There is great resemblance of Christ to Abel. Abel was slain by his brother, Christ by his brethren; the voice of the Jews was, 'Crucify him.' Abel was slain because he sacrificed; Christ was slain that he might be sacrificed. Cain envied Abel because he was accepted; the Jews hated Christ because he was good. Abel might say to his brother, 'For my sacrifice dost thou kill me?' Christ did say to the Jews, 'For which of my good works do ye stone me?' Abel was so slain, that his blood was abundantly shed, and that in many places; for it is said, vox sanguinum,—the 'voice of bloods.' So Christ's blood was let out with thorns, scourges, nails, spear. As Cain sustained a threefold punishment—he was cursed in his soul, a vagabond on earth, unprosperous in his labours; so are the Jews plagued—they have no place they can call their own; when they have heaped up riches, some other takes them away; they cannot see their own city but they must pay for it; they are cursed in their obstinate blindness: thus according to their own request, the blood of Christ is upon them and upon their children.

But now Christ's blood speaks better things: Abel's cried vindictam, Christ's speaks miserordiam. That, 'Lord, see and revenge;' this, 'Father, forgive them, they know not what they do.' God hath an ear of mercy, so well as of justice. If he heard that blood speaking for confusion, then he will hear this speak for remission. If he heard the servant, he will much rather hear the Son; if he heard the servant for spilling, he will much more hear the Son for saving. Postula à me, saith God to his Son,—'Ask of me, and I will give thee,' Ps. 2:8: the Father will deny the Son nothing. Thus hath he saved us prece et pretio,—by his blood, and that a speaking blood: if that blood speak for our safety, nothing shall condemn us. Now the blood of this mediator, our Lord Jesus, speak for us to the Father of mercy, that the Holy Ghost may seal us up to eternal redemption! To whom, three persons, one blessed God, be praise for ever! Amen.

SEMPER IDEM; OR,
THE IMMUTABLE MERCY OF JESUS CHRIST

'Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.'— HEB. 13:8.

BY the name of Jehovah was God known to Israel, from the time of the first mission of Moses to them, and their manumission out of Egypt, and not before. For, saith God to Moses, 'I appeared unto Abraham, and unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty; but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them,' Exod. 6:3. This I AM is an eternal word, comprehending three times: 'that was, that is, and is to come.'

Now, to testify the equality of the Son to the Father, the Scripture gives the same eternity to Jesus that it doth to Jehovah. He is called Alpha and Omega, primus et novissimus, 'the First and the Last: which is, which was, and which is to come,' Rev. 1; and here, 'the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.' Therefore he was not only Christus Dei, the anointed of God, but Christus Deus, God himself anointed; seeing that eternity, which hath neither beginning nor ending, is only peculiar and proper to God.

The words may be distinguished into a centre, a circumference, and a mediate line, referring the one to the other. The immovable centre is Jesus Christ. The circumference, that runs round about him here, is eternity: 'Yesterday, to-day, and for ever.' The mediate line referring them is, ὁ αὐτός, the same: 'Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.'

I. The centre is Jesus Christ. Jesus was his proper name, Christ his appellative. Jesus a name of his nature, Christ of his office and dignity; as divines speak.

Jesus, a name of all sweetness. Mel in ore, melos in aure, jubilus in corde.* A reconciler, a Redeemer, a Saviour. When the conscience wrestles with law, sin, death, there is nothing but horror and despair without Jesus. He is 'the way, the truth, and the life;' without him, error, mendacium, mors. Si scribas, non placet, nisi legam ibi, Jesum, saith Bernard: If thou writest to me, thy letter doth not please me, unless I read there Jesus. If thou conferrest, thy discourse is not sweet, without the name of Jesus. The blessed restorer of all, of more than all that Adam lost; for we have gotten more by his regenerating grace than we lost by Adam's degenerating sin.

Christ is the name of his office; being appointed and anointed of God a king, a priest, a prophet.

This Jesus Christ is our Saviour: of whose names I forbear further discourse, being unable, though I had the tongue of angels, to speak aught worthy tanto nomine, tanto numine. All that can be said is but a little; but I must say but a little in all. But of all names given to our Redeemer, still Jesus is the sweetest. Other, saith Bernard, are names of majesty; Jesus is a name of mercy. The Word of God, the Son of God, the Christ of God, are titles of glory; Jesus, a Saviour, is a title of grace, mercy, redemption.

This Jesus Christ is the centre of this text; and not only of this, but of the whole Scripture. The sum of divinity is the Scripture; the sum of the Scripture is the gospel; the sum of the gospel is Jesus Christ; in a word, nihil continet verbum Domini, nisi verbum Dominum. There is nothing contained in the word of God, but God the word.

Nor is he the centre only of his word, but of our rest and peace. 'I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified,' 1 Cor. 2:2. Thou hast made us for thee, O Christ; and our heart is unquiet till it rest in thee. It is natural to everything appetere centrum, to desire the centre. But 'our life is hid with Christ in God,' Col. 3:3. We must needs amare, where we must animare. Our mind is where our pleasure is, our heart is where our treasure is, our love is where our life is; but all these, our pleasure, treasure, life, are reposed in Jesus Christ. 'Thou art my portion, O Lord,' saith David. Take the world that please, let our portion be in Christ. 'We have left all,' saith Peter, 'and followed thee,' Matt. 19:27; you have lost nothing by it, saith Christ, for you have gotten me. Nimis avarus est, cui non sufficit Christus. He is too covetous, whom Jesus Christ cannot satisfy. Let us seek this centre, saith Agustine: *Quæramus inveniendum, quæramus inventum. Ut inveniendus quæretur, paratus est: ut inventus quæretur, immensus est: Let us seek him till we have found him; and still seek him when we have found him. That seeking, we may find him, he is ready; that finding, we may seek him, he is infinite. You see the centre.

II. The referring line, proper to this centre, is Semper idem, 'The same.' There is no mutability in Christ; 'no variableness, nor shadow of turning,' Jam. 1:17. All lower lights have their inconstancy; but in the 'Father of lights' there is no changeableness. The sun hath his shadow; the 'Sun of righteousness' is without shadow, Mal. 4:2; that turns upon the dial, but Christ hath no turning. 'Whom he loves, he loves to the end,' John 13:1. He loves us to the end; of his love there is no end. Tempus erit consummandi, nullum consumendi misericordiam. His mercy shall be perfected in us, never ended. 'In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy upon thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer,' Isa. 54:8. His wrath is short, his goodness is everlasting. 'The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee,' ver. 10. The mountains are stable things, the hills stedfast; yet hills, mountains, yea the whole earth, shall totter on its foundations; yea the very 'heavens shall pass away with a noise, and the elements shall melt with heat,' 2 Pet. 3:10; but the covenant of God shall not be broken. 'I will betroth thee unto me for ever,' saith God, Hos. 2:19. This marriage-bond shall never be cancelled; nor sin, nor death, nor hell, shall be able to divorce us, Six-and-twenty times in one psalm that sweet singer chaunts it; 'His mercy endureth for ever,' Ps. 136. 'Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.'

As this meditation distils into our believing hearts much comfort, so let it give us some instructions. Two things it readily teacheth us: a dissuasive caution, and a persuasive lesson.

1. It dissuades our confidence in worldly things, because they are inconstant. How poor a space do they remain, Τὰ αὐτὰ, 'the same.' To prove this, you have in Jud. 1:7, a jury of threescore and ten kings to take their oaths upon it. Every one had his throne, yet there they lick up crumbs under another king's table; and shortly even this king, that made them all so miserable, is made himself most miserable. Solomon compares wealth to a wild fowl. 'Riches make themselves wings, they fly away as an eagle toward heaven,' Prov. 23:5. Not some tame house-bird, or a hawk that may be fetched down with a lure, or found again by her bells; but an eagle, that violently cuts the air, and is gone past recalling.

Wealth is like a bird; it hops all day from man to man, as that doth from tree to tree; and none can say where it will roost or rest at night. It is like a vagrant fellow, which because he is big-boned, and able to work, a man takes in a-doors, and cherisheth; and perhaps for a while he takes pains; but when he spies opportunity, the fugitive servant is gone, and takes away more with him than all his service came to. The world may seem to stand thee in some stead for a season, but at last it irrevocably runs away, and carries with it thy joys; thy goods, as Rachel stole Laban's idols; thy peace and content of heart goes with it, and thou art left desperate.

You see how quickly riches cease to be 'the same:' and can any other earthly thing boast more stability? Honour must put off its robes when the play is done; make it never so glorious a show on this world's stage, it hath but a short part to act. A great name of worldly glory is but like a peal rung on the bells; the common people are the clappers; the rope that moves them is popularity; if you once let go your hold and leave pulling, the clapper lies still, and farewell honour. Strength, though, like Jeroboam, it put forth the arm of oppression, shall soon fall down withered, 1 Kings 13:4. Beauty is like an almanack: if it last a year it is well. Pleasure like lightning: oritur, moritur; sweet, but short; a flash and away.

All vanities are but butterflies, which wanton children greedily catch for*; and sometimes they fly beside them, sometimes before them, sometimes behind them, sometimes close by them; yea, through their fingers, and yet they miss them; and when they have them, they are but butterflies; they have painted wings, but are crude and squalid worms. Such are the things of this world, vanities, butterflies. Vel sequendo labimur, vel assequendo lædimur. The world itself is not unlike an artichoke; nine parts of it are unprofitable leaves, scarce the tithe is good: about it there is a little picking meat, nothing so wholesome as dainty: in the midst of it there is a core, which is enough to choke them that devour it.

O then set not your hearts upon these things: calcanda sunt, as Jerome observes on Acts 4. "They that sold their possessions, brought the prices, and laid them down at the Apostles' feet," Acts 4:35. At their feet, not at their hearts; they are fitter to be trodden under feet, than to be waited on with hearts. I conclude this with Augustine. Ecce turbat mundus, et amatur: quid si tranquillus esset? Formoso quomodo hæreris, qui sic amplecteris fædum? Flores ejus quam colligeres, qui sic a spinis non revocas manum? Quam confideres æterno, qui sic adhæres caduco? Behold, the world is turbulent and full of vexation, yet it is loved; how would it be embraced if it were calm and quiet? If it were a beauteous damsel, how would they dote on it, that so kiss it being a deformed stigmatic? How greedily would they gather the flowers, who would not forbear the thorns? They that so admire it being transient and temporal, how would they be enamoured on it if it were eternal? But 'the world passeth,' 1 John

2:17, and God abideth. 'They shall perish, but thou remainest: they all shall wax old as doth a garment: and as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail,' Heb. 1:11, 12. Therefore, 'trust not in uncertain riches, but in the living God,' 1 Tim. 6:17. And then, 'they that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Sion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever,' Psa. 125:1. 'Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.'

2. This persuades us to an imitation of Christ's constancy. Let the stableness of his mercy to us work a stableness of our love to him. And howsoever, like the lower orbs, we have a natural motion of our own from good to evil, yet let us suffer the higher power to move us supernaturally from evil to good. There is in us indeed a reluctant flesh, 'a law in our members warring against the law of our mind,' Rom. 7:23. So Augustine confesseth: *Nec planè nolebam, nec planè volebam. And, Ego eram qui volebam, ego qui nolebam. I neither fully granted, nor plainly denied; and it was I myself that both would and would not. But our ripeness of Christianity must overgrow fluctuant thoughts.

Irresolution and unsteadiness is hateful, and unlike to our master Christ, who is ever the same. 'A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways,' James 1:8. The inconstant man is a stranger in his own house: all his purposes are but guests, his heart is the inn.' If they lodge there for a night, it is all; they are gone in the morning. Many motions come crowding together upon him; and like a great press at a narrow door, whiles all strive, none enter. The epigrammatist wittily, Omnia cùm facias, miraris cur facias nil?

Posthume, rem solam qui facit, ille facit.†

He that will have an oar for every man's boat, shall have none left to row his own. They, saith Melancthon, that will know aliquid in omnibus, shall indeed know nihil in toto. Their admiration or dotage of a thing is extreme for the time, but it is a wonder if it outlive the age of a wonder, which is allowed but nine days. They are angry with time, and say the times are dead, because they produce no more innovations. Their inquiry of all things is not quàm bonum, but quàm novum. They are almost weary of the sun for continual shining. Continuance is a sufficient quarrel against the best things; and the manna of heaven is loathed because it is common.

This is not to be always the same, but never the same; and whiles they would be every thing, they are nothing: but like the worm Pliny writes of, multipoda, that hath many feet, yet is of slow pace. Awhile you shall have him in England, loving the simple truth; anon in Rome, grovelling before an image. Soon after he leaps to Amsterdam; and yet must he still be turning, till there be nothing left but to turn Turk. To winter an opinion is too tedious; he hath been many things. What he will be, you shall scarce know till he is nothing.

But the God of constancy would have his to be constant. Stedfast in your faith to him. 'Continue in the faith, grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel,' Col. 1:23. Stedfast in your faithfulness to man, promising and not disappointing, Psalm 15:4. Do not aliud stantes, aliud sedentes, lest your changing with God teach God to change with you. Nemo potest tibi Christum auferre, nisi te illi auferas.* No man can turn Christ from thee, unless thou turn thyself from Christ. For 'Jesus Christ the same yesterday,' &c.

III. We now come to the circumference, wherein is a distinction of three times; past, present, future. Tempora mutantur: the times change, the circumference wheels about, but the centre is 'the same for ever.'

We must resolve this triplicity into a triplicity. Christ is the same according to these three distinct terms, three distinct ways:—1.

Objectivè, in his word; 2, subjectivè, in his power; 3, effectivè, in his gracious operation.

1. Objectively.—Jesus Christ is the same in his word; and that (1) Yesterday in pre-ordination; (2) To-day in incarnation; (3) For ever in application.

(1.) Yesterday in pre-ordination.—So St Peter, in his sermon, tells the Jews, that 'he was delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God,' Acts 2:23. And in his epistle, that 'he was verily preordained before the foundation of the world,' 1 Pet. 1:20. He is called the 'Lamb slain from the foundation of the world,' Rev. 13:8. Prius profuit, quam fuit. His prophets did foretell him, the types did prefigure him, God himself did promise him. Ratus ordo Dei: the decree of God is constant.

Much comfort I must here leave to your meditation. If God preordained a Saviour for man, before he had either made man, or man marred himself,—as Paul to Timothy, 'He hath saved us according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began,' 2 Tim. 1:9;—then surely he meant that nothing should separate us from his eternal love in that Saviour, Rom. 8:39. Quos elegit increatos, redemit perditos, non deseret redemptos. Whom he chose before they were created, and when they were lost redeemed, he will not forsake being sanctified.

(2.) To-day in incarnation.—'When the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his Son made of a woman,' Gal. 4:4. 'The Word was made flesh,' John 1:14; which was, saith Emissenus,[†] Non deposita, sed seposita majestate. Thus he became younger than his mother, that is as eternal as his Father. He was yesterday God before all worlds, he is now made man in the world. Sanguinem, quem pro matre obtulit, antea de sanguine matris accepit.[‡] The blood that he shed for his mother, he had from his mother. The same Eusebius, on the ninth of Isaiah, acutely, 'Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given,' Isa. 9:6. He was Datus ex Divinitate, natus ex virgine. Datus est qui erat; natus est qui non erat. He was given of the Deity, born of the Virgin. He that was given, was before; he, as born, was not before. Donum dedit Deus æquale sibi: God gave a gift equal to himself.

So he is the same yesterday and to-day, objectively in his word. Idem qui velatus in veteri, revelatus in novo. In illo prædictus, in isto prædicatus. Yesterday prefigured in the law, to-day the same manifested in the gospel.

(3.) For ever in operation. §—He doth continually by his Spirit apply to our consciences the virtue of his death and passion. 'As many as receive him, to them gives he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name,' John 1:12. 'By one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified,' Heb. 10:14. This is sure comfort to us; though he died almost 1629 years ago, his blood is not yet dry. His wounds are as fresh to do us good, as they were to those saints that beheld them bleeding on the cross. The virtue of his merits is not abated, though many hands of faith have taken large portions out of his treasury. The river of his grace, 'which makes glad the city of God,' runs over its banks, though infinite souls have drank hearty draughts, and satisfied their thirst. But because we cannot apprehend this for ourselves of ourselves, therefore he hath promised to send us the 'Spirit of truth, who will dwell with us,' John 14:17, and apply this to us for ever. Thus you have seen the first triplicity, how he is the same objectively in his word. Now he is

2. Subjectively, in his power the same; and that (1) Yesterday, for he made the world; (2) To-day, for he governs the world; (3) For ever, for he shall judge the world.

(1.) Yesterday in the creation. 'All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made,' John 1:3. 'By him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by him, and for him,' Col. 1:16. All things, even the great and fair book of the world, of three so large leaves, coelum, solum, salum; heaven, earth, and sea. The prophet calls him 'the everlasting Father,' Isa. 9:6; Daniel, the 'Ancient of days,' Dan. 7:9. Solomon says, that 'the Lord possessed him in the beginning of his way, before his works of old,' Prov. 8:22. So himself told the unbelieving Jews, 'Before Abraham was, I am,' John 8:58.

We owe, then, ourselves to Christ for our creation; but how much more for our redemption? *Si totum me debeo pro me facto, quid addam jam pro me refecto? In primo opere me mihi dedit: in secundo se mihi dedit. If I owe him my whole self for making me, what have I left to pay him for redeeming me? In the first work, he gave myself to me; in the second, he gave himself to me. By a double right, we owe him ourselves; we are worthy of a double punishment, if we give him not his own.

(2.) To-day in the governing. 'He upholdeth all things by the word of his power,' Heb. 1:3. He is pater familias, and disposeth all things in this universe with greater care and providence than any householder can manage the business of his private family. He leaves it not, as the carpenter having built the frame of an house, to others to perfect it, but looks to it himself. His creation and providence are like the mother and the nurse, the one produceth, the other preserveth. His creation was a short providence; his providence a perpetual creation. The one sets up the frame of the house, the other keeps it in reparation.

Neither is this a disparagement to the majesty of God, as the vain Epicures imagined, curare minima, to regard the least things, but rather an honour, curare infinita, to regard all things. Neither doth this extend only to natural things, chained together by a regular order of succession, but even to casual and contingent things. Oftentimes, cùm aliud volumus, aliud agimus, the event crosseth our purpose; which must content us, though it fall out otherwise than we purposed, because God purposed as it is fallen out. It is enough that the thing attain its own end, though it miss ours; that God's will be done, though ours be crossed.

But let me say, Hath God care of fowls and flowers, and will he not care for you, his own image? Matt. 6:26–30. Yea, let me go further; hath God care of the wicked? Doth he pour down the happy influences of heaven on the 'unjust man's ground?' Matt. 5:45. And shall the faithful want his blessing? Doth he provide for the sons of Belial, and shall his own children lack? He may give meat and raiment to the rest, but his bounty to Benjamin shall exceed. If Moab, his wash-pot, taste of his benefits, then Judah, the signet on his finger, cannot be forgotten. The king governs all the subjects in his dominions, but his servants that wait in his court partake of his most princely favours. God heals the sores of the very wicked; but if it be told him, 'Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick,' (John 11:3), it is enough, he shall be healed. The wicked may have outward blessings without inward, and that is Esau's pottage without his birthright; but the elect have inward blessings, though they want outward, and that is Jacob's inheritance without his pottage.

(3.) For ever: because he shall judge the world. 'God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained,' Acts 17:31. 'In the day that God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ,' Rom. 2:16. Let the wicked flatter themselves that all is but talk of any coming to judgment; non aliud videre patres, aliudve nepotes aspicient; all is but terriculamenta nutricum, mere scare-babes. Scribarum pennæ mendaces; they have written lies, there is no such matter. But when they shall see that Lamb 'whom they have pierced' and scorned (Rev. 1:7), 'they shall cry to the mountains and rocks, Fall upon us, and cover us,' Rev. 6:16. Now they flatter themselves with his death; Mortuus est, he is dead and gone; and Mortuum Cæsarem quis metuit? Who fears even a Cæsar when he is dead? But 'He that was dead, liveth; behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen,' Rev. 1:18. 'Jesus Christ, yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.' Quæsitior scelerum veniet, vindexque reorum.

Here is matter of infallible comfort to us: 'Lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh,' Luke 21:28. Here we are imprisoned, martyred, tortured; but when that great assize and general jail-delivery comes, mors non erit ultra, 'There shall be no more death nor sorrow, but all tears shall be wiped from our eyes,' Rev. 21:4. 'For it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you. And to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with his mighty angels,' 2 Thess. 1:6, 7. We shall then find him the same;—the same Lamb that bought us shall give us a Venite beati, 'Come, ye blessed, receive your kingdom.' 'Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus,' Rev. 22:20.

3. Effectually in his grace and mercy. So he is the same, (1) Yesterday to our fathers; (2) To-day to ourselves; (3) For ever to our children.

(1.) Yesterday to our fathers.—All our fathers, whose souls are now in heaven, those 'spirits of just men made perfect,' Heb. 12:23, were, as the next words intimate, saved 'by Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, and by the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel.' Whether they lived under nature, or under the law, Christ was their expectation; and they were justified credendo in venturum Christum, by believing in the Messiah to come. So Luke 2:25, Simeon is said to 'wait for the consolation of Israel.'

(2.) To-day to ourselves.—His mercy is everlasting; his truth endureth from generation to generation. The same gracious Saviour that he was yesterday to our fathers, is he to-day to us, if we be to-day faithful to him. All catch at this comfort, but in vain without the hand of faith. There is no deficiency in him; but is there none in thee? Whatsoever Christ is, what art thou? He forgave Mary Magdalene many grievous sins; so he will forgive thee, if thou canst shed Mary Magdalene's tears. He took the malefactor from the cross to Paradise; thither he will receive thee if thou have the same faith. He was merciful to a denying apostle; challenge thou the like mercy, if thou have the like repentance. If we will be like these Christ, assuredly, will be ever like himself. When any man shall prove to be such a sinner, he will not fail to be such a Saviour:

To-day he is thine, if to-day thou wilt be his: thine to-morrow, if yet to-morrow thou wilt be his. But how if dark death prevent the morrow's light? He was yesterday, so wert thou: he is to-day, so art thou: he is to-morrow, so perhaps mayest thou not be. Time may change thee, though it cannot change him. He is not (but thou art) subject to mutation. This I dare boldly say: he that repents but one day before he dies, shall find Christ the same in mercy and forgiveness. Wickedness itself is glad to hear this; but let the sinner be faithful on his part, as God is merciful on his part: let him be sure that he repent one day before he dies, whereof he cannot be sure, except he repent every day; for no man knows his last day. Latet ultimus dies, ut observetur omnis dies. Therefore (saith Augustine) we know not our last day, that we might observe every day. 'To-day, therefore, hear his voice,' Psa. 95:7.

Thou hast lost yesterday negligently, thou lovest to-day wilfully; and therefore mayest lose for ever inevitably. It is just with God to punish two days' neglect with the loss of the third. The hand of faith may be withered, the spring of repentance dried up, the eye of hope blind, the foot of charity lame. To-day, then, hear his voice, and make him thine. Yesterday is lost, to-day may be gotten; but that once gone, and thou with it, when thou art dead and judged, it will do thee small comfort that 'Jesus Christ is the same for ever.'

(3.) For ever to our children.—He that was yesterday the God of Abraham, is to-day ours, and will be for ever our children's. As well now 'the light of the Gentiles,' as before 'the glory of Israel,' Luke 2:32. I will be the God of thy seed, saith the Lord to Abraham. 'His mercy is on them that fear him, from generation to generation,' Luke 1:50.

Many persons are solicitously perplexed, how their children shall do when they are dead; yet they consider not how God provided for them when they were children. Is the 'Lord's arm shortened?' Did he take thee from thy mother's breasts; and 'when thy parents forsook thee,' (as the Psalmist saith), became thy Father? And cannot this experienced mercy to thee, persuade thee that he will not forsake thine? Is not 'Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever?' 'I have been young,' saith David, 'and am now old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken'—that is granted, nay—'nor his seed begging bread,' Ps. 37:25.

Many distrustful fathers are so carking for their posterity, that while they live they starve their bodies, and hazard their souls, to leave them rich. To such a father it is said justly: Dives es hæredi, pauper inopsque tibi. Like an over-kind hen, he feeds his chickens, and famisheth himself. If usury, circumvention, oppression, extortion, can make them rich, they shall not be poor. Their folly is ridiculous; they fear lest their children should be miserable, yet take the only course to make them miserable; for they leave them not so much heirs to their goods as to their evils. They do as certainly inherit their father's sins as their lands: 'God layeth up his iniquity for his children; and his offspring shall want a morsel of bread,' Job 21:19.

On the contrary, 'the good man is merciful, and lendeth; and his seed is blessed,' Ps. 37:26. That the worldling thinks shall make his posterity poor, God saith shall make the good man's rich. The precept gives a promise of mercy to obedience, not only confined to the obedient man's self, but extended to his seed, and that even to a thousand generations, Exod. 20:6. Trust, then, Christ with thy children; when thy friends shall fail, usury bear no date, oppression be condemned to hell, thyself rotten to the dust, the world itself turned and burned into cinders, still 'Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.' Now then, as 'grace and peace are from him which is, and which was, and which is to come;' so glory and honour be to him, which is, and which was, and which is to come; even to 'Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever,' Rev. 1:4.

THE TAMING OF THE TONGUE

But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison.'—JAMES 3:8.

HERE is a single position, guarded with a double reason. The position is, 'No man can tame the tongue.' The reasons; 1. It is 'unruly.' 2. 'Full of deadly poison.' Here is busy dealing with a wild member; a more difficult task, and intractable nature have met. Tongue is the subject (I mean in the discourse), and can you ever think of subjecting it to modest reason, or taming it to religion? Go lead a lion in a single hair, send up an eagle to the sky to peck out a star, coop up the thunder, and quench a flaming city with one widow's tears; if thou couldst do these, yet nescit modo lingua domari. As the proposition is backed with two reasons; so each reason hath a terrible second. The evil hath for its second unruliness; the poisonfulness hath deadly. It is evil, yea, unruly evil; it is poison, yea, deadly poison. The fort is so barricaded, that it is hard scaling it; the refractory rebel so guarded with evil and poison, so warded with unruly and deadly, as if it were with giants in an enchanted tower, as they fabulate, that no man can tame it. Yet let us examine the matter, and find a stratagem to subdue it.

I. In the Proposition we will observe, 1. The nature of the thing to be tamed. 2. The difficulty of accomplishing it.

1. The insubjectable subject is the tongue, which is (1), a member; and (2), an excellent, necessary, little, singular member.

(1.) It is a member.—He that made all made the tongue; he that craves all, must have the tongue. Qui creavit necessariam, postulat creatam. It is an instrument; let it give music to him that made it. All creatures in their kind bless God, Ps. 148. They that want tongues, as the heavens, sun, stars, meteors, orbs, elements, praise him with such obedient testimonies as their insensible natures can afford. They that have tongues, though they want reason, praise him with those natural organs. The birds of the air sing, the beasts of the earth make a noise; not so much as the hissing serpents, the very 'dragons in the deep,' but sound out his praise. Man, then, that hath a tongue, and a reason to guide it, and more, a religion to direct his reason, should much much more bless him. Therefore, says the Psalmographer, that for the well tuning of his tongue is called the 'Sweet Singer of Israel,' 'I will praise the Lord with the best instrument I have,' which was his tongue.

Not that praise can add to God's glory, nor blasphemies detract from it. The blessing tongue cannot make him better, nor the cursing, worse. *Nec melior si laudaveris, nec deterior si vituperaveris. As the sun is neither bettered by birds singing, nor battered by dogs barking. He is so infinitely great, and constantly good, that his glory admits neither addition nor diminution.

Yet we that cannot make his name greater, can make it seem greater; and though we cannot enlarge his glory, we may enlarge the manifestation of his glory. This both in words praising and in works practising. We know it is impossible to make a new Christ, as the papists boast the almightiness of their priests; yet our holy lives and happy lips (if I may so speak) may make a little Christ a great Christ. They that before little regarded him, may thus be brought to esteem him greatly; giving him the honour due to his name, and glorifying him, after our example.

This is the tongue's office. Every member, without arrogating any merit, or boasting the beholdenness of the rest unto it, is to do that duty which is assigned to it. The eye is to see for all, the ear to hear for all, the hand to work for all, the feet to walk for all, the knees to bow for all, the tongue to praise God for all. This is the tongue's office, not unlike the town-clerk's, which, if it perform not well, the corporation is better without it. The tongue is man's clapper, and is given him that he may sound out the praise of his Maker. Infinite causes draw deservedly from man's lips, a devout acknowledgment of God's praise; Quia Creator ad esse; Conservator in esse; Recreator in bene esse; Glorificator in optimo esse.

He gave us being that had none; preserved us in that being; restored us, voluntarily fallen, unto a better being; and will glorify us with the best at the day of the Lord Jesus. Then let the tongue know, Si non reddet Deo faciendo quæ debet, reddet ei patiando quæ debet.† If it will not pay God the debt it owes him in an active thankfulness, it shall pay him in a passive painfulness. Let the meditation hereof put our tongues into tune. 'A word fitly spoken, is like apples of gold in pictures of silver,' Prov. 25:11.

(2.) It is a member you hear; we must take it with all its properties; excellent, necessary, little, singular.

[1.] Excellent. Abstractively and simply understood, it is an exceeding excellent member, both quoad majestatem, et quoad jucunditatem.

First; For the majesty of it, it carries an imperious speech; wherein it hath the pre-eminence of all mortal creatures. It was man's tongue to which the Lord gave licence to call all the living creatures, and to give them names, Gen. 2:19. And it is a strong motive to induce and to beget in other terrene natures a reverence and admiration of man. Therefore it is observed, that God did punish the ingratitude of Balaam, when he gave away some of the dignity proper to man, which is use of speech, and imparted it to the ass. Man alone speaks. I know that spirits can frame an aerial voice, as the devil when he spake in the serpent that fatal temptation, as in a trunk; but man only hath the habitual faculty of speaking.

Secondly; For the pleasantness of the tongue, the general consent of all gives it the truest melos, and restrains all musical organs from the worth and praise of it. 'The pipe and the psaltery make sweet melody; but a pleasant tongue is above them both,' Eccclus. 40:21. No instruments are so ravishing, or prevail over man's heart with so powerful complacency, as the tongue and voice of man.

If the tongue be so excellent, how then doth this text censure it for so evil? I take the philosopher's old and trite answer, Lingua nihil est vel bona melius, vel mala pejus: Than a good tongue, there is nothing better; than an evil, nothing worse. Nihil habet medium, aut grande bonum est, aut grande malum:* It hath no mean; it is either exceedingly good or excessively evil. It knows nothing but extremes; and is or good, best of all; or bad, worst of all. If it be good, it is a walking garden, that scatters in every place a sweet flower, an herb of grace to the hearers. If it be evil, it is a wild bedlam, full of goading and madding mischiefs. So the tongue is every man's best or worst moveable.

Hereupon that philosophical servant, when he was commanded to provide the best meat for his master's table, the worst for the family, bought and brought to either, neats' tongues. His moral was, that this was both the best and worst service, according to the goodness or badness of the tongue. A good tongue is a special dish for God's public service. Pars optima hominis, digna quæ sit hostia:† The best part of a man, and most worthy the honour of sacrifice. This only when it is well seasoned. Seasoned, I say, 'with salt,' as the apostle admonisheth; not with fire, Col. 4:6. Let it not be so salt as fire (as that proverb speaks), which no man living hath tasted. There is 'a city of salt,' mentioned Josh. 15:62. Let no man be an inhabitant of this salt city. Yet better a salt tongue than an oily. Rather 'let the righteous reprove me,' than the precious balms of flatterers break my head, whilst they most sensibly soothe and supple it. We allow the tongue salt, not pepper; let it be well seasoned, but not too hot. Thus a good tongue is God's dish, and he will accept it at his own table.

But an evil tongue is meat for the devil, according to the Italian proverb: The devil makes his Christmas pie of lewd tongues. It is his daintiest dish, and he makes much of it; whether on earth, to serve his turn as an instrument of mischief, or in hell, to answer his fury in torments. Thus saith Solomon of the good tongue: 'The tongue of the just is as choice silver, and the lips of the righteous feed many,' Prov. 10:20, 21. But Saint James of the bad one: 'It is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison.'

[2.] It is necessary; so necessary, that without a tongue I could not declare the necessity of it. It converseth with man, conveying to others by this organ that experimental knowledge which must else live and die in himself. It imparts secrets, communicates joys, which would be less happy suppressed than they are expressed; mirth without a partner is hilaris cum pondere felicitas. But to disburden griefs, and pour forth sorrows in the bosom of a friend, O necessary tongue! How many hearts would have burst if thou hadst not given them vent! How many souls fallen grovelling under their load, if thou hadst not called for some supportance! How many a panting spirit hath said, I will speak yet ere I die; and by speaking received comfort! Lastly, it speaks our devotions to heaven, and hath the honour to confer with God. It is that instrument which the Holy Ghost useth in us to cry, 'Abba, Father.' It is our spokesman; and he that can hear the heart without a tongue, regardeth the devotions of the heart better, when they are sent up by a diligent messenger, a faithful tongue.

[3.] It is little. As man is a little world in the great, so is his tongue a great world in the little. It is a 'little member,' saith the apostle, ver. 5, yet it is a world; yea, pravitatis universitas, 'a world of iniquity,' ver. 6. It is parvum, but pravum; little in quantity, but great in iniquity. What it hath lost in the thickness, it hath gotten in the quickness; and the defect of magnitude is recompensed in the agility. An arm may be longer, but the tongue is stronger; and a leg hath more flesh than it hath, besides bones, which it hath not; yet the tongue still runs quicker and faster: and if the wagger lie for holding out, without doubt the tongue shall win it.

If it be a talking tongue, it is mundus garrulitatis, a world of prating. If it be a wrangling tongue, it is mundus litigationis, a world of babbling. If it be a learned tongue, it is, as Erasmus said of Bishop Tostal, mundus eruditionis, a world of learning, If it be a petulant tongue, it is mundus scurrilitatis, a world of wantonness. If it be a poisonous tongue, it is mundus infectionis; saith our apostle, 'it defileth the whole body,' ver. 6. It is 'little.'

So little, that it will scarce give a kite her breakfast, yet it can discourse of the sun and stars, of orbs and elements, of angels and devils, of nature and arts; and hath no straiter limits than the whole world to walk through. Homuncio est, gigantea jactat: It is a 'little member,' yet 'boasteth great things,' ver. 5.

Though it be little, yet if good, it is of great use. A little bit guideth a great horse, ad equitis libitum, to the rider's pleasure. A little helm ruleth a great vessel; though the winds blow, and the floods oppose, yet the helm steers the ship. Though little, yet if evil, it is of great mischief. 'A little leaven sours the whole lump,' 1 Cor. 5:6. A little remora dangers a great vessel. A little sickness distempereth the whole body. A little fire setteth a whole city on combustion. 'Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth,' ver. 5.

It is little in substance, yet great ad affectum, to provoke passion; ad effectum, to produce action. A Seminary's tongue is able to set instruments on work to blow up a parliament. So God hath disposed it among the members, that it governs or misgoverns all; and is either a good king, or a cruel tyrant. It either prevails to good, or perverts to evil; purifieth or putrefieth the whole carcase, the whole conscience. It betrayeth the heart, when the heart would betray God; and the Lord lets it double treason on itself, when it prevaricates with him.

It is a little leak that drowneth a ship, a little breach that loseth an army, a little spring that pours forth an ocean. Little; yet the lion is more troubled with the little wasp, than with the great elephant. And it is observable, that the Egyptian sorcerers failed in minimis, that appeared skilful and powerful in majoribus. Doth Moses turn the waters into blood? 'The magicians did so with their enchantments,' Exod. 7:22. Doth Aaron stretch out his hand over the waters, and cover the land with frogs? 'The magicians did so with their enchantments,' Exod. 8:7. But when Aaron smote the dust of the land, and turned it into lice (ver. 17), the magicians could not effect the like; nor in the ashes of the furnace turned into boils and blains, chap. 9:10. In frogs and waters they held a semblance, not in the dust and ashes turned into lice and sores. Many have dealt better with the greater members of the body than with this little one. Defecerunt in minimis:

Virtus non minima est, minimam compescere linguam.

[4.] It is a singular member. God hath given man two ears; one to hear instructions of human knowledge, the other to hearken to his divine precepts; the former to conserve his body, the latter to save his soul. Two eyes, that with the one he might see to his own way, with the other pity and commiserate his distressed brethren. Two hands, that with the one he might work for his own living, with the other give and relieve his brother's wants. Two feet, one to walk on common days to his ordinary labour. 'Man goes forth in the morning to his labour, and continues till the evening,' Ps. 104:23: the other, on sacred days to visit and frequent the temple and the congregation of saints. But among all, he hath given him but one tongue; which may instruct him to hear twice so much as he speaks; to work and walk twice so much as he speaks. 'I will praise thee, O Lord, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvellous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well,' Ps. 139:14. Stay, and wonder at the wonderful wisdom of God!

First, To create so little a piece of flesh, and to put such vigour into it: to give it neither bones nor nerves, yet to make it stronger than arms and legs, and those most able and serviceable parts of the body. So that as Paul saith, 'On those members of the body, which we think less honourable, we bestow more abundant honour: and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness,' 1 Cor. 12:23. So on this little weak member hath the Lord conferred the greatest strength; and as feeble as it is, we find it both more necessary and more honourable.

Secondly, Because it is so forcible, therefore hath the most wise God ordained that it shall be but little, that it shall be but one. That so the parvity and singularity may abate the vigour of it. If it were paired, as the arms, legs, hands, feet, it would be much more unruly. For he that cannot tame one tongue, how would he be troubled with twain! But so hath the Ordinator provided, that things of the fiercest and fieriest nature should be little, that the malice of them might be somewhat restrained.

Thirdly, Because it is so unruly, the Lord hath hedged it in, as a man will not trust a wild horse in an open pasture, but prison him in a close pound. A double fence hath the Creator given to confine it, the lips and the teeth; that through these mounds it might not break. And hence a threefold instruction for the use of the tongue is insinuated to us.

First; Let us not dare to pull up God's mounds; nor, like wild beasts, break through the circular limits wherein he hath cooped us. 'Look that thou hedge thy possession about with thorns, and bind up thy silver and gold,' Ecclus. 28:24. What, doth the wise man intend to give us some thrifty counsel, and spend his ink in the rule of good husbandry, which every worldling can teach himself? No. Yes; he exhorteth us to the best husbandry, how to guide and guard our tongues, and to thrive in the good use of speech. Therefore declares himself: 'Weigh thy words in a balance, and make a door and bar for thy mouth.' Let this be the possession thou so hedgest in, and thy precious gold thou so bindest up. 'Beware thou slide not by it, lest thou fall before him that lieth in wait.' Commit not burglary, by breaking the doors, and pulling down the bars of thy mouth.

Much more, when the Lord hath hung a lock on it, do not pick it with a false key. Rather pray with David, 'O Lord, open thou my lips, and my mouth shall shew forth thy praise,' Ps. 51:15. It is absurd in building, to make the porch bigger than the house; it is as monstrous in nature, when a man's words are too many, too mighty. Every man mocks such a gaping boaster with Quid feret hic dignum tanto promissor hiatu? Saint Bernard gives us excellent counsel. Sint tua verba rara, contra multiloquium; vera, contra falsiloquium; ponderosa, contra vaniloquium. Let thy words be few, true, weighty, that thou mayest not speak much, not falsely, not vainly. Remember the bounds, and keep the non ultra.

Secondly; Since God hath made the tongue one, have not thou 'a tongue and a tongue.' Some are double-tongued, as they are double-hearted. But God hath given one tongue, one heart, that they might be one indeed, as they are in number. It is made simple; let it not be double. God hath made us men; we make ourselves monsters. He hath given us two eyes, two ears, two hands, two feet. Of all these we will have, or at least use, but one. We have one eye to pry into others' faults, not another to see our own. We have one ear to hear the plaintiff, not the other for the defendant. We have a foot swift to enter forbidden paths, not another to lead us to God's holy place. We have one hand to extort, and scrape, and wound, and not another to relieve, give alms, heal the wounded. But now whereas God hath given us but one tongue and one heart, and bidden us be content with their singularity, we will have two tongues, two hearts. Thus cross are we to God, to nature, to grace; monstrous men; monoculi, monopodes: bicordes, bilingues: one-eyed, one-footed; double-tongued, double-hearted. The slanderer, the flatterer, the swearer, the tale-bearer, are monstrous (I dare scarce add) men: as misshapen stigmatics as if they had two tongues and but one eye; two heads and but one foot.

Thirdly; This convinceth them of preposterous folly, that put all their malice into their tongue, as the serpent all her poison in her tail; and, as it were by a chemical power, attract all vigour thither, to the weakening and enervation of the other parts. Their hands have chiram; they cannot stretch them forth to the poor, nor give relief to the needy. Their feet podagram; they cannot go to the church. Their eyes ophthalmiam; they cannot behold the miserable and pity-needing. Their ears surditatem; they cannot hear the gospel preached. Oh how defective and sick all these members are! But their tongues are in health; there is blitheness and volubility in them. If they see a distressed man, they can give him talkative comfort enough; 'Be warmed, be filled, be satisfied,' Jam. 2:16. They can fill him with Scripture sentences, but they send him away with a hungry stomach; whereas the good man's hand is as ready to give, as his tongue to speak. But the fool's lips babbleth foolishness; volat irrevocabile verbum. Words run like Asahel; but good works, like the cripple, come lagging after.

2. We see the nature of the thing to be tamed, the tongue; let us consider the difficulty of this enterprise. No man can do it. Which we shall best find, if we compare it (1.) with other members of the body; (2.) with other creatures of the world.

(1.) With other members of the body, which are various in their faculties and offices; none of them idle.

[1.] The eye sees far, and beholdeth the creatures in cælo, solo, salo: in the heavens, sun, and stars; on the earth, birds, beasts, plants, and minerals; in the sea, fishes and serpents. That it is an unruly member, let our grandmother speak, whose roving eye lost us all. Let Dinah speak; her wandering eye lost her virginity, caused the effusion of much blood. Let the Jews speak concerning the daughters of Midian; what a fearful apostasy the eye procured! Yea, let David acknowledge, whose petulant eye robbed Uriah of his wife and life, the land of a good soldier, his own heart of much peace. Yet this eye, as unruly as it is, hath been tamed. Did not Job 'make a covenant with his eyes, that he would not look upon a maid?' Job 31:1. The eye hath been tamed; 'but the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil.'

[2.] The ear yet hears more than ever the eye saw; and by reason of its patulous admission, derives that to the understanding whereof the sight never had a glance. It can listen to the whisperings of a Doeg, to the susurrations of a devil, to the noise of a Siren, to the voice of a Delilah. The parasite through this window creeps into the great man's favour; he tunes his warbling notes to an enlarged ear. It is a wild member, an instrument that Satan delights to play upon. As unruly as it is, yet it hath been tamed. Mary sat at the feet of Christ, and heard him preach with glad attention. The ear hath been tamed; 'but the tongue can no man tame,' &c.

[3.] The foot is an unhappy member, and carries a man to much wickedness. It is often swift to the shedding of blood; and runneth away from God, Jonah's pace; flying to Tarshish, when it is bound for Nineveh. There is 'a foot of pride,' Ps. 36:11, a saucy foot, that dares presumptuously enter upon God's freehold. There is a foot of rebellion, that with an apostate malice kicks at God. There is a dancing foot, that paceth the measures of circular wickedness. Yet, as unruly as this foot is, it hath been tamed. David got the victory over it. 'I considered my ways, and turned my foot unto thy testimonies,' Ps. 119:59. The foot hath been tamed; 'but the tongue can no man tame,' &c.

[4.] The hand rageth and rangeth with violence, to take the bread it never sweat for, to enclose fields, to depopulate towns, to lay waste whole countries. 'They covet fields, and houses, and vineyards, and take them, because their hand hath power,' Mic. 2:2. There is a hand of extortion, as Ahab's was to Naboth; the greedy landlord's to the poor tenant. There is a hand of fraud and of legerdemain, as the usurer's to the distressed borrower. There is a hand of bribery, as Judas, with his quantum dabit, what will you give me to betray the Lord of life? There is a hand of lust, as Amnon's to an incestuous rape. There is a hand of murder, as Joab's to Abner, or Absalom's to Amnon. Oh, how unruly hath this member been! Yet it hath been tamed; not by washing it in Pilate's basin, but in David's holy water, innocence. 'I will wash my hands in innocency, and then, O Lord, will I compass thine altar.' Hereupon he is bold to say, 'Lord, look if there be any iniquity in my hands,' Ps. 7:3. God did repudiate all the Jews' sacrifices, because their hands were full of blood, Isa. 1:15. David's hands had been besmeared with the aspersion of lust and blood, but he had penitently bathed them in his own tears; and because that could not get out the stains, he faithfully rinseth and cleanseth them in his Son's and Saviour's fountain, the all-meritorious blood of Christ. This made them look white, whiter than lilies in God's sight. 'Therefore hath the Lord recompensed me according to my righteousness; according to the cleanness of my hands in his eyesight,' Ps. 18:24.

Thus the eye, the ear, the foot, the hand, though wild and unruly enough, have been tamed; 'but the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil,' &c.

(2.) With other creatures of the world, whether we find them in the earth, air, or water.

[1.] On the earth there is the man-hating tiger, yet man hath subdued him; and (they write) a little boy hath led him in a string. There is the flock-devouring wolf, that stands at grinning defiance with the shepherd; mad to have his prey, or lose himself; yet he hath been tamed. The roaring lion, whose voice is a terror to man, by man hath been subdued. Yea serpents, that have to their strength two shrewd additions, subtlety and malice; that carry venom in their mouths, or a sting in their tails, or are all over poisonous; the very basilisk, that kills with his eyes (as they write) three furlongs off. Yea, all these savage, furious, malicious natures have been tamed; 'but the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil,' &c.

[2.] In the sea there be great wonders. 'They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters; these see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep,' Ps. 107:23, 24. Yet those natural wonders have been tamed by our artificial wonders, ships. Even the leviathan himself, 'out of whose mouth go burning lamps and sparks of fire. Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a boiling caldron,' Job 41:19, 20. Squama squamæ conjungitur: 'the flakes of his flesh are joined together; they are firm in themselves, and cannot be moved.' Yet we know that this huge creature hath been tamed; 'but the tongue can no man tame,' &c.

[3.] In the air, the birds fly high above our reach, yet we have gins to fetch them down. A lure stops the highest-soaring hawk; nay, art makes one fowl catch another, for man's delight and benefit; incredible things, if they were not ordinary. Snares, lime-twigs, nets, tame them all; even the pelican in the desert, and the eagle amongst the cedars. Thus saith our apostle, verses 7, 8: 'Every kind' (not every one of every kind, but every kind of nature of all), 'of beasts, of birds, of serpents, and of things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of the nature of man; 'but the tongue can no man tame,' &c.

Thus far, then, St James's proposition passeth without opposition. 'The tongue can no man tame;' the tongue is too wild for any man's taming. It would be a foolish exception (and yet there are such profane tongues to speak it), that woman stands without this compass and latitude; and to infer, that though no man can tame the tongue, yet a woman may. It is most unworthy of answer. Woman, for the most part, hath the glibbest tongue; and if ever this impossibility preclude men, it shall much more annihilate the power of the weaker sex. 'She is loud,' saith Solomon, Prov. 7:11; 'a foolish woman is ever clamorous,' 9:13. She calls her tongue her defensive weapon; she means offensive: a firebrand in a frantic hand doth less mischief. The proverb came not from nothing, when we say of a brawling man, He hath a woman's tongue in his head.

'The tongue can no man tame.' Let us listen to some weightier exceptions. The prophets spake the oracles of life, and the apostles the words of salvation; and many men's speech ministers grace to the hearers. Yield it; yet this general rule will have no exceptions: 'no man can tame it:' man hath no stern* for this ship, no bridle for this colt. How then? God tamed it. We by nature stammer as Moses, till God open a door of utterance. 'I am of unclean lips,' saith the prophet, 'and dwell with a people of unclean lips,' Isa. 6:5. God must lay a coal of his own altar upon our tongues, or they cannot be tamed.

And when they are tamed, yet they often have an unruly trick. Abraham lies; Moses murmurs; Elias, for fear of a queen and a quean, wisheth to die. Jonah frets for the gourd; David cries in his heart, † 'All men are liars;' which speech rebounded even on God himself, as if the Lord by Samuel had deceived him. Peter forswears his Master, his Saviour. If the tongues of the just have thus tripped, how should the profane go upright? 'The tongue can no man tame.'

The instruction hence riseth in full strength; that God only can tame man's tongue. Now the principal actions hereof are, first, to open the mouth, when it should not be shut; secondly, to shut it, when it should not be open.

First, To open our lips when they should speak is the sole work of God. 'O Lord, open thou my lips, and then my mouth shall be able to shew forth thy praise,' Ps. 51:15. God must open with his golden key of grace, or else our tongues will arrogate a licentious passage. We had better hold our peace, and let our tongues lie still, than set them a-running till God bids them go. God commands every sinner to confess his iniquities; this charge, David knew, concerned himself; yet was David silent, and then his 'bones waxed old' with anguish, Ps. 32:3. His adultery cried, his murder cried, his ingratitude cried for revenge; but still David was mute; and so long, 'day and night, the hand of the Lord was heavy upon him.' But at last God stopped the mouth of his clamorous adversaries, and gave him leave to speak. 'I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin.' It is Christ that must cast out this devil. The Lord is the best opener. He did open Lydia's heart, to conceive, Acts 16:14. He did open Elisha's servant's eyes to see, 2 Kings 6:17. He did open the prophet's ears to hear, Isa. 50:5. He did open Paul's mouth to speak, Col. 4:3.

Secondly, To shut our lips when they should not speak, is only the Lord's work also. It is Christ that casts out the talking devil; he shuts the wicket of our mouth against unsavoury speeches. We may think it a high office (and worthy even David's ambition) to be a 'door-keeper in God's house' Ps. 84:10, when God vouchsafes to be a door-keeper in our house.

Thus all is from God. Man is but a lock; God's Spirit the key 'that openeth, and no man shutteth; that shutteth, and no man openeth,' Rev. 3:7. He opens, and no man shuts. I must speak though I die, saith Jeremiah; 'his word is like fire in my bones,' Jer. 20:9; and will make me weary of forbearing. He shuts, and no man opens; so Zacharias goes dumb from the altar, and could not speak, Luke 1:22.

Away, then, with arrogation of works, if not of words. When a man hath a good thought, it is gratia infusa; when a good work, it is gratia diffusa. If then man cannot produce words to praise God, much less can he procure his works to please God. If he cannot tune his tongue, he can never turn his heart. Two useful benefits may be made hereof.

First, It is taught us, whither we have recourse to tame our tongues. He that gave man a tongue, can tame the tongue. He that gave man a tongue to speak, can give him a tongue to speak well. He that placed that unruly member in his mouth, can give him a mouth to rule it. He can give psalms for carols; the songs of Zion for the ballads of hell. Man hath no bridle, no cage of brass, nor bars of iron to tame it; God can. Let us move our tongues to entreat help for our tongues; and, according to their office, let us set them on work to speak for themselves.

Secondly, We must not be idle ourselves; the difficulty must spur us to more earnest contention. As thou wouldst keep thy house from thieves, thy garments from moths, thy gold from rust, so carefully preserve thy tongue from unruliness. As 'the Lord doth set a watch before thy mouth, and keep the door of thy lips,' Ps. 141:3; so thou must also be vigilant thyself, and not turn over thy own heart to security. 'How can ye, being evil, speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh,' Matt. 12:34. Look how far the heart is good, so far the tongue. If the heart believe, the tongue will confess; if the heart be meek, the tongue will be gentle; if the heart be angry, the tongue will be bitter. The tongue is but the hand without, to shew how the clock goes within. A vain tongue discovers a vain heart. But some have words oft as butter, when their hearts are keen swords; be they never so well traded in the art of dissembling, some time or other the tongue, Judas-like, will betray its master; it will mistake the heart's errand, and, with stumbling forgetfulness, trip at the door of truth. 'The heart of fools is in their mouth: but the mouth of the wise is in their heart,' Eccles. 21:26. To avoid ill communication, hate ill cogitation: a polluted heart makes a foul mouth; therefore one day, ex ore tuo, 'out of thine own mouth, will God condemn thee.'

II. 1. It is 'an unruly evil.'—The difficulty of taming the tongue, one would think, were sufficiently expressed in the evil of it; but the apostle seconds it with another obstacle, signifying the wild nature of it, unruly. It is not only an evil, but an unruly evil. I will set the champion and his second together in this fight, and then shew the hardness of the combat.

Bernard saith, Lingua facile volat, et ideo facile violat: The tongue runs quickly, therefore wrongs quickly. Speedy is the pace it goes, and therefore speedy is the mischief it does. When all other members are dull with age, the tongue alone is quick and nimble. It is an unruly evil to ourselves, to our neighbours, to the whole world.*

(1.) To ourselves; verse 6, 'it is so placed among the members, that it defileth all.' Though it were evil as the plague, and unruly as the possessed Gergesene (Matth. 8), yet if set off with distance, the evil rests within itself. A leper shut up in a pesthouse rankleth to himself, infects not others. A wild cannibal in a prison may only exercise his savage cruelty upon the stone walls or iron grates. But the tongue is so placed, that being evil and unruly, it hurts all the members.

(2.) To our neighbours. There are some sins that hurt not the doer only, but many sufferers. These are districtly the sins of the tongue and the hand. There are other sins, private and domestical, the sting and smart whereof dies in the own soul; and without farther extent, plagues only the own soul; and without farther extent, plagues only the person of the committer. So the lavish is called no man's foe but his own; the proud is guilty of his own vanity; the slothful bears his own reproach; and the malicious wasteth the marrow of his own bones, whiles his envied object shines in happiness. Though perhaps these sins insensibly wrong the commonwealth, yet the principal and immediate blow lights on themselves. But some iniquities are swords to the country, as oppression, rapine, circumvention; some incendiaries to the whole land, as evil and unruly tongues.

(3.) To the whole world. If the vastate ruins of ancient monuments, if the depopulation of countries, if the consuming fires of contention, if the land manured with blood, had a tongue to speak, they would all accuse the tongue for the original cause of their woe. Slaughter is a lamp, and blood the oil; and this is set on fire by the tongue.

You see the latitude and extension of this unruly evil, more unruly than the hand. Slaughters, massacres, oppressions, are done by the hand; the tongue doth more. Parcit manus absenti, lingua nemini: The hand spares to hurt the absent, the tongue hurts all. One may avoid the sword by running from it; not the tongue, though he run to the Indies. The hand reacheth but a small compass; the tongue goes through the world, If a man wore coat of armour, or mail of brass, yet penetrabunt spicula linguæ: the darts of the tongue will pierce it.

It is evil, and doth much harm; it is unruly, and doth sudden harm. You will say, Many wicked men have often very silent tongues. True; they know their times and places, when and where to seem mute. But Jeremiah compounds the wisdom and folly of the Jews: that 'they were wise to do evil, but to do good they had no understanding,' Jer. 4:22. So I may say of these, they have tongue enough to speak evil, but are dumb when they should speak well.

Our Saviour, in the days of his flesh on earth, was often troubled with dumb devils (Luke 11:14); but now he is as much troubled with roaring devils. With the fawning sycophant, a prattling devil; with the malicious slanderer, a brawling devil; with the unquiet peace-hater, a scolding devil; with the avarous and ill-conscious lawyer, a wrangling devil; with the factious schismatic, a gaping devil; with the swaggering ruffian, a roaring devil. All whom Christ by his ministers doth conjure, as he once did that crying devil, 'Hold thy peace and come out.' These are silent enough to praise God, but loud as the cataracts of Nilus to applaud vanity. David said of himself, that 'when he held his peace, yet he roared all the day long,' Psa. 32:3. Strange! be silent, and yet roar too, at once! Gregory answers: He that daily commits new sins, and doth not penitently confess his old, roars much, yet holds his tongue. The father pricked the pleurisy-vein of our times. For we have many roarers, but dumb roarers. Though they can make a hellish noise in a tavern, and swear down the devil himself; yet to praise God, they are as mute as fishes.

Saint James here calls it fire. Now you know fire is an ill master; but this is unruly fire. Nay, he calls it 'the fire of hell,' blown with the bellows of malice, kindled with the breath of the devil. Nay, Stella hath a conceit, that it is worse than the fire of hell; for that torments only the wicked; this all, both good and bad. For it is flabellum invidi, and flagellum justi. Swearers, railers, scolds, have hell-fire in their tongues.

This would seem incredible; but that God saith it is true. Such are hellish people, that spit abroad the flames of the devil. It is a cursed mouth that spits fire; how should we avoid those, as men of hell! Many are afraid of hell-fire, yet nourish it in their own tongues. By this kind of language, a man may know who is of hell. There are three sorts of languages observed: celestial, terrestrial, and infernal. The heavenly language is spoken by the saints. 'Blessed are they that dwell in thy house: they will be still praising thee,' Psa. 84:4. Their discourse is habituated, like their course or conversation, which Paul saith is heavenly, Phil. 3:20. The earthly tongue is spoken of worldlings: 'He that is of the earth is earthly; and speaketh of the earth,' John 3:31. Worldly talk is for worldly men. The infernal language is spoken by men of hell; such as have been taught by the devil: they speak like men of Belial. Now, as the countryman is known by his language, and as the damsel told Peter, 'Sure thou art of Galilee, for thy speech bewrayeth thee;' so by this rule you may know heavenly men by their gracious conference; earthly men by their worldly talk; and hellish, by the language of the low countries—swearing, cursing, blasphemy.

Well therefore did the apostle call this tongue a fire; and such a fire as sets the whole world in combustion. Let these unruly tongues take heed lest by their roarings they shake the battlements of heaven, and so waken an incensed God to judgment. There is a 'curse that goeth forth, and it shall enter into the house of the swearer,' and not only cut him off, but 'consume his house, with the timber and the stones of it,' Zech. 5:4. It was the prophet Jeremiah's complaint, that 'for oaths the land mourned,' Jer. 23:10. No marvel if God curse us for our cursings; and if the plague light upon our bodies, that have so hotly trolled it in our tongues; no wonder if we have blistered carcasses, that have so blistered consciences; and the stench of contagion punish us for our stinking breaths. Our tongues must walk, till the hand of God walk against us.

2. 'Full of deadly poison.'—Poison is homini inimicum; loathsomely contrary to man's nature; but there is a poison not mortal, the venom whereof may be expelled; that is 'deadly poison.' Yet if there was but a little of this resident in the wicked tongue, the danger were less; nay, it is full of it, 'full of deadly poison.'

Tell a blasphemer this, that he vomits hell fire, and carries deadly poison in his mouth; and he will laugh at thee. Beloved, we preach not this of our own heads; we have our infallible warrant. God speaks it. 'The poison of asps is under their lips,' saith the psalmist, Psa. 140:3. It is a loathsome thing to carry poison in one's mouth; we would fly that serpent, yet yield to converse with that man. A strangely hated thing in a beast, yet customable in many men's tongues. Whom poison they? First, Themselves; they have speckled souls. Secondly, They sputter their venom abroad, and bespurtle others; no beast can cast his poison so far. Thirdly, Yea they would (and no thanks to them that they cannot) poison God's most sacred and feared name. Let us judge of these things, not as flesh and blood imagineth, but as God pronounceth.

It is observable that which way soever a wicked man useth his tongue, he cannot use it well. Mordet detrahendo, lingit adulando: He bites by detraction, licks by flattery; and either of these touches rankle; he doth no less hurt by licking than by biting. All the parts of his mouth are instruments of wickedness. Logicians, in the difference betwixt vocem and sonum, say that a voice is made by the lips, teeth, throat, tongue.

The psalmographer on every one of these hath set a brand of wickedness. 1. The lips are labia dolosa; 'lying lips,' Psa. 120:2. 2. The teeth are frementes, frendentes; 'gnashing teeth.' 3. The tongue lingua mendax, lingua mordax: 'What shall be done unto thee, thou false tongue?' ver. 3. 4. The throat patens sepulchrum: 'Their throat is an open sepulchre,' Rom. 3:13. This is a monstrous and fearful mouth; where the porter, the porch, the entertainer, the receiver, are all vicious. The lips are the porter, and that is fraud; the porch, the teeth, and there is malice; the entertainer, the tongue, and there is lying; the receiver, the throat, and there is devouring.

I cannot omit the moral of that old fable. Three children call one man father, who brought them up. Dying, he bequeaths all his estate only to one of them, as his true natural son; but which that one was, left uncertain. Hereupon every one claims it. The wise magistrate, for speedy decision of so great an ambiguity, causeth the dead father to be set up as a mark, promising the challengers, that which of them could shoot next his heart, should enjoy the patrimony. The elder shoots, so doth the second; both hit. But when it came to the younger's turn, he utterly refused to shoot; good nature would not let him wound that man dead, that bred and fed him living. Therefore the judge gave all to this son, reputed the former bastards. The scope of it is plain, but significant. God will never give them the legacy of glory, given by his Son's will to children, that like bastards shoot through, and wound his blessed name. Think of this, ye swearing and cursing tongues!

To conclude, God shall punish such tongues in their own kind; they were full of poison, and the poison of another stench shall swell them. They have been inflamed, and shall be tormented, with the fire of hell. Burning shall be added to burning; save that the first was active, this passive. The rich glutton, that when his belly was full could loose his tongue to blasphemy, wanted water to cool his tongue. His tongue sinned, his tongue smarted. Though his torment was universal, yet he complains of his tongue. That panted, that smoked, that reeked with sulphur and brimstone: that burns with the flame of hell dead, that burned with it living. For a former tune of sin, it hath a present tone of woe. It scalded, and is scalded; as it cast abroad the flames of hell in this world, so all the flames of hell shall be cast on it in the world to come. It hath fired, and shall be fired with such fire as is not to be quenched. But blessed is the sanctified tongue. God doth now choose it as an instrument of music to sing his praise; he doth water it with the saving dews of his mercy, and will at last advance it to glory.

THE SOUL'S REFUGE

'Let them that suffer according to the will of God commit the keeping of their souls to him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator.'—1 PET. 4:19.

A TRUE Christian's life is one day of three meals, and every meal hath in it two courses. His first meal is, Nasci et renasci; to be born a sinner, and to be new born a saint. 'I was born in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me;' there is one course. 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God;' there is the other course. His second meal is, Benè agere, et malè pati; to do well, and to suffer ill. 'Do good unto all, but especially unto those that are of the household of faith;' there is one course of doing. 'All that live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution;' there is the other course of suffering. His third meal is, Mori et vivere; to die a temporal death, to live an eternal life.

The first is his breakfast, and herein he is naturally natus et damnatus, born in sin and condemned for sin; spiritually renatus et justificatus, born again in righteousness and justified from sin. The last is his supper, wherein there is one bitter dish, death. Statutum est omnibus semel mori, 'It is appointed to all men to die once;' omnibus semel, plerisque bis, to all once, to many twice; for there is a 'second death.' And that is truly a death, because it is mors vitæ, the death of life: the other rather a life, for it is mors mortis, the death of death; after which mors non erit ultra, 'there shall be no more death.' Therefore rise, that you may not fall; rise now by a righteous life, lest you fall into an everlasting death. If the soul will not now rise, the body shall one day be raised, and go with the soul to judgment. The second course is incomparably sweet; vivere post mortem, to live after death. I say after death, for a man must die that he may live. So that a good supper brings a good sleep; he that lives well shall sleep well. He that now apprehends mercy, mercy shall hereafter comprehend him. Mercy is the ultimus terminus, no hope beyond it; and this is the time for it, the next is of justice. The middle meal between both these is our dinner; and that consists patiendo malum and faciendo bonum, in doing good and suffering evil. And on these two courses my text spends itself. First, 'they that suffer according to the will of God;' there is the passion. Secondly, they may 'trust God with their souls in well doing;' there is the action.

More particularly, in the words we may consider five gradual circumstances.

1. The sufferance of the saints, 'They that suffer.'
2. The integrity of this sufferance, 'According to the will of God.'
3. The comfort of this integrity, 'May commit their souls to God.'
4. The boldness of this comfort, 'As unto a faithful Creator.'
5. The caution of this boldness, 'In well doing.'

1. The sufferance of the saints, 'They that suffer.' All men suffer: 'Man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward,' Job 5:7. This life is well compared to a throng in a narrow passage: he that is first out finds ease, he that is in the midst is in the worst place and case, for he is hemmed in with troubles; the hindmost drives out both the former, and if he have not the greatest part in suffering evil, lightly he hath the greatest share in doing it. Outward things happen alike to good and bad. 'There is one event to the clean and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not; to him that sweareth, and to him that feareth an oath,' Eccles. 9:2. They are both travellers in the thoroughfare of this world, both lodge in one inn, both have the same provision; perhaps the wicked have the better cheer, but in the morning their ways part. There are common evils, as there are common goods. Poverty, sickness, death spares not the greatest; health, wealth, prosperity is not denied to the meanest. All have three mansions:—(1.) This earth; there (as in Noah's ark) are the clean and unclean, righteous and wicked, promiscuously confused. (2.) The grave; this is a common house, a very pesthouse, where all lie together under the surgery of death. It is a cheap and universal house; we pay no rent for it. (3.) But after all are come to this place, there is then a way of parting.

'Est locus hic partes ubi se via findit in ambas.'

Some go to hell, others to heaven. 'They shall come forth, they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation,' John 5:29; some to immortal honour, others to immortal horror.

God gives not all outward prosperity to the wicked, lest they should ascribe it to their own wits or worths, lest they should 'sacrifice to their net, and burn incense to their drag,' Hab. 1:16; nor all affliction to the good, lest they should fall to some sinister and unwarrantable courses: 'The rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous, lest the righteous put forth their hands to iniquity,' Ps. 125:3. There is a mixture of good and evil; prosperity and adversity have their vicissitudes. *Præsentis vitæ nec prosperitas innocentiam testatur, nec acerbitas miseram animam indicat. Neither do the crosses of this world witness a man's guiltiness, nor the blessings of the world his innocence. But the good have a larger share in sufferings than the reprobates. Impius non percutitur nisi à domino, nos ab impiis. None strikes the wicked but God, but all the wicked strike and vex us. This world, like the earth, is a mere stepdame to good herbs, an own mother to weeds. No marvel if she starves us; all is too little for her own children. Omnes patiuntur plurima, quidam ferè omnia. All suffer many kinds of miseries; many suffer all kinds of miseries.

Christianum est pati; it is the part of a Christian to suffer. Wheresoever he is let him expect it. Adam was set upon in Paradise, Job in the dunghill: Job fortior in stercore, quàm Adam in Paradiso. Job was more strong to resist temptations in the miserable dust than was Adam in that glorious garden. The Jews were commanded to eat sour herbs with their sweet passover. Bitterness ever treads on the heels of pleasure. Jacob hath a son and loseth his wife; Benjamin is born, Rachel dies. Our Lady, coming from that great feast, lost her son Jesus three days, Luke 2:45. Seven days she had eaten 'sweet bread;' here followed three days' sour bread for it. Good things are to be taken with much thankfulness, evil with much patience.

Let this teach us two duties. First, to prepare for evils before they come; next, to make them welcome when they are come. So they shall neither meet us with fear, nor leave us with sorrow.

(1.) Preparation to suffer is specially necessary. Sudden crosses find weak souls secure, leave them miserable, make them desperate. Expectatum malum levius mordet. A looked-for evil smarts more gently. Repentina bona sunt suaviora; sed repentina mala sunt graviora. Unexpected joys are more gracious, but unexpected evils are more grievous. Mischiefs come most commonly without warning.

They do not allow, as Jonas did to Nineveh, forty days' respite; not so much as an hac nocte, 'this night,' which was allowed to the worldling: 'This night shall they fetch away thy soul from thee,' Luke 12:20. Happy man that gives himself warning: he that conceits what may be, arms himself against what must be. Thou art in health, eatest, digestest, sleepest—

'Quid si morbosio jaceant tua membra cubili?'

What if sickness shall cast thee down on thy weary couch? Though riches allow thee meat for thy stomach, what if sickness allow thee not stomach to thy meat? How if the very smell, if the very thought, of thy best dishes should offend thee? How if, after many tossed sides and shifted places, nullo poteris requiescere lecto? thou couldst find no corner to give thee ease? How couldst thou take this distemper? Thou art rich; thy throat tastes it, thy belly feels it, thy back wears it: how if, from no fear of want, thou shouldst come to deep poverty, to care for to-morrow's provision, with extreme sweat of brows not to earn bread enough to keep life and soul together, nakedness exposing thy body to the violence of heaven, scorching heat of the sun, cold storms of the air? How couldst thou brook the difference between that abundant opulency and this destitute penury? Thou art at home in peace, singing in thine own vineyards; thou sittest in a shock secure, whilst thy reapers fell down the humble corn at thy foot and fill thy barns. What if for religion thou shouldst be sent to exile, where thou mayest weep with Israel to thy deriding enemies, demanding a song of Zion? 'How shall I sing the song of joy in a strange land?' Ps. 137:4. How canst thou digest the injuries and brook the contempt of strangers?

These be good thoughts to pre-arm our souls; nothing shall make them miserable that have this preparation. Agabus told Paul, having first bound his hands and feet with his girdle, 'Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle,' Acts 21:11. Hereupon the rest of the saints besought him with tears not to go up to Jerusalem. But observe that blessed apostle's resolved answer, Paratus sum, 'I am ready.' 'What mean ye to weep, and to break mine heart? for I am ready, not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus,' ver. 13. The account is past, I am prepared. Men that want this fore-resolution are like a secure city, that spends all her wealth in furnishing her chambers and furbishing her streets, but lets her bulwarks fall to the ground. Here is provision for peace, none for war; something for content of friends, nothing for defence against enemies. It is usual for young men with wooden wasters to learn how to play at the sharp; they are taught with foils how to deal with points. He is desperate that ventures on a single combat in the field, and was never lessoned at the fence-school. We shall be unable to fight with evils themselves, if we cannot well encounter their shadows.

'Mischiefs are like the cockatrice's eye,

If they see first they kill, foreseen they die.'

What our foresight takes from their power it adds to our own; it enervates their strength and corroborates ours. For by this both they are made less able to hurt us, and we are more strong to resist them. Since, therefore, we must pass through this fiery trial, let us first prove our strength in a gentle meditation, as that martyr tried his finger in the candle before his body came to the fire.

(2.) They must be made welcome when they are come. Non ut hostes, sed ut hospites admittendi. They must not be entertained as enemies, but as guests. Their 'feet are beautiful that bring good tidings,' Rom. 10:15. But crosses bring good news. They assure us that we are no bastards. 'If you endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; but if you be without correction, then are ye bastards,' Heb. 12:8. *Non timeas flagellari, sed exhæredari, Fear not to be scourged, but to be disinherited. There is so much comfort in sorrow as makes all affliction to the elect carmen in nocte,† 'a song in the night.' Adversity sends us to Christ, as the leprosy sent those ten, Luke 17. Prosperity makes us turn our backs upon Christ and leave him, as health did those nine. David's sweetest songs were his lacrymæ. In misery he spared Saul, his great adversary; in peace he killed Uriah, his dear friend. The wicked sing with grasshoppers in fair weather; but the faithful (in this like sirens) can sing in a storm.

It is a question whether the sun or the wind will first make a man throw off his cloak; but by all consent the sun will first uncloak him. Imagine by the sun the warm heat of prosperity; by the wind, the blustering cold of calamity; by the cloak, Christ's livery, a sincere profession. Now which of these will uncase thee of thy zeal? The boisterous wind makes a man gather his cloak closer about him; the hot, silent sun makes him weary of so heavy a burden; he soon does it off. Secure plenty is the warm sun, which causeth many to discloak themselves, and cast off their zeal, as it did Demas, who left Christ, to 'embrace this present world.' But the cold wind of affliction gathers it up closer to him, and teacheth him to be more zealous. When a man cannot find peace upon earth, he quickly runs to heaven to seek it.

Plutarch writes, that Antigonus had in his army a valiant soldier, but of a sickly body. Antigonus, observing his valour, procured his physicians to take him in hand; and he was healed. Now being sound, he began to fight in some fear, to keep himself a good distance from danger, no more venturing into the van or forlorn place of the battle. Antigonus, noting and wondering at this alteration, asked him the cause of this new cowardice. He answers, 'O Antigonus, thou art the cause! Before, I ventured nothing but a diseased corpse, and then I chose rather to die quickly than to live sickly; I invited death to do me a kindness. Now it is otherwise with me, for I have somewhat to lose.' A poor and afflicted life makes a man bold in his religion. It is nothing to part with hunger, thirst, cold, contempt; but when prosperous fortunes flow upon him, he dares not stick so constantly to Christ. Would you have the rich merchant find fault with idolatry, and stand to justify God's truth? No, he hath somewhat to take to; and although he ventures much, he would be loath to be a venturer in this. Yet this somewhat is nothing in regard to what he loseth, because he will not lose his riches. Affliction sometimes makes an evil man good, always a good man better. Crosses therefore do not only challenge our patience, but even our thanks. Thy soul is sick, these are thy physic. *Intelligat homo Deum esse medicum: sub medicamento positus ureris, secaris, clamas. Non audit medicus ad voluntatem, sed audit ad sanitatem. Understand God thy physician, he ministers to thee a bitter but wholesome potion. Thy stomach abhors it. Thou liest bound under his hand, whiles he works upon thee. Thou criest to be delivered; he hears thee not according to thy will, but according to thy weal. 'We are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world,' 1 Cor 11:32. Thou payest the physician of thy body though he cannot heal thee; wilt thou not thank the Physician of thy soul that hath healed thee? The child cries for the knife, the parent knows it can but hurt him; though he weep for it, he shall not have it. Such children are we, to think God doth not use us kindly unless he give us every vanity we affect. Instead of these toys that would make us wanton, God lays on us the rod of correction to make us sober. Our flesh is displeased, our soul is saved; we have no cause to complain. I come now from the sufferance of the saints, to

2. The integrity of that sufferance.—'According to the will of God.' We have suffered enough, except it be according to his will. The manner commends the matter. To go no further, this point is sufficiently directed by our apostle, ver. 14, 'If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are you; for the Spirit of glory resteth upon you. But let none of you suffer as an evil-doer.' For, chap. 2:19, 'This is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully.' This our Saviour taught us: 'Blessed are they that suffer persecution for righteousness' sake' (non qui patiuntur, sed qui patiuntur propter justitiam), 'for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' Non mortes, sed mores faciunt martyres. It is not the death, but the cause, that gives the honour of martyrdom.

Indeed, there is no man that suffers contrary to the will of God, but many suffer not secundum, not 'according to the will of God.' In his concealed will he allows the sufferings of the reprobates: this is his just judgment. They are smitten, but for their faults. Mœrent et merentur: they lament, and deserve to lament. When the adulterer is wounded for his lust, he cannot think himself a patient secundum beneplacitum Dei, according to the will of God. When the usurer is fetched over for his extortion, the depopulator for his inclosing, the slanderer for his libelling, all these suffer, but not for conscience toward God, not 'according to his will.' They only are said to suffer according to his will, that suffer first innocently, then patiently.

(1.) Innocently; for the wicked suffer, Mali mala, sed merito. Evil men bear evil things, but after their deserts. The pope hath made many saints from this kind of suffering. Straw-saints, such as Garnet was. If they be first drenched at Tiber, and after hanged at Tyburn, martyres sunt, they can be no less than martyrs. Not seldom their names are put into the Rubric; but they stand there in those red letters for nothing else but to remember their red and bloody actions. They may pretend some show of religion, as if for cause thereof they suffered; but it is not a mere, but a mixed, cause; not for faith, but for faction; not for truth, but for treason. It is observed, that as the physicians say, none die of an ague, nor without an ague; so none of them suffer from the Romish religion, nor without the Romish religion. Therefore as Aristides, dying of the bite of a weasel, exceedingly lamented that it was not a lion; so these Seminaries may greatly lament that they die not for the Lion of Judah, but for the weasel of Rome. Not secundum voluntatem Dei, but secundum voluptatem Antichristi: not according to the will of Christ, but according to the lust of Antichrist. But he can make them amends with sainting them; men shall kneel to them, pray to them, climb to heaven by the ladder of their merits. Alas! poor saints! the pope sends them to heaven, but how if they were in hell before? May we not say of them, as Augustine did of Aristotle, Woe unto them, they are praised and prayed unto where they are not, and condemned where they are. Unless, as the vision was to Ormus, that among the apostles and martyrs there was a vacant place left in heaven, which, saith he, was reserved for a priest in England called Thomas Becket; and this revelation was full twelve years before Becket died.* So except the pope can make them saints before they die, I fear his authority can do little afterwards. Yet indeed the pope is a great saint-maker, and hath helped abundance of men to heaven. For he sent them thither through the fire, for the cause of Christ; he condemned, cursed, burnt them to ashes; and thus, spite of his teeth, he hath helped to make them martyrs and saints. For ourselves, if we suffer any wrong of men, let us be sure we have not deserved it. Our innocence commends our suffering; for this is 'according to the good will' and pleasure of God.

(2.) Patiently; a murmuring mind evacuates the virtue of thy sufferings. 'For what glory is it, if when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? but if when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye then take it patiently, this is acceptable to God,' 1 Pet. 2:20. Let me therefore help your patience by two considerations.

First, What Christ our Head suffered for us; bitter words, and more bitter wounds. Observe him; 'Look to Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, and despised the shame,' Heb. 12:2. So let us run with patience the race that is set before us. If we cannot endure an angry word from our brother's mouth, how would we suffer boiling lead, and broiling coals, as the martyrs did? How to be crucified as our Lord Jesus was? What would we do then? Shew me now one dram of this patience. Among gallants a word and a blow; among civil men a word and a writ. The back of patience can bear no load. But 'ought not Christ first to suffer these things, and then to enter into his glory?' Luke 24:24. First he was crowned with thorns, and then crowned with honours. Caput spinosum in terris, si sit gloriosum in cælis: That head must first wear a wreath of sorrow on earth, that shall wear a wreath of joy in heaven. 'Hereunto are we called: because Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, that we should follow in his steps,' 1 Pet. 2:21.

Secondly, That all this is 'according to the will of God.' Our blows come, at least mediately, from the hand of God. And this hand is guided with providence, and tempered with love. Distressed worldlings cry out, It was my own folly that ran me into this danger, or the malice of mine enemy undid me, or surfeit on such meat made me sick. So the cur bites the stone, which could never have hurt him but from the hand that threw it. Look up to the first mover, O madman, and discharge the means. The instrument may be unjust in thy wrongs, but the cause is just from him that inflicted it. What rod soever beats thee, consider it 'according to the will of God,' and be patient. His hand sets theirs on work: I hope thou wilt not dispute with thy Maker. The medicine of thy passion is composed by God himself; no evils nor devils shall put in one dram more than his allowance; no man or angel can abate one scruple. The impatient man wants either wisdom or obedience. Wisdom, if he be ignorant from whom his crosses come; obedience, if he knows it, and is not patient. This is the integrity of the suffering; now follows

3. The comfort of this integrity.—'Let him commit the keeping of his soul to God.' Every man cannot with this confidence; but qui patitur propter Deum, recurrit ad Deum. He that suffers for Christ's testimony, is confident of God's mercy. 'Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need,' Heb. 4:16. Here let us observe three circumstances, Quis, Quid, Cui: who, what, to whom.

(1.) Who?—'They that suffer according to the will of God.' Felicity thinks it hath no need of God. But God is more dainty of spiritual comforts than to give them to such as are confident in worldly comforts. The balm of the Spirit shall not be sophisticated or mixed veneno mundi, with the poison of the world. 'Give strong drink to the heavy,' saith Solomon. God will not give his consolations to those that are drunk with prosperity, mad-merry with this world; but his wine to the heavy heart. He will 'comfort them that mourn,' Isa. 61:2. 'Let them that suffer commit,' &c.

(2.) What?—The soul, and the keeping thereof. The soul is a very precious thing; it had need of a good keeper. 'For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?' Matt. 16:26. We trust the lawyer to keep our inheritance, the physician to keep our body, the coffer to keep our money, shepherds to keep our flocks; but the soul hath need of a better keeper. Howsoever it goes with thy liberty, with thy love, with thy land, with thy life; be sure to look well to thy soul. That lost, all is lost.

The body is not safe where the soul is in hazard. *Non anima pro corpore, sed corpus pro anima factum est. The soul is not made for the body, but the body for the soul. He that neglects the better, let him look never so well to the worse, shall lose both. He that looks well to the keeping of the better, though he somewhat neglect the worse, shall save both. The body is the instrument of the soul, it acts what the other directs; so it is the external, actual, and instrumental offender: Satan will come with a Habeas corpus for it. But I am persuaded, if he take the body, he will not leave the soul behind him.

(3.) To whom?—To God; he is the best keeper. Adam had his salvation in his own hands, he could not keep it. Esau had his birthright in his own hands, he could not keep it. The prodigal had his patrimony in his own hands, he could not keep it. If our soul were left in our own hands, we could not keep it. The world is a false keeper; let the soul run to riot, he will go with it. The devil is a churlish keeper; he labours to keep the soul from salvation. The body is a brittle and inconstant keeper; every sickness opens the door, and lets it out. God only is the sure keeper. 'Your life is hid with Christ in God,' Col. 3:3. This was David's confidence: 'Thou art my hiding-place; thou shalt keep me,' Ps. 32:7. The jewels given to thy little children, thou wilt not trust them with, but keep them thyself. O Lord, keep thou our only one; do thou 'rescue our soul from destructions, our darling from the lions,' Ps. 35:17. Trust us not with our own souls: we shall pass them away for an apple, as Adam did; for a morsel of meat, as Esau did; for the love of an harlot, as that prodigal did. Lord, do thou keep our souls!

Now, the Christian patient must commit the keeping of his soul to God, both in life and in death.

First, Living. The soul hath three places of being: in the body from the Lord; in the Lord from the body; in the body with the Lord. The two last are referred to our salvation in heaven: either in part, when the soul is glorified alone; or totally, when both are crowned together. Now, the soul must be even here in the Lord's keeping, or else it is lost. If God let go his hold, it sinks. It came from God; it returns to God; it cannot be well one moment without God. It is not in the right ubi, except the Lord be with it. It is sine sua domo, if sine suo Domino. Here be four sorts of men reprovably. They that trust not God with their souls, nor themselves, but rely it only upon other men. They that will not trust God with their souls, nor others, but only keep it themselves. They that will trust neither God with their souls, nor others, nor keep it themselves. They that will neither trust others with their souls, nor themselves, but only God, yet without his warrant that he will keep it.

First, They that trust their souls simply to the care of others: they are either papists or profane protestants. The papist trusts Antichrist with his soul; he's like to have it well kept. If masses and asses can keep it (for so the Jesuits term their secular priests), it shall not be lost. The devil fights against the soul, the pope interposeth an armoury of Agnus Dei's, sprinklings, crossings, amulets, prayers to saints. But surely if this armour were of proof, St Paul forgot himself in both these places (Eph. 6:13; 1 Thess. 5:6), where he describes that panoply, or whole armour of God. He speaks of a plate of righteousness for the breast, shoes of patience for the feet, the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit. To the Thessalonians indeed he somewhat varies the pieces of armour; but in neither place doth he mention crosses, crucifixes, aspersions, unctions, &c. Or they will trust the saints in heaven with their souls—

'Sancta virgo Dorothea,

Tua nos virtute bea,

Cor in nobis novum crea.'

What that prophet (Ps. 51:10) desired of God, they—as if they were loath to trouble the Lord about it, and could have it nearer hand—beg of their St Dorothy: to 'create a new heart within them.' Such a rhyme have they to the Virgin Mary—

Virgo Mater, maris stella,

Fons hortorum; Verbi cella,

Ne nos pestis aut procella,

Pectatores obruat.'

But the saints are deaf, non audiunt. They would pray them to forbear such prayers; they abhor such superstitious worship. They that were so jealous of God's honour on earth, would be loath to rob him of it in heaven. So our carnal professors only trust the minister with their soul, as if God had imposed on him that charge, which the prophet gave to Ahab, 'Keep this man: if by any means he be missing, then shall thy life be for his life,' 1 Kings 20:39. But indeed if he do his duty in admonishing: 'If thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it; if he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his iniquity; but thou hast delivered thy soul,' Ezek. 33:9.

Secondly, They that will not trust others with their soul, but keep it themselves. They wrap it warm in the nest of their own presumptuous merits, as if good works should hatch it up to heaven. But the soul that is thus kept will be lost. He that will go to heaven by his own righteousness, and climbs by no other ladder than his own just works, shall never come there. The best saints, that have had the most good works, durst not trust their souls with them. 'I know nothing by myself, yet am I not hereby justified,' 1 Cor. 4:4. 'In many things we sin all,' Jam. 3:2. All in many things, many in all things; and the most learned papists, whatsoever they have said in their disputations, reserve this truth in their hearts, otherwise speaking in their deaths than they did in their lives. Now non merita mea, sed misericordia tua, not my merits, but thy mercies, O Lord. All our life is either unprofitable or damnable; therefore, O man, what remains? Nisi ut in tota vita tua deplores totam vitam tuam,* but that during all thy life thou shouldest lament all thy life? Works cannot keep us, but grace. Let them boast of perfection, we cry for pardon; they for merits, we for mercies; they for justifying works of their own, we only for our sweet Saviour, Jesus Christ.

Thirdly, They that will neither trust others with their soul nor keep it themselves, but either do sell it for ready money, as Esau sold his birthright, and Judas sold Jesus, or pawn it for a good bribe, some large temptation of profit, or pleasure, or honour. They will not sell it outright, but mortgage it for a while, with a purpose (that seldom speeds) to redeem it; or lose it, walking negligently through the streets of this great city, the world, their soul is gone, and they are not aware of it; or give away their soul, as do the envious and desperate, and have nothing in lieu of it but terrors without and horrors within. They serve the devil's turn for nothing.

Fourthly, They that will trust God with their soul, but have no warrant that God will keep it. They lay all the burden upon the shoulders of Christ, and meddle no more with the matter; as if God would bring them to heaven even whilst they pursue the way to hell, or keep that soul from the body when the body had quite given away the soul. He never promised to save a man against his will. As he doth save us by his Son, so he commands us 'to work up our salvation with fear and trembling,' Phil. 2:12. He that lies still in the miry pit of his sin, and trusts to heaven for help out, without his own concurring endeavour, may hap to lie there still.

Secondly, Dying; there is no comfort but to trust the soul with God. So David, 'Lord, into thy hands I commit my spirit,' Ps. 31:5. So Stephen, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit,' Acts 7:59. With these words our Lord Jesus himself gave up the ghost. It is justice to restore whence we receive. It is not presumption, but faith, to trust God with thy spirit. The soul of the king, the soul of the beggar, all one to him. David, a king; Lazarus, a beggar: God receives both their souls. From giving up the ghost the highest is not exempted; from giving it into the hands of God the poorest is not excepted. There is no comfort like this. When riches bring aut nequam, aut nequicquam, either no comfort or discomfort; when thy wardrobe, furniture, junkets, wine offend thee; when thy money cannot defend thee; when thy doctors feed themselves at thy cost, cannot feed thee; when wife, children, friends stand weeping about thee; where is thy help, thy hope? All the world hath not a dram of comfort for thee. This sweetens all, 'Lord, into thy hand I commend my soul; thou hast redeemed me, O thou God of truth.'

Our spirit is our dearest jewel. Howl and lament if thou think thy soul is lost. But let thy faith know that is never lost which is committed to God's keeping. Spiritum emittis, non amittis. Duriùs seponitur, sed meliùs reponitur. That soul must needs pass quietly through the gates of death which is in the keeping of God. Woe were us if the Lord did not keep it for us whiles we have it, much more when we restore it. While our soul dwells in our breast it is subject to manifold miseries, to manifest sins; temptations, passions, misdeeds distemper us. In heaven it is free from all these. Let the soul be once in the hands of God, it is neither disquieted with sorrow for sin, nor with sin which is beyond all sorrow. There may be trouble in the wilderness; in the land of promise there is all peace. Then may we sing, 'Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped,' Ps. 124:7. Invadit Satanus, evadit Christianus. It is there above the reach of the devil. There is no evil admitted into the city of heaven to wrestle with the citizens thereof. Death is ready at hand about us, we carry deaths enow within us. We know we shall die, we know not how soon; it can never prevent us, or come too early, if our souls be in the keeping of God. Man was not so happy when God gave his soul to him as he is when he returns it to God. Give it cheerfully; and then, like a faithful Creator, that thou givest to him in short pain he will give thee back with endless joy. And so we come fitly from the comfort of our integrity, to

4. The boldness of this comfort.—'As unto a faithful Creator;' wherein our confidence is heartened by a double argument, the one drawn a majestate, the other a misericordia: from majesty, from mercy. His greatness, a 'Creator;' his goodness, a 'faithful Creator.'

(1.) Creator; not a stranger to thee, but he that made thee. It is natural to man to love the work of his own hands. Pygmalion dotes upon the stone which himself had carved. But much more natural to love his own images, his children, the walking pictures of himself, the divided pieces of his own body. God loves us as our Creator, because his own hands have fashioned us. But creavit et vermiculos, he also created the worms. Yield it, and, therefore, non odit vermiculos, he hates not the very worms. Creavit et diabolum, he made the devil. No; God made him an angel, he made himself a devil. God loves him ut naturam, as he is a nature; hates him ut diabolum, as he is a corrupted nature, an evil, a devil. But we are not only his creatures, the workmanship of his hands, but his children. So Adam is called 'The son of God,' Luke 3:38, his own image. Fecit hominem in similitudinem suam, 'he made man after his likeness, in his image,' Gen. 1:26. We are more than opus Dei, the mere work of God; for imago Dei, the very image and similitude of God. We may, therefore, be bold to commend our souls to God, as 'a faithful Creator.'

Divers men have that for their God which never was their Creator. The proud man makes his honour his god, the covetous man makes his gold his god, the voluptuous makes his belly his god. Now, whereas God not only charged in the first precept, 'Thou shalt have no other gods before me,' but added further in the next, 'Thou shalt not make to thee any image or similitude of any thing, whether in heaven above, or earth beneath, or water under the earth,' &c. These three sins seem to cross God in these three interdicted places; for the proud man hath his idol, as it were, in the air; the covetous man hath his idol in the earth; the drunken epicure hath his idol in the water.* Let them take their gods to themselves; let no Rachel that hath married Jacob steal away Laban's idols. Our Creator is in heaven; boldly give thy soul to him. Who should better have it than he that made it?

(2.) The other argument of our comfort is, that he is fidelis, a faithful Creator. He is faithful to thee, how unfaithful soever thou hast been to him. He made thee good, thou madest thyself naught; he doth not there yet leave thee, as man his friend in misery, but sent his Son to redeem thee. Here was great faithfulness. He sends his Holy Spirit into thy heart, to apply this redemption of Christ: here is great faithfulness. Thou often turnest thy back upon him, and following sin, leavest him; he leaves not thee. 'I will not leave thee, nor forsake thee,' Heb. 13:5: here is great faithfulness. He hath promised pænitenti veniam, credenti vitam; to him that repenteth, pardon; to him that believeth, salvation: here is faithfulness. Now, hath he promised? he is faithful to perform it. What man or devil dares stand up to challenge God of unfaithfulness?

This infallibility Christ knew, when to his Father's faithful hands he gave up the ghost. You will say, Who might better do it? The Son might well be confident of the Father. Not he alone: the servants have been faithful also in this emission, and found God as faithful in acceptance. So David, Stephen, &c. God is faithful, there is no distrust in him; all the fear is in thyself. How canst thou trust thy jewel with a stranger? God is thy Creator, and a faithful Creator. But how if thou be an unfaithful creature? Thou wilt frequent the doors of thy patron, present gifts to thy landlord, visit thy friend; but how if to him that made thee, thou makest thyself a stranger? How often hath God passed by thee, without thy salutation! In the temple he hath called to thee, thy heart hath not echoed, and sent out thy voice to call upon him. There hath he charged thee, 'Seek my face;' thou hast not answered, 'Thy face, O Lord, I will seek.' By his Spirit he hath knocked at thy door, thou hast not opened to him. Now upon some exigent thou bequeatest thy soul to him; upon what acquaintance? Will this sudden familiarity be accepted?

It is our own ignorance, or strangeness, or unfaithfulness that hinders us. The reprobates think Christ a stranger to them; 'When did we see thee hungry?' &c., Matt. 25:44. But indeed they are strangers to Christ, and he may well say, When did I see you visit me? 'I was sick and in prison, and ye came not at me.' Would you have God cleave to them that leave him? Doth a man all his life run from God, and shall God on his deathbed run to him? No, you would not know me; and therefore now, non novi vos, I know not you. But the faithful creature knows God a faithful Creator: 'I know whom I have believed.' Thou mayest say with that good father, Egredere anima mea, quid times? Go forth, my soul, go forth with joy, what shouldst thou fear? Yea it will go without bidding, and fly cheerfully into the arms of God, whom it trusted as a faithful Creator. I have served thee, believed on thee, now I come unto thee, saith Luther. 'I desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, says Paul. These are not the voices of worldlings, but of saints. God will be a faithful Creator to receive and preserve their souls. I have served thee, saith man; I have preserved thee, saith God. In me credis, ad me venis: thou believest on me, thou comest to me. Here is now the boldness of our comfort; there is yet

5. A caution of this boldness.—'In well doing.' The wicked man may commit his soul to God's keeping, but how is he sure God will take the charge of it? What should God do with a foul and polluted soul? The soul must at last be committed to some; now he only is the receiver of it in death, that was the keeper of it in life. If Satan have always ruled it, God will not embrace it. As Jephtha said to the elders of Gilead, 'Did ye not hate me, and expel me out of my father's house? and why are ye come unto me now, when ye are in distress?' Jud. 11:7. Did you thrust God out of your hearts, out of your houses, out of your barns, out of your closets; and shall God open heaven to your souls? They that thus commit their souls to God, God will commit their souls to Satan. It must be delivered up in patiendō malum, but in faciendō bonum; in suffering that is evil, but in doing that is good. Otherwise if we thrust God from us, God will thrust us from him.

Thus is God even with man. They say now to the Holy One of Israel, 'Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways,' Job. 21:14. Hereafter God shall say to them, 'Depart from me, I know you not,' Matt. 7:23. Man's soul is but an inmate to the bosom, sent to lodge there for a time; but must not take it up for a dwelling; God is the Lord of the tenure, to him it must be surrendered. We have a soul within us, but it is not ours (and yet what is ours if our soul be not?); it must be committed to God, either in evil-doing, as to a judge, or in well-doing, as to a faithful Creator. Some live as if they had no souls; more belluino, like human beasts. The vicissitudes of drunkenness, whoredom, sleep, share all their time. Others live as if they should never part with their soul. Therefore reponunt in multos annos, they lay up for many years; this was the cosmopolite's self-flattery. 'Soul be merry, thou hast much goods laid up for many years,' Luke 12. Yet others live as if their soul was not their own, but given them to spend at their pleasure, without ever being accountable for it.

But the good live as if their soul was God's; to him they commend it in a sweet conversation with him. Their bodies move on earth, their souls live in heaven. To him they may boldly commend their spirits; for they that fit their souls for God in health, shall never find the offer of their deathbed refused. If a man had no soul, if a mortal one, if his own, if never to be required, he might without wonder be induced to live sensually; he that knows the contrary will live well, that he may die well, and commit his soul to God 'in well-doing.' Here further observe:

A man may do good, yet come short of this comfort; it is given bene facientibus, to them that do well. It is not doing good, but doing well, that gets God to keep the soul. You have served me, says God to Israel, but after your own lusts. To serve God is doing good, but after their own lusts, is not doing well. To build a church is a good work; yet if the foundations of it be laid in the ruins of the poor, their children come not to pray for, but curse the builder. Great and good were the works of the Pharisees, yet all spoiled for want of a benè. 'Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, you cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven,' Matt. 5:20. Therefore St Paul's counsel directs us, 'So (not only run, but so) run that you may obtain,' 1 Cor. 9:24. Schismatics run, but they run out of the church; they love the truth, but not in peace. Secure people run, but they run beside the church; they love peace, but not in truth. Others follow the truth in peace, but not for the truth; dum quærunt eam, non quærunt ipsam.^{*} They fail in their sic, they miss this same 'well.' Prosunt aliis, sibi neutiquam. They do good to others, but not well to themselves. But we have almost lost both bonum and bene, good and well. It is an ill disjunction, that our fathers had so good works, and wanted our faith; and we have the true faith, but want their works. This 'well' is the very form of a good work; and forma dat esse rei, it cannot be good without it. Let me here take just cause to reprove two sorts of people.

(1.) Some there are that trust God with their souls, and destroy their own bodies. But God will take no charge of the soul, but in well-doing. Those virgins that would kill themselves to prevent ravishments, are reprovèd by just censure. Satius incertum adulterium in futuro, quam certum homicidium in præsentì. Better an uncertain adultery to be endured, than a certain self-murder to be acted. How can they hope for God's hand of mercy, that lay on themselves a hand of cruelty. Rhasis in the Maccabees, falling upon his own sword, and throwing himself down from the wall, yet committed himself to God's keeping, 'calling upon the Lord of life and spirit,' &c., 2 Mac. 14:46. The text says twice (with little credit to its own judgment) that it was done manfully. But it was magnè, potiùs quàm benè factum, done with desperate valour; with more venture than wisdom, temerity than honesty. This was that the devil left out, when he cited scripture to Christ, Matt. 4:6. 'In all thy ways;' he made that a parenthesis, which was essential to the text. This the original testified, Ps. 91:11. Custodient in viis tuis; but this was none of his ways down from the pinnacle, to shew the people a tumbling trick, and to break his neck. So the devil labours to secure men of God's providence generally, though they be quite out of the way. He bids men be confident that God will keep their souls, howsoever they walk; so under colour of God's protection, he brings them to destruction. He tells a man of predestination, that he is sure of an eternal election to life, therefore may live at his own pleasure; so from God's decree draws encouragement to a secure life. He tells him of justification, that he is acquitted by the blood of Christ; so emboldens him on the back of presumption to ride post to hell: Whereas predestination and justification are only made known to us by 'well-doing.'

(2.) It is impossible for a man of an ill life, to hope that God will keep his soul. He that lives ill, and hopes well, teacheth his ignorance to deceive his wickedness, and them both to deceive his soul. 'Your iniquities have separated between you and your God,' Isa. 59:2. But 'Separate yourselves from the unclean thing, and I will receive you,' 2 Cor. 6:17. Take away the bar, your sins; break off the partition by repentance, then I will keep you, saith God. Commit your souls to the Lord's trust in well-doing, or not at all. If Christ had come down from the pinnacle headlong, and not by the stairs, he had neglected the way, and so been out of the compass of God's promise to keep him. It is an over-bold presumption, to charge God to keep thy soul, whilst thou dost wilfully lose it. Wilt thou clip the wings of thy soul, and then bid it fly to God? It is all one, as if thou shouldst cut off a man's leg, and then send him on an errand. Our presumption is able to tie up God's arms, that he cannot help us. He that walks in profaneness, and commits his soul to God, is like him that throws himself into a deep pit, to try whether God will help him out, and save him from drowning. Man is timorous where he should be bold, and bold where he should be timorous.

God bids us cast our care upon him for this life. 'Take no thought for your life, what you shall eat, or what you shall drink, or wherewith you shall be clothed: your heavenly Father knows you have need of all these things,' Matt. 6:31. Yet we dare not trust God without a pawn; unless we have bread, we think we shall starve. Here we fear, where we ought not. God tells us, the bread of heaven must feed our spirits; more necessary to maintain life in the soul, than is bread to preserve life in the body: we never hunger after this, yet presume we have sound souls, and trust God to keep them. Here we do not fear where we ought. We are so sottish, that we dare trust God with the soul, the more precious part, without well-doing, the means to have it saved; yet dare not trust him with our bodies, unless we can see our barns full, or at least our cupboards.

But in vain thou committest thy soul to God, except thou obeyest God. There is still a commandment with the promise. If thou keep not the precept, thou hast no interest in the promise. If thou wilt not perform thy part, God is discharged of his part: if thou refuse to do well, he will not keep thy soul. The protection of God extends not to us in lewd courses: we are then out of our way, and the devil may take us up as vagabonds. 'If thou do well, shalt thou not be accepted? if thou do evil, sin lieth at the door,' Gen. 4:7. If thou do evil, sin is thy keeper, not God. There was a temple, called the temple of trust: God will not be to them a temple of trust, that had no trust in their temples.

It is a good thing to have God keep the soul, but the wicked cannot have this hope. He that hath money, lays it up in his coffers; or if he sends it abroad, like a stern jailor, he suffers it not to go without a keeper, sound bonds. He that hath lands, makes strong conveyances to his desired heirs, that they may be kept. If children, he provides to have them safely kept. He keeps his goods from the thief, his chickens from the kite, his lambs from the wolf, his fawn from the hound, his dove from the vermin; yet he keeps not his soul from the devil. O wretched man, that must die, and knows not what shall become of his soul. The world would have it, but he knows it must not; himself would keep it, but he knows he cannot; Satan would have it, and he knows not whether he shall; he would have God take it, and he knows not whether he will. O miserable man, that must part with his soul he knows not whither.

We see what it is to lead an evil life, and to be a stranger to God. He 'knows his sheep,' John 10:14, but the goats are not written in his book. 'The foundation of God standeth sure, having the seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his,' 2 Tim. 2:19. It is a goodly thing to be famous and remarkable in the world. Est pulchrum digito monstrari, et dicier, hic est. It is a goodly thing to be said, 'This is the man whom the world honours,' Esth. 6:9; but perhaps this is not he whom God honours. He that suffers and does according to the will of God, the Lord will take that man into his bosom: 'Such honour have all his saints,' Ps. 149:9. It is no great matter for men to be known to kings and nobles, if the Lord know them not; nothing to ride in the second coach, as Joseph; to be next to the prince, if they be strangers to the court of heaven.

Therefore let us all lay hold on well-doing, that we may have comfort in well-dying. We desire to shut up our last scene of life, with in manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum; Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Behold, while we live, God says to us, in manus tuas, homo, commendo Spiritum meum; man, into thy hands I commend my Spirit. As we use God's Spirit in life, God will use our spirit at death. If we open the doors of our hearts to his Spirit, he will open the doors of heaven to our spirit. If we feast him with a 'supper' of grace, Rev. 3:20, he will feast us with a supper of glory. If we 'grieve his Spirit,' Eph. 4:30, he will grieve all the veins of our hearts. When such shall say, Lord, into thy hands we commend our souls; no, saith God, I will none of your spirit, for you would none of my Spirit. You shut him out, when he would have entered your hearts; he shall shut you out when you would enter heaven. Let us therefore here use God's Spirit kindly, that hereafter he may so use our spirits. Let us in life entertain him with faith, that in death he may embrace us with mercy. So, Lord, into thy hands we commend our souls; keep and receive them, O thou faithful Creator and God of truth, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE SPIRITUAL NAVIGATOR BOUND FOR THE HOLY LAND

Before the throne there was a sea of glass like unto crystal.—
REV. 4:6.

I HAVE chosen a member of the epistle appointed by our church to be read in the celebration of this feast to the most Sacred Trinity. There is One sitting on the throne, which is God the Father; on his right hand the Lamb which was slain, only worthy to unseal the book, which is God the Son; and seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, the seven-fold Spirit, which is God the Holy Ghost. Unus potentialiter, trinus personaliter. Which blessed Trinity in Unity, and Unity in Trinity, inspire me to speak, and you to hear! Amen. 'Before the throne,' &c.

The Revelation is a book of great depth, containing tot sacramenta, quot verba;* as many wonders as words, mysteries as sentences. There are other books of the gospel; but Bullinger calls this Librum evangelicissimum,† the most gospel-like book, a book of most happy consolation: delivering those eventual comforts, which shall successively and successfully accompany the church unto the end of the world. It presents, as in a perspective glass, the Lamb of God guarding and regarding his saints; and giving them triumphant victory over all his and their enemies. The writings of St John, as I have read it observed, are of three sorts. He teacheth in his Gospel especially faith; in his Epistles love; hope in his Revelation.

This last (as of great consolation, so) is of great difficulty. There is manna in the ark, but who shall open it to us? Within the Sanctum Sanctorum there is the mercy-seat; but who shall draw the curtain for us, pull away the veil? Our Saviour lies here (not dead, but living); but who shall roll away the stone for us? open a passage to our understanding? The impediment is not in objecto percipiendo, but in organo percipiendi; not in the object to be seen, but in our organ or instrument of seeing it: not in the sun, but in the dim thickness of our sight. God must say unto us, as the man of God spake to Eli in the name of Jehovah, 1 Sam. 2. Revelando revelavi, &c. 'I have plainly appeared unto the house of thy father.'

For my own part, I purpose not to plunge to the depth with the elephant; but to wade with the lamb in the shallows: not to be over-venturous in the Apocalypse, as if I could reveal the Revelation: but briefly to report what expositions others have given of this branch; and then gather some fruit from it, for our own instruction and comfort. Being bold to say with St Augustine, whosoever hears me, ubi pariter certus est, pergat mecum; ubi pariter hæsitat, quærat mecum; ubi errorem suum cognoscit, redeat ad me: ubi meum, revocet me.* If he be certain with me, let him go on with me: if he doubt with me, let him seek with me: if he find out his own error, let him come unto me; if mine, let him recall me.

With purpose of avoiding prolixity, I have limited myself to this member of ver. 6, 'And before the throne there was a sea of glass like unto crystal.' I find hereof seven several expositions. I will lightly touch them, and present them only to your view; then build upon the soundest.

1. Some expound this glassy and crystal-like sea, of contemplative men: so Emanuel Sa. But I find this foundation so weak, that I dare not set any frame of discourse on it.

2. Some conceive it to be an abundant understanding of the truth; a happy and excellent knowledge, given to the saints; and that in a wonderful plentitude: so Ambrose. Per mare historica, per vitrum moralis, per chrySTALLINUM spiritualis intelligentia. By sea is intended an historical knowledge; by glass a moral; a spiritual and supernatural by crystal.

3. Some understand by this glassy sea like crystal, the fulness of all those gifts and graces, which the church derives from Christ. In him dwells all fulness: yea so abundant is his oil of gladness, that it runs (as it were) over the verges of his human nature, unto the 'skirts of his clothing;' plentifully blessing his whole church. Thus it is conceived by Brightman. As if this mare vitreum were an antitype to that mare fusum: spoken of 1 Kings 7:23, this 'glassy sea,' to that 'molten sea.' Among other admirable works of that heaven-inspired king, ver. 23, 'He made a molten sea, ten cubits from the one brim to the other: it was round all about, and its height was five cubits: and a line of thirty cubits did compass it round about,' &c.; ver. 26, 'It contained two thousand baths.' The end why it was made, and use for which it served, you shall find, 'The sea was for the priests to wash in,' 2 Chron. 4. Now this might well seem to prefigure some great plenitude. For otherwise, for Aaron and his sons to wash in, Exiguus aliquis urceolus vel guttulus suffecisset: some cruet, bason, or laver might sufficiently have served.

4. Some intend this glassy sea, like to crystal, to signify cælum chrySTALLINUM, the crystalline heaven: which they affirm to be next under that heaven of heavens, where the eternal God keeps his court, and sits in his throne. And somewhat to hearten the probability of this opinion, it is said here, this 'sea is before the throne.'

5. Some expositions give this sea for the gospel. And their opinion is probably deduced from the two attributes, glassy and crystalline.

(1.) The first expresseth perlucidam materiem, a bright and clear matter. Which sets a difference betwixt that legal, and this evangelical sea. That was ex ære conflatum, which is densa et opaca materies: of molten brass, which was a thick, duskish, and shadowy matter; not penetrable to the sight. This is mare vitreum, a sea of glass; more clear, perspicable, and transparent. That was a sea of brass, this of glass. In which disparity this latter far transcends the former. So that if David said, Ps. 84, 'How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord:' speaking but of that 'legal sanctuary,' Heb. 9:1, which was adorned with those Levitical ordinances, and typical sacrifices; how much more cause have we to rejoice with Peter and those two brethren, Matt. 17:1, to see Jesus Christ transfigured in the gospel, 'his face shining as the sun, and his raiment white as the light'? Being not come to the mount of terror, 'full of blackness, and darkness, and tempest,' Heb. 12:18; whereat even Moses himself did 'exceedingly fear and quake;' but 'unto Mount Zion, unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels: to the general assembly and church of the first born, which are written in heaven,' &c. For, saith Saint Paul sweetly, 'If the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory,' 2 Cor. 3:9. They saw Christum velatum, we revelatum; Christ shadowed in the law, we see him manifested in the gospel. Great, without controversy, is the mystery of godliness: God manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, &c., 1 Tim. 3:16. They saw per fenestram, we sine medio: they darkly through the windows, we without interposition of any cloud. Great then is the difference between that figurative molten sea of brass, and this bright glassy sea of the gospel.

This glass lively represents to us ourselves, and our Saviour. Ourselves wicked and wretched, damnatos priusquam natos, condemned before we were born: sinful, sorrowful; cast down by our own fault, but never restorable by our own strength; without grace, 'without Christ, without hope, without God in the world,' Eph. 2:12. Our Saviour descending from heaven to suffer for us; ascending to heaven to provide for us: discharging us from hell by his sufferings, and intercessing us to heaven by his righteousness. Oh look in this blessed glass, and 'Behold the Lamb of God taking away the sin of the world,' John 1:29. Look in it again, and behold all the spots and blemishes in your own consciences: as you would discover to your eye any blot on your face, by beholding it reflected in a material glass. See, contemplate, admire, meditate your own misery, and your Saviour's mercy, in this glass represented.

(2.) Crystalline is the other attribute: which is not idem significans, but plenioris, nec non planioris virtutis: not signifying the same thing, but of a fuller and plainer virtue, or demonstration. Chrystallum est quasi expers coloris, accedens proxime ad puritatem aëris. Crystal is described to be (as it were) void of colour, as coming next to the simple purity of the air. Now as the other attribute takes from the gospel all obscurity: so this takes from it all impurity. There is no human inventions, carnal traditions, or will-worship mixed with this sea: it is pure as crystal. Abundant plagues shall be added to him that shall 'add to this book:' and his part shall be 'taken away out of the book of life,' that shall sacrilegiously 'take out from it,' Rev. 22:18.

Let me say: God beholds us through this crystal, Jesus Christ; and sees nothing in us lean, lame, polluted, or ill-favoured. Whatever our own proper and personal inclinations and iniquations have been, this tralucent crystal, the merits and righteousness of our Saviour, presents us pure in the eyes of God. Through this crystal Christ himself beholds his church, and then saith, 'Thou art fair, my love, there is no spot in thee,' Cant. 4:7.

6. There is a sixth opinion. Some by this glassy and crystal sea, conceived to be meant baptism. Prefigured by that red sea, Exod. 14. To which red sea Paul alludes in the point of baptism, 1 Cor. 10, 'I would not have you ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the cloud; and all passed through the sea. And were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud, and in the sea.' Of this mind are Augustine (Tractat. 2 in John), Rupertus, Euthymius.

The accordance of the type and antitype stands thus. As none of the children of Israel entered the terrestrial Canaan, but by passing the red sea; so ordinarily, no Christian enters the celestial Canaan, but through this glassy sea. The 'laver of regeneration' is that sea, wherein we must all wash. 'Verily, verily, I say unto thee:' He said so, that could tell; and he doubles his asseveration, 'Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God,' John 3:5. Ordinarily, no man comes to heaven dry-shod; he must wade through this ford. The minister must irrigate. 1 Cor. 3. John Baptist must pour on water; and Christ must christen us 'with the Holy Ghost and with fire,' Matt. 3:11. There must be a washed body, a cleansed conscience. This is that the apostle calls 'pure water,' Heb. 10. 'Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water.' So let us draw near: without this no daring to approach the throne of grace. Through this sea we must all sail, the Holy Ghost being our pilot, the word of God our compass; or how should we think to land at the haven of heaven!

7. Lastly, others affirm, that by this glass sea is meant the world. So Bullinger, &c. This being the most general and most probable opinion, on it I purpose to build my subsequent discourse. A special reason to induce me (as I think, the best light to understand the Scripture is taken from the Scripture; and as God best understands his own meaning, so he expounds it to us by conferring places difficult with semblable of more facility) I derive from Rev. 15:2: 'I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire; and they that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God.' Where the saints having passed the dangers of the glassy sea, all the perils and terrors of this brittle and slippery world, and now setting their triumphant feet on the shores of happiness, they sing a victorious song: 'Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of Saints.' Praising God with harps and voices for their safe waftage over the sea of this world.

Now, for further confirmation of this opinion, in ver. 3, the exultation which they sing is called 'the song of Moses the servant of God.' So that it seems directly to answer, in a sweet allusion, to the delivery of Israel from the Egyptians, Exod. 14, at what time the divided waters of the Red Sea gave them way, standing up as a wall on their right hand, and a wall on their left; and that so long, till the little ones, and the women with child, might pass over dry-shod; but at last, returning to their old course, swallowed up their pursuers. Immediately hereon, Exod. 15, Moses and all Israel, turning back to behold the Egyptians drowned in the sea, or floating on the waves, while themselves stood secure on dry land, they sung a song to the Lord. The children of Israel, having passed the Red Sea, sing a song to the Lord: the children of God, having passed the glassy sea, sing a song also; and this latter song is called by the name of that first, even the song of Moses.

So that the analogy stands thus. 1. The Red Sea was a type of this glassy sea, the world. 2. The old Israelites, of the new and true Israelites, the faithful. 3. The Egyptians, of all wicked persecutors and enemies of God's church. 4. Canaan, the land of promise, of heaven the land of purchase, which Christ bought for us at so great a price. Our adversaries like theirs, our dangers like theirs, our waftage like theirs; but the country we sail to far transcends that earthly Canaan. That did but flow with milk and honey for a time; this with infinite joy, and illimited glory for ever. Against this construction it is objected.

1. This sea is before the throne: how can the world be so said? Ans. Properly: to shew that all things in the world are not subject to fortune, but governed by 'him that sits on the throne.'

2. The world is rather thick and muddy: how can it be called crystal? Ans. Fitly: not in regard of its own nature, for so it is polluted; but respectu intuentis, in regard of God that beholds it; who sees all things done in it so clearly, as in crystal.

The allegory then gives the world—1. For a sea. 2. For the sea of glass. 3. Like to crystal. 4. Lastly, it is before the throne. Two of the circumstances concern the world in thesi, two in hypothesi. It is described taliter and totaliter: simply, and in reference. Simply, what it is in itself; in reference, what it is in respect of God. The world is—
I. In regard of itself, 1, a sea, for tempestuousness; 2, a sea of glass, for brittleness. II. In regard of God, 1, like crystal, for God's eye to see all things in it; 2, before the throne, subject to God's governance.

I. A Sea.—The world is not a material, but a mystical sea. Time was that the whole world was a sea, Gen. 7: 'The waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and all the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered. Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail, and the mountains were covered.' As a poet, according with the Scripture, Omnia Pontus erant, deerant quoque littora ponto.

All was a sea, and that sea had no shores. The deluge of sin is no less now, than was then the deluge of waters. The flood of wickedness brought that flood of vengeance. If their souls had not been first drowned, their bodies had not been overwhelmed. The same overflowing of iniquity shall at last drown the world in fire.

1. The world may be very fitly compared to the sea in many concurrences.

(1.) The sea is an unquiet element, a fuming and foaming beast, which none but the Maker's hand can bridle, Matt. 8. 'What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him?' The world is in full measure as unruly. It is the 'Lord that stilleth the noise of the seas, the roaring of their waves, and the tumult of the people,' Psa. 65:7. Where the Psalmist matcheth roaring waves and roaring men; the raging sea with the madness of the world. And yet God is able to still them both. The prophet calls the sea a raging creature, and therein yokes it with the wicked. 'The wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt,' Isa. 57:20.

Unà Eurusque Notusque ruunt, creberque procellis

*Affricus, et vastos tollunt ad littora fluctus.

Yet the Lord 'gathereth the waters of the sea together as an heap: and layeth up the depth in store houses,' Psa. 33:7. Hear God himself speak to this boisterous element, Job 38, 'Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stayed.' Let me say truly of God, what Pliny of nature, in this element, Hic ipsa se Natura vincit numerosis modis. God, who is marvellous in all his ways, wonderful in all his works, is in the sea most wonderfully wonderful. It is called Æquor, quasi minimè æquum: so (I think) the world Mundus, quasi minimè mundus. Sometime fretum à fremitu, of a boisterous and troublesome nature. The world is full of molesting vexations, no less than the sea.

[1.] Sometimes it swells with pride, as the sea with waves; which David saith, 'mount up to heaven,' Ps. 107. Behold that Babylonian Lucifer, saying, 'I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds: I will be like the Most High,' Isa. 14:13, 14. Pride is haughty, and walks with a 'stretched-out neck,' Isa. 3:16, and with an elevated head; as if at every step it could knock out a star in heaven. Especially the proud man, like the sea, swells if the moon inclines, if his mistress grace him.

[2.] Vain glory is the wind, that raiseth up the billows of this sea. The offspring of the revived world are erecting a turret, whose battlements were meant to threaten heaven, Gen. 11. Did they it in an holy ambition of such neighbourhood? No; they loved not heaven so well. Did they it for security upon earth? Neither; for Ferunt summos fulgura montes the nearer to heaven, the more subject to thunder, lightning, and those higher inflammations of heaven. Whereas, Procul à Jove, procul à fulmine, was the old saying: Far from Jupiter, far from his thunder. Their purpose was only glory in this world. And as the Psalmist saith, that the wind raiseth the billows of the sea; 'He commandeth and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves thereof,' Ps. 107:25; so ambition was the wind that reared those waves and walls of pride.

[3.] The world, like the sea, is blue with envy, livid with malice. It is the nature of worldings to over-vex themselves at the successful fortunes of others. God must do nothing for another man, but the envious man's evil eye thinks himself wronged. He repines at that shower, which falls not on his own ground. The precious balms distilled from heaven on neighbours, break the malicious man's head. He hath in him no honesty, but especially wants an honest eye. He wounds himself to see others healed. Neither are the blows he gives his own soul transient flashes, or lashes that leave no impression behind them; but marks that he carries with him to his grave; a lean, macilent, affamished body; a soul self-beaten black and blue.

[4.] Sometimes it boils with wrath; and herein the world and the sea are very semblable. A mad and impatient element it is; how unfit to figure man! Yet such is his indignation; if in the rage and fury of the sea there be not more mercy.

There is a time when the 'sea ceaseth from her raging:' but the turbulent perturbations of this passion in the world continue without remission or interruption. The angry man is compared to a ship sent into the sea, quæ Dæmonem habet gubernatorem; which hath the devil for its pilot. Ira mortalium debet esse mortalis.^{*} The anger of mortal man should be mortal, like himself. But we say of many, as Valerius Maximus of Sylla, It is a question, whether they or their anger die first; or whether death prevents them both together. If you look into this troubled sea of anger, and desire to see the image of a man, behold, you find fiery eyes, a faltering tongue, gnashing teeth, a heart boiling in brine, and drying up the moisture of the flesh; till there be scarce any part left of his right composition. The tumultuous rage of the world so reeks with these passions, that the company of those men is as ominous and full of evil bodings, as the foaming sea.

[5.] The sea is not more deep than the world. A bottomless subtlety is in men's hearts, and an honest man wants a plummet to sound it. Policy and piety have parted company; and it is to be feared, they will hardly ever meet again. He is counted a shallow fellow that is, as the Scripture commends Jacob, 'a plain man, dwelling in tents,' Gen. 25:27. New devices, tricks, plots, and stratagems are only in request. Do you not know the reason hereof? The world is a sea; and in this sea is plain-dealing drowned.

[6.] There is foaming luxury in this sea: a corrupt and stinking froth, which the world casts up. The stream of lust in this mare mortuum fumes perpetually; poisons the air we breathe; and like a thick fog, riseth up to heaven, as if it would exhale vengeance from above the clouds. This spumy foam is on the surface of the world, and runs like a white leprosy over the body of it. Commend the world, ye affecters affected of it: there is a foam that spoils its beauty. Praise it no further than Naaman was, 2 Kings 5. He was 'captain of the host of the king of Syria, a great man with his master, and honourable, because the Lord by him had given deliverance to Syria; he was also a mighty man in valour; but he was a leper.' There is a blur in the end of the encomium, a blank in the catastrophe, a prickle under the rose. 'But he was a leper;' this veruntamen mars all. The world, you say, is spaciosus, speciosus; beautiful, bountiful, rich, delightful: but it is leprous. There is a Sed to it, a filthy foam that defiles it.

[7.] The world, as the sea, is a swallowing gulf. It devours more than the sea* of Rome; yea, and will devour that too at last. It swallows those that swallow it, and will triumph one day with insultation over the hugest cormorants, whose gorges have been long ingurgitated with the world; In visceribus meis sunt, they are all in my bowels. The gentleman hath swallowed many a poor man, the merchant swallows the gentleman, and at last this sea swallows the merchant. There are four great devourers in the world, luxury, pride, gluttony, covetousness. The prophet Joel speaks of four horrible destroyers. 'That which the palmer-worm hath left, hath the locust eaten; that which the locust hath left, hath the canker-worm eaten; and that which the canker-worm hath left, hath the caterpillar eaten,' Joel 1:4. The palmer is luxury, the locust pride, the canker gluttony, and you all know that the caterpillar is covetousness. Luxury, like the palmer, swallows much in the world; that which luxury leaves unspent, pride the locust devours; the scraps of pride, the canker gluttony eats; and the fragments of all the former, the caterpillar covetousness soon dispatcheth. These be the world's four wide-throated swallows.

These circumstances have demonstrated (the first instance of this comparison) the tumultuous turbulency of the world. There be many other resemblances of it to the sea.

(2.) Mare amarum. The sea is bitter, and therefore called the sea. A quo dominatio, denominatio. The waters thereof are also salt and brinish. All demonstrates the world to have an unsavory relish. So it hath truly; whether we respect the works or the pleasures of it.

The works of this sea are the 'waters of Marah,' Exod. 15:23. If we be true Israelites, 'we cannot drink of the waters of Marah; for they are bitter.' The works of the world have an unsavoury relish. Would you know what they are? Ask St John. 'All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but it is of the world,' 1 John 2:16. Hæc tria pro trino Numine mundus habet. Ask St Paul. 'Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings,' Gal. 5:19. These opera tenebrarum are bitter works; branches springing from that root, which beareth gall and wormwood, Deut. 29. Sour and wild grapes, which the soul of God abhorreth. As the good Simon told the bad Simon, Acts 8, 'Thou art in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity.'

Nay, even the delights of the world are bitter, sour, and unsavoury. For if medio de fonte leporum, there hap not surgere amari aliquid, yet knowest thou not, it will be bitterness in the end? 'Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee,' &c.; 'But know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment,' Eccl. 11:9. It may be honey in the palate; it is gall in the bowels. 'Though wickedness be sweet in his mouth, though he hide it under his tongue: though he spare it, and forsake it not, but keep it still within his mouth; yet his meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of asps within him,' Job 20:12. He that swims in a full sea of riches, and is borne up with whole floods of delights, is but like a sumpter horse that hath carried the trunks all day, and at night his treasure is taken from him, and himself turned into a foul stable, perhaps with a galled back. The rich worldling is but a hired porter, that carries a great load of wealth on his weary back all his day, till he groan under it; at night, when the sun of his life sets, it is taken from him, and he is turned into a foul stable, a squalid grave, perchance with a galled shoulder, a raw and macerated conscience.

Say, the delights of this world were tolerably sweet; yet even this makes them bitter, that the sweetest joys of eternity are lost by over-loving them. There was a Roman, that in his will bequeathed a legacy of a hundred crowns to the greatest fool. The executors, inquiring in the city for such a one, were directed to a nobleman, that, having left his own fair revenues, manors, and manners, became a hogherd. All men consented that he was the greatest fool. If such a legacy were now given, the heirs need not trouble themselves in scrutiny; there be fools enough to be found everywhere, even so many as there be worldlings, that, refusing the honours of heaven, and the riches of glory, turn hog-keepers, nay, rather hogs, rooting in the earth, and eating husks.

But how bitter, saltish, and unsavoury soever the sea is, yet the fishes that swim in it exceedingly like it. The world is not so distasteful to the heavenly palate, as it is sweet to the wicked, who have learned, though with that woe and curse, Isa. 5, 'to call good evil, and evil good; bitter sweet, and sweet bitter.' They strip themselves to adorn it, as the Israelites did for the golden calf, and so adorned, adore it with devoted hearts. It is their Baal, their idol, their god. Alas! it is no god; more like, they will find it a devil. Mr Foxe in his 'Martyrology,' hath a story of the men of Cockeram, in Lancashire. By a threatening command from Bonner, they were charged to set up a rood in their church; accordingly, they compounded with a carver to make it.

Being made and erected, it seemed it was not so beautiful as they desired it; but with the harsh visage thereof scared their children. (And what should a rood serve for, but to please children and fools?) Hereupon they refused to pay the carver. The carver complains to the justice; the justice, well examining and understanding the matter, answers the townsmen: Go to, pay the workman, pay him; get you home, and mark your rood better. If it be not well-favoured enough to make a god, it is but clapping a pair of horns on it, and it will serve to make an excellent devil. So add but your superstitious dotage, covetous oppressions, and racking extortions to the world, whereby you gore poor men's sides, and let out their heart-bloods; and though it be no god to comfort, you shall find it devil enough to confound. The world then is extremely bitter in digestion, whatever it be at the first relish.

Well yet, as salt and bitter as this ocean the world is, there is some good wrought out of this ill. That supreme and infinite Goodness dissuades his children from affecting it, by their experienced tartness of it. So the nurse embitters the dug when she would wean the infant. How easily had Solomon been drowned in this sea, had he not perceived its distastefulness? When his understanding and sense concludes, 'All is vexation,' his affections must needs begin to abhor it. God lets his children look into the world, as some go to sea to be sea-sick, that, finding by experience what they would not credit by relation, they may loathe this troublesome world, and long to be in the land of promise. He that once thoroughly feels the turbulency of the sea will love the dry land the better whiles he lives. Our better spiritual health is not seldom wrought by being first sea-sick—disquieted with the world's vexations. Salt water hath sometimes done as much good as sweet, hard things as soft, as stones as well as cotton are good casting for a hawk. The crudities of sin in David's soul were vomited up by a draught of this bitter water. That profuse son (Luke 15) would have been a longer stranger to his father's house, if the world had not put him to a hog's diet. Peter no sooner sees the billow, but he ejaculates to Christ a short but substantial prayer, 'Lord, save me.'

For this cause is the world made to us so full of afflictions. Christ promiseth to give a reward, but not to take away persecutions, 'Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven,' Matt. 5:10. He doth not subtract all suffering, but adds a recompence. God doth so mingle, and compound, and make them both of one indifferency and relish, that we can scarce distinguish which is the meat and which the sauce, both together nourishing our spiritual health. You see the alike distastefulness of the world and sea. This is the second resemblance.

(3.) The sea doth cast forth her dead fishes, as if it laboured to purge itself of that which annoys it, giving only contentful solace and nutriment to those that naturally live in it. So does the world, contending to spew out those that are dead to it. 1 Cor. 4:10, 'We are made as the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things unto this day.' No marvel if she pukes when we lie on her stomach. A body inured to poisons grows sick and queasy at the receipt of wholesome nourishment. John 15:19, 'If ye were of the world, the world would love his own. But because you are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hates you.' Not a piece of the world, but all the world. Matt. 10:20, 'You shall be hated of all men for my name's sake.'

The godly are indeed the very health of the world. The family thrives the better that Joseph but serves in. The city is forborne so long as Lot is in it. The whole world stands for the elect's sake. And if their number were accomplished, it should be delivered over to the fire. Yet, oh strange! Elias is said to trouble Israel, and the apostles are thrust out of cities for turbulent fellows. But saith Ambrose, Turbatur illa navis, in qua Judas fuit. The ship was troubled wherein Judas was. Christ was in a ship with the other apostles, without Judas: behold the winds are still, the sea is calm, the ship safe. Christ was in a ship with Judas amongst the rest, and turbatur illa navis: the wind blusters, the waves roar, and a tempest endangers the vessel to ruin.

Benefit multis ex societate boni. One good man doth much good to many. He is not only as manacles to the hands of God, to hold them from the defulmination of judgments, but is also a happy prevention of sin. He keeps God from being angry. He calms him when he is angry. A godly man is like David's harp, he chaseth away the evil from the company, and he doth (as it were) conjure the devil. For in his presence (as if he could work miracles) impudence grows ashamed, ribaldry appears chaste, drunkenness is sober, blasphemers have their lips sealed up, and the 'mouth of all wickedness is stopped.' This good comes by the good.

Yet because they are dead to the world, it casts them out. So the Gergesites did 'cast Christ out of their borders,' Matt. 8. So the pharisees did cast the convert that was born blind out of their synagogue, John 9:34. So the Antiochians did cast Paul and Barnabas out of their coasts, Acts 13:50. Like confectioners, that throw away the juice of the oranges, and preserve only the rinds, or as certain chemists, that cast all good extractions to the ground, and only make much of the poison. But if you will not be picked up of the world, you must adhere close to it, and with alimantal congruence please its stomach. Will you go to the court? You must be proud, or you shall be despised. Will you to the city? You must be subtle, or you shall be cheated. Will you to the country? You must partake of their ignorant and blind dotage, and join in their vicious customs, or you shall be rejected. If you live in the world, and not as the world, this sea will spew you up, as too holy for their company. But let them. For 'God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world,' Gal. 6:14.

(4.) The sea is no place to continue in. No man sails there to sail there; but as he propounds to his purpose a voyage, so to his hopes a return. You hold him a prisoner that is shut up in close walls, the door of egress barred against him. He is no less a prisoner (though his jail be as large as the sea) that must not set his foot on dry ground. The banks and shores be his prison walls; and though he hath room enough for his body, he is narrowed up in his desires. He finds bondage in liberty. The one half of the earth is but his prison, and he would change his walk for some little island.

The world, in like sort, is no place to dwell in for ever. Self-flattering fools that so esteem it. Ps. 49:11, 'Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling places to all generations.' Therefore 'they call their lands after their own names.' As if the sea were for mansion, not for transition. It was a glorious piece of the world, which ravished Peter desired to build tabernacles on, Matt. 17. Yet it was perishable earth, and it might not be granted. Heaven only hath mansions. (John 14:2, 'In my Father's house there are many mansions;' all the world else is but of tottering tabernacles.) And immobile regnum, Heb. 12:28, 'a kingdom that cannot be shaken,' when all the kingdoms and principalities of the earth shall be overturned. This world, then, only is for waftage.

There is one sea to all men common, but a different home. We are all in this world, either strangers or stragglers; the godly are strangers. 'Dearly beloved, I beseech you, as pilgrims and strangers, abstain from fleshly lusts, which fight against the soul,' 1 Pet. 2:21. So that aged patriarch acknowledged to the Egyptian king, 'Few and evil have the days of thy servant been in his pilgrimage.' In that true golden legend of the saints, it is said of them, 'They confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth,' Heb. 11:13. The wicked are stragglers too; and howsoever contentur figure pedes, and to 'take their portion in this life,' Ps. 17:14, yet they must, with Judas, to 'their own home,' Acts 1:25. We grow upward, they go forward, to heaven or hell, every man to his own place. Let the rich man promise his soul a requiem here, Luke 12:20. Let the atheistical cardinal of Bourbon prefer his part in Paris to his part in Paradise; yet the sea is not to be dwelt on. It is but for waftage, not for perpetuity of habitation. This is the fourth resemblance.

(5.) The sea is full of dangers. To discuss the perils of the sea belongs rather to the capacity of a mariner than of a divine. I will only apprehend so much as may serve to exemplify this dangerous world.

[1.] The sea is one of those fearful elements wherein there is no mercy. O that the world had but so much mercy as might exempt and discharge it of this comparison! But if we take the world for the wicked of the world, we read that 'the very mercies of the wicked are cruel.'

[2.] There be pirates in the sea. Alas! but a handful to that huge army of them in the world. Take a short view of them, borrowed of a divine traveller. Fury fights against us, like a mad Turk. Fornication, like a treacherous Joab, in kisses, it kills. Drunkenness is the master-gunner, that gives fire to all the rest. Gluttony may stand for a corporal; avarice for a pioneer; idleness for a gentleman of a company. Pride must be captain.

But the arch-pirate of all is the devil, that huge leviathan 'that takes his pleasure in this sea,' Psa. 104; and his pastime is to sink the freight of those merchants that are laden with holy traffic for heaven. 'Canst thou draw out this leviathan with an hook, or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down? Canst thou put a hook into his nose, or bore his jaw through with a thorn?' Job 41:1, 2. Historians speak of a fish that is a special and oft-prevailing enemy to this whale, called by some vihvella, or the sword-fish. The most powerful thing to overcome this mystical leviathan is the sword of the Spirit, which, to be seconded with the temporal sword of the magistrate, is of singular purpose. Whiles neither of these swords are drawn against this pirate, and his malignant rabble: no marvel if they make such massacres on the sea of this world. Let the red dragon alone; and whilst himself comes tumbling down from heaven, he will draw down many stars with his tail.

[3.] There be rocks in the sea, which if a skilful pilot avoid not warily, he may soon have his vessel dashed in pieces. How many ships have been thus cast away! How many merchants' hopes thus split! They call their vessels by many prosperous names: as, the Success, the Good-speed, the Triumph, the Safe-guard. How vain doth one rock prove all these titles! The rocks of our marine world are persecutions and offences, which he as thick as those fiery serpents in the wilderness, with their venomous and burning stings, Num. 21. Christ's cause and Christ's cross go most commonly together; and who shall be sooner offended than his little ones? 'All that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution,' 2 Tim. 3:12; as if it were a fatal destiny to them, not to be evaded. 'Woe unto the world, because of offences,' saith he that is able to execute vengeance upon his adversaries, Matt. 18:7. 'It must needs be that offences come: but woe be to that man by whom the offence cometh. It were better for him that, with a mill-stone hung about his neck, he were drowned in the depths of the material sea,' as his soul hath been already drowned in this mystical sea of wickedness. Well, put the worst. If these rocks do shatter us, if these persecutions shall split the bark of our life, yet this be our comfort: our death is not mors, but immortalitas; not a death, but an entrance to life incapable of dying. Rocks in the sea undo many a merchant. These rocks eventually make us happy; and often we have just cause to take up that saying, Perieramus, nisi periissemus, we had been undone, had we not been undone.

[4.] Besides rocks in the sea, there be also gulfs. In the Sicilian sea there is Scylla, a great rock, and Charybdis, a place of dangerous swallows, whereout was drawn that proverb, Incidit in Scyllam, cupiens vitare Charybdim. Mystically, in this world there are not only rocks of persecutions, but gulfs and swallows of errors and heresies. Let us beware lest, avoiding the one, we be devoured of the other. There is a perilous gulf in the Roman sea, (too, too many of our nation have found it); dangerous swallows about Amsterdam. It is good to fly from the gulf of superstition, but withal to avoid the swallow of separation. It is ill turning either to the right hand or to the left; mediocrity is the safest way. When opinion goes before us, it is a great question whether truth will follow us. Straggling Dinahs seldom return, but ravished, home. Singularity in conceits concerning matters of religion, are as perilous as to follow a plurality or multitude in evil customs. A man may perish as easily in the fair-coloured waters of heresy, as in the mud of iniquity. What matters it whether thou be drowned in fair water or foul, so thou be drowned? Beware of these gulfs and swallows.

[5.] There be straits in the sea of this world. Those of Magellan or Gibraltar are less dangerous. The hard exigents of hatred, obloquy, exile, penury, misery: difficult straits, which all sea-faring Christians must pass by to the haven of bliss. Pirates that care not which way they direct their course, but only watch to rob and spoil, are not bound to these passages. So worldlings, that never aim or intend for heaven, but to ballast themselves with the wealth of the world, from whomsoever, good or bad, or howsoever, by fair means or foul, they attain it, may keep the broad ocean, and have sea-room enough. For 'broad is the way of destruction, and many there be that keep it,' Matt. 7. But the godly are bound for the coast, that lies upon the cape of Bona Speranza, and they must of necessity pass through these straits. 'Straight and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.' But if, like those Argonautæ, we will sail for the golden fleece of joy and happiness, we must be militantes inter fluctus, content with hard passages. It is our solid comfort (as it was fabled of that ship, that it was made a star in heaven), that we shall be one day inter sidera triumphantes, 'stars fixed in the right hand of God,' and shining for ever in glory. This is the fifth danger of our mystical sea—straits.

[6.] There be sirens in the sea of this world. Sirens; hirens, as they are now called. Those in the material sea are described to have their upper parts the proportion or beauty of women; downwards they are squalid and pernicious. Virgo formosa superne, decidit in turpem piscem. They enchant men with their voices, and with sweet songs labour sopire nautas, sopitos demergere, to lull the mariners asleep, and sleeping, to sink and drown them. What a number of these sirens, hirens, cockatrices, courtezans, in plain English, harlots, swim amongst us! Happy is it for him that hath only heard, and not been infected.

Their faces and their voices promise joy and jolity. Their effects are only to drown and shipwreck men's fortunes, their credits, their lives, their souls. A book called Opus tripartitum speaks of the storks, that if they catch one stork leaving his own mate, and coupling with another, they all fall upon him, and spoil him of his feathers and life too. But, as if this sin were grown a virtue by custom among us, there are not wanting, 'who, knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them,' Rom. 1:32. If, in authority committed to inferior magistrates (the persuasions of my heart excuseth the higher powers, and the impartial proceedings of the truly reverend and godly prelates of this land testify it), there were not some connivance (God forbid patronising!) of these enormities for some sinister respects, the sirens about our river of Thames should be, if not sent swimming to Gravesend, yet at least taken in at Bridewell stairs.

Perhaps a poor man incontinent may smart for it; but how often dares an apparitor knock at a great man's gate! If lust comes under the rank of honourable, or worshipful, who dares tax it? But let as many as would be one spirit with the Lord Jesus, hate to be one flesh with a siren, 1 Cor. 6. It is recorded of Ulysses, that he stopped his ears against the incantations of these sirens; and having put the rest under the hatches, bound himself to the mast, to prevent the power of their tempting witchcrafts. Ulysses was held a wise man; sure, then, they are no less than fools that prove and approve their charms. No man loves a gally-pot for the paint, when he knows there is poison in it. I end in the epigram of a moderm poet—

Si renum cupis incolumem servare salutem,

Sirenum cantus effuge; sanus eris.

[7.] Another peril in this mystical sea is the frequency of tempests. Some have 'tempestuous looks,' as Laban, Gen. 31. Some 'tempestuous hands,' as Sanballat, Neh. 4, to hinder the building of Jerusalem. Innumerable have tempestuous tongues, as Ishmael, Shimei, Rabshakeh. Such tempests have been often raised from the vapour of a malicious breath, that whole kingdoms have been shaken with it. Master Foxe mentioneth, in his Book of Martyrs, that one in the street crying 'Fire, fire,' the whole assembly in St Mary's, in Oxford, at one Mallary's recantation, presumed it to be in the church. Insomuch that some laboured at the doors, where, through the crowd of many, not one could pass. Some stuck in the windows. All imagined the very church on fire, and that they felt the very molten lead drop on their heads. Whereas all was but a false fire. There was no such matter. In like sort scandalous slanders and invective contumelies begin at a little breach, one calumnious tongue, and get such strength, like mutineers, with marching forward, that the world soon riseth in an uproar. These are called by Ambrose, Procellæ mundi. And what world-faring Christian hath escaped these storms? But says Epictetus, Si rectè facis, quid eos vereris, qui non rectè reprehendunt? If thou do rightly, why shouldst thou fear them that blame wrongfully? Do well and be happy, though thou hear ill. This is another danger—tempests.

[8.] There is yet a last peril in the sea, which is the fish Remora. A fish, it is described, of no magnitude, about a cubit in length, yet for strength able to stay a ship. It is recorded that Caius Cæsar's galley was stayed by this fish.

There are many remoras in this world that hinder the good speed of Christian endeavours. Would Herod hear and obey John Baptist's preaching? He hath a remora that hinders him, Herodias. Would Nicodemus fain come to Christ? Fear of the Jews is his remora. Would Paul come to Thessalonica? The devil is his remora. 'We would have come to you once and again, but Satan hindered us,' 1 Thess. 2:18. Yea, doth Christ himself purpose, in his infinite mercy, to suffer for us, and pre-acquaint his apostles with it? Even Peter will be his remora. 'Master, favour thyself. This shall not be unto thee,' Matt. 16:22. Hath that forward young man any good mind to follow Christ? The parting with his goods to the poor is his remora. Would you have him that is rich follow poverty?

Such are our remoras now, that hang upon our arms, like Lot's wife, dissuading our departure from Sodom. Are we invited to Christ's supper, the gospel? Some oxen, or farms, or a wife's idleness, the pleasures of the flesh, retard us. Some business of our own is a remora to God's business. Are we called to speak in the truth's cause boldly? The awful presence of some great man is our remora, we dare not. Doth our conscience prompt us to parley for the restoring of the church's right? Our own impropriations, and the easy gain of the tenth of our neighbour's goods, are a remora, we cannot. Are we exhorted, in the name of Jesus Christ, for God's mercy to us, to shew mercy to his, to feed the hungry, succour the weak, relieve the poor, and make us friends of our unrighteous mammon by charity? Alas! the world, covetous desire of gain, is our remora, we must not. Tell the covetous man that he is not God's treasurer, but his steward, and blame him for perverting the end of his factorship, there is a devil plucks him by the sleeve, thirst of gain. God he confesseth his master, but the world his mistress. If you ask him why he doth not in charitable deeds obey his Master, he answers his mistress will not let him.

Would the young man repent? His harlot steps forth, and, like a remora, stays his course. Let a sermon touch a man's heart, and begin remorse in him, that he purpose reformation, good fellowship, like a remora, stops him. Yea, let a man in an age (for rare are the birds that drop such feathers) erect hospitals, piety and devotion shall meet with some remoras that would overthrow them. You hear the dangers of the sea of the world, the fifth circumstance of this comparison.

(6.) In the sea there be ἰχθύες ἰχθυοφάγοι, fishes that eat up fishes. So in the world, ἄνθρωποι ἄνθρωποφάγοι, men that eat up men, Ps. 14:4. 'Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread.' The wicked man devoureth the righteous.

'Thou makest men as the fishes of the sea,' Hab. 1. The labours of the poor, even his whole heritage, is worn upon the proud man's back, or swallowed down into his belly. He racks rents, wrings out fines, extorteth, enhanceth, improveth, impoverisheth, oppresseth, till the poor tenant, his wife, and children cry out for bread, and behold, all buys him scarce a suit of clothes; he eats and drinks it at one feast.

Oh, the shrill cry of our land for this sin, and the loud noise it makes in the ears of the Lord of Hosts! The father is dead that kept good hospitality in the country, and the gallant, his son, must live in London, where, if he want the least superfluity that his proud heart desireth (and how can he but want, in the infinite pride of that city?) he commits all to a hard steward, who must wring the last drop of blood from the tenant's heart, before the landlord must want the least cup to his drunkenness, the least toy to his wardrobe.

If this be not to eat, swallow, devour men, blood and bones, then the fishes in the sea forbear it. Hear this, ye oppressors! Be merciful. You will one day be glad of mercy. The yellings of the poor in the country are as loud as your roarings in the city. The cups you drink are full of those tears that drop from affamished eyes, though you perceive it not. You laugh when they lament, you feast when they fast, you devour them that do you service. God will one day set these things in order before you.

(7.) The sea is full of monsters. Innumerable, and almost incredible are the relations of travellers in this punctual demonstration. As of estaurus, a fish chewing the cud like a beast; of the manate, headed like an ox; and of certain flying fishes, &c. And are there not in this world men-monsters? I do not say of God's making, but of their own marring.

You would think it prodigious to see a man with two faces. Alas! how many of these walk daily in our streets! They have one face for the gospel, another for the mass-book; a brow of allegiance for the king, and a brow of apostasy or treason for the pope, whensoever he shall call for it. You would think it a strange defect in nature to see a man born without a head. Why, there are innumerable of these headless men among us, who, like brute beasts, have no understanding, but are led by the precipitation of their feet; follow their own mad affections. Others redundantly have two tongues, dissemblers, hypocrites; the one to bless God, the other to curse man made after his image. They have one to sing in a church, another to blaspheme and roar in a tavern.

Some have their faces in their feet, whereas God, os homini sublime dedit, cœlumque tueri jussit, gave man an upright countenance, and framed him to look upwards. These look not to heaven, whence they did drop, but to hell, whither they will drop. Insatiable earth-scrapers, covetous wretches, that would dig to the centre to exhale riches. Others have swords in their lips, a strange kind of people, but common, railers and revilers. Every word they speak is a wounding gash to their neighbours. Weigh it seriously. Are not these monsters?

(8.) On the sea men do not walk, but are borne in vessels, unless, like our Saviour Christ, they could work miracles. In the world men do not so much travel of themselves, as they are carried by the stream of their own concupiscence. So saith St Chrysostom, 'Hic homines non ambulans, sed feruntur; quia diabolus cum delectatione compellit illos in mala.'* Here men do not walk, but are carried; for the devil bears them upon his back, and whiles he labours them to hell, wind and tide are on his side. When he hath them in profundis abyssi, upon that bottomless depth, he strives to exonerate his shoulders, and doth what he can to let them fall and sink into the infernal lake. So Paul saith that temptations and snares, foolish and hurtful lusts do (no less than) drown men in perdition. You think yourselves on dry and firm ground, ye presumptuous wantons. Alas! you are on the sea, an inconstant sea.

Digitis à morte remoti

Quatuor, aut septem, si sit latissima tæda:

Soon overboard. The winds will rise, the surges will beat, you will be ready to sink; cry faithfully, and in time with the apostles, Lord, save us, or we perish.

(9.) Lastly, the sea is that great cistern, that sends water over all the earth, conveying it through the veins, the springs, till those dispersed waters become rivers, and then those rivers run back again into the sea. This vast world scattereth abroad her riches; drives and derives them by certain passages, as by conduit-pipes, unto many men. The rich man shall have many springs to feed him with wealth; the east and west winds shall blow him profit; industry, policy, fraud, luck shall contend to give his dition the addition of more wealth. At length when these springs have made a brook, and these brooks a river, this river runs again into the sea. When the rich man hath sucked the world long, at last absorbetur à mundo, he is sucked up of the world. Whatsoever it gave him at many times, it takes away at once. War, exile, prison, displeasure of greatness, suits of law, death, empty that river in one moment, that was so many years a filling.

Man's wealth is like his life; long a breeding, soon extinct. Man is born into the world with much pain, nursed with much tenderness, kept in childhood with much care, in youth with much cost. All this time is spent in expectation. At last, being now (upon the point) a man, the prick of a sword kills him. Even so is our wealth piled, so spoiled; the world, like some politic tyrant, suffering us to scrape together abundant riches, that it may surprise us and them at once.

Innumerable other relations would the world and the sea afford us. I desire not to say all, but enough; and enough I have said, if the affections of any soul present shall hereby distaste the world, and grow heavenly. Oh, what is in this sea worth our dotage! what not worth our detestation! The sins of the world offend our God; its vanities hurt ourselves; its only good blessings serve for our godly use, and to help us in our journey. But we know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness. Pray we, that this sea infect us not, especially drown us not. Though we lose, like the mariners in the prophecy of Jonah, our wares, our goods, our vessel, our liberties, yea our lives, let us keep our faith. It is the most dangerous shipwreck, that this naufragous world can give, the shipwreck of faith. They write of the serpent, that he exposeth all his body to the blow of the smiter, that he may save his head. So lose we our riches, our houses, lands, liberties, lives; but keep we faith in our Head, Jesus Christ.

Though we live in the world, let us not love the world, saith St John. Not fashion ourselves to it, saith St Paul; hate the vices, the villanies, the vanities of it. Think it easier, for that to pervert thee, than for thee to convert that. Water will sooner quench fire, than fire can warm water. A little wormwood embitters a good deal of honey; but much honey cannot sweeten a little wormwood. Call we then on our God to preserve us, that the evil of the world infect us not. Aristotle saith, if a man take a vessel of earth new and raw, close up the mouth thereof, throw it into the salt sea, letting it lie there a day or two; when he takes it up, he shall find fresh water in it. Though we be soused in this ocean-world, yet if the Spirit of grace seal us up, the brinish waters of sin shall not enter us; but we shall be vessels of grace here, hereafter of glory.

If I have been somewhat long on the sea, you will excuse me. It is a great and vast element to travel over in so short a time. Some observations I have given you, that I might not cross the world without some fruit of my voyage. Only what I have spoken of the waters, let it not be drowned in the waters, as the proverb saith, not perish in your memories, without some fruit in your lives.

2. The next circumstance gives the world, not only for a sea, but mare vitreum, a sea of glass. You see, I must carry you further on this element, and yet at last leave many coasts unvisited, much smothered in silence. Let not all be via navis, as the wise man speaketh, the way of a ship on the sea, leaving no track or print in your remembrances.

This glassy attribute shall give us observable three properties in the world. (1.) Colour. (2.) Slipperiness. (3.) Brittleness. As certainly as you find these qualities in glass, expect them in the world.

(1.) Colour.—There is a glassy colour congruent to the sea. So Virgil insinuates, describing the Nereides, certain marine nymphs.

Milesia vellera nymphæ

Carpebant hyali saturo fucata colore.

And not far removed,

Vitreisque sedilibus omnes

Obstupuere;—

Which is spoken, not in respect of the matter, but of the colour, and perspicuity. So Ovid in an epistle.

Est nitidus, vitroque magis perlucidus amne,

Fons sacer.

All the beauty of glass consists in its colour; and what in the world, that is of the world, is commendable, præter colorem, besides the colour? A cottage would serve to sleep in, as well as a sumptuous palace, but for the colour. Russets be as warm as silks, but for the glittering colour. The Egyptian bond-women give as much content, as Queen Vashti, but for the colour. The beauty of the fairest women is but skin deep, which if nature denies, art helps them to lay on colours. And when they are most artificially complexioned, they are but walking and speaking pictures. It is the colour of gold that bewitcheth the avarous; the colour of jewels that make the ladies proud. If you say, these are precious and comfortable in themselves, then feed on them, and try if those metals can (without meat) keep your life and soul together.

The truth is, man's corporal eye sees nothing but colour. It is the sole indefinite object of our sight, whithersoever we direct it. We see but the lay part of things with these optic organs. It is the understanding, the soul's interior eye, that conceives and perceives the latent virtues. All that we outwardly behold, is but the fashion of the world; and St Paul saith, 'The fashion of the world perisheth,' 1 Cor. 7:31. The colour fades, and the splendour of things is decayed. That if the world, like aged and wrinkled Helen, should contemplate her own face in a glass; she would wonder, that for her beauty's sake Troy should be sacked and burned; man's soul endangered to eternal fire.

Oh how is the splendour and glory of the world bated and impaired since the original creation! The sky looks dusky; the sun puts forth a drowsy head; as if he were no longer, as David once described him, like a 'Bridegroom coming out of his chamber, or a strong man rejoicing to run his race.' The moon looks pale, as if she were sick with age; and the stars do but twinkle, as if they were dim, and looked upon the earth with spectacles. The colours of the rainbow are not so radiant, and the whole earth shews but like a garment often dyed, destitute of the native hue.

It is but colour that delights you, ye worldlings. Esau lusts for the pottage, because they look red; and the drunkard loves the wine, because it looks 'red, and sparkles in the cup,' Prov. 23:31. 'Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright.' What babes are we, to be taken by these colours that only please the eye, or the sensual part of man, and harm the soul! like children that play with glass, till they cut their fingers.

Avicen saith, that glass among stones is as a fool amongst men; for it takes all paint, and follows precious stones in colour, not in virtue. So does this world give colours to her riches, as if there were some worth and virtue in them, till we are cozened of heavenly and substantial treasures by over-prizing them. No matter, saith Isidore, is more apt to make mirrors, or to receive painting, than glass. So men deck the world, as the Israelites did their calf, and then superstitiously dote upon it, as Pygmalion on his carved stone.

But can colour satisfy? Is man's imaginative power so dull and thick as to be thus pleased? Shall a man toil to dig a pit, and laboriously draw up the water; and then must he sit by and not drink, or drink and not have his thirst quenched? Yes: thus do we long after earthly things, which obtained, give us no full content; thus disregard spiritual and heavenly, whereof but once tasting, we go away highly satisfied. Say, then, with Bernard—

Oh bone Jesu, fons indeficiens,

Humana corda reficiens:

Ad te curro, te solum sitiens:

Tu mihi salus sufficiens.

Oh, Jesus, fountain ever flowing,

Thy graces on man's soul bestowing!

To thee I run with thirsty heart,

And none shall want, though I have part.

For others it shall be said, 'Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength; but trusted in the abundance of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness,' Psa. 52:7. But the faithful 'shall be like a green olive-tree in the house of God,' ver. 8; and of as fresh a blee* as Daniel, whom the mercy of God, wherein he trusts, waters for ever and ever. The colour of this glassy sea vanisheth, like the beauty of a flower; and when it is withered, who shall revive it? Rub your eyes, and look on this world better: it hath but a surphulled cheek, a coloured beauty, which God shall one day scour off with a flood of fire. Trust not this glass for reflection, as if it could present you truly to your own judgments. It is but a false glass, and will make you enamoured both of yourselves and it, till at last, the glass being broken, the sea swallows you. Thus for the colour.

(2.) Glass is a slippery metal. A man that walks on it had need be shod as the Germans, that slide upon ice. But go we never so steady on this glassy sea, even the just man falls seven times a day. How soon are we tripping in our most considerate pace! David said he would take heed to his ways; but how soon did his foot slide upon this glass! Psa. 94:18. 'When I said, my foot slippeth, thy mercy, O Lord, held me up.' Let us all pray with him: 'Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not.' And if we have stood, let us magnify him in the next psalm. 'Thou hast enlarged my steps under me, that my feet did not slip.' For the wicked, how surely soever they think themselves fixed in this world, yet, Psa. 73:18, they are set in slippery places. They talk of strong and subtle wrestlers; but the cunningest wrestler of all is the world: for whose heels hath it not tripped up? The wisest Solomon, the strongest Samson, have been fetched up by this wrestler, and measured their lengths on the ground. How dangerous, then, is it to run fast on this sea, where men are scarce able to stand! No marvel, if you see them fall in troops, and lie in heaps, till with their weight they crack the glass, and topple into the depth.

There you shall see a knot of gallants laid along this glass, that have run headlong at pride. There, a corporation of citizens, that have run at riches. Here, a rabble of drunkards, that ran apace to the tavern. There, a crew of cheaters, that posted as fast to Tyburn. Thus the devil laughs to see men so wildly running after vanity, and this glassy sea so easily hurling up their heels. It is reported of the Irish, that they dig deep trenches in the ground, and pave the surface over with green turfs, that their suspectless enemies may think it firm ground. This world is the devil's vaulty sea, full of trenches and swallows, which he paves over with glass. The way seems smooth, but it is slippery. His intention is mischievous, ut lapsu graviore ruamus, that we may have the surer and sorer fall. He that walks on this slippery glass had need of three helps: circumspect eyes, sober feet, and a good staff in his hand.

First, He must keep his eyes in his head. Eph. 5:15, 'See that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise.' Pliny writes of the eagle, that when she would make the stag her prey, she lights down between his horns, whence he cannot shake her; and with dust ready laid up in her feathers, she so filleth his eyes, that he being blinded, breaks his own neck from some high cliff or mountain. If the devil can blind a man's eyes with the dust of vanities, he will easily fling him down on this slippery glass, and drown him in this dangerous sea. Neither must our eyes only be careful to descry our way, but of sound and faithful discretion, not to be deluded with the spectacles, which this glassy sea presents, so retarding our journey to heaven. Pliny reports, that when the hunter hath stolen away the tigress's whelps, he scatters in the way great mirrors of glass, wherein, when the savage creature looks, she, seeing herself presented, imagines these to be her young ones; and whilst she is much troubled to deliver them, the hunter escapes. If we stand gazing on the glassy mirrors of this world, fame, honour, beauty, wealth, wantonness, thinking we see therein presented those dear joys we should seek for, behold, Satan in the mean time doth insensibly rob us of them. Let us look well about us: we walk upon glass.

Secondly, He must have sober feet. He had not need be drunken, that walks upon glass. If he be drunken with the vanities of this world, he may mistake himself, as that drunkard did, who, seeing the resultant light of the stars shining in the water about him, thought he had been translated into heaven; and rapt in a great joy, fell a waving, as he imagined, in the air, till he fell into the water, not without peril of life. He that is spiritually drunk may, in like sort, imagine the stars to be fixed in this glassy sea, which are indeed in heaven; and that the world can afford those true joys, which are only to be found above. I have heard of some coming out of a tavern well lined with liquor, that, seeing the shadows of the chimneys in the street made by the moon, have took them for great blocks, and down on their knees to climb and scramble over them. So worldlings that are drunk, but not with wine, enchanted with earthly vanities, think every shadow which is put in their way to heaven a great block, and they dare not venture. Sober feet are necessarily required to our travel on this glassy sea.

Thirdly, Lastly and mostly, He that would walk stedfastly on this glassy sea, had need of a good staff to stay him. The best and surest, and that which will not let him fall, or if he do fall, will soon raise him, is that David speaketh of, Psa. 23:4, God's staff. 'Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me;' confortant—make me strong, bear and hold me up.

Egypt is but a 'broken reed.' He that leans on it shall find the splinters running into his hand; and cursed is he that makes flesh his arm: but who leans faithfully on this staff, shall never perish. Thus you have heard this glassy world's slipperiness.

(3.) This glass denotes brittleness. Proverb and experience justify this. As brittle as glass: a fit attribute to express the nature of worldly things; for glass is not more fragile. 'The word passeth away, and the lust thereof,' saith St John, 1 John 2:17. Man himself is but brittle stuff, and he is the noblest part of the world. 'Man that is born of a woman, is of few days, and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down; he flieth as a shadow, and continueth not.'

'Sic in non hominem vertitur omnis homo.'

Let him have an ample portion in this life, and 'his belly be filled with God's hidden treasures,' Ps. 17:14. Let him be 'full of children, and leave the rest of his substance to his babes.' Let him be happy in his lands, in his children, in his success, and succession. 'Yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be; thou shalt diligently consider his place, and shalt not find it,' Ps. 36:10.

Glass, whiles it is melting hot and soft, is pliable to any form; but cold and hard, it is brittle. When God first made the world, it was malleable to his working hand, to his commanding word; for he spake the word, and things were created. The next time he toucheth it, it shall break to pieces like a potsherd. 'The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, the elements shall melt with fervent heat, and the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up,' 2 Pet. 3:10. Isidore mentions one that came to Tiberius the emperor with a vial of glass in his hand; and throwing it down to the ground it brake not, but only was bent, which he straightened again with his hammer. But, saith the same author, the emperor hanged him for his skill. How pleasing an invention should that false prophet make, that should come and tell the covetous worldling, or luxurious epicure, that this glassy world is not brittle, but shall abide ever! But serve him as the emperor did, hang him up for an atheistical liar that so speaks.

The decay of the parts argues the dotage of the whole. Ætna, Parnassus, Olympus are not so visible as they were. The sea now rageth where the ground was dry; and fishes swim where men walked. Hills are sunk, floods dried up, rocks broken, towns swallowed up of earthquakes; plants lose their force, and planets their virtue. The sun stoops like an aged man; as weary of his course, and willing to fall asleep. All things are subject to violence and contrariety, as if both the poles were ready to ruinate their climates. 'The end of all things is at hand,' 1 Pet. 4:7; when

'Compage soluta,

Sæcula tot mundi suprema coaggeret hora.'

God hath given us many signs of this. Portenta, quasi porro tendentia. Signa habent, si intelligantur, linguam suam. Signs have their language, if they could be rightly understood. Ultima tribulatio multis tribulationibus prævenitur. There are many calamities preceding the last and universal calamity of the world. No comet, but threatens; no strange exhalations, alterations, seeming combustion in the heavens, but demonstrate the general deluge of fire that shall destroy all.

'Nunquam futilibus percanduit ignibus æther.'

As God's tokens in the plague pronounce the infallibility of instant death, so these signs of the world's sickness are avant-couriers of its destruction.

Men are desirous to buy the calendar, that in the beginning of the year they may know what will betide in the end; what dearth, or what death, will ensue. Behold, Christ and his apostles give us a prognostication in the Scriptures: foretelling by signs in the sun, moon, stars, in the universal decay of nature, and sickness of the world, what will happen in this old year, what in the new year, which in the world to come. The mathematicians and astronomers of the earth never dreamt of a universal eclipse of the sun, only Christ's almanac reports this, Matt. 24.

All beings are of one of these four sorts: Some are from everlasting, not to everlasting. Some to everlasting, not from everlasting. One only thing is both from, and to, everlasting. The rest are neither to, nor from, everlasting.

First, Some are from everlasting, not to everlasting: as God's eternal decrees, which have an end in their determined time, but had no beginning. So God, before all worlds, determined the sending of his Son to die for us, Acts 2:23; but he came 'in the fulness of time,' saith the apostle, Gal. 4:4. This decree had no beginning; it had an ending.

Secondly, Some are to everlasting, not from everlasting: as angels, and men's souls, which had a beginning in time, but shall never end; because they are created of an immortal nature.

Thirdly, One only thing, which is indeed ens entium, God himself, is both from everlasting and to everlasting. For he is an uncreated and eternal subsistence: Alpha and Omega; that First and Last, that had neither beginning nor shall have ending. Whom Plato called τὸ ὄν; and he calls himself by Moses ὁ ὢν, 'that was, that is, and that is to come;' the same for ever.

Fourthly, Other things are neither from everlasting, nor to everlasting; for they had a beginning, and shall have an end. Of this sort are all worldly things. God will give them their end as he is Omega, that gave them their creation as he is Alpha. All these things do decay, and shall perish.

'Mors etiam saxis, nominibusque venit.'

Death shall extend its force even upon stones and names.

Who can then deny this world to be brittle? We see how slowly the tired earth returns us the fruits which we trusted her bowels with. Her usury grows weak, like a decayed debtor, unable to pay us the interest she was wont.

'Ni vis humana quotannis

Maxima quæque manu legeret.*

The world is lame, and every member, as it were, out of joint. It caught a fall in the cradle, as Mephibosheth by falling from his nurse; and the older it waxeth, the more maimedly it halteth. Sin entered presently after the world's birth, and gave it a mortal wound. It hath laboured ever since of an incurable consumption. The noblest part of it, man, first felt the smart; and in his curse both beasts and plants received theirs. It fell sick early in the morning; and hath now languished in a lingering lethargy, till the evening of dissolution is at hand.

Now, since the world is a sea, and so brittle a sea of glass, let us seek to pass over well, but especially to land well. A ship under sail is a good sight; but it is better to see her well moored in the haven. Be desirous of good life, not of long life: the shortest cut to our haven is the happiest voyage. Who would be long on the sea? If a storm or wreck do come, let us save the best good. Whatsoever becomes of the vessel, thy body, make sure to save the passenger, thy soul, 'in the day of the Lord Jesus.' I have now done with the sea, and for this point here cast anchor.

II. Thus far we have surveyed this glassy sea, the world, in regard of itself. The other two attributes concern Almighty God's holding and beholding, guarding and regarding, his seeing and overseeing it. Et videt, et providet: he contemplates, he governs it. His inquisition, and his disposition, are here insinuated. Somewhat (and not much) of either.

1. That God may most clearly view all things being and done in this world, it is said to be in his sight as clear as crystal. As in crystal there is nothing so little but it may be seen; so there is nothing on earth said or done, so slight or small, that it may escape his all-seeing providence. Omnia sunt nuda et patentia oculis ejus. 'There is no creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him, with whom we have to do,' Heb. 4:13. In vain men hope to be hid from God. 'He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see?' Ps. 94:9. All the earth is full of his glory. 'Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence?' Ps. 139:7. It is there amply proved, that neither heaven nor hell, nor uttermost part of the sea, nor day nor night, light nor darkness, can hide us from his face. 'For thou hast possessed my reins, thou hast covered me in my mother's womb.' Our sitting, walking, lying down, or rising up; the thoughts of our hearts, works of our hands, words of our lips, ways of our feet; our reins, bones, bosoms, and our mothers' wombs, wherein we lay in our first infirmity, are well known unto him.

Qualis, mihi dicite, Deus censendus est;

Qui cuncta cernit, ipse autem non cernitur!

said an old poet. 'The Lord hath seven eyes, which run to and fro through the whole earth,' Zech. 4:10. He is totus oculus. Let us not flatter ourselves with those, Ps. 10, that 'say in their heart, God hath forgotten: he hideth his face; he will never see it; 'and so endeavour to pluck out the eye of knowledge itself. But there is neither couch in chamber, nor vault in the ground, clouds of day, darkness of night, bottoms of mountains, nor holes of rocks, nor depth of seas, secret friend, nor more secret conscience, heaven nor hell, that can obscure or shadow us from the eye of the Lord. Wheresoever we are, let us say with Jacob, 'The Lord is in this place, though we be not aware of it,' Gen. 28:17.

Oh, the infinite things and actions that the eye of God sees at once in this crystal glass of the world! Some caring to come out of debt, others to get into debt. Some delving for gold in the bowels of the earth, others in the bowels of the poor. Some buying and bargaining, others cheating in the market. Some praying in their closets, others quaffing in taverns. Here some raising their houses, there others ruining them. Alterum consummantem matrimonium, alterum consumentem patrimonium One marrying and going to the world, another miscarrying, the world going from him. There run honour and pride æquis cervicibus. There walks fraud cheek by jowl with a tradesman. There stalks pride with the pace of a soldier, but habit of a courtier, striving to add to her own stature, feathered on the crown, corked at the heels, light all over, stretching her legs, and spreading her wings like the ostrich, with ostentation of great flight; but, nil penna, sed usus, not an inch higher or better. There slugs idleness; both hands are in its bosom, while one foot should be in the stirrup. Halloo in his ear, preach to him; if he will not waken, prick him with goads; let the corrective law disple* him; he cries not Fodere nescio, but Fodere nolo; not, I know not how to dig, but I will not dig,

Here halts opinion, lame, not with the shortness but length of his legs, one foot too long that mars the verse. There runs policy, and moves more with an engine than many men can do with their hands, leading life after this rule: si occulte, bene; if close enough, well enough. There hurries the papist to the mass, and his wife, the catholic, equivocate before a competent judge, though Christ would not before a Caiaphas, climbing to salvation by an attorney, and likely to speed by a proxy.

There slides by the meagre ghost of malice, her blood drunk up, the marrow of her bones wasted, her whole body like a mere anatomy. There fly a crew of oaths like a flight of dismal ravens, croaking the 'plague to the house' where the swearer is, Zech. 5:3. Nay, ruin to the whole land, Jer. 23. 'For oaths the land mourneth.' Here reels drunkenness with swollen eyes, stammering feet, befriended of that poor remnant of all his wealth (the richly stocked grounds, richly furnished house, richly filled purse, are all wasted, and nothing is left rich but), the nose. There goes murder from Aceldama, the field of blood, to Golgotha, the place of dead souls, and from thence to Hinnom, the valley of fire and torments. There see atheism projecting to displant the paradise of God, and turn it to a wilderness of serpents. Heaven is held but a poet's fable, and the terrors of hell, like Hercules' club in the tragedy, of huge bulk, but rags and straw are the stuffing. Creatures that have a little time on earth, and then vanish. Tu qui dicis, transit Christianus, ipse transis sine Christianis. Thou that sayest the Christians perish, dost perish thyself and leave the Christians behind thee. Whither go these atheists? I believe not to heaven, for they believe there is no heaven. They shall never have those joys they would not believe. They are not in hell neither; there is no atheist. Where then? In hell they are indeed, but not as atheists. They no sooner put their heads within those gates but atheism drops off; they believe and feel now there is a God.

There you shall hear hypocrites, a pipient brood, cackling their own ripeness when they are scarce out of their shells; whose words and works differ, as it is seen in some tap-houses, when the painted walls have sober sentences on them as, 'Fear God, honour the king,' 'Watch and pray,' 'Be sober,' &c., and there is nothing but drunkenness and swearing in the house. There is ignorance, like a stricken Sodomite, groping for the way; nay, indeed, neither discerning nor desiring it.

He sees neither numen nor lumen, neither diem, the daylight of the gospel, nor Deum, the God of day and gospel.

There goes slovenly faction, like a malcontent, that, with incendiary scruples, labours to divide Judah from Israel. It was a strange doom that Valens the emperor gave against Procopius, causing him to be tied to two great trees bowed forcibly together, and so his body to be pulled asunder; that would have pulled asunder the body of the empire. The humourists thrust themselves into this throng, or else I would have spared them; but truth of love to some must not prejudice love of truth in any. If they had as imperative tongues and potential hands, as they have optative minds, they would keep an infinitive stir in the lacerated church. God sees the malicious Jesuit calling up a parliament of devils to plot treasons. He hears their damnable consultations, and observes them, whiles they apparel blood-red murder and black conspiracy in the white robes of religion. He saw Garnet plotting in his study, and Faux digging in the vault, and meant to make the pit, which they digged for others, swallow themselves.

He beholds, as in a clear mirror of crystal, all our impurities, impieties, our contempt of sermons, neglect of sacraments, dishallowing his Sabbaths. Well, as God sees all things so clearly, so I would to God we would behold somewhat. Let us open our eyes, and view in this crystal glass our own works. Consider we a little our own wicked courses, our perverse ways on this sea. Look upon this angle of the world, for so, we think, Anglia signifies; how many vipers doth she nurse and nourish in her indulgent bosom, that wound and sting her? The landlords' oppression, usurers' extortion, patrons' simony, commons' covetousness; our unmercifulness to the poor, over-mercifulness to the rich, malice, ebriety, pride, profanation—these, these are the works that God sees among us; and shall we not see them ourselves? Shall we be utter strangers to our own doings? 'Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God,' 1 Cor. 6:9. Let not us then be such. 'Let us not be desirous of vain-glory, provoking one another, envying one another,' Gal. 5:26. Methinks here, vain-glory stalks in like a mountebank gallant, provocation like a swaggering roarer, and malice like a meagre and melancholy Jesuit. All these things we do, and God sees in the light; and in the light we must repent them, or God will punish them with everlasting darkness. You see how the world is clear to God's eye as crystal.

2. Lastly, this glassy sea is not only as crystal for its transparent brightness, that the Almighty's eye may see all things done in it. But it lies, for situation, before his throne, generally for the whole, and particularly for every member, subject to his judgment and governance.

His throne signifies that impartial government which he exerciseth over the world. 'The Lord shall endure for ever; he hath prepared his throne for judgment; and he shall judge the world in righteousness, he shall minister judgment to the people in uprightness,' Ps. 9:8, 9. Neither is it all for judgment; there is not only a terrible thunder and lightning flashing from his throne, but out of it proceed comfortable voices speaking the solaces of the gospel, and binding up the broken-hearted. Therefore it is said, ver. 3, there is a 'rainbow about the throne,' which is a sign of God's covenant, a seal of his eternal mercy towards us. This is round about the seat, that God can look no way but he must needs see it. So that to the faithful this throne is not terrible: 'Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in the time of need,' Heb. 4:16. If there be the fire of judgment, there is also the rain of mercy to quench it.

Neither is this a transitory throne, subject to changes and schemes, as all earthly thrones are; but (Heb. 1:8), 'Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom.' 'He shall reign ever the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end,' Luke 1:33.

He that sits on the throne is not idle; to let all things in the world run at sixes and sevens; but omnia non solum permissa a Deo, sed etiam immissa. So disposing all things, that not only the good are ordained by him, but even the evil ordered. The sin is of man, the disposition of God. But let God alone with oportet necessitatis; let us look to oportet officii. Sennacherib cannot do what he lists, God can put a bridle in his lips, a hook in his nostrils: 'O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger, and the staff in their hand is mine indignation,' Jer. 10:6. 'Thou art my battle-axe and weapons of war: for with thee will I break in pieces the nations; and with thee will I destroy kingdoms,' Jer. 51:20. Ulterius ne tende odiis; go no further upon God's wrath, thou desperate, wicked man. Gregory Nazianzen speaks of the emperor Valentine, infected with the Arian heresy, that being about to write with his own hand the proscription and banishment of Basil, the pen thrice refused to let fall any ink. But when he would needs write, such a trembling invaded his hand, that his heart being touched, he sent presently and recanted what he had written. But I press this point no further, having in other places liberally handled it.

The four beasts, in ver. 8, 'rest not day nor night, saying Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come.' The fathers, from these words, observe the mystery of trinity in unity, and of unity in trinity—that God is thrice called holy, signifies the trinity; that our Lord God Almighty, the unity. *Quid est, quod ter Sanctus dicitur, si non trina est in Divinitate persona? Cur semel Dominus Deus dicitur, si non est una in Divinitate substantia? Let us then, with the four-and-twenty elders, fall down before him that sits on the throne, ascribing worship to him that liveth for ever; and casting our crowns to the ground, renouncing our own merits, sing to the eternal Unity, 'Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created.' Amen.

PRESUMPTION RUNNING INTO DESPAIR

'They said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb.—REV. 6:16.

THIS verse may be distinguished into error and terror; the error of the reprobate, the terror of the judge. Their error is manifested in their invocation, in which we may observe: to what? mountains and rocks; for what? to fall on them, to hide them.

Thus their amazed error and ignorance is expressed in their prayer. For the terror the Judge is described by his omniscience, 'from the face of him that sitteth on the throne;' his omnipotence, 'from the wrath of the Lamb.'

Every circumstance serves to aggravate their folly and desperate fear. 1. They fear God, but too late. 2. They open their lips to confess the invincible power of Christ; before they were either dumb in silence or blasphemous in contumelies. 3. They pray to the mountains and rocks, which hear them not. 4. To fall on them, which they dare not. 5. To hide them, which they cannot. 6. They beg to be concealed from him that is all eye, from the face of him that sits on the throne. 7. To be protected from him that is all power, 'from the wrath of the Lamb.'

Before we come to their error and matter of their invocation, let us examine two things: what they were, and what they did.

1. The persons thus amazed* with error and amazed with terror are described in the precedent verse: 'The kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, the bond, and the free, hid themselves in the dens and rocks of the mountains.' The greatness of man, when it comes to encounter with God, is weakness and vanity. Is the reprobate a king? The crown on his head is not thunderproof; lift he his sceptre never so high, there is a sceptre of justice shall smite it down.

Is he great in his country, that (as they write of the sea about the castle of Mina) the current goes ever with the wind of his will? Be he never so high, there is one 'higher than he, and the Highest of all regardeth it,' Eccles. 8:5, and will subject it.

Is he rich? Were he the eldest son of Mammon, and sole heir to all the usurers in the world, can his gold save him? Is vengeance afraid to strike his vessel because his sails be of silk and it is ballasted with refined ore? Shall he buy out his damnation with coin? No, the Samuel of heaven will never take bribes.*

Is he a chief captain? Be his looks never so stern, his speech never so imperious, impetuous, he may command here and go without. Were he general of Xerxes' army, yet he shall find the words of the psalm truth, 'Man is not saved by the multitude of an host.'

Is he mighty? Were he, as Alexander thought himself, till he saw his own blood, the son of Jupiter Hammon, yet woe to man when he shall wrestle with his Maker. Proud worm, he may dare to lift up his head, but shall quickly be trodden into slime. When the Lord of hosts is angry, whose wrath shakes the earth and burns to the bottom of hell, who shall proudly without confusion look him in the face? Silly giant of men, that thou shouldest dare to grapple, to parley, yea, so much as to look at God! Lo, greatness!

Time was when, if a friend in the court shall say to thee, as Elisha to the Shunamite, 'What is to be done for thee? Wouldest thou be spoken for to the king, or to the captain of the host?' 2 Kings 4:13, it would have seemed as high a gratifying and ratifying of his love to thee as thou couldst have desired or he expressed. What favour will it be at this day to be spoken for to all the kings of the earth, 'great men, rich men, mighty captains?' Alas! they have need to be spoken for themselves. The greatest potentate, if reprobate, hath now his honour laid in the dust, and from a public throne he creeps into a hole. As ambitious Herod received his pride and glory (with derogation to God, vox Dei) in a theatre, so now his shame and confusion is in the sight of the whole world, of good and bad angels, of good and bad men. Sennacherib, in his ruff, could once say, 'Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arphad, the king of the city of Sepharvaim, Zena, and Ivah?' Isa. 37:13. But now where is the king of Ashur? Thus 'God leadeth princes away spoiled, and overthroweth the mighty,' Job 12:19, 21. For their wickedness, 'he poureth contempt upon princes.' Then shall be manifest the irresistible power and unblameable justice of God, 'who sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers: stretching out the heavens as a curtain, and spreading them as a tent to dwell in. He bringeth the princes to nothing, and maketh the judges of the earth as vanity,' Isa. 40:22, 23.

What privilege, then, do these inferior authorities bring with them, that the bondman should thus strive to be free, the freeman to be mighty, the mighty to be a chief captain, the chief captain to be rich, the rich to be great, the great to be kings, till, in their opinion, nil restat quod præstat, nothing remains to be aspired to. Whereas to these men, omnia in præsentia parva, in fine nulla, post finem mala, all is for the present little; for ut luna, sic sublunaria, as the moon itself, so all things under it are subject to eclipses and changes. In the end they are nothing; death, when the game is done, shuffling king and pawn into one bag. After the end found evil things; for et perduntur et perdunt, they are both lost themselves, and lose their owners.

These so popular wonders, the terror of slaves and mirror of fools, on whom the eye of the world was fixed with admiration, are glad to hide themselves in holes. Where are you, ye great men, that were so ambitious of fame, and made human praise stand in competition with conscience, as if it were the better mistress and worthy of more servants? Alas! glad to be shrouded in holes; your greatness now wisheth itself so little that it might not be seen. You insatiate covetous, that never ceased joining house to house, land to land, and possessing whole countries, yet whined for lack of elbow-room; lo, you shall at this day be glad of a hole, a dark hollow cave in a rock, for your parlour, or more glad if you might be dissolved into nothing.

2. 'They said:' We have described the persons, what they were. Let us see what they did. They said: They open their lips to confess the invincible and inevitable power of Christ. Whence derive we two observations.

(1.) The sense of present misery takes away atheism. Before, their mouths were either shut by silence or opened by blasphemies; possessed either with a dumb or a roaring devil. 'God was not in all their thoughts,' Ps. 10:4; or if in their thoughts, not in their lips; or if in their lips, but to his dishonour; not named but in their oaths. Now, lo, they speak, and make a desperate acknowledgment of that power they erst derided. The day of judgment, when it comes, shall find no atheist. What those degenerate creatures would not believe they shall see; they would not acknowledge their Maker, they shall find their Judge, and cry to the mountains, Fall on us, &c.

Consider this 'ye that forget God, lest you be torn in pieces when there is none to deliver you,' Ps. 50:22. You may forget him during your short pleasure, you shall remember him for ever in torture. Proceed to 'speak of him wickedly, and like enemies to take his name in vain,' Ps. 139:20, you shall one day fall low before his footstool, not with a voluntary, but enforced, reverence. You that have denied God on earth, the first voice that shall come from your lips shall be a hopeless acknowledgment of his majesty.

(2.) The saying that comes from them is desperate; whence note that, in God's just punishment, desperation is the reward of presumption. They that erst feared too little, shall now fear too much. Before, they thought not of God's justice, now they shall not conceive his mercy. Consciences that are without remorse are not without horror. It is the kindness which presumptuous sin doeth the heart, to make it at last despair of forgiveness. 'They say.'

Behold, God accuseth not, they accuse themselves. God loves to have a sinner accuse himself, and therefore sets his deputy in the breast of man; which, though it be a neuter when the act is doing, is an adversary afterwards. The conscience is like the poise of a clock; the poise being down, all motion ceaseth, the wheels stir not; wound up, all is set on going. Whiles conscience is down there is no noise or moving in the heart, all is quiet; but when it is wound up by the justice of God, it sets all the wheels on working,—tongue to confess, eyes to weep, hands to wring, breast to be beaten, heart to ache, voice to cry; and that, where mercy steps not in, a fatal cry, to the hills, 'Fall on us, and hide us.'

Sin and judgment for sin make the most cruel men cowardly. Tyrants whose frowns have been death, oppressors that have made their poor tenants quake at their looks, now tremble themselves, and would change firmness with an aspen leaf. They that care not for the act of sin shall care for the punishment. Tumidi faciendo, timidi patiendo. Nero, that could not be tired in cutting throats, is soon weary of his own torment. They that have made others weep, shall desperately howl themselves. Cain, that durst kill the fourth part of the world at a blow, even his own brother, dares afterwards not look a man in the face, lest he should be slain, Gen. 4:14. Who durst be more impudently bold with God than Judas, when he betrayed his only Son to murderers? Yet, after the treason, who more cowardly than Judas? He becomes his own hangman. The curse that follows sin makes presumption itself to shudder. But what madness is it not to complain till too late. If our foresight were but half as sharp as our sense, we should not dare to sin. The issue of wickedness would appear a thousand times more horrible than the act is pleasant.

Let this teach us now to think of the justice of God as well as his mercy, that hereafter we may think of his mercy as well as his justice. The mercy of God is abused to encourage lewdness, and wretched men by Christ's merits are emboldened to commit that for which he died; but so men may run with mercy in their mouths to hell. They that in life will give no obedience to the law, shall in death have no benefit by the gospel. When they gave themselves over to lying, swearing, coveting, &c., they were wont to cry, Mercy, mercy; now, lo, they feel what those sins are, and cry nothing but Justice, justice; they cannot think on mercy. They that have abused mercy, must be quitted with vengeance. The good now sing, 'With thee, O Lord, is mercy; therefore thou shalt be feared.' The reprobates sing at last, With thee, O Lord, is judgment; with thee is storm and tempest, indignation and wrath, confusion and vengeance, and therefore art thou feared.

These necessary occurrences thus considered, let us pass to their invocation, wherein is exemplified their error. Here we must observe, To what; For what they call.

1. To what.—They are mountains and rocks, unreasonable, yea, insensible creatures. Whence we may deduce two inferences, a negative and an affirmative.

(1.) Negatively, it is clear, that they have no acquaintance with God, therefore know not how to direct their prayers unto him. If their trust had been in God, they needed not to fly to the mountains. So David sweetly, Ps. 11, 'In the Lord put I my trust: how then say you to my soul, Flee as a bird to your mountain?' It is God's charge; 'Call upon me in the day of trouble; and I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me,' Ps. 50:15. But, Rom. 10, 'How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed?' Or believe in him they have not known? And how should they know him but by his word? Alas, those mutual passages and intercourse of means they have ever debarred themselves. They would neither suffer God to trouble them by his word, nor would they offer to trouble him by their prayers. 'They will not call upon him,' Ps. 14:4, nor will they hear him calling upon them.

Therefore as those that never were in the company of God, they know not how to address themselves to him, but rather to rocks and mountains. As extremity discerneth friends, verè amat, qui miserum amat, so it distinguisheth a man in himself. A sudden disturbance gives a great trial of a Christian's disposition. For, as in a natural man at such an affrightment, all the blood runs to the heart, to guard the part that is principal, so in a good man, at such an instance, all the powers and faculties run to the soul, to save that which is principal. The blood and spirits strive to save the life of the body; faith and hope to save the life of the soul. So that at the sudden assault of some danger a man shall best judge of his own heart. It may be at other times a dissembler, for 'man's heart is false, who can know it?' yet at such time it will manifest itself, and cannot deceive.

If God hath been our familiar friend and accustomed helper, danger doth not sooner assault us than we salute him by our prayers. The first thought of our hearts is Jesus Christ; the first voice of our lips is Peter's on the sea in such an extremity, 'Lord, save me,' Matt. 14:30; our faith is reposed on his wonted mercy and protection, 'We know whom we have believed.' Daniel calls on God ere he falls to the lions; this stops their mouths.

The wicked, in such misery, are either heavy and heartless, as Nabal, whose 'heart died within him, and he became as a stone,' 1 Sam. 25:37. Or desperate, as Julian, throwing his blood up into the air, with a blasphemous confession. Or sottish, as these here, running to the mountains, unprofitable, unpossible helps. When the blow of vengeance strikes the covetous, he runs to his counting-house; if his bags can give him no succour, he is distracted. If any broken reed be their confidence, in these overwhelming woes, they catch drowning hold of that; so they and their hopes perish together. There are some whose tongues are so poisoned with blasphemy, that, in an unexpected accident, the very first breath of their lips is a curse or an oath. As if they would swear away destruction, which every ungodly speech draws on nearer. If these men had been acquainted with God in fair weather, they would not forget him in a storm. But they that will have no familiarity with God in peace, shall have him to seek in extremity.

When therefore some sudden peril hath threatened thee with terror, note seriously how thou art affected. Though the danger came unlooked for, let it not pass unthought of; but as thou blessest God for delivery, so examine the good or ill-disposedness of thine own heart. If thou find thyself courageous and heavenly-minded on thy confidence in God, take at once assurance of thy faith and God's mercy. He that now stood by thee, will never leave thee. If otherwise, lament thy sins which darken thy soul's way to the mercy-seat, and beseech Jesus Christ to store thy heart with better comforts. If thy treasure be in heaven, and thy soul hath been used to travel often thither, when danger comes, it knows the way so well that it cannot miss it.

(2.) Affirmatively, this presents a soul amazed with fear and folly. They call to the mountains, that can neither hear nor answer. When the world was destroyed with water, men climbed up to the tops of the mountains; when it shall be dissolved with fire, they will desire the holes of the rocks, to lie under the hills. The mountains are but swellings of the earth, and the rocks are surd things, that have no ears: can they hear? or if they hear, can they answer? or if they answer, can they save? When the graves must vomit up their dead, shall the rocks conceal the living? Those five kings could not be hid in the cave of Makedah from Joshua, Josh. 10:17, and shall any cave hide from Jesus?

Whiles guilt and fear consult of refuge, how vain shifts they imagine! Adam would hide his disobedience in the bushes; Saul his rebellion in the crowd of the people. So the hood-winked fool seeing nobody, thinks nobody sees him. Helpless evasions! When Adonijah heard the trumpets sounding at Solomon's coronation, he quaked, and 'fled to the horns of the altar,' 1 Kings 1:50. When the ungodly shall hear the archangel's trump proclaiming the coronation of Christ, they have no sanctuary (they never loved it in all their lives), but fly to the rocks and mountains.

The grave is a dark and privative place: yet as a prisoner that comes out of a sordid and stinking dungeon, into the open air for his trial in a desperate cause, had rather keep the prison still; so these reprobates newly raised from the earth, cry to it to receive them again, glad to remain (though not on the face of it with pleasure) in the bowels of it with rottenness and solitude, rather than in the open light to come before the judgment-seat of Christ. The grave is a down-bed to hell. They suddenly start out of their sleep, and meet with ghastly amazedness at the mouth of their sepulchres: beholding on the one side sins accusing, on another side hellish fiends vexing, an anguished conscience burning within, heaven and earth without; above them the countenance of an angry Judge, below them a lake of unquenchable fire, round about howling and bitter lamentation: no marvel then if at the world's end they be at their wits end, and cry to the mountains, 'Fall on us.'

Let all this declare to men the vanity of their worldly hopes. God is the Preserver of men, not hills and rocks. The rich man is brought in upon a premunire, can his gold acquit him in this star chamber? The epicure thinks to drown sorrow in lusty wines; the oppressor mistrusts not the power of his own hand; the proud refugeth his troubled heart in his trunks, the lustful in his punks; what is this but running to rocks and mountains? Thus madly do men commit two errors. They 'forsake the Creator, which would never forsake them, and adhere to the creatures, which can never help them,' Jer. 2:13. 'O Lord, the hope of Israel, all that forsake thee shall be ashamed, and all that depart from thee shall be written in the earth,' Jer. 17:13. Now at this day, perhaps, they would seek to the Lord, but they are answered, Go to the gods whom ye have served. Lo, then, of these gods they shall be weary, as in Isa. 2, where these very words of my text are delivered, ver. 19, 'They shall go into the holes of the rocks,' &c., it is immediately added, 'In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which he made for himself to worship, to the moles, and to the bats.' Even the spiritual idolater, the covetous, shall throw his images, golden or silver shrines for the Diana of his avarice, his damned coin to combustion, with a væ, Woe unto it, it hath lost my soul; as the sick stomach loathes the meat, whereof it surfeited.

Well, let us leave invocation to these rocks, worldly refuges, and remember that there is One to be called on, who is only able to defend us, a spiritual, holy, and happy rock, Jesus Christ. David often calls God his 'Rock and his Refuge,' Psa. 18:2, and 28:1. A rock that bears up the pillars of the world, 'Their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges,' Deut. 32:31. He that builds his house of assurance on this Rock, shall stand immovable to wind or weather; he needs not the shelter of mountains, 'for he shall stand like Mount Sion, that abideth fast for ever,' Psal. 125:1. They that despise him, shall find him a Rock also, 'If they fall on it, they shall be broken: if it fall on them, it will grind them to powder,' Matt. 21:44. He is a stone, the stone, the 'headstone of the corner,' Ps. 118:22. cut out of the quarry of heaven, 'without hands,' Dan 2:45, of whom we are made 'living stones,' 1 Pet. 2:5. He is strong without all things; all things weak without him; trust in him, and you shall have no need to fly to rocks and mountains.

2. For what.—The benefit that they would have the rocks and the mountains do them, is to fall on them and hide them. Whence we derive three observations.

(1.) Despair is ever wishing for death, often impatiently snatching at it in this world; but when the last day comes, so greedily longing for it, that to be sure of it, they desire the mountains to dispatch them. Death by the wicked is now most feared, death at the last shall be the thing most wished; 'they shall desire death, and shall not find it.' They that sit in the warm nest of riches, hatching up their brood of lusts, quake at the hearing of death. There are some fear to die, others not so much to die as to be dead. The former are cowardly, the other unbelieving souls. Some fear both, to whom nothing in life than life is more desirable. But when this last extremity comes, mori cupiunt, they desire to die. And that death, like a merciless executioner, might not have too many strokes at their lives, they beg help of the mountains, that they may be thoroughly dispatched at once, without need of a second blow. Cain, at his arraignment for his brother, would needs live; God grants it, as if it were too much favour for him to die. But he yields it for a curse, as if he heard his prayer in anger. He lives, but banished from God, carrying his hell in his bosom, and the brand of vengeance in his forehead. God rejects him, the earth repines at him, and men abhor him. Lo now Cain would die; himself now wisheth the death he feared, and no man dares pleasure him with a murder. As Nero in the like case, Nec amicum, nec inimicum habeo, I have neither friend nor enemy; or as Saul found in his armour-bearer not a will to kill him, though he had a will to be killed by him. Death these reprobates feared, and only death is now desired. 'They cry to the mountains, Fall on us.'

(2.) Observe that rocks and mountains are far lighter than sin. Zachariah compares it to a talent of lead, Zach. 5; Isaiah calls it a burden, Isa. 21. Such a weight bore our Saviour, that he groaned under it. 'I am pressed under you, as a cart is pressed that is full of sheaves,' Amos 2:13. The wicked, that, like Babel-builders, think to aspire to heaven by multiplying of earth, would be glad if, cumuli tumuli, their bodies might be buried under their heaps of wealth, where their souls had been buried long before. But what is a load of earth, a mountain huger than Etna, under which Jupiter was said subter fulminare gigantes, what is the whole massy body of the earth, to the weight of sin?

Think of it, ye Theomachoi, that strive in your rebellions imponere Pelion Ossæ, ye rapacious covetous, that 'load yourselves with thick clay,' Hab. 2. You lay heavy burdens on the poor, heavier on your consciences. Sin may seem light for a season, as a pack made up, but not assayed, with one of your fingers. When Satan shall lay it on you, it will break your backs. You bear it now like cork and feathers; at that day you shall judge it heavier than rocks and mountains.

Now, in contempt of law and gospel, honesty and conscience, earth and heaven, they call to pride, ambition, blasphemy, ebriety, luxury, oppression, 'Fall on us, and cover us,' wearing 'pride as a chain, and covering themselves with cruelty as with a garment,' Ps. 73:6. Sin lies at the door, and they easily take it up. The devil puts his shoulders under the weight, and, thus supported, they feel it not. But when God's justice shall 'reprove them, and set their sins in order before their eyes,' Ps. 50:21, yea, impose them on their weak and yielding consciences, how different will their cry be? 'Mountains, fall on us; rocks, cover us.' The swearer saying to these heavy creatures, You are lighter than my oaths; the covetous, You are not so ponderous as my oppressions; the adulterer, The whole earth is a gentle pressure to the burden of my lusts.

Custom in sin obstupefies a man's sense, and still, like that Roman Milo, his strength increasing with his burden. He that first carried sin a wanton calf, can at last bear it a goring ox. Men lock up their iniquities, as the usurer his money in a chest, where the light of reproof may not find them out. They pack all their iniquities upon Him that will bear them for none but His; or reserve them to an hour's repentance, setting them a day of cancelling, but they break it, as if their last breath could dispel and scatter them all into air. But, alas! sins then are found heaviest of all, and here, like malefactors pressing to death, they cry out for more weight, the accession of rocks and mountains, to dispatch them. Lo, they are to come before the Judge, therefore would be pressed to death by these ponderous and massy creatures.

The mountains have not been more barren than they of goodness, the rocks not so hard as their hearts. The cross of Christ hath been held too heavy, repentance too troublesome a guest for their houses, faith and obedience have been cast off as poor friends, all godliness too weighty; now rocks and hills are light. Christ's yoke was not for their shoulders; Satan's must. His law might not be borne, it was so heavy; his wrath must be borne, and that is heavier. Oh, then, thrice-blessed they whose sins God bindeth up in a bundle, and sinks them in the whirlpool of forgetfulness, that they may never be imposed, for they are too heavy to be borne.

(3.) Observe that before these wicked were lords of nations and countries (for they are said to be princes, captains, conquerors, rich men); now they would be glad of one hole to hide them. Of all their dominions they beg but the barrenest parcel, a rock or mountain; and that to do them a poor office, to conceal them. How much doth man's avarice and ambition covet here, how little contents him hereafter! In death the wickedest potentate must be content with a grave. After death he would be content with a grave still; yea, glad if in the bottom of a mountain he might be hidden.

Hear this, ye covetous, that 'join house to house, and land to land,' by disjoining the societies of men, as if you would leave the whole earth to your babes. *Excudit natura redeuntem, sicut intrantem, Nature shall as strictly examine your going out as it did your coming in. Nonne telluris tres tantum cubiti te expectant?† Do not only three cubits of ground allot themselves to receive you? Only a grave remains, and all you that boast of your great lands shall at that day say, Hæc terra mea, et terra tua, this is all my land, this is all thy land; even so much room as thy dusts will take up, and all the remainder of mighty Hercules will scarce fill a little pitcher. A little quantity of ground hath nature proportioned thee, didst thou possess as much as ever the tempter shewed Christ? When certain philosophers intently beheld the tomb of Alexander, saith one, Heri fecit ex auro thesaurum; hodie aurum ex eo facit thesaurum,‡ 'Yesterday he treasured up gold, to-day gold treasures up him.' Another, 'Yesterday the world did not content him, to-day ten cubits contain him.' Socrates carried Alcibiades, bragging of his lands, to a map of the world, and bade him demonstrate them. Alcibiades could not find them, for, alas! Athens itself was but a small and scarce discernible point. A wiser man spake otherwise of his lands, O Ager, quàm multorum fuisti et eris! nunc meus, et postea nescio cujus, 'O, land, how many men's hast thou been, and shalt be! now mine, and hereafter I know not whose.' So little ground contents us when we are dead.

But when the wicked shall rise again, would it not serve them still with all their hearts? Had they not rather lie in rottenness than combustion? Were not a cold grave more welcome than a hot furnace? Yes, rather had they be dead without sense than alive in torment. Now they beg not a city, though a little one as Zoar; not a house, though poor and bleak as Codrus's; not an open air, though sharp and irksome, scorched with the Indian sun, or frozen with the Russian cold. There is no hope of these favours. Give them but a mountain to fall on them, and a rock to hide them, and they are highly pleased. Here is a strange alteration for the wicked, when they shall go from a glorious mansion to a loathsome dungeon, from the table of surfeit to the table of vengeance, from fawning observants to afflicting spirits, from a bed of down to a bed of fire, from soft linen and silken coverings to wish a rock for their pillow and a mountain for their coverlet! Nay, and yet they that commanded so far on earth cannot command this piece of earth to do them such a kindness. They could in the days of their pride speak imperiously enough, 'This land is mine, this town is mine;' as Nabal said, 'Shall I take my meat and my drink?' &c.; but now they feel it was none of theirs, not one hole must shelter them, not one hillock do them service.

Nothing helps when God will smite; mountains and rocks are no defence when God pursues. 'Dost thou think to reign because thou clothest thyself in cedar?' Jer. 22:15. What is cedar against thunder? God hath a hand that can strike through forts, rocks, and bulwarks. The sevenfold walls of Babylon cannot defend the tyrant within them. The heavens 'melt at the presence of the Lord; if he touch the mountains, they smoke' for it. The offspring of the revived world offer to build a tower whose top might reach to heaven. What security could be in it? Are not things nearer to heaven more subject to the violences of heaven, lightning, thunder, and those higher inflammations! Ferunt summos fulgura montes. In se magna ruunt, summisque negatum est stare diu. God soon made it a monument of their folly and his power. He gives confusion of their voices and their work at once. When God rained from heaven that greatest shower that ever the earth did or shall sustain, you know their shifts. They think to overclimb the judgment, and, being got up to the highest mountains, look down with some hope on the swimming valleys. When the water began to ascend up to their refuged hills, and the place of their hope became an island, lo, now they hitch up higher to the tops of the tallest trees, till at last the waters overtake them, half dead with hunger and horror. The mountains could not save them in that day of water, nor shall the mountains in this day of fire. It is not then the defence of forts and ports, the secrecy of caves or graves, the bottom-burrows of hills, or vaulty dens of rocks; not a league with all the elements of the world, beasts of the earth, stones of the street, that can secure them. Be hidden they cannot; what should they then wish but death? They that once trembled to die do now more quake to live; they would be glad of a riddance, and kiss the instrument of their annihilation. They would prize and embrace it as the best happiness that ever saluted them, if, like beasts, they might perish to nothing. Here they envy the stork, stag, raven, oak for long life, and chide nature for their own shortness; but at this day they would change with any flower, though the continuance thereof were not so much as Jonah's gourd's, and think not to be was to be happy. The pangs of the first death are pleasures in respect of the second.

But what hope is there of their security or refuge in mountains, when, ver. 14, 'the very heaven shall depart as a scroll that is rolled up together, and every mountain and island shall be moved out of their places?' So Isa. 34:4. Heaven is expansum tanquam linteam, et diducta lamina; but shall then be 'folded up like a garment,' whose beauty is not seen; or 'rolled together like a volume,' Heb. 1:12, whose large contents are, as it were, abridged. Not that the matter of the world shall be quite abolished; for, as we say now of grace, Adolet non abolet naturam gratia, so we may say of justice, Perficit non destruit mundum justitia. Corruption shall be taken away, not all the matter that was corrupted. But if all things be thus narrowly searched, how shall the ungodly hope to lie hidden?

II. We have now considered the horror of the reprobates; let us look to the Judge, from whom they desire to be hidden. 'From the presence of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb;' in whom we find an omniscience, and an omnipotence, which circumstances the time allows me but to mention. First, for his all-knowing wisdom:—

1. 'From the face.'—It was ever the fashion of guiltiness, to fly from the presence of God. Adam had no sooner sinned, but he thrusts his head in a bush. Sin's inevitable effect is shame. Though impudence bear it out for a time, 'They were not ashamed when they had committed abomination,' Jer. 6:15; yet they shall one day 'bear the reproach of their sins, and be ashamed, yea even confounded,' 31:19. Shame must come, either first to repentance, 'What fruit had you then in those things, whereof you are now ashamed,' Rom. 6:21; or at last in vengeance, 'Let them be ashamed that transgress without a cause,' Ps. 25:3. Let this teach us how to judge rightly of sin, that drives us from the face of God.

But doth not the glory of the Lord fill all the earth? 'Whither then shall they go from his face: whither fly from his presence?' Ps. 139:7. We shall find the prophet concluding in that psalm, that there is neither heaven nor hell, nor uttermost part of the sea, nor day nor night, light nor darkness, that can hide us from his face. Our sitting, lying down, rising up, the words of our tongues, ways of our feet, thoughts of our heart, our reins, bones, and mothers' wombs, wherein we lay in our first infirmity, are well known to him. Let us not flatter ourselves, as if we would pluck out the eye of knowledge. 'God hideth his face, he will never see us,' Ps. 10:11. For there is neither couch in chamber, nor vault in the ground; neither bottoms of mountains, nor holes of rocks; neither secret friend, nor more secret conscience; neither heaven nor hell, that can conceal us.

'Of him that sitteth.'—Christ now sits in glory. While he was on earth, how little rested he! He dearly earned that voice before he heard it, 'Sit thou at my right hand:' now behold he sits. Good rest is the reward of good labour. The week of our days spent, we shall have an eternal Sabbath: 'Enter into God's rest,' Heb. 3:11. 'Rest from our labours,' Rev. 14:13. Hast thou laboured? thou shalt have ease: hast thou travelled in the ways of grace? thou shalt sit on the seat of glory.

'On the throne.'—Christ at this day shall appear in his true majesty. On earth he would not be crowned. The reason of his refusal was, 'My kingdom is not of this world.' Now he sits in his throne. He hath a kingdom here, but it is secret in the conscience: then it shall be conspicuous, 'sitting in his throne.' His majesty hath been despised; but now, 'Bring those mine enemies that would not have me reign over them, and slay them before me,' Luke 19:27.

Thus differs Christ's first coming and his second. Then in humility, now in glory; then with poor shepherds, now with mighty angels; then the contempt of nations, now the terror of the world; then crowned with thorns, now with majesty; then judged by one man, now judging all men; then in a cratch, now in a throne. You see his all-knowledge; now for his almightiness.

2. 'From the wrath.'—The wrath of Christ in his justice: Attribuitur ira Deo per effectum. As man offended seeks revenge, so when God executes judgment, it is called his wrath. But passion in us, perfection in him. He hath long been provoked; give him now leave to strike. You that made so light to trampo his blood under your sensual feet, shall now find what his wrath is. Let us now think of this wrath, that we may escape it. The commination of hell doth not less commend God's providence, than the promise of heaven. *Nisi intentata esset gehenna, omnes in gehennam caderemus. Now or never is this wrath to be escaped: therefore, 'Kiss the son lest he be angry, and so ye perish from the way; if his wrath be kindled, yea but a little, blessed are they that put their trust in him,' Ps. 2:12.

'Of the Lamb.'—Christ was called a Lamb in his passion; so here in his coming to judgment, not that he should suffer any more, but to shew that the same Lamb that was slain shall give sentence on his murderers. 'The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son. And hath given him authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man,' John 5:22–27, so Acts 17:31, and Rev. 1:7. It shall aggravate their vexation, that the Lamb, who offered his blood for their redemption, shall now censure them for despising it. He that would have been their mediator to pray for them, and their advocate to plead for them, must now be their judge to sentence them. The Lamb that saveth the sheep on the right hand, shall cast off the goats on the left. The Lamb they have contemned, by this Lamb they shall be condemned. Woful men, whom the wrath of the Lamb lights on; for he shall give them an Ite, maledicti. What shall then become of them, but to knock at the gates of heaven whiles those gates are standing, and cry for ever to God, but to no purpose?

I have no will to end with a terror; yet no time to sweeten your thoughts with those comforts which faith might suck from this last word, 'the Lamb.' I say no more. The godly shall find him a Lamb indeed, as willing now to save them, as before to suffer for them. He hath purchased, promised, and prepared a kingdom; and they shall 'reign with him that sits on the throne, and with the Lamb for evermore.' To whom be eternal glory! Amen.

HEAVEN-GATE;

OR,

THE PASSAGE TO PARADISE

'And may enter in through the gates into the city.'—REV. 22:14.

IF we supply these words with the first word of the verse, 'blessed,' we shall make a perfect sentence of perfect comfort. 'Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.'

In the whole there be premises, and promises.

The premises qualify us; we must be such as are blessed; and who are they? Qui præstant mandata, 'that do his commandments.' The promises crown us, and these are two: First, that we 'may have right to the tree of life,' even that which 'is in the midst of the paradise of God,' Rev. 2:7. From whence the angel, with a flaming sword, shall keep all the reprobate; secondly, Et per portas ingrediantur civitatem, 'and may enter in through the gates into the city;' when without shall be dogs and scorners, &c.; whosoever loveth and maketh a lie.

To the last words of the verse I have bound and bounded my discourse; wherein I find three points readily offering themselves to be considered, viz., 1. Motus, motion, 'enter in;' 2. Modus, manner, 'through the gates;' 3. Terminus, place, 'into the city.'

So there is a threefold circumstance.

1. Quid, What? an entrance.
2. Quà, How? through the gates.
3. Quò, Whither? into the city.

1. The motion. 'Enter in.'—They are blessed that enter in; perseverance only makes happy. Our labours must not cease till we can (with Stephen) see these gates open, and our Saviour offering to take us by the hand, and welcome our entrance. We know who hath taught us, that only 'continuers to the end shall be saved.' It is observable, that in the Holy Spirit's letters sent to those seven churches, in the second and third chapter of this book, all the promises run to perseverers; vincenti dabitur, to him that overcomes it shall be given. Nec paranti ad prælium, nec pugnanti ad sanguinem, multo minus tergiversanti ad peccatum, sed vincenti ad victoriam. Nor to him that prepares to fight, nor to him that resists to blood, much less to him that shews his back in cowardice, but to him that overcomes to conquest. Demas, seeing this war ran away; fell back to the security of the world. Saul made himself ready to this battle, but he durst not fight—glory and lusts carried him away. Judas stood a bout or two, but the high priest's money made him give over, and the devil took him captive. But Paul fought out this combat even to victory, though 'he bore in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus,' Gal. 6:17. 'I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; therefore now there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me,' 2 Tim. 4:7, 8.

This is a good life, saith Bernard. Mala pati, et bona facere, et sic usque ad mortem perseverare, to suffer evil, to do good, and so to continue to the end. Some came into the vineyard in the morning, some at noon, others later; none received the penny but they that stayed till night. Augustine affirms this to be almost all the contents of the Lord's prayer: *Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done. Wherein we desire that his name may always be sanctified, his kingdom always propagated, his will always obeyed.

Indeed this grace perfects all graces. We believe in vain, if our faith hold not out to the end; we love in vain, if our charity grow cold at last; we pray in vain, if our zeal grows faint; we strive in vain at the strait gate, if not till we enter. Venire ad religionem est vera devotio; sed non religiose vivere vera damnatio; to come to the truth of religion is true devotion; not to live religiously is true damnation.

Man is naturally like a horse that loveth short journeys, and there are few that hold out. Whence it comes that the last are often first, and the first last. 'Know ye not that they which run in a race, run all, but one receiveth the prize?' 1 Cor. 9:24. He that hath a good horse can go faster up a hill than down a hill. He that hath a good faith doth as quickly ascend the Mount Zion, as the wicked descend to the valley of Hinnom. If men would as strongly erect themselves upwards, as they direct their courses downwards, they might go to heaven with less trouble than they do go to hell.

But he that at every step looks at every stop, and numbers his perils with his paces, either turns aside faintly, or turns back cowardly. They that go wandering and wondering on their journey, are at the gates of Samaria when they should enter the gates of Jerusalem. God saith, 'I will not leave you,' Heb. 13:5. Will you, then, leave God? One told Socrates that he would fain go to Olympus, but he distrusted his sufficiency for the length of the journey. Socrates told him—Thou walkest every day little or much; continue this walk forward thy way, and a few days shall bring thee to Olympus. Every day every man takes some pains. Let him bestow that measure of pains in travelling to heaven; and the further he goes the more heart he gets, till at last he enter through the gates into the city.

Bernard calls perseverance the only daughter of the highest King, the perfection of virtues, the store-house of good works; a virtue without which no man shall see God.[†] There is a last enemy to be destroyed—death. We must hold out to the conquest even of this last adversary, which, if it conquer us by the sting of our sin, shall send us to the doors of hell; if we conquer it by our faith, it shall send us to the gates of this city—heaven. Lauda navigantem cum pervenerit ad portum. All the voyage is lost through the perilous sea of this world, if we suffer shipwreck in the haven, and lose our reward there, where we should land to receive it. What get we, if we keep Satan short of ruling us with his force many hours, when at our last hour he shall snatch our bliss from us? The runner speeds all the way; but when he comes at the race's end to the goal, he stretcheth forth his hand to catch the prize. Be sure of thy last step, to put forth the hand of faith then most strongly: Ne perdatür præmium tantis laboribus quæsitum; lest the reward be lost, which thou with much labour hast aimed at.

It is not enough, Quærere cœlum, sed acquirere; non Christum sequi, sed consequi: to seek heaven, but to find it; not to follow Christ, but to overtake him; not to be brought to the gates, but to enter in. 'Many will say to Christ in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name?' Matt. 7:22. But the 'Master of the house is first risen, and hath shut to the door,' Luke 13:25. Either they come too soon, before they have gotten faith and a good conscience; or too late, as those foolish virgins, when the gate was shut. If, then, we have begun, let us continue to entrance.* Cujusque casus tantò majoris est criminis, quantò priusquam caderet, majoris erat virtutis.† Every man's fault hath so much the more discredit of scandal, as he, before he fell, had credit of virtue. Let us beware that we do not slide; if slide, that we do not fall; if fall, that we fall forward, not backward. 'The just man' often slips, and sometime 'falls,' Prov. 24:16. And this is dangerous; for if a man, while he stands on his legs, can hardly grapple with the devil, how shall he do when he is fallen down under his feet? But if they do fall, they fall forward, as Ezekiel, Ezek. 1:28; not backward, as Eli at the loss of the ark, 1 Sam. 4:18; or they that came to surprise Christ. 'They went backward and fell to the ground,' John 18:6.

Cease not, then, thy godly endeavours, until Contingas portum, quo tibi cursus erat. Say we not like the woman to Esdras, whether in a vision or otherwise, when he bade her go into the city—'That will I not do; I will not go into the city, but here I will die,' 2 Esd. 10:18. It is a wretched sin, saith Augustine, after tears for sin, not to preserve innocence. Such a man is washed, but is not clean. Quia commissa flere desinit, et iterum flenda committit. He leaves weeping for faults done, and renews faults worthy of weeping. Think not thyself safe, till thou art got within the gates of the city. Behold thy Saviour calling, thy Father blessing, the Spirit assisting, the angels comforting, the word directing, the glory inviting, good men associating. Go cheerfully, till thou 'enter in through the gates into the city.'

2. The manner. 'Through the gates.'—Not singularly a gate, but gates. For the city is said to have 'twelve gates. On the east three gates, on the north three, on the south three, and on the west three,' Rev. 21:12; to declare that men shall come from all the corners of the world, 'from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God,' Luke 13:29. These gates are not literally to be understood, but mystically: Pro modo intrandi, for the manner of entrance. The gates are those passages, whereby we must enter this city.

Heaven is often said to have a gate. 'Strive to enter in at the strait gate,' saith Christ, Matt. 7:13. 'Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors,' saith the Psalmist, Ps. 24:7. 'This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven,' saith Jacob, Gen. 28:17. There must be gates to a city: they that admit us hither are the gates of grace. So the analogy of the words infer; doing the commandments is the way to have right in the tree of life; obedience and sanctification is the gate to this city of salvation. In a word, the gate is grace; the city is glory.

The temple had a gate called Beautiful, Acts 3:2; but of poor beauty in regard of this gate. Of the gates of the sanctuary spake David, in divers psalms, with love and joy. 'Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise,' Ps. 100:4. This was God's delight. 'The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob,' Ps. 87:2. This was David's election, to be a porter or keeper of the gates of God's house, 'rather than dwell in the tents of wickedness,' Ps. 84:10. This his resolution: 'Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem,' Ps. 122:2. Solomon made two doors for the entering of the oracle. They were made of 'olive trees, and wrought upon with the carvings of cherubins,' 1 Kings 6:32. The olives promising fatness and plenty of blessings, the cherubins holiness and eternity. These are holy gates. Let every one pray with that royal prophet, 'Open to me the gates of righteousness: I will go into them, and I will praise the Lord. This is the gate of the Lord, into which the righteous shall enter,' Ps. 118:19, 20.

In brief, we may distinguish the gates leading to this city into two: adoption and sanctification. Both these meet in Christ, who is the only gate or door whereby we enter heaven. 'I am the door,' saith our Saviour, janua vitæ, the gate of life; 'by me if any enter in, he shall be saved,' John 10:9.

(1.) Adoption is the first gate. 'We have received the spirit of adoption,' Rom. 8:15. Without this passage no getting into heaven. The inheritance of glory cannot be given to the children of disobedience; they must first be converted, and adopted heirs in Christ. The grace of God is twofold. There is gratia gratis agens, and gratia gratum faciens. This second grace, which is of adoption, is never in a reprobate; not by an absolute impossibility, but by an indisposition in him to receive it. A spark of fire falling upon water, ice, snow, goes out; on wood, flax, or such apt matter, kindles. Baptism is the sacrament of admission into the congregation—of insition* and initiation, whereby we are matriculated and received into the motherhood of the church. Therefore the sacred font is placed at the church door, to insinuate and signify our entrance. So adoption is the first door or gate whereby we pass to the city of glory.

This is our new creation, whereat the angels of heaven rejoice, Luke 15:10. At the creation of dukes or earls there is great joy among men; but at our new creation angels and seraphins rejoice in the presence of God. Our generation was à non esse, ad esse—from not being, to be. But our regeneration is à malè esse, ad benè esse—from a being evil, to be well, and that for ever. Through this gate we must pass to enter the city; without this, death shall send us to another place. No man ends this life well, except he be born again before he ends it.†

Now, if you would be sure that you are gone through this gate, call to mind what hath been your repentance. The first sign of regeneration

is throbs and throes. You cannot be adopted to Christ without sensible pain, and compunction of heart for your sins. The Christian hath two births, and they are two gates. He can pass through none of them but with anguish. Both our first and second birth begin with crying. Our first birth is a gate into this world; our second is a gate into the world to come. There is some pain in both. For this world, but little joy after the pain; for the other, after short sorrow, eternal glory.

(2.) Sanctification is the second gate. 'Make your calling and election sure,' saith Peter, by a holy life: 'For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly, into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ,' 2 Pet. 1:11. But 'there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth; neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie,' Rev. 21:27. Therefore Paul prays the 'God of peace to sanctify us wholly,' 1 Thess. 5:23. Holiness is the way to happiness; grace the gate of glory. But some may object from that of Paul, that this sanctification must be total and perfect; but who can come so furnished to the gate? therefore, who can enter the city? I answer: There is required only sanctificatio viæ, non patriæ: such a sanctity as the gate can afford, though far short of that within the city. The school distinguisheth well. It must be communiter in toto, et universaliter in singulis partibus; but not totaliter et perfectè. This sanctification must be communicated to the whole man, and universally propagated to every part, though it have in no place of man a total perfection. Indeed, nullum peccatum retinendum est spe remissionis. No sin is to be cherished in hope of mercy. But we must strive for every grace we have not, and for the increase of every grace we have. Quærendum quod deest bonum, indulgendum quod adest. Let us make much of that we possess, and still seek for more, 'striving to the mark,' Phil. 3:14. And yet when all is done, profectio hæc, non perfectio est; we have made a good step forward, but are not come to our full home. But still, 'Lord, be merciful to me a sinner,' and 'enter not into judgment with us.'

Now, since this gate stands in our own heart, give me leave to describe it, and that briefly, by its properties and its parts. Its properties are two. It is low and little.

[1.] Low.—Heaven is well called a 'building not made with hands,' 2 Cor. 5:1; for it differs both in matter and form from earthly edifices. For matter, it is eternal, not momentary; for manner, fabricated without hands. Great manors on earth have large answerable porches. Heaven must needs be spacious, when a little star, fixed in a far lower orb, exceeds the earth in quantity; yet hath it a low gate, not a lofty coming in.

They must stoop, then, that will enter here. 'He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away,' Luke 1:53. The rich in their own conceits, and proud of their own worth, shall be sent empty from this gate. Zaccheus climbs up into a sycamore tree to behold Jesus; but when Jesus beheld him got up so high, he said, 'Come down, Zaccheus; make haste, and come down,' Luke 19:5. Whosoever will entertain Jesus, must come down. The haughty Nebuchadnezzar, that thinks with his head to knock out the stars in heaven, must stoop at this gate, or he cannot enter. Be you never so lofty, you must bend. God's honour must be preferred before your honour. It is no discredit to your worship to worship God.

[2.] Little.—Christ calls it a 'narrow gate,' Luke 13:24. They must be little that enter; little in their own eyes, slender in the opinion of themselves. 'Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein,' Mark 10:15. Samuel to Saul; 'When thou wast little in thine own sight, wast thou not made the head of the tribes of Israel?' 1 Sam. 15:17. When Jesse had made all his sons pass before Samuel, he asked him if none remained yet. Jesse answers, Yes, a little one tending the flocks. 'Fetch that little one,' saith Samuel, 'for we will not sit down till he come,' 1 Sam. 16:11. That little one was he. Says the angel to Esdras, 'A city is built, and set upon a broad field, full of all good things, yet the entrance thereof is narrow,' 2 Esd. 7:6. This is spatiosa et speciosa civitas; A city beautiful and roomy; yet it hath but a narrow wicket, a little gate.

Alas! how will the surfeited epicure do to enter, whose gluttonous body is so deformed, that it moves like a great tun upon two pots? What hope hath an impropiator, with four or five churches on his back, to pass this little gate? The bribing officer hath a swollen hand, it will not enter; and the gouty usurer cannot thrust in his foot. The factious schismatic hath too big a head; the swearer such forked blasphemies in his mouth, that here is no entrance. Pride hath no more hope to get into the gates of that city above, than there is hope to cast it out the gates of this city below. Much good do it with earthly courts, for it must not come into the courts of heaven.

Think, O sinner; you cannot go with these oppressions, with these oaths, frauds, bribes, usuries, with these wickednesses, into the gates of this city. You must shift them off, or they will shut you out.

You hear the properties; the parts are now to be considered, and these are four: The foundation, the two sides, and the roof, The foundation is Faith; one of the sides, Patience; the other, Innocence; the roof, Charity.

[1.] Faith is the foundation. 'Be ye grounded and settled in the faith,' Col. 1:23. Credendo fundatur, saith Augustine. It is grounded in faith. All other graces are (as it were) built on this foundation. Credimus quod speramus: quod credimus et speramus, diligimus: quod credimus, speramus, et diligimus, operamur. What we hope, we believe; what we believe and hope, we love; what we believe, hope, and love, we endeavour to attain. So all is built on faith.

Hope on faith. Nulla spes increditi: it is impossible to hope for that we believe not to be. Charity on faith: why should a man give all to the poor, unless he believed an abundant recompence? Repentance on faith: why else suffer we contrition for sin, if we believed not remission of sin? Temperance on faith: why forbear we the pleasing vanities of the world, but that we believe the transcendent joys of eternity, whereof these harlots would rob us? Patience on faith: why would we endure such calamities with willing quietness and subjection, if we believed not an everlasting peace and rest to come? All obedience on faith, that God would accept it in Jesus Christ. If all be built on faith, I may call it the basis and foundation of this gate. 'Without faith it is impossible to please God: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him,' Heb. 11:6. Faith is the passage-way to God; not one of that holy ensuing legend entered the city of life without this. He that hath faith shall enter: yea, he is entered. 'He hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death to life,' John 5:24.

[2.] Patience is one of the pillars. 'Ye have need of patience; that, when you have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise,' Heb. 10:36. That when you have suffered before the gates, ye may enter the city. There be three enemies that assault the soul before she enter the gates—a lion, a leopard, and a fox. The lion is the devil, who roareth with hideous cries and bloody jaws, 1 Pet. 5:8. The leopard is the world, which hath a gay spotted hide; but if it take us within its clutches, it devours us. The fox is our concupiscence, bred in us, which craftily spoils our grapes, our young vines, our tender graces, Cant. 2:15. Patience hath therefore an armed soldier with her, called Christian fortitude, to give repulse to all these encounters. And what he cannot feriendo, by smiting, she conquers ferendo, by suffering. Vincit etiam dum patitur. She overcomes, even while she suffers. Patience meekly bears wrongs done to our own person; fortitude encounters courageously wrongs done to the person of Christ. She will not yield to sin, though she die. She hath the spirit of Esther, to withstand things that dishonour God. 'If I perish, I perish,' Esth. 4:6.

[3.] Innocence is the other pillar. As patience teacheth us to bear wrongs, so innocence to do none. Patience gives us a shield, but innocence denies us a sword. Ourselves we may defend, others we must not offend. Innocence is such a virtue, Quæ cùm aliis non nocet, nec sibi nocet.* Which as it wrongs not others, so nor itself. He that hurts himself, is not innocent. The prodigal is no man's foe but his own, saith the proverb; but because he is his own foe, he is not innocent. Triumphus innocentiae est non peccare ubi potest.† It is the triumph of innocence not to offend where it may.

No testimony is more sweet to the conscience than this: 'Remember, O Lord, how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart,' Isa. 38:3. So Job, 'My heart shall not condemn me for my days.'‡ Blessed soul thus comforted. It smiles at the frowns of earth, and dares stand the thunder. Though there be no innocency but rejoiceth to stand in the sight of mercy; yet thus in the midst of injuries it cheers itself, 'O Lord, thou knowest my innocence.' The wicked 'cover themselves with violence as with a garment,' Ps. 73:6; therefore confusion shall cover them as a cloak. But 'blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth,' Matt. 5:5. That part of the earth they live in shall afford them quiet; and their part in heaven hath no disquiet in it. Si amoveantur, admoventur in locum, à quo non removentur in æternum. If they be moved, they are moved to a place from whence they shall never be removed. 'I will wash mine hands in innocency: so will I compass thine altar, 'O Lord,' Ps. 26:6. If innocency must lead us to the altar on earth, sure that must be our gate to the glory of heaven.

[4.] Charity is the roof, diligendo perficitur;§ love makes up the building. 'Now abideth faith, hope, and charity; but the greatest of these is charity,' 1 Cor. 13:13. It is a grace of the loveliest countenance, and longest continuance; for countenance, it is amiable; all love it. The poor respect not thy faith so much as thy charity. For continuance, faith and hope take their leave of us in death; but charity brings us to heaven-door, and ushers us into glory. I know not what to say more in thy praise, O charity, than ut Deum de cœlo traheres, et hominem ad cœlum elevares;|| than that thou didst bring down God from heaven to earth, and dost lift up man from earth to heaven. Great is thy virtue, that by thee God should be humbled to man, by thee man should be exalted to God.

You have the gates described. Let us draw a short conclusion from these two former circumstances, and then enter the city.

THE SUM.—There is no entrance to the city but by the gates; no passage to glory but by grace. The wall of this city is said to be great and high, Rev. 21:12. High, no climbing over; great, no breaking through. So Christ saith, 'No thief can break through and steal,' Matt. 6:20. Therefore through the gates, or no way. 'Corruption doth not inherit incorruption,' 1 Cor. 15:50. This corrupted man must be regenerate that he may be saved; must be sanctified that he may be glorified. Babel-builders may offer fair for heaven, but not come near it. The giants of our time, I mean the monstrous sinners, may, imponere Pelion Ossæ, lay rebellion upon presumption, treason upon rebellion, blasphemy upon all, as if they would sink heaven with their loud and lewd ordnance, and pluck God out of his throne; but hell gapes in expectation of them. This gate is kept, as the gate of paradise, with a flaming sword of justice, to keep out 'idolaters, adulterers, thieves, covetous, drunkards, revilers, extortioners,' 1 Cor. 6:9; and other 'dogs' of the same litter, 'from the kingdom of God,' Rev. 22:15.

Some trust to open these gates with golden keys; but bribery is rather a key to unlock the gates of hell. Let Rome sell what she list, and warrant it, like the seller in the Proverbs, 'It is good, it is good.' Yet it is naught; but were it good, God never promised to stand to the pope's bargains. Others have dreamed of no other gate but their own righteousness. Poor souls, they cannot find the gate, because they stand in their own light. Others think to pass through the gates of other men's merits; as well one bird may fly with another bird's wings. For all those hot promises of the works of saints for their ready money, they may blow their nails in hell.

Only grace is the gate. *Per portam ecclesiæ intramus ad portam Paradisæ. We must be true members of the church, or the door of life will be shut against us. Heaven is a glorious place, therefore reserved for gracious men. Admittuntur ad spiritus justorum, non nisi justi. To those 'spirits of just men made perfect,' Heb. 12:23, must be admitted none save they that are justified. Kings are there the company; none of base and ignoble lives can be accepted. Heaven is the great Whitehall, the court of the high King; none are entertained but Albi, such as are washed white in the blood of Christ, and keep white their own innocence. Ungracious offenders look for no dwelling in this glory. You that have so little love to the gates, are not worthy the city. If you will not pass through the gates of holiness in this life, you must not enter the city of happiness in the life to come. Thus we have passed the gates, and are now come to

3. The City.—Now if I had been, with Paul, rapt up to the third heaven, 2 Cor. 12:2, or had the 'angel's reed wherewith he measured the wall,' Rev. 21:17, I might say something to the description of this city. But how can darkness speak of that light? or the base country of earth describe the glorious court of heaven? 'Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God,' Ps. 87:3. Glorious cities have been, and are in the world. Rome was eminently famous; all her citizens like so many kings; yet was it observed, illic homines mori, that men did die there. But in this city there is no dying. Mors non erit ultra. 'There shall be no more death,' Rev. 21:4. I will narrow up my discourse, to consider in this city only three things; (1.) its situation; (2.) its society; (3.) its glory.

(1.) Its Situation.—It is placed above; 'Jerusalem which is above is free, the mother of us all,' Gal. 4:26. Heaven is in excelsis. 'His foundation is in the holy mountains,' Ps. 87:1. So was Jerusalem seated on earth to figure this city; built of the 'quarry of heaven,' Dan. 2; 'on sapphires, emeralds, and chrysolites,' Rev. 21. There is a heaven now over our heads, but it shall 'wax old as a garment,' Heb. 1:11. It is corruptible, and so combustible. This city is eternal; Mount Sion, never to be moved; a kingdom never to be shaken. We are now under this lower heaven, then this shall be under us. That which is our canopy shall be our pavement.

(2.) Its Society.—The king that rules there, is one Almighty God, in three distinct persons. He made this city for himself. 'In his presence is the fulness of joy, and pleasures at his right hand for evermore,' Ps. 16:11. If he gave such a house as this world is to his enemies, what, may we think, hath he provided for himself and his friends? But will God dwell there alone? He is never alone; himself is to himself the best and most excellent company. Nevertheless, he vouchsafes a dwelling here to some citizens, and these are either created so, assumed, or assigned.

[1.] Created citizens are the blessed angels; who, from their first creation, have enjoyed the freedom of this city. They stand always in the presence of God; they can never lose their happiness.

[2.] Assumed; those whose spirits are already in heaven. There 'are the spirits of just men made perfect,' Heb. 12:23. They are already in soul taken up, and made free denizens of this city.

[3.] Assigned; the elect that live in the militant church, waiting for the day of their bodies' redemption; crying still, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly! These are conscripti, 'written in the Lamb's book of life,' Rev. 21:27. Now, though we are not already in full possession, because our apprenticeship of this life is not out; yet we are already citizens. 'Ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God,' Eph. 2:19; and we have three happy privileges of citizens.

First, Libertas; freedom from the law; not from obedience to it, but from the curse of it. Præstemus quod possumus: quod non possumus, non damnabit. Let us keep so much of it as we can; what we cannot keep shall not condemn us. Liberty in the use of these earthly things; heaven, earth, air, sea, with all their creatures, do us service. 'Whether things present, or things to come, all are yours; and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's,' 1 Cor. 3:22.

Secondly, Tutela imperii; the king's protection, Angelis mandavit. 'He hath given his angels charge over us, to keep us in all our ways,' Ps. 91:11. Is this all? No. 'He covers us with his feathers, and under his wings do we trust; his truth is our shield and our buckler,' ver. 4. Our dangers are many in some places, and some in all places; we have God's own guard royal to keep us. They 'are sent from God to minister for their sakes, which shall be heirs of salvation,' Heb. 1:14. I need not determine whether any particular person hath his particular angel. St Augustine hath well answered, 'Quando hoc nesciatur sine crimine, non opus est ut definiatur cum discrimine.'* Since our ignorance is no fault, let us not trouble ourselves with curious discussion. Bernard directs us to a good use of it: 'Quantum debet hoc tibi inferre reverentiam, afferre devotionem, conferre fiduciam.' The consideration of the guard of angels about us, should put into our minds reverence, into our hearts devotion, into our souls confidence.

Thirdly, Defensio Legis: the defensive protection of the law. Christ is our advocate. 'Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth,' Rom. 8:33. We are impleaded; Paul appeals to Cæsar, we to Christ. The devil accuseth us, we are far remote: behold our Counsellor is in heaven, that will not let our cause fall, or be overthrown. 'If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous,' 1 John 2:1.

Thus are we citizens in present, shall be more perfectly at last. We have now right to the city; we shall then have right in the city. We have now a purchase of the possession, shall then have a possession of the purchase. 'Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given,' John 17:24. This is our Saviour's will and testament, and shall not be broken.

The company then adds to the glory of this city. We are loath to leave this world for love of a few friends, subject to mutual dislikes; but what then is the delight in the society of saints; where thy glorified self shall meet with thy glorified friends, and your love shall be as everlasting as your glory. There be those angels that protected thee; those patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, that by doctrine and example taught thee; yea, there is that blessed Saviour that redeemed thee. Often here with groans and tears thou seekest him, 'whom thy soul loveth;' lo, there he shall never be out of thy sight.

(3.) Its Glory.—Non mihi si centum linguæ. If I had a hundred tongues, I was not able to discourse thoroughly the least dram of that 'inestimable weight of glory.' The eye hath seen much, the ear hath heard more, and the heart hath conceived most of all. But 'no eye hath seen, nor ear heard, nor heart apprehended the things which God hath prepared for them that love him,' 1 Cor. 2:9. Augustine, after a stand, *Deus habet quod exhibeat. God hath something to bestow on you. If I say we shall be satiate, you will think of loathing; if we shall not be satiate, you will think of hunger. But ibi nec fames, nec fastidium: there is neither hunger nor loathing. Sed Deus habet quod exhibeat. No sooner is the soul within those gates but she is glorious. Similem sibi reddit ingredientem. Heaven shall make them that enter it, like itself, glorious: as the air by the sun's brightness is transformed bright. Quanta felicitas, ubi nullum erit malum, nullum deerit bonum! How great is that blessedness, where shall be no evil present, no good absent! This is a blessed city.

Men are ambitious here, and seek to be free of great cities, and not seldom buy it dearer than the captain bought his burgess-ship.† But no such honour as to be denizens of this city; whereof once made free, how contemptibly they will look at the vain endeavours of worldly men! Think, beloved, yea, know; how sweet soever the gains of this lower city be, it is yet far short of the gains of heaven. And you will one day say, There is no city to the city of God, where 'shall be no more death, nor sorrow, nor crying, nor any more pain,' Rev. 21:4. Death, with all his apparitors, that cites the whole world to his court, sorrow, crying, pain, shall be no more. 'They shall persecute you from city to city,' saith Christ, Matt. 10:23, till at last we come to this city, and then out of their reach.

O that this clay of ours should come to such honour! Well may we suffer it to endure the world's tyranny, and to be afflicted by the citizens thereof; alas, we are but apprentices, and they will use us hardly till our years be out. When that day comes, we shall be free possessors of this city.

You hear now the gate and the city, what should you do but enter? Pass through the gate of grace, a holy and sanctified life, and you shall not fail of the city of glory; whither once entered, you shall sing as it is in the psalm, Sicut audivimus, ita et vidimus: As we have heard, so have we seen in the city of our God. We see that now which was preached to us; yea, and ten thousand times more than ever could be uttered. You shall say to Christ, as the Queen of Sheba to Solomon: 'I heard much of thy glory; but, behold, the one half was not told me,' 1 Kings 10:7. You saw Jerusalem before in a map, now you shall walk through its streets, and observe its towers and bulwarks, fully complete its glory. But my discourse shall give way to your meditation. The joys are boundless, endless: the Lord make us free of this city! Amen.

MEDITATIONS UPON SOME PART OF THE CREED

I BELIEVE IN GOD

THE first thing in the order of every building is to lay the foundation sure; no architect intends to leave there, but he is no good architect that doth not begin there. First, let us be thoroughly grounded in the truth of religion; and then not be determined and shut up in the rudiments, but grow on in knowledge. The end of our ministerial function is not to give satisfaction to curious hearers, but to breed devotion, and bring salvation to humble souls. This age is strangely transported with an humorous appetite to novelties, and rather affecteth variety of toys than a constancy of plain and sober truth. The contrivers of the policy of the Romish Church knew too well how the people would be carried with imagination. Therefore they devised such change of ceremonies, their poetical metamorphoses, transubstantiation, masses like masks, elevations like interludes, processions like the measures of a dance; their friars of so many colours, like a painter's apron; their legends of saints, like the tales of the knight of the sun, or the queen of the fairies, all to please imagination. Their churches like theatres, their images like motionless actors—a histrionical religion, yet pleasing to the eye, and taking the fancy. Their antipodes, the novelists, take the same course. The wholesome doctrine of the text, as too familiar to common preachers, they often quite forsake, and pick out crochets, paradoxes, strange and improper conclusions, as the only way to their own credit and profit, by fomenting the imagination. Yea, such is the wantonness of our auditories, the green sickness of the people's humour, that sound food is vilipended, and they must have quirks to please imagination. From hence it comes that so many crudities oppress their souls, that so many fumes and giddy vapours fly up into their heads, that so many hot spirits, like over-laden cannons, recoil against discipline, break out into factions, and with the splinters of their cracked opinions, do more mischief than deliberate doctrine or discipline can easily cure. But is this the way to be saved? Will the flashes of a luxurious wit build men up to the kingdom of heaven?

To the foundation, then. Without which groundwork, errors will be admitted for truth, and the pride of supposed knowledge fortify the heart against knowledge. I know not whether, through the frequency of preaching or rareness of catechising, this latter is grown into contempt. He that is but a little turned of eight in the morning, past a child, thinks himself too high for this form. To be examined the reason of his faith he is ashamed, as if the doctrine of grace were a disgrace, and men were ashamed of nothing so much as to learn. It would not be thus.

I believe in God.—There be some perambulatory things that I will but salute, as, first, the name of the creed, which it seems to take from the first word, credo, as the Lord's prayer, from the two first words, is called the pater-noster. In other languages, symbolum, which may signify a shot, which is, when every man pays his part of the reckoning, the sum of all, or a badge, as a soldier is known by his colours to what captain he belongs. This distinguisheth Christians from unbelievers or misbelievers. Or a ring, the metal whereof is digged out of the golden mines of the gospel, and (as we receive it) formed by the blessed apostles. Many are curious, some superstitious, in keeping their nuptial ring. To lose that they hold ominous. But look to thy faith; for if that be cracked by misliving, or lost by misbelieving, thou lovest thy interest in Jesus Christ. Secondly, the authors, the apostles; because it is theirs for the matter, though not for the manner. So it is the word of God, though not the Scripture of God—not sovereign, but subordinate—not protocanonical scripture, yet the key of the holy Scripture.* The abridgment of that gospel which Christ taught the apostles, the apostles taught the church, and the church in all ages hath taught us. The plain and absolute sum of holy faith, so comprising the doctrine of the new covenant, that it may be familiar to the weakest capacity, and retainable by the frailest memory. Not long, not obscure, ne dum instruat mentem, oneret memoriam.†

There be two main things; first, the act, which is to believe; the other, the object to be believed, which are all the ensuing articles concerning both God and the church. Therefore credo must be applied to every article; for fides est tota copulativa, he that looks for good by any, must hold all.

Faith is generally an acknowledgment and assent to the truth, James 2:19. It is either common to all; such is an historical faith, which is in the devils themselves, and temporary faith, that will always keep the warm side of the hedge, never windward. Christ is little beholden to that faith, and that faith shall be little beholden to Christ. Or peculiar to the elect, which is a supernatural gift of God, whereby we apprehend the promise of life, and are persuaded of our own salvation by Christ. First, a gift of God, not brought with us, but wrought in us. Let none be so sottish as to think the faith whereby they shall be saved was bred and born in them, for it is the fair gift of God. 'I was born in sin,' saith David, Ps. 51:5; in sin, not in faith. Sin is hereditary, not faith. That I cannot but have from my earthly parents; this I cannot have but from my heavenly Father. Secondly, supernatural; not only above that nature wherein we were born, but even above that nature wherein our first parents were made. Above corrupted nature, yea, above created nature. The state of innocence neither had, nor had need of, faith in Christ. But so soon as man was fallen he wanted a Redeemer, and to obtain redemption he must have faith. So it belongs not to generation but to regeneration. It is a new grace taught in the new covenant of grace. Other graces, in our conversion, are but renewed; our knowledge, love, obedience, all renewed; but this faith is not renewed, but in our conversion takes its first being. Thirdly, whereby we apprehend. This is properly an action of the hand, and faith is the spiritual hand of a Christian. Fourthly, the promise of life; for if there were no promise there could be no faith. Fifthly, and are persuaded of our own salvation by Christ.

This is no opinion, no affection, but a persuasion, not of others' salvation (the devils believe that God will save some), but of our own, and that only by Jesus Christ.

I believe.—I, not we. First, because every one best knows his own heart, and therefore can make best confession of his own faith. Secondly, no man can be saved by another's faith, but by his own only, Hab. 2:4. Charity is of a great latitude, embracing all; faith looks to a man's self. I must put all men in my paternoster, only myself in my creed. Pray I must for others, believe for myself. In my believing, I plead mine own cause; in my praying, I plead also the cause of all my brethren. So no man's faith can do me good, but mine own. I may be the better for another man's charity; the magistrate's justice may do me right; the knowledge of the learned may instruct me; but none of all their faiths can save me. Am I the fatter for the meat another eats? Or refreshed by his sleep, when rest leaves me? Can another's soul animate my body, when its own forsakes it? Shine the sun never so clear, if we be blind we are still in darkness. The Lord of life conversed with the Jews, yet were they still dead, through want of faith. The alms is bountiful, but what if we have no hand to receive it? The fountain of Christ's blood is open, but faith is the friend that must put us in, or we perish.

In God.—There be three degrees or differences of believing, credere Deum, Deo, in Deum.* First, To believe there is a God; and no man possibly can thrust this faith out of his heart. Secondly, To believe God; that is, to acknowledge his word for truth. Thus far go even reprobates, but this faith cannot save them. Not that it is fides ficta (1 Tim. 1:5), by way of similitude: as a histrionical king is called a king, or the picture of a man, a man; for this is a true faith, but not sufficient to save. Nor that it is fides informis, because it wants charity, which the Romanists would have to be the form of faith. Nor that it is extorta et coacta, enforced from the clear evidence of things; for all faith is voluntary, if we believe St Augustine.† But a defective faith, because it applies not the merits of Christ to a man's self. Thirdly, To believe in God, or on God, or into God; to acknowledge him our God, and to place our whole confidence in him. We say, credimus Paulo, but not in Paulum; but credimus Deo, et in Deum. I believe he is, I believe he is good, I believe he is good to me. Faith is a kind of thing infra scientiam, supra opinionem: scientia habet cognitionem, opinio dubitationem; inter has duas fides est media. † Faith is neither a certain science, nor a doubtful opinion; but a middle nature between them, admitting neither of demonstration nor hesitation.

For better declaration of this heavenly grace, faith, I refer you to that lively expression of St Paul, 'I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live: yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me,' Gal. 2:20. Of which words, admit this short paraphrase, 'I am crucified with Christ.' But Christ was crucified with two malefactors, Paul was none of them. He was at the foot of Gamaliel, not at the foot of the cross on Mount Calvary. Had he been there, he would rather have helped to crucify Christ than yielded to be crucified with Christ. How, then, is he crucified with Christ? Not as a man consisting of body and soul, but as a sinner carrying about him the body of death. To understand this, consider two things: First, That Christ on the cross was not a private, but a public, person; what he did and suffered there, we did and suffered in him. As the first Adam did not sin only for himself, but for all that should come from him; so the second Adam did not die at all for himself, but for all that should come unto him. Secondly, There is a real donation of Christ to us, and a spiritual union of us to Christ, whereby he is made as indissolubly ours as if we had been crucified in our own persons. Such is the power of faith, that we who were the causes of his death shall be made partakers of his life.

'Nevertheless I live.' I am not abolished as a creature, but only crucified as a sinful creature. This is not an annihilation of my being, but a reformation of my former being. I am not what I was, nor whose I was. Not what I was: I was Saul a persecutor, I am Paul a professor; I was a sin-lover, I am a sin-hater; I am not what I was from my natural mother, but a new thing from my supernatural Father. Not whose I was: I was Satan's kennel, I am Christ's temple; I am crucified and dead to what I was, I live to what I was not; but now death and life are opposites, and there is no passing from one to the other but by a medium, and that is faith. Three things bring death to the soul by sin: First, its guilt, which makes us liable to condemnation. Secondly, its filth, which makes both our persons and all our actions odious. Thirdly, its punishment, which is death, in the extent of body and soul, and that for ever. With this three-forked sceptre did sin reign over all the sons of men. The tree of life affords us a threefold antidote against this threefold death. First, the life of justification; the righteousness of Christ cancelling the obligation of the law, and acquitting us from the sentence of condemnation. Secondly, the life of sanctification, regenerating every part and faculty of us by a supernatural virtue derived from Christ, infusing new principles. Thirdly, the life of joy and cheerfulness, which made Job exult and Paul insult over all calamities, as more than conquerors. So that we are dead to those sins which did kill us, and we live to that glory which shall crown us.

'And yet not I.' Not I? who then? what contradictions be these? First, I speak, and move, and write, yet I am dead. Can a dead man perform these actions? For a man to be dead, and to tell others he is so, implies a contradiction. But grant him dead, and there is an end; for death is the end of all. Nay, but hear him again, 'nevertheless I live.' This is a short death, that is so soon turned to life. Or is he both at once alive and dead, dead and alive, at the same instant? Yes, Paul is dead, and Paul lives; peccant Paul is dead, believing Paul lives. Dead quatenus subditus peccato, alive quatenus insitus Christo. Well, then, let his last word stand, he lives. 'Yet not I.' Here is another contradiction. Is not a man that he is, himself? Can he be made strong by the strength of another? or rich by the wealth his neighbour possesseth? or can another's honour ennoble him? No; yet he may live by the life of another. No soul can animate this body but mine own, yet neither body nor soul can live but in and by God. Thus doth he annihilate himself, that he may omnify his Master, that Christ may be all in all. So it follows;—

'But Christ liveth in me.' Christ is the fountain and root of all spiritual life, having it so superabundant in himself, that he conveys it to all his members. He is Princeps vitæ (Acts 3:15); yea, Principium vitæ. He that begins not to take life from Christ shall never live; he that doth shall never die. Now, he lives in us by virtue of his union with us, which is both a spiritual and a substantial union, whereby the person of the believer is made one with the person of the Saviour. Neither is this incredible to reason; for if, by virtue of a civil contract, the husband and wife be one flesh, though sundered by many miles, the one being in this land, the other beyond sea, yet still they are caro una, why may not Christ and the believer be one spirit, though he be in heaven and we on earth? He lives in us as the root lives in the branches, as the head lives in the members. The soul doth not more properly enliven the body, than he doth quicken both body and soul. Take away the soul from the flesh, earth becomes earth; sever Christ from the soul, it is but a dead carrion. According to the nearness or remoteness of the sun, elementary bodies be either light or dark, hot or cold. Christ is that 'Sun of righteousness' to our souls; his absence leaves us dead, his presence revives us. The believer can never perish, unless life itself could die.

'Christ lives in me.'—But can we all say, Christ lives in us? Neither speak I of gross sinners, not grafted into Christ; but even to those that applaud themselves in their holy portion, and look to be saved. Why do they suck on the breasts of this world, and seek to solace themselves in vanities? Is not the life of Christ in us above all sweetness? Are not the grapes of Canaan satisfying enough, but we must long for the onions of Egypt? Why should we look unto Pharphar, that have Jordan? He that hath the living waters of Jesus flowing in his heart, is mad if he stoop to the puddles of vanity, or seek content in the world. Yea, such a one will scarce descend to lawful pleasures, but for God's allowance, and nature's necessity; and then but as the eagle, who lives aloft, and stoops not to the earth but for her prey; or as Gideon's soldiers, to sup his handful, not to swill his bellyful. I deny not oil, and wine, and recreation; but we must not live by these, but by Christ. He that is come to man's estate, throws away rattles and babies: the philosopher could be merry without a fiddle; as one of them told the musicians, offering their service, that philosophers could dine and sup without them. How much more may the Christian rejoice without a playfellow? He hath holy meditations of the forgiveness of his sins, peace and reconciliation with God; and to break off this for the entertainment of vanity, is more absurd, than for a husband to leave his fair and chaste wife, peerless for beauty and innocency, for the embraces of a black and stigmatical strumpet. We have generous and noble delights, angelical pleasures; what should discomfort us? 'Jesus Christ lives in us.'

'And the life which I now live in the flesh.'—By flesh, he means here, not the corruption of nature, but the mortal body. It is one thing to live in the flesh, another thing to live to the flesh. To live in the flesh, is a dying life; to live to the flesh, is a living death. By none of these lives the believer; but by another, a better, a surer, which as he hath aliunde, from another place; so he lives after another manner; it is coelitus inspirata, and so called coelestis vita: 'our conversation is in heaven,' Phil. 3:20. Of moles of the earth, this makes us souls of heaven; of snails, dromedaries. How impossible did it seem before to us, that we should be persuaded to deny the world, to forsake ourselves, to condemn our own pleasures? We thought it as easy for stones to climb mountains, or for iron to swim. Yet this new life of faith doth naturalize these holy affections to us; Christ working upon us, as the sun doth on the vapour; of a gross, heavy, and squalid substance, it makes it light and aerial, apt to ascend to the middle region. To outward duties go both the natural and spiritual man; but with what difference of affections, of success? A bear goes not more unwillingly to the stake, nor a galley-slave to the oar, nor a truant to school, than the one. The other, willingly, cheerfully, as being (not driven with fear, but) 'led by the Spirit of God,' Rom. 8:14. The manner of guidance is indeed ἀγῶνια, a mighty motion, but no coactive violence; for Christ moves the will, and makes it ducible.

'Draw us, we will run after thee,' Cant. 1:4; we will run, not go with an ordinary motion, but run, disdaining all paces but the swiftest. He draws us, but with our wills. *Aliter trahitur claudus ad prandium, aliter reus ad supplicium. There is great difference between these two attractions; of a lame man to his dinner, and of a guilty malefactor to his execution. This new life is a new internal principle; which is like a spring to the watch, or oil to the wheels, to make the motion quick and permanent.

'Now.'—This distinction of time hath a double reference; like Janus, it looks both ways, to the time past, and the time future, though it speak of the time present. First, to the time past; this is not such a life as I did live before: that was to the flesh, this is but in the flesh. In the former state I was dead, now I live. How many live and die, before they come to St Paul's nunc? They consume their days in time-eating vanities, and the greatest part of their life is the least part wherein they have lived. Oh that they would recollect themselves, and be sure of this nunc, to say, 'Now I live,' before they go hence, and cease living! It is never too late, you say; but, I am sure, it is never too soon, to begin this life. Be not like truants, that slubber out their books, before they have learned their lessons. Secondly, to the time to come; now, I live by faith, I shall not so live always. 'Now abides faith, hope, and charity,' 1 Cor. 13:13. Now, two of these shall cease one day. I now live by faith, I shall live by vision; now by the expectation of hope, hereafter by the possession of glory. Faith is now the queen, and charity the handmaid that waits upon her. The damsel attends upon Judith through the gates of the city, through the watches of the army, through all dangers and passages, till she comes to the tyrant's chamber door: there she is not suffered to enter; Judith goes in alone, and by her own hand delivers Israel; the waiting woman hath not a stroke in it, Judith 13. Faith is this great lady, charity her handmaid; through all the actions of goodness she attends on her mistress; when faith sets down the objects of her beneficence, love is her secretary; when she disposeth her good deeds, love is her almoner; when she treats a league of peace with her neighbours, love is her ambassador; what work soever she undertakes, charity is her instrument. But when it comes to the point of justification, to enter the presence chamber of the great King, to procure remission of sins, imputation of righteousness, and peace of conscience, here charity leaves her to herself, and hath not a finger in that business. Thus is it now. But hereafter, these two shall change places; charity shall be the lady, and faith the waiting-woman. When the soul is to be discharged out of prison, and moves to the high court of heaven, faith waits upon her all the way; but at the presence-chamber of glory, faith stays without, and love only enters. Yet though faith and hope, at last, perish in the act, they shall never perish in the effect; for we shall enjoy what we have both believed and hoped.

'I live by the faith of the Son of God.'—It is called the faith of Christ First, because he is the revealer of it; neither nature nor the law opened the door of faith, but the Son of God; it belongs to the gospel. 'The law came by Moses, but grace and truth came by Christ Jesus,' John 1:17. Secondly, because he is the author of it: the 'founder and finisher of our faith,' Heb. 12:2. Thirdly, because he is the object of it; faith desires 'to know nothing, but Christ crucified.'

This faith is the means of this life; sin divides us from Christ, faith reunites us. We live primarily and properly by Christ, as the body lives by the soul. Mediately or instrumentally by faith, as by the spirits, which are the bond of soul and body. As the leg or arm lives by the proper sinews, veins, arteries, whereby it is united to the head, heart, and liver, those more noble parts, so faith is that special ligament that knits us on earth to Christ in heaven. 'He that hath the Son hath life;' and he that hath faith hath the Son. By this Paul doth here challenge Christ for his own (as it were), engrossing the common God, as if he were his and nobody's else. It is well observed by a worthy divine,* that faith is a wonder-worker, and hath a kind of omnipotence in it; that it can remove mountains, command the sun to stand still, raise the dead, animating it with an ever-living spirit. So that the potent works, which indeed only Christ doth, are attributed to faith. It is he that, by the power of his death, deadeth sin in us; and of his resurrection quickeneth us. Yet faith is said to mortify, faith to vivify, faith to purify, faith to justify, faith to sanctify, faith to save us. It is the poorest of all virtues, therefore of all virtues God most honoureth it: respexit humilitatem, as the blessed virgin sung, Luke 1:48. Love is more noble; it is a meaner act to believe, than to love. Charity is a rich giver, faith but a beggarly receiver. Yet thus hath it pleased God to honour this virtue, so quite out of request with the world, that we shall live by that, and all other graces shall be beholden to it. Mary Magdalene had done much for Christ, washed his feet with her tears, and dried them with her hairs, anointed him with spikenard; and he commends her for all these; but there was another thing that saved her, to which all the rest yield, her faith: 'Thy faith hath saved thee.' Not thy sorrow melting in tears, not thy humility kneeling in the dust, not thy charity in the expense of that precious unguent; none of these hath saved thee: but 'thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace,' Luke 7:50. Nor yet in this do we sacrilegiously robe the servant in the divine honours of her sovereign; yea we say, if faith knew any arrogance against her master, or insolence against her fellows, she were no more faith. But while we magnify faith, we reflect all upon Christ, who justifies the imperfection of our believing with the perfection of his deserving. It is for the honour of the Son of God, that we live by HIS faith; as notwithstanding our eyes, we are beholden to the sun for seeing the light.

'Who loved me.'—The foundation of all good to man, is the love of God. A love without all invitation, or the least merit in the object. We love nothing, but either there is, or we suppose there is, some goodness in it. God loved us, when he knew there was no good thing in us. The motive of our love is from without us, the cause of God's loving is within himself. We love a man because he is good; God loves a man because himself is good, though the man were stark naught. Our love doth not make a thing good, but embraceth it as being good before; but that which before was bad, God's love maketh good. Habet in se Deus quòd diligit, invenit in nobis quod puniat.

God hath the matter of love in himself, the cause of punishment he finds in us.

We were in worse case than the wounded man, upon whom the Samaritan shewed mercy, Luke 10. There was some reason why he should pity him. First, because he deserved not that unjust measure at their hands, that robbed him. Secondly, the Samaritan himself might happen to be in the like distress; therefore he tendered that compassion he desired to find. But first, God saw that we deserved that damnable estate wherein we lay; and that not one dram of sorrow was put into the potion more than we merited to drink off. Secondly, Himself could never be in the like case, sitting in heaven, far enough out of the reach of misery and mischief; yet he loved us.

'Loved me.'—It may be so: Paul had good experience of his love, by a miraculous conversion, a supernatural rapture and revelation. Yea, but he doth not engross all this love to himself, but rather speaks in the person of all believers; teaching us to pledge him in that saving cup, wherein he had begun to us so hearty a draught. Thou that art born in a time and place where the gospel flourisheth, and Christ is continually preached to thy conscience, must needs confess that God hath loved thee. Indeed, the unbelieving pagan and the misbelieving papist cannot conclude to themselves thus comfortably. But when I consider my illumination, the clear means of my redemption, the evidence and demonstration of those invaluable treasures of mercy opened to my heart, I must acknowledge that God hath loved me. If he had not loved me, he would never have done thus for me. If the Israelites so applauded their own happiness, by being the depositories of the oracles of God—'He hath shewed his statutes to Jacob: the heathen have not the knowledge of his laws,' Ps. 147:20; if they thought themselves so blessed in having the law, which Saint Paul calls the 'ministration of death,'—how are we bound to him for the gospel, 'the ministry of salvation?' This is the voice of that faith which shall save us; 'he hath loved me.' Charity rejoiceth that God hath loved also others; faith, that he had loved me. Charity prays for others, faith believeth for a man's self.

'And given himself for me.'—This indeed is a sound proof of his love: 'Greater love hath no man than this, to give his life for his friends.' 'Given:' We were never able to purchase him; all the treasures of the world were trash and rubbish in comparison of him. 'Himself:' not a man, nor an angel, but himself. As when 'God had no greater to swear by, he swore by himself;' so when he had no greater to give, he gave himself. 'This is a true saying, and worthy of all men to be received,' 1 Tim. 1:15: a gracious gate to a glorious building! Prefaces are ordinary in the Scriptures; this is no ordinary preface. Without preface it should be received; where the ware is good, there needs no sign. Many things may be worth looking on; this is 'worthy to be received.' Like the ark, it makes a man, and his house, and all blessed that receive it. It is thankful, and requites them that receive it, as Christ made Zaccheus a liberal amends for his entertainment. It is worthy to be received 'of all men,' and with all faculties of soul. Worthy of the intellective part. Nothing more excellent to be known: 'I determined to know nothing among you, but Christ crucified,' 1 Cor. 2:2. Worthy of the affective part; nothing more dearly to be loved: 'Sweeter than honey and the honey-comb;' more precious than 'thousands of gold and silver.' When the body and soul cannot hang together, this comforts us. Worthy of the executive powers, for it beautifieth and graces all our actions. Worthy to be bought with all labour, with expense of goods, with expense of bloods. He that hath this faith, how doth he vilipend the world's three great mistresses—profit, honour, pleasure? The Lord gives many temporal benefits to reprobates; suffers a wicked Haman to be a great emperor's favourite; lets a Nabal wallow in his golden dung; fills the belly of a profane Esau. But he gives Christ to none but those whom in Christ he loves for ever.

By this that hath been spoken, we may well relish the sweetness of faith. Now take some useful directions about it.

First, Learn to know God: 'How shall we believe on him we have not known?' Rom. 10:14. It is not the bare rehearsal of the creed that can save a man's soul. Knowledge is not so much slighted here, as it will be wished hereafter. The rich man in hell desires to have his brethren taught, Luke 16:28. Sure, if he were alive again, he would hire them a preacher. 'The people are destroyed for lack of knowledge,' Hos. 4:6. If we see a proper man cast away at the sessions for a non legit, with pity we conclude he might have been saved, if he could have read. At that general and last assizes, when Christ shall 'come in flaming fire,' with thousands of angels, woe be to them that 'know not God,' 2 Thess. 1:8. For 'he will pour out his fury upon the heathen, that know him not, and upon the families that call not on his name,' Jer. 10:25. It is the fashion of this intemperate age to shuffle the cards, while they should search the Scriptures; to spend more upon cooks than books; till they bury the soul alive, in the sepulchre of a blind and sensual flesh. Jonathan's eye 'waxed dim with fasting;' our intellectual eye is put out with feasting. Our means is liberal, but we will not allow ourselves to know; like those that have a free school in the town, yet never a one can say his cross-row.* Or, if some can spell, yet 'understandest thou what thou readest?' Acts 8:30. Submit thyself to a teacher; for if thou diest in ignorance, thou canst not die in faith. If a stranger be setting his pace and face toward some deep pit, or steep rock—such a precipice as the cliffs of Dover—how do we cry aloud to have him return? yet in mean time forget the course of our own sinful ignorance, that headlongs us to confusion. Do we not expect from them most work to whom we have given most wages? Do we not look that a frank pasture should yield fat sheep? How then shall we answer God, for his cost and charges to save us?

Secondly, Let us acknowledge our unbelief. Though we little suspect it, there is none of us whose heart is not full of infidelity. There can be no greater indignity offered to God than not to take his word, which is not to believe him. How doth animated dust scorn such a distrust? They that lie for an advantage, scalding their mouths to beguile their customers; they that promise what they mean not to perform, laying their tongues to pawn, without purpose to redeem them; they that are led with gain, as the butcher enticeth a poor lamb from its bleating mother, by a green branch in his hand, to the house of slaughter;—do they believe in God, that he will sustain them here, and crown them hereafter? Job thought God did him a good turn in taking away all; his account being lessened, by abating his receipt. There be some that would think no hell like it. Alas! they can scarce allow their own bodies garments and sustenance. All is to have and to hold, as their indenture runs; and they never come out of their own debt, so base are they to others, so sordid in themselves. But now, what spends such a man in a year upon his soul? What does God and heaven cost him? — — oo. Do these believe in God? I tremble to speak it: the devils believe more. O, but they have a good faith and a good meaning! It is false; they have a bad faith, and a worse meaning, for they mean not well to themselves. We are all faithless by nature, dead in unbelief, not only with dimmed eyes, and wounded affections, and weakened souls, like that robbed passenger, 'half dead,' Luke 10. (Such indeed is that usual resemblance, wherewith the Pontificians shadow out our estate before conversion; but as that man fell among thieves, so that text is fallen among thieves too.) But quite dead; so say Christ and his apostles, which we have cause to believe before the pope and his Jesuits. Naturally, there is no faith in us, till the Spirit of grace infuse it.

Thirdly, Let us be humbled and annihilated in our selves, that we may the better believe in God. When the poor man finds no sustenance at home, he is glad to go to the door of charity. The earth is indeed fixed, but thou art not fixed on it; thy gold will but expose thee to danger; how many have lost their lives for no other fault but being rich? Thy trade will fail, thy friends will change the copy of their countenance, thy children may prove unkind, thy own heart will fail, thou wilt fail thyself: 'Believe in God,' Prov. 3:5, he will never fail thee. Let thy reason tell thee of more refuges than Ahasuerus had provinces; in the day of trouble thou wilt be to seek. He that will not trust in God in prosperity; in adversity, for God, he shall trust to himself. Read Jer. 17:7, 8. There is no winter with that man, no fall of the leaf; his comforts be ever fresh and green, as it were an everlasting spring. 'O Lord, my hope is in thee;' so long as hope holds the heart will not burst, but his hope shall never vanish that is placed in God.

Fourthly, Endeavour we to keep our faith always waking and working, that we may feel it. Quod non fit, non patefit: if faith be in us, it will be felt, 2 Cor. 13:5. But the broken heart confesseth, I would believe, but I feel the smoke of my sins smothering it; in my best vigilancy many known errors escape me, and many more escape unknown. But wherefore came Christ but to save sinners? All things are possible to faith, all sins are pardonable to an infinite mercy. As St Martin answered the devil, tempting him to despair for his sins, Why, Satan, even thy sins should be forgiven if thou couldst believe. Whether thou be a young convert that hast so much life as to feel thyself dead in sin; holdest Christ but with benumbed hands; hast life, and dost not believe thou hast it; believest, and yet will not be persuaded that thou believest. Be comforted; even to feel the want of feeling is an argument of life; he that is stark dead neither feels nor knows he doth not feel; no man feels his sickness that is quite dead; nor are we sensible of corruption, by corruption, but by grace. Or whether thou hast fallen into some filthy puddle of sin, yet faith will never rest till thy peace be made with thy God and thy own conscience. And for ordinary infirmities, faith fetcheth out a pardon of course; thy prayer in the morning cleansing thee from the weaknesses of the night, and thy prayer in the evening from the vanities of the day. Thus do thou more duly wash thy soul and affections than ever pharisee did his hands and his face.

Faith hath a remedy for all diseases; daily we sin, and faith doth as daily and duly by the blood of the Lamb recover us. God sees all our violations of his law, knows every peccant act better than our own conscience, but withal he sees the atonement made in the sacrifice of his own Son, a satisfaction able to pay all our debts. Hence no sin shall oblige us to condemnation, no debt shall bear an action against us. The rich creditor sees many items in his books, knows what debts have been owing, but withal he sees them crossed and cancelled, so that the debtor need not break his sleeps for such engagements. I deny not but faith may be sometimes duller and more inactive, yea brought to a very low ebb, yet even then be comforted. God accepts the will and earnest desire to believe for faith itself; nor are we justified for the perfection of our faith, but for the perfection of that obedience which our faith apprehends. Among the Israelites stung with serpents, some (likely) had dim eyes, some were far off, yet by looking on the brazen serpent they were healed as well as the clear-sighted, to shew that they were not cured for the virtue of their sight, but for the ordinance of God. 'Blessed are the poor in spirit,' that complain their want of faith, that feel themselves full of unbelief, that grieve they can believe no better; blessed are such, they do believe truly, they shall believe more powerfully.

Samson's hairs may be shorn by the deceit of Delilah, his strength be enervated, but his locks shall grow again, his strength shall return. Jordan may not fill her banks every morning, yet the tide will come. There is an hour when John does not stir in the womb, he shall spring at the approach of Jesus. God never began a building but he finished it, Luke 14:30. Man often fails to perfect his undertakings, either through former ignorance or want of future ability; process of time may teach him that the foundation was not good, the model not convenient; there is a Tobiah or Sanballat, sickness or poverty, to hinder him. But God can neither be wiser at the second thought, nor weaker in the conclusion. Faith is like the daisy (so called quasi day's-eye), that sets with the sun and opens with his rising; her condition being according to that planet's motion. If that 'Sun of righteousness' goes beneath the globe, faith hangs its head, closeth itself, contracts its leaves; but, having fetched his circumference, and rising in her hemisphere with the beams of his shining and warming mercy, faith dilates itself, sprouts, and sends forth a pleasant odour. 'The damsel is not dead, but sleepeth,' Mark 5:39. Yet our best course is to prevent this slumber; he is a dull servant that falls asleep at his work; let us be doing good works, this shall keep our faith waking.

Fifthly, Let us continually be nourishing our faith, that it may thrive and grow in us. The flesh hath not more need of repast and recreations than the soul hath of her cheerings. Draw in the sweet air of God's precious promises; this will breed excellent blood and cheerful spirits. Feed upon that heavenly nectar, make it thine own, as the body doth meat by concoction, that it may disperse itself through all the veins of the soul. Think of that promise which cancels all thy debts; how sweet a thing it is to have God's anger appeased, his infinite justice satisfied, thy innumerable sins pardoned; that neither death nor hell need be feared, as being utterly unable to separate thee from Christ; that spite of all temptations thou shalt stand, that thy condition is not changeable; that thou art now the son of grace and the heir of glory. These be the high and stately things that belong to thee, who belongest to Christ. Our Paschal Lamb is slain, all the days of our life be holy days, the true manna that shall preserve us alive for ever is set on our tables; who can have such cause to be merry? Do we complain that we want something which the world hath? Why, we have that which the world shall never have. Are we loth to trust God longer than he comes to us with a full hand, as the usurer will not trust the man but the pawn? This is to live by sense, not by faith. There is not the least promise made in the blessed gospel, but the believer will live more comfortably by it, than if all the monarchs of the world had commanded the most puissant of their kingdoms for his sustentation. 'So God loved the world, that he gave,' &c., John 3:16. Let me take my own dinner out of this feast, a portion for myself out of this infinite treasure, leaving nevertheless for others; I am satisfied, abundantly satisfied, and there remains nothing, but that I hasten to make an end of sin and long for glory.

If we would maintain a healthful temper of the body, we must keep the pores, veins, arteries, and such passages clear and free from colds and obstructions, as physicians tell us. So faith must be kept clear and void of drowsy oppilations, that the Spirit may have the freer passage and scope for motion and action; he that is asthmatical, narrow-breathed in his faith, cannot but be lumpish and melancholy. To believe in God is the best physic for all diseases, the best diet to keep the conscience in everlasting health. Our assurance of blessedness must not make us careless of helps; the husbandman believes his ground will yield him a good crop, yet he neglects no tillage. The merchant hopes for a prosperous voyage, yet he is shy of rocks and pirates. The hope of a good end encourageth all proceedings; we that have such a prize in our hands, God forbid there should want a cheerful forwardness in our hearts.

I believe in God.—I come now to the object of our faith—God: described here by his name, number, nature, distinction.

1. Name. It is impossible that any name should express the nature of God. If the heaven of heavens cannot contain him, for he contains them, how should four letters and two syllables comprehend him? How can an infinite being be signified by a limited name? If all the earth were paper, all the sea ink, and every plant a pen; or were the heaven parchment, the air ink, and every star a pen, and every living creature a ready writer, yet could not the least part of his immenseness be set down. Yet will he be called, and called upon, by this revealed title, 'God.' I believe in God, that infinite power, which no word, no world, can contain.

2. Number; only singular, God, not gods. Plurality of gods was the error of gentilism, and such an opinion as the wiser sort made themselves merry withal. Deus, si non unus, nullus.† The bees have but one king, the flocks but one leader, the heavens but one sun; one kingdom could not hold Romulus and Remus, though one womb did. The whole world hath but one governor. If there were more gods than one, then singly and apart each must have less strength, so much being wanting to one, as the rest had gleaned from him. Therefore he hath no name, because he is but one, and the proper use of a name is for distinction from others.

Now if but one God, then but one religion: one God in the first precept, and presently one religion in the next. One in the law till Christ came; one in the gospel when he came. Those former St Paul calls 'beggarly elements,' Gal, 4:9; the first letters of the book to school the people of God. When the fulness of time brought Christ, and Christ brought with him the fulness of knowledge; these last true riches make the other beggarly. Now if Paul could not endure Christ and Moses together, how would he endure Christ and Belial together? One king we have, and long may we have; not here the Solomon of England, and there the Jeroboam of Rome. One church, whose motherhood may we all embrace; not here the Sarah of Christ, and there the Hagar of antichrist; here a kind mother, there a bloody stepdame. One gospel, and long may we have it; not here the written verity, there unwritten vanities; not human tradition blended with the divine canon. One religion, and no more; not here Christ's temple, and there the idols of Babel, the synagogue of superstitious Baalites, at next door to the communion of saints. One faith, and may we all preserve it. for it preserves us; not here the merits of Jesus, and there the relies of Jesuits. One way, one truth, one life, without which we err, we lie, we die; which keeping, we go right, we believe right, and shall live for ever. How should the unity of the Spirit, and vanity of the flesh, ever accord? 'One body, one spirit, one hope of our calling, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in us all,' Eph. 4:4.

3. Nature.—If we could fully understand the nature of God, we might as well give him a name; we can do neither. God is an essence spiritual, simple, infinite, most holy. (1.) An essence subsisting in himself, and by himself; not receiving it from any other; all other things subsist in him and by him; 'in him we live, move, and have our being.' (2.) Spiritual: he hath not a body, nor any parts of a body, but is a spirit, invisible, indivisible. (3.) Simple, we are all compounded; God is without composition of matter, form, or parts. (4.) Infinite; and that in respect, [1.] of time, without beginning or ending. [2.] Of place, excluded nowhere, included nowhere; within all places, without all places. (5.) Most holy; his wisdom, goodness, mercy, love, are infinite. Divers men and angels are called holy, wise, merciful; but, first, they are so made by him, it is his holiness that is in them, and they are but holy and good in their measure, in the concrete; God is holiness itself in the abstract; secondly, The creature is one thing, and the holiness of the creature is another thing, but God's holiness is himself, it is his nature. Thus much our narrow capacity may conceive of him; but this sea is too deep for men or angels to sound. Only, if such we believe him, let us strive to be like him—holy, good, merciful; this is to 'partake of the divine nature,' Heb. 12:10. Scrutari temeritas, imitari pietas est.

4. Distinction.—This title, God, is not proper to the first person only, but common to the rest. Such is the order of the creed; first, generally, in the forefront, to propound God, and then to distinguish him into three subsistences—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. They are three in persons, not in nature; one in nature, not in persons. Nature may be common to many; as humanity, the nature of man, is common to all mankind. Person is some incommunicable and individual thing subsisting by itself; as Peter is a man by himself, and Paul a man by himself specifically. Either is a man in unity of nature, but Peter is not Paul, nor is Paul Peter, in unity of person. Let us conceive three persons in one essence, not divided but distinguished, and yet not more mingled than divided. Think of one substance in three subsistences, one essence in three relations; one Jehovah, begetting, begotten, and proceeding—Father, Son, Spirit. The path is narrow, we must walk warily; the conceit either of three substances, or of one subsistence, is damnable. Many men may have the same nature in specie, but they cannot have it in numero, because they are created quantities, therefore separable. So Peter, Paul, John, have one universal form, yet are not one man, but three men. But the divine nature being infinite, admitting neither composition nor division, three persons may subsist in it, yet they are not three gods, but one God. The light of the sun, the light of the moon, and the light of the air, are for nature and substance, one and the same light, yet are they also three distinct lights. The light of the sun being of itself, and from none; the light of the moon from the sun; and the light of the air from them both. But here only we can adore, and not conceive, we may conceive and not utter, we may utter and not be understood. Now this point is useful.

First, For the direction of our faith. We are bound to believe one God in three persons, but there can be no faith of a thing utterly unknown. If barely to say, 'I believe in God,' were sufficient to save, heaven would be fuller than it is like to be. But this is a strait gate, and few enter. Learn, therefore, to know that you may believe; to believe, that you may be saved. This binds us to believe the first person of the Deity to be our Father, the second to be our Saviour, the third to be our Sanctifier; if we know not what they do for us, our confession is a confusion.

Secondly, For the direction of our worship. The Trinity in unity, the Unity in trinity, is to be worshipped. He that shall adore one person, without the rest, worships an idol, John 4:22. If we worship all three, and not as one God, we make three idols. If we frame to ourselves another form than God prescribes, we worship not him but ourselves. They that wait on the king know the special forms and terms of honouring him; all his subjects know that he is to be honoured, that reverence, obedience, and love is due to him; and that is a disloyal unmannerliness which denies humble obeisance to so great a majesty. But, if the king make special laws, prescribing the form of his honour, every subject is bound to know that. Ignorantia juris will excuse no man, for he is bound to take notice. God hath set down the manner, and defined the honour, which he will have, and how; to this we are all obliged, and must observe it.

Thirdly, For the direction of our prayers. We must not call upon one person, and leave out the rest, as the Jews do on the Father, denying the Son. May we not pray to one person? Yes, safely and comfortably, if we include the rest. While we fix our heart upon one, and shut out the other, our prayer is sin; let us mention one, and retain all, we offend not. None of them doth aught for us without the rest; all their outward works are common. Therefore, to beg of one, and not of all, is injurious.

Here let us be sure to take our Mediator with us, otherwise we go to the throne of grace without comfort; in whom we must conceive a true manhood gloriously united to the Godhead, without change of either nature, without mixture of both. As in the Deity we conceive three persons and one nature, so in Christ two natures and one person. These apprehensions we must so sever that none be neglected, and so conjoin that they be not confounded. These be mysteries, yet in some measure learnable; great depths, yet we may safely wade in them. Yea, this high knowledge is necessary; and he that hath it not may babble, he doth not pray. Think of the man Christ, but without separation of the Godhead united, whose presence and merits give the only passage, acceptance, vigour to our prayers. In him let us send them up to the glorious Trinity, beg mercy of the Father for his Son's sake, beg sanctity of the Holy Ghost for Christ's sake, beg mercy of Christ for his own sake; petition for all good things to all the three persons, but dare not to ask of any without the mediation of Jesus. The least glimpse of this knowledge is worth all the beams of secular skill; the gleanings of this irradiation better than the vintage of the whole world. Let us study to conceive aright, that we may pray aright; and pray, that we may conceive; and meditate, that we may do both; and that God we believe in direct us, enable us, that we may do all!

The first person is described. 1. By his title, 'The Father.' 2. By his attribute, 'Almighty.' 3. By his effect, 'Maker of heaven and earth.'

1. The Father.—But doth not this seem to give the first person some prerogative above the rest, being set before the rest? Answ. He is indeed first, not in priority of nature, for there is but one God, one infinite; nor in priority of time, for there is but one eternal; nor in priority of honour, for none is greater than another; but in respect of order, prioritatem originis,* as being the fountain of the Deity, principium Deitatis.† The Father is of none, the Son is of the Father only, the Holy Ghost from them both. So they are distinguished, John 15:26. Suppose three kings, equal in royalty, all God's immediate lieutenants, met in one place. They cannot all sit down first, but one in the first place, &c. Yet we cannot say he that sat first is the chiefest. Seeing we must name them all, in order we begin with the Father. But still let me adore simply, not explore subtly, this wonderful mystery.

'Father' is a relative term, Paternitas supponit filiationem, Mal. 1:6. This is sometimes understood of the whole Trinity. So Adam is said to be 'the son of God,' Luke 3:38. 'Call no man father on earth, for one is your father in heaven,' Matt. 23:9. We have indeed earthly parents, but God is our Father originally, Mal. 2:10, man organically; God the Father of our spirits, man only of our flesh, and he receives this honour from God. Sometimes it is given to Christ, Isa. 9:6; Pater æternitatis, 'the everlasting Father.' Heb. 2:13. The Son of God is the father of man, as a man may be at once the son of a father and the father of a son.

'The Father,' in a double relation: to Christ and to us.—God hath one Son by generation, many by regeneration, innumerable by creation.

(1.) In respect of Christ, who is his Son, naturally, singularly, consubstantially, coeternally. Therefore, it is the incommunicable propriety of the first person to beget; in this he is distinguished from the other two. Creatures do, indeed, also beget, but with a great difference. In created generations the father is before the son in time, but here the Father begets from all eternity; so both the begetter and begotten are coequal, coeval, in respect of time. God the Father begets God the Son by communicating his whole essence to him. No created father begets so. Adam did not convey his whole essence to his son, for then there must have been an abolition of himself, the generation of one being the corruption of another. But God doth give the whole essence, and yet retain it, being infinite. Man begetting, is forth of the child begotten, and the child is forth of the father; so they are two men. But God the Father begets the Son in himself, not forth of himself, so both persons are still one God. But if they be one nature, then the Father begetting the Son begets himself. Answ. The godhead of the Father begets not the godhead of the Son, but the person of the Father begets the person of the Son; both which are several and distinct persons in one Deity.

(2.) In respect of us.—God is the Father of Christ by nature, of angels by election, of all men by creation, of all magistrates by deputation, of all Christians by profession, of all saints by adoption. 'I ascend to my Father, and your Father,' saith Christ, John 20:17; not Nostrum, but Meum, et vestrum: aliter meum, aliter vestrum: meum natura, vestrum gratia.[‡] Father of the angels, Job 1:6, Ps. 89:6. These be the eldest of the created sons. Father of all men, Acts 17:28; making our bodies by natural and mediate generation, forming our souls by immediate infusion, Heb. 12:9. Father of magistrates; they are called the 'sons of the most High,' Ps. 82:6. Saul as a man might be the son of Belial, but Saul as a king was the son of God. Father of all Christians by profession, 1 Pet. 1:17. Father of all the elect, by adoption, Rom. 8:15; so that now we love him, not for fear, but we fear him for his love. Thus he is our Father. By redemption, Col. 1:12, Ps. 25:22: 'Is not he thy Father that bought thee?' Deut. 32:6. By education: he both brought us into the world, and hath brought us up in the world. For sanctification: 'Is not he our Father that sanctifies us?' Isa. 1:2. For instruction, Matt. 10:20: 'The Spirit of your Father shall speak in you.' In compassion: 'As a father pities his children,' Ps. 103:13. In correction: thus 'he deals with us as with sons,' Heb. 12:7. Lastly, for salvation: 'Come, ye blessed of my Father,' &c. Yea, Luke 12:32, 'It is your Father's will to give you the kingdom.' Thus he is our Father.

We have other fathers, but God is the Father of our fathers; we have instrumental fathers, this is our original and fundamental Father. Child, in the Hebrew, often signifies no more but a transcendency: as the 'child of wrath,' 'children of death,' 'sons of perdition,' Ephes. 2:2, deep in hell's books. Filii contumaciæ, given to disobedience. 'The child of hell,' Matt. 23:15. 'The sons of death,' 1 Sam. 26:16, Ps. 79:11, Filii mortis, pro morti destinatis. 'Children of this world,' Luke 16:8. for such as are addicted to this world. Or, Luke 20:34, filii seculi, for such as live according to the custom of the world. 'Children of Belial,' 'children of the devil,' for such as practise the works of the devil. Gen. 5:32, Filius quingentorum annorum; how old soever in Hebrew, they are called sons. The wicked man belongs not to the fatherhood of God; therefore, he hath many parents, as a bastard is called filius populi.

The saints, indeed, have many filial titles, but all in relation to God. Filii lucis, Job 3:16, 'children of the light,' because God is the light. Filii pacis, Luke 10:6, 'sons of peace,' because God is peace. Filii sapientiae, Matt. 11:19, 'children of wisdom,' because God is wisdom. Filii regni, both for outward profession and inward condition, 'children of the kingdom,' Matt. 8:12, 13:38, because filii regis, children of the king, heirs of the kingdom. Filii promissionis, Gal. 4:28, 'children of promise,' because God hath covenanted to be their Father; it is paternum foedus. Filii thalami, Matt. 9:15, 'children of the bridechamber,' such as the bridegroom shall admit to his glorious nuptials. 'Children of the resurrection,' Luke 20:36, because in the resurrection this Father shall acknowledge them for his own children.

The magistrate is a civil father, 2 Kings 5:23. 'Kings shall be nursing fathers,' Isa. 49:23. Honour thy father, reverence the magistrate. The minister is a spiritual father, 1 Cor. 4:15; Gal. 4:19; Philem. ver. 10. He is a mean, but God is the main in this adoption. Christ is our 'elder brother,' Rom. 8:29; yet also our father. Such was the pre-eminence of birthright, both under nature and the law, that the first-born son was the head of the family; bore the name, sustained the place, exercised the office of a father, to the governing and even blessing of his younger brethren. Now, if primogeniture had such a privilege and precedency, by the rules of justice, among children of the same generation, much more may our Saviour challenge it by a higher right and title. Non timuit habere coheredes,* because his inheritance is not abridged by the multitude of possessors.

But why would God have more children, seeing that one Son is sufficient for his delight, and in him alone he is well pleased? Ans. He needed them not for any completion of his own happiness, it being infinite and incapable of augmentation; but he doth it for the communication of his mercy, and manifestation of his glory. Christ is his Son by an eternal generation, not made, but begotten; a Son by nature, whereof all adoption is but an imitation, as the civil law speaks. It is a prerogative case, that a father, having a natural son, may not assume a legal, adopted, or supported son, because this latter help was invented and intended only for solace of the father's barrenness, or a supply in regard of the children's mortality. 'Lord, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless? and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus,' Gen. 15:2. As if Eliezer should be Abraham's heir; for lack of a natural, an adopted son. But this is a mortal and barren help. Had the day of our conception never dawned, and the morning of our adoption never come, God might well have spared us; he knew how to be happy without us. Before mountains or fountains, hills or depths, had any being, God was delighted in wisdom, his own Son; yet withal, he graciously adds, 'My pleasure was in the sons of men,' Prov. 8:30. This was not to close up our Creator's defects, or to furnish his scarcity, but to communicate his perfection and abundance. Such was his infinite mercy, that when he could have been glorious enough without us, yet he did adopt us.

Neither was the principal heir against this adoption, not grudging that more beside himself should call God Father. But as the whole store of Egypt came through the hand of Joseph, so the whole largess of all heavenly blessings to mankind, came through the hands of Christ. Jacob's family had perished by famine, but for Joseph: the family of the whole world had been lost, but for Jesus. God hath 'chosen us and adopted us in him,' Eph. 1:3, 4. Though his decrees are before all times, eternal; yet some men, according to the received process and succession of causes here, have guessed at the manner and order of this election; concluding Christ as the first effect of God's ordination, a mediator, in some sort, of God's actual choice, and our potential childship. But non refert dici, quòd non confert disci: God hath abstracted it, and no contemplation of man can reach it. Let the matter of our study be, not how he hath chosen us, but whether he hath chosen us; not so much to inquire the reconciliation of mercy and justice in our heavenly Father's counsel, as in our heavenly Father's covenant. Let us be delighted with the prophetic declaration, more with the real exhibition, most of all in the experimental application of our common Saviour. Through all passages we find no acceptance, but 'in the Beloved,' Eph. 1:6; Gal.

3:26. This faith hath its beginning from the Spirit of Christ, that eternal Father within us; and apprehends the merit of Christ, the righteousness of that Father without us; at which instant we become actual children, and cry, Abba! Father.

To make all this useful to ourselves, here first occur the comforts this title gives us, then the duties it requires of us.

Comfort 1. The honour of having such a Father, 1 John 3:1. How high is this dignity! 'To be called the sons of God,' John 1:12: this is our prerogative royal. We tell you not of a kindred imperial, adopted into some of the Cæsars' families, nor of David matching into the house of Saul, which seemed to him no small preferment; we blazon not your arms with the mixture of noble ingressions, nor fetch your lineal descents from heroes and monarchs. As in the contention between Mary and Jane, the gentlemen of Oxfordshire came to the university for counsel in that title; but were answered, that they had many excellent arts and mysteries, but the study of heraldry was not practised among them. Only as Peter said, 'Silver and gold I have none, but what I have, I give,' Acts 3:6; so, what we know we declare. Do you ask no more: you need no more. To be made the sons and daughters of God, is honour amply sufficient.

This dignity will appear greater, if you remember the pit from whence you were digged. We were not only dust in our inception, and ashes in our dissolution, but far worse: our father was an Hittite, the swarthy king of hell; our mother an Amorite, leprous and loathsome sin; desperately forlorn, cast into the wilderness; a sordid skin, and no clothes to hide it; exposed to the rage of hellish monsters, more ravenous than the wolves of the evening: antequam nati, damnati; adjudged to captivity before our nativity; benighted in ignorance before ever we saw the sun; Satan's prisoners, whom he purposed to bind in everlasting chains of blackness. We have read of hopeless foundlings entertained by miracle, as young Cyrus in a shepherd's house, a cottage not much above the ground; no likelihood of high promotion there, yet exalted to a kingdom. Of Moses among the bulrushes, taken up to be the son of Pharaoh's daughter. Of David, from the sheepfolds advanced to a monarchy. But no example holds proportion with this: it is of Lo-ruhamah and Lo-ammi, the bastard fruits of fornication, we speak, Hos. 1:8; that these should be fetched from accursed thralldom, and estated in the glorious liberty of the sons of God; this transcends all admiration. That the Jews, those elder sons, for whom God had done so many miracles, should be rejected; the lost angels for ever disinherited, and we wild brambles adopted: O let all thoughts be held digressions, all occurrences and meditations superfluous, that serve not to remember us of this ineffable and inestimable mercy.

Comfort 2. This assures us that we shall never fall into destruction, for there is no mutability in this our Father. If now sons, sons for ever. Nec moribus nostris convenit filium habere temporalem, could man's law say. This is an inheritance too glorious for a man of polluted lips to describe; no study can comprehend it, no pulpit deliver it, no university teach it, but that one university of heaven. Deo et parenti non redditur œquivalens: none but an ostrich will leave her eggs to the sun above, and to the sand below, forgetting the foot of a beast or passenger to frustrate her hopes. But God's affection is always dear and indefatigable, which Saint Bernard compares to the most tender mothers, springing up similitudes, as the falconer doth partridges; and yet all short, as no natural parent can afford her brood such heat, such motion, such nourishment, as God doth.

Many neglects doth the good father pardon, without averting his love from his child. Absalom is up in arms against his own father; David musters his troops too; but as he encourageth them with his eye, so he restrains them with his tongue: 'Deal gently with the young man Absalom, for my sake.' O how favourable be the wars of a father! But this seems to be unjust mercy, deal gently with a traitor; of all traitors, with a son; of all sons, with an Absalom: so bad a son of so good a father: one that hunts for his blood and crown. For whose cause should Absalom be pursued, if he be forborne for David's? He was courteous to others, plausible to all the people, only cruel to David. He was not sure of the success; the number was unequal. Absalom's forces doubled his, so that he might have been driven to say, Deal gently with Absalom's father. Yet, squaring the greatness of his hopes by the goodness of his cause, and granting himself the victory, he commands pity to the conspirator. A messenger comes. David's first question is, not how fares the host, but how fares Absalom. Cushai resolves him. How is he thunder-struck with the word! As if he were at once bereft of all comfort, and not cared to live but in the name of Absalom, he goes weeping, and crying, O Absalom, my son, &c., 2 Sam. 18:33. Israel prized his life dear, worth ten thousand of theirs, yet he wisheth it exchanged for a traitor's — 'Would God I had died for thee!' Absalom conspired against the life of David, yet David would give his life to relieve Absalom. Here was the love of a father, which I instance as the shadow of that unmeasurable mercy which the true King and Redeemer of Israel bears to his children.

Thus have we Christ praying for his murderers, even while they were scorning him, killing him: 'Father, forgive them, they know not what they do.' If we be sons, we are ungracious, we are rebellious sons; yet still doth our heavenly Father compassionate us. God needs not seek occasion against us; every moment we provoke and deserve his wrath: just cause he hath to sentence us, 'Let them perish.' Yet still he forbears us, gives us life and motion; yea, even that power which we abuse to dishonour him. Still he chargeth his celestial armies, the blessed angels, 'Deal gently with my children.' While we lift up our arms against heaven, they lift up their arms to support us: they bear us in their bosoms, as mothers do their curst children, that scratch their breasts. Unkindly we deal with him, pillage his church, defraud his members, dishonour his name; yet so kind is he, that he chargeth all creatures to spare us. Yea, even when we would not spare ourselves, he hinders us: as the nurse binds the hands of the unruly child, when it would do violence to its own face; speaking to us, as Paul to the jailor, 'Do thyself no harm,' Acts 16:28.

Here is a paternal mercy, past the comprehension of all finite capacities. A near resemblance of it was that of David, the deputy and type of Christ: 'Deal kindly with my son Absalom;' 'would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son.' But how far greater was the love of our Saviour, who said of us wretched traitors, not, Would God I had died for you; but, I will die, I do die, I have died for you. Oh! love like himself, infinite! whereat the angels stand yet amazed, wherewith the saints are ravished. So grievous are our faults, that were the Lord other than a father, how could he pardon us? And, being a father, he must needs be angry with us; but because he is a father, he will not disinherit us. A temporal father is loath to part with his mortal child; how will the Shunamite weep for her son? yet parents are but the nurses of their children, God is the father; and may not the father at his pleasure send for the child from nurse? Perhaps the milk of our breasts is not wholesome, our counsel is not good; the air is infectious, this world is baneful; or we would bring them up ill; therefore death is the father's messenger to fetch them home. We would not forego them, but we must; God loves them better than we; loves us better than we can love them: he is able to keep both us and them, John 10:29.

Here let us still remember, that all the love of the Father to us is in and by our Elder Brother, Christ, 'the Beloved,' 'the Son of his love.' God loved others: he loved Abel, held his blood precious; he loved Enoch, translating him to himself; he loved Abraham, whom he called his friend; he loved Jacob, loved him before he was, gave him the blessing; he loved Joseph, prospered him in every place—all Egypt, all his brethren, witness it; he loved Moses, called him his faithful servant; he loved Noah, saving him from that general destruction; he loved David, choosing him from the folds; loved Samuel, selected him from a child; he loved Solomon, gave him wisdom; loved Daniel, that man of desires; loved Elijah, fetching him up to heaven; he loved Josiah, praising him for an incomparable prince; loved Mary, the blessed Virgin, 'she found favour in his eyes.' Christ loved Lazarus, wept for him; loved John, suffering him to lean on his breast; loved Paul, whom he rapt up to paradise. God loveth us, loveth others, loves his whole church, loves infinite thousands; but all these 'in the beloved,' Jesus Christ.

Comfort 3. Toleration of wants. The good father doth not turn off the child for being weak and sickly; but is so much the more indulgent, as his necessity requires succour. If his stomach refuse meat, or cannot answer it with digestion, will he put him out of doors? No; when the Shunamite's son complains of his head, she lays him in her bosom. A mother is good to all the fruits of her womb, most kind to the sick infant; when it lies with its eyes fixed on her, not able to declare its grief, or to call for what it desires, this doubles her compassion: 'So the Lord doth pity us, remembering our frame, considering that we are but dust,' Ps. 103:14; that our soul works by a lame instrument; and therefore requires not that of an elemental composition, which he doth of angelical spirits. The son is commanded to write out such a copy fairly; he doth his best, far short of the original; yet the father doth not chide, but encourage him. Or he gives him a bow and arrows, bids him shoot to such a mark; he draws his utmost strength, lets go cheerfully; the arrow drops far short, yet the son is praised, the father pleased. Or being sent of an errand, he falls by the way, is hindered by the insinuation of bad company: temptation assaults us, lust buffets us, secular business diverts us, manifold is our weakness, but not beyond our Father's forgiveness: 'He will spare us, as a man spareth his son that serveth him,' Mal. 3:17.

Comfort 4. Supportation of infirmities. Our Father's strength is made glorious in our weakness, Matt. 18:14. *Patris voluntas, filii validitas. Thus we are taught in the first words of that prayer compiled by Wisdom itself, 'Our Father,' admonens adoptionis divinæ; 'which art in heaven,' peregrinationis humanæ. That we may both know we need help, as pilgrims on earth from God in heaven; and conceive trust or hope of that help because he is our Father. There is in him, 1, Skill; an omniscient Father, that 'knows what things we have need of, before we ask him,' Matt. 6:8. Thy natural father will repair the wants he knows (1 Tim. 5:8), God knows before we declare them. 2,

Will, because he is a Father; every one wisheth well to his own. 3, Power, because he is in heaven; 'ask, and it shall be given you,' Matt. 7:7; because he is a Father, our Father, our Father in heaven. We are full of want and woe; there is pity and plenty with our Father. This was the first consideration of that returning unthrift, 'In my father's house there is bread enough, and to spare,' Luke 15:17; the sense whereof taught him so devout a humiliation, 'Father, I have sinned.' Oratio sine malis, est quasi avis sine alis. The child, finding itself too weak to go alone, puts forth a hand to the wall to stay it. We are too feeble for the encounters of Satan, we have a Father strong enough: 'His grace is sufficient for us.' The wronged child stands not to right itself; but resolves, I will tell my father, Exod. 14:14. Is the world and the flesh too hard for us? let us tell our Father. This should comfort us in all our sufferings, Pater videt, Ps. 34:15.

Will David undertake that monstrous giant? Eliab will soon snib him for it: Get thee home, foolish stripling, to thy hook, to thy harp; let swords alone to them that can use them. Saul looked for one as much higher than himself, as he was taller than the rest; for some stern face and brawny arm; young ruddy David was so far below his thoughts, that he receives contempt instead of thanks. But he hath leave to go, not with Saul's armour, but with God's; with no sword but that of the Spirit, faith. All Israel looks on him with pity and fear; why is this comely young man suffered to cast away himself upon such a monster? why is the honour of Israel hazarded upon so unlikely a combatant? The Philistine looks on him with scorn; 'Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?' After all this insolence and ostentation, hear David's reply: 'Thou comest to me with a sword, spear, and shield; but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts,' 1 Sam. 17:45. I am indeed weak, but he in whose name I come is potent enough. Thou hast defied the host of God, and the God of hosts. This God fights against thee by my hand; he is able to revenge his own cause. With one stone he confounds him: there lies the Philistian champion, and the terror of Israel, at the foot of a shepherd. He that considers little David grappling with great Goliath, and great Goliath grovelling under little David, must confess that we have a Father able to deliver us.

Comfort 5. Admission into his presence. Without fear the good child may come to his kind father. First, there is a persuasion in our hearts that he is our Father; then a petition in our mouths for supply of wants, or pardon of sins, or deliverance from perils. That which faith generally believes, prayer particularly begs. We believe in our Father, ability to give, never denying; wisdom to give, never repenting; goodness to give, never upbraiding. This makes us cry, not speak softly, as in fear, but loud, as in assurance. When the king hath promised a boon, the subject comes with special security into the presence. Are we laden with sin, and would be eased? privy to imperfections, and would have them supplied? Do we fear some judgment, and would be secured? are we haunted with a temptation, and would be quitted? full of thankfulness, and would be delivered? We have the warrant of a Father, Pray, and be comforted.

But let us beware of sin, that will make us run away from our Father, and hide ourselves. If we delight in sin, God will not delight in our prayers. He doth not hear malicious and deliberate sinners, Ps. 66:18, John 9:31. It is a high privilege to come into the presence chamber of a mortal king, and not seldom even great men want this prerogative. Yet the king's son may have free entrance; no servant dares deny the son. Neither have we access only to the throne of grace, but even of glory; our prayers go before, ourselves shall follow. If he admit our petitions, he will not deny our persons. The king gladly receives a letter from his absent son, how joyfully will he entertain himself? Why should we fear to die, that may commend our souls into the hands of a gracious father? Luke 23:46. No obedient child fears that messenger, how grim soever he looks, that he knows will bring him to his loving father.

Comfort 6. Provision of all good things. It is part of the father's duty to provide for the family. Parents lay up for their children, not children for their parents. Shall God be defective in that he requires of us? Quid pater negabit filiis, qui hoc dignatus est, ut sit pater? Many be our necessary wants, besides those imaginary ones which we make to ourselves. Thou art rich, and complainest the want of children. Thou hast a Father. 'Instead of thy fathers, thou shalt have children' (Ps. 45:16), was but a temporal blessing; but instead of children thou hast a Father: this is a spiritual blessing. Cannot this content thee? Is not this Father 'better to thee than ten sons?' as Elkanah said to Hannah, 1 Sam. 1:8. Children may be unkind, vexations instead of comforts. There is unchangeable compassion in this Father. King Edward the First, hearing the news at one time of the death both of his father and of his son, lamented more for his father, giving this reason: I may have more sons, I can have no more fathers. When the case stood so with Abraham: I must either kill my only son or disobey my heavenly Father; though the conflict were grievous between natural affection and faithful obedience, he prefers his Father. How far unlike to those that, to content a child's humour, will displease an almighty Father!

Doth the world throw contempt upon us? 'It is our Father's will to give us a kingdom,' Luke 12:32. Bene fertur calumnia, cum acquiritur corona. That celestial royalty makes large amends for all. Do we want riches? Pater novit, 'our heavenly Father knows that we have need of these things,' Matt. 6:32. *Non dubitetis affectum, pater est; non dubitetis effectum, novit quod indigetis. 'If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your heavenly Father give good things to them that ask him?' Matt. 7:11, where is a threefold comparison. 1. Dantis ad dantem, betwixt the givers. God hath the better store. Man gives and wants. God's treasury hath never the less. Who would travel far to a broken cistern, that dwells at next door to the fountain? 2. Recipientis ad recipientem, betwixt the receivers. Grant that Jacob loves Joseph dearly, Benjamin dearer, yet God loves them both better, and better provides for them. 3. Dati ad datum, betwixt the gifts. Corporal things maintain but a corruptible life, spirituals preserve an incorruptible soul. Confer on thy son never so many honours, manors, jewels, ornaments, yet he shall die. Our Father gives that shall keep us alive for ever.

Pater est, ergo vult; in coelis est, ergo potest.† Our 'Father,' to signify his mercy; 'in heaven,' to declare his all-sufficiency. Non denegabit petentibus sua, qui sponte obtulit non petentibus se. Some children are sick of their father, longing when his testament shall be ratified by his death, that they may be fingering the legacies. But let us affect patrem rather than patrimonium, not so much desiring heaven itself, as the glorious presence of our Father there. Deus dabit se et sua, petentibus se plus quam sua. God will give himself and his riches to those that seek himself above his riches. They are extremely covetous whom that infinite Deity cannot content. This is our happy supply of comfort by our Father: for our impotency we have his omnipotency; for our transgression his pardon; for our misery his mercy; for our affliction his compassion; for our weakness his might; for our indigence his indulgence; for contempt in the world content in the Lord. Therefore let us sing, 'Blessed be God, the Father of mercies, and the God of all consolation,' 2 Cor. 1:3.

Now, as this title gives dignity, so it requires duty. Many are content, that as a father he should bless them, but not as a father command them. They love to be of the taking hand, but will part with nothing. But we must serve him like morigerous children, that he may do us good as a gracious Father.

Duty 1. We must be 'led by his Spirit.' This is one proof that we are his children, Rom. 8:14. Seeing this paternity is the foundation of all hope for what we want, of all continuance of that we have, it is good to be sure of it. Now God, as it is said of Adam, begets no children, but 'in his own likeness.' Generation doth not more than regeneration, effectuate a similitude of the child to the parent. We commonly know young ones, whose children they are, by their complexion and condition. Such a blood and such a spirit moves in their veins. When God calls for his sons, I make no doubt but the devil himself will appear, Job 1:6; and I fear, among those that profess and call God father, he will find many of his own children, John 8:44. Some come into the congregation of God's children, either in a sullen humour, as Cato was supposed to step into the theatre, merely that he might step out again; or in a bravery, as men make appearance at a muster, to shew their furniture and feathers, and flash off a little powder; or for company, like geese to the capitol. There is an humble heart and a teachable spirit; this is rare to find. If we be not led by the Spirit of our Father, what assurance have we that we are not bastards?

Duty 2. Let us be humbled for our natural condition, and strive for this spiritual adoption. We had a worse fatherhood than that of corruption, Job 17:14. No child is so like its father as a man by nature is like Satan, in his thoughts, desires, delights. None of us can endure the exprobration of a base parentage. Yet, if men's works be devilish, Christ's censure holds; and to be the son of a hangman, of an harlot, is honour to it. Our Romish neighbours talk much of their miracles; but all present wonders shall lose the reputation of strangeness, would you bless our eyes with this miracle, to see all become the holy children of a heavenly Father. The earth shall be filled with admiration, hell with distraction, heaven with acclamation, the church with exultation, every good heart with gladness, every ill one with madness, all with amazed looks, at such a conversion. Is the former Saul joined with the prophets? the latter Saul with the apostles? Do the children of Nimrod, hunters and oppressors; the children of Lamech, fighters and swaggerers; the children of Jubal, singers and pipers, all come in? all made the children of God? Sure, 'Japhet is persuaded to dwell in the tents of Shem.' Now, he that can raise to Abraham sons of stones, work this! Come, then, to meet him, that 'runs to meet you,' Luke 15. He came once in his Son, he comes continually in his word; and he will provide the fat calf, better than all our venison. He will give the kiss, and the ring, and the robes, precious and incomparable things to entertain his sons.

Duty 3. Good children follow their father, and observe him as the copy of their life. In case of injury, what doth my father? 'He causeth his sun to shine, and his rain to fall,' Matt. 5:45, even on his enemies; in this be the 'children of your Father.' In the works of charity, what doth my Father? 'He is a Father of the fatherless, a Judge of the widow,' Ps. 68:5; so is his good Son, 'a Father to the poor,' Job. 29:16. If our Father give us the inheritance, and we stick at a small beneficence, it is as if a favourite, when the king had given him a great manor under the broad seal, should grudge to pay the fees. He is unworthy to be a rich man's heir, that will not pay the scrivener for making the will. Let us look up to our Father, and love him for his mercies, fear him for his love, reverence him for his goodness, obey him for his greatness, and be thankful for his kindness; thus should a good son do. Many complain the unruliness of their children, forgetting how unruly themselves are to their Father. It is just with God to punish the untowardness of his children, with the untowardness of their children. While we fear not our Father, what reverence should we find in our children? The sole compendiary way, to be a happy father of earthly children, is first to be a holy child of our heavenly Father. Children are like a looking-glass; a very breath may defile them: or as a stringed instrument, that is put out of tune by the very change of the weather. Let the mother confer with the father, as Hannah did with Elkanah about young Samuel's dedication, so concerning their young Samuel's education. Let us shew them how we would have them behave themselves toward us, by our own behaviour toward God.

Duty 4. Avoid all ungodly society; so 'God will be a Father to us, and we shall be his sons and daughters,' 2 Cor. 6:18. He is a graceless child that will take part with his father's enemies. Amicus Dei non erit, qui inimicos Dei non oderit. 'Do I not hate them that hate thee?' Ps. 139:21. My enemies I love, thy enemies I hate: non quatenus sunt homines, sed quatenus sunt hostes. Shall I accompany those that revel out the Sabbath, as if there was no God to serve? How the son of so good a father was wrought upon by bad company (Luke 15), consider with fear. Ask those brands which have been snatched out of this fire, the souls that have escaped this snare, how more outrageous than whirlwinds, more contagious than the breath of basilisks, bad fellowship is. There be divers words that lose their sense in construction, and many souls that lose their innocency by consortion. No poison is more violent, more virulent, than that is shot from the breath of such infectious serpents.

Duty 5. Be patient under his corrections: blows from a stranger recoil upon him with quittance; from a father they require patience. If two children be fighting, and a man parting them, lets the one alone, corrects the other, we conclude, the child whom he beats is his own son. God lets bastards escape, but chastiseth his children, Heb. 12:10. Some in calamity seek to wizards for help, or to such uncouth means; this is for the son, when he is whipped by the father, to run to his enemy for succour. No, let us beseech the same hand that inflicted it, to remove it; and till he does, be patient under it, believing that the father will do what is best for the child. Honora potrem non solum osculantem, sed et verberantem; et indulgentem, et objurgantem. Lord, thy very strokes are mercy; if thou correctest us as children, thou meanest to save us as a Father.

Duty 6. If he be our Father, 'where is his honour?' Mal. 1:6; and how can we honour him, but by our obedience? Honour thy temporal father, much more thy eternal. Shall an obstinate sinner say to God, 'My Father, thou art the guide of my youth?' Jer. 3:4. Shall we dissemble, whose Father is truth? be gripulous,* whose Father is bountiful? revenge injuries, whose Father is merciful? walk in darkness, whose Father is light? Of all his errors, this most galled the unthrift's heart, that he had grieved his father, Luke 15:18. Our 'fruits' are called for; these 'honour our Father,' John 15:8; our 'good works,' these 'glorify our Father' on earth, Matt. 5:16, and according to these he will glorify us in heaven. But a 'bad son shames the father,' Prov. 28:7.

Duty 7. Let us maintain the honour of our Father with zealous courage. Did our faint-hearted bashfulness injure our own persons, the matter were less grievous; but the common cause of God is wronged through his children's timorousness. Which of us hath not yielded an implied consent to God's dishonour? which of us in our places is bold to rebuke corruption, as Paul did Peter, to the face? where is the ear that tingleth, the blood that riseth, the heart that thrilleth, at the lies and blasphemies of the age? Unhallowed tongues in every place wound our Father's name; which was able to make Croesus's young and dumb son speak: while children that are dumb should speak, we that can speak, are dumb and speechless. Shall we, like those rulers, believe, and not dare to confess? John 12:42. Shall we usurp more in our fear and love than our Father? Yet how hath this stolen courage from men's hearts, and men's hearts from the Lord. Our forefathers stood against the torrent of the times for Christ, being prodigal of their bloods in that fiery trial; and shall we be ashamed to speak for him, and that against private sins, where, if our words prevail not. we have shewn our zeal? *Vir bonus et sapiens audebit dicere Pentheu; 'Thou art the man.' I will speak, saith Esther: 'If I perish, I perish,' Esth. 4:14. If we deny him before mortals, shall not he deny us before angels? Is there not a fearful 'lake' provided for 'fearful' men? Rev. 21:8. Oh it is beyond all imagination terrible for us to think, above all wonder horrible for them to feel, what punishment belongs to such dastards, yea to such bastards, not children of their Father. How will all their policies shrink, what a world of confusion will surprise their hearts when God shall say, 'Depart, I know you not.' Cowards you have been, none of my champions; strangers you are, none of my children. I know there be some, that with monstrous tongues, bigger than their hands, can speak great words, play their prizes in empty forms, and seem valiant; non quia plus cordis, sed minus oris habent: not because they have more courage, but less modesty. But far be it from us in the cause of our Father to hold our peace. Shame is the consequent of sin; let us bestow all our shame on our own sins; and not think it a shame, but an honour, to stand for the glory of our Father.

Duty 8. Seeing we have a Father so loving, and able to provide for us, let us banish all immoderate care, Matt. 6:26, 32. In a family the father provides for all; he that doth not, is worse than an infidel; the church is God's family, his providence sustains it: if thou be one of the house, put thy trust in the Father. If we see a young man busily purveying for himself, building, purchasing, proling, raking wealth together, we say, Sure his father is dead. If our care be set night and day on the things of this life, losing our repasts, breaking our sleeps, wearing out our bodies with labours, tearing our souls with distractions; it argues, that either God hath cast us off, or we take him for no father of ours. Indeed if our Father were poor, we might look to ourselves; but seeing his riches know no measure, his love no end, it is enough for us to be sure of our adoption, let him alone with our portion. If a temporal father give no legacy to one child among the rest, yet he will recover a child's part by law. But our Father can neither want legacies to give, nor love to bestow them; if we be his children we shall be blessed.

ALMIGHTY.—This consists in two things. First, he is able to do what he pleaseth, and that in all places, Ps. 135:6. Next, he is able to do more than he pleaseth, able to turn 'stones into children,' Matt. 3:9; or 'into bread,' Matt. 4:3; yet he never did it. Able to command legions of angels for his rescue, yet he did not, Matt. 26:53. Able to have saved himself from death, and confounded his deriders, he would not; but rather chose, by not saving himself, to save us, Luke 23:35. He is able to make more worlds, more suns for this; he would not, will not. Thus God can do all that he will do, actually; and more than he will do, potentially. There be three things that (divines hold) God cannot do, without derogation to his almightiness: (1.) Such as be contrary to his personal propriety: as the Son cannot beget the Father, nor either of them proceed from the Holy Ghost. (2.) Such as be contrary to the essential property of the godhead; as he cannot be finite, nor ignorant of anything; he cannot make another God, another infinite. He 'cannot lie,' Titus 1:2, Heb. 6:18; he 'cannot die,' he 'cannot deny himself,' 2 Tim. 2:13; cannot repent, cannot change, Num. 23:19, Ps. 110:4, Mal. 3:6. Mutare potest signum, non consilium. Whom he hath decreed to save, he cannot damn; if he have promised mercy, he cannot throw to hell; for he cannot do against his promise, against his purpose. These are the effects of impotency, signs of imperfection, which, if God could admit, he could not be God. Man can indeed lie and change, and sin, and repent, therefore is weak; but God cannot, and because he cannot he is omnipotent. *Dicitur omnipotens, faciendo quod vult, non patiendo quod non vult.

(3.) Some think that he cannot do things which imply contradiction; of a stone he can make a man, or turn man into a stone; but that a stone, being a stone, should also be a man, this they hold impossible. A woman was turned into a pillar of salt, but become a pillar, she ceased to be a woman. So water was changed into wine, but then it was no longer water. That, in the same place, and not in the same place, at the same time, and not at the same time, the sun should shine, and not shine—this is a manifest contradiction. When we deny the Romish reality of Christ's body in the sacrament, they think to choke us with a potest Dominus, God can do this. But beside that a body hath dimensions, circumscribed, limited to some place, and to extend it to innumerable places, is to make it cease being a body; the sea was divided, the sun stood still; but that was still a sea, this still a sun; but, if a body could be everywhere, it were not still a body. But yield that God can do this, therefore he doth it, is no good consequent. From will to can is a good argument, 'Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean,' Matt. 8:2; not from can to will. But this is miraculous, say they. We answer, Christ wrought no miracle, but man's sense might apprehend it to be a miracle. When he turned water into wine, made him see that was born blind, fed thousands with a few loaves; the sight, and taste, and sense being exercised, could testify these for miracles. Here the sense is against it; we see bread, take bread, taste bread, digest bread; therefore not the real body, otherwise than in a sacramental relation and mystery. Faith is supra sensum, not contra rationem. It were a strange faith, when I see and know this church to be wood and stone, to believe that it is brass and iron.

Duty 1. This should strike a terror unto us, as the poor child quakes when he sees his father coming with the rod. 'I am afraid of thy judgments;' they little consider of God's almightiness that tremble not at his judgments. 'It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands' of his justice, Heb. 10:31; but into the hands 'of his mercy' we desire to commend ourselves; there is no place safer. Do not think to pass current with thy sins, because thou art long forborne; he that was able to overthrow thee before this in his power, will call thee to account in his justice. Aaron might look somewhat heavily on that sad spectacle, amazed to see his two sons dead before him, Levit. 10:3, dead in displeasure, dead suddenly, dead by the immediate hand of God; yet he 'held his peace;' not out of sullenness, but submiss patience; seeing it the Lord's pleasure, and their desert, he is content to forget that he had sons. God's judgments must be honoured, not murmured at, not censured in others, but deprecated in ourselves. That which hath befallen any sinner, O sinner, may befall thee; there is the same might in him, if there be the same malice in us. Were his strength decayable with time, there might be some hope in reluctance; but never did or shall man contest against God without coming short home. He is as almighty in the valleys as in the hills. Some fear the waters, are secure on the land, dread a clap of thunder, think themselves safe in a calm; as if the earth could not swallow Korah, as well as the water drown Pharaoh; as if Nadab were not slain with fire from heaven, when the weather was fair. One will not come to the temple for fear of dying in a crowd; as if God could not find him out in his privacy, or the strayer from the drove might never fall into the hands of slaughter.

Duty 2. Let this consideration humble us; the pride of man and omnipotency of God will hardly stand together. The apostles contend for superiority, and presently Satan begs them, 'desires to winnow them,' Luke 22:31. A man thinks scorn to be censured a natural; yet he is no sooner proud but Satan begs him for a fool, as none are begged of the king but fools and madmen. The sight of a proud woman made the good man weep; first, because she was going to hell; secondly, because she was going faster than he could go to heaven.* All other sins lead a man to God, only pride brings him against God. 'God resisteth the proud!' 1 Pet. 5:5.; good reason, for the proud resist God. Other sinners forsake God, therefore God forsakes them; but the proud resists God, therefore God resists him.† All the capital sins are the daughters of pride, all odious; how vile is the mother?

It degrees up itself like rebellion. (1.) The first act of rebellion is denying of tribute: pride refuseth to pay God the tribute of praise; all honour is too little for herself. (2.) Rebellion disobeys the king's laws, pride will be bound to no law, thinks herself too good to be controlled. (3.) Rebellion sets up a new king, and pride sets up a new god: 'We will not have this man reign over us,' Luke 19:14. Like Ahithophel, it sets up an Absalom against David, but at last despairs and hangs itself. (4.) Rebellion takes the field, and so doth pride; 'Let us break their bonds asunder,' Ps. 2:2. If their hands cannot reach heaven, they will dart out spicula linguæ, 'setting their mouths against heaven,' Ps. 73:9. They will blaspheme God, though they cannot uncrown him. All are fools by nature; he that humbles not himself must remain a fool still; for God reveals his wisdom to babes, not to the proud. Christ doth not thank God for hiding these mysteries from the wise, but for revealing them to the humble, Matt. 11:25. As Rom. 6:17, not that you were so, but that you are thus.‡ Alas, that poor dust should be proud when it considers the Almighty! He that desires to build high, and to seek the things above, must lay his foundation low in an humble heart. Quo minor est quisquis, maximus est hominum. Humility is schola, and scala cœli; to raise the humble is the delight of omnipotency, but rebels shall be east down into hell.

Duty 3. Be patient under his afflicting hand; there is no dealing with the Almighty but by prayers and peace-offerings. 'I was dumb, and opened not my mouth, because thou didst it,' Ps. 39:10. Not a word! but there may be a silent tongue and a clamorous heart. A speechless ripening§ of the soul is the loudest cry in God's ears. Heat gathered within, and wanting vent, is more flagrant. But David was dumb within, his heart was mute, he knew he should get little by brawling with God. Aaron's sons perish, and he 'holds his peace;' if he breathe out discontent, he saw God able to speak again, even to him, in fire.

Shimei curses, David looks higher, not to the barking of the dog, but to the master that set him on. He could easily stop the mouth of Shimei, he dares not grapple with the hand of God. The sin of Shimei's curse was his own, the smart of the curse was the Lord's. God wills that as David's affliction, which he hates as Shimei's transgression. That lewd tongue moved from God, it moved lewdly from Satan. Yet the patient king says, 'God hath bidden him curse David.' The event shewed that David could distinguish between the righteousness of God and the unrighteousness of a traitor; how he could both kiss the rod, and yet charge Solomon to burn it. His eyes were fixed on the Almighty; this was the strong motive of his submission, the acknowledgment of the original from whence these evils came.

Let us learn, in the wrongs of an enemy, to see the hand of God; our hate of the instrument shall be swallowed up in the awe of the agent. There is no greater proof of grace than to smart patiently, with a contented heart, reposing itself in the wisdom and goodness of God, so far from chiding that we dispute not. The more a bird struggles in the net, the faster she is caught. The lion shews least mercy of all to the resisting beast. We all know that we do not meddle with our match, when we strive with our Maker. Yet nature is so forward that she still urgeth us to this dangerous quarrel, 'Curse God and die.' It is not only the master's charge, but the apostle's, and so the Lord's, to servants, that they 'answer not again.' When God either chides or smites, think of his omnipotence, and hold thy peace. When his hand is on our back, our hand must be on our mouth. Otherwise we shall fare the worse, as mothers whip their children so much the more for crying.

Duty 4. Let us not extend our power to the utmost; considering that the Lord is almighty, yet doth not exercise the fulness of his power against us. When we contemplate his might, we have cause to wonder at his patience. Bloody and cruel Marcion charged the God of the Old Testament with blood and cruelty; as his father the devil, even in paradise, a place full of love, would have fastened envy on his Maker. All this while he forgot his omnipotency, that gave him a tongue to speak, and head to invent such a devilish blasphemy. He that was able to sink him in the midst of this impiety, and did not, was no cruel God. If wicked men see fearful judgments, their heart is ready to charge God with cruelty; but he that spares them in mercy, who in their malice spare not him, is no cruel God. He needs no cruelty. Should he turn all things to nothing in a moment, by his almightiness, he might do it in justice, and his justice is a part of his goodness. Long, long doth he forbear us, that can find cause enough in his justice, and power enough in his omnipotence, to confound us. Himself calls punishment 'a strange work, a strange act,' Isa. 28:21; as if every act of severity seemed strange to him. But for infiniteness, his patience would be tired out in the tedious expectation of our repentance, Exod. 34:6. His mightiness is contracted in a few words, his mercy hath a large description; as if this had gotten the victory, and all the weapons in the armoury of heaven were rainbows; which is a bow, but without an arrow, and a bow full bent, but without a string, and a bow bent, but with the wrong side upwards, as if we shot at him, not he at us. If he should turn it, and charge it, and draw the arrow up to, the head, yet repentance might get mercy to step in, as the angel did to Abraham. Thus able is he to punish, thus gracious to forbear and forgive.

You that be magistrates at home, masters of families, behold here the patience of your Master, and the Master of all the world. You have power to punish, so hath he; your power is limited, his infinite. Will you forgive no faults? You shew him how to use yourselves. Examine your own conscience; you have not gone at God's sending, not come at his calling, not done your duty according to his bidding. He hath spared you; be not ye without mercy, that stand in need of mercy. The apostle hath spoken it, and the day of Christ shall verify it: 'Judgment shall be without mercy, to him that shews not mercy,' James 2:13. I know that correction is necessary for a servant; but let it not be discharged like a piece of ordnance, that dasheth in pieces ere it reporteth. Let direction be multiplied upon direction, instruction upon instruction, here a warning, there a threatening; and when words cannot prevail, come not to blows without weeping eyes, melting hearts, yearning bowels. Use your power to the edification, not to the damnifying, of others. There is difference betwixt apprentices and slaves: they are yours to teach a trade, to direct in the ways of godliness and civility; not to abuse with overburdenous labours and inhuman blows. If you extend your magisterial power over them, take heed, there is an almighty God able to revenge it upon you. Ye have children, may they not feel the punishment of such a father, in the rigour of such a master? Think thou seest thy own child in such a plight as thou hast left the child of thy neighbour. Say stripes be not common; yet harsh language, uncomfortable chocks, the discouragement of continual snibs, are vexation enough. Should God thus rebuke thee for every fault, where were thy peace? Let your behaviour be so innocently impartial, that they may despair of pardon for their errors; and yet so pardon theirs, as men that continually offend. Beware of spleen in any chastisement; passion and precipitation may make mental murder of a just correction. Qualify your power by your pity, as God doth his might by his mercy, Luke 6:36. Rather spare, where in equity you might have punished; than punish, where in mercy you might have spared. A forfeiture, in law, hath left the borrower to thy mercy; if thou wilt be extreme, and do what thou mayest do, look for the same measure at the hand of this Almighty. That thou wouldst do mischief, and canst not, thanks be to God; that thou canst do mischief, and wilt not, next to the divine grace, there is some thanks to thyself. He that can say with conscience, that he hath spared others, may hope with confidence that God will spare him.

Duty 5. Beware of presuming in sin by the Lord's forbearance. It is the greatness of mercy, not the want of greatness, that hath spared thee. And he is not more merciful to the repentant, than just in retribution of vengeance to the obstinate. Seeing the wicked impugn, one would think judgment were all this while omitted, as an unproper and impertinent business, scarce agreeable to the blessed nature of such a sovereign goodness, Eccles. 8:11. The venturous swimmer may escape often, and yet at last be drowned in some churlish wave; the rioter overcomes many surfeits, some one shall pay him for all. So doth the justice of God overtake sinners when they least suspect it, that have had many warnings of wrath, and would not prevent it. Oh, that men would consider this almighty power, and how horrible a pit he hath provided for iniquity, whereinto he is able to put them in the act and article of their sins! In the night, a man passeth by some dangerous precipice, steeper than Dover cliffs, from whence falling he were lest without hope. This as he escapes without sight, so he goes his way without thanks. Bring him back in the day, shew him the peril, measure the downfall; he trembles at it, and blesseth God for his deliverance. To let us go on in our errors, and perish, that were his justice; to deliver us from the dangers we would incur, this is his providence.

Duty 6. Despair not of mercy upon thy repentance, for there is no sin beyond the Almighty's forgiveness. After 1600 years' obduracy of the Jews, 'God is able to graff them in,' Rom. 11:23. Indeed, when a man is aged in sin, in blindness, unbelief, disobedience, it is only an almighty power that can convert him; as to cure a man thirty-eight years bed-rid, or another born blind. This is to 'believe in God Almighty,' that he is able to pardon my sins, to supply my wants, to ease my sorrows. If we want not faith, he wants not power to give us all good things. An almighty Judge, so the devils believe him; but an almighty Father, this is the faith of the saints. On these two foundations stands every Christian, the 'exceeding greatness of his power,' Eph. 1:19, and 'of his mercy,' chap. 2:4. Indeed, the contrary power is visible everywhere; Satan is strong to draw men to sin. In our unpacified contentions, we see the power of Satan; in our covetousness, uncleanness, malice, is seen the power of Satan; but in few do we discern the mighty power of grace. Men 'have a form of godliness, but deny the power thereof,' 2 Tim. 3:5. Though he be almighty, he forceth no man to heaven against his will. If they will deny his power, he that is mighty to save them that believe, is as mighty to condemn those that will not obey. Satan is but his slave; though he prevail mightily, it is but by permission. 'Greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world,' 1 John 4:4. As he is greater in himself, so let him be greater in us; yielding to his grace, as we do to his truth, not only that it is great, but shall prevail in us. As you desire to leave a good testimony to the world, and to bear a good argument in your own souls, that you are the children of this omnipotent Father, let his grace be mighty in you, and shew itself mightily from you. Let that mighty word, which is preached by dust and ashes, be mighty in your lives, 'casting down the strongholds' of sin, every high fortification exalted against obedience, 2 Cor. 10:5. Let us see charity as mighty in you, as covetousness is in the world; the love of God as mighty in you, as the love of riches is in them. When the power of your lust yields to the power of grace; the strength of corruption, to the strength of the Spirit; the mightiness of your robustious wills, to the will of your almighty Father; then we shall find comfort, you shall find comfort, the whole church be delighted, the angels in heaven rejoice; and that most mighty God, who here sanctifies us by his mighty grace, and shall raise our bodies by his mighty power, will at last mightily glorify us with his salvation.

MAKER OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.—This appertaineth essentially to the whole Trinity, for the Father is not only a Creator, and almighty, but also the Son and the Holy Spirit, John 1:3, Heb. 1:2. The Son creates, Col. 1:16; the Holy Ghost, Gen. 1:2, Job 26:13. The creation, in the mass of the matter, is attributed to God the Father; in the disposition of the form, to God the Son; in the preservation of all, to God the Holy Ghost. The actions of God be of two sorts, outward or inward. (1.) The inward are immanent in the essence of the Deity by an act internal and eternal; as the Father to beget the Son, and to communicate the godhead to the Holy Ghost. (2.) The outward are transient works, passing to the creatures by an act external and temporal; these are works of nature, or works of grace. The works of nature respect her either quà est in fieri, or quà est in facto; the former are the works of creation, the other of conservation. These outward works be common to all the persons. Opera ad extra sunt indivisa, what one person doth all do; the Father createth, the Son createth, the Holy Ghost createth. Yet here must be observed a distinction in the manner and order of working. The Father createth by the Son and by the Spirit, the Son createth from the Father and by the Spirit, the Spirit createth not by, but from, them both. Therefore is the first person called our Creator, because he makes all things, after a peculiar manner, by the Son and Spirit; whereas they make, not by him, but from him. The Father may be said to be Causa movens, the Son operans, the Spirit absolvens; the Father wills it, the Son works it, the Holy Ghost accomplisheth it.

To order the method of our discourse according to the method of God's work, consider three things:—1. His determination to make the world; 2. His creation of it as he had determined; and, 3. Preservation of it as it is created.

1. The counsel or determination of God hath two properties: Eternity, decreeing all things before all time, Ephes. 1:4, 2 Tim. 1:9; and unchangeableness, Jam. 1:17, for such as God is, such is his decree. By virtue of this he set down with himself whatsoever he hath, doth, or shall bring to pass, with all their circumstances of time, place, causes, so that not the least thing is left unpurposed, undisposed. 'He worketh all things after the counsel of his own will,' Ephes. 1:11. There is nothing out of the compass of his foreknowledge and foreappointment, neither of which must be severed. Impotens voluntas absque scientia, inanis præscientia absque voluntate.

This is that counsel of the blessed Trinity whereby he purposed to make and govern the world. Christ is called his Father's Counsellor, Isa. 9:6; and so the creation of the world is said to be 'in him,' Col. 1:7. (1.) In Christ, tanquam in exemplari, he being the image of his Father's understanding. In the building of a house there is a double frame, one in the architect's head, another in material being, built after the former conceived pattern. (2.) In him, as that head and foundation in which all other things should consist. He is our Creator ad esse, our Preserver in esse, our Redeemer ad bene esse, making us the sons of God, John 1:12.

But if God decree and ordain all things, then sin. Ans. God decreed sin not properly as it is sin: quatenus habet rationem entis, non quatenus habet rationem defectus, God converting that to his glory which the sinner commits to his own confusion. But he is a God iniquitatem non volens, 'that hath no pleasure in wickedness,' Ps. 5:4. Ans. Voluntate permissiva vult, approbativâ non vult. By his will of permission, but not by his will of approbation, he wills it. Thus by an unspeakable manner it comes to pass, ut quod est contra voluntatem Domini, non est præter voluntatem Domini,* that that is not beside his will which is yet done against his expressed will. His special will forbids it, hates it, punisheth it; yet his general will suffers it, and he honours himself by it. So, in respect of God, bonum est ut sit malum. Object. But if all comes to pass by his unchangeable decree, what need is there of means? to what end are sermons, sacraments, magistrates, laws? Let men work or play, wake or sleep, his purpose cannot be frustrated. Ans. The same decree that ordained the end, ordained also the means to that end. The earth shall yield us corn not unless we sow it, if we would have hay, we must cut the grass. Desire we some good things we want? We must pray; prayer is the means to obtain them. Would we be forgiven? We must repent; remission is the end to which repentance is the means. Would we be justified by Christ's righteousness? We must believe; faith is the means. Would we believe? We must hear. In vain he looks for recovery of his health that refuseth physic. They that content themselves with idleness and indevotion, must be content without salvation.

2. The Creation.—To create is to give a being where was none before, and that out of nothing, to make esse quod non erat. There is a difference between creating, generating, and making. Generation is to produce a living substance by a living substance, conferring the matter out of itself, as man by man. Making is to form a thing of something, as to make an image of a piece of wood or stone. Creation is to frame a being of nothing; this is a work of God by himself, generation is his work by nature. There have been many errors about the creation. (1.) Some held that the world was eternal. (2.) Some that if it were not eternal, it had a material beginning, it was made of something. (3.) Some that God made the superior creatures himself, the inferior by angels. (4.) Some that the world was made by chance, by the concurring of bodies, as the epicures. (5.) Others conceived two beginnings, one to be the beginner of things corruptible, the other of incorruptible. The very first verse of the Bible confutes them all. 'In the beginning;' therefore, it was not eternal, it had a beginning. 'Created' argues that it was made of nothing. 'God,' this excludes angels from being creators. Lastly, 'God made all;' therefore, there is but one beginning of all creatures.

For the creation in general I will touch upon seven circumstances: the matter, the manner, the harmony, the goodness, the time, the space of making, and the end.

(1.) The matter and first beginning of all creatures was nothing; God made something of nothing, and of that something all things. It is the praise of us men if where we have matter we can give fashion; lay us stones and timber, we can raise a house, and if it be handsome we look for commendation. But God made the matter which had no being; he gave a form to that matter, a glory to that form. With us not so much as a thought can rise without some matter, but here all matter arises from nothing; nothing negatively in the creation of the first mass of all things, nothing privatively in the second creation of things out of the first chaos.

This miraculous work may soon drown our thoughts, who cannot conceive of eternity, what it was before the world was. How can plants judge of sense or beasts judge of reason? Little doth the horse know what his rider's soul discourseth; so unfit is reason to judge of eternity. But let this [1.] humble us all. Why do we stand upon our ancestors? Could we derive ourselves by a known lineal descent from Noah, yet he was the son of Lamech, who was the son of Methuselah, who was the son of Enoch, who was the son of Jared, who was the son of Mahalaleel, who was the son of Cainan, who was the son of Enos, who was the son of Seth, who was the son of Adam, who was the son of dust, which was the son of nothing. Man was made of earth, but what was the earth made of? Nothing. Foolish dust, to be proud of nothing! [2.] Comfort and confirm our faith. How easy is it for God to repair all out of something, that could fetch all out of nothing? How should we distrust him for our resurrection, who hath thus approved his omnipotence in our creation? Our remainder after death can never be so small as our being was before the world; ashes is more than nothing. It is a greater wonder to make the least clod of nothing than to multiply a world. Thou that didst make me in time, according to thy own decree before time, wilt revive me from dust, fetch me a second time from the earth, to live with thyself when time shall be no more.

(2.) The manner of God's creating things, was most freely, most easily. Freely; without any necessity compelling him to it, fecit, quomodo refecit, but 'of his own will he doth regenerate us,' James 1:18; therefore of his own will he made us. That which is not, cannot give any cause why it should be; we could not deserve to be made, nor did God need us to do his work for him. Easily; without any labour, motion, or mutation of himself; without any defatigation in his works, but the very bidding it 'be done,' was the doing of it. His will was his word, and his word was his deed. Our tongue, and hand, and heart, are different; the tongue often promises without the heart, the tongue and heart are resolved, yet the hand comes short of performance. All these are one in God, who is simply one and infinite. Fiat, et factum est, Ps. 33:9; 'He spake the word, and they were created,' Ps. 148:5. There is verbum annuntiatum, enuntiatum, and operativum. [1.] The substantial Word, which is Christ, ὁ λόγος, John 1:1; that excellent word, from whom every divine truth comes. Indeed, by this Word was the world created; but, Gen. 1:3, the Son is not meant. For that word was in time, but the Son is before all times. He is not a vocal word, formed by the tongue and air, but before any sound or air; the mental Word of his Father. Verbum, non sonus auribus strepens, sed imago mentibus innotescens.* That was the word of the three persons equally, whereas the Son is the Word of the Father only. [2.] The sounding or written word; but it is not likely that God did speak more humano, when he made the world. [3]. The operative word, which is the good pleasure and will of God. Ipsum Dei velle, gave omnibus esse.

He needed no helps, no instruments; we cannot build a house without tools, but there needed no tool, nor hand to the Omnipotent. His arm is not shortened with time, his word is still equally effectual. Dic verbum tantum, 'Say the word only,' Matt. 8:8, and my soul shall be made new again. He that created me when I was not, by his word, can as easily by the same word restore me, that have brought myself to worse than nothing. 'Say the word,' Lord, and my heart shall be turned from iniquity. 'Say the word,' and my body shall be repaired from death. Say, 'Let there be light,' and my inward darkness shall vanish, 2 Cor. 4:6. How penitent, humble, holy, should we all depart hence, that came in sinful, proud, profane, did God give but his fiat; for all things obey him. O that man, whom God made to command the creatures, and to obey himself, would not, by the defect of his obeying, lose the priviledge of his commanding! We that must necessarily yield to the word of his counsel, why do we not voluntarily yield to the word of his command? Thus easily did he make us, and quickly did we mar ourselves; our reparation cost him dearer, the blood and death of his only Son. We that owe him all we are for our creation, what shall we give him for our redemption?

(3.) The integrity and excellency of the work: the matter doth not more praise his power, than the form his wisdom. 'How manifold are thy works, in wisdom hast thou made them all,' Ps. 104:24. How admirable is the beauty, the order! What beauty in the work, what order in the working! If we can finish a slight and imperfect matter, and that by a former pattern, and that with much labour; it is the height of our skill. But to begin that which never was, whereof there was no example, whereto there was no inclination, wherein was no possibility of that which should be; this is proper only to the infinite power of an infinite Creator.

It pleased God to work this by degrees; at first he made nothing absolute, but heaven and earth in their rude and indisposed matter. As the cup and the cover, as in an egg the yolk and the white, as in a circle the centre and the circumference. 'The earth was without form, and void,' Gen. 1:2. Here was matter, but it wanted form; called tohu and bohu, emptiness and vacuity. Not that tohu was the materia prima, which the philosophers dreamt of; and bohu, forma nondum applicata. There was yet neither day nor light; but presently he made light and day. First, things that should have being without life, then those that should have being and life; then those that should have being, life, and reason. So we ourselves, in the ordinary course of generation, first live the life of vegetation, then of sense, of reason afterward. Such were the steps of God's proceeding; he that could have made all perfect in an instant, chose to do it by degrees. That which moved him to create, is reason enough why he did create thus; his own will. How vainly do men hope to be perfect at once! as if one instant could make thee an absolute Christian, whom many years have scarce made an absolute man. By degrees hath God made this world fit for us, and by degrees he will make us fit for the world to come.

(4.) The goodness; all that God made was good, himself much more good; they good in their kinds, Gen. 1:31, he good in himself. This goodness was the perfect state of the creature, made conformable to the mind of God. For it is not first good, and therefore approved of God; but because God approved it, therefore it was good. Some curiously have observed, that in the works of the second day, this approbation is omitted, 'God saw that it was good.' The Hebrews say, because Gehenna, hell, was that day made, and that day the angels fell. Jerome says, because two is the beginning of division; but this division was good, which reduced the creatures from confusion. Indeed, the work begun on the second day was finished in the third; but all were good, there flowing in the creation a goodness to every creature.

This goodness stands in three things. [1.] In the comeliness and beauty of the creature; a rare glory shining forth in the form and constitution of it. [2.] In the excellency of the virtue infused to it; as every one was made for some special end, so endued with special virtue to accomplish that end. [3.] In the harmony of their obedience to God, and the commodious and delightful benefit of them all to man; when no herb, no flower was wanting; whether for ornament or use, for sight, or scent, or taste. How pleasant have some gardens appeared, made by men; yet all the world cannot make one twig, one leaf, one spire of grass. How profitable for matter, how admirable for form, how delectable for use, must that be, made by God himself.

All were good indeed. Satan, as he is a devil; and sin, that came by his suggestion; and death, that came by sin; are none of God's works. What is evil is a nothing; mali nulla natura est, sed amissio boni accepit nomen mali. Mali essentia in eo posita est, quòd essentiam non habet.†* From God nothing but good. Ita confert bona, quòd non infert mala.‡ When we see any ataxy or deformity in the creatures, let us look back to the apostasy of our parents, and confess in the sorrow of our hearts, that our wretched sins have defiled heaven and earth, and drawn a curse upon the whole fabric of nature; whatsoever imperfection is in it, we, we have caused it. As a man lets a well furnished house to a careless and sluttish tenant, whose uncleanness defiles it. So in all the beauty of it, we read our Maker's goodness; in all the deformity of it, our own badness. Now, he that hath made all things good for us, make us also good for himself!

(5.) The time when the world was made: 'In the beginning.' He that is without beginning gave a beginning to time, and to the world in time. In time, with time, in the beginning of time. The exact computation whereof is set down by Moses and the prophets unto Christ, and we have it from Christ to the present day. This chronology God would have kept and observed. [1.] To confute the Egyptian atheism, which talks of a succession of their kings for seventy thousand years, and reckons, since they first learned astrology, a hundred thousand years. [2.] That the covenant of grace might be known, for the time of donation, renovation, and exhibition. 'When the fulness of time was come, God sent his Son,' Gal. 4:4. [3.] To shew that the world was not made for the eternal God, but for man. God dwelleth nowhere; we all dwell in him: non Dominus in domo, sed domus in Domino. If any object, that he 'made all things for himself,' Prov. 16:4, I answer, this is meant, for his glory, not for his necessity. [4.] That our hearts might not be set on the world, which hath an ending, but on him that hath no beginning. The house was made for man, not man for the house. But how did God employ himself before? Was he weary of doing nothing? To this bad question the Hebrews made as mad an answer: that he was making many little worlds, which he as suddenly destroyed as he created, because none pleased him till he came to this. Another answers, that he was making hell for such busy inquisitive fools. St Augustine truly, Nec cessando torpuit, nec operando laboravit he was neither idle nor weary; not more happy, but more known to be happy, by making it.

(6.) In what space was it made? In six distinct days. God could have made it in a moment; he would not. He took leisure, non ex necessitate, sed ex voluntate. Such was the creature's disability, that when God had prepared matter, it could not give itself form. As in the word and sacraments heavenly cheer is provided, yet the soul departs never the fatter, unless God give the appetite of faith. First, If the creatures had been produced all at once, they had not been so sensible of their own infirmity, as by the succession of their making. Eve had not been so welcome to Adam, had she been made at once with him.* Secondly, Ne increata viderentur,† one seeing another created gathers his own creation from it. Thirdly, To shew the Creator's liberty and power over the creatures; he that made light before the sun, was not beholden to the sun for light. Plants were made the third day; yet the sun and rain, which makes plants grow, not till afterward. God can cause herbs to grow without the operation of heaven, without heat, dews, or influence. Fourthly, To teach us a serious deliberation in all our undertaking. When perfection itself was content to take leisure, shall imperfection be rash and sudden? Precipitation in our works makes us unlike to God: heady fool, art thou wiser than thy Maker? The proverb tells us, 'Not too fast, we shall have done the sooner.' I am sure, Not too fast, and we shall have done the better. Fifthly, If all had been made in a moment, this had been too mystical for our apprehension; therefore he did use days and degrees, that our thoughts, after him, might move paces of admiration and of thanks. He made all in six days, and rested the seventh, that we might set the seventh day apart for their special meditation, after our own works done in the six. How long should we be in contemplating on that, which he was so long a-making?

Lastly, This commends his wonderful providence, that he prepared the table before he invited the guests: 'Come, for now all things are ready,' Luke 14:17. Yea, he made the house ready for the tenant, before he made the tenant that should have the house. He created beasts, but first he made herbs and grass to feed them. He created man, but not till all things were made fit to entertain and sustain him. By his providence, we that are born should not distrust to be kept; that provided whereby we should be kept, before we were born. He that purchaseth an inheritance for a son before he hath him, when he hath him will not disinherit him. God could have done all sooner, for he works not as the creatures do. Nature works by degrees, little by little, as the heavens mature things on earth: art helps nature, by watering, manuring, warming. Angels work more suddenly, they have wings for their speedy expedition. God works in an instant, by his fiat, 'said,' and 'done;' so Christ turned water into wine. But it is one thing what God can do by his greatness, another what he will do in his goodness.

(7.) The end why all is made is for the glory of the Maker. Not ex additamento, as if God would purchase a glory he had not before; sed communicativè, to manifest that glory to us, which was and is ever infinite. An excellent painter draws an exquisite piece; the exposing this to public view doth not improve his skill in himself, but make it known to others. The world could not make the Maker glorious, yet is it an occasion to make him appear glorious to his creatures. Thus he made all for his own glory and our use. They of the old world built an ark to save Noah, not themselves. Skilful workmen made the sanctum sanctorum, whereinto being finished they might never enter. The carpenter frames a house for one more honourable than himself. God did not so: the supreme end was his own glory; the inferior and dependent, our benefit and comfort. To dwell in it himself he made it not; to be honoured by them that dwell in it, so he made it. St Augustine would have three things declared: quis fecerit, who made the world? how? and why? If we demand, who? it is God; if how? by his word; if why? because he is good.* Nec enim est author excellentior Deo, nec ars efficacior verbo, nec causa melior bono. † Moreover, he would have four things marked: by the perpetuity of the creatures, intelligitur Creator æternus, we understand the Maker to be eternal; by the magnitude, omnipotens, almighty; by the order and disposition, sapiens, most wise; by the government and providence, bonus, most good. He that is good made all good, for our good, that we should be good and do good, to the glory of his goodness.

Duty 1. God must be glorified in all creatures, because he is the Maker of all creatures: 'Thou art worthy of honour and glory, for thou hast created all things,' Rev. 4:11. When we behold some rare piece of a skilful workman, we are not satisfied till we know his name, thinking it but just to give him due commendation. There is no place that presents not to our view the unspeakable wisdom and goodness of God in the creatures. Let us not stick in the fabric, but look up to the Architect, honouring him who for his honour made them. It is the argument of a dull and non-intelligent man, to see an excellent work without minding it; as negligent readers run over books, and never think of the author's art or the printer's. Non amat artifices, qui non intelligit artes. There is no greater disgrace to the statuary than for men to pass by a famous statue without casting eye upon it. Ubi mea legeris, me agnosce, was but a reasonable request.

'Consider the works of God,' Eccles. 7:13. He meant them not to be slighted; meditation is the means to give the Maker glory: 'The invisible things of God are understood by the visible,' Rom. 1:20. He that had no other book but this, shall be condemned at the last day for a non legit. Thus we may know God ad extra, by his effects; though non ad intra, in his essence: ex postero tergo, licet non ex antica facie. This is his general epistle to the world, whereby he reveals his power and goodness. Man's primer, wherein he that cannot read may spell almightiness. A glass that reflects upon us the beams of infiniteness. Seculum est speculum. A large theatre, wherein every creature is either an actor or a spectator; man is both. The ploughman's alphabet, the shepherd's calendar. Man is bound to it. (1.) Because he only hath understanding, a soul able to comtemplate, not only from the cedar to the hyssop, but even from the angel to the worm, that the same hand made both, nec superior in illis, nec inferior in istis. It is a lean and unblest understanding that is not thus exercised. (2.) Because he hath a special day appointed for this solemn business; that he should rest from his own works, and meditate on God's works. Not that common days are exempted: he that is grinding at the mill may study on that providence which ordained bread for man. But there is one day of seven distinctly separated, that this exercise may be distinctly performed. Qui Sabbatizavit à creando, docet nos Sabbatizare in meditando.

Duty 2. Let none of the Creator's glory be misplaced upon the creatures: 'We have nothing, but what we received.' Have we strength? we received it; wisdom? we received it; riches? we received them. We made not ourselves wise, strong, or rich; shall we glory in alieno, tanquam in proprio? Let not the 'strong, wise, or rich, glory in his strength, wisdom, or riches; but in this, that he knoweth the Lord,' Jer. 9:24; knows him to be strong, wise, and rich; strong in making, wise in forming, rich in furnishing the world. Nor is this caution appropriated only to those Jews adjudged to captivity; but as that in the hand of the angel was an 'everlasting gospel,' Rev. 14:6, so this in the mouth of the prophet, is an everlasting sermon. *Quædam specialiter pronuntiata, generaliter sapiunt.

But 'most men will proclaim their own goodness,' Prov. 20:6. Regum nobis induimus animos;† every one bears the mind of an emperor; few 'remember their Creator,' Eccles. 12:1. Pride is ever a confusion, of old Babel that was, of new Babel it shall be. The Maker is not afraid of his creature, when it comes in competition with him; such a fear belongs to mortal emulation. What cares the potter for the swelling of his pitcher, which he can break, as he did fashion, at his pleasure? Is wisdom honourable in men? Quam sapiens ille, qui sapientes facit, yea and 'confounds the wisdom of the wise.' Is power revered? Quam potens ille, qui potentes facit, yea and makes the potent become impotent. Have riches respect? How rich is he that gives all riches, and leaves himself never the less? So foolish are we to glory in these things, without trembling before him whose they are.

Why should we do, or speak, or think, but to the praise of our Maker? For what shall God reward thee, but for that whereby men glorify God in thee? A servant wrongs his noble master by a base carriage; yet he is but his master, not his maker. Oh, happy man, whose conscience witnesseth his actions directed wholly to the glory of his Creator; that knows himself bound to nothing else, because he was made for nothing else; whose tongue speaks his praise, whose hand works to his praise! In the last psalm, the Rabbins have found out thirteen Halleluiahs, answering those thirteen properties of God, Exod. 34:6, 7. So he begins, so he ends; every verse, every sentence hath his Halleluiah. After twelve comes a thirteenth, that when we have done, we may begin again with the praises of God. Here, because our life is short, we sing it in breves and semibreves; hereafter we shall sing it in longs, for ever. 'Lord, open thou our lips, and our mouth shall shew forth (not ours, but) thy praise.'

Duty 3. Let us humble ourselves with repentance, who have corrupted what he hath created. 'Prepare to meet thy God' in fear and humility, Amos 4:12, lest he set forth against thee in dreadful fury. Non facilius struere, quàm destruere: It is as easy to pull down as to build up; he that was so mighty in the one, is not less in the other. David saith, 'I am fearfully and wonderfully made,' Ps. 139:14. Many a one may say, I am fearfully and wonderfully destroyed. If we repent not of our corruption, God will repent of our creation; and woe to the man of whose making God shall shew himself sorry. Hence it comes, that we abuse the other creatures, because we forget ourselves to be creatures; and that is violated which was made for man, even by that man which was made for God. Durst we surfeit to the utmost stowage and capacity of our bottoms, if we knew ourselves accountable creatures, and accountable for the creatures?

Duty 4. Let us serve God with all, because he made all. The curious smith will not brook to have his files exercised upon stones; nor the mathematician lend his engines for wasters and bandies. There is no artist but would have the instruments he makes employed to their purpose. In the great workhouse of the world, or in the little shop of man, every instrument must be used to its own purpose. Let the tongue praise God; he made it for that purpose. As man is a little world in the great, so his tongue is a great world in the little: Grande bonum, or grande malum.* It is either the trumpet of God's praises, or Satan's loud ordnance of blasphemy. Let the heart praise God; he made it for that purpose. The tongue is the heart's messenger; so often as it speaks before the heart dictates, the messenger runs without his errand. He that will not speak idly, must think what he speaks; he that will not speak falsely, must speak what he thinks. When the heart maliceth, or the tongue dissembleth, were they made for this purpose? The knees and hands have also their offices; let no part of the body lag behind, no affection of the soul stray abroad; let us worship him withal, that made all for his worship. The Lord hath given us knees to bow, tongues to pray, hearts to love; we take these blessings, and bestow them upon his enemies. The potter may err in framing his vessel, and so in anger dash the unfadging clay against the walls. God could not err in our creation, and he is still working us to his service; if nothing will effect it, his will must be fulfilled in vengeance, whose word was not answered in obedience.

Duty 5. This corrects their sauciness, that seem to make themselves creators. Among the papists, the mass-priest takes upon him this power to make God. Almighty men, that can make their Maker; that whereas God by his word made them, they by their word can make God; he made them of nothing, they him of a piece of bread. What naturian ever thought or taught, that the pot did create the potter? Among us, God made all creatures; the rich patron thinks himself a maker too, and is ready to call a man his creature. His first gift plants him, his second waters him, third makes him grow; hic Deus nihil fecit: now he is his creature, as if God had done nothing for him, had nothing to do with him. This no man justifies in a direct line, but ex obliquo, some do in effect; imposing such works on their creatures as cannot stand with the honour of God. Sins are offices for the devil; while they so employ them, they use them worse than they do their beasts. If thy pride will thus insult over God's best creatures, the basest of all creatures, worms and fiends, shall insult over thee.

Comforts.—That God, who did manifest such power in our creation, will be no less glorious in our redemption and conservation. 'He doth not despise the work of his own hands,' Job 10:3; he hates nothing that he made; there is no man but favours the effect of his own worth. Let man understand, whether is greater, justos creare, or impios justificare;* to create righteous creatures, or to justify the unrighteous. Certainly, si æqualis sit utrumque potentiæ, hoc est majoris misericordiæ; if both be of equal might, this last is of greater mercy. The former was opus digiti, this opus brachii, that of his word operative, this of the Word incarnate. Yet he can open the eyes of the blind, that could make him eyes that had none, Isa. 42:6. He can raise a dead soul, that could make the soul which had no being. Thus he doth remember us of his power in the creation, to assure us of his grace in our redemption, though it be harder than to spread out the heavens, Isa. 45:18. Soon doth the potter, of pliable clay, frame a vessel to his mind; let it be once hardened and deformed, it is difficult to mend it. Therefore the terms of creation are used in describing the work of our redemption; as if it were as glorious to regenerate a man as to make a world, Eph. 2:10; 4:24. A clean heart is a rare blessing, it is created, Ps. 55:10. Peace in the heart is sweet, it is created, Isa. 57:19. From hence arose Paul's bold challenge and defiance to all his enemies, Rom. 8:35; Why? they are creatures, and cannot cross the resolved will of their Maker. Lord, thou didst make us when we were not, for thou art glorious; wilt thou save us that were lost, for thou art gracious?

MAKER OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.—I come to the creation in the particulars. By heaven and earth, Gen. 1, is understood the matter, and seed, where out all things were made; first created in the matter, after perfected into form, and last beautified with their ornaments; as trees and beasts in the earth, fishes in the sea, fowls in the air, stars in the sky. Here we understand not only heaven and earth themselves, but all the creatures which they contain in their distinct places. In this great machine, most fitly, most wisely are all the parts disposed. We know not whether more to praise the matter, the method, or the form. The head of this creation is heaven, and earth the footstool. Yet, as he that would ascend to the top of an house begins at the lowest stair, so though heaven be better, yet earth is nearer. I will therefore first consider the place where we are, then arise to the place where we would be.

The earth is the centre of the world, created firm, Eccl. 1:4, not to be shaken by any hands but the Maker's, when in his wrath he pleases to totter the foundations of it. This is the common sewer of all the world's corruption, the receptacle of all the lees and dregs of nature. Yet how admirable is it, both for that we see on it and we may find in it. Every lineament of her face yields many wonders; an innumerable variety of beasts, worms, herbs, flowers, seeds, plants, fruits, appear. What pile of grass is there wherein we may not read the finger of God? 'Let the earth bring forth grass,' &c. From which divines gather that the world was made in the spring, and that Christ was crucified the same day that Adam was created, that the first might be a type of the second. The first man could call the beasts by names agreeable to their natures. Now, what son of man doth know all the beasts either by name or nature? What herbalist can describe the virtue of every plant? Long industry hath found out something, but (as the greatest discoverer of the world) leaves more unknown behind. Strange are the treasures which the bowels of this earth hide from our eyes. Mines of metals, quarries of stone, that it is hard to say whether the back or the entrails be richer. These hath God laid up secretly and basely, that we should not over-search nor over-value them. The wealth they yield to our purses is far short of their observation to our minds. Our heart is too narrow to admire sufficiently that we tread upon, how much less comprehensive of our Maker? But if we shall subject our hearts to that which God hath subjected to our feet, we are a baser earth than that which carries us.

The sea is comprised under this title. That great deep, the womb of moisture, the huge pond of the world, wonderful in divers respects. 1. For situation, which Ambrose and Basil collect from the psalm (104:6), to be above the earth. 'Thou coveredst it with the deep, the waters stood above the mountains.' It is reported of an Egyptian king, and after him of Darius, that they would have cut the earth, and joined the Nile and the Red Sea together, but that they found it higher than the land by three cubits, and so ceased.* But indeed it is not so; and the Ptolemies effected that design without any danger of inundation. We see by experience the earth to be the heavier element, and so to have her foundation lowest. Yet cannot the sea overwhelm it, and this by (not miracle, but) ordinary providence, that hath so disposed it. The waters rage, foam, swell, as if they would swallow it up; yet the Lord shuts up this roaring element in a channel, like a barking cur in a kennel, wraps up this huge beast as a child in swaddling clouts, stays its rage by an insensible violence, and (in a wonder of nature) confineth his waves. 2. For motion. Why it moves forward, why it retires, is to us above all reason wonderful. He only that made it knows why he made it so; and by its ebbing and flowing keeps it from overflowing us, that so wrestling with itself we might live. 3. For the innumerable creatures in it Great whales, like living mountains, rolling up and down in those dreadful billows. Neither earth nor air can compare for wonders with the sea. Behemoth is short of the Leviathan. Yet hath the most wise God taught man to subdue this monstrous creature. Hell only hath a Leviathan more terrible than the sea. The same God teach us and help us to overcome him by our faith. Such uncountable numbers, strange shapes, various forms, and huge quantities be in the sea. that we know not whether to wonder more at the element itself or the creatures it contains. Ipsa se natura vincit numerosis modis.† 4. For the strange art of sailing on it. That there should be a plough to delve a passage through the unwieldy ocean, a saddle for the back of that unruly beast.

Thus have I made a brief circuit of the whole earth, a short cut over the vast sea. There is yet a shorter passage than this, which is by the contempt of them both, especially in regard of that which follows, which is HEAVEN.—This contains generally all that is above the earth. In this high and stately building be three stages, all called heaven—Aëreum, Sidereum, Empyræum. The first is the space from the earth to the firmament. So we read of the fowls of heaven, the windows of heaven. The next contains the sun and stars. The highest is invisible, that third heaven, 2 Cor. 12:2, the glorious place where Christ sits in his manhood, and whither all faithful souls are gathered. The lowest is for fowls, vapours, meteors; the next for stars and lights; the third for saints and angels. As in the division of Solomon's temple, three courts: the first is open for all; the second is the body of that illustrious house, wherein those radiant candles are continually burning; the uppermost is the holy of holies. In the first is mutability and trouble, in the next constancy and harmony, in the highest blessedness and glory. The first we feel, the second we see, the third we believe. In the two lower is no true felicity; neither the birds nor the stars are happy. Only the third heaven, celestial paradise, is the place of everlasting joy. Still the higher we go the more perfection we find. That which excels another in place, excels it also in honour—the visible firmament transcending the air, and the invisible yet more exceeding that. So let our holy thoughts, aspiring 'from one stair to another, attain at last to the top of Jacob's ladder, that empyreal heaven, the glorious seat of Christ.

First, let us pass through the meanest region of heaven, and nearest to our senses, the air. Even here we find cause of admiration and praise. What variety of fowls fly up and down this heaven with their lighter wings, of numberless shapes and colours: some preying upon others, some playing among themselves, all seeking their meat of God, who 'feeds the young ravens when they call upon him.' How can we be mute when we hear the little birds every morning carol the praises of their Maker? Here we feel the subtle winds, now puffing from the east, then from the west, purging the air, as the lungs fan coolness upon the heart. These we hear whistle among the leaves, we perceive moving clouds and ships, we see not their substances, we know not their causes. These the Maker useth as particular crosses to some, but general blessings to all.

Here be the clouds, big-bellied with a burden heavier than themselves. These are driven with a violent agitation of the winds, yet hang and hold their load till a high hand crush them. How they are supported, why they should be delivered in this place, not in that, now, not then, what naturalist could ever prescribe? Yea, that these watery sponges should be turned into furnaces, venting their sudden fires on all sides, and amazing the world with the dreadful noise of their thunders, the vapour making an eruption through the cloud, sending forth flashes that reach the eye before the roaring of the breach invades the ear, as the fire from the cannon is discerned before the report. Thus from the midst of water doth God fetch fire, and hard stones from thin vapours. How wondrous would these things be if they were not common? This heaven contains also those meteors, blazing comets, falling stars, letters and characters of such strange variety, whereout, though we cannot read the Creator's meaning, we may read his power, and tremble to sin against him. Often we behold gulfs and gapings in the sky, bright circles, flashings in the heavens, fires darted up and down, matter for our admiration rather than examination. Natural causes be given by rational men; but let us look higher, to the wisdom and mightiness of an infinite God. All of these in their kinds praise the Lord, 'Fire and snow. storm and tempest, fulfilling his word,' Ps. 148:8. Let not us forget him.

The next heaven we consider by its height, hugeness, glory. For its height: the Hebrews, by drawing this ascending line forwards on a plain, have found it to be five hundred years' journey to the starry sky; Aratus will have it but of thirty days. Curious calculators, how are they troubled to deceive themselves; the one making it too little, the other too much! But such is the height, that it is a wonder our eye should reach the celsitude of it, and not be tired in the way. Let it teach us, how easily our immortal souls can go further, when our eye, fixed in a mortal head, can extend so far. Now if so high, how large? Art teaching that the orbicular compass must be proportionable to the height. How huge a curtain hath the Maker drawn about this little point, the earth! We think this island spacious, yet it is not so much to the whole earth, as an inch to an acre; the earth huge, yet were we in the starry heaven with these corporeal eyes, the whole earth would seem less to us there, than one star of that doth appear to us here. Yea, not many stars are so little as it, and yet what ample spaces be there void of stars! How small a thing is man to the earth, earth to the sun, the sun to the heaven; man, earth, sun, heaven, and all to the Lord! The glory of it graceth both height and magnitude: how delectable are the utmost walls, the ceiling and roof of this world! How embroidered a canopy hath God drawn over the head of man! Lights to which precious stones, in their brightest lustres, are but clouds. What is exposed to our view, is admirable; how much more that we cannot see, which God hath charged us to believe, that we may enjoy. If the outside of the royal palace be so magnificent, if the hall appear so rare, what ornaments are in the presence and inner chamber of the King? By that we see without, we are taught to admire and desire the treasures and pleasures within.

Thus high are our thoughts raised: conceiving ourselves first to have passed an earthy and watery voyage, observing the wonders of God by sea and land; then, through the threefold region, seen the bottles and spouts of rain, felt the snows and hail, heard the rattling of the thunder, opened the caves of lightning, perused the meteors, visited the outgoings of the morning and evening, ascended to the stars, and conversed with those fixed and yet moved fires; now, before we mount higher, I interpose this short meditation.

There be not two worlds; God made but one world: this present, and that to come, are but divers parts of one and the same world. This is the morning, that the high noon; this the inn, that the home; this the gallery, that the bed-chamber. That is called future, because of our permutation; differing like infancy and perfect stature. Travellers called the undiscovered parts of America novum orbem, the new world, because it was new to them. So St Peter calls that a new heaven and new earth, because the earth shall be renewed, and heaven is new to us at our arrival thither. Whithersoever sin could extend, corruption would not be kept back; like an unhappy brood, it would follow the dam. There is nothing but labour and vanity under the sun: this is a fair house, but the tenant hath infected it; therefore he is as sure to be cast out, as ever he came in. Only the landlord's mercy lets him enjoy it for a time, that he may provide himself of another. Lo, there is a better to be had; mansions, not pavilions, purchased by Christ of his Father. He that can make ready his fine and his rent, which is faith and a good conscience, shall be instated in a perpetuity, domus æternitatis, an inheritance never to be lost.

This is higher than the dwelling of the sun and stars; even the receptacle of the glorified spirits, the court royal of the blessed Trinity, Such is the privilege of God's children, that here by faith they see him that is invisible, and enjoy him that is immense; and so begin that heaven, which the clear vision and unchangeable fruition shall consummate in the heaven of heavens. Proportionable are God's works to himself; magnum magna decent. Kings do not build cottages, but magnify their royalty in sumptuous palaces; how glorious is that which the King of glory hath built for himself! If the lower side of that pavement, which the feet of the saints shall walk upon in heaven, be so glorious a ceiling to us on earth, that no art of man, or riches of the world, can sample it, what be the parlours and chambers unseen? If the sun, the light of the world, be of such majesty, what is the brightness and glory of its Maker? If but some other of the stars were let down as low as the sun, they would all appear like suns to us, which now we only wonder at in their distance. If such a firmament be adorned, such an earth prepared, for the use and benefit of God's enemies, how happy shall those eternal mansions be, ordained for his friends! It is the feeling of his gracious presence, that makes a heaven on earth. It is the manifestation of his glorious presence that makes a heaven in heaven. Lord, thou didst make the sun and stars for us, not us for them; them for our temporary use, not everlasting society. Raise us up as far above them, now in desire, hereafter in place, as they are yet above us; that when the sun shall be darkened, and the moon turned to blood, and the elements melt with heat, we may enjoy that light which shall never be put out!

In this heaven be the sun, moon, and stars, those radiant beauties of it. These were not made on several days, according to the dream of Eugubinus, but all on the fourth; nor in succession, as Basil thought, but all at once. The sun and moon are called the 'great lights,' Gen. 1:16; not according to the Jewish fancy, that they were both made of equal light in the beginning, and that the moon, envying the light of the sun, was brought into subjection, and made recipient of her light from him; and of the beams, whereof the moon was deprived, God made the lesser stars. But the sun is a great celestial body, found by mathematicians to exceed the earth one hundred and sixty-six times in bigness; whereas the stars of the first magnitude (whereof they reckon but fifteen) exceed it but eighteen times. Reason satisfies us of the sun's great quantity; both because when it ariseth, all the stars are hid, the less lights giving place to the greater. And if it were not of such quantity, how could the whole earth be enlightened by it? Lastly, because it appears of like quantity to all throughout the world; it is not greater to us, and less to the Indians. Whereas herds of cattle afar off, shew like ants; and a ship may be discovered so far on the sea, till it appear no bigger than a dove.

The other great light is the moon; which the Stoics held bigger than the earth; Parmenides, equal to the sun; others, next to the sun; but mathematicians find it less than the earth thirty-nine times, and the least of all the stars but Mercury. Moses calls it a great light, according to the vulgar capacity, because it is nearest of all stars to the earth, greatest in operation, and governess of the night. Of the other fixed stars, and wandering planets, there be four ends or uses. 1. To distinguish day and night. 2. For signs of weather, especially when natural causes have begun to work; as in the evening to presage the morning temperature; but not to prognosticate things to come: that use would be hissed out of almanacs. 3. To serve for signs and seasons. 4. To give influence, by their heat and motion, to these inferior parts. But to calculate nativities, to ground predictions, to find things lost; to make stars alias beneficas, alias maleficas, whereas God made all good; this study is for them, who, so they may know something of heaven while they live, are content to take another place when they die. Let not us be ambitious to know, what we cannot learn, our destiny in the stars; but to learn what we may know, our names written in the book of life.

The heaven itself were but a formless and confused creature, without light: this is the soul of the body, the beauty of all those beauties of the world. But if God made the light, was he not before in darkness? No; he needs no created light, that is himself a light uncreated; no corporal light, that is a spiritual one. God is light, and in him is no darkness. He made this light for our mortal journey on earth; himself is the light of our immortal abode in heaven. But if God made the light, who made darkness? Darkness is nothing, but only the absence of light, as nakedness the want of clothing, and silence the cessation of noise. God did not dwell in this light that he made; no more than when it is said, 'The Spirit moved upon the waters,' the waters were the habitation of the Spirit; but he so moved on the creature, as the workman upon the matter which he is about to fashion; the sun is carried about the earth, yet is not the earth the habitation of the sun. Now if one glimpse of this created light give so beautiful a lustre to all God's workmanship, how incomprehensibly glorious is that in himself? This the very beasts can behold, that not the very angels. This shines to the basest part of the creation, that only to the supreme world of blessedness.

The light was made the first day, the sun not till the fourth, Gen. 1:5. How could there be a distinction of days without the sun? Answer. There was a division of day and night before, but a more exact division afterward. What this former light was there may be many opinions. Some take it not for a natural, but a spiritual, light;* but not truly; for it made a visible difference betwixt day and night. Some for the element of fire; but this light was moveable, whereas the elements are universally dispersed. If man had then been made, he had seen all lightsome, yet not seen from whence it came. As in a great pond we see the banks filled, we see not the springs from whence that water ariseth. He that made the sun made the light without the sun, before the sun, that we might not ascribe it to the sun. The light depends on the Creator, not on the creature. What light it was, where placed, how it moved, how long it continued, are fruitless examinations. This observe we: God's power is not limited to means; it was easy for him to make a heaven without a sun, light without a heaven, day without a sun, time without a day. Let us allow him to be Lord of his own works. Never distrust we that God in the want of means, who can either give them, or save us without them. Whatsoever we command, and want God, our poverty is miserable. Whatsoever we want, and have God, our riches are comfortable. As it was before man was made, so shall it be after he is dissolved: 'The sun shall be no more our light by day, nor the moon by night; but the Lord shall be our everlasting light,' Isa. 60:19, 20. One day again we shall have light without the sun, Ps. 84:11. Here we sometimes darken him to ourselves, but in heaven there is no eclipse. The created sun and light are for a world inferior to themselves. God's light is only for above. He that gave this light to the sun, which the sun gives to the world, what light hath he prepared for the heavens? Here he made a sun for us, there he will make us 'like suns,' Matt. 17:2. The sun shall be 'seven times' more 'glorious' than it is now, Isa. 30:26, and we seven times more glorious than it is then.

This light, thus dispersed for three days through the whole heavens, was the fourth day gathered and united to the body of the sun, that receptacle which God had ordained for it. The heaven was instead of a sun till the sun was made. Then it pleased the Maker's wisdom that one star should be the treasury of light to heaven and earth. He made one proper centre for all things of one kind, unto which he reduceth them. Light things mount upward, heavy substances have a natural propension downward. As the waters were gathered into one sea, so the light was called into the compass of one sun. So shall all his chosen be congregated to one glory. Our souls and bodies are made to come to him, why should our desires be scattered from him? Why do we not settle our affections upon his Christ, and shew ourselves to be of the communion of saints? The light of God is now dispersed into innumerable souls. It shall one day all be reconciled in himself. We are but as the heavens in their first imperfection, till we attain that centre, and be locally assembled to the presence of Christ.

Continual light would have seemed tedious to man, therefore God interchanged it with darkness. He could have made it perpetual; he would not, that it might be more grateful. There is nothing but God himself, whereof man would not be weary. The manna was that sweet relish to every palate which the palate desired, yet was Israel satiate with it. Even the things which we most affect cloy us with the continuance. Therefore God made such change of creatures to answer the desires of man, for whom he made them. God delights in constancy, we in change. There is no variety in that which is perfect, for there is but one perfection. The more uniform the more perfect. Yet so pleasing is the vicissitude of things, that the less worthy give us more content in their intercourse than better to in their perpetuities. To walk or sit or lie continually seems a pain not tolerable. We are sick with lying, therefore rise; sick with working, therefore rest. So the day dies into night, the morning is a resurrection. Darkness keeps her turn, that light may be more welcome. There is no constant and unalterable fortune in this world, all hang together by successions. Above it shall be day for ever. The night is only for mortality, it is eternal day in heaven. Yet let us strive, in some measure of resemblance, to be here as we shall be there. Let us dispel the clouds that darken our internal light, that our souls may have a continual day. If any fog be gathered in our lives, any mist arise in our consciences, let us labour, like the moon under an eclipse, to get out, abhorring the interposition of lusts between the light of our salvation and our souls. Let us walk in the light of this day till we come to the day of that light.

The 'third heaven.' How excellent is this world which our meditations have passed through, ourselves dwell in! Yet how miserable in regard o our home. How is it beyond the tongue or thought of man to declare or conceive. 'No eye hath seen, nor ear heard,' &c., 1 Cor. 2:9. Some have untruly gathered from 2 Cor. 5:1, that this heaven is eternal, never created; but though it were 'made without hands,' yet it was 'made;' and the apostle calls it eternal, not because it had no beginning, but because it shall have no ending. 'Whose builder and maker is God,' Heb. 11:10. Therefore it was made. Nor is it to purpose to say, It hath always been the place of the eternal God, therefore it is an eternal place; for the 'heaven of heavens cannot contain him,' 1 Kings 8:27. He may there give a fuller remonstrance of his majesty, but it cannot comprehend his majesty. Others demand where this heaven is, and some have thought it to be everywhere; but then hell itself should be in heaven. It is above these visible heavens. 'Christ ascended far above all heavens,' Eph. 4:10. Others yet question why God created this third heaven, seeing his gracious presence makes every place a heaven. Answer. So it pleased him to ordain a certain place for the manifestation of his glory to the elect angels and men. This is called by Christ 'his Father's house,' and the 'kingdom of heaven,' where God is king, and ruleth all in perfect glory. It is a place our souls cannot yet comprehend, may it one day comprehend our souls.

1. This discovers the general folly of the world. Men curiously seek to keep their footing in this mortal and barren turf, without assuring themselves of that heaven which is a thousand times more glorious than the firmament. Suppose a man hath two houses, one a torn cottage, open to wind and weather, the other a princely palace, impregnable for strength, unmatched for beauty; the former by tenure at another's will, the other by inheritance. If he shall bestow all his care and provision in hightening and dressing the uncertain and beggarly shed, leaving the other unregarded, is he not mad? God hath provided for us two houses, the one of 'clay, whose foundation is in the dust,' Job 4:19, the other of gold and precious stones, 'sapphires and chrysolites,' Rev. 19. Yet what labour and cost is there to patch up the ruins of this homely cabin, with what price do we buy a little physic to rectify it? Yet will scarce be at the small necessary charges of the other. Not break a sleep, nor fast a meal, nor part with a superfluity of our substance, for an eternal mansion in heaven. How much gold will the rich worldling give to save his life? How small a cost doth he think sufficient for his soul? He will forbear a dish that he loves, upon the physician's warning, for the one; he will scarce forbear a sin, upon God's warning, to save the other. Fond man! this house shall be taken from thee; the sun shall not shine to thine eyes; those holes shall be filled with darkness; then prepare thyself for that other, which before the world was prepared for thee. Break off thy sins by repentance, hate the vice that may stop thy passage to bliss. Flatter not thyself with a treasure of conversion in thy own hands; but seek the Lord while he may be found, lest when thou wouldest find him, he be then to seek.

2. Be content with thy condition here, be it poverty, or sickness, or disturbance; there is a third heaven shall make amends for all. How valiantly did Paul undergo his burden, encouraged with this consideration! 'I look not to the visible things, that are temporal, but to the invisible, that are eternal,' 2 Cor. 4:18. O the different departures of the reprobate and Christian! The one dies howling, the other rejoicing; the one knows he changeth for the better; the other mistrusts, for the worse; to the one death is a gulf of sorrow, to the other a port of liberty; he, because he is stripped for a scourging; this, because he lays off his clothes, after his toil, to go to bed. Little cared Abraham to change his dwelling so often, that knew a country provided for him to dwell in for ever. Queen Elizabeth, being a prisoner in her sister's days, wished herself a milkmaid for freedom: but had she then foreseen her own future fortunes, so long, so prosperous, so glorious and blessed a reign over this kingdom, she would not have admitted that thought. All our loathness to depart, and fears in departing, arise from our own unsettledness; we have not made sure to ourselves a dwelling in these glorious heavens; many mansions there be, John 14:2, we have not provided ourselves one. Did we truly value it, above all cities, crowns, kingdoms, pleasures, inheritances, comforts, how could we but set our hearts upon it, or rather upon him that bought it for us, and us for it! We would then say with David, 'Woe is me that I must remain in Meshek;' with Simeon, 'Now let thy servant depart;' with Elias, 'I am weary of my life;' an end, good Lord. We would be far from lingering and hankering after this Baca of tears, and wilderness of fears, were we sure that this removal should dry our eyes, and end all our labours.

'Our light momentary affliction worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory,' 2 Cor. 4:17. A superlative, transcendent phrase, not to be found in any heathen rhetoric, because they never wrote of such a theme, nor with such a spirit. What is here in the world but vexation? for a minute of peace, months of trouble; for a dram of honey, pounds of gall and aloes; our souls, like Noah, find no resting for the soles of their feet, till they come to this mount Ararat; whither their works follow them, where their sorrows leave them.

Believing and remembering this, why should we either so mourn for our departed friends, or fear for our departing selves? Jacob thought some evil beast had devoured Joseph, while Joseph was alive, and triumphing in Egypt. Those saints are not lost, but gone before us to the joys of this heaven: they may præire, not perire. Let us long to be with them, more than scholars do for holidays, apprentices for freedom, spouses for marriage, labourers for their wages, husbandmen for harvest, heirs for their inheritance, or princes for their kingdoms. I could wish to hold your thoughts longer in this blessed court; whither, you are not so unkind to yourselves, as not to wish your own arrival. But it is only the Spirit of God that can imprint these patterns in our hearts; that at all times we may remember them, especially in that great and solemn day of our death, when Satan will be busiest, and ourselves weakest. O then let us think of these unspeakable comforts; how our souls leave a broken and ruinous cage, the keeper unlocking the door; with what vivacity they shall pass through the lower regions of the air, pierce the clouds, go by the moon, sun, and stars, transcend the firmament, and those higher orbs, cheerfully mounting up to the glorious gates of eternal light and life, be welcomed by saints and angels to the court of blessedness, and possessed of those delights which know neither measure nor end.

THE CREATION OF MAN.—The world is a great man, and man is a little world. Quantillum dominum posuit Deus in tantum dominium? a little lord over a great lordship. I will discourse of him first in general, then of his special parts. Hominem, ad hominem, de homine loquentem, doceat factor hominum. The points be six. 1. The preparation to his facture. 2. The model or form. 3. The time. 4. The place. 5. His dignity. 6. His society.

1. The preparation to his making; 'Let us make man,' Gen. 1:26. Other creatures were made by a simple fiat; man not without a divine consultation of the blessed Trinity; not for the difficulty, but dignity of the work; it was not more painful, but more noble. Here was something to be produced on the sixth day, better than all the visible works of the former. The rest were made at once, man was first formed, and then inspired; as God did seem to be deliberate in the purposing, so he used degrees in the making. The painter will be studious about that which he means to make his masterpiece. This was to be the crown of God's works on earth, as the angels are in heaven.

2. The form after which man was made is the image of his Maker. Other creatures are made in several shapes, like to none but themselves: man after the image of God. He that made all things would have something somewhat to resemble himself. Wherein consists this image? First, Eugubinus thought that God did take a human shape when he made man, but that could not be his image if he had assumed it; this was the error of the anthropomorphites. Secondly, Some say, 'after the image of God;' because like that nature which Christ was to assume; but Christ took our likeness, not we his. Thirdly, Some understand it for the soul's immortality; Damascene, for the free will; Chrysostom, for dominion over the creatures. Fourthly, Others, because as all things are originally in God, so by participation in man; he partakes with the stones in being, with the plants in growing, with the beasts in moving, with the angels in understanding. And as God is the principal end of all things, so man the secondary and subordinate, for whose use they were made. And, as all things had their being from God, so all men had their beginning from Adam. St Augustine hath seven several conceits, which I mention not. The most, with the master of the sentences, think this image to consist in reason and understanding; save that some also add charity. These be the conceits of men.

God teacheth us otherwise; expressly, that this image consists 'in knowledge, holiness, and righteousness,' Eph. 4:24, Col. 3:10. First, Such as is the image of God renewed, such was it created; but it is renewed in these; therefore secondly, if this image were in the substance of the soul, wicked men and spirits had the image of God: for the substance of spirit and soul is in them still. Thirdly, Deus non damnat imaginem suam;* God doth not destroy his own image; but the soul of the reprobate is damned. That image of God wherein we were created, is not condemned but crowned; but only the righteousness of the soul is crowned. Fourthly, that image of God which man received in his creation, he utterly lost by his transgression, otherwise it needed no renewing. But the substance of the soul, with the natural faculties, was not lost, † therefore this image could not consist in that. The whole man in his inward and outward part inveteravit; the inward is now renewed by regeneration, the outward shall be restored by the resurrection. Now there needed no repairing, if there had been no impairing, nor decay; nec restitutio sequeretur, nisi destitutio præcesserat. Fifthly, that image which is naturally begotten is not God's; it is absurd to think that image propagated; as 'Adam begat a son, in his own likeness, after his image,' Gen. 5:3. Therefore this image was not in man's substance, but in his knowledge and conformity to the will of God.

God is alone, after his own singular manner, simple, infinite, glorious. It is impossible that any creature should be like him in his proper being, because it is a creature. What is finite to infinite, mixed to simple, weak to omnipotent? There can be no perfect resemblance of God; yet of all visible creatures man comes nearest to it. Most creatures are all body, angels are all spirit, man is body and spirit. Nor yet is this correspondence in his natural faculties, but in his divine graces. Wisdom and holiness was the first copy from which they were drawn. So long as we were wise and good we were like to God. We made ourselves sinners, and sin made us fools. In our creation we were like God, by transgression we became unlike ourselves. While we now commend man, we praise him to his shame. He that magnifies the ruins of Zion never saw her in her perfect beauty. The honour of man as he is, is a disgrace to what he was; the better we were, we are the worse, as the sons of some lavish or tainted ancestors tell of the lands and lordships that once were theirs, or as blind Samson should talk of his former valour. Yet how hath God's goodness overcome our badness, sending the image of his own person to restore us the image of our creation! O, let the readiness of our desires be answerable to the graciousness of his mercies, seeking to redeem what we have lost, to recover in Christ what we have lost in ourselves. If our damage turn not to our benefit, the second fault is ours. We may be better in the second Adam than ever we were in the first, stand surer in grace than we did in nature, if our faith be as strong now as our condition was flexible then.

3. The time of man's creation, the sixth day. The stage being fully prepared, man was brought upon it, as an actor and spectator: an actor, that he might not be idle; a spectator, that he might not be discontent. Earth is made ready for his use, heaven for his contemplation. He saw the heaven a glorious place, but far off. See it he might, not reach it; God will therefore make him a little heaven upon earth, fit him with a paradise at home. If he had been ordained immediately for heaven, as were the angels, what needed a body? If appointed to live always on the earth with beasts, what needed a soul? If he had not been to dwell a while upon the earth, his body had been superfluous; if to dwell ever there, his soul had not been so happy. Therefore, as God ordained a heaven for his soul, so an image of heaven for his body. He was enabled both to contemplate and to do. If only to contemplate, some vast wilderness or barren mount might have served. But he that gave him a heart to meditate gave him also business to do; hands fit to work, and work fit for his hands.

He was created in a perfect age, his body being fit for generation, as it appears by the charge following his facture, 'Increase and multiply;' and immediately after his fall was Cain begotten. Some think he was made about the years that Christ died, but it is most likely rather when the patriarchs were fit to generate, about sixty-five, for under those years none of them begat children, Gen. 5:12. So adding sixty and five to nine hundred and thirty, Adam will appear to have lived longer than Methuselah or any of the patriarchs. But that he was a giant, able to wade over the ocean, this is a Jewish fancy. The sight of his eyes and reason of his soul were perfect at once, and the objects which both apprehended gave him cause to apprehend himself blessed. If we could now conceive in meditation what he then perceived in fruition! When he first opened his eyes he saw a glorious heaven above him, a steady and pleasant earth under him, serviceable creatures about him, a perfect understanding and peaceable conscience within him, a glorious God before him; and he knew as well what all these things meant as if he had been long acquainted with them. Thus when God had made the great house of this world and furnished it, then he brought in the tenant to possess it. An empty palace is a fair gift of a king to his subject, though he be not at the charges to adorn and supply every room with answerable furniture; the bare wall had been too good for us. But he that measures his gift by his own goodness, so beautified this world for man, whom, above the world, he beautified for himself.

4. The place where he was made and set to dwell was paradise; as if the common earth had not been good enough for him, but a garden. The whole earth was excellent, this was the best part of it. This place was for pleasure, for labour, for instruction, to delight him, to exercise him, to teach him.

(1.) For pleasure. Such was the Maker's bounty, not only extending to life, but to the happiness of life. Every part of earth would yield fruits enough for Adam's sustentation, this shall also for his delectation. He that made all things good, did also provide that they might be well; their solace was his care, so well as their being. Not only competency, but abundance, may stand with innocence. That vita vitalis requires a confluence of many good things. They are too rigid and austere that forbid lawful delights. Let no teacher make the way to heaven more thorny than God himself made it and meant it. Those idolaters cut and mangle their own flesh in their sacrifice. But for whom was this service? Not for God, but for Baal. I cannot believe that God will ever give a papist thanks for whipping himself. Our lawful pleasures are his pleasures, and our (unbidden) wrongings of our own selves are his injuries. That is a superstitious worship which makes the worshippers miserable. God delights not in our blood, but when the witness of his glory calls for it. The world hath ways enough to vex us; we need not be our own tormentors. It is no credit to a man's holiness that he condemns all recreation. Let me look to please God, and then know that he hath made the world to serve me. Men may eat and drink even to honest delight, so withal they worship the giver, Ps. 22:29, and do not like Esau, who 'did eat and drink, and rose up, and went his way,' Gen. 25:34, never minding the author; no grace, but full, rose up, went his way.

(2.) For labour. Paradise was not only to delight his senses, but also to exercise his hands; as bees love to be in gardens, yet must there work out their honey. In every pleasure there is some labour; the hunter's sport doth oft bring him home weary. All Adam's delights could not make him happy had his life been lazy. The state of innocence did not except him from diligence. Idleness might not be tolerated either by the perfection of his nature or command over the creatures. After his fall labour was inflicted as a punishment; before his fall it was not dispensed with as inconvenient. How many sons of Adam still take delight in dressing gardens and planting nurseries? He is, therefore, no sooner made than set to work. Before he sinned his labour was without necessity, without pains without weariness; if there be now sorrow in it, we may thank sin for it. In paradise all things laboured for man, now man must labour for all things. Adam did work because he was happy; we, his children, must work that we may be happy. Heaven is for joys, hell for pains, earth for labour. The first whole day that ever man spent was a holy day, the six following were work days. Let us labour that we may rest; the more cheerfully we go about our lawful business the nearer we come to our paradise. Christianity is a vocation, not a vacation: 'Work out your salvation with fear and trembling,' Phil. 2:12. 'Work:' this is agere, to do; 'work out,' be instant, constant in it: this sat agere, to do sufficient; 'your salvation,' keep the right course: this is hoc agere, to do the best. Our labours end with our lives, our rewards end not with our labours.

(3.) For instruction. God did teach man's heart by that he did exercise his hands. There were two principal trees in the garden, the tree of life and the tree of knowledge. Other trees had a natural use, these a spiritual; they were Adam's sacraments.

The 'tree of life;' not because it was able to give immortality, or to preserve from death till man was translated to immortality. Some schoolmen* hold that it had a power to preserve from death by a natural faculty; Bonaventura, by a supernatural faculty. But, indeed, by eating its fruit it could do neither; no food that is corruptible can make the body incorruptible, for neither the fruit could nourish without its own corruption, nor maintain life without nourishment. If man had not sinned he had not died; but for this immortality he was beholden to his creation, not to the tree. And without sin he had lived; eat what fruit he would, saving only one. It is called the tree of life, not effectivè, but significativè;* not for operation, but signification; being a figure of that true immortality which man should have enjoyed from God, continuing in his obedience. So the Scripture expounds it, symbolically, Prov. 3:18; Rev. 2:7. This was one sacrament, to assure Adam continuance of happiness, upon his perseverance in holiness. Albeit God, that ordained the end, immortality of life, did not appoint this fruit the effectual means of that life; yet certainly it served to nourish the soul, by a lively representation of that tree whose fruit is eternal life.

The 'tree of knowledge;' not because it gave knowledge speculative, but experimental. For if it had bettered their knowledge it had been their gain, not their loss. But it was another sacrament; to shew man that, if he transgressed God's commandment, he should die, and so come to an experimental knowledge of good and evil. Life is the act of the soul, knowledge is the life of the soul: the tree of knowledge, and the tree of life, were ordained as earthly helps of the spiritual part. The one was for confirmation, the other was for probation or trial; the one shewed him what life he should have, the other what knowledge he should not wish to have. But when he had tasted of the tree of knowledge, he might not taste of the tree of life: that immortal food was not for a mortal stomach. God gave him the one, and forbade the other; now qui arripuit prohibitam, amisit concessam: by taking that was prohibited, he lost that was allowed. Yet he that drove him from the visible tree promised him that invisible tree, whereof the other was a symbol or sacrament, Christ. So now at once he perceives his own death by the sense of reason, and apprehends his future life by the eye of faith.

All our tastes are too much seasoned with the forbidden fruit, nitimur in vetitum, cupimusque negata. There is a tree of life, let us hunger after that. None but repentant sinners can relish it: let us repent that we have eaten, believe that we may eat, and eat that we may live for ever. Adam in that visible tree saw his Saviour, ere he had need of a Saviour; he saw the means of a heavenly life, before he had lost the earthly. We have a clearer evidence, why then have we not a stronger faith? The tree of life was nailed to the tree of death, that we who fell by the tree of death might come to the tree of life. When we contemplate that paradise wherein man was created, we conceive it a place of such joy, that our thoughts want place to apprehend it. Yet that paradise, to which man is predestinated and redeemed, doth more exceed that than that exceeded a barren desert. Let others vainly trouble their wits to seek that paradise which is lost; let us set our hearts to seek that paradise which may be found. When Adam had sinned, that earthly paradise was shut; when Christ had died, this heavenly paradise was set open. From thence we were cast out in Adam, hither we are admitted in Christ. He that took that from us in justice, promised this to us in mercy. That could contain but a few, this hath room enough for us all. We made ourselves unfit for that by sinning; the Lord make us fit for this other by believing!

5. The dignity of man; 'Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour,' Ps. 8:5. Paulo inferiorem angelis, multo superiorem reliquis. First, He had a sweet communion with God, his soul and body being a sanctuary for his Creator; many familiar passages and conferences interceding between them. It was sin that caused Adam to hide himself; fear follows guilt, and sin is the mother of shame. But some sparks of divinity appearing in Christ, Peter cries, Recede; 'Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord,' Luke 5:8. How pleasant is the tranquillity of soul arising from the assurance of pardon! How inconceivable was that delight when the soul needed no pardon! Then, such was the wondrous beauty of his body, such a majesty resulting from his face, that it struck a reverence and awe into all the creatures: 'The dread of you shall be upon all things, for into your hand they are delivered,' Gen. 9:2; so that they neither durst nor could rebel against man. While he served his Creator, he was feared of every creature.

More than this, he had a patent of dominion over them, Gen. 1:26. He that made man and all the rest, præposuit, set man over all the rest. To witness this subjection, they present themselves before him as their lawful king. Some have conceited Adam sitting in some high and eminent place as in a chair of state, his face shining brighter than Moses's, and every beast coming as he was called, and bowing the head as he passed by, being not able to behold his majesty. But certainly, by a secret instinct from God, they were gathered to Adam, 'he brought them,' Gen. 2:19. Wherein he might admire his Maker's bounty, behold his own excellency, exercise his own authority, and, lastly, shew his wisdom;—

Which was great. (1.) In natural things, for the name was given according to the nature; therefore he understood at first the propriety of every creature. But it is objected that 'Solomon was wiser than all men; none like him before, none arose like him after,' 1 Kings 3:12. And he understood the nature of plants, beasts, fowls, and fishes; of 'everything,' chap. 4:33. Tostatus doth prefer Solomon before Adam for wisdom. Answer: This is spoken of the common generation of men, excepting both the first Adam and the second: the former being created without sin, the other born without sin. So that until Christ, certainly Adam was the wisest man. (2.) In supernatural things; he was not ignorant of the mystery of the Trinity, in whose image he was made. (3.) In future things; he had some knowledge of Christ to come, though not yet as a Redeemer, yet perhaps as the author and fountain of life, whereof that tree was a symbol. Of the fall of angels I know not whether he had knowledge; because Eve was without suspicion, who else would have been cautelous of such a conference.

Thus God gave the nature to his creatures, Adam must give the name; to shew they were made for him, they shall be what he will unto him. If Adam had only called them by the names which God imposed, this had been the praise of his memory; but now to denominate them himself, was the approval of his judgment. At the first sight he perceived their dispositions, and so named them as God had made them. He at first saw all their insides, we his posterity ever since, with all our experience, can see but their skins. Therefore are they presented to their new lord, to do their first homage, and to acknowledge their tenure. Thus did God honour man, before man did dishonour God and himself. The lions crouch at his feet; the bears and tigers tremble at his look; the eagle stoops to his call; he commands, the behemoth and leviathan obey. He can now stoop the hawk to his lure, send the dog of his errand, teach one fowl to fetch him another, one beast to purvey for his table in the spoil of others; but this is by art and violence, then it was by nature, without compulsion or resistance. Here I find cause to condemn three opinions.

(1.) That man in his innocency should have slain the beasts to help his experience, by taking knowledge of their inward parts; or for his sport and delight in hunting, or for his sustentation in eating.* But this is not likely, for 'death entered by sin,' Rom. 5:12; if there had been no sin, no death could have seized upon either lord or servant. Ad usum erant, non ad esum. The killing of beasts, on what occasion soever, whether for food, for knowledge, or pleasure, belongs unto the bondage of corruption, which sin brought with it. 'I have given you the herb, the tree, the fruit,' Gen 1:29; fruit, not flesh. Homo immortalis vivebat ex fructibus, homo mortalis vivit ex mortibus. † The beasts should not have died for us, if we had not been dying in ourselves. I am persuaded, if man had not sinned, no beast should have been killed. I dispute not their question, that think the beasts remaining at the resurrection shall be preserved. But let this temperate our authority from unmerciful tyranny; it was sin that made us butchers, and taught the master to eat the servant.

(2.) The anabaptists, from that general grant, Gen. 1:26, would fetch their confused community, and teach every son of Adam to challenge a free use over all the creatures; as if, because the fishes of the sea be common, therefore also the fishes in every pond. But it is a gross collection, for the gift must be used according to the will of the giver. Now as he gave this liberty, so he distinguished a propriety. We may drink the milk of kine, but of our own kine; wear the wool of sheep, but of our own sheep, or such as our money hath bought and made our own. These men have robbed the decalogue of the eighth commandment, as the papists have of the second. An error that hath in it, we know not whether more impotence or impudence, so barbarous that the best conviction is the magistrate's bastinado. He that will steal a horse by a counterfeit warrant out of the Scripture, is well worthy to be confuted with a halter,

(3.) Those that have wrung blood out of the nostrils of reason, in framing arguments to the dishonour of man, thinking it the credit of their wits to vilify whom God doth thus dignify—man. Tully, prince of the academics, was transported with such a fury, he rails on nature, calls her stepdame for bringing man into the world naked and weak, and so makes him inferior to the brutes, whom God hath made little inferior to the angels. The Lord hath thus honoured man, and yet who but man could thus dishonour the Lord? There be such degenerate men, content to proclaim themselves bastards that they might disgrace all their fraternity. An opinion, that like a blazing meteor is dissolved in the wind, and in its dissolution vanisheth; as if God had made him the worst of all creatures whom he meant to make the best. Here, as David speaks, 'If the enemy had only reproached me,' Ps. 55:12, if the wrong were only man's, we might be silent; but God is injured in his workmanship, et per latera hominum petitur Creator hominum.‡ Let me proportion a censure fit for these censurers: Ne præferantur brutis, qui bruta præferunt; if they will prefer beasts before men, let their portion be among the beasts. For us let us honour God in man, who hath honoured man next himself; inferior to the angels in our nature, superior to the angels in the advancement of our nature, assumed by the image of his own person, Jesus Christ.

6. Plato and some of the Hebrews thought that Adam was created at first both man and woman, and was afterward divided into twain; or that they were both at first made together, but joined by their sides, like conporate twins, and after parted: they have too many such fables and fooleries. So the poets came in with their apish fictions: Hesiod with his Pandora, whom Vulcan made, all the gods adoring, adorning, and contributing to her; Venus gave her beauty, Pallas comeliness, Mercury wit—whereupon she was called Pandora; which, opening the lid of the tun, divided care and grief to men who lived before without. They would believe Hesiod of his Pandora; not Moses, nor God himself, concerning his Eve.*

The woman hath many adversaries that disdain her competition with man. Some will not allow her a soul, but they be soulless men. God 'in his image created them,' Gen. 1:27, not him only, but him and her—them, 'male and female;' therefore she hath a soul. Some will not allow her to be saved; yet the Scripture is plain, 'she shall be saved by childbearing,' 1 Tim. 2:15. 'Two shall be grinding at the mill,' duæ, two women, so is it originally; 'one of them shall be saved,' Matt. 24:41. Though Christ honoured our sex in that he was a man, not a woman, yet he was born of a woman, and was not begot of a man. And howsoever wicked women prove the most wicked sinners, yet the worst and greatest sin that ever was done, was committed by man, not by woman—the crucifying of our Lord Jesus; not a woman had a hand in it; even Pilate's wife was against it, charging her husband 'to have nothing to do with that just man.' Woman was the principal in killing the first Adam, himself being accessory. But, in killing of the second Adam, man was the principal, and woman had not a finger in it. In a word, God in his image created them both on earth, and God in his mercy hath provided them both a place in heaven! Concerning the creation of woman, I observe three things: man's necessity, God's bounty, and the woman's conveniency.

(1.) Man's necessity. A whole world to use, and so many millions of creatures to command, had not been a perfect content for him without a partner. For Adam 'there was not a help found meet for him,' Gen. 2:20. He saw all the creatures, he saw them fit to be his servants, none to be his companions. Not that the necessity was such as if the Maker's wisdom could not have multiplied man without the woman. According to the Hebrew paradox, nothing is good but a woman; which others lewdly thwart with a pseudodox, nothing is bad but a woman. But it was, First, For mutual society and comfort. She is compared to a vine: for its fair shadow and arbor of leaves, Refrigerium, a refreshing to her husband. When he comes from his labour abroad, Lætabitur sub vite sua, is his welcome home. Secondly, For the propagation of the world, she is a 'fruitful vine,' which is one means of her salvation, as one end of her creation; if they be fructus nativitatis suæ, liberi, not spurii: children, not bastards. Thirdly, To increase the church of God, and by replenishing the earth, to supply and store the kingdom of heaven. Fourthly, That from her might come that 'promised seed' which alone doth save us all.

Therefore it was God's charge, 'Increase and multiply;' and his provision, 'It is not good for man to be alone.' To condemn that 'doctrine of devils,' which loads this holy estate with their dung-carts full of reproaches. Misliking all their former answers, they now say, This Crescite is not a precept, for it was given to beasts not capable of precepts, and it should then bind all men, not only to marry, but to multiply by marriage; therefore they will have it only an institution of nature and promise of fecundity. But here they fight with their own shadows, for we do not say that it is a commandment binding all, but a liberty granted to all; in the barring of which liberty lies their sin. 'When you are persecuted in one city, flee to another,' saith Christ; yet he sinneth not that flieth not, when his faith is strong enough for the trial. Some have the gift of continency, which supplies this necessity; but to constrain him to live without a wife, who cannot live without a concubine, is to enforce a necessity of sinning, where God hath giving the faculty of avoiding it. Before the fall, marriage was in beneficium, now also in remedium. And though, in some respects, Felicior cælibatus, single life is more happy; yet matrimonium tutius, always marriage is more safe. Moses was a married man, Elias a virgin; Elias called fire from heaven, Moses obtained manna from heaven. Elias was a waggoner in the air, mounted through the clouds in a chariot; Moses was viator in mari, a traveller through the sea: God honoured them both alike. The smell of the flourishing vine drives away serpents and venomous creatures: the love of the wife, seasoned with the fear of God, is a supersedeas and bar to all Satan's temptations.

(2.) God's bounty. When man was made, we do not read that he found the want of an helper: he that enjoyed God could want no contentment. The contemplation of the new made world, and the glory of the Maker, did so take him up that he had neither leisure nor cause to complain. Should he beg of God a companion, this had been to disesteem the happiness of his condition, to grudge at his Maker's goodness, and unthankfully to have questioned his own perfection. As too many of his sons make themselves unworthy of that they have by coveting that they want, which they might want and be never the worse, may have and be never the better. Adam found not this want in God, but God found this want in Adam. He that made him, and knew him better than he knew himself, saw his want and supplied it, giving him comfort in a creature beside him, that had enough in his Creator above him. And rather than his innocence shall want a companion, God will begin a new creation. Before we can see our defects, God foresees them, and is then providing relief for us, when we feel no cause to complain; building a rampart for us, before the enemy comes to plant any ordnance against us. Still he watcheth over his 'beloved,' even 'while they sleep,' Ps. 127:3. How will he supply our necessity that thus stores us with superfluity?

When he effected this, he did cast Adam into a 'deep sleep,' Gen. 2:22, that neither his sight might be offended, nor his sense oppressed; sleep being a binder up of the senses. Would he not have yielded this rib waking? yes, doubtless; to such a Maker, and for such a purpose, most cheerfully. But as Adam knew not while himself was made, so he shall not know while his other self is made out of him. God will so magnify his goodness, that he shall receive his happiness before he expect it; that his joy in it, and thankfulness for it, may be the greater. So God 'built the woman;' she is called a building. First, Because man was an imperfect building without her. Secondly, Because the building of the family is by her; so the Hebrews call a son ben, of banah, to build. Man in marriage is said reparare latus suum, to repair his maimed side; and repetere costam suam, to require his own rib. And the woman is thither reunita, unde sublata, reduced to her first place. The inscription she bears, is donum and bonum, the gift of God; 'he brought her to the man,' it was his new-world's gift, the like whereof was not to be found in all the riches of nature.

(3.) The woman's conveniency and fitness for man. She was not made out of the earth, which was the matter of man; not out of the inferior creatures, which were the servants of man; but out of himself, that she might be dear in estimation, and equal in condition, to him. Therefore she took her denomination from him, as her being out of him: of ish, isha; of man, woman. The school hath curious questions: whether this was one of Adam's necessary and substantial parts, or a superfluous and supernumerary rib? If it had been superfluous, God had not made it and given it him; if he had been imperfect without it, God had not taken it from him. There is difference between things useful and convenient, and those that be necessary. Therefore, if in God's sight man could not well have wanted it, it had been easy enough for him to make the woman of the bone, and to turn the flesh into another bone. But he so multiplied the spirits, so animated it, that it should never be missed, or give cause of complaint. 'This is bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh,' saith Adam, Gen. 2:23; not so much for the contemplation of her likeness, or consideration of her fitness, or sensible alteration in himself, as for the knowledge of her matter, and to shew his authority over her. He gave a name unto her, 'She shall be called woman.' If she had been made by the request or will of Adam, or with the pain and detriment of Adam, she might afterward have been upbraided with her dependency and obligation. Now she owes nothing but to her Creator. Adam can no more challenge aught from her for his rib, than the earth can challenge from him. From a rib to a helper, was an happy change. Who was ever a loser by God's alteration? Whatsoever we have is his. When he taketh from us his own, which we had, he will give us better things, which we shall keep. He that gave man a woman to his helper, gave him by that woman a man to be his Saviour.

Conclusion.—When we see the heavens, the sun, and stars, we have good cause to say, 'O God, what is man?' Yet all these creatures hath he made for one, and that one almost the least of all. The smallest dust or sand is not so little to the whole earth, as man to heaven. Yet all the creation hath not more wonder in it, than is in man. They were made by a mere fiat, man by consultation; they at once, man by degrees; they in shapes like to none but themselves, man in the image of God; they with qualities fit for service, man for dominion; they had their names from man, man from God. When he had drawn this real map, built the substantial fabric of the world, he did abridge it all into the small tablet of man. He alone consists of heaven and earth, soul and body. When we say, 'Maker of man,' we include, 'Maker of all the world.' The price and virtue of things consists not in the quantity. One diamond is worth many quarries of stone; one loadstone hath more virtue than mountains of earth; one herb in the garden is better than whole fields of weeds; we say the leg of a lark is better than the whole body of a kite; we value an ounce of gold more than a talent of lead. Nor do I in this praise man, but God in man. The Maker must be glorified in all, but especially in the best of all. It is fit we should be consecrated to God above others, upon whom he hath bestowed more cost than on others. This is the end why he hath made us, to manifest his glory in us. His wisdom, goodness, mercy, is seen in all; but who can take notice of it so well as man? None but he can see what God hath done; none but he can admire and adore him in what he seeth. Why should we do anything else but honour God, seeing he hath made us only able to honour him? Think, O man, why thou wert made, and do not dishonour thy Maker. Let us cast ourselves down at his footstool, with our knees on the ground, and from the ground of our hearts say, All honour and praise, all thanks and obedience, be to God, our Creator, for ever.

Thus of man in general. Other visible creatures are wholly corporal; the invisible are wholly spiritual. Man is both corporal and sensible in his body, spiritual in his soul. He is the figure and abstract of heaven and earth, and doth in his little contain as much. Consider the earth, whether outwardly in her best prime, when the spring hath decked her over with fragrant and beauteous flowers; yet they are but dull in regard of the face of man, whose colours are more lively and pleasing, like drops of blood upon beds of snow. Or inwardly, he hath veins for her mines, bones for her rocks, muscles for her quarries. Heaven hath a swift motion, yet the imagination of man far outstrips it. Their motion is continual, man's mind immortal. For the plants and grass of the earth, man hath excrementa, ornamenta, his hairs. For the sun and moon in heaven, man hath eyes to give his body light. Yea, there is more in this little man, than in the great world; as the philosopher was more confounded in the small fly, considering her parts, than in the great elephant with his members. Now let us consider him in his parts; and herein first of his body, then of his soul. Concerning his body, I consider four circumstances; the matter, the honour, the order, and the wonder.

1. The matter of it. 'God formed man of the dust of the ground,' Gen. 2:7; not to be the soul's sepulchre, as Plato taught, but the soul's organ, to execute what she dedicates. This was not a slimy matter, mixed of earth and water; but the dust, the thinner and purer part of the earth. Man was at first of that element composed, unto which he shall be at last resolved; this was dust. 'Dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return again,' Gen. 3:19. Certainly, his was a more excellent constitution than any other creature's; a temper fit for the instrument of such a soul.

(1.) Others, by reason of their cold and gross humours, grow over: beasts with hairs, fowls with feathers, fishes with scales. Man is smooth and clear; God shining upon him as the sun upon a plain glass; on the rest as upon uneven clods, neither apt to receive nor reflect his beams.

(2.) His form and proportion exceed the rest; his members being disposed to a ready use, a hand to machinate and perfect the invention of his head.

(3.) The uprightness of his stature gives him pre-eminence. Their faces are set to look downward; man hath an erected and exalted countenance; ad sidera tollere vultus. And in the majesty of this carriage, he makes a demonstration of his dominion over the rest.

(4.) Though they may excel him in the quickness of some sense—the eagle in seeing, the dog in smelling, the mole in hearing, the spider in feeling, and for strength, the horse is most powerful,—yet man can better discern and judge of the outward sense, make more noble use of it; and what excellency of either strength or sense is in the rest, he adds to himself, and makes his own by reducing it to his service.

It was fittest that his body should be made of a terrene, not ethereal or celestial matter, because he was to live on the earth. A body capable of sense, by which the soul, being sent into it as a naked table, might gather experience, and by experience knowledge. And howsoever it was mortal, considered in itself, as compounded of contrary natures, the elements, yet by God's conservation it should have been immortal, without sin.

We are made of dust, and dust will claim her own. Why do we glory in our greatness? When that father stood by the tomb of Cæsar, with tears he exclaimed, Ubi nunc pulchritudo Cæsaris? Where is now the glory of Cæsar? Where be his troops of nobles, armies of soldiers, orders of senators, imperial majesty, the fear of nations, honour and terror of the world? Ubi nunc hæc omnia? Quo abiit magnificentia tua? Why do we covet? 'O earth, earth, earth, hear the Lord's word,' Jer. 22:29. Thrice: other men are earth twice, earth in coming from it, and earth in going to it. The covetous man is earth thrice, for his love of earth transforms his soul into it. A mortal fool, to heap up so much wealth for insensible dust! Why put we confidence in man, whose life is nothing but a little breath? Isa. 2:22. Stop but his mouth and nostrils, and he is a dead man. A very shuttle; no sooner in at one side but out at the other, Job 7:6. Sickness is often without a name, non publico morbo nomen fatetur. Death is always known, and known inevitable, in what shape soever it appears, non medicina contra mortem. Why do we reckon upon fourscore? Quantulum est quod vivimus! Why do we fear what we cannot shift? If we be in Christ, it is the gate of life. It is said, tempus communis medicus, time can remedy some evils, translating the rod of the righteous to the backs of the wicked. But mors communis medicus indeed. It can cure all diseases of body and soul, that no sore be left in the one, no sin in the other. *Nil crus sentit in nervo, cum manus est in cœlo: the body may sleep quietly in the dust when the soul is in heaven.

2. The honour of it. Albeit the image of God in man consists in wisdom and sanctity; yet there may be a likeness in other respects. Yea, though the body cannot be like a spirit, much less a finite body to an infinite spirit, yet even in the body may be found some prints of the divine majesty. First; Man is said to be made after God's image; man, not the soul of man only. The soul without the body is not a perfect man. Secondly; God's image was also in Christ's body; for he says, 'He that hath seen me hath seen my Father,' John 14:9. Me, he saith not, that hath 'seen my soul;' nor could his soul be seen. Thirdly; When God prohibits the shedding of man's blood, he yields this reason: 'For in the image of God made he man,' Gen. 9:6. Now, the soul cannot be killed, therefore there must be some similitude in the body. So precious is the life of man, who had this image created; much more of Christians, who have this image renewed. Fourthly; Our body is the example of that world which was in God from all eternity. As he purposed and formed it, so with a summary abridgment in man he expressed it. Fifthly; There is few of our members but be (in a metaphorical sense) attributed to God. By our eyes he signifies his knowledge; by our ears his regard to prayers; by our feet his coming towards us; by our hands his power. So that these serve not only for the offices of our soul, but be also certain types and resemblances of some perfections in God. Sixthly; The mind in the body is like a candle in the lantern, which makes the horn transparent, and diffusive of the light. The soul knows, not the body; yet the soul communicates her knowledge by the body.

This is the honour of the body, fit to be the mansion of so noble a guest. We may despise this earthly frame, as it is our own; we must admire it, as it is God's; we should not abuse it, as it belongs to both. It is but a tabernacle for the soul, 1 Cor. 6:19, it is a temple for the Lord. Let us not so defile it till both the soul and the Lord be weary to dwell in it. We love the cabinet for the jewel's sake, esteem it for that it contains. He is absurd that will stable his horses where he means to lay his honourable guests. Yet how do many men pollute this fair house by drunkenness, making it a swine-sty, by uncleanness a brothel, by worldliness a dunghill, by oppression a lion's den, by voluptuousness a boar's frank, by malice a stove or burning furnace, and by continual sin a barricaded jail to imprison the soul! Thus, instead of God's resemblance, it is made the exemplary of Satan, a habitation for bats and owls, a cage of unclean birds. Prostituted harlots, that set up a trade without credit, and (contrary to all honest professions) break with too much custom, little think how they make that body the devil's pinnace, which God built an ark for himself, a good ship to transport the soul to paradise, till at last they become no longer God's, but the chirurgeon's creatures. Not to speak of those external violences and inward disturbances which many contract to their own bodies, some setting the house on fire by wrathful passions, others untiling it and breaking down the windows by intemperance, even sordid nastiness makes it odious to God. For, howsoever Christ prefers puritatem cordis puritati cutis, the pure heart is best; yet seldom doth a clean soul dwell in a sluttish body. As that of the philosopher is held to be true, that the outward complexion inclines the inward disposition, so the unhandsomeness of the cover disgraceth the contents of the book, and through the chinks of an unhighted flesh we may read a neglected soul. But as God gave us our bodies for service, so he calls also for them in our holy sacrifice, Rom. 12:1.

3. The order. The head, as it is nearest to heaven, so liketh to heaven, both for roundness of figure, globular, resembling the firmament, which is a perfect circle and circumference, and for situation of divine graces in it. From the head all senses have their original, there they strive to declare their virtues. That which indeed makes a man dwells here, the princely power of reason. The forehead is smooth and clear, like the brow of heaven. The face is full of sweet proportions, the seat of beauty, the throne of majesty, an external figure of the mind, the relish of all the other parts. Of this beauty colour is the matter, and proportion the form, which ariseth from the general harmony of the whole. The eye is the centre where all these beauties meet, the life of the face's comeliness moves there; it is the model of all the other graces united. God set two great lights in heaven, so two living glasses in the midst of our visage. By these are remote and unreachable objects represented to the mind; and because they be tender, and subject to danger, he hath fenced them in with lids and covers, hollow bones and prominent brows. The tongue, that instrument of speech and taste, is but a small nimble piece of flesh, yet how rare and melodious voices are formed by it; notes able to ravish the heart of man! It can discourse of heaven and earth, things visible and unseen, manifest the thoughts of the mind, persuade the soul with arguments. It is called the glory of man, because it best expresseth the glory of God. Those instruments of eating, the mandibles, how are they fortified? The upper is fixed, the lower hath scope of motion, contrary to those grinders in the mill, where the upper moves above, and the lower lies still. The neck is small and sinewy, the arms long to extend, the hands active to do, the thighs and legs like marble pillars to support, the feet to transport and move the body according to the will of the mind. Every part is so disposed, with power, proportion, and conveniency, that we cannot think a reason how it should be otherwise, or give them any fitter place.

Now, as what God hath joined together, let no man put asunder; so what He hath ordered in wisdom, let not us disorder in folly. If one be born with a defective, superfluous, or misplaced limb, we call him a monster, a prodigy, yet is he so besides his will, even of God's making. But we have monsters of their own making. Man's face hath an outward reference to heaven. Other creatures grovel down to the earth, all their senses be intent upon it. Man is reared upwards, as prompt to look upon heaven, as his foot hath no power to tread beside earth. What monsters are they that deject their countenances, abase their bodies, deface themselves, and, being men, make themselves beasts? Such are the covetous; the eyes of the brute are not more pronely fixed on the earth. Omnia subjecisti, 'God hath put all things under his feet,' Ps. 8:6. The worldling crosseth this ordinance, subjecting himself to all things. How vile and degenerate is it, subjici subjecto, for man to put his heart under that which God hath put his feet? Yet, if their bodies were answerable to their affections, incederent quadrupedes, they would go on all four. Other creatures have but four muscles to turn their eyes round about; man hath a fifth to pull his eyes up to heavenward, as his proper inheritance and home. Lest our eyes should be too much bent on what they should not, they have peculiar nerves to attract them toward the seat of their rest, to shew that we can never truly be happy till we come to enjoy that place whither our eyes may invite our hearts, and our hearts should direct our eyes.

Let it be our care to keep ourselves as God hath made us. As our head is nearest to heaven, so let the thoughts of our head be most fixed on heaven. As our feet are lowest, so let the things under our feet be held vilest. The joints of our knees have a facility in bowing, let them do daily homage to their Maker. Our hands are nimble instruments, let them act the duties of our calling; an idle hand is as improper as a heavy air. Let our foreheads be smooth and calm like heaven, without the frowns and furrows of wrath. Our faces are the seat of majesty, let us not make them the snares of iniquity. Our eyes are the body's light, let them not purvey for the soul's darkness. Our tongue is the instrument of music and melody; it is never in tune, but when it sings the praises of God. The God of order requires that every part keep the order of God. Lord, thou hast made our bodies in harmony, preserve them in sanctity, and crown them with immortal glory.

4. The wonder. There is not a member wherein we find not cause of wonder. Our body was so far beyond our own skill in the making, that it poseth and astonisheth us in the considering. So many arteries, sinews, veins, none of them idle, or without manifest defect to be missed; a wonder! The necessary dependence and disposition of those inward parts, for all the offices of life, like the wheels of a most curious clock, that the disorder of one puts all out of frame; a wonder! The liver is the fountain of blood; the heart of vital, the brain of animal, spirits: now that from the same nourishment, the liver should derive blood, and the heart spirits; and that the brain, which is a cause of feeling, should have in itself no feeling; another wonder! That this body should be kept alive by dead things, the flesh of slain beasts; a wonder! for how should that which is dead give life, or maintain it? That since the fall, man eats and drinks in such a quantity: this in common reason should rather choke than nourish him. Yet thus hath God made his stomach a limbeck, to digest all meats that be wholesome for his nourishment; a wonder! There is no such strength in the body, whereby it should hold together, no more than a piece of earth set upright; yet, being animated with a soul, it can move and work, without which the sinews could not confirm the flesh to the bones; a wonder! Innumerable are these marvels, if the naturalist would consider them; but I am not physician enough to reckon them. Only thus much I say, 'I am fearfully and wonderfully made,' Ps. 139:14; wonderfully in the conception, more wonderfully in the completion, most wonderfully in the inspiration. God made us, and we knew it not; brought us into the world, and we knew it not; preserved us in the cradle, and we knew it not; now we are come to maturity, and do know it; let us serve him, and glorify his name for ever.

Conclusion.—Man being made in so goodly a proportion, and so far excelling all other creatures, how comes it to pass that he is so mortal and momentary, a flower so quickly vanishing? This hath been an old philosophical complaint, that nature to man was a stepdame, allowing him least time that could make best use of his time. Ars longa, vita brevis: the stag, the raven, treble the age of man. He only can understand, and he is kept from improving it, by the shortness of his time. Let me answer this by an apologue. When Jupiter had made the world, and all the beasts in it, they no sooner opened their eyes, and beheld this glorious frame, but they were jocund and merry. But yet they knew not their employment, and therein desire to be satisfied. The ape went first to know his office. It was answered, that he was to serve man; to skip and play, and make him sport, in sundry tricks and imitations; to be bound to a chain, and do as man would have him. This relished somewhat harsh, but there was no remedy. He demands how long he must endure this; it was told him, thirty years. He thought that too tedious, and begged a shorter time; Jupiter was contented, and bated him ten. Then came the ass, to know the fortune of his condition; which was also to serve man, in a laborious life, carrying burdens, bearing stripes, and not seldom wanting his sustenance; and the term of this service was also thirty years. Discontented with this long slavery, he desires Jupiter to take off some of his time, and to bestow it on those that desired it. This was granted, and he was likewise eased of ten years. Then comes the dog; and his office was to run a-hunting, to kill hares, but not to eat a bit of them; when he was weary, to be glad of scraps; to wait in the dark, and keep the house; and this for thirty years. But petitioning for the like abatement, it was granted, and ten years cut off. Last comes the ox, to know what he should do; which was also to serve man, in drawing the yoke and other carriages for his use, with the galling pricks of many a goad, to rouse his dulness. He also craves abridgment of his thirty years, and lo! twenty was abated to him; provided that, when he had laboured to do man service ten years with his living body, he should then be killed to feed him with his dead flesh.

Now comes man; and finding himself of so immortal and discursive a soul, usufructuary lord of all the world, a potent prince in so fair a dominion, he demands his office, which was to serve his Maker in a cheerful obedience. He likes it well, but how long was he to live? Jupiter answers, that he had determined to every one thirty years. Man thought this too short a time for so pleasant a dwelling, therefore begs that the years which were taken from the other might be added to his. It was granted, but with this condition, that, having first lived his own thirty years, he should enjoy the rest in their order.

First, the life of the ape, full of fancies and wanton imitations; then the life of the ass, moiling and toiling, carrying and recarrying, labouring for the riches of this world, but withal, eating little part of his own gains; so till fifty. From that to sixty, the life of the dog, snarling at one, barking at another, hunting about for preys, and scarce eating a morsel of them, but, in a foolish covetousness, leaving them all for others. The remainder, like the ox; lazy, unwieldy, full of pains and aches, till at last death comes to take him out of the pasture. This fable teacheth us, that long life, if it be not sanctified from these bestial qualities, is an unhappiness, rather than a favour; and that man need not grumble at the shortness of his time, seeing other creatures live but for a time, and then perish; whereas after this short life of misery, God hath provided for us an eternal life of glory.

The soul of man.—The body hath had its due honour, whereof every part, for place, use, and form, doth exceed wonder. Yet doth not this human body more excel other visible creatures, than the soul doth excel that. The heavens are purer than the earth; the body is of the earth, the soul is from above the heavens. The body is to the soul as a barren turf to a mine of gold, as a mud-wall about a delicate garden, as a wooden box wherein the jeweller carries his precious gems, as a coarse case to a fair and rich instrument, as a rotten hedge to a paradise, as Pharaoh's prison to a Joseph, or as a mask to a beautiful face. It is so excellent a thing, that itself considers it cannot sufficiently conceive its own excellency. For method, I desire to touch upon these six circumstances: What it is, From whence it comes, When it begins, How long it continues, What it is like, and What it is able to do.

1. What it is; no accidentary quality, but a spiritual and invisible essence, subsisting by itself. This appears, because the soul hath often a disposition adverse to the body's; she would pray, when the other would sleep; and is often most comforted, when the body is most distressed; as a bird sings most merrily when her cage is opened. And, because it hath a being when it is removed from the body; as the musician lives though his lute be broken. For the specific difference, beasts are said to have souls, but they be not substances, but peculiar qualities, arising from the temperature of the body, and vanishing with it; the soul of the beast is said to be 'in the blood,' Gen. 9:4. Angels are spirits, but cannot be united with bodies, so as to make one entire person. Man's soul is his form, the first mover of the body, and the principal thing that makes man to be man. There be spirits in man, but this is not the soul. Some think that man consists of three parts, because Paul mentions 'soul, spirit, and body,' 1 Thess. 5:23. But there by spirit is signified the mind, by soul, the will and affections; these are not two things, but two faculties, for the soul is but one. So it is called the 'spirit of our mind,' Ephes. 4:23, which is the more noble and purer part of the soul. Indeed, soul hath divers acceptations in the Scripture. First, For the whole man; 'The soul that sinneth, shall die,' Ezek. 18:20; the soul, totus homo, the whole man. 'Tribulation upon every soul that doth evil,' Rom. 2:9; upon every man. Secondly, For that immortal part of man; fear not man, for he cannot 'kill the soul,' Matt. 10:28; the better part cannot be killed. Thirdly. For the affections and will, which is the inferior part of the soul. Thou shalt love the Lord 'with all thy soul,' Matt. 22:37; love is an act of the affective part. Fourthly, For the life; deponit animam, that is vitam, 'he giveth his life.' The life of the beast is the soul of the beast,' Gen. 9:4; the blood being the seat of life, and chariot of the vital spirits. When we read in philosophers and physicians, of a spirit in man, which working in the heart is called vitalis, the lively faculty; in the liver, naturalis, the natural faculty; in the head, animalis, the animal faculty; we must not think this to be the reasonable soul, but rather the chair wherein she sits, and the organ whereby she works; without whose service, the soul cannot so perfectly exercise her powers and acts in the body. In ecstacies, if the spirit be comforted, the soul is comforted; if the spirit be suffocated, the soul and body are resolved.

2. From whence it comes; not by traduction from our parents. A body may be engendered of bodies, because something is imparted and conferred from them; but a soul cannot bring forth a soul, because nothing can separate a thing that is thin and immaterial. That man's soul is not traduced, consider these reasons. First, 'God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and he became a living soul,' Gen. 2:7. His body lay senseless on the ground, till a soul was breathed into it by its Maker. Secondly, God made the woman, Adam named her. 'This is bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh,' Gen. 2:23; not soul of my soul; he knew she had no part nor portion of his soul. Thirdly, If a soul could beget a soul, then an angel might beget an angel. Fourthly, The first man Adam was made 'a living soul,' living, not quickening. Fifthly, They are called the 'fathers of our bodies,' Heb. 12:8, not of our souls; we have another 'Father of our spirits,' most plainly; it is God that 'formeth the spirit of man within him,' Zech. 12:1. There is some difference in the making of our bodies; at first by the immediate creation of God, now by the combination of man and woman; but there is still the same rule of creating the soul; it is particula divinæ auræ, breathed into the flesh by himself. Infundendo creatur, et creando infunditur; it is infused in the making, and made in the infusing.

Nor yet may we think, that the beginning of the soul is of the essence of God, which seemed to be the error of Lactantius. For as breath is no part of his substance that doth breathe it, so the soul is no part of God's essence that doth give it. If it were part of the divine essence, it were immutable, without beginning, from all eternity; yea every soul were God. It doth neither arise from the substance of our parents, nor from the essence of God; but is immediately formed and inspired by the Maker of all, and infused into the body. The body was made of the earth, common to his fellows, and there lay as senseless as the earth, from which it was taken, and by which it was supported. It was the life of breath, that gave it the breath of life; no air, no earth, no water, no element was here used, to contribute to this work; we are beholden to nothing but God for our soul. Our flesh is from flesh, our spirit is from the God of spirits. Now, he that breathed upon the body, and gave it a living spirit, breathe again upon us all, and give us his Holy Spirit!

3. When it takes beginning. Etsi cum corpore non definit, saltem cum corpore incipit; though it do not end with the body, yet it begins with the body. In the making of the first man, God first instrumentalised a perfect body, and then infused a lively soul. Now the body is made by ordinary generation in the womb, and the soul is inspired into it, before it see the light, or draw breath. 'The children struggled in Rebecca's womb,' Gen. 25:22; which proves not only infantum animas, sed et pugnans;* they seem not only to have souls, but even affections. 'The babe leaped in Elizabeth's womb for joy,' Luke 1:14; hi motus gaudia vestra, says Tertullian to pregnant mothers, that you may be assured your unborn infants have souls. This string I touch rather touch, because some naturians have disputed against it; and would have the life of such children to be either merely vegetative, such as in plants and roots; or sensitive and motional, such as in beasts; both which die with the subjects wherein they are; and not rational, which is the soul. But both the canon law condemns her for a homicide, quæ conceptum in utero deleverit, that destroys the fruit of her own womb; and if abortion, after life, be caused, murder is committed; God's law, man's law, and their own conscience condemns it; therefore the soul is inspired before the birth. Yea so precise were the Sorbonnists, and so ascribing to the outward element, that if the hand of an infant, which could not be born, appeared, they would have it baptized; alleging that baptism is for the soul, not for the body; and the soul is tota in qualibet parte, whole in every part. But this truth we affirm, that so soon as the body is formed in the womb, the soul is inspired by the Lord, and having once a beginning, it shall never have an ending; which is the next circumstance considerable.*

4. How long it continues. The soul is made of an everlasting nature; it hath a beginning to live, it shall have no time to die. There is indeed a death of the soul; not that it ceaseth to be, but when it ceaseth to be righteous; it doth still subsist in nature, but not in the comfort and peace of God. Our soul sleeps not in a living body, therefore shall not sleep in a dead body. The souls of reprobates have their deportation, as the rich man's soul was fetched from him, Luke 12:20; and their detrusion, being 'cast into hell,' Luke 16:23. But they that die in the Lord, do instantly go to the Lord, as the soul of Lazarus was in Abraham's bosom. So Christ assured the penitent malefactor, 'This day thou shalt be with me in paradise,' Luke 23:43. Corpus resolvitur, anima absolvitur; quod resolvitur in terram suam, nihil sentit; quæ absolvitur, in æternum gaudet. The body is dissolved, and feels no pain; the soul is absolved, and rejoiceth in bliss. The departed saints are dead in their worst part only, living in their best, vivit, qua voluit vivere, parte magis. Death to such a soul is not exitus, but transitus—its transmigration, not abolition. 'God is the God of the living,' Matt. 22:32. Therefore Abraham is alive, Jacob is alive. Now their bodies be dead, therefore their souls live. 'We shall go to them, they shalt not return to us,' 2 Sam. 12:23. Men's souls have a beginning without an end. The soul and body part for a time, but they shall meet again to receive an irrevocable doom. They do not obambulate and wander up and down, but remain in certain places and receptacles of happiness or unhappiness, either in the hands of God, or in the devil's prison. The soul is the principal in doing well or ill, therefore she is first in receiving her reward of either pain or peace.

5. To what she is like. The superscription the soul bears is the image of God; as it came from him, so it is most like unto him. God is immortal, so is the soul; God is immaterial, so is the soul; God is an understanding spirit, so he hath made the soul, and withal to will freely; God is invisible, so is the soul; God is spiritual and simple, so the soul hath nothing mixed or concrete, nothing moist, nothing airy or fiery. The soul quickeneth the body, as the Lord quickeneth the soul and all things. The soul was perfectly created, and is now imperfectly regenerated to be wise, holy, loving; and therein resembles the wisdom, sanctity, and love of God. As God is the centre of every circumference, filling all places, so the soul is whole in the whole, and wholly in every part, neither increasing nor decreasing with the body. Lastly, the soul is an image of the Trinity, which is to be worshipped in unity; not in unity of the persons, nor trinity of the Godhead; but in unity of the Godhead, and trinity of the persons. In the Deity, there is the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one God: so in the soul, there is the understanding, the will, and memory, three distinct faculties; yet these three are but one soul. This is the principal part of man, a princely similitude of the infinite God. Object. Man is the image of God; but it is lawful to make the image of the image of God, therefore to make the image of God. Ans. Man is made after God's image in his soul, not in his body: that therefore wherein man is like God, is invisible, and cannot be imaged. No man can make a picture of the soul.

6. What the soul is able to do. It is wonderfully capable and active; can pass by her nimble thoughts from earth to heaven in a moment; can be all things, can apprehend all things, can know that which is, and conceive of that which never was, never shall be. Man's soul is comprehensive of universality, and hath virtutum ad infinita; nature hath set no limits to the thoughts of the soul. It can remember things past, foresee things to come, apprehend things present, which are not elementary but divine faculties, and can come from none but God himself. Therefore it hath several names, according to its several powers. Dum vivificat, anima: dum vult, animus: dum scit, mens; dum recolit, memoria: dum indicat, ratio: dum spirat, spiritus: dum sentit, sensus.* Quickening, it is the soul; willing and knowing, the mind; recollecting, the memory; judging and discoursing, reason; breathing, the spirit; and as sensitive, the sense. Here is not a difference of substances to the difference of names; for all these are but one soul. As the earth can have no heat nor nourishment but from the heaven, so the body can have no life, sense, nor motion but from the soul: more glorious in these powerful faculties than the heavens are with the sun and stars. But why doth it not work so powerfully at its first infusion? Answer. Not that (according to some philosophers) it is more or less in substance. And for diminishing of the qualities, whereby they would prove the mortality of it, it is as when we have found a mass of gold, and the same being fined becomes less; by diminution of the quality, we should deny the substance. But thus we answer, it is straitened by the imbecility of the organ; we are not born men; there is difference between the creation of Adam and the generation of all his children. First the body increaseth in the womb by the life of the parent, until the infusion of the soul; being animated, it grows by the soul's virtue, and is not at an instant instrumentalised of perfect stature. Adam, at the first infusion of his soul, was able to discourse. We cannot do so. Physicians give the reason of a natural moistness, that drowns and clouds the understanding part, and as that is dried up, so reason appears; but divines say more certainly this disability comes by sin. But leaving these things to the learned, come we to some more useful conclusions, applying all to ourselves.

1. Seeing the soul is so far more excellent than the body, let it be more carefully tendered. Non anima pro corpore, sed corpus pro anima: nec corpus in anima, sed anima in corpore sita est.[†] The soul was not made for the body, as the lute is not made for the case, but the body for the soul, as a box for the jewel. Man was made last, because he was to be the best; the soul of man was inspired last, because that was to be yet more noble. If the body have this honour to be the soul's companion here, yet, withal, it is her drudge: Instrumentum est, sed et impedimentum est; both the organ and the clog of the divine part. For service it is a labourer, for life a companion; an instrument for action, a bar to contemplation. External works be effected by it; but it hinders the internal, which are more worthy and necessary. The imprisoned bird, when she sees no remedy, sings in her cage; but she flies most and highest when she is at liberty. Set the soul once at freedom, she will then most cheerfully sing the praises of her Maker. Yet the common course is to fortify this prison, and to boast in corporal abilities. But qui gloriatur in viribus corporis, gloriatur in viribus carceris. I do not approve the sullenness of that soul which wrongs the body: but I worse like to have the body wrong the soul, to have Hagar tricked up in Sarah's garments, and set at upper end of the table. If the painted popinjay, that so dotes on her own beauty, had an eye to see how her soul is used, she would think her practice more ill-favoured and unhandsome, than perfuming a putrefied coffin, or putting mud into a glass of crystal. For shame, let us put the soul foremost again, and not set heaven lowest, and earth uppermost.

2. Seeing the soul comes from God, and is made to return unto him, let us cheerfully surrender it when he calleth for it. Let them rise up continually to him, and fix themselves in their thoughts upon him who alone created them in their infusion, and infused them in their creation. Let them long to come back to the fountain of their being and the author of their being glorious. So willing were Simeon, Luke 2:29, and Paul, Phil, 1:23, to have those bonds loosed that kept them from the glory of their Maker. So Stephen disposeth his soul, 'Lord, Jesus receive it.' Thou hast created it, redeemed it, justified it, sanctified it, and in thy good time wilt glorify it; Lord take it into thine own custody; seeing I am to leave my body, do thou receive my spirit. 'And when he had thus spoken, he fell asleep,' Acts 7:59. When he had uttered such excellent words, and with such a resolute spirit, and in such a reverent manner, giving unto God the life of his soul, and forgiving men the death of his body, he sweetly fell asleep. *Christus pro nobis hominem induit, Stephanus pro Christo hominem exiit. Christ became man for Stephen, and Stephen became no man for Christ; as cheerfully putting off his flesh as the sleepy man puts off his garments. 'Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit, Ps. 31:5; 1 Pet. 4:19. O how willingly doth that man send up his soul, that believes the God who inspired it will graciously receive it.

3. Seeing the soul is immortal, and cannot be extinguished, let us neglect the body in comparison of it. Most men are all for the body, nothing for the soul. Yet 'what shall a man gain, by winning the world, and losing his soul?' Matt. 16:26. There be three things in that comparative bargain: 'erminus primus, gain of the world; terminus secundus, loss of the soul; æqui librium, which is weightier? Yet how many lose the jewel to keep the box, spill the wine to preserve the vessel, make more of the shell than the kernel. Now few men's souls stand them in so much as any one part of their bodies. The coverings of their heads, their very shoes, cost them more in a year than their souls. We will not trust an unskilful coachman, a rude waterman, with our bodies; any minister will serve for our souls. Do we call them from their injustice, from sacrilege, from uncharitableness? Alas! men will have their wills, whatsoever become of their souls. Every soul in itself is of greater price than the whole world; thy soul to thyself should be of greater account than a million of worlds. Seek goodness to thy soul, other goods will come in without seeking. When Solomon begged wisdom, riches and honour came unasked for. Monica prayed that her son Augustine might turn catholic Christian; God made him a most illuminate doctor. Sisera asks water; Jael gives him milk. Gehazi begs one talent; Naaman constrains him to take two, 2 Kings 5:23. Save thy soul, and save all; lose that, and lose all. Howsoever it go with thy goods or good name, be sure to look well unto thy soul, that whether thou die for the Lord, or in the Lord, thou mayest with comfort resign it to the Lord.

But alas! our souls are kept like slaves, and our bodies like gentlemen. We desire a good servant, a good child, a good field, a good friend; we would have our apparel good, our meat good, our bed good, our very beast good, all things good about us, only we do not care though our souls be bad within us. How comes it to pass, that thou hast deserved so ill of thy self, *Ut inter bona tua omnia non vis esse malum nisi teipsum. Thy body hungers, thou wilt give it food; thirsts, and thou drinkest; is weary, and thou goest to rest. Thy soul may starve, without seeking spiritual manna; it may cry out Sitio, and not be brought to the living waters; wearied with lusts and the troubles of conscience, and yet thou seekest no peace. If we be fallen into the waters, how do we catch to save the body? how do we run from an house on fire? how warily shun an infected place—all to preserve a brittle, miserable, mortal body. Yet neither the present floods of sin, overwhelming the poor soul, nor the future fire of hell, never to be quenched, nor the plague of bad society, can make us fear the eternal loss of our souls, as if that which God had made only excellent, we thought it only to be nothing worth. In sickness, we cry, My head, my head, my sides, my heart; but My spirit, or My soul, is seldom our complaint, as if it were so easy to save that, upon which depends the saving of all the rest.

4. Seeing the soul is so capable, so comprehensive, let us seek for something that may fill it. Nothing in the world, not the world itself, can do this. Otherwise, why did not so many kingdoms content that ambitious monarch? why do not whole lordships of lands, heaps of coin, treasures of jewels, satisfy their possessors? But that still there is as much desire, as there is abundance; and they so want many things, as if they had nothing. This covetousness is not the error of the body; alas, that receives but little. Perhaps it longs for some delicate food, yet is it soon satisfied, and begins after repletion to loathe it. It takes no pleasure to be laden with store of gold; many jewels, and glorious apparel, are but a burden to it; the body is not desirous of honour, it is the soul that covets all these things, and with all these things is as little satisfied as without them. There is only one thing that can fill the soul, and that is God; as nothing can limit it, but that is everywhere, so nothing can satisfy it, but that is infinite: an infinite nature can fill an infinite desire. O may he dwell in them, that hath appointed them to dwell in clay, and fill our souls, as he hath made them to fill our bodies! Lord, thou hast created them of an heavenly nature, do thou sublime them from earthly affections. Sanctify them with grace and holiness, replenish them with peace and happiness. Let them draw our bodies upward, and not our bodies draw them downwards.

3. The divine providence.—This is that most free and powerful action of God, whereby he disposeth all things; that universal art, whereby all the affairs of the world are ruled. Some things are by choice, some by chance, some by election within us, some by disposition without us, some by opposition against us, some by co-operation by us, some by infliction upon us: God sits in his throne, orders all. 'He worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will,' Eph. 1:11. First there is a counsel, as a faciamus; then a purpose, as a faciamus hominem; then a will, resolving to do according to that purpose; then an effect succeeding it, working according to that will, and an universal extent, 'all things.' So God respects one thing, that he regards all things; so he minds all things, as if they were one thing.

The carpenter or mason, having built the house, are paid for their work, and so leave it to another to inhabit. The shipwright builds the vessel; the merchant owns it, the pilot guides it, the sea bears it, the wind drives it, the rocks split it, and the shipwright cannot help it. But he that made the world looks to it, as he gave it being, so he keeps it in being. The gardener hath inclosed a piece of ground, planted it, fenced it, finished it, is still dressing it, yet weeds will grow, worms will spill the roots, and while he sleeps, thieves may break in and spoil it. But God so watcheth over his plantation, that no power can alter the least piece of it without his will. The workman makes a curious watch, every pin and wheel is well placed, the spring and all in perfect tune, himself keeps it, and it goes well, yet will it gather foulness, and time will wear it out. But God is so presential to every piece of his fabric, that he keeps it from rust, nor can time alter it, if eternity will preserve it.

For method, first let us hear what error hath spoken against this providence; then what reason can allege for it; and lastly, the truth of it, and wherein this providence consists, in which consists all things.

The philosophers, as they had sundry sects, so divers opinions concerning the divine providence. Some held that the gods did, nec curare sua, nec aliena, regard nothing; wherein they are like our atheists, but some of them not altogether so bad; for ask Epicurus and Pliny how the world is governed, they will tell you, Cælestia causis naturalibus, inferiora vi stellarum per influentias: but above all these they acknowledged a Deity. So the Stoics held, that God did govern heavenly things by himself, sublunary things by the disposition of starry influences.

Objection 1. God is at ease and quiet in heaven; what need he trouble himself with earthly matters? What is it to him, whither thou goest, or what thou speakest, or how thou workest? Ea cura quietos sollicitat? Ans. This is a poor reasonless conceit of God; as if rest itself could be weary, or peace itself be disturbed; whereas the heavens are not weary of moving, nor the mind of thinking. It is a pleasure even to a good man, not a pain, to see all things in his family well ordered. That which changeth place, or is capable of motion, may admit of labour. God if infinite and impatible, seeth all things without eyes, does all things without hands. Our wars cannot disturb him. The thunder of the air may trouble the earth, the vapours of earth trouble the air, the quarrels of two nations disquiet a neighbouring third; but nothing can molest God. Such fools are they that think God can be weary with business; but when men in their pride could not make themselves like God, in their folly they would make God like themselves.

Objection 2. But this is injurious, to bring down the majesty of God to the husbanding of bees and ants, and such inferior businesses. Kings do not stoop to take up every brabble. 'How doth God know? can he judge through the dark cloud? He walks in the circuit of heaven,' Job 22:13; and there is a vast interposition betwixt that place and earth. They thought it not fit to give him a descent beneath the circle of the moon; and that his knowledge would become vile, if it were abased to take notice of trivial objects and occurrents. Ans. This doth not disparage his wisdom, but honours it. How many a man hath been ambitious to count the stars, and to give them names, whereby to know them again? God only 'knows their number, and calls them all by their names.' Archimedes propounded it as a matter of wondrous reputation to himself, if he could have made a just numeration of the sand, which he foolishly attempted. Non vilitatem arguit, sed perfectionem. Is the glass vile, because it presents deformities? or the sun defiled, because his beams fall on muddy places? If God could be afflicted or infected with our corruption, it might be some prejudice to him. But he can turn that to his honour, which man doth to his dishonour. 'He humbleth himself to behold things done in heaven, and on the earth,' Ps. 113:6. The one is no more humbling to him than the other. We see that which lies at our foot, as well as that which stands at our elbow.

Objection 3. They allege Scripture against it. 'He that increaseth knowledge, increaseth sorrow,' Eccles. 1:18. Ans.: Solomon speaks there of a human knowledge, which is always attained with labour, often retained with grief. Knowledge in man is varied. We know some things as past, some as present, others as to come; God sees all uno intuitu. Man is anxious about the event; God sees the end and beginning at one instant. But Num cura Deo de bobus? 'Hath God care of oxen?' 1 Cor. 9:9. Therefore he regards not inferior things. Ans.: The apostle doth not exempt oxen from God's care, but shews that the law was not made for oxen's sake, but for ours. 'Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox treading out the corn,' Deut. 25:4. Yea, this proves directly that God hath care of oxen, for whose sustenance he so provided; but much more care of his ministers, unto whom in that law he hath chiefest respect. Arctiore providentia complectitur hominem, quam bovem. He 'feeds the young ravens;' a creature less worthy than oxen, because not so serviceable to man. He that would have an ox live by his labouring, would have a minister live by his preaching. Deo est cura de bobus vestris, vobis non est cura de predicatoribus suis. God hath care of your beasts, you take no care of his ministers.

Objection 4. Many things come to pass by chance, but chance and providence cannot stand together. Ans.: In respect of God's prescience nothing happens contingenter, by chance; because he foreknoweth all things, and ordereth them by a certain, deliberate, and eternal counsel. But in regard of us, who know not the causes, nor are of God's privy council, when things come which we do not expect, they are said to come by chance, Luke 10:31. 'Time and chance happeneth to all,' Eccles. 9:11. Videntur nobis fortuita, quæ apud Deum consulta. God made fortune his slave, let not us make fortune our God.

Objection 5. Providence and disorder cannot stand together; but in the world there is nothing but disorder and confusion; seditions, subversions, rebellions, contentions. In such hurly-burlies, what order, what providence? Ans.: The greater; as to rule a headstrong horse is more than to ride a tame one. Indeed, this world is the devil's walk, and he is a lord of misrule; he always comes in with a breach, and goes out with a stench. As it is God that keeps us, so that not a hair of our head doth perish; so Satan watches that not a hair might escape. He loves to trouble the waters, to vex the righteous, to provoke the indifferent, to enrage the lewd, to turn all upside down. These things are, by the providence of God, not effective, but permissive; and even in this mutinous irregularity, there is an order, though we see it not, disposing all these evils, to the conversion of the elect, to the confusion of the wicked, and the glory of his own name in both.

Objection 6. But the means are visible by which all things be wrought and preserved, as by their causes: what providence appears? Ans.: First, God ordained the means as well as the end. He that determined the death of Christ, determined also the instruments. Secondly, The means is sometimes evil, in matter or form, as that was; yet he makes good the work, and carves an excellent piece with the worst tool. Thirdly, He is not tied to means, but can work with or without, besides or against nature. Fourthly, All media have their efficacy from him; nor could the sun heat, nor bread nourish, but by the blessing of his providence.

Objection 7. But the innocent suffer most injuries, and the world runs merrily with men of the worst conscience. What providence is in this? Bona malis, and mala bonis? By rule of order and equity, the godly should flourish and the wicked perish. Ans.: Many a good man hath been troubled with this temptation, but was never sent away without his resolution. Read Ps. 73:12, 13, 17. Who seeth not that prosperity increaseth iniquity? and where is more want, there is less wantonness. The church, like the moon, gives ever the clearest light, when the sun seems to be in most opposition to it. Drones gather honey only from the hive; a true believer will gather it even from thistles. We prescribe not a physician, by what medicine he shall help our body; and shall we set down our heavenly Physician a course, how he shall deal in the cure of our souls? To think we need no pills, no cauteries, is to think we are not the sons of Adam. Had we rather stay in Egypt, than by passing the penurious deserts of Arabia, to come to our Canaan? It was a great prince that, being in health, pleasantly asked his physician, which was the way to heaven; he gravely answered, That your highness thought upon when you were last sick.

It is the vulgar opinion of a rich man, how much is he bound to God? whereas a poor abject creature doth often owe more to the divine goodness, to whose palate it hath embittered the world, that he may better relish the kingdom of heaven, and have it. Many a momentary tenant of this sophisticate happiness below, besides the miserable condition of his conscience, can scarce give away his money, but he must bequeath the devil to boot; and his lands and houses have so sore incumbrances annexed to them, as hell-torments.

The pontificians would have temporal felicity to be one special note of the true church against us; but so the Jews' arguments were good against Jeremiah. 'While we did burn incense to the queen of heaven, we had plenty of victuals, were well, and saw no evil,' Jer. 41:17, 18. Since we left off that worship, 'we are consumed with famine.' Thus God's plenty must prove God's piety, and cheapness goodness; and the church must derive its mark from the market. But we answer. First; When all things were so cheap in the commonwealth, the pope made all things dear in the church; secular benefits were of an easier price in the market, than spiritual preferments and benefices were in the temple. Secondly; Who was the author of this prosperity? the queen of heaven, or the king of heaven? Did the mother, whom they worshipped, or the Son, whom we worship, cause this plenty? Thirdly; Was this kingdom so rich, that the pope termed it a well never drawn dry? How comes it to pass that he dried it, and left it so poor, that it had not water to quench his thirst, or to pay another tax? Fourthly; If this be a true mark, why is not ours allowed for a true church, which these threescore years hath enjoyed so much peace, that they fret their heartstrings, and envy is ready to burst her bowels at it? Neither hath it at any time been disturbed, but through their treacherous attempts. But we obtrude not to them the prosperity of our state, but the purity of our doctrine, and honesty of our practice.

Christ did not confute the devil by a miracle, but by an oracle, Matt. 4:4. We may suffer injury, and be never the worse; they may enjoy plenty, and be never the better. Graces multiply by afflictions, as the saints did by persecutions. 'The more they were afflicted, the more they multiplied,' Exod. 1:12. These terrors may affront us; they shall not affright us. Unguntur cruces, a quo inferuntur.* Crosses be rough and smarting; but we look to the unction of comfort, that makes them portable and easy. In all conditions we bless his providence, who, according to his own wisdom, not ours, disposeth things; which, if they be harsh to a state that must suffer, are good for an estate that shall be blessed for ever.

These be the objections against it. Now consider we some reasons for it, which we may derive from Scripture, experience, conscience, consequence, conference, and sense.

1. The Scripture is copious and punctual in this magnifying of the divine providence; ascribing to it the beginnings, proceedings, and events of all particular actions, whether casual in themselves, or rational in us. 'The lot is cast into the lap,' Prov. 16:33; 'the horse is prepared for the battle,' ver. 21, 31. God disposeth both the lottery and the victory. 'Man's goings are of the Lord,' ver. 20, 24. The die hath no sense, the beast no reason; man hath both sense and reason; yet all their motions are disposed of God. That he is a God 'on the hills,' as well as 'in the valleys,' the king of Aram proved to his cost, 1 Kings 20. That it extends to the feeding of widows with multiplied oil, and is a fatherhood to the orphan, I need not urge, no man denies, Ps. 29:9. Yea, even to the 'calving of hinds,' Ps. 147:9, to the 'feeding of lions and young ravens.' They write of the raven, that, finding her young to be of a whitish colour, unlike herself, she leaves them, as if they were none of hers. Lo, then doth God's providence sustain them! 'Who provides for the raven his food, when his young ones cry unto God?' Read Job 39. 'The very hairs of your head are numbered,' Matt. 10:30. Quid vilius cadit de homine? Quid numero concipi minus potest? But Sapientiae ejus non est numerus, Ps. 147:5. To lots, so was Canaan divided, albeit formerly in his decree disposed, Num. 26:54. God had secretly destined Saul to the kingdom; Samuel knew this. Yet, as if Israel would not be otherwise satisfied, the lots must decide this choice. God is so constant to his own purposes, that the man, whom he had determined, and Samuel anointed, the lot shall find out. There is no chance to the Almighty; even casual things are no less necessary in their first cause, than the natural. Saul may hide himself among the stuff, but he knew where the lots would light before they were cast. Haman would cast lots, Est. 3:7; but did the Almighty sleep at his bloody design? No; he that keeps a calendar of all times and things, so inverted his intendments, that the day became dismal to the plotter of mischief; the lot of death fell upon Haman.

2. By experience. The order which appears in the whole course of nature proves it. In a family there is order; some rule, some obey. A city consists of many well-governed families, where the grave senators guide the rest. A kingdom consists of many cities and towns, where one sits in the throne, and the rest do him reverence. The world consists of many kingdoms, whereof God himself is the omnipotent monarch, so ruling the good, and overruling the bad, that all shall tend to his glory. Herbs and grass are for cattle, cattle serve men; the heavens above, for them that are beneath; and all the creatures, above or beneath, serve for God: all declare his providence.

3. Man's own conscience binds him to confess this truth. Suppose he hath done a murder, so closely that no eye saw him, no suspicion dogs him, he is out of all danger of the law. Yet doth his unquiet conscience vex, trouble, haunt, torment him, gives him no more ease than he shall find on the gibbet, yea, if ever, his very confession shall assuage his pains. Another hath sinned in uncleanness; no man accuseth him, yet if ever he shall be cleansed by repentance, his conscience will so gird him, that he never rests till, by prayers and tears, contrition for it, and resolution against it, he hath made his peace with God. Now, 'if our own heart condemn us, God is greater,' 1 John 4:20. That the very falling into some extraordinary sin should often occasion a man's good. Who could work this but the providence of our Father? The thought of it is so terrible, and the guilt appears so irksome to him, that many days he bleeds for one hour's error—hates the place, the cause, the temptation to such a lewdness. As the being once overtaken with wine hath been a means to keep a man sober all his life after, so that he answers the next invitation to such excess with the dear remembrance of his former sorrows, what it cost him to recover his peace. Thus out of transgression doth the divine providence work sanctification.

4. If a supernatural hand did not govern the world, how could things come to pass so long foretold? Or how could they be so long foretold before they come to pass? What man can prognosticate what particular event shall happen in this land a thousand years hence, if the world so long continue? There is nothing in nature, nothing in art, nothing in the stars to make man thus wise. Let God inspire him, he can presently specify it. Josiah is named some two hundred and sixty years before he was born, 1 Kings 13:2, and that he should then do the prophet speaks of as now in acting. Future things are present to the eternal. What are some centuries of years to the 'ancient of days?' What a perfect record is there of all names in the rolls of heaven, before they be, after they be passed? At the giving they seem to be contingent in the wills of the parents or witnesses, yet were they before under the certainty of the divine knowledge, and are better known in heaven, ere they be, than upon earth whiles they are. God knows what names we shall have before we have a being, yea, he knew them before the world was; and to testify this knowledge he doth sometimes specially name the man whom many years after shall produce. There cannot be a more clear and certain evidence of a true God than the prescience of those things, whose very causes have yet no hope of being. No tongue, O Lord, but thine could declare it, no hand but thine accomplish it.

5. By comparison. Man doth his business with prudence and circumspection; and shall not God be more provident over his work? It is a proverb in Pindarus, homines etiam triduanum prænoscunt ventum, 'Who hath put wisdom into the inward parts, or understanding into the heart.' How wise is he that makes man so wise? How should it be that homo providus conderetur a Deo non provido? 'He that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?' Ps. 94:10. In all things the cause is nobler than the effect, the workman better than his work. The very ants have a providence. As if they foresaw a dear year, they gather more greedily, and fill their garners fuller. 'The stork, turtle, and crane know their appointed times,' Jer. 8:7. Who endued them with such a sagacity but a most provident God? Some write of the mice, others of the spiders, that ruinam domus præsentiant. They foresee the ruin of a house, and get them gone ere it fall. How do the birds build their nests with secrecy and cunning? the foxes and hares make and keep their mounds and burrows? Lord, they all acknowledge thy providence, 'in whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind,' Job 12:10.

6. My last argument is from the feeling of every man. Let him that receives not good from this providence deny it. Bonum est quod omnia appetunt.* It is undoubted in speculation, experimented in action. We cannot see the goodness that is in God, but the goodness that is from God we may; not goodness in the subject, but in the object. There is lux in lucido, and lumen in diaphano. Now, so generous an offspring must needs argue a divine parent; and in the fruit we have an image of the tree. Nor is this goodness confined only to the orb of Israel, as if the world had no portion out of God's treasury. His goodness extendeth her sweetness, no less than his omnipotency doth her power. As no man lives that enjoys not the light and heat of his visible sun, so no man continues living but by the beams of this invisible goodness. 'He left not himself without witness, in that he did good,' Acts 14:17. Not that everything is universally good for all things, but everything is good for something. Vult Deus omnibus bonum, non vult omnibus omne bonum. So that which antipathises against one thing sympathiseth with another. What is poison to one is another's food. Things bad to us were not from a bad beginning, as the Manichee would persuade an ignorant man, when flies molested him, that the devil made flies. We have too many such Manichees, that think what is repugnant to their humours is not good.† In an artificer's shop there be instruments wherewith a rude handler may cut his fingers; shall he therefore condemn them, or him that doth dexterously use them? We will not do this in a shop, and shall we in the world vilify such things as God useth to his glory? We know not why frogs or flies or worms were made, yet we see them good in their kind, though sometimes noxious to us. Now, if those things be so good that are made of nothing, and changed in time, how incomprehensible is the goodness and sweetness of their maker?‡ 'Lord, the eyes of all things wait upon thee,' Ps. 145:15, and thou sustainest them.

Conclusion—It is the common course of the world to undervalue God's goodness. His favours of the day are forgotten before night, and his protection in the night finds no thanks in the morning. If things go well with us we think it no more than our due; if ill, we are ready to quarrel with God's providence. Yea, is not his goodness ravished and misused to the encouragement of our badness? Do we not convert his bounty to our impenitency, his forbearance to our hardness? Do we not wilfully offend him, while (we must confess) he doth graciously defend us? Do we not lift up our sword against him that is our buckler? and wrestle against that mercy which would save us? So little do we acknowledge his goodness towards us, that we make use of it to our own ill. There be millions of causes why we should honour God. It is hard if this one cannot prevail with us, that he does us good. Solomon was said to be without compare, 1 Kings 3:12, yet even the helies exceeded him, Luke 12:27, saving only in this, that he was sensible and apprehensive of God's goodness, which the other were not. To leave outward benefits, look into thine own bosom. There is enough to make thee cry out Quam bonus Dominus! If the multitude of his mercies could be numbered, or their greatness measured, when we recollect our own sins we had cause to despair. But seeing our sins may be numbered and measured, and his mercies cannot, we may be comforted in him that overcomes our evil with his goodness. He is offended, and forbears; provoked, and yet blesses.

We sin, he delays to punish. We are peevish, and he is patient. If we repent he pardons us. If we return he receives us. While we linger he prevents us. So above measure, O Lord, art thou good to us. Make us in some measure good to thee.

Thus in general of the divine providence. Now, God governs the world with means, or without means. Without, so he made heaven and earth without an instrument, trees to grow without a sun. Man's first garment was of leather, without means God made it. He caused the Israelites' apparel to last forty years without mending. The hungry lions shall fawn upon Daniel, the inflamed furnace not singe a hair of those three martyrs; seas and rivers shall forbear their wonted courses; rocks shall pour out waters; the prophet's cloak shall divide Jordan; iron shall swim; the sun shall stand still for Joshua, go back for Hezekiah; five loaves shall feed thousands. Above nature, against nature, can our Maker effectuate his will. With means; such are rational, as angels and men; or irrational, which is the course of nature, created by his wisdom, conserved by his goodness. Among which, I take the sun and rain as two principal instances; and as you may taste the sea by a drop, so in this abridgment consider his universal providence.

'He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good; and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust,' Matt. 5:45.

1. The sun; this is one of God's common blessings, a most excellent piece of this fabric, by which many benefits are conveyed to all creatures. The world without it were like a fair house without a window, or a goodly person without an eye. It is admirable and effectual.

(1.) For extension of heat; every creature receives warmth from it. Therefore the philosopher calls it principium generationis: generat hominem homo et sol. Naturally, no life can be received or preserved without heat; now, 'nothing is hid from the heat thereof,' Ps. 19:6; therefore it may be called universalis mundi ignis. But some countries are exceeding cold; how then doth this sun extend his heat to all? To all, but not to all alike: the remoteness of it to some places, and at some times, was by God's first institution, who gave it an ecliptic line, and bade it run so. The spring would not be so welcome if there was no winter, heat itself would annoy were it continual. Yet even to the furthest climates it sends so much warmth, as they must perish without it.

(2.) For communication of light; God in the creation drew together all that light he had made, and gathered it to the body of the sun, that from that treasury all the world might be enriched. Therefore it may be called universalis mundi oculus, the world's eye: we cannot see the sun's light but by the light of the sun. The true value of such a benefit, those old muffled Egyptians, and such as now live in disconsolate dungeons, can sufficiently prize, The best thing that ever came to mankind is called 'the light,' John 9:5. Our bodies were blind heaps of earth without the sun, our souls dark shadows without Christ.

(3.) For distinction of times; that we may know the term of time, from the beginning of the world to the end. The computation of the year depends upon it; by it spring is discerned from summer, autumn from winter. In the accomplishing of some extraordinary work, God hath often put an extraordinary sign in the sun. When he threatens to make the rivers of Egypt run with the blood of the inhabitants, he says, 'I will cover the sun with a cloud,' Ezek. 32:7. When he gave that miraculous conquest over five kings and their kingdoms, 'The sun stood still in Gibeon.' When he prolonged the days of sick Hezekiah, 'the sun went back on the dial of Ahaz.' At the death of our Saviour, the sun was totally eclipsed, the moon being then in the full; which caused a great astronomer to say, *Vel Deus naturæ patitur, vel mundi machina dissolvitur. At his coming to judgment, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon turned to blood. For the ordinary works of nature, as ploughing, sowing, planting, &c., ordinary signs are sufficient. So the sun may be called universale mundi horologium, the great clock or dial of the world. It is a creature that continually looks upon us, and we look upon it, yet forget to read the goodness of our Maker in it. Let us not worship it, like sottish Indians; but worship God for it, like good Christians.

2. Facit solem suum, he maketh His sun to shine; the sun in the firmament is God's sun, not ours. 'The world is mine, and the fulness thereof. The earth is the Lord's,' Ps. 50:12; his, not ours; we walk upon it, but it is 'his footstool,' Matt. 5:35. To shew it is his, he causeth it to help his servants: 'The earth helped the woman,' Rev. 12:16, by swallowing up the flood cast out of the dragon's mouth. To confound his adversaries, 'the earth opened, and swallowed up Dathan.' 'The sea is his, he made it,' Ps. 106:17; and he made it devour his rebels. The sea will shew the Egyptians that it regards the rod of Moses, not the sceptre of Pharaoh, Exod. 14:26; and as if she were glad of such an advantage over God's enemies, she shuts her mouth upon them, swallows them into her stifling bowels; and after she had made sport with them awhile, casts them upon her sands, for a spectacle of triumph to their adversaries. Neither sea nor land do naturally divide themselves. The sea is moist and flowing, and will not be divided for the continuity of it; the earth is dry and massy, and will neither naturally open nor shut again when it is opened. Yet to shew that both sea and land are the Lord's, the waters did part in twain, to give way to the Israelites for their deliverance; and the earth did cleave, to give way to those conspirators for their vengeance: both earth and sea did shut their jaws again upon God's adversaries. There was great wonder in both. It was marvel that the waters opened, no marvel that they did shut again; for their ebbing and flowing is natural. A marvel that the earth opened, but a greater that it did shut again; because it hath no natural disposition to meet when it is divided. But in both we see that God can use his creatures to his own pleasure, and make them spill or preserve with ease. 'The waters saw it, and fled; Jordan was driven back,' Ps. 14:3.

The waters know their Maker: when Christ was baptized, Jordan did flow and fill its banks; when the same God leads Joshua through it in state, the waters must run back to the fashion of walls, and leave the channel dry. As if a sinew were broken, it recoils to both issues, and stands in admiration of its commander. What a sight was this to their heathen enemies, to see the waters make both a lane and a wall for Israel! Neither do they run hastily through this strange way, as if they feared lest the tide should return; but they pace gently, in a slow march, knowing that watery wall to be stronger for them than walls of brass could be against them. He that seeks not a ford for their passage, but cuts the waves, shews the sea to be his, and every creature observant to him. He could have made Jordan like some solid pavement of crystal for their conveyance; but this had not been so magnificent, every great frost can congeal the water in a natural course. But for a running stream to stand still, to give back, and mount to heaps, till it become a liquid wall, is for nature to run out of herself, to do homage to her Creator. O how glorious a God do we serve, to whom all elements do willingly submit themselves, and are glad to be what he pleaseth to make them! 'The day is thine, and the night is thine; thou hast made the light and the sun, summer and winter,' Ps. 74:16. The heaven is his, the earth is his, the sea his, the sun his: if he bid it shine, it shineth; if he chargeth it to forbear, it hides its face. At his appointment it runs forward like a giant, at his rebuke it runs back like a coward. Mortal men boast of their lands, of their gold and silver, of their flocks and herds; but 'the earth is the Lord's, and all that is therein;' 'every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills,' Ps. 50:10. In all things there is God's superscription; therefore 'give unto God the things that be God's.' Let us not go from the Maker to the creature, but rather let every creature direct us to the Maker.

3. Facit, He doth make his sun to rise; not only hath at the beginning, but still doth. By virtue of his providence, the sun shineth, the earth fructifieth, everything retains the ingrafted power. 'Hitherto my Father worketh, and I work,' John 5:17. He did not leave all to be governed by others, neither by intelligences nor by angels, as one makes a clock, and leaves it to the sexton's keeping; but he continually moves upon the world, as the Spirit did on the waters, not to hatch a new world, but to conserve the former. So long as the spring runs, the river holds its wonted stream; if that once be dry, her channels will be soon empty. God is that fountain which supplies every creature, and there is nothing which his manutenancy upholds not. As it is a sun, and his sun, so the virtue it hath to light and heat is from his maintenance, that God may be all in all.

You will say, We are not heathen, to doubt these things. Nay, the very heathen should not have doubted these things. The whole world is a harp, every string whereof cannot be moved and touched in so sweet a harmony without an infinite God; yet as some little children call every man they see their father, so those blind naturals mistook everything for their maker. As Œdipus, in the poets, knew in general that he had a father, but knew not who his father was, and therefore such was his misfortune that whom he carefully sought he unwillingly slew; so muffled pagans know there is a God, but not what this God is. Therefore, while they do not diligently seek him, they ignorantly blaspheme him. 'But now, ask the beasts, and they shall teach thee,' &c., Job 12:7, &c. Every creature hath a trumpet in its mouth to proclaim the Deity. All are regii professores, professors of that great King, preachers of his divinity; and the name of being they bear is thus written, 'The Providence of God.' This is a witness of such duration, that no time can obliterate it; yea, time itself remonstrates it, and eternity shall more clearly explain it.

Had God written the book of his providence as he did the book of his law and gospel, with pen and ink, it had been understood only by the learned.* The rich might have bought it, the poor wanted it, the greater number know no more than their own language; therefore, he wrote this argument in every man's tongue: 'Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, Cretes and Arabians, &c., all hear in their own tongues the wonderful works of God,' Acts 2:11. Critics would have been as busy in corrupting the elements as they are now in abusing words, had this been committed to books. Yea, because nature is so diametrically repugnant to transubstantiation, the Council of Trent would have condemned it, or at least forbade it the laics in a vulgar tongue. Our atheists had then been heretics, and, turning over nature's text, would have interpreted it by the devil's comment. But this book of universal providence is too heavy to be transported, too clear to be corrupted, too high to be reached with profane hands, too strong to be torn, too open to be shut, too plain to be misconstrued. 'The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork,' Ps. 19:1; his handiwork, not only the manufacture but manutenance of his hand. These things we do not deny, but we do not mind; the creatures be always in our eye, often in our hand, in our mouth, in our sense, when God is not in our heart. There is no creature but tells us with an audible voice, I am not he thou seekest, but I subsist in him whom thou seekest in me; he that made me and thee hath set me here to direct thee to himself, that all glory might be his. If we shall honour the sun and forget God, this is truly to 'come out of God's blessing into the warm sun.'

4. The rain to fall. This is another of those common blessings whereby the divine providence enricheth the world, the rain. Calidum et humidum are the two pillars of our life. The sun is called principium generationis, propter calorem; the rain, propter humorem: the one, ratione agentis; the other, ratione materiæ. Without heat, moisture would drown; without moisture, heat would parch. Without the sun, the world would be sick of a dropsy; without rain, it would be sick of a burning fever. Either of them severed would destroy it; both together do preserve it. Summer would over-dry the earth, and, by drawing up vapours, infect the air, and breed pestilences, did not winter check it. Winter would extinguish life, benumb the earth, and rot the plants, did not summer relieve it. Winter is like an old man, cold, but froward, pettish, testy enough; summer like a young gallant, hot and fiery. These two would never agree together; therefore the spring and autumn, like men of more temperate dispositions, stand between them to part them. Fire and water, we say, can never agree; yet thus hath the wise providence disposed, that by the concurrence of these contraries the consort of things should be preserved.

The sun draws up moisture, makes it a cloud, rarefies it; and as he took it from the earth, sends it back again in beneficial showers. A special means whereby the earth fructifies; 'Thou makest it soft with showers, thy paths drop fatness, and the little hills rejoice on every side,' Ps. 65:10 to the end. Therefore, the 'rain and fruitful seasons' are often united, Acts 14:17. This is one of those keys which God entrusteth to neither angel nor seraphim, 'I will give you rain in due season,' Deut. 11:14; I, not the sun, not heaven, not an angel. The heavens, indeed, are ordinary instruments and second agents, but so subordinate to the first worker, that in their actions he doth more than they. 'I will hear the heavens, and the heavens shall hear the earth, and the earth shall hear the fruits, and they shall hear Jezreel,' Hos. 2:22. Our life is maintained by the fruits, the fruits are beholden to the earth, that to the heavens, they and all to the Lord. He gives that influence to the heavens which they give to the earth. The heaven like a father, the earth a mother, the children they bring forth are fruits, and these are for us. For God ordained not the heavens for their own sakes, but for ours; and it is a treasury whereof himself still keeps the key, opening and shutting it at his pleasure. 'Canst thou loose the bonds of Orion?' Job 38:31. He gives it here, he denies it there, 'causing it to rain upon one city, and not upon another,' Amos 4:7; restraining it in this place, to that enlarging it; sometimes so pouring it down that 'the ships howl' on the sea, Isa. 23:1, and sometimes so scanting it that the 'sheep mourn' on the land, Joel 1:20.

The Lord when he sends rain or drought respects our sin or obedience; he considers not in what position heaven is, but in what disposition we are. We look up to the heavens, God looks down upon us. We turn the almanac in vain; the best prognostication we are to rely upon is God's mercy and our own innocency. 'He turns dry land into springs of water,' Isa. 41:18, to relieve the good; and 'a fruitful land into barrenness,' Ps. 107:34, to punish the bad. The Scripture speaks of no conjunctions nor oppositions of stars, no eclipses of the sun, whereby to gather what God will do, that we should study them. But this is God's rule, 'If ye consent and obey, ye shall eat the good of the land,' Isa. 1:19. Many astrologers are so for natural causes, till they become natural fools. The stars, say they, work upon the elements, the elements upon compound bodies, the qualities of such bodies may change the senses, the senses being changed alter the understanding, the understanding inclines the will; therefore, the stars incline the will. This is like the drunkard's argument: He that drinks well sleeps well, he that sleeps well thinks no harm, he that thinks no harm is a good man; therefore, he that drinks much is a good man. It was a wiser answer of him that, being demanded the cause of those shelves about Sandwich haven, said it was the building of Tenterden steeple.

They have set one poor man dwelling at twelve signs; an anatomy they call it, as if he were to be dissected by twelve surgeons. Butchers deal better (as a reverend divine* wrote in his younger days), for they join head and purtenance together; but these divide the head, heart, and lungs to several owners; saving that the liver, one of the most noble parts, hath no governor. Perhaps in old time men had no livers. When crows part among them a dead sheep, every one gets somewhat; but here either the signs scrambled or else played foul play, for Capricorn got nothing but the knees. It may be, he came too late to the dividend, but compassion was had, and a gathering was made; Sagittarius gave him the lower part of the thigh, and Aquarius the upper part of the leg, both which together make up the knee.

Fond men! how they cozen others, and themselves! Those signs be not above where they look for them; they might look below and find them. The philosopher might have seen the stars in the water, he could not see the water in the stars, I am far from Copernicus's opinion, that the earth moves, and the heavens stand still; but what they imagine to find in the heavens, I am sure we find on the earth. Cancer is not there, but here many an apostate retrograde to goodness. Here is Scorpio, the slanderer and blasphemer; Ursa major and minor, and Draco, are not found there; here be those oppressors and covetous defrauders, serpents, and hydras, and dog-stars, and dog-days. There is no Taurus nor Capricornus, no Aries nor Leo, above; here be those bulls and goats, persecutors and unclean livers, lions rampant, and rams assailant. Only we may believe that Libra is in heaven, for justice and her even weights and scales are scarce to be found in earth.

The famines and wars, plagues and ruins, are not caused by the stars, nor to be read there; no constellations produce those dire effects, but our own sinful lives below. We are those wandering planets, that swerve from the holy line of truth; we those irregular stars, of so strange forms and names, that move in a lunatic orb, and keep not the orders and course which God hath prescribed us. Saturn with his malevolent influence, Venus with her tempting aspect, the trines, quadratures, bad conjunctions, and worse oppositions, are all beneath. The cause of good or evil seasons, is in our good or evil lives. Let us be good in the sight of heaven, and heaven shall be good to us; no star will be malignant to our bodies, if we nourish no bad affection in our souls. 'The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night,' Psa. 121:6. We fear no constellations, we fear our transgressions. We dread neither Jupiter's corruption, nor Mars's fever, nor Saturn's inflammation, nor Mercury's madness; only, O God of heaven and earth, let us fear thee and nothing else.

Seeing the providence of God so blesseth us with all necessary things, let us honour him with thankful praises. Even lewd persons, when they fare well at another man's cost, will say, 'God save the founders,' though themselves be the confounders and abusers of it. And shall not we, in sobriety of heart, bless that God who so blesseth us? If a man be ingrate for one benefit, give him a second; if for that, try him with a third; but if he slight this also, hold thy hand. God hath given us thousands; if we hold our mouth from praising him, he will hold his hand from prospering us. If the servant bury his one talent, he shall have no more. He that cannot husband a hundred, must not look to have a thousand. We that are unthankful for the sun and rain, have made ourselves unworthy of Christ. 'The outgoings of the morning and evening praise him;' yet we, over whose heads we know not whether the days or nights pass more merrily, forget him. Ingratitude loseth all, 'Take his talent from him,' Matt. 25:28. It deprives us of the good we have, it debars us of the good we might have, amittit data, præcludit danda. If men do not bless God for earthly things, he will not trust them with heavenly things. If Esau cannot keep his birthright, he shall lose his blessing. Because the Jews corrupted the law, they were defeated of the gospel; and not valuing their own kingdom, the kingdom of heaven was taken from them, and given to those that will be thankful. While we praise not God for the light of the sun, how should he give us the light of heaven? While we disregard the benefit of elemental rain to our bodies, how can we expect that elemental dew of grace to our souls? Lord, that we live not here in darkness, we are beholden to thy sun; that we are not scorched and consumed with heat, we are beholden to thy rain. Make us thankful for these, much more for thy spiritual showers of mercy, and the light of glory.

Thus in general of God's providence; now I come to the manner, parts, and kinds of it.

The manner of God's governing the world must be considered two ways, as it respects good, or as it respects evil. Evil is of two sorts, the fault, or the punishment.

Sin is governed of God by two actions. First, an operative permission; because he partly suffers it, and partly works in it. First, in sin, there is the subject and matter, which is a certain quality or action, and those so far forth as they are themselves are good, having existence in nature, and God for their author, so that though sin be sufficiently evil to condemnation, yet it is not absolutely evil, as God is absolutely good. There is an infinite good, there is no infinite evil; because the subject of evil is good, and hath in it regards of goodness. Secondly, and the form, which is an anomy or transgression. Now this latter, God neither willeth, nor ordaineth, nor commandeth, nor causeth, nor helpeth; but forbids, condemns, and punisheth. When Adam was tempted to fall, his understanding was good, his will good, affections good, the fruit good, all from God. But his using those to the breach of the commandment, was not good, but from Satan and himself. The wine in the cup is good, the stomach that receives it good, the lifting up of the hand good; but the abuse of all these to excess is bad, and man's sin. The eye lusteth: the eye is good, the lustful look sinful. The hand striketh; the motion is from God, but the injury by that motion is none of his work. God moves the sinning instrument, he does not move the instrument to sin; the action is from him, the defect from ourselves. He puts no wickedness into us; but the evil which he finds in us, he moves and orders by his infinite wisdom, the bad instrument not knowing the good which he intends. The blinded mill-horse goes on forward, and knows not but that he is in the ordinary way; he thinks himself whipped for one purpose, the miller knows it is for another. David was threatened that his bed should be incestuously defiled, 2 Sam. 12:11. The counsel of Ahithophel, the lust of Absalom, have but fulfilled this judgment of God. O that infinite wisdom! which can use the worst of evils well, and most justly make the sins of men his executioners. Neither is Absalom excusable by God's purpose, nor God chargeable with Absalom's fact. What if the Lord, for the correction of his own servant David, gave Shimei a tongue able to belch out such blasphemy, 2 Sam. 16:10; yet is Shimei's curse worthy of Abishai's sword. Wicked men are never the freer from guilt or punishment, for that end and hand which the holy God hath in their offensive actions. When David said, 'let him curse,' he meant to give a reason of his own patience, not of Shimei's impunity.

The true-hearted Israelites would fight against that usurping Jeroboam; God forbids them, by this reason, 'This thing is done of me,' 2 Chron. 11:4. The smart of that rebellion was from God, the sin of Jeroboam's rebellion was his own. God wills that as Rehoboam's punishment, which he hates as Jeroboam's wickedness. That conspiring hand moved from God, it moved conspiringly from Satan. When the brethren sold Joseph, and their posterity killed Jesus, neither did other than God purposed; neither meant to fulfil God's purpose in it. There is a difference to be put between the evil work of man, and the good work of God in it. A malefactor is condemned, sentenced to die; the executioner owes him a grudge, useth him hardly, by increasing his tortures, or prolonging his pains; the judge and executioner do both one and the same work; yet is it in the judge upright justice, in the executioner no less than murder. God so useth evil instruments, that he is free from the evil of the instruments. When he useth good instruments, men or angels, he works by them, and in them, guiding them by his Spirit, that they shall will what he willeth. When he useth evil, he only works by them, not in them; they shall do what he determines, yet are left to do as their own corruption suggests. Secondly, Therefore his second action in the government of sin, consists in repressing and disposing it. He restrains men, that they shall not do what evil they would, and disposeth it to the good which they would not.

For the evil of punishment, it is but the execution of his justice, 1 Kings 22:22; Amos 3:6: evil it may be to the sufferer, is good in the inflicter. Thus he is said to blind the eyes, and to harden the heart, Exod. 7:13; Isa. 19:14; Rom. 1:28; and so must all such places be understood, 2 Thess. 2:11.

In respect of good, which be the natures and substances of all creatures, even of the devils, the quantities, qualities, motions, actions, inclinations, simply considered in themselves, are good. There is a natural good, which God created for our use, and a moral good, which he ordained for our practice. Now, these he governs sustinendo, that they decay not, and promovendo, by driving them to their own particular ends.

Let us learn here in what awful reverence to hold the divine providence, which makes that is good to be good to us, and keeps what is evil from us. Therefore we pray, Libera nos a malo; à malo homine, à malo dæmone, from evil men, from evil spirits, from evil works, from our own evil selves. The devil is like a Saul, bent with a javelin against us: wicked men like Shimei, gnashing their teeth at us, desirous to crush our bones. We have Absaloms and Ahithophels, affections and opinions, the children of our own bosoms, and counsel of our own brains; all conspire against us feeble Davids, yet the Lord delivers us from them all. 'They compass us like bees,' Ps. 118:12. Many are the evils we see and fear not, many we fear and see not, many we both see and fear, many we neither see nor fear. He whose eye of providence never sleeps, whose hand of governance never rests, doth still defend us. Satan is such a malicious and potent evil that, let God give him but leave, he would destroy us in a moment; the world would sink us in the inundation of sin. Our own hearts are false to ourselves; and we need no worse an enemy than that we cherish within us. Still this gracious providence delivers us.

The kinds of this divine providence are two—general and special. General is that which extends itself to the whole world, and all things in it, indifferently, even to the reprobate angels. By this he maintains the order which he first did set in nature, preserving the life, being, substance of all. The qualities and virtues placed in the sun, stars, trees, seeds, herbs, would otherwise lie in them dead and unprofitable. He governs the world per οἰκονομίαν, as a monarch in his kingdom: κατ' εὐδοκίαν, according to his good pleasure, decreeing them to salvation whom he hath loved, and bringing salvation to them whom he hath decreed. Some add μετὰ συγχώρησιν, by concession, as he grants victories to Turks against Christians, and makes the wicked fortunate. 'All things (are said to) consist in God,' in respect—1. Of ubiquity: he comprehends all things, and is comprehended of nothing. The 'nations are but a drop of his bucket,' and time but a drop of his eternity. 2. Of omnipotency: in his power the whole frame stirreth; the heavens could not move without him. 3. Of omniscience: all are within his knowledge, and from it receive their order, as soldiers their directions from their captains. 4. Of decree: because the world did from everlasting hang in his foreknowledge and preordination. Thus they consist in him; both for order, all agreeing in one glorious frame; for continuance, that no substance in specie that was at first made ever ceased, and the very singulars of every sort do consist in individuo; and for cooperation, all following his manuduction and rule. Thus, there is no creature that is not beholden to God, for being upholden by God.

St Paul tells the heathen that he did 'fill their heart with food and gladness,' Acts 14:17. The heart being synecdochically taken for the whole man; for as food is the principal staff of life, so the heart hath a principal operation in our food. Not but that a gentile may want food sometimes, when as even an apostle was 'in hunger,' 2 Cor. 11:27, and a patriarch driven to change his dwelling for famine, Gen. 12:10. This filling is (not according to the insatiate desire of lust) sufficient to satisfy nature, not to content humour; not what man's folly may expetere, require, but what God's wisdom sees expedire, convenient. But his hand is open to all. Reprobates that hate him fare the better for him, by his gifts. Their eyes stand out with fatness, that set their mouths against heaven. Many think of their wealth, as they say of venison, so they have it, they never inquire unde, from whence it comes. But albeit thou mayest con the devil thanks for the manner of getting thy riches, yet thou art indebted to God for the substance itself. And thou that wouldst not pay God thy service for the substance, must pay Satan thy soul for the circumstance, like him that will hire his house of one, and pay his rent to another. Acknowledge his goodness, or thou shalt feel his justice.

His special providence is that whereby he governs and blesseth his church, gathering them by his gospel, guiding them by his grace, and preserving them by his mighty power unto salvation, Isa. 43:1, 2. This doth not only wrap them up under the general blessing of his protection, but enlivens them with the Spirit of his special operation. It doth not only respect them as men, but as Christians; not only as them in whom his image was once created, but as men in whom this image is again renewed. His general providence communicates good to all, that in him they 'live, move, and have their being.' His special to his children, gives them the life of comfort, the motion of grace, the being of happiness. Others have the blessedness of life, these have the life of blessedness. He often fills others' bones with marrow, their barns with com, their purses with money, their bellies with his hidden treasures; but he fills the 'hearts' of his chosen 'with gladness.' Ps. 4:7. When a man apprehends a distasteful object, the heart contracts itself, and calls in the spirits which it was wont to send forth, whereupon the outward members tremble, and the face looks pale and wan. But when he conceives a pleasing object, the heart dilates itself, dispersing spirits into the outer parts, to give more scope of delight and enjoyment. Though this providence do such good to the wicked, that their table stands full of delicates, and their cups of wine, Dan. 5:6; yet 'even in laughter the heart is sorrowful, and the end of that mirth is heaviness.' But to the faithful, 'His blessing maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow with it.'

If wealth could give content, why should rich men ever be sad? If honours, why cannot crowns keep our cares? No, man's triangular heart can never be filled with this globular world; but some corner will be empty, still there will be room for more. Only the three persons of the infinite Deity can replenish it with sweet satisfaction, to the utmost capacity of it.

This special care of the church is in Jesus Christ, 'in whom consist all things,' Col. 1:17. 1. Because he is that atonement which keeps the world from being dissolved by Adam's fall. 2. Because the comfortable use of all the creatures is recovered to us, by a covenant or patent of mercy in him. 3. Because the respect to him and his church keeps the world up to this day, which being once complete, it should not stand one hour. Thus 'all things are ours, because we are his, and he is God's,' 1 Cor. 3:22. All things: the scriptures for direction, sacraments for confirmation, angels for protection, creatures for sustentation, crosses for correction, death itself for the way to perfection. By what tenure do we hold all? By deed of gift. In whom granted? In Christ. 'Grace, mercy, and peace, from God our Father, and Jesus Christ our Lord,' 1 Tim. 1:2. Ut Deus scit, ut Pater vult, ut Dominus potest, ut noster debet Jesus Salvator in hoc, Christus unctus ad hoc. 'I AM, saith the Lord,' Exod. 3:6; calling himself so, he is the God of all; 'The God of Abraham;' so he is the God of his elect in Christ: 'I am thy God, O Israel!' Our God. (1.)

Ours, ob specialem cultum, we serve him. (2.) Ours, ob specialem curam, he preserves us. (3.) Ours, ob specialem mercedem, he will give us his own inheritance. Benjamin's mess exceeds the rest, Gen. 43:34. All Jehoshaphat's children have fair legacies; Jehoram goes away with the kingdom, 2 Chron. 21:3. These God calls his jewels, Mal. 3:17; other be but his ordinary vessels, these be his jewels. He gives common persons enough to make them happy for this world; he enricheth his children with the blessings of the world to come.

1. Seeing this eye of providence is everywhere, and no work, no thought is hid from it, let us walk as in his presence. If the king had an eye to see every act, an ear to hear every word in his kingdoms, durst the Seminary whisper treason, or the mutinous incense rebellion? Adultery dares not abuse the wife in sight of the husband, though he doth often in spite of the husband. 'Will he force the queen before my face,' saith Ahasuerus? Esth. 7:8. The servant will not steal from his master looking on; yet men rob God to his face. Do we think he sees us not? 'He that made the eye, shall not he see?' Can we put out the eye of knowledge itself? There is nothing so secret and abstracted from men's senses, ut creatoris aut lateat cognitionem, aut effugiat potestatem.* He that stands on the bank, sees only the water running by him; but from a high tower, he sees the present stream, the water that is coming on, and that gone by. God on the battlements of heaven beholds all. The sun is the world's eye, yet the interposition of the earth keeps him from seeing us in the night. God sees in the night, the 'darkness and light are all one to him,' Ps. 139:12. But, alas! men live as if this eye was put out; there sits one scorning holy things, in a holy place; another plotting his neighbour's ruin; a thousand sins in a thousand several shapes, projecting to themselves prosperity in their unrighteous courses. But all this while God is forgotten, as if these were not 'to be found sinners,' Gal. 2:17. Though he seems now to connive, yet he will 'judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ,' Rom. 2:16. Men may by their sins hide God from themselves, they can never hide themselves from God. We are never out of his sight; therefore let him see us so live in grace, that we may live to see him in glory.

2. Let us be patient in all estates, seeing nothing can happen to us but by the disposition of this providence. The body is inseparable from the soul during life, yet we see not the soul, but the body only. So we cannot sever God's providence from the act done, yet we see the act more clearly than his providence. Therefore we have two eyes, that if we fasten one upon the visible calamity, we may fix the other on God's invisible mercy. Thou art deprived of thy health, estate, friends, or liberty; I deny not that thou shouldst look on these miseries, and in those sorrowful characters read thy own deserts; but withal, behold the hand that sent them. These be like shavings, to make us smooth and straight; if God pare us to the quick, it is because we should feel it; that so being sensible of the smart, we might amend the fault. If this act of providence can effectuate our patience; then as the stars do shine in the night that be hid all day, so our Christian courage, that lay obscure in the sunshine of prosperity, by the night of affliction shall appear more glorious.

3. Let us believe that God will provide for us; this is a main strength of this article. This was Abraham's faith; Dominus providebit, Gen. 22:8. We desire and have not, because we ask not; we ask and have not, because we believe not. Never man wanted provision that trusted in this providence. God lacks neither will, nor skill, nor power to help us. We call him 'almighty,' therefore believe that he can; 'our Father,' therefore hope that he will; and that he may never be to seek, we know whither to go to him; 'which art in heaven,' he is always at home. He is called 'Jehovah,' not only because of his independent being, present to all times and places, Of all other things we may say, either they were and are not, or they are and were not, or they were and are, but shall not be; but Jehovah is the same for ever. God and Lord have been communicated to some creatures; never Jehovah. But also because of his mercy to his church; a constant care to provide for them. What is made, is mutable; but the Maker is as good, as merciful, as gracious, as ever he was. He will make good all his promises; man promiseth out of his poverty, what he cannot perform; or out of his folly, what he should not perform; or out of his falsehood, what he will not perform. God can, for he is rich; knows, for he is wise; will, for he is faithful that hath promised. 'I have set the Lord always before me, therefore I shall not be moved,' Ps. 16:8. When David's soldiers threatened to stone him, 'he comforted himself in God,' 1 Sam. 30:6. Nothing shall dismay us, if we believe. If the challenger be on the left hand to defy us, we have a champion on the right to defend us; if the invader be behind, the protector is before us. When Stephen was fallen under that shower of stones, he saw Christ 'standing at the right hand of God,' Acts 7:55. 'Standing;' often do we read him 'sitting' at the right hand, here 'standing.' In common distress he sits still, and so (as it were with ease) strengthens us; but in this sore conflict, when his enemies were mad with rage, and the first martyr was to encounter death for his name, he stands up, like a champion vowing to revenge his own quarrel. 'Lord, let thy mercy light upon us, as we do put our trust in thee;' 'Lord, in thee have I trusted; let me never be confounded.'

There be three sorts of men not rectified in their faith concerning God's providence. First, Some will not believe that he will do anything, unless they can cast about how he may conveniently do it; as if he could not cross the sea without making a bridge. Secondly, Some are so supinely dependent on this providence, that they neglect all appointed means, and look to be fed by miracle. Thirdly, Others will not believe that he favours any man's cause, when he affects his person; and so think that people's faith not to be worth the keeping, whom God suffers to be losers by it. The first gives God less than he should have, the next gives him more than he would have; the former, too little; the other, too much; the last give him nothing at all. Against those three errors I propose my next three directions.

4. We must not tie the divine providence to means; as if God knew not how to preserve us, because we cannot prescribe him the manner. That prince thought, God must needs 'make windows in heaven,' 2 Kings 7:2, and rain bread, or else that prophecy must fail. But as he heard it with his ears, and would not believe it with his heart; so his judgment was to see it with his eyes, and not taste it with his mouth. True faith hath learned to trust God without means; it is but a sorry faith that trusts him with means, it is no faith at all that ties him to means. Let us bind all means to God's providence, bind his providence to no means.

How often did that unfaithful Israel distrust their known God for unknown means? Merciless Pharaoh is behind them, a not more merciless sea before them; and now they cry out, as if God knew not how to save them. Lo, his mercy is beyond their infidelity, they are delivered. Now they that had complained of too much water, go three days without; as if God meant to punish their unbelief with the defect, who had distrusted him for the abundance. Water was their fear, water shall be their want. Before they saw all water, and no land; now they see all dry land, and no water. Well, after three days God sends them water; will they yet trust him? But what was it? 'bitter water,' Exod. 15:23; long thirst will make bitter water seem sweet, but these could not be endured. The wells ran pure gall; they liked their moisture, but abhorred their relish. Lo, God sweetens the waters; will they yet trust him? No; now they complain as fast of hunger. 'He sent us indeed streams of water, but can he give bread also? can he provide flesh for his people?' Ps. 78:20. Here was drink, and meat. Now, as if there was as little possibility of the thing, as visibility of the means, they cry out with less hope than they that gather relief for prisoners do at the doors of usurers; bread and meat! God, to try them further, and to magnify his own power, gives them what they ask, and more(?). They desire flesh, and receive quails; they beg bread, and have manna. Had it been the coarsest flesh, and the basest pulse, hunger would have eaten it without sauce, and thought it dainty. But God doth not only supply, but pamper them; gives them the meat of kings, and the bread of angels. By what means? Do they till the ground, plough and sow? they might have perished before harvest; neither was the wilderness fit for increase. Do they reap, and thrash, and grind, and bake? No, God prepares this bread to their hands. Other bread ariseth from the earth, this comes down from heaven. Do they spread their nets, whistle, call for the quails? do they go a fowling for their dinners? These be ordinary means. No; they travel not to seek the quails, the quails travel to seek them. They come not by instinct of nature, but by the power of the Creator; needs must they come, whom God brings.

Take one instance more. The same Israelites see those walled cities, whose height yet was not answerable to their report, Josh. 6:2; the fame so affrighted them, ere their eyes beheld them, that they were likely to say in distrust, How shall we scale those invincible fortifications? what engines can batter such towers? God prevents their unbelief; tradidi in manum tuam, 'I have delivered them into thy hand.' Were their walls higher than eagles could soar over, this is enough for their downfall. For on whose earth have they raised those castles? out of whose treasury digged those piles of stones? Who gave them art, strength, and time to build? Be their foundations deep as hell, their battlements above the clouds, their soldiers giants, their commanders made up of policy and valour, this same 'I have delivered them to thee,' is enough to vanquish all. Means can do nothing without God, much less against God. But still the want of means dismays Israel, and flatters Jericho; these do not fear, the other cannot hope. Lo, on a sudden, the walls fall down of themselves! They had silver trumpets, yet must use rams' horns; they had swords and arms, they use only their voices and feet; means poor enough, but the rich power of God performs all.

Let these examples strengthen our faith in this providence. The gates or hell are stronger than the walls of Jericho; yea, we do not besiege Satan, but Satan besiegeth us; the fortifications of sin are to nature utterly invincible. Yet by means that appears contemptible to the world, they shall be overthrown and triumphed over, 1 Cor. 1:27. How weak soever water appears in the font, bread and wine at the table, or man's voice in the pulpit, for so great a work, yet even by these doth the unlimited power of God save our souls. If he were bound to means, he would have kings his orators and angels his preachers, and not poor ministers; but he will have us owe all the honour of our salvation only to himself. Do we want sustainments? we cannot be nearer driven than God's own people in the wilderness.

Cities have bread, but thou wantest money; they had money, but the wilderness had no bread. God sends it; how? by a leisurely providence? were sowers, mowers, millers, bakers employed in it? No; we are under these means, God is above them. 'Can he furnish a table in the wilderness?' Ps. 78:19. Yes, even in the places of extremest scarcity. The fowls shall come in flocks, like obedient creatures, at their Maker's call, and offer themselves to their slaughter. We do not so willingly serve him for our preferment and salvation. Who can distrust the great Housekeeper of the world, when he sees such provision in his storehouse, and that he can furnish tables in the wilderness?

Did he so then, and cannot he do so now? Is he growing careless? or rather we faithless? He that made one suit last forty years whole, shall not we trust him for clothing? Do we think it impossible to be sustained because we want money? Paul speaks of 'content in food and raiment;' he mentioned not money. I have known many children want, whose fathers did put confidence in their moneys; I never knew any want whose fathers did put their confidence in God. How many orphans in this city are left without portion or patrimony, yea, knowledge of their own parents. God provides that they do not perish, Hos. 14:3. He still stirreth up one heart or another, by one means or another, to comfort the poorest. The Israelites never fared so well as when they were at God's immediate finding, and in the morning expected their breakfast from heaven.

But now, you say, God works by no miracles. As if he could not find means, because he will do no miracles! As if nature was not his servant, to do as he bids her! What if he does not keep the widow's meal from wasting by expense, when he sends her every day new meal? What if he do not multiply our old store, when he supplies us with new? What if we have no bread left in the evening, when he gives us 'every day our daily bread?' We are taught to beg bread for the day, not that this day's bread should last us the whole year. While our provision holds out, we have less occasion to pray; it is our sensible want and dependence on God that gives wings to our devotion.

Yea, even still God works miracles, though we take no notice of them. That our hearts should be converted by preaching, this is a miracle. That our faith should believe above reason, this is a miracle. That Satan doth not destroy us, this is a miracle. If he does not fetch water out of a rock, yet he fetcheth repentance out of sin, and makes the stony heart gush out tears; this is a greater miracle. If he does not turn water into wine, yet he turns our sorrow into joy; as great a miracle. If he does not feed five thousand bodies with a few loaves, yet he feeds five thousand souls with one sermon; as great a miracle. If he does not open the corporeal eyes of one born blind, yet he enlightens the understanding that was born blind to spiritual things; no less a miracle. Still he cleanseth lepers, casteth out devils, raiseth the dead, straightens cripples, stops bloody issues; in a spiritual manner; no less miracles. Why do we not trust him without a miracle, who will work miracles from heaven rather than we shall want provision upon earth? Why do we not repose upon his mercy? Lord, thy hand is not shortened to give, let not ours be shortened or shut to receive! Why do ye not wait on him, whom we have found so powerful, so merciful? We set the mercy and love of God upon a wrong last, while we measure it only by our present sense. Nature is jocund and cheerful while it prospereth: let God but withdraw his hand, no sight, no trust. Many can praise him for a present favour, that cannot depend upon him in the want of means for a future. We are all never weary of receiving, we are soon weary of attending.

5. Let us use ordinate means, but not trust unto them. So must we accept the means, that we rely on his providence; and so rely on his providence, that we do not neglect the means. Man hath two apprehensive instruments, his hand and his heart; and there lie before him two objects, the divine providence and ordinary means; this natural, that supernatural. Now, if he shall misplace these, and lay hold on the wrong object, his error is fearful; as when he shall give God his hand, and the means his heart; his hand to God, to work with his visible power; his heart to the means, as if there was his confidence. To beg that from heaven which lies before us on earth, is slothful negligence; to take that on earth, without trusting on the blessing of Heaven, is faithless diffidence. Shall the able sluggard lie on his back, and call God to help him up? Doth the soldier look that God should give him the victory, while he fights never a stroke? No; but 'let the praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand,' Ps. 149:6. So Joab: 'Let us play the men, and the Lord do what seemeth him good,' 2 Sam. 10:12. How did our Saviour disclaim trust in the means! There is other ways to live than by bread, Matt. 4:4; yet in due season he did eat, not refusing the means upon any presumption of this providence. So he repelled another temptation, descending by the stairs from the pinnacle, not the next way; he knew that the devil did but equivocate with him, leaving out 'in all his ways.'

God himself does not exercise this miraculous power when nature lies ready for his use: 'Take the rod in thy hand, wherewith thou smotest the river, and smite the rock,' Exod. 17:5. God could have done it by his will without a word, by his word without a rod; but he will do that by means, which he can as easily do without. Besides, what virtue was in the rod to cleave a rock? An axe, or stronger engine, cannot do this. There was no virtue in the rod, none in the stroke, but all in the command of God. Means we must use, but expect their efficacy out of themselves. They that use not the means to get faith and repentance, do no more indeed repent or believe than they can live that neither eat nor drink. As we say of a false friend, wheresoever I see him I will trust to myself; so wheresoever I meet the flattering world, I will trust to the everlasting Lord.

5. Let us not think the worse of a good cause, because this providence doth not always prosper it according to our expectation and desires. Because God doth not at once 'consume that man of sin,' shall we suspect our own religion? The men of Israel were smitten by the men of Ai, yet the men of Ai had not the true religion, but the men of Israel. Professors of the gospel in foreign parts are persecuted by the antichristians, spoiled of their countries, inheritances, privileges, peace; shall we therefore judge the divine providence, or fault the gospel? The Spirit of grace, and our holy faith forbid it. Because God doth not send them present deliverance, nor present likelihood of deliverance, shall we think he dislikes the cause, and so grow cool in our devotion at home, as if he neglected it abroad? Canaan was the Israelites' own land, long before they enjoyed it; being lineally descended from him that was first possessor of it next after the flood, and so right heirs; yet were they so long kept out of possession, that they were not able to set their title on foot, yea scarce knew their own title; yet God restored them to it.

From small and unlikely beginnings the divine providence produceth great effects. Against Sennacherib he did not stand to levy, muster, train, and arm soldiers; but took a nearer way; his angel making in one night, one hundred eighty-five thousand dead corpses, Isa. 37:36. To satisfy the prophet's servant, taken with a bodily fear, he did not so much as trouble an angel, but by a mere apparition in the clouds effected it, 2 Kings 5:16. Against the Philistines, with their thirty thousand chariots, he did not employ an angel, not a cloud, no creature at all; but struck a terror into their hearts, and they slew one another, 1 Sam. 14. So he reduced Gideon's two and thirty thousand to three hundred men, lest the augmentation of their forces should be the diminution of his honour. He will not be wooed with multitudes, when he means to fight himself. When God made the world, was it not of nothing? For the several creatures, made on several days, he had matter before him, stuff enough to cut them out of all sizes; in his first work there was the seed of all creatures. But for the stuff itself, heaven and earth, this he made of nothing; he had not any seed of heaven to which he might say, Do thou hatch out heavens, sun, orbs, or stars; he had no seed of earth to which he might say, Do thou hatch an earth. All at first was nothing, and from that nothing came all. Now he that made the whole earth of nothing, cannot he recover one piece of it with a little?

The church was very thin, when Elias knew of none but himself; God tells him of seven thousand more. Seven thousand was much to one, was little to all the world; yet these seven thousand have peopled heaven with armies of martyrs, flocks of lambs, saints without number, and replenished those places of glory, depopulated in the fall of angels, Rev. 7:9. Still God hath his 'remnant,' and out of that remnant he will make up the whole garment, Rom. 11:5. Often do we continue a sinful course of life, drown the holy graces in our hearts by habitual practices of naughtiness, fall asleep in our uncleanness, or covetousness, or intemperance, to the very forgetting of all devotion in God's service; and if we do hear, it is sleepily; if pray, perfunctorily. When we are roused from this spiritual slumber, and see the fearful estate we stand in, we begin with trembling to apprehend the anger of God, think his mercy inaccessible, his majesty inexorable; and are ready to sink into the gulf of desperation. Yet the Lord recovers us, there is 'the seed of God remaining' in us; upon which the Holy Ghost sits and hatcheth a new creature of us; and from that little beginning we are brought to a modest, but infallible, assurance of his mercy towards us.

Now weigh the means whereby he doth this; it is so small in appearance, that none can discern it but he that feels it. He suffered the magicians to counterfeit some of his greater works; but in the least, he brought them to acknowledge the finger of God. The finger, that was enough; the arm of God, the hand of God needs not; for what he will do, his finger is sufficient. Some rabbins held, that the devil could not make any creature less than a barley corn. As with men, it is harder to make a little clock, a little picture; Homer's Iliads in a nut-shell; anything in a little than in a larger form. Because it is so with men, they dreamed it to be so with Satan. But we that are apt to admire great works in small forms, why do we not believe that God will do great works with small means? Let this stay and pacify our hearts and tongues in all the great business of the world; the undertakings of princes, the discomfiting of armies, the restoring of inheritances, the malice of persecutors, the sufferings of saints. On this blessed providence let us all wait; without either presumptuous confidence, or cowardly diffidence; beseeching God to dispose of them, of us, of all, to his own glory. 'The poor committeth himself unto thee, for thou art the helper of the fatherless,' Ps. 10:14.

7. Let us take heed of ascribing any good thing to other cause than the divine providence. That old Chaldean superstition is devolved to us; we 'sacrifice to our nets,' Hab. 2:16, to our wits. A sin that God was so careful to prevent in his Israel; that the prophet was so heedful to avoid in himself. 'Not our own arm, not our own sword,' hath gotten us the victory, Deut. 8:17; therefore 'not unto us, not unto us, but to thy name give the glory,' Ps. 44:3. God gives us rain, and we are ready to praise the weather for it; he sends us plenty, we commend the earth; he grants us peace, we applaud our own power and policy. Preferment comes, then the plotting of our brains, the goodness of our friends, the success of our good fortunes, are only mentioned. Then, we are born under a lucky planet, we rise off our right sides; anything hath the honour, rather than he that owns it. It was the error of Israel to Aaron, facito nobis deos, 'make us gods to go before us;' but they were not so impudent as to say, facito nos deos, make us ourselves gods to go before others.

We are apt to erect images, and dress altars to ourselves; though Saturn be turned out of his kingdom, Plutus be confined to hell, and Phœbus have resigned his chariot. We do not call Paul Mercurius, and Barnabas Jupiter; we ourselves will be Jupiters and Mercuries, new earthly deities. From the worship of the pontifical 'beast,' many are relapsed to a new idolatry; instead of the pagan idols, sun and stars; instead of the popish idols, saints and angels; they are ready to do homage to themselves, dust and ashes; not thinking of the cause above, but of their own industry below. You need not run to Rome, ransack their temples, break down their altars, and deface their images; and there is indeed the glory of a church like the glory of a play-house, where every man is courting his own mistress; you need not tell them, These be no gods, they can do you no good. No; take a shorter journey, run to yourselves, and your own hearts. Let us tell them, neither our own luck, nor our own wit, nor our own labour, hath brought us the good things we possess; we are all miserable sinners, and worthy of nothing but torments. It is the divine providence that hath hedged in our estates, set us in seats of honour, filled our barns, fields, shops, houses; it is this, not the sea, that hath walled in our land, and so long kept out invading war. It is this, not the clouds, that hath given us plenty; this, not our policy, that hath preserved us in peace and truth. Without which, our meat and drink could no more nourish us, than the stones in the wall. The Lord hath given us wealth and happiness, the same God give us also content and thankfulness!

8. This discovers a main imposture, and received vanity of our days, the foretelling of future things; which attempt is a presumptuous injury to God's providence. This is a study for those heathen that know not God, Jer. 10:2. He taught Israel by his prophets, he taught thee not by his planets. How expressly hath he confuted and confounded such fortune-tellers? Isa. 19:12. If they will undertake to know fates by the stars, and by erection of figures, how comes it to pass that they do not know their own? He that is not able to know his own, and will promise to tell me mine, is either a fool or a juggler; choose him whether. 'Shew me the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know ye are gods,' Isa. 41:23; this is only God's art, will you make yourselves gods? ye shall prove yourselves fools. 'He frustrateth all their tokens, and makes the diviners mad,' Isa. 44:25: God shall destroy them; O then let not us believe them. The prognosticator tells us that he believes God's providence; yet withal, he writes a prediction of all things that must happen the year following, which is indeed to compliment with God in words and to abuse him in deeds. Too many have thus lost God's providence in the stars, whereas the stars are to be found in his providence. And if they be to go a journey, or undertake a business, they will turn over the almanac before the Bible, and consult the signs, while they forget to say their prayers. As if one having an excellent watch, should still be in admiration of the spring, by which all the wheels have the swifter or slower motion, and keep their course; and never think of his art and invention that made it.

When such English almanacs come out, that set down all the future passages of the year as confidently as if they had received that prognostication from the angels, which they sell to the stationers: yea, when French almanacs come with their predictions concerning states and princes, one would think that, in this clear light of truth, there should not be found one soul so dark as to credit them. But fools will be meddling with strange things, as the satyr did with fire till he burnt his fingers. Whatsoever these men prognosticate, the likeliest thing to happen is the direct contrary. Not once of twenty times did I ever turn over almanac to examine what he foretells of the present weather, but I found it quite cross. When they threaten us with rain, it is most commonly fair; and when they flatter us that it will be fair, it is sure to rain. Therefore Diogenes, when a bungler was a shooting, ran to the mark; other places might be dangerous, but he was sure he would never come near that. So the best credit to be given all these prophecies, whether of the weather, which is less intolerable, or of men's fortunes, which is most sacrilegious, is to presuppose the contrary. For when there are but two ways, cold or hot, wet or dry, good or bad (to shew how God laughs them to scorn from heaven), they speak only that which shall not be. If they should hit the right, yet a fool might say as much; it will rain, or it will hold up, it is but an even lay. Rather, man is his own star, and he that can keep a clear conscience commands the stars, they shall not constrain him. Let the stars do their worst, and star gazers say their worst, so long as we faithfully serve the God of heaven. I deny not but the stars have some power to work upon us, but this divine providence orders the stars; and we have a Star above all stars, that hath 'the seven stars in his hand,' Rev. 1:16, ready to defend all that trust in him.

9. Let the eye of our mind be always fixed on this divine providence, that considering the unspeakable goodness it hath continually done us, in all necessities we may hope that it will help us. Through all the passages of our life let us gather observations of it; how it kept us in the womb, brought us into the world, watched our cradles, guarded our infancy, tutored our youth, preserved us from danger, supplied us with blessings; that thus finding it always hitherto graciously present, we may assure ourselves it will never be absent. David lacks a sword, Ahimelech can furnish him with none but Goliath's, 1 Sam. 21:9: O give me that, there is none like it. Why? for the metal's sake, or for the strength's sake? No, other might be as sharp, as strong; but for the Lord's sake, of whose mercy he had so good experience by that sword. Why else was Israel commanded to build altars and erect pillars in their passages, but that they might stand like trophies and holy memoratives of the Lord's mighty mercies in those places?

So God bids Moses 'take the rod wherewith he smote the river,' Exod. 17:5; not simply naming the rod, but with a description. Why? Because with that rod he smote the river, and turned it into blood, Exod. 7:20. Now his faith might well expect, that the same rod, by the same appointment, should as well turn the stone into water, as it did turn water into blood, and the sea into a pair of walls. This latter wonder was easily credible to him, that had tried the rod to be so miraculous. Nothing more animates us to present affiance, than the recognition of favours past. The same rod that brought plagues to Egypt, brings blessings to Israel; by the same means can God both save and condemn, as the same sword both defends and kills. Such due registers and records let us make of God's mercies, that we may never want confidence, as our blessed Maker doth never want providence.

10. Let us imitate his providence, which is the way to approve ourselves his children. Do good to all; why? Your heavenly Father doeth so, Matt. 5:45; without this demonstration of love, you have little proof that you are not bastards. But such a one doth me harm, shall I do him good? No man can so offend thee as the sinner offends God: yet God doth him good; he lives by his providence. To love him that loves us, is the publican's charity; it is common to drunkards, whoremongers, usurers, and is no more in effect but self-love. Non tam diligit socium, quàm in socio seipsum. Thus far the children of hell go, shall not the children of heaven go further? As we have received a greater measure of love from God, so let us shew a greater measure of love to men. Yet withal, as God makes some difference, giving good things to all, but the best to his servants; so 'let us do good to all, but especially to the household of faith,' Gal. 6:10, as those of a family will love together, and hold together, more than they will do with strangers.

11. Lastly, Seeing the divine providence bestows the creatures upon us to use, let us forbear to abuse them; for this were unthankfully to wrong God in them. They are sent to nourish us, sent to serve us, sent to teach us; sent ad salutem, not to be used ad insaniam.* The very bread we eat, should put us in mind of that bread of life; our apparel, of that garment of righteousness which doth justify us, and of glory that shall crown us; our houses below, of those eternal mansions above; the light of the sun invites us to that everlasting light in heaven; the winds in their airy regions, of that sacred Spirit which blows and sanctifies where he pleaseth; the running streams summon us to that crystal river, and fountain of living waters; the earth, when it trembles, remembers us of the world's final dissolution.

There is no page in the book of nature unwritten on; and that which may not be a teacher to inform us, will be a witness to condemn us. It is the voice of all creatures to man, accipe, redde, cave;† to which let me add, profice, parce, vale. Accipe, take us to thy use and comfort; I heaven am bid to give thee rain, I sun to give thee life, I bread to strengthen thy body, I wine to cheer thy heart; we oxen leave our pastures, we lambs our mothers, to do thee service. Redde, remember to be thankful; he that gives thee all, commands thee to return him somewhat; it is hard if thou canst not thank the great housekeeper of the world for thy good cheer. Cave, beware of abusing us; the beasts of the field cry, Do not kill us for wantonness; the fowls of the air, Do not riot with us; the wine, Do not take me to drunkenness, devour not me to disable thyself. Profice, do good to us and thyself. To us; feed the sheep which thou meanest to feed upon; meat thy horse, that he may perform thy journey. They are dumb, and cannot call for what they want; thou hast reason, provide for them. For thyself; profit by us; let us not only please thine eye, but cherish thy body. Consider our virtues, to further thee toward life eternal; feed on our substances, to help thy life temporal; that in both thou mayest acknowledge and bless our Maker. Let not the grain mould in thy garners, nor the gold rust in thy coffers; but profice, so use us, that thou mayest be the better for us. Parce, yet somewhat spare us; do not play the tyrant with us, delight not in our torment; let our death satisfy thee, without a merciless vexation; do not satiate and gorge thy appetite with our groaning service. But as for thy sake we were made, so deal with us, that we may long do thee good. Do not spoil matrem cùm filiis, destroy not our breed, but only take so much as may serve thy own turn. Vale, farewell; when thou hast thus rightly used us, and standest in no more need of us, death calling thee to a better place, farewell. Having dealt kindly with us on earth, may God deal mercifully with thee in heaven. Where thou shalt not need this sun, for God shall be thy light; nor this air to breathe thee, nor this earth to bear thee, nor bread nor wine to sustain thee, for Christ shall be all in all unto thee.

THE FALL OF MAN.—The next part of the Creed concerns Jesus Christ, directing our faith how to believe in him. Wherein he is set forth as a Saviour, performing the great work of our redemption. But redemption presupposeth some precedent captivity. If man had stood, as we have considered him made, we had known the Son of God, but not as 'conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary,' &c. Therefore, by order of conveniency, before we come to look upon our Redeemer, we are first to look upon our own need of a redeemer. Our lifting up grants that we were once down. For connection therefore of these two parts, our creation, whereby we were made, and our redemption, whereby we are repaired, betwixt both these, our apostasy hath a due place of meditation.

In our fall, there are four points especially considerable: the cause, the manner, the time, and the measure.

The cause is double. First, The efficient cause was Satan; for we must conceive no otherwise of the serpent than of his instrument. Moses did not indeed name the devil, but spake according to the gross capacity of the people, who would understand nothing but visible things. So in the story of that apparition to Saul, that is called Samuel which was only his resemblance. There Satan in the shadow of Samuel, here Satan in the body of the serpent.

But why did Satan make choice of the serpent? Answer, First, for subtilty, wherein his usefulness was no less than his likeness. He is subtle to recover his dimmed sight by the juice of fennel; to cast off his winter coat, subtle to stop his ears to charms, subtle to insidiate man, Gen. 49:17. Secondly, For aptness in carrying the business: the serpent was fit for insinuation, he could wind in and out and never be seen of Adam. Thirdly, Had he framed a voice in the air, Eve would not have granted so familiar a conference. Fourthly, Had he appeared in human shape, there being no more mankind but she and her husband, his imposture had been palpable.

But Eve knew that serpents could not speak, why then did she not mistrust? Answer: She was sufficiently able to put a difference betwixt the faculty of beasts and power of angels; but being transported with the fair promises, she did not so much mind unde, from whence they came, as quales, what they were. She was so rapt with an ambitious desire of bettering her estate, that she never intended whether it was a good or a bad angel. But why was she not afraid to talk with a serpent? Not because the serpent had a beauteous face, countenance like a virgin; as you have heard of mermaids, virgo formosa supernè, which is not nature's action, but the poet's fiction. There is no such serpent, unless it be in a moral sense, a beautiful face with a serpentine heart in a whore. But because, during the state of innocency, no creature was loathsome to man. Serpents and beasts had the same form and shape before, but not the same terribleness and nocent powers. Wicked atheists deride this story, yet believe their poets, that a river saluted Pythagoras, an elm Apollonius, that Jupiter's bull did speak in Rhodes, and Achilles's horse foretold his master's death. There is no doubt but that, by permission, Satan can possess a body, living or dead.

The other cause was the will of our parents, Eccles. 7:29. Freedom of will is fourfold: libertas ad solum malum; ad solum bonum; restricta, partim ad bonum, absoluta ad bonum vel malum. 1. Freedom to only evil, which is in reprobate men and angels; and is indeed more properly a thralldom than a freedom. 2. Freedom to only good, which is in God by nature, in the angels by grace. 3. Freedom restrained, partly to good, but not without touching upon evil; this is in militant saints. 4. Freedom absolute to good or evil indifferently; this was in Adam. He had no inclination to sin, nor yet was he bound by any necessity from sin. God, in restraining one tree, declared that man had power either to take or forbear it.

For God, he was no ways any cause of it. He did not only make them righteous creatures, but also gave them righteous wills; told them plainly what he would exact, and what they could perform. But why did he not prevent it? Answer: He was not bound unto it, he permitted it for divers reasons. 1. To make the most excellent creatures sensible of their own infirmity, how unable they are to stand without his supportation. 2. That there might be an occasion to exercise both his justice and mercy; justice in punishing, mercy in saving. If in the world had been no misery, there had been no work for mercy, no need of Christ. If no sin, no matter for his justice to shew itself. 3. To will nothing but good, is a state reserved for heaven; to will nothing but evil, is a state reserved for hell; to will good and evil, is a state disposed for earth. There is a double grace: one, to be able to will and do that is good; the other, to be able to persevere in willing and doing good. God gave Adam the former, not the other. Dedit posse perseverare si vellet: non dedit velle perseverare cùm possit. 4. God owes no creature anything; beggars must be no choosers. We that are indebted to him for all that we are, cannot challenge more than he will give. He so governs all things he hath made, ut etiam proprios motus exercere sinat.* 5. He might justly suffer this evil, because he knew how to turn it into good. It was not præter voluntatem Dei, that were to make a lame providence; not contra voluntatem Dei, that were to make a weak omnipotence; but juxta voluntatem Dei, in part he ordained it; not as it was a sin to ruin the creature, but as a way to exercise the justice and mercy of the Creator.

But if Adam did that which God willed, he did not sin. Answer: He did will the same matter, but not after the same manner, nor to the same end. Suppose an Israelite had wished the death of that persecuting tyrant Benhadad, and Hazael also wished it: the former, because he was a malicious enemy to God's church; the other, that he might get his kingdom. God and Adam willed this fall; but neither God with man's intent, nor man with God's intent, Adam's purpose was to be like God, God's to manifest his own glory. But God decreed it, therefore man could not avoid it. Answer: In respect of God's decree, it was necessary; in respect of Adam's will, it was voluntary: the Creator's purpose did not take away the creature's freedom. But God's will is the cause of Adam's will, and Adam's will the cause of this fall, therefore God's will is the cause of this fall; for quod est causa causæ, is causa causati? Answer: God's will is a moving cause of the wills of evil men, not as they are evil, but as they are wills. As a man makes a lame horse bear his burden: cogit claudum portare, non cogit equum claudicare. God so inclines the evil will, that while he moves the will he is not entangled with the evil.

Who can now complain of God? Not the devil, God did not cause him to deceive man. Not Adam and Eve, they fell by their own wills, without his instigation; and this their own consciences did confess. Can the posterity of Adam? No; reprobates justly suffer, and must acknowledge they have but their deserts. And for the elect, they get more by the second Adam than they lost by the first. 'O the depth,' &c., Rom. 11:33.

The manner was by temptation; which was partly subtle, partly malicious, all devilish. Satan's malice was high and great: high, in that he meant this mischief at God himself, whose infinite majesty being out of his reach, he thought to spite him in ruining his workmanship; as the Romanists took their pleasure and revenge on Queen Elizabeth's picture, because they could not come at her person. Great; for despairing to save himself, he endeavoured to destroy all the world. Now, his fraud was not inferior to his malice, which will appear in twelve crafty circumstances.

1. For his vessel, a serpent, a thing so like him for craft, that it is still his emblem. Every serpent is (as it were), a young devil, and the devil is called an 'old serpent.'

2. For his insinuation to the place: who would look for a serpent in paradise? What wonder is it, if our corruption finds him in our closet, among our bags, in our beds with his unclean suggestions, on our boards among our many dishes and full cups; whenas our parents, being holy, found him in paradise?

3. For his use of the time. He is not sooner got in, than he falls to work. He lays hold on the first opportunity, knew it was no advantage to slack his design. A little forbearance might have improved man's experience, and so prevented his mischief. To think him idle, is as gross, as for the times of ignorance to call their fairies and hobgoblins, harmless devils.

4. For his choice of the tree. There were many trees in paradise; you find him about none but the forbidden. There was no danger in the rest; here grew the fruit of his hope. By no tree but this could they miscarry; upon none but this dwells his subtle expectation.

5. In his singling out the woman; who being the weaker in resistance, was the more malleable to his purpose; the fitter for him, both to work upon, and to work by. Though she had good helps, holiness and wisdom, yet he outvied her, and she lost the game. He keeps his old trick still; when he would pervert a whole family to superstition, he teaches his Jesuit to begin with the woman. To witchcraft he brings more women than men; therefore the Scripture names a witch in the feminine gender, Exod. 22:18. He sped so luckily with this plot in paradise, that he practised it upon Solomon and Samson; he foiled the strongest, and fooled the wisest, by a woman.

6. For watching his opportunity; not only assaulting the woman, but absente viro, when the man was not by. Had Adam been present, he durst not have attempted it. It was in Uriah's absence, that he wrought Bathsheba to folly. Let Ulysses be at home, Penelope's suitors vanish.

7. In his question, to move doubt. 'Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree?' It is likely, that they had spent some time in conference, from which premises the serpent infers this conclusion, Num dixit Deus? This is strange, that God should give you any such prohibition? Not eat of every tree? as if God had dealt hardly with them, in the abridgment of this liberty. If Satan can but get us to stand him, and hold him talk, he makes himself sure, and dischargeth as at a dead mark. 'Blessed is he that hath not stood in the way of sinners.'

8. In his reply, to work distrust. 'Ye shall not die;' never think that God hath any meaning to kill you for so slight a matter. To doubt of the commandment, is the way to expose ourselves to the transgression. Usury, and monopoly, and monomachy, had never been known, but by hearsay; had not men stood to talk with Satan, and to hear his reasons and arguments, what he could say for such horrid sins. Hence it came to be put to those two unhappy referees, the devil's wit and man's will.

9. In his protestation of safety, and promise of glory. 'Ye shall be as gods;' sicut, for quality, not for equality; so far from mortal creatures, that you shall be immortal powers. But whether is the devil more subtle to promise, or man more simple to believe, that there may be safety in sin? Safer is a vessel on the sea without mast or stern, or a blind cripple in a house on fire. He that bids us look to speed well in doing ill, promiseth us good luck in breaking our necks.

10. In his suggestion to envy and discontent. Why one tree? Sure, he grudgeth you that fruit, as if he kept it for his own tooth. Why this tree? sure there is some more delight and goodness in this tree than in all the rest. How many thus lose the comfort of their own estate, by envying the betterness of another's? How foolish is he, that will fast from his own wholesome supper, because his neighbour hath better cheer? Lord, rather give me a contented want, than a discontented abundance.

11. By his flattering them with the increase of knowledge and honour. 'Ye shall know good and evil.' Now they knew nothing but good; and what gets a man by the knowledge of evil? Who being in health, would make himself sick, to know what sickness is; yea, rather kill himself, that he might get experience of death? And for honour, what a puff do ambitious men, like boys about a bubble, catch at? What if my name be despised on earth, so long as it is written in heaven? This were as when the sun sends forth his glorious beams, to cry for the putting out of a candle. Yet how easily doth honour and knowledge, the knowledge of honour, the honour of knowledge, transport the sons of corrupted nature! A cunning devil! that sends a man to seek for light in a vault, his own glory in the dishonour of his Maker.

12. In his ambiguity of speech; every word being capable of a double construction; as he used afterwards to deliver his oracles. 'Ye shall not die,' that is, not presently the death of the body, yet presently be made mortal. 'Your eyes shall be opened;' so they were, to see their confusion. 'Ye shall know good and evil;' so they did, not by a bettered knowledge, but by a miserable experience. 'Ye shall be as gods;' either as good angels, or as apostate devils. Thus his words have an ambagious meaning; that howsoever it should happen, he might keep his credit, by expounding it according to the event. So if he failed now, he might hope to prevail another time. 'Now when the woman saw that the tree was good for food,' Gen. 3:6; there is the voluptuousness of her desire; 'and pleasant to the eyes,' there is the curiosity of her sight; and 'would make one wise,' there is the vanity of her mind. Proportionable to the Apostle's description of the world; 'the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life,' 1 John 2:16. We sin according to the pattern of our mother; see, like, take, die; and so infect others, as Eve having eaten, gave her husband. Had she stayed her hand with her own fall (as he that ignorantly drank to his friend in a cup of poison, but once perceiving it, threw away the cup, admitting no pledge), Satan had been prevented, we preserved, the root of mankind being uncorrupted. But such was her unhappiness, to invite man to this cursed banquet; so they both did eat, and set all their posterity's teeth on edge.

Observation 1. If we had been by, and seen Adam, in hoc articulo positum, in a strait, betwixt the persuasion of his wife, and the precept of his Maker; how would we have cried out to him, Take heed, the apple is fair, but the core will choke thee; the woman of thy love is the instrument of thy bane. Yet when it comes to our own turns, our memory forgets, and our conscience forbears, to give us this caution. *Tam minimè cautum est, à quo miserrimè casum est. Consider thy soul in Adam's stead, concupiscence is like Eve, thy wife; Satan is still himself, his bait is the forbidden fruit. He opens his pedlar's pack, bids concupiscence like and take; reason is hitherto absent, the wife is won, concupiscence woos reason; if she can prevail, Satan laughs to see them both perish together. 'How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?' Jer. 4:14. O corrupt man, God doth not blame us so much that these thoughts come, but that they are suffered to tarry. They may knock at our door, we may choose whether we will let them in. Their intrusion is not, their entertainment is, our fault. Think betwixt the cup and the lip; this draught of gain or lust is deadly. Though Eve be taken, save Adam. Let not Lot look back for his wife, though she perish.

Obs. 2. Satan still works by his factors; he would be too abhorred in his own shape, therefore comes in like concealed ware, and the more plausible his artillery, the more terrible his battery. Poison goes the more unsuspectedly down in a pleasing goblet. The devil presumes, like the Philistines, that Samson will deny Delilah nothing. Mischievous politicians have got this trick of their father, to use other instruments in all dangerous designs; as the monkey took the sleeping cat's foot to rake the chestnuts out of the fire. The actors shall be upon the stage, but the poet is close behind the curtains. What vessel soever bears the evil motion, wife or friend, let us suspect Satan in it, as David did his captain, 'Is not the hand of Joab in this?' 1 Sam. 14:19. The devil hath a hand in it, as he brought upon Adam, per amorem uxoris, amarorem mortis. So easy it will be for him that will be uxorious to his wife to be injurious to his God.

Obs. 3. Satan flatters them with benefits and glorious shows: they shall be wise, they shall be as gods, wise as gods; but not a word of death, or confusion, or deserved society of devils. When he tempted Judas to that unnatural treason, he shewed him the silver, not the halter. When he sent Gehazi after Naaman, he suggested unto him the garments, and the money, not the leprosy. He shewed Christ on the mountain, 'all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them,' Matt. 4:8; he presented him with the glory, not with the vanity: while he magnifies the pomp, he hid the vexation. If there be any pleasure, majesty, bravery in the world, where should we find it but in the courts of princes? There be the rich jewels, embroidered robes, sumptuous feasts, glorious triumphs, refulgent beauties, honourable attendance, royal state; and these he lays forth to the fairest show. With the inconveniences he meddles not, unless it be with their concealment. Full many a care attends on greatness, sovereignty is full of jealousy; he fears most, who is most feared. Christ's crown was all thorns, no crown is without some thorns. The highest seats are ever uneasy. Those innumerable discontents, which are like shadows to sublime places, Satan hides out of the way; nothing is left visible, but what may allure.

When he assaults any poor soul, he suffers nothing to appear to the eye but pleasure, profit, a sweet satisfaction of our desires, and a phantasma of happiness. There is also wrath, and judgment, and torment, and sting of conscience belonging to it; these must be, but these shall not be seen. All the way is white snow, that hides the pit. Green grass tempts us to walk; the serpent is unseen. If temptations, like plaises, might be turned on both sides, the kingdom of darkness would not be so populous. If David could have foreseen the grief of his broken bones ere he fell upon Bathsheba, those aspersions of blood and lust had not befallen him. If Achan could have foreseen the stones about his ears before he filched those accursed things, he would never have fingered them. But as it is said of Adam and Eve after their fall, Tunc sunt aperti oculi eorum, 'Then their eyes were opened;' then, not before. Judas was blind till he had done the deed, then his eyes were opened, and he saw it in its true horror.

Sins are light in the common balance of flesh and blood, but bring them to 'the measure of the sanctuary.' Adulterous acts are unlawful, ex confesso; but of wanton looks men make no reckoning, yet they weigh in the judge's balance as heavy as condemnation, Matt. 5:28. The smallest atom is seen in the sun, which we think nothing in the dark. The coral, so long as it is under water, is white; being got above the water, it waxeth hard and red. Our sinful works in their own element, seem soft, and fair, and harmless; being brought into the open air, they appear red and bloody. Lines may be so written with the juice of a lemon that no man can read them; heat the paper against the fire, you read them easily. The characters of our flagitious lives are so kept from us that we read no ill: let us bring them to the fiery trial, this shall make all our works and words, yea the secrets of our hearts, legible. Sorrows and woes are reserved for the farewell of sin; that they may be both seen and felt at once. When we are once sure, Satan is a tyrant; till then, he is a parasite. If we desire to be safe, let us view the back, as well as the face, of temptations. This good use let us make of our grandmother's ill, that we deceive Satan of that trick whereby he deceived her. When he invites us to view the glorious beginning of sin, let us look first to the ending, and so prevent him.

The third circumstance is the time, and I will not spend much time about it. Some would have Adam to continue in paradise about three and thirty years, because Christ lived so long upon the earth; some, forty days, that there might be a correspondence between the intemperancy and the remedy. The first Adam sinned in eating, and the second Adam fasted forty days for it. Others hold that he fell the next day after his creation, upon the day of rest. But it is not likely that upon a day of joy God would execute a work of sorrow, nor curse in that which he had blessed. Others say upon the eighth day, that day sevensnight after his making; as the eighth day was ordained for circumcision, that the father's apostasy and the children's recovery might be answerable for the time. But the most received opinion is according to Saint Augustine: that they fell on the very day of their making. Moses having set down the creation, without interposition of anything, comes immediately to the fall.

For reason to confirm this opinion. 1. Satan fell presently after his making; non stetit in veritate, 'he abode not in the truth,' John 8:44. He scarce tasted the sweetness of an angelical life, but as soon as he had it, he lost it; so it is likely of man. 2. Christ calls the devil a 'murderer from the beginning.' This could not be from the beginning of the world, or of time, then he had none to kill, it must be from the beginning of man; therefore in man's beginning Satan did set upon him. 3. His implacable malice would edge and urge him to lay hold on the first occasion, and his subtilty would admit no delay, lest man's experience should have confirmed him in obedience, and enabled him to persist; therefore that very day. 4. Adam had not yet tasted of any fruit; it is clear, not of the tree of life, Gen. 3:22; and with that he was most likely to begin. This appears both by Satan's onset, and the woman's answer, 'We may eat;' may, have not yet. Now they would not have stayed long without eating; therefore, that very day. 5. Presently after their making they were bidden to increase and multiply, so that if they had tarried there long Adam, in obedience to the commandment, must have known Eve, and so they should have gotten children without sin; for it is an erring ignorance to think they were not made fit for procreation and of apt disposition. 6. Never any man on earth kept the Sabbath without sin but Christ. That is called the 'rest of Christ,' Heb. 4:10, that enjoyeth a cessation from all the works of sin. Therefore he fell before the Sabbath, and that must be the very day. 7. What became of lions and such creatures, whose natural sustenance is flesh? They did not feed upon grass, and to say they did eat flesh is absurd, for there was no death before the fall; so that, if Adam had stayed long in paradise, their fast must have been tedious and above nature. 8. The psalm says, 'Adam abode not in honour,' Ps. 49:12, he lodged not one night in honour. So some read it. Lun, signifying to stay all night. If he did not continue in paradise one night, he fell on the day of his creation.

But how could so much business, as the aggregation of the creatures, their nomination by Adam, Eve's temptation by the serpent, the man's seduction by the woman, God's conviction and curse of them all, be despatched in so few hours? Answer: 1. The imposition of names was performed by Adam ere Eve was made; and this he could do at first sight, without trial of their natures, by reason of his singular wisdom. 2. Such is the celerity and subtilty of spirits, that Satan was nimble enough to play off his part in a very short space. 3. It was in the 'cool of the day,' about eventide, when God gave the sentence. Thus in the scope of eight or nine hours all these passages might be accomplished. But what is all this to us, to know when he fell, so long as we feel too sensibly that he is fallen? Yes, this point is not barren of use, it teacheth us two things.

Consideration 1. The fickleness of all temporal things. If innocency itself could not keep this world, no, not one whole day, how brittle hath corruption made it since! If our righteous father could not preserve himself without sin twelve hours, how vainly presumptuous are we, his infected children, to be confident of our standing! No man but he that is God and man, ever stood without falling. And in him, we are so much more happy than Adam was, that we shall not fall into perdition; but this we have common with him, and from him, that we cannot but fall into transgression. In saying the Lord's Prayer, he that prays, 'Lead us not into temptation,' confesseth that he may fall; he that prays, 'Forgive us our trespasses,' confesseth that he had fallen. Both which lead us to a penitent contrition for what we have done amiss, and to a careful circumspection about what we do; that we stand upon our guard, and watch the blow, to defend ourselves. Thou hast done well; be not too sure; trust not thy own legs; 'let him that thinks he standeth, take heed lest he fall;' Paul himself hath his buffets, 2 Cor. 12:7; the bladder that is full of wind must have a prick to let it out. 'I sent to know your faith, lest by some means the tempter hath tempted you,' 1 Thess. 3:5. They were his hope, his joy, his crown, yet they might be tempted. Light the taper at the fire of the sanctuary, and leave it burning clear, yet there is a thief to waste it; yea, it is ready to dim itself, if there be not snuffers to keep it bright.

If spiritual things may thus be forfeited, what assurance is there of temporals? No mere man ever stood so high as Adam; this earth is now divided among many kings, which was all his alone. Their lands bring them no increase without industry, his yielded fruits naturally. The whole earth his field and orchard, paradise was his private garden. They often command and go without; all things obeyed Adam. Storms and thunders, serpents and flies, stand in fear of no prince; none of these durst or could injure Adam. His glory was great, greater his safety, his command greatest of all; yet this potent, safe, happy king lost all in a moment. O then what constancy can be expected from the world? All these were in his hands, like an estate in the true owner's; we are all naturally usurpers, and cannot challenge one foot in our own right; shall the thief be secure when the true man was not? What land is so entailed to posterity, but the dying possessor may not give it this farewell and inscription; nunc mea, nunc hujus, sed postea nescio cujus? O happy man, who neither loves the world, nor the world him; both being dead, either to other! Dum alter alterum non appetit, quasi mortuus mortuum non attendit.

Abraham and Job, and many other saints, have been rich and potent; yet while the world flourished about them, it did not flourish within them; it smiled on them, they did not smile on it. Now, it is decrepit in itself, yet lusty in us; withered in its own parts, yet it grows green in our affections. It wooed them, and they scorned it; it frowns on us, and yet we woo it. It was to them, as the Jebusites to Israel, a drudge; we subject ourselves to it, as Israel did to the Egyptians. It proffered them service, and might not be entertained; we proffer it ourselves, and request it to entertain us. They could not be caught with its sweetness, we doat upon the bitterness of it. Sequimur fugientem, quem illi spreverunt sequentem. But while we lean upon that which is falling, shall we not fall with it? Lo, Adam could not hold it, while it was good, while he was good, all was good; now being grown stark naught, if we trust it, we are worse than it.

Consideration 2. The cunning of that adversary, whom it is hard to elude, impossible to avoid. It is now since Adam's fall above five thousand years; the devil lost none of his time; he that would not forbear innocency one day, will assault corruption every hour. He could not augment his malice, he hath improved his experience. If he were so crafty then, what a cunning devil he is now! Et ille fortior ad pugnandum, et tu debilior ad repugnandum. If, as Samson lost his strength with his lock, that angel had lost his wisdom with his goodness, we were safer in the wide world, than Adam was in his impaled paradise. But he still remains an angel, though a mischievous one; and we are men, not half so wise as our father. Lord, let it not be presumption in us to beg, that thou wouldst make us wiser than Adam; that all the tricks of Satan may never cozen us of our grace and portion in Jesus Christ.

Yea, let us be as far from security, as he is from ignorance or charity. Ille non cessat discere tentando, nos discamus non cessare cavendo. Give a serpent a wound, he will turn again; every good deed gives that old serpent a wound; let us look for his malice, be sure he will turn again. He is ever busy, but worst at last, discharging his shot thickest when it is almost night; recompensing brevitatem temporis, gravitate tentationis. He strikes continually, but his first and last blows are most dangerous. He assaulted Adam so soon as he came into the world, most furiously he sets upon all the children of Adam when they are going out of the world. Look well to the conclusion; for as the tree is loaden, so it bends; and as it bends, so it grows: and as it grows, so it falls; and as it falls, so it lies; and as it lies, so is it found at the last day; and as it is found at the last day, so it must continue for ever.

The Measure.—Some sensual men have extenuated Adam's sin; alas! it was but eating an apple. Wherein they do implicitly and by consequence tax God of injustice, to lay so heavy a punishment on him for so slight a fault. What, condemn a whole world for so small a matter? Be not deceived, we shall prove it by evidence, as we find it by experience, to be a grievous rebellion; not one single sin, but many in one; as Leah said of Gad, 'Here comes a company;' simplex pomum, multiplex peccatum. The quantity of a sin must not be measured by the object, about which it is conversant, but by the commandment which prohibits it. It was not the fruit eaten, but the law broken, that made him guilty. He that will truly value his sin, must not so much look to the thing done upon earth, as to the majesty offended in heaven. 'Against thee, O Lord, against thee, have I sinned,' Ps. 51:4. David had sinned against Uriah, his subject; but he looks up to God, his sovereign. Here, non tot grana in pomo, quot mala in peccato. In one fact we find ten several sins.

(1.) Incredulity. They did not believe God's word to be true: he says, 'Eat and die;' they hope to eat and not die. Howsoever other sins speed, unbelief is sure to smart. He deserves no mercy of God, that will not take his word. This indignity we still offer him, more paterno; still doth the want of faith shut men out of paradise.

(2.) Blasphemy, in giving credit to the devil, more than to God. His moriemini they doubt; Satan's non moriemini they believe. Let the devil charge the God of truth with falsehood, the God of love with envy; yet to this they subscribe. Is it a small sin to reproach their Maker?

(3.) Curiosity, in affecting greater wisdom than the God of wisdom saw fit for them. Satan flatters them with some strange operation in this fruit: this they long to find: to their own woe they found it. What great evils rise from small beginnings! It is probable that curiosity turned Lot's wife into a pillar of salt; she would but see forbidden Sodom, and sped worse than Sodom. That curiosity sent home Dinah deflowered; she would but see the virgins of the land, and left her own virginity behind her. Her idle curiosity bred all that mischief; upon this she wanders abroad, upon her wandering follows ravishment, upon the ravishment murder, upon the murder spoil. It is holy and safe to be jealous of the first occasions of evil. Curious Lot's wife lost herself, curious Dinah lost a city, curious Helena lost a kingdom, curious Eve lost all the world.

(4.) Wantonness, in sinning without need. All the trees in the garden were at their service; all pleasant and allowed, only one pleasant and forbidden. She slights that she might have; and for that she might not have, she bequeathed this legacy to all her children, that they should naturally desire what they may not lawfully possess.

(5.) Pride and ambition to be no worse than their maker. If all failed, Satan hoped this would do it. Had his bait been beauty, Eve was fair and amiable; certainly the most beautiful woman that ever the world had, or shall have; none but a glorified body in heaven can excel hers, and in enjoying her, Adam had, with pleasure, without offence, enjoyed himself. Had it been delight, he knew that he wanted none which earth could yield him, while he had a heaven within him. Had it been gold, why all was his own already, and how basely would he have esteemed the most shining metals who had no use of coin, no fear of want! If all Adam's sons knew the little worth of gold as well as he did, the devil would never have turned digger, for all his mines could not have won one piece of a soul. It was then a proud desire of bettering his condition; what but this could turn man out of paradise, angels out of heaven, and tumble so many millions to hell!

(6.) Unthankfulness. Had not God done enough for them? created them after his own image, estated them in the monarchy of the world, furnished them with a pleasant habitation, paradise, the seat royal of the whole earth, set serviceable creatures to attend them, pleasure itself to delight them, perfect knowledge to accomplish their blessedness? Yet as if all this were not worth thanks, they must be something that God would not have them, or have something that God would not grant them. He had studied to make them happy, and now they study to make themselves miserable. They must know more than they did, as if God did not know that they knew enough. Still do we inherit this saucy appetite of our grandmother; we can never rest satisfied with the portion which God hath carved us. Wanton children never speed worse than when they have things of their own choosing. How well doth he deserve to lose all he hath, that repines for one thing he hath not? When Eve had all the world and the innumerable delights in it, yet she would hazard all for one apple. This was the amplification of David's fault by the prophet, contemning the variety of his own wives for the forbidden one of his subject, 2 Sam. 13. How doth our ingratitude overlook the many blessings of God in discontent for one! Thus I have seen a sullen guest at a well furnished table, because he is prevented of one dish that he hath a mind to, keep a melancholy fast and eat never a bit.

(7.) Presumption: they made themselves confident of God's mercy, that though they did what he forbade them, yet he would not do as he threatened them. As if he prized them above his own honour, and would break his word to spare them that broke his law. So the evil man flatters himself; God will be gracious though I be ungracious. 'The judgments of God are far above out of his sight,' Ps. 10:5. Out of his sight; as an eagle at her highest towering so lessens herself to view, that he sees not the talons, nor fears the grip. Thus man presumes till he hath sinned, and then despairs as fast afterwards. At first, 'Tush, doth God see it?' At last, 'Alas, will God forgive it?' But if a man will not know his sins, his sins will know him; the eyes which presumption shuts, commonly despair opens. Cain, that fears not to kill his brother, fears that every passenger will kill him. Israel calls for the flesh-pots of Egypt, but they forget the smart, the seasoning of the pot, the whips, the straw, the bricks, the servitude, children haled from their mothers' breasts. The bitterness of sin is always concealed to the last; that morsel, after the banquet, is left to close up their stomachs. Satan is a dumb devil while the mischief is a doing, but a roaring devil when it is done. During the merriment of sin, he is altogether against conscience, and stops her mouth; but in the sorrowful sense of it, he takes her part and extends her voice. While the debtor trades and is busy in the world, the creditor lets him alone; but if he once break, then action upon action. Let Eve teach us how great a madness it is to complain too late. Had she foreseen how by that act she should lose the comfort she had, endure a torment beyond her thought, bereave her husband of happiness, make her posterity miserable, and bring a curse upon the whole world; the fruit had hung still on the tree, and the Son of God not been put to hang on the tree of death for it.

(8.) Murder, causing the death of all those that were to take life from them. She that was made the 'mother of the living,' became, by that act, the mother of the dying. Had she eaten alone, it is likely she had died alone; but when she gave to her husband, she killed us all. Therefore, that Adam might see he had begot a son in his own image, their first-born child was a murderer. Adam slew his posterity, Cain slew his brother. The same devil that did set enmity betwixt God and man sets enmity betwixt man and man; and the same cause that moved Satan to tempt the first man to destroy himself and his posterity, moves also the second man to destroy the third. I do not doubt but though Adam could not be innocent in paradise, yet he was a good man out of paradise; his fall had made him wary, so that his children's education was holy. Seeing he had bereaved them of that image of God which he had for them, he would labour, by all good endeavours, to repair it in them, that so his care might make some amends for his trespass. 'But who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?' Job 14:4. That which is crooked can none make straight. To make his children guilty, this he had done easily; he found it impossible to make them all holy. There is no breeding can alter destiny. We are all too like one another in that wherein we are unlike to God. Fan the grain from the chaff, make it never so clear when you sow it, yet you shall find chaff when you reap it. Goodness may be repaired in ourselves, it cannot be propagated to ours. That Adam was an elect saint there is no question; he had two elder sons, perhaps twins, yet how contrary are their estates, their dispositions. Had nature any remaining privilege, the firstborn child of the world had not been a reprobate. Now, the elder was a murderer, the younger a saint. The elder had his impiety from nature, the younger his sanctity from the free grace of God. Our hatred of the serpent and his seed is from God; their hatred of the holy seed is from the serpent, Gen. 3:15. In one and the same person are both the seeds of the woman and serpent. Cain's natural parts are of the woman, his vicious qualities are of the serpent. The woman gave him to be a brother; the serpent, to be a fratricide. Yet here is the comfort, the father shall not answer for the son; he is never the further from heaven, though he cannot bring his children along with him. As the better cannot carry up the worse to heaven, so neither shall the worse pull down the better to hell.

(9.) The easiness of the commandment makes the transgression more heinous. You say it was but for eating an apple that he was condemned; and I say it was but eating an apple that was forbidden. Will you blame God for punishing him for so little, and not blame him for offending in so little? The easier the precept, the easier was the obedience. As the Syrians said to their master, 'What if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing?' 1 Kings 5:13. What if the Lord had commanded him some great matter? Say he had charged him to fast forty days, and that in paradise, as the second Adam did in the wilderness? Had he begotten a son in innocency, and been charged to offer him up in sacrifice, as Abraham was tried? Had he been bound to abstain from his beauteous spouse, to till the earth for his bread, or plant trees for his fruit? Here had been greater difficulty of obeying, but no toleration of sinning. But when it was only an apple, the fruit of a tree, of one tree, of one among such variety, and such variety of as fair and allowed fruits, certainly quò facilius præceptum, eò gravius peccatum, the more easy the command the more heinous the disobedience. He that will not do a little for God, is there any hope he will do much? He that will not part with his sin will more hardly part with his son at his Maker's bidding. He that grudgeth a cup of cold water will more stick at a cup of warm blood for Christ. Peccare in minimo, peccatum non minimum. Saint Augustine* brings in Eve thus disputing of the tree. Si bona est, quare non tango? Si mala est, quare in paradiso? If it be good, why is it forbidden? if it be bad, what doth it in paradise? It is in paradise because it is good; but thou must not touch it, because thou must be obedient. Let this example teach us to be careful of small precepts. 'Well done, good servant; thou hast been faithful in a little,' Luke 19:17. Fidelis in modico. But this seems to be a little commendation, to be faithful in a little? Indeed, if we place modicum in fidelitate, little in faithfulness, it is a diminution; but fidelitas in modico, faithfulness in a little, is a commendation. He that cannot rule a little boat must not be trusted with a great vessel.

(10.) The main of all was disobedience, or transgression of the law of God; and so we have ten sins bound up in one fact, as the ten commandments are summed up in one word, love. Yea, this very single offence was the breach of the whole law. And as from the mass of heaven and earth, that seed of all creatures, innumerable kinds were formed, so from this one sin, the seed of all evil, what a multitude of sins have been derived. The sins of one man are beyond all numeration; how infinite are the sins of all the world!

Question 1. What was the first sin in the world? The Romish stream is altogether for pride, because Satan said, 'Ye shall be as gods.' That they were tickled with pride by the temptation, and so were suffered to fall.† But this takes away the difference betwixt the sin of man and of the angels. These fell by their own pride immediately, man by temptation unto pride. There was some fault in man before pride, none before it in the apostate spirits. The devil fell without a seducer, man not but by his seduction. Therefore man found mercy, they reap nothing but judgment. Man is restored by a Saviour, they must perish for ever. Man, quantò fragilior in natura, tantò facilior ad veniam.‡

But we find that Satan's drift was to make man doubt the truth of the commandment and punishment. Therefore his first deceit was fidem removens. 'Ye shall not die.' He warrants them against all danger before he allures them with hope of honour. Therefore the first sin of the world appears to be infidelity! For if man had constantly believed what God directly threatened, the devil had lost his labour. Pride followed upon infidelity, not infidelity upon pride. Here let us take notice that unbelief was the first sin of the world, and unbelief is the worst sin of the world. At first it lost all men, and still it loseth the greater part of men—pagans, infidels, heretics, and not a few of them that be called Christians, John 16:9. Will God break his word to save thee, thou unbeliever, who will not break it to save a world? Rather than it, 'heaven and earth shall pass.' And dost thou hope to escape? There is not a soul now in hell but confesseth itself damned for unbelief, Num. 23:19.

Question 2. Whether Adam lost his faith, and so was damned for his sin? We say, against our adversaries, that our first parents lost not their faith in their fall. (1.) Though in that one act of faith they failed, it follows not that their faith was utterly extinguished. He that is seduced in one article or point of faith, is he presently stripped of all faith? Because a man stumbles, hath he no feet? (2.) Peter denied his master; yet he could not in his judgment so soon cast off all opinion of Christ. Fear prevailed, his faith perished not. (3.) It was no formal infidelity, which is wilfully to reject God's word; but only they were materially deceived; their sudden and violent affection overshadowing their judgment, like a thick cloud before the sun. (4.) If the life of faith should be extinct by every act of sin, spiritual life were more mortal than the corporal, and the sanctity of grace were no better than the morality of nature. God's promise is a stronger foundation than for every blast of wind to blow down. (5.) There was remorse of conscience in them, and a shame for their offence. Now, repentance is an effect of faith.

Adam, therefore, was not a reprobate. For, first, the promise of the Messiah was given him immediately after his transgression; therefore his interest was in him. Secondly, the first Adam was a figure of the second; but no man ordained by God to be a figure of his Son was a reprobate. Thirdly, he is called the Son of God, therefore he was not the son of death. Fourthly, there is no likelihood that the root of all mankind should perish, or that God would damn the first image of himself that ever he made on earth. Hilary acknowledgeth Adam confessum, et veniæ reservatum. Of the same sentence are Irenæus, Epiphanius, Ambrose, Augustine, and Tertullian, who saith, that as he was cast out of the earthly paradise for transgression, so he was admitted into the heavenly paradise by confession. 'Wisdom preserved the first-formed father of the world, and brought him out of his fall,' Wisd. 10:1. Oh the infinite extent of Christ's merits! How should not his blood save souls to the end of the world, that saved the first soul in the beginning? It cannot be of less value or virtue, being exhibited, than when it was only promised.

Question 3. Whether was Adam's sin the greatest sin of the world or no? We have considered it very great; but Bellarmine says it was the greatest of all. (1.) Propter facilitatem obedientiæ, he had sufficient grace to keep the law. (2.) Propter simplicitatem præcepti, he had but one commandment. We that have less power of obedience have a great number of commandments—ten for one. We have ten times as much to observe as he, and he had ten times more ability than we. (3.) For ingratitude. Who had received so much good to so little purpose. (4.) For propagation, his sin redounding to the hurt of all the world. These reasons make it great, but not the greatest sin.

We must distinguish of sins, they be personal or general. Personal sins be peculiar to the individual sinner, and only make him guilty. General sins be common to all men. Cain's murder was a great sin, but personal. It did not make his posterity guilty, because he never was appointed to be the root of his posterity. But Adam's was not a sin of his own person only, but of the human nature, he being the root or head, bearing in him all mankind. He sinned for us, and we all sinned in him. 'By one man sin entered upon all,' Rom. 5. Nor can we say this of all Adam's sins, but only of his first.* If we consider the condition of his person, and the perfection of his state, especially the universal extent and bane of all mankind by it, so it was the greatest sin. But simply in itself considered, many children of Adam have gone far beyond their father. Cain's fratricide, killing one better than himself, for no other reason but because he was better than himself; Pharaoh's tyranny; Saul's partiality; Judas's treachery: all these were worse than Adam's apostasy. Thus it was not the greatest, ratione vel genere peccati. So we hold blasphemy and idolatry to be greater sins. Nor in regard of the sinner's affection; for many are carried with a more violent and ungodly desire than Adam was in this temptation. Nor for the quality of the sin, for it was venial to him; whereas if it had been the greatest sin, it never had been pardoned; and the sins of reprobates are punished with everlasting fire. Which of us can deny that he hath done greater iniquity? which of us ought not to repent with greater fervency?

Question 4. Whether was Adam's sin or Eve's the greater? St Ambrose doth aggravate the man's;† Chrysostom and Augustine the woman's. Let us hear them both.

First, for the man's sin. (1.) An evil angel deceived the woman, but the woman deceived Adam. In so much as he had a weaker tempter, he was the greater sinner. Answer: But the same serpent tempted them both. Eve was set upon single, Adam by a couple of tempters; his, therefore, was the stronger temptation. Besides, the woman was dear to him, and it is no hard matter to be deceived by a known and beloved friend. (2.) The woman did not hear the precept from God's own mouth, as did Adam; therefore he is the greater offender. Answer: The serpent urgeth this charge to the woman, 'Yea, hath God said?' therefore it appears that she also heard the precept. (3.) The man is first rebuked. Answer: But the woman is first punished. (4.) The woman accuseth but the serpent, Adam did unkindly to accuse the woman. Answer: She could not accuse Adam; he might well accuse her as the means of his fall. (5.) The woman in her punishment findeth mercy. Though she should bring forth 'in sorrow,' yet she should be 'saved by her fruit,' which was matter of joy. Answer: The man hath as great a share in that blessing as the woman; and the saving seed was promised before her punishment was inflicted.

It is concluded, then, that the woman was in greatest fault;‡ not because she only presumptuously affected the divine equality, for of this also the man was guilty. That derision of his ambition, 'See, the man is become as one of us,' had not been given him, had he not heard and credited the false persuasion of Satan, 'Ye shall be as gods.' But, First, Adam sinned only in doing the forbidden act. Eve not only admitted it in herself, but also tempted the man; and had now learned so much of the devil, as to do his office. Not that she gave it him on purpose, lest, if she died, he might have taken him another wife, as the Hebrews dream, for she was the only woman in the world; but because she was desirous to make him partaker of her supposed happiness. Secondly, *Vir peccavit in se tantum, et in Deum; mulier in se, Deum, et maritum. Adam only harmed himself, she wronged both herself and her husband. Thirdly, The greatness of the sin is comparatively seen by the punishment; but the woman was more punished, therefore she more offended. Over and above man's penalty, she hath an addition of sorrow in travail. This the order of their punishment demonstrates. First, the serpent is cursed, as the first seducer; next, the woman, as being in the second degree of offence; the man is reserved to the last and least punishment. Fifthly, The plain Scripture avers it: 'The man was not deceived, but the woman was deceived, and was in the transgression,' 1 Tim. 2:14. Not that Adam was not deceived at all; but, first, he was not first deceived; the woman sinned before him. Secondly, Not immediately deceived; Satan had tempted her to tempt him. Thirdly, He was not so deceived, as to become the author of seducement to others. He sinned either scienter, wittingly; or per errorem incogitationis, not by ignorance, but through want of confidence. Aaron sinned against his judgment in making the calf, and Solomon, in giving a toleration for idolatry: their sin was greater than Adam's. Fourthly, Eve's sin is so amplified, as if the man's fault, compared with hers, were scarce counted a transgression. Viro mulier, non mulieri vir, author erroris.† So easy is it for a man to be seduced, quadam amiculæ benevolentia,‡ by her that lies in his bosom.

This, then, be the conclusion, resolved by Thomas.§ The sin of Adam was greater, equal, less than the woman's, in different respects. First, greater, in regard of the perfection of his person; his dignity being more, so was his iniquity. Adam plus peccavit, quia omni bono abundavit. He had the more excellent graces, and greater strength to resist. Secondly, equal, quantum ad genus peccati, both fell in one thing; the same infidelity, in not believing God more than the serpent; the same concupiscence, in coveting fruit forbidden; the same ambition, in desiring a better state of perfection: these were alike in them both. Thirdly, less, quantum ad speciem superbiæ; in the woman was a greater pride, and her sin was tempered with a greater measure of unbelief and ambition. Adam gave credit to Eve, but Eve to the serpent. He was inductus, she inducta, et inducens. Therefore, the woman's was the greater sin. This doth not hold still, that the daughters of Eve be greater sinners than the sons of Adam. The woman then tempted the man, now commonly the man tempts the woman. But where that sex takes to be evil, it is exceeding evil. Many men had one devil a-piece, one woman had seven devils. Wickedness in them doth not so easily take, as fire is long before it be incorporate with iron; but when once it does, it is hardly driven out. But I will no longer compare them; both are bad enough; the Lord have mercy upon us all!

Application 1. To make some good use of this evil, is to take notice of our own frailty. Adam fell, fell in his innocency, fell from his innocency, fell with his knowledge, fell by one temptation. We are not innocent, but guilty in him. That guilt proclives us to any impiety. Our knowledge is clouded, many temptations besiege us, and we have less power to hold out. How ready must we be to fall, how unable to stand! Si Adam in paradiso, quid nos in sterquilinio? O, the wretched security of the world! Fateor patrem deceptum, non sentio me decipiendum.* Against the stream of the world, a man is made ex deteriore melior, of worse better; but with the full torrent ex meliore deterior, of better worse. Is the unguarded treasure safe in the house with thieves? a solitary virgin among libidinous ravishers? a poor lamb among a rabble of wolves? So is a soul among these hellish lions. A house may be so barricaded and fortified, as to withstand mortal invasions; but what doors or bars can keep out the devil? especially when he hath a friend within, as ready to open as he to enter. Every man knows the way to be evil, familiarly; but to be good, is a new art, which none can teach but God.

Security is the very suburbs of hell; there is nothing but a dead wall between. Hope and Life would once take a journey together. Each chose an attendant; Hope, Security; and Life, Jealousy. When Hope would take rest, Security sleeps by her. Life is fearful of dangers; therefore sets Jealousy to watch by her. Thus guarded, they are all safe. But one night the two handmaids mistook their mistresses. Jealousy watcheth by Hope; hereupon she starts, and trembles, and slumbered so unquietly, as if Doubt (her old enemy) had seized on her. Life, trusting to the vigilancy of her sentinel, Jealousy, and having (in her stead) so poor a guard as drowsy Security, was surprised by her old enemy, Danger. In this conflict, Life calls to Hope for succour; but alas! Hope had enough to do to help herself. In this extremity steps in Wisdom, who discovers the error, at whose approach Doubt and Danger fled; Hope and Life recovered. But to prevent the like mistaking hereafter, Wisdom bound Security to Hope, Jealousy to Life; and in every wise man they still so continue. Ut illa certantes foveat, et ista torpentes pungat.[†] If mortal man had any immunity or exemption from sin, where was it to be expected? In solitariness? No; Lot fell in the mountain. In the wilderness? No; for there Christ himself was tempted. In paradise? No; there man fell, De loco voluptatis. In heaven? No; there angels fell, Sub præsentia Divinitatis. In Christ's College? No; there Judas fell, in Schola Salvatoris. Si non in eremo, si non in Collegio, si non in Paradiso, si non in cælo, multò minus in mundo.[‡] So we stand, as not without fear to fall; so being fallen, let us look up, as not without hope to rise. The child is not safe but in the lap of its mother, not we but in the bosom of our Saviour.

Application 2. Seeing all be fallen in Adam, and by justice shut up under condemnation, what privilege of nature can minister cause of glory? Can riches? Alas, they never came in request with man, till sin had made man out of request with God. When he had lost heaven, he came to mind earth; having forfeited his God, to dig for gold.

Metalla, quasi μετα τὰ ἄλλα, Post alia necessaria. When they had tilled the ground, and wrought out bread, planted trees, and gathered fruits, built houses for shelter, and found other things to sustain life there, Itum est in viscera terræ, they rummage the bowels of their mother earth. Antiquiora sunt necessitatis inventa, quàm voluptatis. Gold and silver are centred in the entrails of the earth; nearer to hell than heaven. Their orb is among pagans, not Christians. Methinks, when I see a man look big because he is rich (and such are not scant), he is like one that swells because he hath the dropsy, or as a son that hath lost his father's inheritance, proud of a little dust from his grave.

Can glories? Alas, they were at first but like the shadows of high towers, now the shadows of pigmies, and that at noon; and at the best, but shadows. Glories, like glow-worms afar off, shine bright; come near, they have neither heat nor light. All that the world's glory leaves behind it, is but like a man that falls in the snow, and there makes his print; when the sun shines forth, it melts both form and matter. 'Remember from whence thou art fallen,' Rev. 2:5. If the proud could but think from whence they are fallen, they would look but poorly on the height to which they are risen. For birth, it were enough to pale the cheek of the purest gold, to think of the base earth out of which it was digged. And for learning, with what a tedious difficulty do we attain a small glimpse of our forefathers' knowledge? There is nothing left for which a man would think well of himself; but that moss will grow to a stone. Let us hold ourselves, as we are by nature, the basest of all creatures; there is no danger in this tenet. There is danger in riches, danger in knowledge, danger in dignity; there is no danger in humility.

Application 3. This gives us cause to bewail our downfall, and the miserable effects it produceth. He that sees heaven lost, paradise vanished, earth cursed, hell enriched, the world corrupted, all mankind defaced, and all this by one fall, were his tears as deep as a well, this would pump them out. Often when they plough the ground too deep, they discover springs of water; he that shall send this meditation to the root of his heart, will soon fetch tears from his eyes. God gave us tears for no other purpose, but to weep for our sins. We are fallen into poverty, and weep; tears will not enrich us. We suffer injury, and weep for it; tears will not redress it. We lose our friends, and weep; tears will not revive them. We are sick, and weep; tears is not physic to recover us. We have committed sin, and weep for that; tears will now help us. This is the disease, for which repentance is a proper remedy. To cure such a sore, this is the only salve.

Man fell by an affectation of joy, he must rise again by the affection of sorrow. The world was once drowned with water; but ever since Adam's fall it hath been a 'valley of tears.' That part of the world that shall be drowned in the bottomless lake, spends its days in laughter; that part which shall rejoice for ever, must be first drowned in tears. The son who having a noble father, sees him by foul treason condemned himself, and destroying his whole posterity, and will not weep for it, hath less passion than stones. Yea, we read that stones have cloven in sunder when Christ suffered; rocks have gushed out water, being smitten with a rod; Jeroboam's altar rent with a word; yet fleshy hearts are obdurate. Bonaventure hath a strange wish; upon that of the prophet; a 'stony heart changed to a heart of flesh,' Ezek. 36:26. A heart of flesh! No; Lord, rather give me a heart of stone. Seeing altars have rent, stones brake, rocks flowed water; yet fleshy hearts have remained hard; Lord give me rather a heart of stone.

Application 4. This may teach us all to look to the beginnings of sin, when we consider in how small a matter (as the world construes it) the world was lost; and that an infinite ruin followed the eating of one apple; what an army of plagues may be mustered up by an act of rebellion! Adam's breakfast will not be digested till doomsday; it was but a little meal, even for one man, yet the whole world took a surfeit of it. David's heart smote him, for touching of Saul's garment; this garment was not on, therefore he meant no harm to his person; yet he relents. Tender consciences regret at those actions which a wicked heart passeth over with ease and a smile. Saul is not troubled for seeking of David's blood, David is troubled for cutting Saul's garment. Consciences are like stomachs: one surfeits with the lightest food, and grows sick of dainties; another turns over the hardest morsels, scarce edible in their nature. But here is the difference: this may be called a good stomach, but the sample of it is a bad conscience. Every good heart is in some measure scrupulous, and finds more safety in fear than in presumption. It is better to abstain from some lawful things, than hazard ourselves to things unlawful. As that state is better, where nothing is allowed, than where all things, so the timorous conscience is better than the lawless. There is no hope of that man who makes no bones of his courses; but there is likelihood of him that is scrupulous. I had rather have a servant that will ask his direction twice, than one that runs of his own head without his errand.

Let us fear the first entrance to evil. If Hezekiah admit the Babylonians to see his treasury, he hath endangered its loss; yea, invited danger. The doors are locked, the thieves cannot get in; they then open a casement, and put in a little boy; this boy cannot rob the house; no, but he can open the door to those that will rob it. Pompey's sick soldiers, being entertained in compassion, grew strong enough to spoil the city. We see not that harvest of sorrows which follows a small seed of sin. Paul said of the mariners, 'Except these abide, ye cannot be safe,' Acts 27:31; but let me say of your sins, If they do abide in you, ye cannot be saved. He is a rare David that hath not some Absalom, some darling lust, the fosterling of his indulgence, which he would have spared. In Athaliah's massacre of the blood royal, young Joash was hid in the bed-chamber, and came to be king, 2 Kings 11:2. Save any sin, snatch it from mortification, nurse it in the bed-chamber of the heart, hide it from impartial Athaliah, and it will in time come to be king over us. Weigh the effect before thou admit the cause. Wisdom begins at the end; and if she likes not that, ends at the beginning. Had Adam fore-considered the miserable effects of that eating, the fruit had hung on the tree to this day, untouched for him.

Application 5. Admire we God's mercy with thankfulness. Adam sinned but once, and was cast out of that glorious garden for ever. We sin daily, yet God doth not shut heaven against us. The Lord did thrust him out, he calls us in. He did set angels against his re-entry, he appoints angels to guard our journey. They that were employed for his expulsion are ministering spirits for our admission. There was a fiery sword to defend the garden from invasion; not torrida zona, the parching country under the equinoctial;* not a wall of fire, not purgatory.† But a sword, which by its shaking seemed to glitter as a flame of fire; not improbable, some fiery inflammation in the likeness of a sword, for a terror in that passage. There is no sword against us, but for us, even the 'sword of the Spirit' to defend us.‡

There is no terror to keep us from approaching that celestial paradise; but 'we are come to Mount Zion, to the city of the living God,' &c., Heb. 12:22; all amiable, peaceable, delectable. Thus Adam's strength offending, was punished with severity, our weakness finds pity. He had but one commandment, therefore was justly plagued for breaking it; our proneness to sin is restrained by many, and we break them all; yet God shews us mercy. His justice came to reckon with Adam 'in the cool or evening of the day;' his mercy came to save us by Christ in the evening of the world. The wind brought that terrible voice of examination to Adam; that 'holy wind,' John 3:8, brings the comfortable voice of salvation to us. Then, 'Where art thou, sinner?' come forth to judgment; now, 'Where art thou, sinner?' come forth to amendment. Then, 'Hast thou eaten of that (sacramental) tree which I forbade thee?' Now, 'Come and eat' that sacramental fruit which I give thee. Then fear and guilt made man hide himself in the bushes; now, favour and faith calls him forth to the light of goodness. Then, his eyes were opened to see his shame; now, our eyes be opened to see our Saviour. Then, in the day thou eatest, thou shalt die; now, in the day thou eatest, thou shalt live. Then, cursed be the earth for thy sake; now, blessed is the world for my Son's sake. Then, in sorrow shall the woman bring forth; now, there is joy to all nations by him who was born of a woman. Then, dust thou art, and to dust return thy body; now, from corruption and dust I will raise thee to glory. Then, man lost himself and all the world by his sin; now, God hath sent redemption to all the world by his Son. Then, justly did we all die in Adam; now, graciously do we all live again in Jesus Christ.

ORIGINAL SIN is the effect of Adam's fall; both a fruit of it, and a punishment for it. It is the daughter of the first sin, and the mother of all the rest. Yet this distinction must be observed: quod prius in patre, posterius in progenie; et in illo erat posterius, quod in nobis est prius. In Adam first was actual sin; in us first is original, and after that follows actual. The points I will touch are these: What it is, Whence it comes, Where it dwells, How far it reaches.

1. What it is. Original sin is an evil ingrafted in our nature, wherein we were conceived and born, and hath two parts.

First, a real communication of the sin of our first parents to us; every man that came, by ordinary course of nature, from Adam, sinned in the sin of Adam. This is not by imitation, according to the Pelagians; nor by bare imputation, as the Jesuits; nor only potentially, because we were in Adam's loins; but really, by propagation. His sin in eating the forbidden fruit, was my sin. Though I were then unborn, yet it is mine, and I must answer for it, unless Christ answer for me. He was then a public person, the pledge of mankind; what covenant God made with him, he made with us; what God gave him, he gave us; what he promised to God, he promised for himself, and for us; what he did, he did for himself, and for us; what he received, he received for himself, and for us; and what he lost, he lost for himself, and for us. When he lost his original purity, he lost it for all his posterity. When guiltiness and corruption fixed into his nature, it stained all his posterity, Rom. 5:12. But this seems strange, that a man must answer for a sin done by another, and that five thousand years ere he was born. Answer: We grant it true, were it Adam's sin only; but it was his and mine, he being my father, and standing in my room. All men smart for Adam's sin as their own, yet few men weep for Adam's sin as their own. Let it not be so old that we have forgotten it, for it stands on our head or score in God's debt-books, and must there remain till our penitent tears wash it out.

Secondly, There is a depravation and corruption of the whole nature of man, whereby he stands guilty and polluted before God, indisposed to all good, and prone to all evil. All naturals are depraved, all supernaturals are deprived. It makes the youngest child hateful to God, as the young wolf or serpent is to man, an issue corrected by grace, never fully stopped but by death.

2. Whence it comes. From our parents, without question. This leprosy began in Adam, and ran over all successions of mankind. 'I was conceived in sin,' saith that holy prophet, Psa. 51:5; not meaning any particular sin of his parents in the act of generation, for he was begotten and born in lawful marriage; but his hereditary sin, whereof he was guilty in his mother's womb. The manner of this propagation is hard to define. As the mother said to her children, 'I cannot tell how you came into my womb; it was not I that formed your members,' 2 Mac. 7:22. I know not how my soul was formed, but he knows that formed it,* whether he framed it together with the body, or infused it into a body first prepared and formed. So may it be said of original sin: we know we have it, and we know from whom we had it; we know not definitively how we came by it, we know not how to be rid of it.

There be two select and most received opinions; take your choice. 1. That in the instant of infusion God forsakes the soul, not in respect of the substance or faculties of it, but in respect of his own image, whereof it is deprived in Adam. Nor is this injustice in God; for original sin in us is but a due punishment of that actual sin in him. Primo homini quod erat pæna, nobis fit natura. † 2. That the corruption of the body is derived from the parents, and the corruption of the soul from the body, as sweet oil poured into a fusty vessel loseth its pureness; and still this contagion of the soul must be considered as a just punishment of sin. Objection: But sin is an act of the soul, not of the body; it cannot then be in the body till the soul come; and in the soul it is not, because that is immediately created pure of God; therefore, unless the soul be traduced from the parents, where place you original sin? Answer: It is neither proper to the body, nor to the soul, alone; but is peccatum hominis, a sin of the whole man; and the man consists of both. It comes from neither of them single, but out of the conjunction of them both together; he is not a man that wants either. Neither the body must be respected alone, nor the soul alone; but as they jointly make one man, and enter into one condition.

But how stands this with God's justice, to thrust a clean soul into an unclean body, as a virgin in the stews? Answer: 1. The soul and body are not respected of God as single substances, but as being joined they make one man. 2. The soul, though it be created pure, continues not in that state one moment, being made in the midst of an unclean place. Children die, therefore they have sin; they die before actual, therefore they can have none but original.

Some pontificians hold that original sin is only derived from Adam, not from Eve, because it is said, 'By one man sin entered,' Rom. 5:12. But, 1. Anthropos signifies both man and woman. 2. Man is named because he is the chief instrument of generation; 'for the man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man,' 1 Cor. 11:8. By the law the males were only circumcised, because the beginning of carnal generation was from them. 3. Adam was the more noble person, and the transgression was not consummated but by his consent; therefore it is called 'his sin.' 4. If Adam alone brought in sin, then how was the woman 'first in the transgression!' 1 Tim. 2:14. 5. The sin came by two, and the apostle says, 'it entered by one,' for they two made but one; 'two shall be one flesh.'[‡] By one it entered, yet both sinned: Quia intravit per mulierem de viro factam;§ or because if man had not sinned, mankind had not been corrupted. The truth is, that original sin came from them both together. 'Of the woman came the beginning of sin, and through her we all die,' saith the preacher, Eccus. 25:24; which is good Scripture against our adversaries. Saint Augustine infers upon it, Per duos homines transisse peccatum.

Both, saith Ambrose, Parentes ut generis, sic et erroris. This is agreeable to the law of nature; Partus sequitur ventrem: if a free man get a child by a bondwoman, the child shall be bond by the mother, not free by the father.

First, as sin entered into paradise, so it entered into the world; for it is the same sin in us that was in them: in them actually, in us originally; and the same sin must have the same beginning; but it came into paradise by them both, therefore so into the world. 2. By whom death entered, by them sin entered; but death came by them both, and they received one common punishment as being guilty of one sin; both are turned into dust. From them both we have this corrupt habit, which is not only a privation of health, like a disease, but hath also humores malè dispositos.

But holy parents beget holy children; for it stands not with reason that they should convey that to their children which they have not themselves. Answer: Parents beget children as they are men, not as they are holy men. Sanctus generat, non regenerat filios carnis.* By generation they derive to them their nature, they cannot derive their grace, which is above nature. We give them what our earthly parents gave us, not what our heavenly Father infuseth into us. Take the finest wheat, winnow it, fan it, skry it, leave not a chaff upon it, then sow it; when it is grown up, weed it; when it is ripe, reap it; when it is in the barn, thrash it: yet you shall find as much chaff as ever it had before. So God ordained it in the creation, that as oft as it grows, it should bear stalk, ear, chaff, and all. A pippin may come from a crab-stock; but this is a new graft: it naturally bears none but crabs. Tame a couple of wolves till no cruelty appear left in them, yet the young wolf they engender will be bloody. Naturam expellas furca licet, usque recurret. If sanctified parents could produce sanctified children, I see no reason but counsellors should beget counsellors, and wise men beget wise men, not fools. But nature hath left us bad, and nothing but grace can make us good.

3. Where it dwells. This cannot be the substance of man, for by that reason the soul should not be immortal; and Christ, in taking our nature, should also contract sin, and so himself need a redeemer. It cannot be the faculties of the soul, the understanding, will, affections: for these were in man from the first creation, whereas sin was not before the fall; God made the faculties, he made not sin. It must needs then consist in the corruption of those faculties, and so original sin is a disorder and evil disposition in the whole man, carrying him inordinately against goodness. The subject of it then is not one part of man, but the corruption of the whole body and soul. The natural appetite is vitiated, from whence come so innumerable diseases and distempers. The outward senses are corrupted, the eye hunting after vanity, the ear opening the door to petulancy. For the soul, the understanding is like a dark lantern, the light is dimmed; the will like a water-mill driven with a violent stream, without cessation of evil, Gen. 6:5.

This cannot, therefore, come by imitation: then the faculties of infants should not be corrupted, for they cannot imitate good or evil; yet they have sin, or they could not die. Yea, so death should reign over no son of Adam, that had not 'sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression', Rom. 5:14. Many, in sinning, do not propound to themselves the example of Adam, but have other occasions. The thief robs a passenger, and never thinks of Adam, but of gold. What is Adam's eating the fruit to adultery or uncleanness? Besides, many in the world never heard of Adam's transgression. What shall we say then? Doth God give men souls answerable to their corrupt bodies, as to other creatures, spirits agreeable to their conditions? God forbid! pure they came from him. Doeth the carnal pleasure of parents cause it? No, for there is no generation without delight; and if that pleasure, considered in itself, were sin, marriage itself were also sinful. And if it were granted a sin, yet only that particular sin can be conveyed by it; whereas original sin is the corruption of the whole nature. Doth the soul, then, come from the parents, as the body? Divers have reasoned hard for this. 1. It is said of Adam expressly, 'God breathed into him the breath of life:' not so of Eve; therefore her soul was from his. Ans.: Nay, therefore it had the same beginning with his; otherwise he would have said, 'This is soul of my soul,' as well as, 'This is flesh of my flesh.' 2. 'The souls that came out of Jacob's loins were threescore and six,' Gen. 46:26: souls out of loins. Ans.: The soul is taken for the whole person. By a synecdoche, man is denominated by his better part. So Mary is said to be θεοτοκος, the mother of God, because her son was God and man; yet was he her son no further than he was a man: he was born only as a man. 3. But if the flesh only be derived from our parents, then doth man confer less in his generation than brute beasts; for they traduce not only bodies, but also spirits in their kinds. Ans.: God inspires the soul, but into the body, and so they both come forth of our parents. So totus homo ex toto homine nascitur: even the soul, albeit not materially, yet originally. Man's soul is not derived from the soul of his father; yet man, as he consists of body and soul, is begotten of his father, the Father of spirits concurring in that natural act.

Thus original sin provenit ex carne causaliter;* yet is in the soul subjectivè et formaliter. Sickness comes of corrupt meats as the cause; yet not the meats, but the body is the subject of sickness. The pure soul is infected with the contagion of impure seed, as a fair flower is sullied with unclean hands. They that live in a smoky house must needs be smutched, and contract some of the blackness. Put the whitest wool into the dye-fat of woad, it will come out blue. This, then, is an hereditary disease; as a leprous father begets a leprous son: often cæcus cæcum, and claudus claudum. Parents' goodness repaired cannot make this goodness propagated: as the Jews, being circumcised, begat children that were uncircumcised; to shew that the grace of circumcision was not hereditary, but they needed a new and successive circumcision of heart. The father had his sins forgiven him when he begat his son; he could not transmit part of that forgiveness to his son. The sanctity of parents no more passeth to theirs, than doth their knowledge and other virtues. Grace only comes from our supernatural Father in heaven.

4. How far it reacheth. It is not only a deprivation of original justice, and the want of this makes man culpable, though not culpa actuali, quæ est suppositi, yet culpa originali, quæ est naturæ. But also a pravity and deformity of all the powers of man; the efficient cause whereof was the perverseness of Adam's will, the instrument is carnal propagation, the end is eternal confusion, without the mercy of God in Christ. It is taken both actively for the sin of Adam, which was the cause of sin in his posterity, called originale originans. And passively, for the natural corruption raised in Adam's offspring, by his transgression, termed Originale originatum. The effects are three. First, Participatio culpæ; when he sinned, we sinned. Secondly, Depravatio naturæ, a deformity wherein dwelleth no good thing. Thirdly, Imputatio reatus, which subjects us to wrath and death, both temporal and eternal.

Bellarmino says that this infection is malum, non peccatum; an evil, not a sin. Ans.: Well then, by this concession, it is an evil; and by St Paul's confession it is a sin, Rom. 7:7; therefore it is an evil that is a sin. Object.: But it is lex peccati, the 'law of sin,' therefore not sin. Ans.: Yea, by this reason it is worse than sin. As the law that commands things holy is itself more holy, so concupiscence, the law of sin, prescribing things unjust, is itself more unjust. If it be not a sin, as they deny; yet it is worse than sin, which they grant. By saying thus, what do they gain? Object.: But it is not voluntary, therefore no sin. Ans.: That which was voluntary in our transgressing parents, is become necessary in their corrupted children. Object.: But it was not a sin in Adam to be tempted of Eve, nor in Eve to be tempted of the serpent, till they consented. Ans.: This was true in them, because sin had then no being; not so in us, who brought sin along with us. They consented before they had sin, we have sin before we consent. Then, the suggestion was external, without them; now it is internal, and from within us. We have a serpent in our own bosoms: concupiscence, to tempt us. Their innocency puts Satan to his trumps; in our natural uncleanness he finds prepared matter to work upon.

For reasons to prove this original concupiscence to be a sin, remaining in us even after conversion. 'If we confess our sins, God is faithful to forgive them; yet, 'if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves,' 1 John, 1:8, 9. The remission of sin, and the remansion of sin, may stand together. The guilt is taken away by forgiveness in Christ; yet after this forgiveness, he that says he hath no sin, is a liar. 'Let not sin reign in your mortal body,' Rom. 6:12. This exhortation is given to men regenerate. Now, there was no fear of its reigning, if it were not remaining. So Augustine.* The baptized is cleared from the guilt of all evils, not from the evils themselves. Nunquid caret ignorantiae malo? Is not the evil of ignorance still in him? Now, concupiscence is worse than ignorance, and ignorance is a sin. In iis qui intelligere noluerunt, peccatum: in iis qui non potuerunt, pæna peccati: this evil that remaineth in us, being not Substantia, sed vitium substantiæ: Dei gratia nos regenerante, non est imputandum: Dei gratia adjuvante, frænandum: Dei gratia coronante, sanandum. The Douay men say, it is a matter of exercise in the righteous, and if they resist, of merit. But so as well may spots and pimples make the face beautiful. Whose is the flesh? Is it not ours? Who shall answer for the evils done in the flesh? Shall not we? It is not our merit, that God's grace in us doth resist; but it is our fault, that our flesh doth rebel. There were certain heretics called Ophitæ, of the serpent, whom they did reverence, saying that he brought first into paradise the knowledge of virtue. Little other do the Rhemists, while they commend the serpent's tail or sting, teaching that it makes just men's actions more meritorious. But Espencæus, a grave writer of theirs, urgeth that of St Cyprian, that no man escapes the biting of the serpent without hurt, which is lust. Nec quisquam ex illo vulnere sanus abit.† It breeds sin, it brings forth death.

Thus far I have gone: if any inquire or require further, let them correct themselves. This is enough for us to know; and knowing this, it is more than we know how to help. When a house is on fire, it is a vain expense of time to inquire how it began: Tace lingua, succurre manu; hold thy tongue, and bring thy bucket to quench it. St Augustine compares it to one fallen into a pit: while the passenger stands wondering how he fell in, he replies, Tu cogita quomodo hinc me liberares, non quomodo huc ceciderim quæras: never examine how I fell in, till thou hast first helped me out. The patient would be impatient to hear his chirurgeon stand questioning how he came by his wounds, before he hath stanchèd the blood, and bound them up. It is the tree of knowledge that undid us, the tree of life can only recover us.

Conclusion 1. In every man are all sins, because original sin is the material of all. This is not in some men more, in some less, but in all equally, as all are equally the children of Adam. There is in every man a want, not of some, but of all, inclination to goodness; a proneness, not to some, but to all, evil. The seeds of all sins are within us; I do not say the practice, but the seeds. But some are kind, others cruel; some mild, others furious; some civil, others licentious. Answer: This difference ariseth not from more or less corruption, but from more or less limitation. God restraineth nature, but that is no thanks to nature. Something we ascribe to corporeal constitution, something to civil education, something to legal subjection, something to secular vocation, something to national custom, something to rational direction, all to the limiting grace of God, that corrects nature from running into divers sins. Without which, any man would commit any sin, even the most horrid that ever the world brought forth. That some are not so angry, so wanton, so drunken, so covetous as others, it is not from their own natural goodness, but the supernatural goodness of God. There is not the same eruption in all, there is in all the same corruption. Some be not kites, others hawks, and the rest eagles, from one and the same eyrie. But that God is pleased, for his church's sake, for order's sake, for the world's sake, for man's sake, for his own glory's sake, to repress and stint nature, there would be no society among men.

Nor be these seeds in the worst only, but in the best-natured men. So that, make choice of the best man, and the worst sin; and the worst sin is to be found in that best man, the seminale principium is in him. This every man that knows himself knows to be true. I appeal to the conscience, especially of a good man, whether he find not in his nature an inclination to the foulest sin in the world. He that doth not feel this suggestion of concupiscence, is stark dead in disobedience. Cain committed an unnatural murder in killing his brother, and went to hell for his labour; we hate such a villainy, yet is the seed of this sin within us. We are further from Adam than Cain was, we are as near to the sin of Adam as Cain was. He was the immediate heir of his body, we are as immediate heirs of his guilt. Sodom had found out an unnatural way of lust, and was destroyed with unnatural fire for it; we have the grace to detest it, yet, let our pride hear, the root even of that sin is within us. Sennacherib blasphemed the living God; Julian, both living and dying, blasphemed Christ: we know their fearful ends, and tremble to think of their sins; yet is there in us by nature a disposition to those sins, and (without preventing grace) we may fall into them. When we read that Judas betrayed his Master, that Pilate condemned the innocent, that the Jews crucified their Saviour, we bless ourselves; were Christ now living on earth, we could not use him so for all the world. But let us better consider of the matter: we are the children of Adam as well as they, and were born with as much of him in us as they were; so that, naturally, there is malice enough in us, were he now among us, with Judas to betray him, with Pilate to condemn him, with the Gentiles to pierce his side, with the Jews to tear his heart. Yea, they are not few, that with their blasphemies and oppressions still crucify, and that the glorified body of Christ.

To conclude. Let a man conceive in his mind the most notorious sin that can be; and though he do not act it, do not intend it, do never admit it, yet the matter, beginning, seed and root, is in him. Yea, even the seed of that unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost, though not one man among many thousands do commit it. In that sin is the sea of all sins, and in man is the fountain of that sin. All evil tends to a perfection, as well as goodness; and the devil would fain screw up all to that height, till, like an exhalation, it be fired and sent down to hell. It is only the omnipotent goodness that restrains devil and man from being so wicked as they would and could be. "The heart of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked,' Jer. 17:9: a vast ocean, whereof we can neither see the banks, nor sound the bottom. Experience teacheth that men are friends to-day, to-morrow foes; now civil, presently outrageous; all their life kind comforters, on a sudden desperate murderers. From whence comes this alteration, but from hidden corruption? The seed was before, now the temptation ripens it into act. When we hear of the murders, massacres, treasons, blasphemies, perjuries, apostasies, sacrileges, and such horrible sins of the world, let us look homeward, and confess that any of these might have been our sins, had not grace prevented us.

Conclusion 2. Through this sin we are all by nature the children of wrath, born subject to damnation, and stand like traitors convicted in the Prince's high displeasure, sure to die without a special pardon. The less suspicion of this, the greater danger. Every man is born a pharisee, well-conceited of himself; and if he miss scandalous impiety, he presently blesseth his own happy disposition. But let him know, that nature is as corrupt in him as in the worst man of the world. Therefore praise not thy nature, but God's grace, which hath so rectified thy nature. And to this common grace that qualifies corruption, beseech him to add that saving grace which mortifies corruption, without which the best nature of man shall never come to salvation. Yea, he that is conceived in sin is conceived in wrath, for the sin of man and the wrath of God are inseparable. The curse under which we are all born is threefold—of sin, of death, of hell.

(1.) Sin, which is a bondage under Satan. A Spaniard over his galleys, a Turk over his slaves, are good masters compared with this. There, only men's bodies be captivated and subjected to labours and stripes, their mind is free; but here, man's best part, his heart, conscience, soul, is under the king of cruelty; whose law is injustice, whose service is sin, and his hire confusion. Many will not name the devil without defiance, yet serve him with all diligence. They spit him out of their mouths; but he is lower, they should conjure him out of their hearts. There he sits in his throne, and keeps his court, till the Spirit of grace dispossess him. Invite this 'honourable guest,' that sin may 'give place,' Luke 14:9; it will have some room, but let it 'with shame take the lowest room.' If a man could hover in the air, and see all the miseries of a town besieged, so long till all their provision be spent, what lamentable shifts they make to protract a famished life; one tearing a piece of stinking vermin out of another's throat; a mother ready to devour the fruit of her own body, reinforcing that to keep life within her, that took life from her; the murdering pieces dashing down houses, and ruining the inhabitants with their falls; and upon the entrance of the enemy, virgins shrieking with cries, and rending their hairs, that their bodies must be abused before they have leave to die; the wife cleaving to the arms of her wounded husband, dying with him with whom she may not live; the rage of a merciless enemy, 'kill, kill;' the impotence of the sufferers, 'die, die;' how would his heart bleed in the commiseration of this calamity? Alas! this is but a poor shadow, a representation far too short, to picture out unto us the miserable slavery of the world under sin and Satan. Lands, houses, cities, estates, privileges, lives, and such temporal things do there perish; but here the souls of men are murdered, massacred, captivated. One is set to scrape together wealth, whereof he must not taste; there one is possessed with the spirit of blasphemy, daring heaven to vent his thunder; here one burning with lust, there another besotted with drunkenness; here one robbing the church, to the everlasting forfeit of her blessing, there another cheating the commonwealth; all taking more pains in the devil's service, than ever poor slave did in those tyrants' galleys; who can look at this estate with dry eyes? This made Christ weep over Jerusalem; by this she drew from him his tears before she had his blood. All this misery upon us, is from that sin original within us.

(2.) Death, and this in itself is a terrible curse; the very gate of hell, the portal of damnation. To the wicked it is the end of glory, and the beginning of shame; the epilogue of their comforts, and the first act of their everlasting torments. It is called the 'pale horse,' Rev. 6:8, a furious and forcible beast; Jehu's horse, that stamped Jezebel into pieces, was but a jade to it. The steed that dashes out the little puppy's brains, is weak in respect of death, which, with a spurn or kick of his heel, foils the strongest constitution. It treads on the necks of kings and princes, as Joshua's captains; insults in the terms of Rabshakeh, 'Where is the king of Hamath, where is the king of Arphad, and Sepharvaim?' Tyrants, whose force was upon the living, are by this horse laid among the dead; making their beds in the slimy valleys, and laying their swords under their heads. Where is Goliath with his beamy javelin, and brazen boots? Hath wisdom delivered, strength rescued, or wealth ransomed from death? This 'king of fears,' was bred by sin; and so far as sin reacheth, he challengeth his dominion.

In the sin of Adam all die. Death comes upon sinners, like an armed horseman upon naked footmen. There is no prevention by resistance, no evasion by flight. This winged Pegasus hath all men in chase; sometimes gives them law, and at his pleasure fetches them up again; gallops as swift as time, when his rider gives him the reins, and swallows the ground as he goes. He sets out after man as soon as he is put into the race of this world, and plays with him as the greyhound with the badger; sometimes he follows fair and far off, keeps aloof out of sight; anon he takes his career, and is at his heels. Sickness is the neighing of his nostrils, after which, though he allows us some breath, yet in the end overtakes us, and is upon us in an instant. Yet in Christ, his nature is changed, and this horse shall but carry us over Jordan to the land of promise. The quartan ague is called the shame of physic; but death indeed befools all natural skill and valour. There is a disease we call the king's evil; because he most happily cures it. So death may be called faith's evil; she only professeth the healing of this disease, and by the least touch of Christ's hand performeth it as familiarly as the richest balsam heals the smallest cut of the finger. Such a curse came by the first Adam, by the second such a blessing.

(3.) Hell. The wrath of God is the curse of all curses, and hell the completion of all torments. Death is pale, but his 'follower' (Rev. 6:8) is a black fellow. The very fit of a cholic is held an insufferable pain. A man would give all the world for ease; yea, many wish themselves out of the world to be out of that anguish. Now, if the pain of one part will so distemper body and soul that it cannot be relieved with all the pleasures on earth, what then shall that torment be when not one kind of pain, but the whole vials of wrath, shall be poured, not on one member, but on the whole soul, body, conscience; and that not for a time, but eternally, without hope of relief, which one thing makes hell to be hell indeed; and that not in this world, where may be some comforts and remedies, but in that ugly dungeon and infernal vault; and this not among living men, who, if they cannot ease thee, yet will pity and bemoan thee, but among damned spirits, which solace themselves in thy destruction, and rejoice to be thy tormentors?

Death is the extremest of all sufferings on earth, and therefore fittest to give denomination to the torments of hell, which are called 'the second death.' When the spiritual court of man is breaking up, every office discharged, the eye from seeing, the tongue from speaking, the foot from walking, only the sense is not yet past feeling, violent convulsions rending the veins and sinews, an army of pangs assaulting the heart-strings; when a man lies betwixt life and death, having no hope to live, and yet no power to die; this is an image and shadow, and but a shadow, of that second death which can neither be endured nor avoided.

This is that threefold curse of God due to the first sin of man. The first is a spiritual death, which is of the soul; the next a temporal death, which is of the body; the last an eternal death, which is of them both. These do answer to the three degrees of sin. 1. A guiltiness of Adam's disobedience. 2. The taint of original and universal corruption. 3. A pollution by many actual offences. In the first every man is equally guilty, in the second equally corrupt, in the third each keeps that compass which the power of God limits. Now, as in our guiltiness of Adam's sin hath its beginning, in original sin its continuance, in actual sin its perfection; so the wrath of God, which always stands opposite to sin, is begun in leaving us to the slavery of Satan, is continued by death, and accomplished by damnation. This is the misery of our natural estate, for which we have all cause to be thoroughly humbled, seeing, if God should take us away without repentance, it is not possible to escape vengeance. But blessed be that God, who hath done better things for us, and from this hapless, helpless, hopeless condition, hath, by a covenant of mercy in his own Son, raised us up to salvation.

THE REMEDY finds the next place in our meditations. We see by demonstration, and should not see without shame and sorrow, our natural estate. Whither doth a man's sickness send him but to the physician? A repairer we need, but where is he to be found? Where dwells that great physician that can do this cure? Is there any simple in the garden of nature that hath this virtue? No, non est medicamen in hortis. Is there any among the sons of man, any among the sons of God, the blessed angels, that can help us? No looking for a medicine in hell; there is nothing but poison in those sophisticate vials of darkness. Angels could not if they would, devils would not if they could, do us this good. Shall we run to the law? There is, indeed, a promise of life, but, withal, a condition which we were never able to perform, 'Do this, and live.' This we have not done; therefore the law condemns us. It began in thunder and lightning, and never gave over thundering till that blessed shower came, Ps. 72:6, wherein God rained down his own Son from heaven. Is there, then, no hope of life, no life of hope, remaining? Is our evil past all remedy? Must we needs perish?

No. Behold the day breaks, the sun riseth, darkness vanisheth, wrath and malediction give place to favour and salvation. Justice is content to give mercy the upper hand. Grace comes down from the imperial court of glory, in a refulgent throne of ivory, drawn by swans and doves, simplicity and innocency. Thousands of angels wait upon her, those celestial voices make her melody; the sun calls his beams to do her reverence, the moon and stars bow low to her; the obedient clouds part to give her way, the earth springs to welcome her; the sea curls his waves, the floods clap their hands for joy; the birds sing in the air, the beasts skip in the pastures. There is a universal holiday all over the world; only hell trembles, and the infernal spirits be struck with melancholy. Truth and righteousness go before her, peace and prosperity follow after her, pity waits on her left hand, on her right hand mercy; and when she first sets her foot on the earth she cries, A pardon, a pardon. Hear, ye sons of men, and thereby sons of wrath. My sister, Love, hath prevailed with your offended Father, and he hath sent me, the daughter of his goodness, to bring you news of a Jesus, the Son of his delight and greatness. Lo, he shall come down to the earth, that you may ascend up into heaven; he shall die, that you may live. Thus dear do you cost him; be thankful to him. A pardon, a pardon! Let the heavens sing, and the earth shout for joy, and the whole frame of nature triumph! Peace be with you, for God is reconciled unto you. To assure you of which comfort, I, Grace, do promise both to live with you during this world, and that you shall live with me in the world to come.

'The law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which we draw nigh unto God,' Heb. 7:19. We desire to enter into heaven: the apostle tells us of a wrong door and of a right. The law was a wrong door, 'it made nothing perfect.' Whether we take it for—

The moral law; what hope of remedy was here? God was ever wonderful in his works, and fearful in his judgments; but never so terrible in the execution of his will as he was in the promulgation of it. What a majestic terror was there! Lightning darted in their eyes, thunder roared in their ears, the trumpet drowning the claps of thunder, and the voice of God outsounding the trumpet. The cloud inwrapping, the smoke ascending, the thunder rattling, the fire flashing, the mount trembling; Moses climbing and quaking; paleness and death in the face of Israel; an uproar in the elements, and all the glory of heaven turned into terror. Is there any hope that law should save the world, that did thus terrify it? Never was such an astonishment: God hath been fearful in punishing the breach of his law, but never so fearful as when he gave the law. When he destroyed the old world, there were clouds raining, without fire; when he destroyed Sodom, there was fire raining, without clouds. But here were fire and clouds, smoke, thunder, and earthquake, in one amazing mixture.

Now, if there was such terror at the law giving, what shall be at the law requiring? If such were the proclamation of God's statutes, what shall we think of the assizes? The trumpet of the angels called them unto the former; the voice of an archangel, the trumpet of God, shall summon all the world to the latter. There only Mount Sinai was on a flame, here the whole world shall be on light fire. There only that hill trembled, here the foundations of the earth shall quake. Then the elements were in combustion, at this day they shall be in a confusion, 'and melt away with a noise.' There heaven was darkened, here 'the heavens shall be dissolved.' There only (as it were) sparks or flakes of fire, in this there shall be an universal flame.

He that did thus forbid sin, how terrible will he be in doing vengeance upon sinners! If he did appear so astonishing a lawgiver, what kind of judge must we expect him? If there was little less than death in the delivering, where shall they appear that are guilty of the transgressing? What shall become of the breakers of so fiery a law? If he should but exact his law in the same rigour that he gave it, and no more punishment should be felt than was then seen and feared, yet sin could not quit the cost. But now the fire wherein it was delivered was but terrifying; the fire wherein it shall be required is consuming; the fire wherein the breach of it shall be tormented is everlasting. O happy men that are delivered from that law, which was given in fire, and in fire shall be required! Fire will continue long in bells and other metals, but time will wear it out; but the fire wherein the law was given is still in it, and will never out. What are our terrors of conscience, stings and gripings of heart, sorrows and distractions of spirit, in the remorse of sin, but the flashings of this fire? Every man's heart is a Sinai, on which the law being read, there presently appear the clouds and smoke of rebellions, the thunder of God's vengeance, the earthquake of fear and despair, the fire of that burning pit. By this door then we cannot pass; for as the cherubims guarded paradise with a flaming sword, so here is fire, and smoke, and thunder, and terror to keep us out.

Or whether we take it for the Levitical law; could the law of ceremonies and sacrifices, which was wholly figurative of Christ, do us more good? Alas! they were but the shadows of good substances; and it must be the substance that doth us good, not the shadow. They were something, they are nothing: like stars which do us some pleasure in a dark night, but hide their faces at the glory of the sun. At first they were mortales, dying; after Christ's victory, mortuæ, dead; now they are mortiferæ, deadly. Some have called the legal priests cocos gloriosos, magnificos laniones, glorious butchers; none but evangelical priests bring the saving health.

Circumcision prefigured Christ: it is necessary that it should cease post adventum, quod præsignificavit adventum. All their sacrifices were figures of Christ's sacrifice; why should beasts any more die upon altars, when Christ hath died upon the cross? Paul calls legal ceremonies 'beggarly rudiments;' such are the popish, like a beggar's cloak, full of patches. When the debt is paid, it is unjust to keep back the bond: Christ being come, and having discharged all, it is injurious to retain the bond of ceremonies. In the spring we make much of buds and flowers to delight the eye and cheer the sense of smelling; but in autumn, when we receive the fruits to content our taste and appetite, and to nourish us, the other are nothing worth. The affianced virgin esteems every token her lover sends her, and solaceth her affections with those earnest of his love in his absence; but when she is married, and enjoys himself, there is no regard of the tokens. It was something to have a ceremony or a sacrifice, representing a Saviour; but this 'made nothing perfect;' and all the life which those things had was from that Saviour whom now we have.

'But the bringing in of a better hope did.' In the law moral there was no hope; in the law typical there was a little hope; in the law evangelical there is a 'better hope.' This doth both absolve the former, and dissolve the latter. Moses had a vail on his face when he brought the law; yea, God had a vail on his own face, which hid his presence in the holy of holies. Now, when Christ said 'It is finished,' both the vail of God did rend, and the vail of Moses was pulled off. The vail is off, we now clearly see Christ, the end of the law: our Joshua, that succeeded Moses, speaks to us barefaced. What a shame is it if there should be a vail upon our hearts, when there is none upon his face! 'Even when we were dead in sins, God hath quickened us together with Christ,' Eph. 2:5. Here is death in its extent, the worst of things we can suffer; and life in its extent, the best of things God can give. We have already looked death in the face, let us now more admiringly behold that love which hath given us life. What David said of Ahimaaz, 'He is a good man, and cometh with good tidings,' 2 Sam. 18:27, is infinitely more true of Christ: 'He brings good news with him.' There was impossibility in the door of the law, great difficulty in the door of shadows and figures; but this last is the door of life, whereby we have hope, good hope, better hope of our salvation.

Let us therefore 'draw nigh unto God;' and good reason, for he hath drawn nigh unto us. In good manners, we should have gone first to him; but we durst not, we could not, unless he had first descended unto us. 'Nigh unto God:' it seems that we were far off before; indeed, near enough to his presence, for we could not be but before him; near enough to his power, for we could not move but in him; too near (for us) to his justice, for that had condemned us; but far from his favour, for that had not approved us. Such terms of distance were betwixt God and man, that we could not approach; and if we would, yet the door was shut against us. Blessed be he that hath the key in his hand, and with one turn did let us all in; that by opening the door of his own heart, did open for us the door of heaven; for when by death his side was pierced, the door of life was opened. He hath shewn us the way; he hath cleared the way; he is 'the way.' Let us draw near by him, who should never have been welcome without him; and that God, to whom we draw near in faith and piety, draw near to us in love and mercy.

THE COVENANT OF GRACE.—There is a promise of reconciliation whereby God's mercy raiseth up forlorn man from his misery: 'The seed of the woman shall break the head of the serpent.' In this covenant there be two parties: God is the principal, and he promiseth righteousness and salvation in Christ. Man is the other, and he binds himself, by God's grace, to believe and rest upon the promise. This covenant is not made with angels, who, as they fell without a tempter, so are left without a redeemer; but with man. Nor yet with all men, but only with those to whom the free mercy of God hath given faith. 'All are concluded under sin, but the promise of faith by Jesus Christ is given to them that believe,' Gal. 3:22. Sin belongs to all men, the promise only to the faithful.

There hath always been a distinction of men. In Adam's family Abel was received into the covenant, Cain rejected. In the days of Noah, some were the 'sons of God,' the rest the 'children of men.' In Abraham's house, Ishmael is cast out, the 'promise is established in Isaac.' From Isaac's loins Jacob is loved, Esau is hated. The Jews had the 'adoption,' the Gentiles were 'strangers to the covenant.' Object.: But as Adam received the first grace for himself and all mankind, so also the second, which is the promise. Ans.: Indeed, by creation he received goodness for himself and all his posterity, and in his fall he lost that goodness in himself and all his posterity; God did put 'enmity between the seed of the woman and of the serpent.' This is primarily understood of Christ, who was so properly the seed of the woman, that he was not the seed of man; so betwixt Christ and Satan was the greatest enmity, for he consented to him in nothing. Next, by the woman's seed is meant all the elect, and by the serpent's seed all the wicked. Now, if all men were received into the covenant, then were all men the seed of the woman, and the serpent should have no seed at all. In every covenant there must be a mutual consent on both sides; as there is a promise on God's part, so there must be a re-stipulation on ours, otherwise it is no bargain; but he that believes not, consents not, therefore he is not of the covenant. That doctrine is repugnant to the Scripture, and unsound, which teacheth the redemption by the second Adam to be as universal as the sin of the first; it is so, indeed, for value and sufficiency, it is not so for communication of the benefit. The 'world' is taken in both the better sense and the worse: 'the world is reconciled,' 2 Cor. 5:19, and 'the world is not reconciled,' 1 John 5:19; who can reconcile these speeches? Saint Augustine thus: Christ redeemed totum mundum ex toto mundo, a little world out of the great. So we speak in common phrase, emphatically, a 'world of saints,' and yet we know there is a world of sinners. For method in opening this covenant, I insist on five points—the extent, the restraint, the cause, the manner or form, and the instrument or charter.

1. First, for the latitude or extent, Christ's sacrifice was universal, of infinite value, but of definite apprehension. It is universal in four respects.

(1.) For time. No time is excepted. He was once sacrificed in act, always in potentia, in effect and validity to save. Therefore, that he might save those who were before him, he is called 'the Lamb slain from the beginning of the world.' He was not sooner promised than his virtue was exhibited. God took his own word before he had performed the deed. And to shew that he saves to the end of the world, 'if any man sin (at any time) we have an advocate with the Father.' Adam sinned in the morning of the world, Noah in the forenoon, Solomon at high noon, Peter in the afternoon, we sin in the evening, they after us at very night; Christ died for us all. Not that all men, at all times, had this medicine, but whosoever had it found salvation by it.

(2.) For place. Even when Jewry was the sole depositary of it, and the Gentiles were then 'no people,' yet here and there many became proselytes; and it was not so confined to Jerusalem, but that God called divers aliens, and joined them to his church. But now the door of salvation is set wide open, men may flock from the four winds, from all parts of the world, and be entertained. When Gideon's fleece was wet, the ground was dry; when the Jews had the church, the Gentiles wanted it. Now the ground is wet, and the fleece is dry; the Jews want the church, and the Gentiles have it. Swarthy Africa hath heard of Christ; and America no sooner discovered her riches to us, but we discovered our better riches to them, and so exchanged with them in a happy traffic. God grant them to become more rich by ours than we have grown by theirs. So shall they perceive that all their mines are not worth one dram of the blessed gospel.

(3.) For object. No sin is excepted. Bodily diseases, as they come from several causes, require several courses of cure. He that is sick of the stone, alias curatur quam februosus. Cold aches and palsies have another medicine, than burning fevers and inflammations. That which opens an obstruction increaseth a fluid evacuation. But Christ's sacrifice cures all—close-fisted covetousness, or open-handed profuseness; the costive usurer, or the laxative rioter; aspiring presumption, or dejected despair; the cunning pharisee, or the impudent publican; proud affectedness, or sordid nastiness; natural impurity, or unnatural cruelty; blind ignorance, wilful malice; envy, idolatry, blasphemy; there is no sin so desperate but this physic can cure it. Noah's drunkenness, Lot's incest, David's uncleanness, Solomon's defection, Peter's denial, Mary Magdalene's prostitution, Zaccheus's oppression, the Ephesians' superstition, Paul's persecution—all are pardonable by this satisfaction. Whatsoever sin may be repented, may be remitted.

(4.) For subject, no sort of men excepted. 'The grace of God brings salvation to all men,' Tit. 2:11, that is, all sorts of men. The servant as well as the master; the king in his robes, the beggar in rags; rich Abraham and poor Lazarus; the commanding magistrate, the obeying subject; the bondman in fetters, the freeman in his liberties: 'There is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus,' Gal. 3:28. There be distinctions of men: in respect of nation, some are Jews, and some Gentiles; in respect of condition, some are bond, and some free; in regard of sex, some are male, some female; yet all these are taken away in Christ, in whom all are one.

There be four times and regards which take away all difference. 1. Sleep; wherein the wise man differs not from the fool, the turbulent is as tame as the innocent, the lawyer is as silent as his paper. 2. Death, mors dominos servis: gentleman and labourer, landlord and tenant, are distinctions upon the earth; in the earth, in the grave, there is no such distinction. The fairest lady makes no better dust than the Egyptian bondwoman; Menippus, there, cannot tell Mercury which was Alexander and which the potter. All differences are shuffled and tumbled together in the charnel-house. 3. The resurrection; those that lie in tombs and monuments rise no more gloriously than such as slept in their forgotten sepulchres. The angel that calls us out of the dust will not stand to survey who lies naked, who in a coffin; who in wood, who in lead; who in a fine, who in a coarser, shroud. When that day comes, there is not a forenoon for lords to rise first, and an afternoon for meaner persons to rise afterwards. The groom must not stay for his master, nor the maiden wait to make ready her mistress. Indeed, 'the dead in Christ shall rise first,' the king's own servants be more graced than the rest; yet these altogether. And for the wicked there shall not be such difference in appearing as was in offending; not such in their rising as was in their lying down. 4. The redemption: Christ was not only made poor to save the rich, but he will be also rich in mercy to save the poor. He was not whipped to save beggars, and crowned with thorns to save kings; he died, he suffered all for all. It was not one for one, nor one for many, but one for all. One for one had been well in terms of equality; one for many in terms of equivalency; 'thou art worth ten thousand of us,' say they to David; but one for all, this one must needs be of infinite price. Saint Paul useth all these phrases; sometimes, Christ gave himself 'for you,' which is vox spei, a word of hope; sometimes 'for me,' which is vox fidei, a word of faith; sometimes 'for us,' which is vox unitatis, a word of unity; sometimes 'for all,' which is vox charitatis, a word of charity.

2. But are all men actually blessed by this covenant? No; for some men did not receive it, therefore were not blessed by it; some men did not believe it, therefore not received it; some did not know of it, therefore could not believe it; some never heard of it, therefore could not know it. All that called on the God of Israel were not the Israel of God, Rom. 9:6. Though salvation were within that church, yet many in that church were without salvation. 'But have they not all heard? Yes verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world,' Rom. 10:18. 'Ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and unto the uttermost part of the earth,' Acts 1:8. Divers of the fathers thought that the apostles did actually and personally preach the gospel in all nations. And yet it may well appear that a great part of the world hath been discovered since, which neither professed nor knew Christ. When Augustus's decree went forth, that all the world should be taxed, this decree and tax went not to the Indies; yea, it is likely that, in all the flourishing state of the Romans, that monarchy was not heard of to them. But, as in Moses' time, the Mediterranean sea was called the great sea, because it was the greatest which they had then seen: so in the apostles' time, that was called all the world which was then known and traded in. This covenant is not yet offered to all men; it shall be before the world's end.

Now, even among those that have it, there is not to every one an effectual success by it. Men may be within the covenant, and yet the covenant not be within them. By God's promise, it is necessary that every one that believes should be saved; but it is not necessary that every one that hears should believe. Salvation is offered to many that do not offer themselves to salvation. Some hear and believe not; many say they believe, and repent not. Thus the covenant lies by them, sealed on God's part in the sacrament of baptism; but not sealed on their part by a required faith, and answerable life. In a covenant drawn, there is no confirmation by sealing on one side, if the other refuseth. Now, he that believes 'hath set to his seal,' John 3:33; but he that believes not hath not sealed. So a man may live within the circumference of the gospel, and have no benefit by it. Canaan was a land flowing with milk and honey, yet a man might live in Canaan, and taste neither milk nor honey.

'I pray not for the world,' saith Christ, John 17:9. There be two main parts of his mediatorship—his redemption, and intercession. Now, he excludes the world from his intercession, therefore from his redemption: for whom he does not pray, he did not die: he did not open his side, if he will not open his mouth for them. Let not men bear themselves too bold upon their acquaintance with Christ, when their affection lies another way. Those merchants are blessed that sell all the world to buy Christ, not they that sell Christ to buy the world. This covenant is too good for them that slight it; and it is but a poor valuation to make it the best flower of our garland: but one among others, though a principal one. Nay, we have no flower, no garland, but that. The covenant of grace is all our tenure; and as that assurance can never be taken from them that have it, so there is nothing but woe to them that have it not.

3. The free mercy and good pleasure of God is the cause of this covenant. 'God did not choose you for your number,' or goodness; 'but because he loved you,' saith Moses to Israel, Deut. 7:8. The same may be said of all God's chosen: election hath no cause but dilection; dilection hath no cause at all. To seek for a reason why God 'loved Jacob' before he was, is to search for the beginning of eternity. Why did God make the world? Quia voluit, because he would. Quare voluit? Why would he? An idle question. Why did God choose some men to life everlasting in Christ? Quia dilexit: because he loved them. Why did he love them? This is a vain Quære: there is no cause of the first cause; so high we can go, we dare not attempt higher. How comes it to pass, that we have wine and bread? Because the earth yields us those fruits: 'the earth shall hear the corn and wine,' Hos. 2:22. Why doth the earth afford them? Because the heavens give it their kindly influence: 'the heavens shall hear the earth.' How doth the heavens impart this influence? Because the Lord hath so ordained it: 'I will hear the heavens.' Thus far religiously; but why hath God ordained it? To ask this is a presumptuous folly. Christ 'loved us, and gave himself for us,' Eph. 5:2: he gave himself for us, because he loved us. Why did he love us? There is no cause of that. We may as well seek for a place above heaven, or below the centre, as a cause beyond love. There must be no Quare, where can be given no Quia. O the bottomless depth of that love! 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that God loved us,' 1 John 4:10. Here is love indeed, as if all other love were not worth naming or mention, in respect of this. Thus Christ loved us, and 'gave himself a sacrifice for us.' There is nothing better than Christ, nothing better in Christ than love, no love better than to give, no gift better than himself, no way to give himself better than in sacrifice. Other graces are spoken of God in oblique: God of mercy, God of peace, God of comfort; but love absolutely, in abstracto, 'God is love.' Thus, the cause of all causes is the love of God.

4. The manner of conveying this to man is by promise; so to our first parents he begun it, so to divers patriarchs he renewed it, so by his prophets he confirmed it, and at the coming of Christ he performed it. We may conceive this done by way of contract and marriage: first God contracted his Son to our human nature, and then united it by a solemn marriage. This was no clandestine act done in a corner; but though a dispensation was granted from the high court of faculties in heaven, yet Christ would have the banns openly published; and so they were at the least thrice. 1. In the church of paradise, when Satan flattered himself that he had subdued all mankind to his dition and command: even then a Redeemer was proclaimed, a husband promised, the 'seed of the woman.' This was the first time of asking, and none forbade it. 2. In the church of patriarchs: 'Shiloh shall come, and gather the people to him,' Gen. 49:10; the Messiah shall be married to the church. This was the second time of asking, and none forbade it. 3. In the church of the Jews, and that at so famous a time, and in so great an assembly, when Ahaz was frighted with Syria and Israel, bending and banding their forces against him: 'Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel,' Isa. 7:14; which is interpreted by St Matthew, 'God with us,' the Son of God married to the nature of man. This was the third time of asking, and none forbade it.

Now, when our Saviour took flesh, they were espoused. It is our custom to publish this promise thrice before the marriage, and once at the marriage. So was it here, John the Baptist being honoured to be the proclaimer of this blessed nuptials: 'Behold the Lamb of God.' Now, the Lamb of God is espoused to the nature of man: the Lamb of God, of the parish of heaven, on the one part; and the nature of man, of the parish of earth, on the other part. If any man, any creature, can shew any lawful cause why they may not be joined together, let him now speak, or else hereafter for ever hold his peace. There was no denial, but an universal acclamation from heaven and earth. The angels and a multitude of the heavenly host, sang, 'Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will toward men,' Luke 2:14; so from heaven. 'Hosanna, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, hosanna in the highest,' Matt, 21:9; so from earth. As if heaven and earth had consented together in this marriage-song, 'God gave them joy.' The sanctuary wherein this sacred knot was tied, was the body of the virgin Mary. This was that sanctified temple wherein the divine and human natures of Christ were married together.* He that took on him the office of the priest was the Holy Ghost. 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee,' Luke 1:35: he did knit this knot.

This promise is thus performed; Christ is married to our nature. Yet doth not this bring all mankind within the covenant; because, though Christ partake the human nature of all men, yet all men do not partake the divine nature of Christ. Here must be a new contract, a new marriage. We must be 'one spirit' with him, as well as he is 'one flesh' with us, or we have no part in this covenant. Here the Holy Spirit doth a new office, and espouseth the believer to Christ, the wedding-ring being faith, the militant church the temple, the witnesses angels, the nuptial garment holiness of life, the duty of the wife to please her husband, the love of the husband to save his wife. This is the contract or espousals. The public and solemn marriage is to come. 'Blessed are they which are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb,' Rev. 19:9. This is the true saying of God, this is his faithful promise; such shall be his gracious performance. O, the royal apparel, sumptuous cheer, unspeakable joy, at this feast, where the parlour is heaven, the cates glory and peace, and the music a choir of angels!

5. The instrument of this covenant is the gospel; it is registered in the Scriptures, and kept upon eternal record in heaven. This is the tenure we hold by, our letters patent from heaven: the Old Testament from Mount Horeb, sealed with the blood of goats; the New Testament from Mount Zion, sealed with the blood of the Lamb. The one promising and prefiguring, the other performing and exhibiting, this reconciliation. Therefore Christ, immediately before his death, first celebrated the passover, then instituted his supper; first ending the law, then beginning the gospel. The law and the gospel, like Jacob and Esau, had both one Father; yet how they differ. Esau hath the right of nature, the law was elder; Jacob hath the right of grace, the gospel is sweeter. Yet, Jacob's hand was born before Esau's heel, Gen 25:26; a beam of the gospel shone in paradise, before the written law came from the mount. Esau was rough and hairy; the law is full of terror: Jacob smooth and mild; the gospel full of beauty. Jacob and Esau strove in the womb, and began their war betimes; the law and the gospel are at strife in the Christian, and when God actually enters us into this covenant we begin this combat. The law comes in puffing, like Esau, in hope of the blessing; but the gospel, like Jacob, goes away full of the blessing. The law, like Esau, is full of tears; the gospel, like Jacob, replenished with joy. Thus under the law the covenants were drawn; by the gospel the deed is sealed. They expected it, we have it; they looked for it, we look upon it. As when the Israelitish spies had cut down a branch of grapes, and 'bare it between two on a staff' upon their shoulders, Num. 13:23, he that went before knew he had it, but he that came after saw it.

Now, every man looks well to his deeds and assurance. How should we prize and preserve this covenant! How dear should the gospel be unto us! Yet, alas! there be too many that value it below the least trifle they affect. They will not forbear the least sin it forbids, nor yield the least duty it requires, nor do the least action it commands.

It speaks to the covetous, Leave off thy worldliness; seek riches in me. No; the fool and his counters must not part so. Yield me some of thy estate in charity to the poor, in equity to the church. No; gospel, I thank you, I will not buy you so dear! Thus they look to have the inheritance, yet despise the conveyance.

The least sentence of this charter, the least line of a sentence, the least word of a line, the least letter of a word, is worthy to be written in gold, and worn about the necks of Christians as their only glory. Honour should be given to the meanest servant it hath, to the lowest part of the lowest servant. Quam speciosi pedes, 'How beautiful are the very feet of them that bring this tidings?' 'Blessed be the Lord that sent thee, and blessed be thou that hast kept me from shedding blood,' saith David to Abigail, 1 Sam. 25:33. Not only God, but even the minister is blessed in some sort that doeth good. Perhaps we cannot trim it up curiously enough for this choice age. The wits do not like it; men in whom wit hath given honesty the checkmate. But will a man refuse a diamond because it is not curiously set, or a malefactor reject his pardon because it is not eloquently written? If Elias be hungry, he will not despise the meat that is brought by a homely messenger. Indeed, he that teaches good and does good marries the graces and muses. But the gospel is the gospel; and whosoever brings it, the good heart will thankfully receive it. There is sweetness in flowers, though some smell it not; there is light in the sun, though the blind see it not; there is heat in fire, though the dead feel it not. Observe them that do carefully seek it. Sure if there was not some goodness in it they would not so love it as not to value their lives in regard of it. The countryman knows not the price of a jewel, therefore stands by the buyer and the seller, hears what the chapman bids and what the merchant refuseth; so he gets it. You will say that it is an occasion to make some men worse. It is true of one and the same word that it hath different effects, in heartening the good to the service of Christ, and hardening the wicked in the service of Satan. But still itself is blessed and good. If the sun cause a stench, it is a sign that there is some dunghill nigh; if it reflect on a bed of roses, there is sweetness. We have cause to honour that which doth honour us; cause to cherish that which doth enrich us; cause, if need require, even to die for that which gives us eternal life. O, let us bless it, and bless God for it, that we may all be blessed by it, through the foundation of it, which is—

JESUS.—Such is our Saviour's first title. 'I believe in Jesus,' without whom we had never known God our friend, and God would never have known us for other than his enemies. I will not dispute whether he could not have received us again to favour by some nearer and easier way than for his own Son to be humanified, and being man to be crucified. Aliter potuit ac voluit; he is not bound to give us any reason for what he does, we are bound to thank him for what he hath done. I have read many curious observations concerning the name Jesus.* Some of the first letter, which, among the Hebrews and Greeks, in sua gente denarii numeri nota est. Some of the five letters, some of the three vowels, some of the two syllables, in which superfluous descant they lose the sweetness, as by too affected diffusion some fingers lose the note. Yet herein they come short of the monks and friars in their conceits of the word Maria; they have so tossed it and turned it, so anagrammatized and transposed it, that never were five poor letters so worried since time did put them into the alphabet. They have made a goddess of her person, but a martyr of her name. They story to us how one was saved by only learning her name. His devout schoolmaster would have taught him the whole salutation, but the dull scholar only attained the first two words, Ave Maria, and could never come to Gratia plena. He died, and upon the top of his grave grew out a fair flower, whose leaves were natural characters of those two words, Ave Maria; and the wonder being searched, they dig into his grave, and find this flower to spring out of his mouth. Let him believe it that hath a faith of that size. But our salvation does not consist in syllables; it is the sense, not the sound, of Jesus that saves us. We acknowledge brevitatem in nomine, immensitatem in virtute. The argument of this discourse I take from Matt. 1:21. 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins.' Wherein observe,

1. The imposition of a name, 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus;' and, 2. The exposition of that name, 'for he shall save his people.'

1. Jesus.—This name was not invented but accepted by Joseph, brought by the angel, sent by God himself. Before that heavenly embassy little did Joseph conceive in his mind what Mary had conceived in her womb. He would hardly have thought of a name expressive enough of so great a person. God informs him what, and he performs that, calling him Jesus, therein acknowledging his reputed Son to be his true Saviour, and him that took flesh of his wife to be the God of all the world. Though we place not religion in names and titles, yet the wiser devotion is deliberate in this holy action. First, it is not safe to be ambitious of high titles, especially let us not arrogate the appellations of God. Some call their sons Emmanuel: this is too bold. The name is proper to Christ, therefore not to be communicated to any creature. It is no less than presumption to give a subject's son the style of his prince. Yea, it seems to me not fit for Christian humility to call a man Gabriel or Michael, giving the names of angels to the sons of mortality.

On the other side, it is a petulant absurdity to give them ridiculous names, the very rehearsing whereof causeth laughter. There be certain affectate names which mistaken zeal chooseth for honour, but the event discovers a proud singularity. It was the speech of a famous prophet, Non sum melior patribus meis, 'I am no better than my fathers;' but such a man will be sapientior patribus suis, wiser than his fathers; as if they would tie the goodness of the person to the signification of the name. But still a man is what he is, not what he is called; he were the same, with or without that title, or that name. And we have known Williams and Richards, names not found in sacred story, but familiar to our country, prove as gracious saints as any Safe deliverance, Fight the good fight of faith, or such like; which have been rather descriptions than names.

The name is given at our holy baptism, in the awful presence of God, of the blessed angels, of militant saints, at the child's admission into the church; 'In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.' All which should fill our mouths with sobriety, our hearts with reverence. The end of giving names (besides the main, which was for distinction) was either: (1.) For the memory of some good past; so Jacob was called Israel, because he prevailed with God. So Moses, which signifies 'drawn up,' Exod. 2:10. The occurrent begets praise; so the goodness of ancestors is revived by giving their names to posterity. This they objected to Zachariah calling his son John; 'There is none of thy kindred called by this name,' Luke 1:61; intimating that the memory of progenitors should be preserved in their names. (2.) For the mention of good present; as John, the grace of God, because he was sanctified in the womb. Or for evil present, as Rachel's Benoni, Phinehas' wife's Ichabod; Adam, red earth. (3.) For the presage of some good to come; as Abraham receives an enlarged name, because God meant to enlarge his family. Or for evil to come; as Loruhamah, one that hath not obtained mercy, Hos. 1:6. Here God, as he extraordinarily created the nature, immediately imposed the name. God is the Father of his person, and he is the Godfather of his nature; 'Call his name Jesus.'

Jesus is a name of great honour. *Nomen Jesu prædicatum lucet, recogitatum pascit, invocatum salvat. God gave him 'a name above all names;' it was not enough to exalt his person, but also his name. What is his nativity without an epiphany? Why are things exalted, but that they may be in view and apparent! so was the brazen serpent lifted up. Kings are so high, that upon earth they cannot be higher; there is no way left to exalt them but this, to spread abroad their names. What name was this? one among the famous names of men? No; super, above them all. Above all names! What, above the name of God? We might say, 'He that did put all things under him, is himself excepted,' 1 Cor. 15:27. God gave him a name above all names, except his own.' But indeed, this is one of God's own names. 'I am a Saviour,' Isa. 43:11. How is it then given him, when he had it before? Accipit ut homo, quod habebat ut Deus: He received that as a man, which was his own as God; he took with his nature his name, and the chief of all his names, the name of a saviour.

Jesus, a principal name, both in regard of God, and of us. (1.) For God, though many titles of the Deity sound and seem to be more glorious, yet he esteems none of them like this. They have in them more power and majesty, but not so much mercy, not so much of that wherein God delights to be magnified above all his works; and indeed the greater mercy, the greater glory, 2 Cor. 3:9. We read among those attributes of God (Exod. 34:6), one of his power, two of his justice, but many of his mercy. Other titles had not us men, and our salvation in them; therefore he sets by no name like that, wherein with his glory is joined our safety. It is not so much for his own sake, that he so highly esteems it, but for us; he had lost nothing, though we had lost ourselves. How should we esteem of him, that esteems of this name above all names for our sakes!

But howsoever it be to him, sure it is to us most dear and precious; we have no other name to hold by, Acts 4:12. Without Jesus, God had been an enemy to us, therefore to us it is more sweet than all the titles of God. There is goodness and greatness enough in the name Jehovah; but we merited so little good, and demerited so much evil, that in it there had been small comfort for us. But with the name Jesus, there is comfort in the name of God; without it, none. It is to us more useful than all; in the depths of all distresses, when the body and soul can scarce hang together, the one vexed with sickness, the other perplexed with conscience, how do we then implore him? We beseech his mercy by the name of Jesus, even adjure him by that, to make good his own name, not to bear it for nought; but as he is a Saviour, so to save us. This is our comfort, that God will never so remember our wretched sins, as to forget his own blessed name. But that as of all other he most loves it, so of all other he will least forget it. That he will interpose Jesus whom he loves, betwixt his wrath and our sins, which he hates. Thus, as suprema lex, salus, so supremum nomen, Jesus; the highest, the sweetest, the dearest to us of all the names of God, is the name Jesus.

2. 'For he shall save his people from their sins.' The name itself, we hear, is honourable for its author; God gave it; honourable for its nature, God loves it; now it is also honourable for its effect, it 'saves us from our sins.' In this exposition be three particulars.

(1.) What he shall do; 'Save.'

(2.) Whom he shall save; 'His people.'

(3.) From what he shall save them; 'From their sins.'

Save.—(1.) First, he shall save. Was he for this called Jesus? Why there have been many Jesuses, many saviours, Heb. 4:8. Others had this name besides him, and before him. Jesus the worthy, Jesus the high priest, Hagg. 1:1; to say nothing of Jesus the son of Sirach. It is true they had it, but not given them by God; they had men to their godfathers. But here the name is ordained by God, in the mouth of an angel. There is now a sect or society of Jesus, Jesuits; but this name was not given them by an angel, nor by their godfather, but by themselves, They gave themselves the name, God never gave it them. Whether they mean themselves the servants of Jesus, so are we all by profession; or the brethren of Jesus, so are all Christians by adoption; or the fellows of Jesus, as if he had been the founder of their order, and head of their college, I know not. But sure there is no man so unlike to Jesus as the Jesuit. They affect also another name, disciples; it is hard to judge in whether of them there is more ambition. Jesus was regular and 'obedient to the death;' no order in the world is so full of disorder, disobedience, and irregularity, as the Jesuits. Jesus paid tribute and honour to kings, Jesuits decrown them. Jesus was harmless, without fraud, 'neither was guile found in his mouth;' the Jesuit, where he is free, wears a mask upon his heart; where he is not free, he shifts it, and puts it upon his face. His equivocations, his perjuries, his regicides, witness his simplicity. They can no ways challenge this name, but by the contrary; as mons a non movendo, lucus a non lucendo, so Jesuita a Jesum persequendo. For the other Jesuses, they had all need, and were glad to lay hold on the skirts of this Jesus, Zach. 8:23; as on him alone that was able to save them, otherwise they had been falsely so named, lost men all. Therefore they are willing to resign it up to him, that he may bear it with a main difference from them all.

For saviours, other things, indeed, have been so called, Obad. ver. 21. Baptism is said to 'save us,' but no otherwise than as it represents the blood of this Jesus that doth save us, inwardly baptizing our souls. It is the King's broad seal; it is the King that grants the tenure, the writing doth but convey, the seal doth but confirm it. Ministers are called saviours. 'Save thyself and others,' saith Paul to Timothy, 1 Tim. 4:16. Much is ascribed to the instrument, that belongs to the agent, James 5:20. So they are said to 'turn hearts,' Luke 1:16, and make 'men righteous,' Dan. 12:3, yet God only justifieth; and 'Turn us, O Lord,' or we shall never be turned. He bids Ezekiel raise up dry bones, Ezek. 37:9. We can as well raise the dead as save souls. But the wind comes, the Holy Spirit of God does it. We thrust away all honour with both hands. 'Not unto us, O Lord, but to thy name Jesus give the glory.' The Father saves, and the Holy Ghost saves; but Christ alone paid the price of our salvation. This was the 'end of his coming,' Luke 19:10, this the meaning of his name. Superstition would have the very letters of Jesus, though pronounced by a faithless tongue, drive out foul spirits. But to expect this from the mere sound of two syllables, is to change the name of salvation into a charm of conjuration. Rome may attribute too much to the name, but I am sure they give too little to Jesus himself. For all that is sacrilegiously detracted from him, which is superstitiously given to saint, angel, man, work, merit, or any creature. Against all such self-cozened and self-condemned idolaters, his jealousy shall one day break out like fire, and say, What have I to do with you? If you can do all, or aught at all without me, then let me alone. Let me be either saviour alone, mediator alone, all in all, or none at all. But let their saviours be according to the number of their cities. We have one for all, one above all, one that is all in all, and let us never think of any at all but this blessed Jesus.

(2.) Not all people, but his. Caput est corporis sui, non alieni, another's body cannot live by thy soul; animat suum. The shepherd keeps his own flock, the master provides for his own family. But how could they be called his people before he had redeemed them? Well enough. Before all time they were his by election; in the fulness of time they are made his by redemption. They were his before ex consilio cordis; now his, ex pretio sanguinis. All are not his. Suum is a possessive and peculiar. Mine is the speech of a proprietary. My house, my land, my child, these be proper to me, not common to all. If all people were saved by him, how is he called the Saviour 'of his people?' If he be a Jesus to all, to whom shall he be a judge? If all be saved by him, how shall he condemn any? Why should the kindreds of the earth mourn at his coming, and wish the mountains to hide them from his face? It will be said, because they believe not. Belike, then, man's will must overrule God's will, whereas it is the common rule of Scripture and nature that actus primæ causæ ordinat actum secundæ causæ. The sun rules the season, the season doth not govern the sun. We are therefore good because God hath chosen us. He did not therefore choose us because we would be good.

He 'saves his people,' his people keep his laws, his laws are faith and obedience. Faith and obedience are not in the wicked, therefore they break his laws. They break his laws, therefore are not his people. They are not his people, therefore he doth not save them. If reprobates could here find an evasion, there might be some hope of their salvation. Men are deceived to think, when they lose themselves, that God loseth anything by them. What prejudice is done to the sun when a scornful eye refuseth to look upon him? Take a branch from the tree, it bears fruit still. Cut off a channel from the sea, it misseth it not. Christ hath no loss though men fall away. Therefore, qui vult vivere in capite, oportet esse de corpore, we must be his people, of his church, if we will be saved. Unrelenting sinners have no more portion in Christ than dogs have in the bread of children.

(3.) Why only from sin? It had been acceptable enough to save us from poverty. How welcome is that fleet which brings in gold enough to make us all rich! or to save us from our enemies, and the merciless hand of war! How welcome was this Christ in '88, when he spoiled that horned crescent, and drowned their new moon in the old sea! At other times the moon rules the sea, but here the sea became too hard for the moon. Or to save us from famine, how welcome is bread to the hungry! Such tidings to famished Samaritans savoured sweetly even from the mouths of lepers, 2 Kings 7. Or to save us from a raging pestilence, how welcome is that wind which can cleanse our infected air, and blow away the plague! Or to save us from death—divers diseases are very painful, but death is fearful; nature will endure much ere it yield to die—how welcome is that doctor who, shewing his vial, says, This shall cure you! But 'from sin?' This is a thing that most make least account of; nothing troubles them less than their sins. A wreck at sea, a cross on land, a suit at law, put men out of patience, distraction hath a thousand ways to mar their peace; but who break their sleeps for their sins? Doth extortion trouble the usurer? wantonness the adulterer? lying the flatterer? sacrilege the tithe-lurcher? a painted image the juggling idolater? Alas! save them from their sins, and they think you take away their best friends. No saving match they hold it, unless they may save by it. Oh, it is a desperate resolution for men not to know what sin is till they know it too late, and understand it in unquenchable fire. If a man had such sense beforehand, and all the corporal plagues that ever flesh and blood groaned under in this world, and the full punishment of one sin, were put to his choice; rather than answer for one sin, he would offer himself to all those pains.

By this time we begin to perceive what it is from which he saves us, sin. Indeed, what else could hurt us? What is poverty, but the want of a little luggage? Doth the horse think himself the better for the hampers on his back? Take away sin, there is no man poor. Sin makes beggars, as beggars make sin. What is ignominy without sin? The world's obloquy is the honour of innocency. How did all the reproaches of Christ turn to his glory! When the sinner revileth the righteous, he throws dust at his enemy, which the wind drives back in his own face; or like a mastiff, ill set on, that recoils on his owner's throat. There is no shame but sin. As poverty is but the want of a little ballast, so contempt but the lack of a little sail. How weak a thing is the strongest adversary, while our sin is not his second! Nothing can make us penetrable but sin. Saul fell on the mountains of Gilboa, not by the sword of a Philistine, but by his own sin. None could wound him till sin had first disarmed him. It is the corruption and stench of sin that breeds the plague, and all those pestilential tokens are but the tokens of sin. It is the fulness of sin that brings scarcity of bread. The bondage of service comes from the bondage of sin. Paradise itself were but a prison with sin, and the prison is a paradise without sin. Death should never have been at all, should not now be painful, but for sin. 'The sting of death is sin.' Take out the sting, you may put the serpent in your bosom. When the bee hath lost his sting in my hand, he may play with mine eye-lid, and do me no harm. All these are but the effects and wages of sin; therefore tolle peccatum, tolle omne malum, take away sin, and there remains no evil.

But the devil is our malicious adversary; give him but leave, and he will not leave one man alive. Hell is a dismal place, unquenchable fire is an inconceivable pain. Why is not Jesus said to save us from these, but from sins? Alas! all these shall never do us harm without our sins. Sin first kindled the fire of hell, sin fuels it. Take away sin, that tormenting flame goes out. And for the devil, sin is his instrument whereby he works all mischief. By the sin which he finds in us, he brings more sin upon us; so that to take away our sins is to disappoint his hopes. *Intra te est, quod contra te est. As Sennacherib was punished by his own bowels, so the sin within us brings all woe upon us. Any man thinks it base to be a slave's slave, but it is only sin that makes man a slave to Satan. But for sin the devil had no business in the world, but must go home, save his breath to cool his torment, and make himself merry with his own fire.

What abundance of benefits are here in one word. There is no evil incident to man, but it ceaseth to be evil when sin is gone. Blessings fall down like gracious showers; but if they light upon a bad and ill-disposed ground, if sin be there still raging and reigning, nothing rises but weeds and such noxious things. So that when Jesus takes away sins, he doth bless our very blessings, and sanctify our afflictions. He fetcheth peace out of trouble, riches out of poverty, honour out of contempt, liberty out of bondage; pulls out the sting of death, puts out the fire of hell. Which should direct our estimate of sin, to think worse of it than of its punishment; worse than of Satan, of death, of hell; for these are but the instruments of justice, an executioner, a jail, a gibbet. It is only sin that sets them on work, that brings a malefactor to the bar, from whence these wait to receive him. So that they are all wrapt up in sin, and he that saves us from sin, saves us from all these. Were there no death, no torment, no plague, we should hate sin for its own sake. Could it be granted to the saints and angels in heaven to sin, they would abhor it. Thus should it be, thus let it be, on earth.

Duty 1. We learn to hold this name in high respect and reverence. Did he take this name for our sakes, and shall not we honour this name for his sake? The heart is indeed primum mobile, but that queen walks not abroad without her train. This God requires principally, but not only; nothing can please him without it, yet that alone cannot do it. He hath created corporal organs to express without the mental devotion that is within. We must 'worship, and bow down, and kneel before the Lord our Maker,' Ps. 95:6. We begin our liturgy with this invitation. Shall we ever say it, and never do it? How ready be the Roman knees to bow to their Baals, which God hath forbidden! How stiff be ours to bow to Jesus, which he hath commanded! God hath bound this duty by an oath, shall we offer to make him forsworn? Rom. 14:11; giving him no more reverence than the seats that hold us. Not that this is required to the sound, but to the sense; hearing his name, let us have mind on him. It is the signification, not the pronounciation, that requires our reverence.

The novelist objects, that spirits, as well as men, are commanded to bow to the name of Jesus, Phil. 2:10. Now, they have no knees. A reverend prelate answers, What is that to us? we have. They have their peculiar ways, which we cannot conceive, otherwise than by these gestures familiar to ourselves. They do it their ways, let us do it ours; look we to our own duties, and not trouble our brains about theirs. To us hath God spoken it, and of us he requires it. But this form hath been superstitiously abused. So hath every sacred thing in religion. Shall we pull down our churches, because mass hath been said in them? or take joined stools instead of pulpits, because in these false doctrine hath been preached? There is some superstition left in many hearers, idolising their own preachers; shall we, therefore, hear no sermon? In us there may be superstition; there is none in that which God commands.

But why not all this reverence to the name Christ, as well as Jesus? (1.) Christ is not the name of God; God cannot be anointed; but Jesus is the name of God, and that wherein he principally delights. (2.) Christ is communicated to others; princes are called Christs; but Jesus is proper to him; there is no Saviour but he. (3.) Christ is anointed; to what end? To be a Saviour. Jesus is therefore the end, and the end is always above the means. The name of health is above the name of any medicine. He is high to whose person we bow, but he far higher whose very name exacts our reverence. Our Saviour's person is in heaven, but his blessed name he hath left upon earth. What interest have we in himself, if his name finds not reverence in our hearts? If the knee will not bow, it may be smitten, that it cannot bow; and the tongue that will not confess, may become speechless. And that name, to which men will do no honour, may prove comfortless to them when they have most need of it. Therefore, let us do reverence to the name of Jesus while we live, that we may find comfort in the name of Jesus when we die.

Duty 2. This holy and happy name, Jesus, teacheth us that we were utterly lost in ourselves, Matt. 18:11; for if we had kept our first standing, there had been no need of a Jesus. So that in our own sense and feeling, we must be men forlorn, if we will have Jesus to save us. If our wounds do not smart, who shall bind them up? Luke 10:34. Many talk of Jesus that do not truly feel the want of him, Matt. 9:12.

He came to save sinners. Why, all are sinners; what, then, to save all? No; but sinners in sense and conscience, that mourn for their sins, and groan to be delivered; that find sin their torment, not that make it their sport; that be 'bruised and broken-hearted,' Luke 4:18; these be the sinners that Jesus is sent unto, and singles out. He gives his riches to the poor that want it, not to the rich, that scorn it. As repentance breaks the strong heart, so he heals the broken heart. To the captives he gives deliverance, while libertines are reserved for vengeance. They that think they see, must remain still blind; they complain their own blindness, whom he makes to see. It is the storm of despair, the sense of anguish, that makes men cry, 'Lord save us, we perish,' Matt. 8:25.

A formal acknowledgment of Jesus is common; but how is a physician known and approved, but by a frequent resort of patients? In the days of his mortal flesh, to cure their bodily diseases, how did they flock to him from all coasts? Yet he came not so much to heal the body, as to save the soul. When that bed-ridden wretch offered himself to the new-stirred waters, still somebody stepped in before him, John 5:7. But whensoever we seek Christ, none shall thrust us by, none step before us. Never any man wanted mercy, that humbly and faithfully sought to Jesus for it.

Conclusion.—This is that Jesus, the Son of God's love, the author of our salvation; 'in whom alone he is well pleased.' It is true that many worthy saints have been somebodies with God. He was pleased with Enoch; so did he grace that saint, that he 'walked with God,' and God walked with him. He was pleased with Noah, from whose sacrifice he 'smelt a savour of rest.' He was pleased with Abraham, who was called the 'friend of God.' He was pleased with Jacob, surnamed Israel, a potent 'prince with God.' He was pleased with Moses, a faithful steward in his house. He was pleased with Samuel; in so much, that they who rejected him, are said to reject God himself. He was pleased with David, called 'a man after God's own heart.' Pleased with Solomon, whom he crowned with wisdom and honour. Pleased with Elijah, whom he took up in a glorious chariot to heaven. He was pleased with Josiah, with whom, for piety, no king before him, or after him, might be compared. Pleas'd with Daniel, calling himself the 'God of Daniel;' 'though Noah, Samuel, and Daniel' should plead for the people, to shew that they were prevailing favourites with God, and could do something with him. He was pleas'd with Mary, the virgin-mother; 'she found grace with him,' and was honour'd to bear his Son. Pleas'd with Mary Magdalene; sent her as an apostle to the apostles; yea, Christ appear'd to her first, after his resurrection. He was pleas'd with Paul, whom he rapt up to the third heaven. He was pleas'd with many martyrs, that seal'd his truth with their blood. Pleas'd with many confessors, with many men, many women, whose names he wrote in the book of life, and whose souls he took up to heaven. But pleas'd with all these only in Jesus; through and for the sake of the Messiah, the heir, the son of his desires and good pleasure, in whom he hath heap'd up the fulness of grace, and treasures of all perfection. Thus God accepts many gracious works and virtues at our unworthy hands. The piety of Abel was accepted, the meekness of Moses accepted, the faith of Abraham was accepted; the zeal of Phinehas, the justice of Solomon, the patience of Job, the humility of Paul, all were accepted; all the good works of faithful Christians are accepted; but all are accepted 'in the beloved.' Still it is in Jesus that God is pleas'd with us, and with what we do. Both our graces, our virtues, our works, our selves, are accepted for his sake; in whom God is pleas'd with us all, our blessed Jesus.

CHRIST.—This is the second title, which some take for his surname; others say, it is no name at all, but a mere appellation, as for a particular man, besides his own name, to have the addition of lord, duke, peer, or prince. But, indeed, it is the name of his office, expressing that in significance, which himself was in substance, 'the anointed of God' for the world's redemption.

Three orders of men among the Jews were anointed with holy oil. Kings, at their coronation; so was David. Priests, at their consecration; this began with Aaron and his sons, but afterwards was not used except to the high priests alone. Prophets, at their mission, as was Elisha. This was figurative of Christ's unction, who was to be a king, a priest, and a prophet. Not that this was done with material oil, but with grace, the oil of gladness, and that 'above his fellows,' Ps. 45:7; neither was king, priest, or prophet, anointed in that manner and measure that Christ was. Two of these offices have fallen upon divers; all three were never coincident to any one man, but Christ. Samuel was a priest and a prophet, but he was not a king. David was a prophet and a king, but he was not a priest. Melchizedec was a king, and a priest, but not a prophet. Only Christ was all; priest, prophet, and king. David was thrice anointed, once in Bethlehem, and twice in Hebron; the Son of David was anointed. (1.) In his mother's womb, furnished with graces for so high a calling. (2.) In his baptism, when the Holy Ghost came upon him in a visible form. (3.) In his resurrection, when all power was given him in heaven and earth. Or, if but once anointed, yet to three several offices.

Christ's anointing differs from all others. (1.) For the matter; they with oil, he with grace; that was oleum consecratum, this oleum consecrans. (2.) For the author; that oil was poured on by man, but with the appointment of God: this was infused by God himself immediately, without the ministry of man; 'Him hath God the Father sealed,' John 6:27. The excellent graces which are in Christ's manhood, have their beginning from Godhead. (3.) For the measure; angels and saints are glorious creatures, stored with rich treasures of grace; but all come short of Christ, both in measure, number, and degree. For 'God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him,' John 3:34. They have plenitudinem sufficientiæ, he superabundantiæ. He is every way the most principal and glorious man that ever was. Yet are not the graces of his manhood infinite, because the nature itself is definite. They are infinite in the deity, finite in the humanity, of the same Christ. (4.) For the effect; their oil was limited to their own persons, it had no virtue to work upon others. But Christ's grace is so diffusive of itself, that it derives holiness to us, 'running down from the head to the skirts,' Ps. 133:2, to all his members. He was not only anointed himself, but our anointer. Therefore it is called 'the oil of gladness,' because it rejoiceth our hearts, by giving us spiritual gladness, and peace of conscience.

There is unguentum præparativum, wherewith the impostumed member is fomented, supplied, and prepared for lancing. Unguentum refectivum, oil that makes a 'cheerful countenance.' Unguentum sanativum, such oil as the good Samaritan poured into the wounds of the robbed traveller. Unguentum consecrativum, with which kings are confirmed in their thrones. Unguentum odoriferum, which fills the room with a fragrant smell; such was Mary's, that perfumed the house, John 12:3. With the first, Christ was prepared for the sacrifice, to be lanced on the cross, for the letting out of our corruption. With the second in his baptism or transfiguration, when that divine testimony cheered his human heart, 'This is my beloved Son.' With the third in the grave, to heal the wounds which death hath made in his body. With the fourth in his resurrection, when he was made higher than the kings of the earth. After his ascension, he sent down the Holy Ghost with that odoriferous oil, the effect of the former, to fill his church with that blessed sweetness. The holy oil was compounded of earthly ingredients, myrrh, calamus, cassia, and the like, Exod. 30; so the graces of Christ's manhood were not the essential properties of his godhead, but certain created gifts and qualities, otherwise our nature could not have been capable of their participation. As that oil did sweeten the place where it was opened, so doth the grace of Christ drive away from the nostrils of God the noisome savour of our sins, and so perfumes us with his righteousness, that both our persons and holy actions become acceptable to him. Thus in general, now let us particularly meditate on his threefold office.

1. He was anointed to be our priest, to offer up that propitiatory, expiatory sacrifice for all our sins. Legal priests offered many sacrifices, the Lamb of God was offered up once for all. They sacrificed not themselves, but for themselves and the people; Christ sacrificed himself, not for himself, but for the people. But of this sacrifice more hereafter. Now the communication of that holy oil hath made us all priests, and we have also our sacrifices.

(1.) A holy life. 'Offer to God the sacrifice of righteousness,' Ps. 4:6. Let thy heart be the altar, the fire charity, the hand faith, the knife that 'sword of the Spirit;' make a whole burnt-offering of thy sins; let not a loose thought, nor a straggling desire, escape this holy combustion. Then offer up the rest to his service. Christ gave his whole self for thee, give thy whole self to Christ. The Levitical sacrifice was to be without blemish, how much more the evangelical? If Cain had offered himself when he sacrificed his beast,* he had been accepted of God.

(2.) Prayer. 'Let my prayer come before thee as incense, and the lifting up of my hands as an evening sacrifice,' Ps. 141:2. This should be our daily service, as a lamb was offered up morning and evening for a sacrifice. But, alas! how dull and dead are our devotions! Like Pharaoh's chariots, they drive on heavily. Some, like Balaam's ass, scarce ever open their mouths twice. We should 'pour forth our souls' in prayer, as if our souls did strive with our prayers, which should come first unto God; as Ahimaaz ran with Cush, who should come first to David. We cannot look for a blessing without prayer, we cannot pray faithfully without a blessing.

(3.) Thanksgiving. 'Whoso offereth me praise honoureth me,' Ps. 50:23. 'Offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name,' Heb. 13:15. These be the 'odours in the vials of the saints,' Rev. 5:8. But, alas! we esteem our blessings as Solomon did the brass given to the temple; it was so much that he never stood to weigh it; they are so common, we forget to value them. The sun draws up clouds, and they give us showers: yet often hide that sun from us which drew them up for us. The Lord gives us blessings, and they give us sweet refreshings; but take we heed lest they hide our God from us. Christ's bounty perit ingrato, but then perit ingratus: the unthankful man loseth it, but then he loseth himself with it. This is a sacrifice that shall never cease; after this world we need not pray, nor beg good things of God, for we shall have more than heart can wish; yet even then we shall laud and praise him for ever.

(4.) The fruits of charity, which the apostle calls an 'odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God,' Phil. 4:18. 'Forget not to do good, and to communicate: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased,' Heb. 13:16. Superflua diviti, necessaria pauperi; qui hæc retinet, detinet aliena. The best grace after dinner is to give the reversion to the poor. By this men may know whether they have sacrificed themselves to God or no; for he that hath given the jewel will never stick at the box. Nec des tua, et detineas te; nec des te, et detineas tua. Give not to the Lord thy goods, withholding thyself; nor give him thyself, withholding thy goods. But many, instead of filling the hands of the poor with these sacrifices, do fill their own hands with the sacrifices of the poor. So, while they should offer to God the sacrifice of a charitable devotion, they offer to the devil the sacrifice of unjust oppression. Popish priests turn the ruins of the poor to the church; our sacrilegers turn the ruins of the church to themselves. 'With such sacrifices God is not pleased.'

(5.) Repentance. 'The sacrifice of God is a contrite spirit, a broken heart he will not despise,' Ps. 51:17. If martyrdom do not call us to sacrifice our bloods, yet let contrition work us to sacrifice our tears. The sacrifice could not be offered, but it must bleed; Christ in his sacrifice was slain for us; nothing in our sacrifice is to be slain but our sins. 'Mortify your earthly members,' Col. 3:5, your lusts. There is one mortification to cast ourselves out of the world, there is another mortification to cast the world out of us; the former is detestable, the other necessary. We must all, with Jacob, first marry Leah, 'blear-eyed' repentance, before we can have beauteous Rachel, peace of conscience. These be the Christian sacrifices.

2. He was anointed to be our prophet. He is that wisdom of the Father; teaching by his oracles, convincing by his miracles, performing the will of God, and informing us. Wisdom indeed; not only according to his nature and eternal generation, the inward and essential Word; but also in regard of his prophetic office, sweetly disposing the ways of man's salvation. 'In him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge,' Col. 2:3: the fountain of all spiritual understanding, as all the senses are in the head. Thus was he anointed to teach us; he was always a preacher; living, he took all occasions to instruct them that were to instruct his flock. Dying, *Etiam crux Christi pendentis, cathedra fuit docentis. Sometimes a mountain, sometimes a ship, and last of all the cross, was his pulpit.

But now are we instructed by this prophet? hath this wisdom made us wise? 'This is eternal life, to know God, and whom he hath sent, Jesus Christ,' John 17:3. Here is wisdom above wisdom: he that knows this, with experimental feeling, knows all. He is wise that knows things in their proper nature and causes; but he that knows wisdom itself, which is Christ, is not only wise but blessed. O that I had so deep an insight in this divine wisdom, that I could limn it out to you in its true beauty! But a lame man may point you out the right way; in a dark night, we had better have a little boy with a candle lighted, than a great man with an extinguished torch. Yea, a superior may lean on an inferior, as a great torch may be lighted at a small taper. So the very angels learned of the church the mystery of the incarnation, Eph. 3:10. That great bishop of our souls teach us, that we may be able to teach you!

Whither should we send you for that learning which can save you, but to the word of this prophet? 'Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life,' John 6:68. This shall make you wiser than your fathers, wiser than your teachers, wiser than your enemies. Without consulting these oracles, were we wiser than the children of the east, the day of judgment will find us fools. How murderous is that policy of Rome, to wrap up the oracles of this our anointed prophet in an unknown language, with severe interdictions! Oh! but simplicity, the simplicity of children, is commended by them! As if the sense of that precept did not concern either our affection for the subject, 'Be children in malice, but not in knowledge,' 1 Cor. 14:20; or evil for the object, 'Be simple concerning evil, but wise unto that which is good,' Rom. 16:19. There must be a scire facias before there can be a fieri facias: the blind seamster will never sew true-stitch. They that will never seek what they should know, will never know what they should do.

Let us love the wisdom of God, as we would have the God of wisdom love us. The whole world contents itself with a very little measure of this study, which should admit of no bounds but the common bounds of mortality. This is one cause why God is so ill served, for that can be no true worship of him which is separated from knowledge: the 'sacrifice of fools' is not accepted. He requires rationalem cultum, our 'reasonable service,' Rom. 12:1. If any man among you 'seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise,' 1 Cor. 3:18. He speaks not of them that are wise, but seem to be wise; and not wise in the kingdom of heaven, but in this world. And if they were all this, it were no great matter of pride; where the wisest know but in part, and the rest see but a part of that part. Yet 'let him become a fool,' acknowledge his own natural blindness, for humble ignorance is better than proud knowledge, 'that he may be wise.' 'The meek he will teach his way,' Ps. 25:9; the humble are the docile; God takes no other scholars into his school.

Let me tell the world, that this divine knowledge is no matter of opinion; yea, they come nearest the matter, who stand farthest off in opinion from the world. There is a great deal of wisdom in the world, yet but a few wise men. When alms is divided among beggars, prizes among soldiers, lands or goods among legators, every one is discontented, and thinks he hath not his full share. But knowledge, of all dividends, seems to be most equally divided; for every man thinks his own portion sufficient: Sorte sua contentus abit. At an assize, witnesses do not appear when jurates be called. In your several companies, when mercers be summoned, goldsmiths do not come in; upon the citation of mechanics, none but mechanics shew themselves; no tradesman will answer to the name of another craft or mystery. But at the proclamation, 'Oyez, all that be wise come hither;' who comes not? never was such an appearance in any court. But alas! are all wise that so think themselves? Nay, is any man wise that applauds his own wisdom? It is said 'to make a man's face shine;' but yet sanctified wisdom is by grace as far out of a man's conceit as the face by nature is out of his sight. It may shine to others, himself doth not think it glorious. The people saw the 'shining face of Moses,' and were afraid: Moses saw not the brightness of his own countenance. As there is no day without a night, only that is the longest day which hath the shortest night, so there is no mind of man without some clouds and shadows of error and ignorance, only optimus ille qui minimis urgetur; that is best which hath fewest.

We call ourselves Christians: it were a shame not to yield ourselves to be taught of our Master. Christ came in signo ad Abraham, in lege ad Mosem, in carne ad Mariam, in gratia ad electos, in evangelio ad omnes the church is his school, the gospel his doctrine. On earth let us be his disciples, that after our removal we may be admitted to a new form among the blessed angels.

3. He was anointed to be our king. He was to be a prophet, like Moses. 'The Lord shall raise you up a prophet like unto me,' Acts

3:22; to be a priest, like Melchizedec, 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedec,' Ps. 110:4: so also a king, like David, 'God will give him the throne of his father David, and he shall rule over the house of Jacob for ever,' Luke 1:32. Not such a king as Herod feared, when he steeped his prevention in the blood of infants: it is not a secular, popular, visible kingdom. Of temporal royalty he had so little share, that his chair of estate was the cross, his crown made of thorns, his sceptre a reed, the Vivat Rex was 'Crucify him;' and the Head of the church had not a place to rest his head on. But a spiritual, immortal, invisible kingdom; his throne being the heart of man, his court our conscience, and the sceptre his holy word. The Jews disclaimed him, 'We have no king but Cæsar,' John 19:14; we say the contrary, 'We have no King but Christ.' What is said of Michael (Rev. 12:7), is meant of Christ: the battle and victory is his. We need no angelical, that have an evangelical, Head.

Well, if he be our King, let him rule us: no Divisum imperium cum Jove mundus habet: his throne brooks no rivals. If we divide his regiment, we divide ourselves from his regiment. We must not set up one king in Hebron, another at Jerusalem; prince against prince, Absalom against David, the prince of this world against the prince of the whole world. Not Christ shall command me to-day, mine own lust or pleasure to-morrow. If we be not his loyal subjects on earth, we shall not be his glorious courtiers in heaven. Never king bought his subjects so dear; he may well challenge our allegiance. 'All the garments of our king smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia,' Ps. 45:8. Let not our disobedience, by the odour and stench of our sins, overcome that sweet perfume to our own souls. He is the King anointed; and with the odour of that supernatural balm we are perfumed. Let the fragrancy of his name draw us to holiness, Cant. 1:3; and of our own lusts be it said, 'Their place is no more found,' Rev. 12:8.

Yea, he hath made us all 'kings unto God his Father,' Rev. 1:6. How great is that King which makes kings? Kings over our tractable and morigerous desires, to direct and encourage them. Kings over our mutinous and rebelling lusts, to subdue and punish them: Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos. The glory of a king is not to exercise dominion over men's bodies, but to be a king of hearts. When a Christian can master his own affections, this is regale imperium. He that can overcome a fulness of estate by abstinence, overcome injuries by patience, overcome blaspheming enemies by innocence, yea, overcome God himself by penitence, and hold that almighty hand by humble confidence, as Jacob wrestled with the angel, and got the better, he is a king indeed, and shall be called Israel, a potent prince with God.

Kings live not like common persons; their apparel, diet, dwelling, attendance, revenues, all are above the vulgar rank. If Christ hath made us kings, why do we live like beggars? Our diet is manna, the bread of angels; our apparel out of the rich wardrobe of God's own Son; our dwelling (for this is but our pilgrimage) is that glorious court above the starry firmament; our revenues be those immortal graces from the treasury of goodness, which can never be wasted; our attendance no meaner than celestial angels. Thus we fly a higher pitch than the secular wing. 'Men think it strange that we run not along with them to riot and excess,' 1 Pet. 4:4. They that walk out of the common road shall be deemed miracles, when as the kingdom itself is a mystery; but to eagles of the same eyrie it is neither miracle nor mystery. The hen that hath hatched partridge's or pheasant's eggs, seeing them rise from under the brooding and soar aloft, looks after them with wonder; alas, she thought they had been her own, whereas they are of a higher kind. The world, in some sort, hath brought up God's children; for, 'first is that which is natural, then that which is spiritual,' 1 Cor. 15:46. It may be we have eaten their bread, fed at their cost. But when these fly high at the game of high eternity, and take a course quite above the world, the old birds, worldlings, stand amazed, and look strangely after them, because they are ignorant that these are of a higher generation.

Conclusion.—This blessed Christ is the sole paragon of our joy, the fountain of life, the foundation of all blessedness. The sum of the whole Bible, prophesied, typified, prefigured, exhibited, demonstrated, to be found in every leaf, almost in every line; the Scriptures being but as it were the swaddling bands of the child Jesus. Abraham, Moses, Joshua, Samson, David, were all renowned, yet are but meant on the by; Christ is the main, the centre whither all these lines are referred. They were all his forerunners, to prepare his way: it is fit that many harbingers and heralds should go before so great a Prince; only John Baptist was that Phosphorus, or morning star, to signify the sun's approaching. The world was never worthy of him, especially not so early; he was too rich a jewel to be exposed at the first opening of the shop. Therefore he was wrapt up in those obscure shadows, the tree of life, Noah's ark, Jacob's ladder; therefore called 'the expectation of nations,' longed and looked for more than health to the sick, or life to the dying. The golden legend of those famous worthies, Heb. 11, were but so many pictures which God sent before to the church, counterfeits, abridgments, and dark resemblances of the Prince of glory, whom his father promised to many unto mankind; and 'when the fulness of time was come,' Gal. 4:4, he performed it. Lo! now, all those stars drew in their borrowed light when that sun arose. To whom, instead of all the rest, Moses and Elias did homage on Mount Tabor, as to the accomplisher of the law and prophets.

The best things of the world may be proud and happy to be resemblances of him; by him they were made, but for him they should not continue; therefore most willingly they yield all their services to his honour, glad to be as silk and gold, fringe and lace, for the embroidery of his garments. The sun, the brightest of all stars; wine, the sweetest of all liquors; the rose, the fairest of all flowers; bread, so necessary; water, so refreshing; all emblems to adumbrate some parcels of his infinite perfections. Were they all compounded into one, the most harmoniously, yet they could not make up an idea of him. He is life and light, the sun and the sum, the founder and the finisher of all perfect blessedness. Christus in imo, Christus in summo; Christ is the root, and Christ is the roof. With us divers things have their uses in some cases and places, but to make us righteous before God, to pacify our consciences, to preserve us in this world from sin, and in the world to come from damnation, nothing but Christ. As for God, he hath so set his love upon Christ, that besides him, or out of him, he regards no person, no action. Only look how much there is of Christ in any man, whether imputed or infused, so much he is in God's books. Out of that boundless treasury he pays himself all our debts, and that so sufficiently, that whatsoever God can require for satisfaction, or man desire for perfection, it is all found in Christ. Now this Christ, as he is our King, govern us; as he is our Prophet, instruct us; as he is our Priest, save us, by the sacrifice of himself and his own precious merits. Amen.

HIS ONLY SON.—'His Son.' Three things are here considerable: the person begotten, the manner of begetting, and the time. 1. The person begotten is Christ, who must be considered as he is a Son, as he is God. As a Son, he is not of himself, but the Son of the Father; as God, he is of himself, not begotten, nor proceeding. He is alius a Patre, not aliud a Patre; not the same species with the Father, but the same individuum. 2. The manner: this is neither by flux, as water is derived from the spring by a channel; nor by decision, as one thing is cut out of another; nor by propagation, as a graft is transplanted into a new stock; but by an unspeakable communication of the whole essence from the Father to the Son. Which is no more a diminution of the Father's godhead, than the lighting of one torch doth take from another. Lumen de lumine, saith the Nicene Council. 3. The time; which hath neither beginning, middle, nor end, but is eternal. Before mountains, or fountains, or the world, 'the Lord possessed me,' Prov. 8:22; now before the creation was nothing but eternity. But the person begetting must needs go before the person begotten? Answer: There is a double priority, of time and of order. In the generation of creatures there must be a priority both of time and order; here is of order, not of time.

The Son of God therefore must needs be God. We are neither Arians, nor Lucians, nor Porphyrians, nor Atheists, that I should stand to prove this; yet admit one argument to confirm it. Christ gave a resolute and constant testimony of himself, that he was the Son of God, and very God. Why, is this such a matter? Divers others have not stuck at such a profession. Nay, but hear it all. Never did any man arrogate this title, to be called God, but was made the exemplary spectacle of a miserable man. Our first parents credited the devil, that they should be as gods. What became of it, but the ruin of us all? Herod did not exact it, but only accept it; he took without refusing, what was given him without asking; yet what man ever perished more fearfully? If Christ had pretended a divinity, and been but mere man, his confusion had been as grievous, as now his exaltation is glorious. But while Herod, Pilate, Caiaphas, and all those enemies of his deity were plagued, himself triumphs in the glory of blessedness. Never man was ambitious of this honour, but he was confounded; Christ challenged it 'without robbery,' and was glorified; therefore he is God. How should this gospel, which is more contrary to nature, than water is to fire, so win upon the whole world, that men should trust him with their souls, should witness him with their bloods; but that he is omnipotent God?

'His only Son;' because he is so in a special manner. Nothing can be the Son of God as he is. Angels are God's sons by creation, believers by adoption, Christ as man by personal union; but Christ as God, neither by creation, nor adoption, nor by virtue or grace of union, but by nature. But if Christ, as God, be the Son of the Father by nature; and as man, by the personal union; then he is two sons? Answer: One person cannot be two sons, but may be one son in two respects. Two respects make not two things; so light and heat should make two suns.

Was it necessary that Christ should be God? Yes. First, None can save but God. He alone can repeat his creation; that is, to save us: 'Beside me there is no Saviour,' Is. 43:11. Secondly, That the grace of God might go beyond the sin of man. The sinning Adam was a mere man, the redeeming Adam is God and man: that as the first is far excelled by the second, so our comfort by the redemption of the second might be greater than our discomfort by the fall of the first. Thirdly, We were all lost, and there was need of remedy. What shall that be? Mercy? No; we had justly deserved punishment. What then? Justice? No; for we stood in need of mercy. Here now for God to be so merciful as not to disannul his justice, and so just as not to forget his mercy: salvo jure justitiæ, parare locum misericordiæ: both to appease his wrath, that his justice might be satisfied; and yet so to appease it, that his mercy might be magnified, here must come in a meditation.* Now, what shall this be? Shall we offer God the world for satisfaction? It is his own before. Should angels tender themselves? They are engaged to him for their making; besides, they are finite, and cannot answer for an infinite debt: this must be payed with an infinite sum; therefore he must be God. But this is not all; for what can satisfy for our apostasy but humility? When God comes to obey, he must be humbled: he must serve that comes to deserve, which God only cannot do. When he comes to die he must be mortal, which God only cannot be.

Therefore he was both: man to become bound himself, God to free us; man to become mortal, God to overcome death; man to die for his friends, God to vanquish his enemies. The foot of that visional ladder stood close to Jacob's loins, the human nature of Christ to his church militant; the top reacheth heaven, his divine nature is one with the Father, to bring us up to the church triumphant. How inconceivable was this mercy, how doth it swallow up all human comprehension! If all the goodness of all the men in the world were contracted into one, and all the badness quite thrown out; yet were not this man worthy to kiss the hand of the Son of God, or to be saluted by him. But that he should die for those that had no goodness at all, here let our souls make a stand, and say, Lord, enlarge our hearts to be thankful, for we know not what to say.

Suppose a subject hath done some capital offence against his sovereign, and the king's wrath is so incensed that nothing but the offender's blood can appease it. Yet there is only one way to save him; that is, if the prince, the king's only son, will undertake for him; which, if he do undertake, there is not one dram of the penalty to be abated; he must suffer all that is due to the transgressor, which is death. This condition, if the prince do not accept, here is a miserable subject; if he do accept it, here is a merciful prince. And if the son would be thus compassionate, yet will the father suffer it? What king will give his only son for his slave? There could be no cause in us why either Christ should interpose himself, or God should admit such an interposition. Loath would man be to give his own son for his own sin; yet God gave filium suum pro peccato non suo. Infinite was the love of this Father; infinite the kindness of this Son; infinite the grace of the Spirit; infinite the mercy of that one God.

Now the Son of God being humbled with the title of the son of man, hath dignified the sons of men with the title of the sons of God. Filios adoptavit Deus in Filio, plurimos in unigenito: so that now he is the 'first begotten among many brethren,' Rom. 8:29. But if we be children, let us learn to know our Father. When the father is absent, the mother teacheth her children to know him; by his care and providence for their education, by telling them his will and commands; how they may please, how displease him; and if they swerve from these rules, she gives them correction. Our Father is invisible; in his works only we see him, in his word we hear him; this is voluntas Patris, our Father's will; the church teacheth us to obey that doctrine. And if we straggle from that rule, she justly whips us for it; for God hath allowed no fellow-doctor with himself. A man is made what he is taught; doctrine transforms him into itself. Now the true mother will teach us the true doctrine of our Father; and if we be true children, we will obey it.

Duty 1. Seeing he is the Son of God, let us prize him above all things; what should be dear to us in regard of him that paid so dear for us? Indeed, it is no easy thing for the narrow heart of man rightly to comprise this inestimable jewel: his sweetness is so far beyond the faculty of our taste, his beauty beyond the apprehension of our eye. It is not enough to make much of him, but nothing must be regarded but for him. Let us not hold him with one hand, while the other grasps Mammon; but embrace him with both arms of love. Ordinary objects are well satisfied with an ordinary measure of our affection;

but such a love will not content Christ. All the little rivers of our love, united into one stream, cannot carry a vessel worth his acceptance. He that paid all debts for us, and gives all blessings to us, requires no less than all love from us. For the entertainment of common persons, wise liberality says, Enough is a feast; but when a king is our guest, we think enough too little; too much, or nothing. But for the Son of God, every little is too much; we love him, that's enough; but then we lie, and that's nothing.

How do they love him that prefer the beauty of a wife, the petulancy of a child, yea, a cup of wine, or the content of a harlot, before him? Money is that dominus factotum of the world. 'A feast is made for laughter, and wine maketh merry, but money answereth all things,' Eccles. 10:19. Money is the master; religion, at best, but the master's mate. That can buy in offices, buy out offences, dignify peasants, magnify mushrooms; what not? This is the world's Pandora, the Diana, the trump that bears the game, the queen of hearts, the mistress of men's affections, upon whom mistresses themselves must wait. Christ is put out of his lodging when this great lady must be entertained. O fools! when will ye be wise? When your heads ache, lay your bags of gold under them instead of pillows; will they ease you? Will it put lustre into your cheeks when sickness hath made them pale? Will not one spoonful of the apothecary's cordial do you more good? If they cannot do these poor things, of what validity are they in the distress of conscience? Let Judas then see what comfort his money will afford him: enough to buy a halter to hang himself. Doth not too late experience teach thousands, that one dram of mercy is more worth than whole coffers and mines of refulgent metals? Why then do we not sell our nothing to purchase Christ? What be our bugles in respect of this diamond? The whole pack of the world, with all the haberdash stuff in it, is not worth the least grace of the Son of God. It was a heathen circumscription of old coins, Nummus regnat, nummus vincit, nummus imperat,* which Charles the Great well turned into Christ: 'Christ reigns, Christ overcomes, Christ commands.' It is impossible to gain him unless we despise all in regard of him, unless we lay down all for him that laid down his life for us. Many have some faint and languid wishes, O that Christ were mine! but they want the fruition of him, because they make but a cold inquisition after him. The soul that seeks him as if she were undone without him, and rather than want him would want all the world, finds him her Jesus. He will be wooed, in the first place, with the prime of our loves, joys, services; he is the Alpha of our grace, the Omega of our glory; they that make him the Omega of their thoughts and cares, begin at the wrong end, and set themselves to work when the candle is out. But it is the Son of God that must bless our beginning, and crown our latter ending.

Duty 2. Let this teach us humility and obedience; the Son of God himself was obedient, and that to the very death. We love obedience in a whole skin, but who will obey to the death? And, indeed, death is the wages of sin and disobedience; not the morigerous, but the rebellious son is punished. Yet such was the matchless humility of the Son of God, he humbled himself to the nature of man, and that was very low; his humanity was humility enough, yea, to 'the form of a servant,' and that was lower; even to wash the feet of his own servants; yea, to the death, and this was yet lower; yea, to the worst kind of death, the death of malefactors, of the worst sort of malefactors. One death is worse than another; if he must die, why not a fair, an honest, an easy death? No; the bitterest and the most shameful death of all. To be born, and so to be born; to the cratch; to die, and so to die, on the cross; to be humbled to the nature of man, to the form of a servant, to the death of a malefactor. And this for the Son of God! Thus hath he taught us obedience that laid down his life for our disobedience.

OUR LORD.—The Son of God is God, and therefore must be Lord of all; yea, he is Lord also as mediator. Jesus Christ is the Lord; a blessed conjunction, that Jesus, who is a Saviour, should also be Lord; that not a fleecer, not a flayer, but a Saviour hath the place. When lord and tyrant meet in one person, the people rue it, Prov. 29:2. Power and malice be the worst match in the world; these two make up a devil. Flies have a spleen, but they want strength. Bulls and horses have strength, but their spleen is dull: both are compounded in the dragon; especially in that 'red dragon,' who, with one swoop of his tail, drew stars from heaven, and by his malice would not leave one star there. Claudius was a bad private man, but a good emperor; Titus a good private man, but a bad emperor; if we believe Tacitus. Goodness and greatness is an excellent composition; such is our happiness. Jesus is the Lord. Christ, one that cureth unctiōne, non punctiōne, with anointing, not with searing and lancing; he is Lord.

There be many on earth called lords; but they are lords of earth, and those lords are earth, and those lords must return to earth. This Lord is immortal; raising out of the dust to the honour of princes, and laying the honour of princes in the dust. A Lord, not qualified; not of such a barony, county, signiory, but Lord, in abstracto; of universal extent. Lord of heaven, to glorify whom he please; Lord of earth, to make high or low, whom he please; Lord of death, to unlock the grave, Rev. 1:18; Lord of hell, to lock up the old dragon with his crew, Rev. 20:3. He keeps the key, that shall let all our bodies out of their earthy prisons. A great Lord; whither shall we go, to get out of his dominion? To heaven? there is his throne? To earth? that is his footstool. To the sea? there his hand is most wonderful. To the darkness? night is day with him. To hell? there he is present in his fearful justice, Ps. 139:7. Whither, then? Yes, to purgatory, or some of the limbos; that terra incognita is not mentioned in Christ's Lordship. The pope may keep the key of that himself. But for the rest, he is too saucy; advancing his universal lordship, and hedging in the whole world for his diocese; stretching his arm to heaven, inrubricking what saints he list; to hell, in freeing what prisoners he list; on earth, far and wide; but that some of the wiser princes have cut short his busy fingers.

'Our Lord;' so we believe, so we profess. Ours: he dearly paid for us; bought us, and brought us out of the hand of our enemies, that we might serve him. Here comes in our duty, that, as he is a Lord of himself, so he be acknowledged by us. This is expressed, 1, by our reverence; 2, by our obedience.

1. If he be 'our Lord,' let us do him reverence. It hath ever been the manner and posture of God's servants, when either they offer anything to him, Matt. 2:11, or pray to receive anything from him, Ps. 95:6, to do it on their knees. When the king gives us a pardon for our life, forfeited to the law, we receive it on our knees. When he bestows favour or honour, be it but a knighthood, men kneel for it. In that holy place, where men receive the forgiveness of sins, the honour of saints, so gracious a pardon, so glorious a blessing, there be some that refuse so humble a gesture to the Lord himself. Never tell me of a humble heart, where I see a stubborn knee. Indeed, this bodily reverence is not all; the tongue and heart must not be left out. But when our body is in such a position, and our mind in such disposition, we are then fittest to speak of him, and to speak to him. The tongue must also confess his glory. Those little engines are nimble enough in our own occasions; they run like the plummets of a clock when the catch is broken. But in our public devotions, Amen is scarce heard among us. The Amen of the primitive church was like a clap of thunder; and their Halleluiah as the roaring of the sea.* How do they convince our silence!

All must do honour to this Lord; they in heaven, willingly, 'casting their crowns' at his feet; they in hell are thrown down, and made his footstool; they shall acknowledge him, though roaring, and on the rack, gnawing their tongues for spite. The regenerate sing his praise with cheerful voices; the reprobates, like the band of Judas, shall fall backward, and end their days in Julian's desperateness. Vicisti: they shall confess him, though sore against their wills. He must be honoured; if we be his servants, by us; whether we will or no, upon us. Either we must confess him singing, with saints and angels; or howling, with devils and damned spirits. God will be glorified in his Son, either by the gracious confession of them that yield, or the glorious confusion of them that stand out.

2. If he be our Lord, let us give him obedience. 'Lord, save me,' saith Peter, Matt. 14:30. He is a Lord to save. 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' saith Paul, Acts 9:6. He is a Lord to command. We like Saint Peter's Lord well; to succour and save us, when we are in any danger; he shall hear of us then. But we do not like so well of Saint Paul's Lord; 'What wilt thou command to do?' Lorinus observes, that the apostles, before Christ's resurrection, used to call him Master; after he was risen, only Lord; to witness his power, and their obedience. When we would have him do us good, then 'Lord, help us;' but when we should do him service, then 'who is Lord over us?' Ps. 12:4; we have no Lord, then. A young rich man came unto Christ; 'Good Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?' Matt. 19:16. Hitherto, Good Master; God had been a good Master to him, that had so enriched him for this world: and if he would give him the kingdom of heaven, too, he should be his best Master then. But when it comes to this, 'Sell all thou hast, and give to the poor,' he hung down his head, and went his way; no more Good Master, no Lord now. This parting from his riches mars all. If this Lord cannot be served without begging his followers, he is no Lord for him. Christ is our good Lord, while he fills our coffers with money, our bones with marrow; but if he require aught from us, either to the poor in charity, or to his church in equity, this Lord may go seek him servants. But how do men forget themselves to be but stewards, while they deal thus with their Lord? Is any steward the richer, because he hath much money of his Lord's entrusted to him? He hath not the greater estate, but the greater account. Thus we play at fast and loose with Christ; fast for our advantage, and loose at our obedience; as if we were but his servants in compliment, to take his wages, and do our own business. His, when we have need of him; our own, when he hath need of us. But let him be our Lord to govern us, or we shall not find him our Jesus to save us.

'Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?' Luke 6:46. How dare you give me that title in your words, and deny me that honour in your deeds? 'No man can say, that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost,' 1 Cor. 12:3. From the teeth outward, many a false spirit can acknowledge it; but to say it as it should be said, is the work of the Holy Ghost in us. In judgment and doctrine we confess him, in affection and practice we deny him. We hear this Lord in your lips, but let us see him in your lives. As a Saviour, every man will own him; but few obey him as a Lord. But let his word rule our lives, that his blood may save our souls.

Thus much severally of his four titles; from them jointly considered together, I desire to raise four uses.

Use 1. Seeing this blessed Saviour is a person so full of absolute perfection, let us fully rest ourselves content and satisfied in him. 'He filleth all things;' good reason he should fill our hearts. If he be our host, our cup shall overflow; if he be our physician, our wounds shall never rankle; he hath that wine and oil which will cure us. What if God take away all, and give us his Son? are we losers by it? No; all accessions add nothing, all defects detract nothing from that soul's happiness which enjoyeth Christ. He is via lucens, veritas ducens, vita coronans; if we err, he is the Way; if we doubt, he is the Truth; if we faint, he is the Life. What should distemper us, if our Saviour be in us? We are full of sins; his satisfaction answers for us. We have no righteousness; his righteousness covers us. He takes it unkindly at our hands, if, through his justice, we do not hold ourselves completely just. We have manifold weaknesses. 'His grace is sufficient for us.'

If he be not the object of our knowledge, our wisdom will end worse than did Herod's oration, in odious ruin. To hope or trust in God, and not only through Christ, is a wild naturian faith, a Jewish, ungrounded confidence. Patience without him is a base stupidity; fortitude, a desperate presumption; temperance, a drunken sobriety; all virtues, but either natural qualities of the constitution or moral habits of education, neither acceptable to God nor profitable to ourselves. If Christ be not their form, they are all misshapen; he is the grace of all graces, as sugar sweetens all confections and musk perfumes all cordials. We may flatter ourselves with our good works, but if they be not dyed in the blood of Christ, God will not vouchsafe so much as to look upon them. Nature, custom, and education have done much for many. In these they rest, priding their own hearts and pleasing themselves; but without Christ, they are far from pleasing God. All our graces are but the rays of his righteousness, the effects of his holy influence. Whither should we go for supply but to the fountain? In vain we seek it in nature, or hope to attain it by art. Who runs to the pack when the warehouse is open, or fetcheth water at the cistern when he may have it at the spring head, nearer hand, and better cheap? 'Without Christ we can do nothing,' John 15:5. The bird can sooner fly without wings, the ship sail without wind, the body move without the soul, than we do any good without Christ. O, that our hearts were more fixed on him and directed towards him, than the Heliotropium is to the sun, the iron to the loadstone, the loadstone to the polestar.

For us that be ministers the text of all our sermons, the sermon of all our texts, is Christ. He is our only scope and theme, and all our task is, to crucify him again before your eyes, by preaching his death and passion to your ears; by the help of Christ, to preach the gospel of Jesus, to the praise of God. If we should intend to commend to you our own learning, or anything but Christ, we had better have held our peace. We lay our foundation on this Rock; and if we should not, the rocks would cry out against us. Let the dotards of Rome give more reverence to the founders of their own rules and orders, than they do to Christ. Let those Franciscan fathers snib their novices for talking of Christ and his gospel, and not of the rules of Saint Francis and their own order. Christ is our sermon, let Christ be our contemplation. Why else doth the Scripture resemble him to such familiar and obvious things, but that in all occurrences we should remember him? He is compared to the light, that so often as we open our eyes we might behold him; to bread and wine, that we might not make a meal without him; to the door, that going in and out we might think on him; to the water, that we cannot wash but we must meditate of his cleansing our souls; to a garment, that when we put on our clothes we might thankfully consider his righteousness that covers us.* He is all in all unto us. Let us seek no content (for we shall find none) but in Jesus Christ.

Use 2. Let us glorify his name that hath purchased glory for us. Let him not suffer the world's indignity through our impiety. 'Holy and reverend is his name,' Ps. 111:9; and as we term him our Lord, let us use him so. But we may weep to speak it. Our unseemly behaviour, and the slender reverence that we give him,—I say not only in the common passages of our life and profane places, but even in the temple, his house of prayer and praise,—shew as if we were ashamed of his service, Rom. 2:24, whereas our carriage there, of all places, should be so decent, so devout, so orderly, that if a stranger or unbeliever should come in he might be convinced to say, 'Verily, God is among us,' 1 Cor. 14:25. So respectively † ought we to bear ourselves in his holy worship, that men may say, See what servants Christ hath; how full of reverence to his sacred mysteries, how free in their contributions of charity, how forward and zealous in their obedience. This is to glorify that Christ on earth who we look should glorify us in heaven.

Yea, whether we eat or drink, work or walk, whatsoever we meditate, speak, or do, let all be to the glory of the Lord Jesus. Impertinent and unsavoury be our best works when we have an eye to our own names, inviting honour to ourselves. This is to hunt counter, to take great pains to no purpose; the more cost, the more lost. Such pharisees may, for their charity, go to the devil, themselves and their moneys perishing together; whereas the least beneficence done for the love of Christ shall have a sure reward. Then be our alms accepted, when the love of Christ constrains us, when his eye is more encouragement than all the world besides, if, when good is done, the thanks and sole honour of the deed redound to him. 'I laboured more than they all,' saith Paul. But he corrects himself. Was it I? No, 'but the grace of God in me,' 1 Cor. 15:10. He will suffer no part of the repute to rest upon his own head, but repels it forcibly from himself, and reflects it carefully upon his master; as Joab, when he had fought the field and gotten the day, sent for David to carry away the credit of the victory. Far be it from us to lurch any of his praise.

Let all our works be done in the name of the Lord Jesus; begun with his allowance, performed with his assistance, and concluded to his glory. We can desire no better a paymaster; why should we do any work but his? Let the Romish parasites blow up their mushroom into a colossus, yet 'the strong shall be as tow, and the maker of it as a spark, and they shall both burn together, and none shall quench them,' Isa. 1:31. Their lord of the triple crown needs not be magnified; let him alone to magnify himself. But no praises light happily unless they reflect upon the Lord of glory. Those two court-figures, adulations and hyperboles, are incompatible to him. He cannot be flattered, that is goodness itself; nor praised too highly, which is infinite. It is his just title to 'inhabit the praises of Israel.' Soli virtuti laus debita;* now there is none perfectly good that is, or was, or is to come, but only he that is, and that was, and that is to come. Be glory only to God. The best praises are lofty-winged and fly high, resounding at the immortal door of blessedness, Trin-uni Deo gloria.

Use 3. Our obedience and a holy conversation must not be omitted, otherwise we shall be sine Christo Christiani,[†] Christians in name, without Christ indeed. In vain we profess to 'know him if in our works we deny him,' Titus 1:16. If we will have him do good to us, we must do the good he wills us. He is to command, we are to obey. But, alas! instead of doing his will, we are angry if he do not ours; if he answer us not in this thing or that which we would have, and when we would have it, we are presently in the tune of unthankful Israel, murmuring. Here it does not shew as if he were the Lord, and we to do his will; but as if we were lords, and he to do our will; he to serve our turns, and when he fails of that, to be turned out of his sovereignty. Men will acknowledge the Lord to be Jesus, but not Jesus to be the Lord. O, Lord, be Jesus! but not O, Jesus, be Lord! We would have the Lord a Jesus to save us, but not Jesus a Lord to command us. But Jesus is the Lord; and those things which God hath joined together let no man attempt to put asunder.

Use 4. 'Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ,' Rom. 13:14. Saint Paul seems to borrow this phrase from the custom of those that were baptized in his days, who, coming to that sacrament, did use to put off their clothes, and when they were baptized, to put on new garments. Now, the use of a garment is to apply it to the body and to wear it; so, to put on Christ, Gal. 3:27, is to express him in our conversation. He is an excellent robe. Some write that Pilate, wearing the seamless coat of Christ, did pacify the angry Cæsar; but Christ is a garment that can appease God himself. They that wear gorgeous apparel are in princes' courts, they wait on kings. Whosoever are admitted to the court of heaven have put on Jesus Christ.

'Put on Christ,' a rare garment; rare for the matter, rare for the making. The matter is of heaven and earth, God and man. For the making up; in his conception the web was spun, in his birth it was woven, in his persecution it was fulled, his life being ground in the mill of sorrows. Then was it dyed in grain, scarlet dye; his blood was shed to colour it. In his death it was cut out; iron was put to it, but it did not shrink. In his resurrection it was made up again. In his ascension it was richly adorned and beautified, and so laid up in the wardrobe of heaven. From whence it is spiritually taken, and continually worn of the elect by a faithful application; a robe large enough to cover us all. Thus Christ, like the silkworm, spun himself to death, that he might make a web of righteousness to apparel us, 'The king's daughter hath on raiment of needlework,' Ps. 45:14; Christ is that garment of needlework, the needles that stitched him were the thorns and nails. Woe to them that shall abuse this robe, that shall either stain it with the blood of saints, or defile it with the aspersions of their own lusts, or rend and tear it with blasphemies, or cut and divide it by their peace-breaking factions. Such are the schismatics, that play the tailors with Christ, and cut him out to new fashions. But let us in humble faithfulness put him on, and innocently wear him as our only glory.

I conclude. Melius non esse, quam sine Christo esse, we had better not be at all, than be without Christ. I had rather be out of heaven with Christ, than in heaven without Christ. Yea, wheresoever Christ is, heaven is. When Christ was in the womb, heaven was there; when Christ was in the manger, heaven was there; when Christ was in the temple, heaven was there; when Christ was in Zaccheus's house,; heaven was there: 'To-day is salvation come to this house,' Luke 19:9 when Christ was in the ship, heaven was upon the sea; when Christ was on the mountain, heaven was there: 'It is good to be here,' saith Peter; when Christ was on the cross, heaven was even there; when he 'brake bread at Emmaus, heaven was at the table; when he took flesh, heaven came down to earth; when he ascended, heaven went up to heaven. The same heaven is now in heaven, which makes heaven to be itself. Now he that is our heaven on earth, bring us to himself in heaven, through the exalting power of his own most blessed merits! Amen.

THE INCARNATION.—'The Word was made flesh.' Verbum, quid sublimius? Caro, quid submissius? Factum, quid mirabilius? In the Word, there is eternity; in flesh, temporality; in made, personality. The Word is a creator, the flesh a creature, made a creation. Flesh, finitum; Word, infinitum; made, unitum. There is divinum, humanum, and vinculum. In these three words, have been found above three hundred mysteries.

1. 'The Word.' The person incarnate is the Son of God: he that is eternal, before all time, was made man 'in the fulness of time.' 'In the beginning was the Word.' In principio, that is, in principatu, as some expound it, taking ἀρχή to be not only ordinativum, but potestativum, as princes are called ἄρχοντες, Rev. 19:16, Or 'in the beginning,' that is, 'in the Father.' *Pater est principium sine principio, filius principium de principio. 'I am in the Father,' as the river in the fountain; 'the Father in me,' as in his engraven image, John 14:11. Or in principio, rather that is, in æterno; the creatures were from the beginning, the Word in the beginning, before there was a beginning. Jam tum patris erat sanctum et venerabile verbum.† God made the world, he made not the Word. He had his being before any creature took beginning, Prov. 8:22. Erat, not fuit; fuit is given to that is not, fuimus Troes; erat quod est et erit. As he was, so he is, and is to come, Rev. 4:8. When was the Word? in the beginning; where was it? with God; what was it? God. With God? why so are the angels. Indeed, they are so locally, but not personally. The Word says, 'I and my Father are one,' John 10:30; unum, one substance, not unus, one person, in a plural verb, 'are one.' Semper cum patre, semper in patre, semper apud patrem, semper quod pater.‡

2. 'Flesh.' Why is his humanity expressed by this word flesh, whereas the soul is the more noble part of man? Answer: The spirit cannot be seen, Luke 24:39; the flesh is a visible and passible part; 'flesh,' not an idea or form of man conceived only in the mind, but the whole nature of man, consisting of a reasonable soul and body, existing in uno individuo; the true dimensions of a body, the true affections of a soul, yea, the infirmities of our sinful flesh, but quite separate from the sin of our flesh. He did partake of every state of man. First, Of innocence, wherein he had immunity, yea, impossibility of sin. Secondly, Of grace, wherein his excellency is superabundant. Thirdly, Of glory, wherein he hath clearness and blessedness of vision. Fourthly, Of corruption, taking infirmities of nature, a nature of infirmities. He had all fulnesses, numerositatis et copiae;§ yea, also of infirmities. But these be distinguished, passibilitatis, or inordinationis;|| there are infirmities painful without sin, or sinful with pain; he took those, not these. He was in the reality of flesh, Heb. 2:17; but only in the 'similitude of sinful flesh,' Rom. 8:3.

Infirmities be either natural or personal; natural, as to be born weak, unlearned, subject to passions; these he assumed. Personal, as to be born lame, blind, diseased; these he assumed not. Such as might be evidences of his humanity, not such as might be impediments of his ministry. His body, doubtless, was of a most excellent form, a starry brightness sparkling in his countenance, such as made his disciples follow him for love, and his apprehenders recoil for fear, though this were hidden under the vail of humility. The blessed wood of that ark was exempt from all corruption,¶ far purer than the body of Absalom, 2 Sam. 14:25. That which is made by miracle, is more perfect than that which is made by art or nature: as when Christ made wine of water, it was the 'best wine.' That body which the Holy Ghost had shaped for so pure a soul, separated from sin, united to the Son of God, proportioned in most equal symmetry, was not disfigured nor distempered with diseases. He lay not swollen with a dropsy, nor lame of the gout, nor languishing of a consumption. He took infirmities, not diseases.

He took affections, not sins. Thou art covetous, Christ took not this; he was made flesh, not covetous flesh; he was covetous of nothing but his Father's glory and our salvation. I am stained with sin, Christ had neither sin nor stain: that Israelite was without guile, that Lamb without blemish. He took the weaknesses of natural flesh, not of personal flesh: 'the seed of Abraham;' that is, the nature of Abraham, not the person. I know that he took our sinful infirmities too (for whatsoever in man was not someway assumed, was noway healed), but these in another kind; not by way of inhesion, but by imputation, 'he was made sin for us,' 2 Cor. 5:21; by reputation, the world thought him a sinner, Mark 15:28. In a word, he took so much of flesh as was expedient for us, not unseemly for himself. But the flesh is weak, Isa. 40:6; and he was now to undertake the hardest design. Shall our Samson, who (we expect) should foil the Philistines—death, sin, Satan, hell—suffer his hair to be shorn, his self dispowered, by taking flesh? yea, rather, 'Put on strength, O arm of the Lord,' Isa. 51:9. But Christ, not so much with his strong arm as with his holy arm, hath gotten himself the victory. Dæmona non armis, sed morte subegit. Satan little suspected in human flesh a power to overthrow his kingdom.

3. 'Is made.' The Maker of all comes to be made; he that made man to be made of a woman. He thought it 'no robbery to be equal with God,' Phil. 2:6. There be many gods in name, Christ is God by nature. Lucifer and the pope are gods by robbery, Christ is by right. Natura sumpsit, non præsumpsit superbia.* Made flesh; not by conversion: sicut verbum induit vocem, et non transit in vocem: sic Verbum æternum induit carnem, et non transit in carnem: not as water is turned into wine, there is no mutation of God; not by confusion, as divers sorts of grain be mingled in the heap; not by composition, as divers metals are beaten together in a mass. But by the assumption of the manhood into God: naturam suscipiendo nostram, non mutando suam. His divinity was no whit consumed when his humanity was assumed. Ille manet quod semper erat, quod non erat incipiens. Homo Deo accessit, non Deus a se recessit.† He was 'made flesh:' non deposita, sed quasi seposita majestate.‡

Begotten of his Father as God before all times; born of his mother as man in the fulness of time. A wonderful union; not hujus ex his;§ the framing of a third thing out of diverse parts united; but hujus ad hoc, an uniting of things so, that the natures remain distinct, yet the subsistence is but one. As the soul and body make one man, or as fire is incorporated into iron, or as the same man is both a lawyer and a physician, or as a scion ingrafted to a tree, is one with the stock, yet still retains its own nature and fruit. Thus the man Christ is everywhere, not the manhood. 'Made flesh.'

This was a work beyond the substitution of any created excellence; either to defend the fruit from original infection, to which Adam's seed was liable, or to actuate it in the womb by an inconceivable operation, Luke 1:35; or indeed, to overshadow it from our ambitious examination. Si haberet exemplum, non esset singulare; si ratione ostendi posset, non mirabile.|| Let us grant the Lord able to do what we are not able to understand. This is work for our hearts, not heads; humble faith, not curious inquisition, shall find the sweetness of this mystery.

Object. 1. Every person is the whole divine essence; therefore if any person of the Deity be incarnate, the whole Deity is incarnate. Ans.: Deus incarnatus, non Deitas; God is incarnate, yet not the Godhead, but the person of the Son subsisting in the Godhead, The whole soul is in every part of the body: in the foot, in the hand, in the knee, lip; yet doth it not exercise reason in every part, but in the head only.

Object. 2. Opera ad extra sunt indivisa: this was an external action of God to the creature; therefore not proper to the Son, but common to all. Ans.: Inchoative communis, non terminativè. The incarnation stands in two actions: the creation of a nature to be assumed, the assumption of it being created. The former was common to all the three persons equally; the latter is the limiting it to one person only; so it is made peculiar to the Son. The word was only made man, yet they all did work together in the making of this man. Three women concur to the making up of a garment; haply one may spin it, another weave it, and the third shape it, yet one only of them wears it. In the choosing of a wife, there is the father, the mother, and the son; the son likes, the father and mother consent; all have chosen her, yet is the son only married to her. So terminus unionis was in Christ.

Object. 3. Why not the Father or spirit incarnate, but the word? Ans.: It was not fit for the first person; for so he should have been the son of a creature, which is the Father of a Creator: the father of him that is by nature immortal God, should be the son of her that is by nature a mortal woman. To 'take flesh,' is to 'be sent,' John 3:17; but the Father cannot be sent; the fountain sends forth the river, not the river the fountain. It was not fit for the third person; for so there should have been more sons in the Trinity than one; the second person by nature, and the third by grace. It was fittest for the Son. First, Who so fit as the Son of God, to make us God's sons; as the Son by nature, to make us sons by grace? Secondly, The inheritance was his; who so fit to divide it with us? he may dispose his own at his own pleasure. Thirdly, The image of God was lost in us; who so fit to repair it as the express image of his Father's person? God made us like created resemblances of himself, we had made ourselves resemblances of Satan; lo, he that is so like God, that he is God, confirmeth us again to this image. Fourthly, By this Word, God made the world; by the same Word made flesh, he redeemed it. Fifthly, Christ is the wisdom of his Father; by his wisdom he made all at the first; by the same wisdom he restores all again. Sixthly, Man had foolishly affected to be as God; to rectify this, the Son of God must be man. As the Lord said in derision of man's folly, so we may sing in the praise of his mercy. See, said God, 'man is become as one of us,' Gen. 3:22; we say thankfully, 'See, God is become like one of us,' Acts 14:11.

Verbum caro factum. Here is a trinity of words, and the work of a trinity of persons; of the Father in sending, of the Son in accepting, of the Holy Ghost in applying. Three sisters work up one seamless mantle, which the second only wears. The father hath his work in creating this garment of the manhood, the Holy Ghost in setting it on; only Christ wears it. St Augustine sends the cavilling Jew to his harp: there be three things together; art, the hand, and the string; yet but one sound is heard. *Ars dictat, manus tangit, chorda resonat; both art and hand work with the string; neither art nor hand makes the musical sound, but the string. The Father, Son, and Spirit work together; yet neither Father nor Spirit, but only the Son is made flesh. Sonum sola chorda reddit, carnem solus Christus induit. The operation belongs to three, the sound to one; ad solam chordam soni redditio, ad solum filium carnis susceptio.

There is a fourfold coming of Christ; in carne, fide, morte, et retributione. In the flesh, John 1:14. In faith, Rev. 3:20. In death, Mark 13:35. In judgment, Luke 21:27. According to these four comings, the church celebrates four adventual Sundays, effectually to prepare our hearts for the meditation of them. The whole world had been left had he not come in the flesh. So much of the world is still lost, to which he does not come in the Spirit, in faith. The world would be secure were he no more to be expected, therefore he will 'come to judge the quick and dead.' If every man were to tarry for his trial till the general consummation of all things, many would fear the commission of nothing; therefore as he will come most certainly to judge all men, so he comes uncertainly to judge any man; every particular man hath his day, and there is one universal day for all. Erga hominem, intra hominem, supra hominem, contra hominem.

He came unto all, and all shall come unto him; but if he once come into us, he will never come against us. Concerning his first advent, in the flesh, all things are accurately and exactly set down; that they may be as apparently certain to us, as they are excellently wonderful in themselves, quantò accuratior in describendo veritas, tantò persuasior in recipiendo fides. We cannot doubt of this truth, and be saved. The incarnation of God is that history and mystery whereon the faith and salvation of the world dependeth. *Noluit nos negligenter audire, quod ille voluit tam diligenter enarrare.

CONCEIVED OF THE HOLY GHOST.—For the explanation of this article, my discourse shall walk in the evangelist's steps, following the passages and circumstances in their due order.

Luke 1:28, 'The angel came in unto her, and said, Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women.' Borrowing a little from the precedent verses, we have, 1. The place, Galilee. 2. The time, the sixth month after John's conception. 3. The messenger, an archangel. 4. The salvation, 'Hail, thou that art graciously accepted,' &c.

1. The place was obscure; Galilee, despised of the Jews, as quite destitute of all privileges. 'Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?' says even a Nathanael, John 1:46. 'Shall Christ come out of Galilee?' so the people disparaged it, John 7:41. 'Search, and look, out of Galilee ariseth no prophet;' so the pharisees took up Nicodemus, ver. 52. Do we look for a king, where is not to be found a prophet? From a country so corrupted, that there is scarce one to be saved, do we expect him that shall save us all? Yes, non tantum a Galilæa surgit propheta, sed Dominus prophetarum. No prophet comes out of Galilee, but an angel comes into Galilee; yea, the God of angels and prophets descends there to be conceived, where his solemn oracles appeared not. The angel is not sent to the palaces of Jerusalem, but to a cottage of Galilee. Many noble dames and great ladies were in that metropolitan city; honour and pleasure there kept their courts; it was once 'the joy,' is still the fame of the whole earth. Yet how doth

God overlook her stately turrets, and pass by her proud damosels, directing his angel to Galilee? As Elias was sent to none of the widows in Israel, but to one in Sidon, Luke 4:16, so Gabriel is sent to none of the virgins in Jewry, but to one in Galilee. Goodness is gracious, wheresoever she hides her head; and humility is not more contemptible to the world than precious in the eyes of heaven. Angels had rather be with a saint at Nazareth than with a sinner in the court of Jerusalem. The place doth not honour the person, but the person honours the place, as the heavens do not make God glorious, but his presence glorifies the heavens. Be content with thy obscure Galilee; thou art as near to present mercy, and to future glory, as temporal advancement can make thee. Yea, it is in thee to make thy shed a palace. God, that filleth all places, makes no difference of places. *Sapientis patria est ubicunque sapit, the wise man's home is wheresoever he is wise. Credenti cœlum est ubicunque credit, the faithful man's heaven is wheresoever he believes.

Galilee was a despised part of Israel, Nazareth a part of Galilee; their own pride had hid it from the pharisees; the angel comes thither to find the holy virgin. Where can devotion serve the Lord, and the Lord not observe her? The good conscience may think itself solitary, yet is never without company. God and good thoughts are within it, blessings and good angels are about it. Honour waits at the door of humility; and though dogs and devils were barking to disgrace it, will not away till it hath encompassed its head with a crown; as Samuel must attend till David be fetched from the sheepfolds to be anointed king. No poverty, no ignominy can bar out mercy. It shall find out goodness in the darkest corner of privacy. God makes not dainty to converse with a saint, because he goes in rags, or dwells homely. It is for the pride of man to observe such circumstantial differences, and to be transported with the glorious bravery of places; to shake the hand that wears the gold ring, not to drink to any below the salt. With God it is otherwise. He respects bonitatem in tuguriolo more than celsitatem in palatio. 'Heaven is my throne,' yet 'I will look to the man of an humble heart,' Isa. 66:2. Than heaven, there is no place higher; than a poor contrite spirit, there is no condition lower. The head and the feet stand furthest asunder; yet than betwixt these there is no sympathy nearer. Cold taken in at the feet suddenly affects the head; and if one tread on the toe, the head complains, Why do you tread on me? They that think themselves lowest are most respected by him that is the Highest. In vain doth a man hunt after his shadow, he shall never overtake it, for all this while the sun is behind him; let him turn and follow the sun, his shadow shall follow him. Whilst humility refuseth to hunt after glory, glory will hunt after humility. As no place is so secure as to keep out God's judgments; so no place is so obscure as not to be found out by his mercies. The angel salutes Mary in Galilee.

Galilee, some say, signifies a transmigration; fit to shadow out his conception, who 'went forth from the Father, and came into the world,' John 16:28. There is one transition. Who left his own people, that left him, and offered himself to the gentiles. There is another transition. In Galilee, yet in a city of Galilee. He that was to build a city would be conceived in a city. Spiritual Zion was the city he came to build, the foundation whereof was laid in his blood, the walls reared by his grace, the strongholds fortified by his righteousness, and the perfection of it is his glory.

2. The time must be considered in a double relation. Quoad statum populi, quoad statum anni. First, for the state of the people, which was extremely corrupted. Indeed, the priesthood and daily ministrations continued from David's time to Christ. They had run through many troubles, many hurly-burlies, many alterations, yet the sacerdotal line was not interrupted. That order endured above eleven hundred years. It was God that reserved his own worship. No thanks to them. They that were so apostated from holiness would not have stuck to deprave his service. Yea, the pharisees had so blended it with their own traditions, that thousands among them knew not which was God's word, and which the pharisees'. They had lost both purity of doctrine and piety of life. If Rome have lost these, her personal succession is but a poor argument. While the Jews crucified their Saviour, no man denies that they kept the succession of priesthood, no man thinks that they kept the succession of truth and holiness, which indeed make a church, and not the persons. That is a forlorn and miserable church which hath lost the truth, though it have many priests; as at the last day, there shall be 'little faith' in the world, yet abundance of Christians. In this extremity of evil God produceth the greatest good. When things were at the worst, he began to mend them. Those times were fit for Christ, and Christ was fit for those times. In the most desperate declination of Israel came the most glorious salvation of Israel. I deny not but there were some holy in those degenerate days. Alas! if Judah had wanted saints, where had they been found in all the world? It is a miserable vintage where no good grapes be left to the gleaners, Rom. 11:4. Elias thought himself singular; God tells him of seven thousand partners that defied Baal. He hath some holy clients in the midst of the foulest depravations. The Jesuits, with all their familiar devils, shall not bring all into the Inquisition that worship Christ under their noses. God disposeth of all times, of all men, therefore would dispose of some good men for his own times. All shall not go before him, nor all come after him; some shall wait upon him. Zacharias, Elizabeth, Mary, Joseph, Anna, Simeon, Nathanael, these were his attendants. It is fit, when the King of all the world came into the world, he should have some servants to entertain him. For this preparation was John Baptist sent before, that it might not be done without a noise. Indeed, 'he came unto his own, and his own received him not,' John 1:11. And because they received not him, he rejected them.

For the state of the year, this was the sixth month after John's conception. Christ was conceived in the spring, and born in the solstice. John Baptist was conceived in September, so called quasi septimus imber, in the autumn, fall of the leaf, or declining of the year. Christ was conceived in March, the spring or rise of the year. 'He must increase, and I must decrease,' said John, John 3:30. 1. In the spring the world was made, in the spring it was redeemed. God begun both the creation and the reparation in one and the same season. 2. The world received its life from Christ in the spring, and Christ received his life from the world in the spring. Qui dedit, accepit, sub eodem tempore, vitam. 3. The sun doth then return to us, diffusing his beams and influence with a more powerful operation. Christ is our Sun of righteousness. He was never far from us, but he never came so near unto us as when he took our flesh. 4. For the sweetness of the season. The spring renews the face of the earth, and heals the breaches of squalid winter. Stillabunt montes dulcedinem. 'The mountains drop sweetness, the hills milk and wine, and rivers flow with cheerful waters,' Joel 3:18. The ground looks with a new face, hath new hairs to her head, new clothes to her back; the sun seems to have new eyes, the trees put out new arms, flowers bespangle the meadows, and birds sing in the branches, Cant. 2:12. Here is a spring of blood in our veins, a spring of blyth in our countenances, a spring of hope in our labours, a spring of joy in our hearts. 5. In the spring the days begin to lengthen, the sun being past the equinoctial point. Under the law they had short days and long nights; some glimpses and small irradiations of the light, but quickly clouded with the mists of obscurity. Under Christ we have long days and short nights. After the glimmering and dim candle of legal shadows, we have the bright sun of evangelical substance. Theirs was a St Lucy's day, short and cloudy; ours is a St Barnaby's day, which hath scarce any night at all. Thus he that stretcheth out the heavens hath stretched out our days as heaven, yea, even lengthened them to eternity. Our mortal state, indeed, hath some night, not because there is not day enough about us, but there is some natural darkness remaining within us. Our immortality shall be clear, for there 'is no night at all there,' Rev. 21:25. Oh, may this happy spring of grace never know any fall of leaf, never may night overtake this day of comfort!

3. The messenger is an angel, which affords us divers meditations of light and use.

(1.) An angel. So honourable was the message, that a man had been too mean to bring it. The incarnation of God could have no less a reporter than the angel of God. Even the conception of his precursor was foretold by an angel. The Holy Ghost revealed to Simeon, that he should not see death till he had seen Christ, yet was not that prophet graced with this embassy. John was to be such a harbinger of Jesus, and Zacharias shall have such a harbinger of John. John was to be the first herald of the gospel, and even his herald shall be an angel. The same angel brought both the tidings: to Zacharias, of his son; to Mary, of her's. John was the greatest of them born of woman by man; Christ, the greatest born of woman without man. Both were sent of the gospel's errand; the one as a messenger, the other as the author. One angel foretells them both. John was to proclaim Christ, and an angel is sent to proclaim John. Christ came in silence, John with a noise. John was a wonder, but he wrought none; Christ was a wonder, and a worker of wonders.

(2.) An angel. The vision of those celestial spirits was never common; rarely they appeared, and upon weighty occasions. But now especially, when their obstinate sins had locked up the revelations of heaven, when God had restrained his supernatural inspirations, and left them alone with their ordinary instructions, it was now wonderful news to see an angel. They were grown strangers to God in their conversations, and God was grown a stranger to them in his apparitions. Yet still their knowledge was better than their practice; and till they had more obediently learned the old lesson, there was no need of a new. But when God intended to begin his gospel, he first visits them with his angels, before he visits them with his Son. His angel shall come in the form of man, before his Son come to them in the nature of man.

(3.) The angel's name is specified: Gabriel, he whose name signifies the 'strength of God,' shall bring news of the God of strength. A maid of mortal condition, therefore impotent, shall conceive him that is omnipotent. She shall be strengthened by him that shall be conceived in her. The indulgence of other mothers procures strength to their children, here the child shall add strength to the mother.

(4.) It is not likely that this angel did formerly wait upon Mary; this was not his ordinary attendance. In that celestial hierarchy there is an order, though we cannot understand it. They are too presumptuous, that appoint them their several walks, ranges, and quarters. Without question, they have their special charges. But as this was an extraordinary message, so this angel was sent extraordinarily on purpose.

(5.) As no man was worthy to bear this news, but an angel, so nor was every angel thus honoured, but an archangel. Never did angel receive a greater honour, than this message of the incarnation of his Maker. Angels have been sent to divers: to Gideon, Manoah, &c. There the angel honoured the message, but here the message honoured the angel. For never was any business conceived in heaven that did so much concern the earth, as the conceiving of the God of heaven in a womb of earth. He was highly glorious before, this added to his glory.

(6.) The first preacher of the gospel was an angel. If God had not meant honour to that office, he would have used a meaner instrument. An angel was the first preacher, and God hath ever since called his preachers angels.* He that is sincere in the smallest gifts, doth the office of an angel; they that well employ greater talents, shall be reckoned among the archangels; they that burn in the zeal of the truth, and kindle this holy fire in the heart of others, shall be numbered among the seraphims. How basely soever the world esteems us, we are the successors of apostles, of angels. God that sends us, calls us his angels; men to whom we are sent, make and count us beggars. We preach the same Jesus to you, that Gabriel did to Mary. O that our sermons had such success in your hearts as his found in hers! that you might all depart pregnant of the Lord Jesus.

(7.) An angel; that our reparation might be answerable to our fall. Eve was a virgin in paradise, Mary a virgin in Galilee; Eve was espoused to Adam, Mary espoused to Joseph; an evil angel comes to Eve, a good angel to Mary; that bad one was the first motioner of sin, this good one is the first reporter of salvation. The one came propria voluntate, Deo permittente: the other, bona voluntate, Deo præcipiente: Satan came, God permitting it; Gabriel came, God commanding it. The evil angel was the cause of our ruin, the good angel could not be the cause of our restoring. That was author erroris, the beginning of our destruction; this, nuntius salutis, but the messenger of our salvation. Yet, although the angels cannot be the authors, they are glad to be the reporters of our new blessedness; joyful to tell that God hath done that for us, which they would and could not. Good news rejoiceth the bearer. With what gladness did Gabriel bring this tidings of our Saviour, and his own confirmer! for as we are redeemed to life, so they are established in life, by one and the same Jesus.

(8.) God appeared frequently in the presentation of angels, until the fulness of time brought in the fulness of knowledge. Formerly, angels signified the presence of God, as an ambassador represents the person of the king. Now he restrains the angelical, having given us the evangelical revelation. Still the presence of angels is as ordinary, but not their apparition; very rarely do we see them, yet we are never without them. We are never out of their sight, though they be out of ours; they are by us, and we see them not; they bear us in their arms, and we feel them not. When they do assume shapes, they are not more present, but more visible. Our senses cannot perceive them, our faith may. We are God's little children, the angels be his elder sons; posuit, præposuit nobis; as in a family, the greater children bear and look to the less. In quovis angulo adhibe reverentiam angelo: tibi præsunt, tibi prosunt.† Behave thyself reverently before those angels, whom thy God hath charged to protect thee.

(9.) Mary was at home when 'the angel came in unto her;' in muliebri orbe, the house. Straggling and gadding Dinahs sooner meet with devils, than with angels. It is not unlikely that she was at her devotions; ante mentem replevit quam ventrem: sicut cum processit ex utero, non recessit ab animo.‡ While Zacharias was offering incense, an angel came down (as it were) in that fragrant smell, Luke

1:11; as an angel went up in the smoke of Manoah's sacrifice. Of all places, he chose to appear in the temple; of all parts of the temple, at the altar; of all parts of the altar, at the right side. The angels are with us at all times, but especially in our devotions; in all places, but especially in God's house. They rejoice to be with us, when we are with God. When we go about our sins, they turn away their faces. They would not minister to us, while we are officious to Satan. But while, with Zacharias, we are at our prayers, or, with the holy virgin, at our lawful callings, they delight to do us good. The angels of God shall preserve us, so long as we serve the God of angels.

4. The matter or salvation itself. 'Hail, thou that art highly favoured,' or 'graciously accepted.' The angel does not so much praise the virgin, as God's grace to the virgin: meritum non narrat, sed favorem; he says not that she had deserved, but that she is accepted, and what God hath conferred. I deny not but she was holy among women, at that time the most holy of men or women; but for this sanctity she was beholden to God, not God to her. The Lord doth not tie his favours to the worthy; his elections be as free as himself. Mary was his choice; he that purposed and promised that his Son should be made of a woman, purposed to perform that promise in this woman. He sent the angel to her, but himself prevented the angel, and was first with her. Therefore the angel says not, Præpara hospitium; but in effect, Redde præparatum. The Holy Ghost had sanctified her soul, before he overshadowed her body; and filled that with holy faith, before he filled this with the blessed fruit. God was with her, before God took flesh of her. She was full of excellent graces; but those were munera, not merita: no creature could deserve to bring forth the Creator. She had honoured God as an obedient daughter; but this could not merit that God should honour her for his mother. 'He regarded the lowliness,' not the worthiness, 'of his handmaid,' was her own confession. Alas, that ever man should think to merit of his Maker, when this could not be granted to God's own mother. Humility, and a disposition of ourselves, is that which the Lord accepts. Humble penitence is better than proud righteousness; humble ignorance better than proud knowledge. I had almost said, an humble sinner is better than a proud saint.

'The Lord is with thee.' Dominus ad te, Dominus in te, Dominus ex te, Dominus tecum. The Lord, even the whole Trinity, was with her. God the Father, in his election of her to this honour; God the Son, in his conception of her flesh; God the Holy Ghost, in his obumbration of that holy vessel. Pater præelegit, Filius replevit, Spiritus sanctus consecravit. The first person honoured her, that, of whom himself was the Father, she should be the mother. The third person honoured her, in forming that divine burden within her. The second person honoured her, in being made man by her flesh. So she might be called Totius Trinitatis nobile triclinium. This expounds the former; she was highly graced indeed, when 'God was with her;' wheresoever he is by his gracious presence, he makes heaven to be. Highly was she favoured when she was honoured by the Most High; when heaven, which so far transcends this visible world; when God, who so infinitely transcends heaven, descended into her womb. This was no ordinary grace which the virgin found in heaven, to find heaven within herself. No mortal creature was ever thus honoured; that he should take part of her nature, who was the God of nature; that the Maker of all things should make his human body of hers; that her womb should yield that flesh which was personally united to the Son of God: that she should bear him who upholds the world; this was such a Dominus tecum, as was never heard of before, never shall be sampled after; above all wonder admirable, without all example singular.

'Blessed art thou among women.' First, Many women have been blessed; neither doth the Old Testament afford such plenty of good women as the New. Why should there be any difference of sexes in grace, when there is none in glory? 'In Christ there is neither male nor female.' Only the good woman hath the greater honour, because she is the weaker in nature; as in the night a clear and bright moon is more admired of us than a daily sun. Of the good women under grace, Elizabeth led the ring; and, in respect of time, went before

Mary, as her son was to go before the Son of Mary. She was long barren, but at last had a son, and that a miraculous fruit both of her body and of her time. She was blessed to be the mother of the greatest mere man; Mary to be the mother of him that is God and man. Many women are fruitful(?), but they cease to be virgins; many virgins are blessed, but they are not fruitful. But Mary was a virgin-mother, a fruitful virgin: fruitful even while she was a virgin, and continuing a virgin after she had been fruitful.

'Blessed among women.' The first woman was the instrument of man's transgression; this is the instrument of his redemption. *Eva occidendo obfuit, Maria concipiendo profuit: illa percussit, ista sanavit. She, by believing the evil angel, became cursed; this, by believing the good angel, became blessed among women. Eve's disobedience peperit mortem, Mary by obedience peperit salutem. But this eulogy is formerly given of another woman. 'Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber be; blessed above women in the tent,' Jud. 5:24. Ans.: She was blessed above any woman in her age, or in the ages before her. Judith did as nobly in cutting off the head of Holofernes, as Jael in boring the head of Sisera. Esther is behind neither of them, in hanging up the head of Haman. Those three women were all famous, and merited praise, for livering Israel from those three cruel tyrants. But they lopped off only some branches; Mary brought forth him that stocked up the root. Sisera, Haman, Holofernes, were but limbs of the devil; Christ confounded the devil himself. Still may it be said of Mary, Nec primam visa est similem, nec habere sequentem; 'Blessed is she among women.'

Christ came from many blessed women; faithful Sarah, godly Rebekah; yet it is observable that none of these be mentioned in his genealogy; but other four, and they had all their several blemishes, Matt. 1.

Tamar is the first; and she stole from her father-in-law an incestuous copulation; because in justice she might not have her third husband Shelah, by subtlety she obtains Judah. She rights herself wrongfully, because she was not righted justly. Yet is this incest pardoned, and this woman royally chronicled.

Rahab is the next; and she was every way contemptible. By nation a Canaanite, by profession an idolater, by city a Jerichonite, by trade an hostess, by conversation a harlot. Her nation was as vile as to be a dog; her religion was a worship of the devil; her city was so cursed, that it should not be builded but by the ruin of the re-edifier's posterity; her profession was an infamous reproach; her life was not unanswerable to all these, her body being as common as her house. Hostess and harlot were held convertible terms; if a guest wanted lodging, her own bed was public. Yet is she become a mere chaste convert, honest and honourable; thought worthy to be the grandmother of David's father; and the holy line of Christ is not ashamed to admit her into that happy pedigree.

Ruth, the third woman, came of that nation which was begot in incest; Moab, even by Lot of his own daughter. They were the snares and pitfalls of Israel, the contempt of God; 'Moab is my washpot,' Ps. 60:8. Indeed, the worst of herself was poverty; and that was her fate, rather than her fault. Yet she hath the honour above all the dames of Israel to be the great-grandmother of a king, of David, of the Messiah.

Bathsheba is the last, recorded under the title of Uriah's wife; the very reddition of her husband's name, is the repetition of her shame. One that, ambitious to be a queen, leaped into the bed of her husband's murderer. She first lies with an adulterer, and then marries a homicide. Yet is she honoured to be the mother of King Solomon, and (in respect of the line royal) of Christ himself.

Thus one was incestuous, the second a public hostess, the third a begging stranger, the last an adulteress; yet from these came the Lord Jesus; from such unholy loins, the most holy Saviour; not for the countenancing of their sins, but for the magnifying of his own mercies. He that descended from their bodies, sanctified their souls, pardoned their sins, and made them blessed. But his own immediate mother was a pure virgin; of whose holiness we cannot have too reverent a thought, so long as our apprehension holds her to the condition of a woman. We may not affect to be honoured as Mary was; we may affect to be sanctified as Mary was. Our desire of holiness must know no measure, that is not above the capacity of a creature.

'Among women;' it is not said 'among men.' There is a man above her, there is no woman comparable to her. Her honour is confined to her own sex. 'Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou surmountest them all,' Prov. 31:26. She hath the pre-eminence, inter filias, among the daughters; but there is filius, a Son, even her own Son, that far excelleth her. She was her Father's mother; in her was made he that made her. Her finite body contained the infinite Spirit; eternity was wrapt up in time, the Creator in a creature, God in a virgin. Many men and women have been and are the spiritual temples of God; none ever was his material sanctuary, but this; therefore, 'blessed above women.' Yet still more blessed the man that was born of this woman. Mater benedicta propter filium, non filius propter matrem the blessedness of this woman came by a man. Thus Christ honoured both the sexes; he was a man, not a woman; he was made of a woman, not of a man. Formam viri assumendo, et de femina nascendo, utrumque sexum honoravit. It was the seed of the woman, not of the man, that slew the serpent. If man should insult over woman, because the world's Saviour is of our sex, not of theirs, they might answer, he was made of our sex, without the least counsel of yours. If they should insult over us, because he was made of a woman, not of a man, we reply, that he was made a man, not a woman.* He would be a man, and be made of a woman, that he might save both man and woman. And in respect of his salvation, there is neither man nor woman, male nor female, but 'we are all one in Jesus Christ.'

The angel salutes her, he does not pray to her; he doth graciously speak to her, not humbly worship her. Adoration is a divine peculiar,

which even the noblest creatures among themselves may neither give nor take. She was to be the mother of God, yet he adores her not; here the angel did not give it. When John fell down to worship an angel, he did not suffer him; there the angel would not take it, Rev. 19:10. They style themselves the 'fellow-servants' of holy creatures, not fellow-mates with the most holy Creator. The angel's salutation is become the papists' prayer; so they used to join the brokage of Ave-Mary lane with Pater-noster row, and looked not to be heard of their Almighty Father, without the intercession of his mother. We pity the blind people that are taught to make a conscience of this folly; but neither heaven nor earth can yield an argument to excuse their teachers. Who but madmen would beg of the blessed virgin now again to conceive Christ? But are not these words in the word of God? Yes, so be many others; which abuse makes the doctrine of men, yea, the doctrine of devils. Satan takes words out of the Scripture, whereof to make his charms of sorcery. To say, they use it not as a petition, but as a salutation, this were to suppose the virgin still at Nazareth, ourselves all archangels, and sent on this message. But neither is she mortal, as she was in Galilee, nor are we angels, as was Gabriel. Because a glorious spirit saluted her that was flesh and blood here on earth, shall we, that are flesh and blood, salute her that is a glorious spirit in heaven? How gross, how senseless is this presumption! We read how the angel spake to Peter. He that shall now pray to him in the same terms, 'Arise, gird thyself, bind on thy sandals, cast thy garment about thee, and follow me,' Acts 12:8; were he not mad? Yet the one hath as much sense in it as the other. For men to pray unto the virgin in the angel's salutation, is to abuse the virgin, and the angel, and the salutation. Neither are they excusable that hang up this sign at their doors: so that it is no rare thing to be drunk at the Salutation. In a word, the angel salutes her as a saint, he does not pray to her as a goddess.

The angel did not pray to her, but he praises her: 'Blessed art thou among women.' Herein we second the angel; we bless her, and bless God for her, because we are all blessed in him that came of her. She 'found favour' and grace with God, and we are all thankful to the God of grace for it. Her happiness was more ours than the angel's; we have reason to bless her, whom the angel pronounced 'blessed.' The whole Trinity did honour her; miserable be that dust and ashes which doth spitefully dishonour her. She is the beloved of God, therefore worthy of all humble respect from man; so holy, that not to be thought of without reverence; so glorious, that not to be mentioned but with praises. It is pity, he that despiseth the mother, should be saved by the Son. She was a prophetess on earth; she is an eminent saint in heaven. She was 'blessed among women' below; she is blessed among saints above. Thus far we willingly go; but to make her a queen of heaven, an understander of hearts, an attorney-general to promote all men's suits, the advocate of all clients; that she can command God, because he is her Son; that she can pardon sins, prevent miseries, do that superstitious man would have her: to this we dare not subscribe. Yea, we say it is blasphemous to mingle the milk of the mother with the blood of the Son, a derogation from the perfect merits of Christ; and they that lose the Son, are never to be helped by the mother. Yet such be the idolatrous blasphemies of their rhyming Marials, that Calvin fears not to say truly: If one should spit in her face, drag her by the hair of the head, or trample her under his feet, she would count it a less injury. I deny not but some of the fathers have gone too far in these attributes; but it was their zeal to the Son, that made them over-praise the mother. They did adornare laudibus, but our Romists do adorare precibus. Jerome calls Christ the head, and Mary the neck; the head transfuseth by the neck. But at Rome, she is neck, and head, and eye, and hand, and heart, and all. Nor can they think of a grace in Christ, which they do not doubly commend in the virgin; and indeed the whole tenure of that church is more in their lady, than in our Lord. But she will never thank them for that honour, which dishonours God. She that so humbly 'magnified her Saviour,' would not be magnified for a Saviour. The Jews were commanded to keep holy the day of their deliverance out of Egypt; they did not think that the day delivered them, but God on that day; they did not worship the day, but on that day they more especially worshipped God. Moses might as well have adored his rod, because it wrought miracles; as Aaron his, that at once bloomed and fructified. These were laid up for holy monuments; they were not worshipped. That blessed virgin cannot be too much honoured, so long as she is not deified. The angel's testimony was seconded by her own prophecy; we believe both the angel and her. 'All generations shall call her blessed,' Luke 1:48; by the fruit of whose womb all generations are blessed.

'Blessed among women.' Well was the child worthy to make the mother happy. Mary was obscure; she was not ignoble, but even of the blood royal of Judah, though her condition was mean. Joseph was immediate heir of the crown; Mary was not far removed, but by her right had been queen. Christ came of a poor, but no base parentage; the famous kings of Judah (none such were in all the world), were his progenitors; he was born a king. Herein she might be happy; but in being mother to the King of all the world, more happy. And yet, still, there is a happiness for her beyond that; *Beatior concipiendo Christum fide, quam carne: felicius corde quam corpore gestavit. This was the Dominus tecum, that made her perfectly blessed; she believed on him, whom she conceived. Tecum in ventre, tecum in mente; tecum in utero, tecum in auxilio. The one was more miraculous, the other more beneficial; that was her privilege, this is her happiness. That the Word was made flesh within her, this was our good; that her heart was hallowed by the Word, this was her good.

To be the mother of God, was singular to her; to be the sons and daughters of God, is common to all the elect. In the former, God meant her a miracle of women; in the other, an example of men and women. In that, she conceived the Saviour of the world; in this, she conceived the Saviour of her own soul. If we obey the word, we are the mothers of Christ; if we believe, we do again incarnate the Son of God. A Christian may well be called a 'new creature;' for he becomes one by conceiving his Creator. Adam was formed of neither man nor woman; his body of earth, his soul from God. We all come of both man and woman. Eve was made of a man, without a woman; Christ, of a woman without a man. A Christian is formed a new way; neither as Adam, of neither sex; nor as all the world, of both; nor as Christ, of woman alone; nor as Eve, of man alone; but by having another formed within him. So Saint Paul travailed in birth of the Galatians, 'till Christ was formed within them,' Gal. 4:19. Adam was taken out of the earth, Eve out of Adam, we as men out of Adam and Eve. Christ was formed within Mary, to be a Saviour; and Christ is formed within us, to be our Saviour. Thus until Christ be conceived in us, we are not indeed Christians. Every renewed heart is another Mary, a spiritual sanctuary of the Lord Jesus. There he was formed, to be formed here; here daily, there once for all. In this God hath made us blessed (in due proportion) with Mary; she materially, we spiritually, conceive his only Son. No womb can conceive him, and not partake of him; none can partake of him, and not be blessed.

This blessedness belongs to all that are spiritually pregnant of Christ; but all do not see with the angels' eyes. None are less honoured in this world, than they that shall be most honoured in the world to come. The gallant ladies of Jerusalem little thought of this neglected virgin; yet after the success known, which of them would not have changed condition with her, though they had given the whole world to boot? Mary was the happy instrument to make all nations blessed, by bearing Him that is the blessedness of all nations. Ministers are the instrumental means to bring him into our hearts, whom she brought forth unto the world; yet who be more contemptible in the eyes of all men? Papists and sectaries, indeed, make them idols, the rest of the world esteem them as cyphers; either nimious respect is given them, or none at all. They strive to make men rich for heaven, and men strive as fast to keep them poor on earth. In sacrilege the world hath one end, God hath another; their end is covetousness, God's end is justice; they do it because they will not be controlled, God suffers it because they shall not be saved. Yet still blessed are they among men that bring this blessed gospel to men; and if they serve that Christ whom they preach for their contempt below, he will make them amends with his own glory above. The star is the thickest and darkest part of the orb till the sun hath enlightened it; then it is far the brightest. The preacher is the meanest man of all professions till Christ hath glorified him; then shall his shining honour appear, Dan. 12:3.

All the faithful are thus blessed among men in their degrees; though disregarded of the world, yet honoured of the angels, and beloved of God himself. The elections and valuations of men fall out otherwise. The rich man in his purple is set on the throne of esteem; poor Lazarus lies at the footstool of the heart, perhaps shut out of the gate. The world is apt to magnify them that magnify themselves; desert in retiredness is not minded. We choose a wife for her beauty, a servant for his industry, a friend for the flattery, a house for the commodity; none of these in reference to Christianity. Ingo, an ancient king of the Draves and Veneds, having some Christians in his dominions, but the most and greatest of his subjects being pagans, made a great feast, and invited them both. He sets the pagans, though they were his nobles, in the hall, the poor Christians in his presence chamber, where their cheer and attendance was kingly, and they had his company. While his peers wondered at this, he answered, 'This I do, not as I am king of Draves, but as I am heir of another world, where all these shall be my fellow-princes. He gave civil due to his lords in the politic regiment of his kingdom; but these he looked upon with a spiritual eye, beheld them below as they shall be above, clothed with white robes and crowned with glorious diadems. These he loves, these he blesseth, as the blessed and beloved of God.

Uncut or unset diamonds, shuffled among other stones that are polished, are not heeded by a common eye. Beryls and bristow stones, especially rubies and sapphires, are incomparably preferred before them. But the lapidary culls out the other, and having artificially handled them, holds the least diamond at a greater price than they can have for all the rest. The godly are jewels; heaven itself is not so precious, for it was made for them, not they for it. But they appear not yet to the world in so bright lustres. When they shall be set in the ring of eternity, how glorious will they shew then! 'They shall be mine, saith the Lord, in the day when I make up my jewels,' Mal. 3:17. There be that value one jewel above many Christians, whereas one true Christian is more worth than all the world. Gold is the purest metal, yet is covered with a barren turf. The richest piece in the gallery hath always a curtain before it. The fairest beauty commonly goes masked. 'The king's daughter is all glorious within.' Rottenness gives the lie to others; this beauty shall outlast and outshine the heavens. God doth not keep a court of heraldry upon earth to record to the world the degrees of the honour of his saints; but their names are written in heaven, registered in the book of life. The angel calls Mary blessed, Elizabeth calls her blessed, Simeon calls her blessed, she calls herself blessed, all generations call her blessed, God himself calls and makes her blessed. Yet, as Paul said, 'cometh this blessedness on the circumcision only?' Rom. 4:9; so, cometh this blessedness on the virgin only? No. Even 'blessed are they that mourn' for their sins, Matt. 5:4; 'blessed are they whose sins are not imputed,' &c., Ps. 32:2. Let the lures and stales of the world, the gorgeous caparisons of the flesh, attract and transport others; these to me are the excellent on the earth, the true, gentle, noble worthies of the world. These hath God blessed 'with spiritual blessings in heavenly places;' these shall Christ entertain with a 'Come, ye blessed of my Father!'

Ver. 29. 'When she saw him, she was troubled at his saying, and cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be.' She might well be troubled. First, If it had been but a man that had come in so suddenly when she expected none, or so secretly when she had no other company, or so strangely, the doors being haply shut, she had cause to be troubled. How much more when the shining glory of the person so heightened the astonishment? Secondly, Her sex was more subject to fear, mulieres, molliores; women are sooner wrought upon by objects. Yet not only men, but even good men, have been amazed at the sight of angels, Jud. 6:22. Manoah and his wife had not spirit enough left to look one upon another; but, instead of looking up to heaven with cheerful countenances, they fell flat to the earth on their faces, Jud. 13:22. Zacharias was a holy priest, wonted to serve in the presence of God, yet he trembles at the presence of an angel, as if he durst be more familiar with the Lord than with the servant. Well might a tender virgin be troubled at that wherewith such strong men were astonished.

We flatter ourselves how well we could entertain such visions, but there is difference betwixt our faith and our senses. To apprehend here the presence of God by faith, this goes down sweetly; should a glorious angel appear in this church, it would amaze us all. Weak eyes are soon dazzled with that light which should comfort them. The vision of God is life and happiness, yet our mortal nature is ready to conceive death in it. If the cause of our joy afflict us with fear, we may thank our own sin for it. Now, if the sight of an angel did so astonish this holy and blessed maid, what shall become of the reprobates when they shall be brought before the tribunal of God himself, with all his glorious angels? Yet she was not troubled so much at his sight as at his saying; not what she saw, but what she heard, more amazed her. The messenger was not so wonderful as the message. Her soul hath work enough to digest this, though she had less minded the other.

Ver. 30. 'And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favour with God.' This fit must not last long. The good angel was both apprehensive and compassionate of her weakness, therefore suddenly revives her spirits with a cheerful excitation, 'Fear not.'

1. The law was given 'by the ministration of angels,' but in terror. Moses himself quaked. The gospel was given also by the ministry of angels, but without terror: 'Fear not, Joseph;' 'fear not, Zacharias;' 'fear not, Mary.' Here is no earthquake nor thunder, but a mild and mansuete voice, a tune of peace. 'Glory to God on high, peace to men below,' Luke 2:14. The law was a yoke, 'which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear; the gospel is a yoke too, but profitable. Leve jugum Christi. A yoke is not for one, but for two. Christ himself is one of the two; that yoke must needs be easy which he bears with thee. 'The Lord will speak peace to his people,' Ps. 85:8. But why be not all our songs set in that key? Why is anything but peace in our words, whose commission is the word of peace? If we were sent to none but Maries, we would use no other language but the angel's. We say, 'Fear not, Mary, Joseph, Zacharias;' but 'Fear not, Judas, Elymas, Magus, Herod,' we dare not say. Fear, that you may escape sin; and believe, that you may escape fear. Zedekiah's 'Fear not' to a godless Ahab was unseasonable; it invited him to ruin. The same to Gideon was in season, and encouraged him to conquest. He that deals with men's affections hath a wolf by the ears. If we speak peace, they wax wanton; if we reprove, they grow desperate.

2. The good angels endeavour to take away our fear, evil angels to bring it; their conditions are not more contrary than their dispositions. They strive to hinder all good from us, and to quench all good in us; the other do pity our human frailties, and love to be the instruments of our happiness. This is true on both sides, though we perceive it not whom it most concerns. We neither see nor feel the devil when he tempts us to our destruction. Our senses are no more sensible of the angels, when they watch in our protection, and secretly suggest their consolation. If an angel says not to us vocally, 'Fear not,' yet he provides actually against the cause of our fear. Satan is so deadly an enemy, that he would not only kill us, but kill us with terror; good spirits affect our relief, and instead of terrifying us, labour for our tranquillity and peace. Here was not so much amazement in the face, as comfort in the speech of the angel. Joy was his errand, not terror. There is no fear with the angels of the gospel; but as the sweetest lesson to an ill-affected hearer sounds harsh, the fault is not in our instruments, but in your contradicting and discordant spirits.

3. Till the fit of fear was taken off, the virgin was unfit for this heavenly message. Her sickness was not a fever, but a syncope, or swooning, therefore her most proper physic is a cordial, some restorative; this water of life the angel hath ready, brought from heaven. All passions disquiet the heart, and sway the balances from an equal poise; there is no weighing the gold till they return to evenness. A sound conscience is to the soul as health to the body; health consists in the good temperature of the elements, fit quality of the humours, a diligent function of the parts which proceeds from the former, and a beautiful proportion of the body that ariseth from them all. If any be defective, or excessive, or not perform the due office, all is out of frame. Fear had a little troubled the virgin's soul; as a green branch is forcibly bowed by the hand of man, which (letting go the hold) presently comes again to itself and former proportion. If a man look into a troubled spring, he sees no reflection of his own image; the passionate heart cannot for the time return the image of the Maker. But as the sun itself gives way to a storm, which overblown, he reshines to us in his former glory; so this sudden fear was as suddenly swallowed up by a miraculous joy, and the virgin appeared again herself. Soon hath the angel cleared the coast; the mists of passion are dispelled by the very name of that Sun, which from her womb, as from the blessed East, was to arise unto the world.

'Thou hast found favour with God.' Favour is a sure antidote against fear. Esther durst not come into the presence till the sceptre had given her admission; a summon of that emboldens her. Mary found favour, not at Herod's court; it was none of her ambition: the beauties that brought grace from thence, often left more grace behind them, their honourable names. Not grace among men: she was none of the world's favourites; for then sure she had been worth a lamb at her church-going, Luke 2:24. Not grace with the world; alas! it is a popular, titular grace, like a blazing comet. But favour with God; a durable, comfortable grace, a star fixed in the orb of eternity, as unchangeable as its author. She did not merit favour, but she found it; God did not find it with her, but she found it with God. This high favour did not make her proud, but thankful.

Erewhile she trembled with fear, now she is confirmed with favour; the troubles of the righteous ever end in comfort. Let those fear that know not they are in favour, or know they are in disfavour with God; thy gracious estate calls for confidence, and that confidence for joy. What should discourage them on earth that have found favour in heaven? What can they fear, that are loved of him, at whom the devils tremble? What remote corner of her soul was there, into which these beams of consolation did not shine? Favour with God! We need no more; fremat orbis et orcus; were there many hells, and every devil a legion, here is an invincible fortification against them all. 'By this I know that thou favourest me, because mine enemies triumph not over me,' Ps. 41:11. He had enemies enough, but what was their rage in respect of God's favour? We fear not the good angels, for we know that if they can hurt us, they will not; the evil ones would, but cannot, if we be in God's favour. Their assaults strike our weakness with terror; why? but because we forget our condition in Christ. 'If the Spirit witness with our spirits, that we are the sons of God,' Rom. 8:16; let all the subtile spirits of hell, more cunning than critical lawyers (for the master hath still one trick more than he teacheth his scholar, as the fencer said), do their worst, they shall never pick a hole in our evidence, nor find a claw or quillet to disinherit us. The world frowns; no matter, so long as we have found favour with God. These storms may hide the sun from mortal eyes below, heaven finds him nevertheless glorious. Kings rage, and kingdoms swell against us; he 'laughs them to scorn' that favours us. There is no room for fear in the breast that is assured of favour. Lord, give us certainty of thy favour to us, and let the powers of hell spend their venom against us.

'Thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a Son, and shalt call his name Jesus.' This is the foundation of her comfort; how shall she be sure that she hath found favour with God? By a very good token, for she shall find God within herself. She need not go up to heaven to search the book, for he that hath the book shall come down from heaven to her. A Son from all eternity, thy Son in temporality; this Son shall bring the records with him. What could keep joy out of that heart, from whose womb shall come salvation?

'Thou shalt call his name Jesus:' non impones nomen, sed vocabis impositum. Not name him, but 'call his name;' for this belongs to his Father, not to his mother, to give him a name; God so named him by the angel. Jesus, a Saviour; the very name secures her; for he that came to save the world, without question would save her that brought him into the world. If he redeem 'all his people,' of all people he would redeem his mother.

But a child is parvulus, a little one; nay, this child is magnus, 'He shall be great;' and not coram Deo, 'in the sight of the Lord,' as John Baptist was, Luke 1:15; but magnus Deus, the great God. And lest thy estimate of him should be confined as to thine own Son only, know he is more, Filius Altissimi, 'the Son of the Highest.' And how meanly soever thou seemest to thyself or to others, thy Son shall be a king: 'God shall give him a throne.' And no mean king, for he shall have the 'throne of David.' Nor is he a temporary or mortal king, but eternal; to whose kingdom nec termini sunt, nec fines. 'He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.' Here was a Son, and such a Son as the world never heard of before.

It is natural to women to desire children, and of children generally rather a son than a daughter. The joy of a new-born son digests the bitterness of the mother's travail, John 16:21. And this son they would have good, and being good they wish him honourable, and with both these long-lived; and withal the comfort of their age. It hath been no rare thing in the world for parents to repent their own fruitfulness: dry loins are better than an unblest issue; many a father hath such sons as he wisheth unborn. Better had that child's cradle been his coffin, his swaddling-band his winding-sheet, that lives to the shame of his father, to the grief of his mother. Children are certain cares, uncertain comforts. The proof of them makes them either the blessings or crosses of their parents. It was Abraham's joy that he should have a son, a son in his old age, and such a son as Isaac, in whose seed lay the promise of his salvation. So to Zacharias, a son that should be 'his joy, the joy of many,' Luke 1:14; sacred to God, beneficial to man, a harbinger of him that was God and man. This was not only comfort, but honour, to his age; news able to tie up that tongue with amazement that was afterward tied up with incredulity. So to this blessed virgin, that she should have a Son, and such a Son. To hear what he should be before he was: Jesus, the name of salvation is sweet; great, power with mercy, sweet and strong; a king over the house of Jacob from his father David; a king of all the world from his Father God. Never was any mother so glad of her son, born and accomplished, as this virgin was of hers, even before he was conceived.

Ver. 34. 'Then Mary said to the angel, How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?' If the blessed virgin had not been strong in faith, and full of grace, she had asked more questions than this. Indeed, it was none of the least, but certainly it had not been the last. Who art thou, whence comest thou, who sent thee? These had been the questions of mere nature. Yea, if reason had granted all this, that he was an angel, come from heaven, sent by God, yet the remaining difficulties had been enough to suspend sudden belief. What kingdom is this? where shall it be founded, when erected? Alas, Herod is too potent; or if he were not, yet Cæsar commands the world. How, then, should my Son be a king, be a king of Israel? yea, how should my son be the Son of God? An unbelieving heart would have stuck at all these; all these she takes for granted. A less matter went down more hardly with Zacharias, for all his priesthood. He misdoubts the message, 'How shall I know?' Luke 1:18; Mary doth but demand the manner, 'How shall it be?' Nature prevailed in him, grace in her. He considers the impossibility, from old age, and long barrenness, as if years and dry loins could binder him that is able of stones to raise up children. He did not so suddenly apprehend the infinite power that promised, nor remember that famous pattern of Abraham and Sarah. Mary hath digested greater things than this, and supposing these strange wonders would be done, insists only in the manner of doing. Of this she requires a further information, not doubting de prædicto, but demanding de modo. To Zacharias the message was not so miraculous as the messenger; to Mary the messenger was not so miraculous as the message. Zacharias was a holy man, but surprised with the unwontedness of that he saw and heard, as if the news were too good to be suddenly believed. His understanding was not yet recollected, his thoughts had not time to debate the matter; therefore at first he entertains that with doubt, which after he received with joy. At the first hearing, it astonished his heart; but when he was well acquainted with it, no man made it more welcome. The gospel hath much ado to win our belief, and they are few that rightly entertain it; but being once received, it fills our souls with such sweetness, that rather than lose it, we would lose our lives.

'Seeing I know not a man.' The angel speaks of a present conception; she so understands him, which increaseth the wonder, 'I know not a man.' Well might this make her inquisitive of the means: per coitum is the usual manner of having a son. Let her marriage be consummated, let her have knowledge of her husband, and then to conceive a son would be no wonder. But concipere filium, and non agnoscere virum: this was the marvel. If she were to have a son by Joseph, how then should her son be the Son of God? Here a demand was necessary, the case required a further intimation. How her virginity should be made fruitful, instantly, sine contractu hominis, was far from a doubt of infidelity. Yea, it rather argues faith; for she believed the main, that God would do it, and inquires the circumstances how he would do it. To be a virgin-mother, might as well open her lips to inquire, as it fills the whole world with admiration to consider. It was then without a man. Fæmina circumdabit virum; 'A woman shall compass a man,' Jer. 31:22, not a man compass a woman. This is an article of our faith, 'born of the virgin Mary,' whereof we cannot doubt, and be saved. Here arise divers instructions.

1. God would have his Son born of a virgin, that he might be wholly free from the least tang of corruption; that the prophecy might be fulfilled, 'Behold, a virgin shall conceive,' &c., Isa. 7:14. The Jews, to elude this demonstrative testimony, say that Alma signifies only a young woman, whether married or unmarried, that hath known man. But this is a forgery, for the prophet speaks there of a wonder, a mighty wonder, such as the world never heard of the like. But for a young woman that hath known a man to have a son: this were no wonder, it being the common course of nature.

The fathers compare her to Aaron's rod, quæ fronduit, et floruit, et fructus protulit, sine arbore, absque radice. Let the incredulous Jews tell me, quomodo arida virga floruit absque germine, how that sere rod brought forth almonds without any stock or root; and I will tell them, quomodo sola virgo concepit absque homine, how the virgin conceived without a man. Nec virgæ virorem fructus læsit emissio, nec virginis pudorem sacri partus editio. We can explicate neither; nec Judæus virgæ conceptum, nec nos virginis partum.^{*} The virgin marvelled; she was not ashamed; non quia peperit innupta, terretur: sed quia genuit intacta, miratur. Joseph at first misconceived, that his spouse conceived amiss. But he was satisfied, and would sooner believe that a child might be born without a father, than that Mary could be unchaste. Credidit plus gratiæ, quàm naturæ: conceptionem perspicit, castitatem defendit.^{*} They that be good themselves, always think the best of others.

2. A virgin, yet a virgin espoused. She knew not her husband, yet she knew herself betrothed to an husband. If a priest's daughter played the whore, she was to be burned, Lev. 21:9; if a common person's daughter, to be stoned. Well might the world, when it saw her pregnancy, suspect her virginity; but that suspicion is lost in the name of an husband. Without this, her own innocency had not prevented her infamy. She needed not this betrothed husband for her own satisfaction, but to defend that chastity abroad, which she knew was safe at home. Too many that had not the grace to save their maidenheads, yet have the manners to take husbands to save their credits. Such a marriage is not honour, but a cloak for dishonour. He is mad, that cuts off his leg to get him a crutch. What fair woman will venom her face, that she may wear a mask? The bad woman takes a husband ad velamentum turpitudinis; the blessed virgin had a husband ad testimonium virginitatis.

There was further a double end of this betrothment and marriage. First, That the mystery of Christ's incarnation might be concealed from Satan; her espousals blinded him from suspecting her to conceive by the Holy Ghost. Secondly, For the comfort of herself and of her babe, in whose sustentation the Lord employed Joseph, that there might be at once a witness and a guardian of her fruitful virginity. He was noble and just; he was loth to expose her to public shame, or to put her away with a noise; yet abhorred to touch her whom he thought defiled. In this perplexity he is satisfied by oracle, to prevent the ignorant from sin, the innocent from shame, and the whole church of God from scandal. At a dead lift God never fails us.

3. Christ was conceived after espousals, not born till after marriage, to grace both the estates. He sanctified virginity with his conception, he honoured marriage with his birth. He was conceived of a maid, but a maid espoused; born of a maid, but a maid married. His mother was a maid for the honour of virginity; his mother was a wife for the honour of marriage. To convince them that so admire virginity with the disgrace of matrimony, Christ did honour matrimony as well as virginity. He says not, They that keep their virginity, but 'They that keep faith and obedience, are his mothers,' Matt. 12:49. How long might nuns continue maids (if at least there be any maids of that profession) before they could obtain this honour without hearing the will of God, and doing it? Saint Bernard fits them, 'Mary was a virgin, yet rejoiced in her humility: these votaries forget to be humble, yet glory in their constrained virginity.'

God honoured marriage in making the first woman for Adam; and he honoured it again in marrying the best woman to Joseph. There is no such fountain of comfort on earth as marriage, whether for society or posterity. The marriage was contracted before his conception, and solemnised before his nativity. Thus he that would take flesh of a virgin did yet grace marriage. In this whole work God would have nothing ordinary; it was fit she should be a married virgin, that was to be a virgin mother. Amongst all women he chose a virgin; amongst all virgins one espoused. If the same God had not been the author and blesser of marriage as well as of virginity, he would not have countenanced virginity by marriage. Thus was he the seed of the woman, not of the man; without the seed of man he would be the son of man; that he might take man's nature without man's corruption. 'Born of a virgin.'

4. It is a question whether there be more wonder in the conception, or in the fruit; in the conception of a virgin, or in Jesus conceived. The one is above example, the other seems above miracle. Here we break forth in Bernard's admiration: O venter latior elementis, diffusior terris, capacior cælis; that could contain him that contains the world! The whole world moves in God, and yet God moved in a little room; that the daughter of a man should be the mother of God, how wondrous! Quæ virgo tam sublimis, ut salutetur ab angelo: tam humilis, ut desponsetur fabro;* let me add, Tam nobilis, ut sit prægnans Deo. There was inclosed, virtus in infirmitate, in majestate humilitas,† æternitas in immortalitate,‡ in carne Divinitas, in matre virginitas, in virgine fœcunditas. All are wonderful.

But the fruitfulness of a virgin doth not more exceed all wonders than the humanising of God doth exceed that. For the former, God made Eve out of Adam, a woman of a man without a woman. Why not now, a man out of a woman without a man? He made then a woman out of a man sleeping; why not now a man out of a woman living? Then a woman of a man's rib; why not here a man of a woman's flesh? This, then, was but the reimprovement of that power which created the world. God was almighty enough thus to make a man; but how comes the Almighty to be made? That God should be incarnate was an abasing of his majesty; that incarnate of a woman was the exaltation of a creature beyond all example. If it were not so wondrous, how was it matter of faith? and being so, it is wondrous that faith doth believe it. But he that to the first miracle, that a virgin did conceive, added a second, and greater, that God was born, let his grace work a third miracle, giving us all faith constantly to believe it. Yea, let our faiths wholly rest on this Son of Mary, that our souls may rest with this Son of Mary for ever.

Ver. 35. 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee.' This is the conclusion of the angel's message, or the main confirmation of the virgin. After this she asks no more questions; but subscribes with an humble and faithful fiat. Her reply was not, 'How can this be?' but, 'How shall this be?' Accordingly doth the angel answer. He tells her not of the manner, but of the Author of this act, which was sufficient to confirm her faith, 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee.

1. The conception of Christ's manhood was the action of the whole Trinity. Why, then, is it ascribed to the Holy Ghost? Answer: Not to exclude the rest, but (1.) to shew that it was the free grace of God, which is often termed the Holy Ghost;§ for the manhood deserved not this dignity of union. (2.) Because the Father and the Son effected it by the Holy Ghost. So was it his work immediately, and in a special manner. Good reason have we to be thankful to all the three persons, to the Father for ordaining this garment, to the Holy Ghost for weaving it, to the Son for wearing it: to the whole Deity for clothing us with it, and making us righteous by it.

2. Needs must that be holy which is made by the Most Holy, and united to the Most Holy, and must please and pacify the Most Holy, for them that are most unholy. How would sin touch him that was born of a holy virgin, and conceived by the most holy God? It was God's decree that what sin or defect soever Adam brought on himself, he should derive it to all his posterity. So when he begat a son, he gave him his sin. Every man that begets a child is in Adam's room, and begets him in the corruption of nature. To evade this, Christ, though he came of man, was not begot by man; and man propagates his corruption to no more than he begets. Other men are from Adam, and by Adam. Christ was from him, but not by him, as the procreant cause. His soul was infused by the Creator of spirits, his body made of the virgin's substance. The matter was her flesh, not the colour of the painter, nor the bread of the baker, when it is charmed by the conjuror. If the bread become his very body when it is consecrated, I do not see but the baker and the priest have done as much as the virgin Mary.

3. Neither yet is the Holy Ghost Christ's father. He did not beget him, but formed him. A human father is not a bare efficient cause, but confers the matter from himself, whereof the child is made. The Holy Ghost did not minister the matter from his own substance, whereof Christ was made, but took a part of human nature from the virgin, and of that he made the body of Christ within her. He was conceived, not of the substance, but by the power of the Highest; not by any generation, but adumbration or benediction of the Holy Ghost.

4. This was the virgin's satisfaction, to know, quis and quid, who was the undertaker, and what he would do. Let us not be ambitious to know more than the angel told Mary. Her faith was herewith contented, and shall our curiosity be unquiet? For the manner even of a natural conception, no mother knows her own. Naturalists may prattle what they will, but sooner shall they see the grass grow, the dial's hand move, than understand man's forming in the womb. It is, then, impious presumption for flesh and blood to search how the Son of God took flesh and blood, Ps. 139:15, 16. If the course of ordinary generation be a secret, how past all comprehension is this extraordinary operation? Of things that concern us, God hath been no niggard in his revelations.' It is tit for us to let him alone with the things that concern himself, and that so immediately. He meant the benefit of this incarnation public, the manner miraculously secret. The Holy Ghost did cast a shadow over the virgin, and withal a shadow over this mystery. Why should we seek a clear light where God himself will have a shadow? The light of the world was conceived in a shadow. Let the shadow alone, look unto the light. The light was conceived in a shadow, that we who were in the shadow of death might come to the light of life. Or the Holy Ghost overshadowed the virgin, and her son Christ shall overshadow his church. Tabernaculum Dei, umbraculum diei. 'There shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the day time for heat, and for a covert from the storm and the rain,' Isa. 4:6. If we be cold, he is the Sun of righteousness to warm us; if hot, he is refrigerium, a shadow of refreshing to cool us. Thus is it a shadow of secrecy from our curious heads, and a shadow of mercy to our humble hearts. The Holy Ghost did it, and the Holy Ghost give us faith to believe it, and comfort by it!

5. To make this useful to ourselves. First, Christ was conceived thus holy, that he might sanctify us. As the first Adam was the root of all corruption, so the second is the root of all sanctification. No unclean thing can enter into heaven, and we are all privy to our own uncleanness. How, then, shall we enter? He that was conceived and born holy sanctifies our conception and birth. Our life contracts new uncleanness, his holiness is sufficient for us. Next, in this he is our pattern. We must be conceived anew by the Holy Ghost, that we may be holy in imitation, as he was in perfection, 1 John 3:3. He conceived Christ in utero Mariæ, and he conceives us in utero Ecclesiæ. But if we be thus renewed, we will strive to keep ourselves undefiled. He could not have been a fit Saviour for us unless he were first sanctified. Nor can we be fit members of him unless we be purged.

But that I make choice to insist on here, is this. He that was conceived of the Holy Spirit, in the womb of a holy virgin, how much 'fairer than all the sons of men' must he needs be? He that is so holy cannot but be lovely. 'If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be an Anathema Maranatha,' 1 Cor. 16:22. The supposition of a dangerous sin, the imposition of a heavy punishment. Anathema is properly, a thing laid up; so things dedicated to God, were called Anathemata, reposita, seposita. Now they be called cursed, because they are cursed that violate them. So, cursed is he that loves not the Lord Jesus. 'The end of the commandment is love,' 1 Tim. 1:5. There is perfectivum, charity; perfectibile, the commandment; perfectio, the end. Omnia æstimanda sunt a fine. Love is that noble end of all. Si adsit sanitas, non opus est medico: si adsit charitas, non opus est præcepto. Saint Augustine reduceth those four cardinal virtues to charity, as to their genus; and makes all their differences, but the various effects of love. Justice is but love, in due retributions. Fortitude is but love, in bearing injuries. But charity is only loved by those that understand it, and understood by those that love it. Deus diligendus in quantum diligibilis; this proper only to the Trinity. In quantum diligi potest parte diligentis; this is excellent in saints and angels; in us imperfect. Yet we must love him with all our heart, mind, and soul; with a threefold totality. First, ex parte objecti, all in God. Secondly, ex parte subjecti, with all in man. Thirdly, ex parte temporis, for ever. Christ is called Spes nostra, Pax nostra, Justitia nostra, Salus nostra; all with an adjunct; but Deus est charitas, God is love. Love in Divinity, is one person of the Trinity. There is charitas increata, God's love to us; and charitas creata, our love to God: both are his, the one erga nos, the other, in nobis, Eph. 6:24.

'Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.' Not all that hear of him; multitudes flocked about him, not so much for his veniat regnum, as for his panem quotidianum. Of the beasts that came to hear Orpheus, being examined, in the fable, all came not for the melody; but the hart for fear of the lion's anger, the wolf to find a lamb there, the ass for company, the fox to observe. Beggars come to funeral sermons, not for their soul, but for the dole. 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear;' the gouty hath both his feet, but not to walk; the blind hath both his eyes, but not to see; the manacled malefactor hath both his hands, but not to do their offices; so many men have both their ears, but not to hear the word of God. Some are for the crotchets of Zion's music; some are for sleep, but there God may take them napping. But if the love of Christ do not open our ears, the word of Christ will not enter our hearts. Not all that know Christ; Judas knew him, no man thinks that he loved him. Historia dat cognoscere, gratia dat diligere. We must strive to see Jesus by Jesus, not by story, but by Christ, Luke 7:47. 'Give me thy heart,' not thy brain; not the imaginative, but the affective, part pleaseth God. Mary Magdalene had much given her, and much forgiven her, not because she knew much, but loved much. Where love is, knowledge is inseparable; yet knowledge may be, where love is not. Not all that fear him: there is timor bonus, malus et mixtus. Evil fear hath both eyes on the punishment, good fear hath both eyes on the punisher; mixed fear hath one eye on the misery, another on the cause. There can be no love without fear, there may be a fear without love. Not all that praise him; many men praise Christ for that he never gave them. The wealth that comes by injustice, the honour that is got by flattery, are his curses rather than blessings. They may praise Christ for this, but Christ will never praise them for this. Not all that call upon him, when their petitions relish not so much of love to Christ, as to themselves. All riches are in the hand of God, and innumerable clients flock to his gates for his goods, not for himself. But no man is to love beneficium, plus quam benefactorem. All these duties be nothing without love; if love be their mistress, under her service they shall be entertained.

He gives us all our wisdom, and honour, and valour, and riches; yet he requires neither riches, nor valour, nor honour, nor wisdom, but our love. Yet, alas! the best of our love is but like a lump of gold, sophisticated with drossy mixtures; there is gold in it, but we know not how to find it. But shall a man despise the gospel of Christ, and say he loves him? It were no good argument of a subject's love, to tear his prince's proclamations, or to misuse his messengers. Shall we vilipend his sacraments, trample on his blood, and say we love him? Shall we swear him all over, open his side with new wounds, and say we love him? Wilt thou deface his pictures, the poor, his living images: spit on his face, by despising his holy rites, give him a new potion of gall, by drunken carouses; draw blood from his heart by oppressions, and yet say thou lovest him? If this be love, there is no hatred. Christ may well say, Give me thy hate, I do not like this love. Lord, let all that love not thee 'be written in the dust; but let those that love thee rejoice in thee,' Ps. 5:11. Blessing be upon all them that love the Lord Jesus.

'Therefore that holy thing which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God.' This one sentence confutes all the heresies of the world concerning Christ, and directs our faith to believe three things.

1. A duplicity of natures. 2. A real distinction of them. 3. A personal union in Christ.

1. That there is a duplicity of natures, with a verity and subsistence of them both, the words evince: 'That holy thing which shall be born of thee,' there is one nature, 'shall be called the Son of God,' there is another nature, and both these natures are one person. 'To us a child is born,' Isa. 9:6; there is a nature human; and he shall be called 'The mighty God,' there is a nature divine. 'God sent his Son, made of a woman,' Gal. 4:4. His Son, therefore truly God; made of a woman, therefore truly man. Martian said, he was God, but not man; Arius, he was man, but not God: both their heresies are here convinced. Is there any doubt in vocabitur, he shall be called? Answer: He is God before, but now this person shall be called so: a man is called by his name, yet his name doth not make him a man; they that deny Christ this title, call him out of his name. To be called God is to be acknowledged God: all shall so acknowledge him, either here in a gracious confession, or in a glorious confusion hereafter. He is as eternal as God, Rev. 1:17; as infinite as God, Matt. 28:20; as omniscient as God, Matt. 9:4; as omnipotent as God, John 5:19. The apostles called upon him, when they cast out devils, Acts 16:18. He called upon none, but expelled them by his own power, 'I command thee to come out.' He creates as God, John 1:3; he commands as God, Matt. 8:26; he forgives as God, Matt. 9:6, Acts 7:60; he sanctifies as God, John 1:12; he glorifies as God, John 10:28, Luke 23:42. He must be believed on as God, John 3:18; loved as God, 1 Cor. 16:22; obeyed as God, Matt. 17:5; prayed to as God, Acts 7:59; praised as God, Rev. 5:13; adored as God, Heb. 1:6, Phil. 2:10. Therefore he is God. He was born as man, bred as man, fed as man, he slept as man, wept as man, sorrowed as man, feared as man, he did suffer as man, bleed as man, die as man, therefore he is man.

2. That there is a real distinction of these two natures, is evident in the words, for the conviction of Eutichees. There is no conversion of the one into the other, as he changed water into wine; no confusion, as meats be mingled in the stomach; no abolition of either, no composition of both; but they remain distinct in one person. 1. The Godhead cannot be the manhood, nor can the manhood be the Godhead. 2. They have distinct wills. 'Not my will, but thy will be done, O Father,' Luke 22:42; plainly differencing the will of a creature from the will of a Creator. 3. The actions in the work of redemption are inseparable, yet distinguishable, 'I lay down my life, and I take it up again, John 10:18. To lay it down, was the action of man, not of God; to take it up, was the action of God, not of man. The humanity is much magnified by the divinity, but the divinity is nothing altered by the humanity.

3. For the personal union, against Nestorius; here be two things, and but one person. As soul and body make but one man, so the Son of God, and the Son of Mary, make but one Christ. The manhood was a nature of itself, it was never of itself a person, but is united to the divinity; as the misletoe hath no root of its own, but grows and lives in the body of an oak. In the Trinity be three persons and one nature, in Christ be two natures and one person. By virtue of this union: 1. The manhood is dignified with incomparable honour, exalted far above the angels. 2. Whatsoever good may be in any creature, that doth not deify it, is without measure poured into the manhood. 3. The participation of office is given it, that Christ is a mediator as man, as well as God, and his flesh is the bread of life. 4. There is a communication of properties: God is said to redeem by his blood, 1 Cor. 2:8, and the Son of man to forgive sins, and judge the world; yet, indeed, only man hath blood, and only God forgiveth sins. Thus, while he was talking with Nicodemus on earth, he was even then in heaven, John 3:13. Such speeches be true in concreto, not in abstracto: as they be both joined together, not as separated one from the other. 5. The manhood being combined with the Godhead, is adored with divine honour; as the honour done to the king, redounds to the crown on his head. Therefore confitemur adorabilem in corpore, non secundum corpus.

It was fit that the Son of God, coming to redeem us, should be made man. 1. That in that nature wherein God was offended, he might be satisfied. 2. The law was to be fulfilled by man, therefore God became man to fulfil it. 3. The price of our redemption was death; but the Son of God could not die till he was made the Son of Mary. 4. God is most high, sinful man most low; how should these be brought together, nisi in uno seipso junxisset ima summis?* God must descend to man, that man might ascend to God. 5. The Mediator must speak between both parties; to man from God, to God for man; therefore it was fit for him to be both God and man. Such was the heinousness of sin, that no nature could have made satisfaction for it, unless it had been joined with God, and sustained by him. Such was the mercy of God, that whereas we were the vilest of all creatures, except the devils, our nature should be exalted above the angels. As he descended to take our human nature, we should strive to come near his divine nature. Without this, we are still miserable; for reprobates are one nature with him, and he with them; yet he is not their Immanuel, not God with them, but rather God against them. By his conception of Mary, he is one flesh with us; by our holy faith in the covenant of grace, we are made one spirit with him.

Ver. 38. 'And Mary said, Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word.' This is her assent; herewith she rests satisfied, and strives not to pick objections out of the particularities; but after this conclusive solution of all difficulties, she makes no further demand. O, happy faith, how fit was her womb to conceive the flesh of God's Son, whose breast had so soon given assent to God's will! It was the Holy Ghost that wrought both these miracles; first, that of faith in her soul, then that of conception in her body. Thomas did first exercise his senses, and then believe; Mary first believed, and then perceived. So soon as she understands the good pleasure of God, she argues no more, but quietly rests herself in a confident expectation; 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord,' &c. The example of her blessed faith affords matter of instruction.

1. When we plainly understand the will of God, let us never dispute against it. All thwart arguments are the arguments of unbelief; and howsoever their colour be a desire of satisfaction, they are plain rebellion. When Eve gave Satan leave to dispute against that known precept, she lost herself and all the world. When God saith, 'Thou shalt not rob thy God,' sacrilege here disputes; 'Thou shalt be subject to powers,' Romish treachery disputes; 'Thou shalt not swear falsely,' Douay disputes against it, yea, flatly contradicts it; with evasion, with reservation, with distinction, thou mayest do it. What devil can be more adverse to the manifest truth? Thus, when we preach the known will of God, our hearers dispute against it; but think what you will, and flatter your hearts with your better reasons, if you do cavil, you are not Christians. In the day of judgment, Christ will give the sentence of decision. Thus I said, and thus you said; which of us two shall have the better? Disobedience is always bad enough, but then intolerable when it hath an advocate. Causa patrocini non bona pejor erit. We all transgress; but if we dispute for transgression, what shall moderate but confusion? That same cæca obedientia, to go blindfold whither God will lead us, to obey without arguing, shall be rewarded. All sciscitations are from pride and self-will; and instead of 'Thy will be done,' why shouldst thou so will it? So God that gives laws, must give account for his laws; and that to his creatures. Hell is entailed to these peremptory questions; respondebitur in tormentis. But in humble obedience, let us resign over ourselves with this holy virgin. 'Behold the servants of the Lord; be it unto us according to his word.'

2. There is no heart of man so faithful, but there be in it some sparks of infidelity; so to believe, as to have no doubts at all, is scarce incident to flesh and blood. Faith is no more destroyed by some doubts, than the day is annihilated by some clouds. There is nothing of Adam left in us, when there is no reluctance of unbelief. It is the perfection of our mortal state to be conquerors, not to be without enemies. Therefore, we run to the Scripture in a devout examination, to the Spirit by humble petition, for a holy wind to disperse these clouds of nature. Therefore, we heap up arguments to our own souls; the more fortifications, the better assurance. We would smite these rebel-thoughts, as Joash should have smitten the earth and Syria, 'till they were consumed,' 2 Kings 13:19; but that final stroke is reserved till the stroke of death. Good reasons, from good grounds, are good helps to establish faith; grounds they cannot be, they may be helps. The faith that hath no other tressels to stand upon but discourse, will soon fall to pieces. I would be able to give a reason of my faith; I would be loth my faith should depend upon my reason.

It is good to be furnished with arguments, for the conviction of gainsayers. These weapons do well in the school; but when I plead my cause with God, I lay down my weapons at his feet: 'Lord, in thy word is my trust.' Faith and reason have their limits; ubi desinit philosophus, incipit medicus: yea, rather ubi desinit philosophus, incipit Christianus. Where reason ends, faith begins. Reason does well at home, like Dinah in her father's house, under her mother's wing; if she once straggle abroad, she is soon ravished by infidelity. Malapert Hagar, that, because she hath gotten a great belly, despiseth her mistress, must be driven out of doors. If saucy reason encroach upon faith, it is as if the foot should invade the office of the hand. Christians are bound to deny themselves; and the chief piece of ourselves is our reason. Let reason get the head, it will prevail with will, and will commands the affections; so this triumvirate shall govern man, and not faith. But as when three ambassadors were sent from Rome, to appease the discord between Nicomedes and Prusias, whereof one was troubled with a megrim in his head, another was lame of the gout, and the third was a fool, Cato said, This embassy hath neither head, nor feet, nor heart; so that man shall neither have a head to conceive the truth, nor a foot to walk in the ways of obedience, nor a heart to receive the comforts of salvation; that suffers reason, will, and affection to usurp upon faith. God will be obeyed, not questioned. The child asks not a reason of his father's command, but doth it. If faith be only at reason's finding, we shall have a fat reason, but a lean faith. Thus God may say the word long enough before we believe it, unless he doth make our reason comprehend it. This is for a Christian to turn back again unto man, and from man to beast. For how justly doth God turn his reason into folly, that hath turned his faith into reason! No reason in the world can comprehend the conception of a virgin, or the incarnation of God, or the creation of the world, or the resurrection of the body; yet he that doth not believe all this, shall never be saved.

3. Faith is best established by the contemplation of the Lord's omnipotency. This was the angel's conclusion to the virgin, 'For with God nothing shall be impossible;' a strong prevention of all doubts, a foundation of all assurance. Here, here fix thyself against all outward assaults, against all inward hesitations. 'He is faithful that hath promised;' he is able to perform what he hath promised. Among men, some are faithful and not able, some are able and not faithful, some are neither; God is both. His promise is not beyond his power; his power never came short of his promise. Promise and performance are distant to us in time; both are at once in the eternal God. Let the eye of our mind look upward; if right forward, or downward, or sideward, everything is a block in our way. David was promised a kingdom, yet saw nothing present but Saul's hate and persecution, so long he looked forward. 'I am old,' saith Zacharias; how should I have a son? he looked downward to his dry loins. The prophet's servant, seeing the Syrian troops, cried, 'Alas! master, how shall we do?' 2 Kings 6:15; he looked round about. His eyes were directed upwards; there he saw relief. While we look upward to Him that hath bidden us believe, there is no point of faith so hard, but it shall go easily down with us. When we shall subject all the powers of our reason and will to the word of our Maker, this is the noble proof of faith. Lord, thou hast charged us to believe our own salvation by Christ. 'Be it unto us according to thy word.' All the doubt is in our believing, not in the performing; give us to believe what thou hast promised. We need not ask thee to perform thy promise; for 'in Jesus Christ all thy promises are Yea and Amen.'

GOD'S ANGER AND MAN'S COMFORT:

TWO SERMONS PREACHED AND PUBLISHED BY THOMAS
ADAMS.*

PUBLISHED IN 1653.

TO THE

MOST HONOURABLE AND CHARITABLE BENEFACTORS,

WHOM GOD HATH HONOURED FOR HIS ALMONERS,

AND SANCTIFIED TO BE HIS DISPENSERS OF THE FRUITS OF CHARITY AND MERCY

TO ME,

IN THIS MY NECESSITOUS AND DECREPIT OLD AGE,

I HUMBLY PRESENT

THIS TESTIMONY OF MY THANKFULNESS,

WITH MY INCESSANT APPRECIATIONS TO THE FATHER OF ALL MERCIES,

TO REWARD THEM FOR IT IN THIS LIFE, AND TO

CROWN THEIR SOULS WITH EVERLASTING JOY AND GLORY
IN THE LIFE TO COME,

THROUGH JESUS CHRIST, OUR LORD. AMEN.

THOMAS ADAMS.

GOD'S ANGER

O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry with thy people that prayeth?—PSALM 80:4.

IT hath been said of war, that it is malum, an evil; but it may be a necessarium, a necessary evil. It is good sometimes to hunt the wolf, though it is better to fodder the sheep. They speak of a drowning man, etiam ad novaculam, that he will rather take hold of a knife than of nothing. A very coward will catch the edge of a naked sword to save his life, though it cut his fingers. Man being cast out of paradise, and that paradise guarded with a sword in the hand of a cherub, durst not attempt a re-entry, because he was guilty. But commonwealths, that have lost any part of their territories or just privileges by foreign invasion and by hostile violence, may justly venture upon the sword, and fairly hope for a recovery, because they are innocent; et hanc picem amoliri gladio. Irene signifies peace; yet the Turk could sacrifice his beauteous Irene to the god of war. If war in itself were utterly unlawful, God would never have accepted this title, 'the Lord of hosts.' Yet in this style he takes such delight, that he is oftener called the God of hosts, in the former Testament, than by any other title. In those two prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah, it is given to him no less than one hundred and thirty times.

All creatures are mustered, and trained, and put into garrison, or brought forth into the field, by his command. Which way can we look beside his armies? If upward into heaven, there is a band of soldiers, even a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, Luke 2:13. If to the lower heavens, there is a band of soldiers, Gen 2:1; it was universa militia cæli, to which those idolaters burnt incense. On the earth, not only men are marshalled to his service; so Israel was called the 'host of the living God;' but even the brute creatures are ranged in arrays. So God did levy a band of flies against the Egyptians; and a band of frogs that marched into their bedchambers. He hath troops of locusts, Prov. 30:27, and armies of caterpillars. Not only the chariots and horsemen of heaven to defend his prophet; but even the basest, the most indocible, and despicable creatures, wherewith to confound his enemies. If Goliath stalk forth to defile* the God of Israel, he shall be confuted with a pebble. If Herod swells up to a god, God will set his vermin on him, and all the king's guard cannot save him from them. You have heard of rats that could not be beaten off till they had destroyed that covetous prelate, and of the fly that killed Pope Adrian. God hath more ways to punish than he hath creatures.

The Lord God of hosts is not properly a title of creation, but of providence. All creatures have their existence from God as their Maker; but so have they also their order from him as their Governor. It refers not so much to their being as to their marshalling; not to their natural but militant estate; not only as creatures do they owe him for their making, but as they are soldiers for their managing. Their order is warlike, and they serve under the colours of the Almighty. So that here, God would be respected, not as a creator, but as a general. His anger, therefore, seems so much the more fearful, as it is presented to us under so great a title, 'the Lord God of hosts is angry.' They talk of Tamerlane, that he could daunt his enemies with the very look of his countenance: Oh! then what terror dwells in the countenance of the offended God! The reprobates shall call to the rocks to hide them from the wrath of the Lamb, Rev. 6:16. If ira agni doth so affright them, how terrible is ira leonis, the wrath of the lion? It may justly trouble us all to hear that the Lord, the Lord God of hosts, is angry; in the sense whereof the prophet breaks forth here into this expostulation, 'O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry with thy people that prayeth?' Wherein we have five propositions or inferences naturally arising out of the text.

I. That God may be angry: for that is manifestly implied in the text, 'God is angry.'

II. That his anger may last a great while: 'O Lord, how long wilt thou be angry?'

III. That his anger may extend to the whole nation: 'how long wilt thou be angry with thy people?' all the people.

IV. That his anger may fall upon his own people, even his peculiar and chosen flock: 'how long wilt thou be angry with thy people?'

V. That his anger may dwell upon them in their devotions, and not be removed by their very prayers: 'how long wilt thou be angry with thy people that prayeth?' Yea, against their prayer?

Now, God is never angry without a cause; he is no froward God, of no tetchy and pettish nature; a cause there must be, or he would never be angry. There can be no cause but sin; we never read that God was angry for anything else. Some he hath corrected without respect unto sin, as Job; but he was never angry with any man but for the sin of that man. It is the sin of the people that hath thus grieved God; and it is the anger of God that hath thus grieved the people. Sin must be supposed to run along with his anger, throughout the text, as the ecliptic line does through the zodiac.

1. If it were not for sin, God would not be angry.
2. If it were not for the continuance of sin, he would not be so long angry.
3. If it were not for the universality of sin, he would not be angry with the whole people.
4. If it were not for the unnatural ingratitude of sin, he would not be angry with his own people.
5. If it were not for the base hypocrisy of sin, he would not be angry with his people that prayeth.

Thus, then, the argument lies fair and plain before us:-

1. It is sin that makes God angry.

2. It is the continuance of sin that makes him long angry.

3. It is the generality of sin that makes him angry with the whole people.

4. It is the unthankfulness of sin, or the sin of unthankfulness, that makes him angry with his own people.

5. Lastly; It is the hypocrisy of sin, or the sin of hypocrisy, that makes him so long angry with his own people that prayeth.

I. We provoke him by our rebellions, and he is angry.

II. We continue our provocations against him, and he is long angry.

III. We provoke him universally, and so he is angry with us all; not with some offenders here and there, but with the whole people.

IV. We provoke him by our unkindness; for whom he hath done so much good, and upon whom he has heaped so many blessings; and so he is angry with his own people.

V. Lastly; We provoke him by our dissimulations; approaching to him with our lips, and keeping back our hearts; we pray unto him, and yet live against him; we call upon his name, and rebel against his will; and so he is angry, and long angry, and long angry with the whole people, and long angry with his own people, and long angry with his own people that prayeth.

I. God may be angry; and sin is the cause of his anger; that is the first proposition. Man may be angry without sin, not without perturbation; God is angry without either perturbation or sin. His anger is in his nature, not by anthropopathy; but properly, being his corrective justice, or his vindicative justice. Iratus videtur, quia tanquam iratus operatur. Our anger is a most impotent passion; his a most clear, free, and just operation. By this affection in ourselves, we may guess at the perfection that is in God. The dissolute securitans think that God doth but smile at the absurdities of men; that ludit in humanis; that their drunkenness and adulteries rather make him merry than angry. Like some carnal father, that laughs at the ridiculous behaviour of his children, to whom their wanton speeches and actions are but a pleasure, and in which he rather encourageth than chides. Indeed, God is said to laugh, Ps. 2:4. He that sits in heaven, laughs them to scorn; but woe be to the man at whose fooleries God laughs. It is a dissembling falsehood in man to smile and betray, as Judas began his treachery with a kiss. Such are likened to those bottled windy drinks, that laugh in a man's face, and then cut his throat. But this laughter in God argues not so much what he does, as what they suffer, when, by frustrating their sinful purposes, he exposeth them to contempt and scorn. Dei ridere, est hominem ludibrio exponere. If a little ant, creeping out of a molehill, should march forth, and proffer to wrestle with a giant, there were yet some proportion in this challenge; but there is none of a finite power with an infinite. Audacious sinners, that dare provoke the Lord of hosts! What are all the armies and forces of tyrants, to oppose the omnipotent God? He will make a feast of them for the fowls of the air, whom he invites to the flesh of captains, and to the flesh of kings, Rev. 19:18. Let earth and hell conspire, let there be a confederate band of men and devils; how easily can he command the one to their dust, and the other to their chains! What power have they either of motion or of being, but from him against whom they fight? Our God is a consuming fire, and he will consume them not only in anger, but in laughter. The catastrophe of all rebellion is but the sarcasmos or bitter scorn of God.

There is no less difference between God's anger and his favour, than between death and life; death in the most dismal horror, and life in the most comfortable sweetness of it. 'In his favour there is life,' Ps. 30:5; death in his anger; for when 'thou art angry all our days are gone,' Ps. 90:9. There is great light given to contraries by their comparison. 'Look first a little upon the favour of God. 'Oh, how excellent is thy loving-kindness, O Lord,' Ps. 36:7. 'Thy saints shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house, and thou wilt make them to drink of the river of thy pleasures.' What follows upon his favour but satisfaction, and peace, and joy, and eternal life? When the deluge of water had defaced that great book of nature, Noah had a copy of every kind of creature with him in that famous library, the ark, out of which they were reprinted to the world. So he that hath the favour of God in the Ark of the Covenant, hath the original copy of all blessings; if they could all have perished, yet so they might be restored. God is the best storehouse, the best treasury. O happy men, that have their estates laid up there! Though friends, goods, and life forsake us, yet if God's gracious countenance shine upon us, that will be life, and goods, and friends unto us. These benefits and comforts flow from his favour.

But, alas! how terrible is his anger! He hath scourged some in very mercy, till they have smarted under his rod. Job complains that 'the terrors of God do fight against him,' Job 6:4; and David says, 'From my youth up, thy terrors have I suffered with a troubled mind,' Ps. 88:15, 16. If he will do thus much in love, what shall be the terrors of his wrath? If he hath drawn blood of his dear ones, what shall be the plague of wilful sinners? If this be the rod of his children, what are the scorpions provided for his enemies? What comfort can any find in all the prosperous fortunes upon earth, with whom God is angry in heaven? If that mighty pagan could apprehend this, he would find small safety in his guard of Janissaries, and less pleasure in his brutish seraglio. It is a vain conceit of that potentate, who, refusing the name of Pius, would be called Felix—happy, not godly. But there can be no felicity without God's blessing; and he will not bless, where he is not blessed. But Sylla, surnamed Felix, accounted it not the least part of his fortunes, that Metellus, surnamed Pius, was his friend. Piety is the best friend to Felicity, though Felicity does not always befriend Piety.

That is but a wretched prosperity upon which God looks in anger. If the sun were wanting, it would be night for all the stars; and if God frown upon a man, for all the glittering honours of this world, he sits in the shadow of death. Let him be never so rich in lands and waters, yet his springs have lost their sweetness, his vines their fruitfulness, his gold hath lost its colour, his precious stones their value and lustre. I mean, the virtue and comfort of all these are gone away with the favour of God. If our house were paved with a floor of gold, and walled with pearls and diamonds, and yet the roof wide open to the violence of heaven, would these shelter us from storms and tempest? Would we like to be so lodged in winter nights? Or were our house roofed with cedar, and the walls hung with arras; yet if the floor be rotten, and under it a bottomless pit, could we sleep in quiet? There can be no safety when God is angry. His wrath may come thundering from heaven, and suddenly sink rebellious sinners into hell; and then where is all their honour? when their mortal part lies in the dishonourable dust, and their immortal part suffers in the inextinguishable fire.

Thus terrible is the anger of God; now what is he angry withal, but sin? That is the perpetual make-bate between God and us; the fuel of the fire of his indignation. 'Your iniquities have separated between you and your God,' Isa. 59:2. For this cause he looks upon us as a stranger, yea, as an enemy; 'but they rebelled, and vexed his Holy Spirit; therefore he was turned to be their enemy, and he fought against them,' Isa. 63:10. But they rebelled: man's occasion of offending God is but a but, a nothing, no cause at all; God's occasion of being angry with men is a therefore, a cause sufficient, and that cause is sin. Search the holy book all over, and you shall never find God angry but for sin. Nor doth the flame of his wrath break out upon every sin, but only when sin grows impudent and past shame, We were wont to say, that reritas non quærit angulos; but now vitium non quærit angulos. It doth that in a bravery, with which the false prophet was threatened, that he should do it in fear, 1 Kings 22:25; it runs from chamber to chamber, from house to house, not to hide itself, but to boast itself. We so provoke the Lord, that we do not only anger him, but are angry with him. If the winds do not blow, and the rain fall, as we would have it; if anything falls out cross to our desires; we even vex at God himself, as if he were bound to wait upon our humours. No marvel if God be angry with us, when we dare to be angry with him, by murmuring at his actions, and calling his providence to question. 'Doest thou well to be angry?' O man, Jonah 4:4. No; it is exceeding ill, and dangerous. We may tremble to think that the pot may fall out with the potter, and man be angry with his Maker. It is this meretricious and shameless forehead of sin that angers God. And in this anger we here find him, but let us not so leave him; and yet the next point tells us that his wrath is not suddenly pacified.

II. He may be long angry. That's the second proposition. Usque quo, Domine! It is not for a fit, like some flash of powder, but may burn long. 'How long, O Lord, wilt thou be angry for ever? and shall thy jealousy burn like fire?' Ps. 79:5. He visits his own Israel with a long dearth; during all those three years of drought and scarcity, God's altar smoked with daily sacrifices, and heaven was solicited with daily prayers, yet still he was angry; and why may not David complain, in this psalm, of that famine? We are not at the first sensible of common evils; in war, dearth, or pestilence, we think only of shifting for ourselves, or finding out convenient refuges, like foxes in a storm, that run to the next burrows, and study not how to remove public judgments. But the continuance of an affliction sends us to God, and calls upon us to ask for a reckoning. An evil that is suddenly gone, is as suddenly forgotten; as men struck in their sleep, cannot quickly find themselves; so the blow doth rather astonish than teach us. But when the burden lies long upon us, we will at last complain of the weight, and seek to ease ourselves.

Indeed, there be some sinners more insensible, more insensate than beasts; if we find the hungriest ox feeding in the meadow, and cannot with many pricks of the goad make him remove from his place, we wonder at his stupidity. Yet the insatiate world-affecters, though God not only affright them with menaces, but even afflict them with many scourges, cannot be gotten from their covetous practices. So long as they can by any means grow wealthy, they will not believe that God is angry with them. As if there were none that have more than heart could wish; yet live all this while in the sphere of God's indignation. We can read God's wrath in a storm, not in a calm; yet he may most be angry, when he least expresseth it. 'My jealousy shall depart from thee, and I will no more be angry with thee,' Ezek. 16:42. Oh! that is the height of his displeasure. The prophet speaks of a true peace, Jer. 14:13. True were a needless epithet, if there were not a false peace in our carnal hearts. How fondly doth the secure sinner flatter himself, in the conceit of his own happiness! All is well at home; he quarrels not with himself, for he denies himself no sensual pleasure. God quarrels not with him, he feels no check of a chiding conscience, he sees no frown of an angry judge; nothing but prosperity shines upon him. He sees no difference in the face of heaven, whatsoever he says or does: the same entertainment is given to his blasphemies, as to his prayers. Sure he thinks himself in God's books above other men. And so he is indeed. In God's book of debts; in God's book of arrearages; in God's book of judgments: so he is far in God's books. He owes such men a payment, and they shall have it. Alas! this is not the sinner's peace, but stupidity; not the Maker's favour, but his fury. All this while he is very angry, though he suspends the execution of his wrath. Thus long sin lies like a sleeping bandog at the door of their hearts; they look upon the cur as if he would never wake; or if he did, yet as if he were so chained, and clogged, and muzzled that he could never hurt them. But when once God rouseth him, then have at their throats; then they shall feel what it is to have lived so long in the anger of God; when the Almighty shall put himself into the fearful forms of vengeance, and the everlasting gulf of fire shall open to receive them into intolerable burnings, the merciless devils seizing on their guilty souls, and afflicting them with heavy torments.

It is some favour when we have the respite to cry, 'How long, Lord, wilt thou be angry with us?' He is not thoroughly angry with us when he suffers us to breathe forth this expostulation. There is some hope of remedy when we once complain of our sickness. It is not change of climate, but change of diet, that recovers us; when we grow to forbear the surfeits of sin, there is a fair possibility of comfort. Yet

God may be long angry, and long continue sensible testimonies of his anger. 'Forty years long was I grieved with this generation,' Ps. 95:10. He had smitten Israel with divers punishments, and threatened them with more grievous calamities; that 'every man should eat the flesh of his own arm; Manasseh, Ephraim; and Ephraim, Manasseh; and they both against Judah,' Isa. 9:20, 21. And yet he had not done with them; his 'anger was not turned away, but his hand was stretched out still.' David's pestilence of three days was a storm soon blown over, though it were bitter for the time; but God's displeasure hath dwelt longer upon us.

But how, then, doth the prophet say 'that he retaineth not anger?' Well enough; for he never retaineth it one moment longer than we retain the cause of it. So soon as we ever cease sinning against him, he ceaseth to be angry with us. After David's humiliation and sacrifice, the angel struck not one blow more with the sword of pestilence. He measures out the length of his anger by the continuance of our rebellions; so that, if we expostulate with him, 'Lord, how long wilt thou be angry with us?' he replies, 'Oh, ye sons of men, how long will ye be rebellious against me?' Let us not look that the Lord should begin first; that his pardon should prevent our repentance. There is great reason that he who hath done the first offence should be first in making the peace. Every day we expect comfort from God, and every day God expects conversion from us. Every week we look for some abatement in the bills, and every week God looks for some abatement of our sins, or amendment of our lives. So long as we continue guilty, it is in vain to cry, 'O, Lord, how long wilt thou be angry?' Our hard hearts are not yet broken with remorse; alas! what can be done to break them? 'The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars,' Ps. 29:5; he breaketh the mountains, Ps. 18:7; he breaketh the heavens, Isa. 64:1; he breaketh the stones, 1 Kings 19:11; and yet his word cannot break our hearts. But if he cannot break us with the rod of affliction, he will break us with a rod of iron, Ps. 2:9, and 'dash us in pieces like a potter's vessel.'

God is long patient before he is long angry; why should he not be long angry before he be appeased? He is not easily provoked; why should he be so easily pacified? Yet so propense to mercy is our gracious Father, that the fire which was long a kindling is soon quenched. His anger, which is not blown into a flame without many and long continued sins, is yet put out with a few penitent tears. When our houses are burning, it were but foolish to cry out, 'We are undone, the fire rageth,' and we all the while forbear to cast on water. The usque quo of God's anger waits for the quousque of our repentance. He will not give over striking till we fall a weeping; and we may do well to weep before him, seeing we did ill to sin against him. His anger doth now long offend us, but our wickedness did far longer offend him. We have provoked him many years, and shall not his wrath burn many days? Still it flameth; let us make haste to bring our buckets of water, filled at the cistern of our eyes, and derived from the fountain of our hearts, to quench it. Let no hands be wanting to this business; for if some bring in the water of tears, while others cast in the fuel of sins, this fire will burn still. But, from the highest to the lowest, let us come in with repentance; and that all of us, even the whole people, for so far God's wrath extendeth.

III. God may be angry with the whole people; which is the third proposition. He hath been angry with a whole family, with a whole army, with a whole city, with a whole country, with the whole earth. With a whole family; so he cursed the house of Jeroboam, that 'him that dieth in the city the dogs shall eat, and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat.' With a whole army; so he slew of Sennacherib's host in one night one hundred and eighty-five thousand. With a whole city; so the city of Jericho was cursed with a universal desolation, never to be re-edified without the ruin of the builder. With a whole country; so Saul was charged to destroy Amalek, man and woman, infant and suckling, sheep and oxen, and all that belonged to them. With the whole earth; so when it was become corrupt he drowned it with a flood. Yet observe how God hath qualified his wrath; with his hand of favour snatching out some from his hand of anger. When he cursed the whole family of Jeroboam, he excepted Abijah. When he doomed to death the whole city of Jericho, he excepted the family of Rahab. When his wrath burned Sodom, he excepted the family of Lot. When his anger drowned the whole world in a deluge, yet his mercy excepted Noah and his ordinary household. But his anger is very grievous when it extends to the whole people. 'Through the wrath of the Lord of hosts the whole land is darkened,' Isa. 9:19.

What makes him thus universally angry with us, but the universality of our sins against him? When the passengers ask, 'Wherefore hath the Lord done thus to this great city?' the answer is made, 'Because they forsook the covenant of the Lord, and worshipped other gods,' Jer. 22:8, 9. To such a fearful height may the sins of the children bring the mother, that that church, which now enjoys such abundance of truth and peace, may be poisoned with heresy and wounded with schism, and suffer an utter dereliction. The whole people is guilty of sin; and why, for their sins, may not God be angry with the whole people, yea, and long angry too? for it will be very long before that fault be amended which hath so long been committed.

God came to low conditions in the behalf of Sodom; Abraham brought him down to ten. But he came to lower conditions in the behalf of Jerusalem; he brought himself down to one: 'See if you can find a man, if there be any that seeketh the truth in the whole city, and I will pardon it,' Jer. 5:1. Oh, how epidemical is that wickedness where not one escapeth the corruption! We have found the Lord angry enough with a whole people for the sin of one man: 'Lord, hath one man sinned, and wilt thou be angry with the whole congregation?' Num. 16:22. No; God's vengeance, when it is the hottest, makes difference of offenders, and knows how to distinguish between the heads of a faction and the train. Though neither be faultless, yet the one is plagued, the other pardoned. 'Depart from the tents of these wicked men, lest ye be consumed in their sins.' So soon as the innocent are severed, the guilty perish. One Achan sins, all Israel suffers. One David sins in pride, seventy thousand of his subjects suffer in the plague. One Saul slew the Gibeonites, three years' dearth lies upon the Israelites for it. The blood of those Canaanites, shed against covenant almost forty years before by the then king, is now called for of the whole people. They had all sins enough, but God fixeth his eye of anger upon this. Every sin hath a tongue, but that of blood outcries them all; and if justice do not revenge the murder of one, God will require it of the whole nation. When seven of Saul's sons were hanged up, God was entreated for the land, 2 Sam. 21:14. Then 'shall the clouds drop fatness, and the earth run forth into plenty: then shall the valleys stand thick with corn, and the little hills rejoice on every side.' Some drops of blood shed in justice procure large showers from heaven. A few carcasses laid in their graves are a rich compost to the earth. There can be no peace where blood cries unheard, unregarded; but when it is expiated by the blood of the offenders, there will be a cessation of the judgments. 'Phinehas executed judgment, and the plague stayed.' One contrary is ever cured by another; take away the cause, and the effect will cease. Prayer is very powerful, but doing of justice more available. The whole congregation were at their prayers, and those prayers were steeped in tears; yet still the plague raged and God's anger continued. But when Phinehas had run those two adulterers through with his javelin in the act of their sin, the plague was stayed. So blessed a thing is it for any nation that justice is impartially executed.

Thus the universality of sin calls for the universality of repentance, or else it will provoke God's anger to strike us with universal judgments. If the whole people be guilty, the whole people must fall to deprecation. Such was the Ninevite's repentance, 'every man turning from his evil ways,' John 3:8. We have sinned, even the whole nation; and, as if we had not sins enough of our own, we borrow of our neighbour. What nation under heaven do we trade withal, from whom the sins of that nation are not brought hither? And those are merchandises that might well be spared. Are we all in the transgression, and do we lay the burden of repentance upon some few? If we expostulate with God, 'Lord, hath one man sinned, and wilt thou be wroth with the whole congregation?' may he not much more justly expostulate with us, 'Hath the whole congregation sinned, and is it enough for one man to repent?' Is the whole garment foul, and must only the skirts be washed? Is the whole building ruinous, and do we think it a sufficient reparation to patch up one corner of it? No; the plaster of our repentance must be fully as large as the orifice of our wickedness, or we cannot be healed. But still God is angry with us, yea, though we were his own people. For—

IV. God may be angry with his own people; which is the fourth proposition. 'I will visit their sins with a rod, and their iniquity with scourges; but my mercy will I not utterly take from them,' Ps. 89:33. Though he do not take his mercy from them, yet he may be angry with them. He is our Father, and never did father in sweeter terms entertain the dearest treasure of his blood than God doth us, when he vouchsafes to call us his people. Yet, did you never see a father angry with his child? Indeed, there is great difference between that wrath of God which is toward his own people and that which comes upon the children of disobedience, Col. 3:6. They differ three ways.

1. In respect of continuance. His anger upon reprobates is eternal, not extinguished with their bloods, but pursuing them from earth to hell. To his people it is but temporary, it lasts but a moment, 'Weeping may endure for a night, but joy comes in the morning,' Ps. 30:5. 'He will not always chide, nor will he keep his anger for ever,' Ps. 103:9. When he was very angry with his idolatrous Israel, Moses does but put him in mind that they were his own people, and he was pacified, Ex. 32:11. 'For a moment, in a little wrath, he hides his face from us.' Isa. 54:8. 'Rejoice not against me, O my enemy, for though I fall I shall rise again,' Mic. 7:8. But for the wicked 'his wrath abideth on them,' John 3:36.

2. In respect of the measure. It is milder towards his own people than to others. For the unrighteous he proportions his judgments, not to their strengths, but to their deserts. For his own people he proportions his corrections, not to their deserts, but to their strengths. For the former he minds not what they can bear by their powers, but what they have deserved by their sins. For the other he considers not what their sins deserve, but what their spirits can sustain. His most bitter wrath to his people is always sweetened with his mercy. 'Thou wast a God that forgavest them, though thou tookest vengeance of their inventions,' Ps. 99:8. He brings a scourge in one hand, and a pardon in the other; and while he draws blood of the flesh, he brings peace to the soul.

3. In regard to the end. The wicked are vessels of wrath, Rom. 9:22; and, as their sin makes them fit for God's anger, so his anger makes them fit for destruction. But for his own people, 'they are chastened of the Lord, that they might not be condemned with the world,' 1 Cor. 11:32. Whether he inflict on them punishments for sin, or suffer them to fall into sins for punishments, yet all shall work to their good. His corrections are but medicines, 'bringing forth the quiet fruit of righteousness,' Heb. 12:11. He lets them fall into some heinous crime, but it is to waken their repentance. Small spots on a garment are not minded; we seldom are so curious as to wash them out. But when a great spot comes, a foul stain, we then scour and cleanse it, to get out that, and so we get out all the little spots too. Sins of a lesser size never trouble us, we mind not the washing of them with a few sorrowful tears; but when a great sin comes, and disquiets the conscience, then repentance, that old laundress, is called for, and in that larder we wash out both the great offences and the rest. So God suffers us to fall into some gross and grievous sin, as a father suffers his little child to burn his finger in a flame, that his whole body may not fall into the fire.

All these differences are expressed by the prophet Isaiah. (1.) For the time. 'Doth the ploughman plough all the day to sow?' Isa. 28:24. God doth not continue ploughing all day long furrows upon our backs, but when he hath broken up the fallow ground of our hearts, he then sows in the seed of his comfort, (2.) For the measure. 'Hath he plagued Israel, as he hath plagued the enemies of Israel?' Isa. 27:7. He smites his Israel in the branches and in the bunches, cuts down some of his superstitious boughs, and plucks off clusters of her rotten grapes; but the wicked he smites at the very root. (3.) For the end. The furnace of his wrath shall but purge away our dross, and make us pure metal, fit for the stamp of his own image.

Yet, for all this, God hath been grievously angry with his own people. Yea, their sins anger him most of all, because, together with wickedness, there is unkindness. As dearly as he loves them, their sins may provoke him. Our interest in God is so far from excusing our iniquities, that it aggravates them. Of all others, the transgression of his own people shall not pass unpunished. The nearer we are to him, the nearer do our offences touch him; as a man more takes to heart a discourtesy done by a friend than a great injury by a stranger. Pagans may blaspheme, and bezzle, and defile the marriage bed, and yet God let them alone; but he will not endure these sins in his own people. The more he loves us, the greater should be our love to him. Now, love and unkindness cannot stand together. If we revolt from our Maker, as Absalom thought Hushai had renounced David, may he not justly expostulate with us, 'Is this thy kindness to thy friend?' There is no such irksome disobedience as where God looks for service. 'He came unto his own, and his own received him not,' John 1:11. Oh! that could not choose but trouble him! As Demades said to Philip of Macedon, and at a time when he well deserved it, Cum fortuna tibi Agamemnonis personam imposuerit, nonne pudet te Thersitem agere? When fortune hath made thee an Agamemnon, art thou not ashamed to play Thersites? When God hath honoured us for his own people, with the noble name of Christians, is it not a shame for us to play the pagans? 'Happy are the people that are in such a case, yea, blessed are the people that have the Lord for their God.' Yet that people may so far anger him that he will take away, not only their temporal, but even their spiritual happiness. Those seven churches of Asia were God's own people, yet the gospel was not fastened to their territories, as the old Romans pinioned their goddess Victoria, or their apish posterity do the Catholic faith, to their own infallible chair. But as they had a time to breathe, so they had a time to expire; and so hath my fourth proposition. There is but one gradation more.

V. God may be angry with his people that prayeth. Wherein we have two main observations. First, The wonder that God will be angry at our prayers. Second, The answer which resolves the wonder, shewing why our very prayers may anger him. Either of these is backed with three circumstances. 1. For the wonder that 'God is angry with his people that prayeth.'

1. All the other conclusions are easily granted. God may be angry, and angry very long, and angry with the whole people, and angry with his own people: all this because of their sins; but that he should be angry at their prayers, this is the wonder. He hath commanded us to pray, and will he be offended with us for doing his command? Angry against us for our prayer! He hath commanded us to prayer as the only means to assuage his anger; and yet, is he angry at our prayer? Phinehas prayed, and his anger was pacified, Ps. 106:30; Aaron prayed, and the plague ceased; and will he now be angry with the people that prayeth? He is a God that heareth prayer: 'O thou that hearest prayer, to thee shall all flesh come,' Ps. 65:2; and does he now reject prayer? He hath so stiled his own house, oratorium, the house of prayer; and to them that pray unto him in his house he hath promised peace, saying, 'In this house will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts,' Hag. 2:9. Peace and wrath are contraries; how should prayer procure peace, when God is angry at prayer? Prayer is so noble, that under it is comprehended the whole worship of God: 'Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved,' Rom. 10:13; and yet will God be angry at the prayer of his people? It is a great honour that God will vouchsafe to speak unto man, but a far greater honour that man is allowed to speak unto God; the very angels stand in admiration of it; and yet what comfort is there in that, when God is angry at the prayer of his people? What blessing is there which our prayers cannot infeoff us in? We send up prayer to God with the same confidence that Adonijah sent Bathsheba to Solomon: 'the king will deny thee nothing;' and will God be angry at prayer? It is the only means we have to pacify him, prayer; and shall our prayer anger him? Alas! what hope is left us, when God is angry at prayer? This hath often turned away his wrath, and does it now incense his wrath? If we should not pray, he would then be angry; and when we do pray, is he angry too? What! neither way pleased? What is the reason why there is so much empty cask in God's cellar, but for want of prayer? 'Ye have not, because ye ask not,' James 4:2; and shall not prayer obtain favour? 'O Lord, what shall I say,' it was the complaint of Joshua, Josh. 7:8, 'when Israel turneth their backs before their enemies?' So, what shall we say, what shall we do, when God turneth back our prayers? Why is it called the throne of grace, before which we present our prayers, if that throne send forth nothing but beams of wrath? We look for grace, and a favourable audience of our petitions; but, alas! what shall become of us, when God is angry at our very prayers?

2. How wonderful is the power of prayer! 'Let me alone,' saith God (Exod. 32:10) to Moses; who would look for such a word from God to man, as Let me alone? As yet Moses had said nothing; before he opens his mouth, God prevents his importunity, as foreseeing the holy violence of prayer. Moses stood trembling before the majesty of his Maker, as fearing his dire revenge; and yet that Maker doth, after a sort, solicit Moses for leave to revenge, 'Let me alone.' As it was afterwards said of Christ concerning some places, 'He could do no miracles there, because of their unbelief,' so one would think that God could do no judgments here, because of Moses's faith. 'Let me alone.' Why? Can that resist God? Yes, prayer can resist him. Such is his mercy, that he hath, as it were, obliged his power to the faith of our prayer. He enables us to resist himself: 'scipsum vincit.' The fervent prayer of the faithful can bind the hands of the Almighty. What is there that God can do which prayer cannot do? O mighty, I had almost said almighty, prayer! What a hand is that which can hold omnipotence! What wings are those which can overtake infiniteness! Yet, alas! we now mourn over prayer as David did over Jonathan: 'How are the mighty fallen!' 2 Sam. 1:25. Prayer hath lost her force with God when God is angry with prayer. Her wings are clipped that she cannot mount. Her bow is broken; she cannot shoot an arrow that reaches the mark. She is become a widow, as it was lamented over Jerusalem (Lam. 1:1), desolate and solitary, that was a princess among the provinces, and a queen among the nations. She sits weeping in the dust, and hath almost forgot the use of speech. She mourns not so much for Mary's abstulerunt Dominum, for she knows where to find him; as that our sins abstulerunt Domini favorem, and she knows not how to pacify him. And how should she, when God is angry with his people that prayeth? Where is the strength of this Samson? What is become of that power, which was wont to command heaven and earth? The visible heavens have been opened by prayer, for so Elias brought down rain, James 5:18. The invisible heavens have been opened by prayer, for so the penitent malefactor got from the cross to paradise. So Stephen saw the 'heavens opened, and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God,' Acts 7:56. Omnia vincentem vincit. It was wont to be an especial favourite of God; but now, alas! it is cast out of favour, for God is angry with prayer. 'Thou hast covered thyself with a thick cloud, that our prayer should not pass through,' Lam. 3:44. This is a woful condition of our souls, when the Lord is angry at our prayers; when he will not hear them, nor answer them; it is a cause of sadness in us, but much more when he is angry with them. 'Therefore will I deal in fury; though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them,' Ezek. 8:18. This is fury indeed: before the ancients of Israel had said, 'The Lord seeth us not, he hath forsaken the earth.' There they deny God eyes, and here he denies them ears. A burning wrath, as the original hath it: 'How long wilt thou smoke against the prayer of thy people?'

3. And of thy people. This increaseth the wonder. For God to stop his ears against the prayers of the heathen, to reject the petitions of idolaters, to despise a devotion done before images and painted blocks, is no marvel. For they dishonour him in their prayers, and God will be angry with anything that eclipseth his glory. But he does not use to slight those that serve him, and continue in his holy worship. It is strange that he should be angry at the prayer of his own people. Angry with those whom he hath chosen, angry with them long, and angry with them at their very prayers. This must be some extraordinary wrath; and so you have all the circumstances that may advance the wonder.

Now for the answer, that takes off this admiration, and satisfies us with some reasons why God may be angry with his people that prayeth. God is never angry at his people without a cause, and it must be a great cause that makes him angry with them in their devotions; whereof we have three considerations.

First, There may be infirmities enough in our very prayers to make them unacceptable. As if they be Exanimæ, without life and soul: when the heart knows not what the tongue utters. Or Perfunctoriæ, for God will have none of those prayers that come out of feigned lips. Or Tentativæ, for they that will petere tentando, tempt God in prayer, shall go without. Or Fluctuantes, of a wild and wandering discourse, ranging up and down, which the apostle calls 'beating the air,' as huntsmen beat the bushes, and as Saul sought his father's asses. Such prayers will not stumble upon the kingdom of heaven. Or if they be Preproperæ, run over in haste, as some use to chop up their prayers and think long till they have done. But they that pray in such haste shall be heard at leisure. Or sine fiduciâ; the faithless man had as good hold his peace as pray; he may babble, but prays not; he prays ineffectually, and receives not. He may lift up his hands, but he does not lift up his heart. Only the prayer of the righteous availeth, and only the believer is righteous. But the formal devotion of a faithless man is not worth the crust of bread which he asks. Or sine humilitate, so the pharisee's prayer was not truly supplicatio, but superlatio. A presumptuous prayer profanes the name of God instead of adoring it. All, or any, of these defects may mar the success of our prayers.

Secondly, But such is the mercy of our God, that he will wink at many infirmities in our devotions, and will not reject the prayer of an honest heart because of some weakness in the petitioner. It must be a greater cause than all this that makes God angry at our prayers. In general it is sin. 'We know that God heareth not sinners: but if a man doth his will, him he heareth,' John 9:31. 'If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear my prayer,' Ps. 66:18. They be our sins that block up the passage of our prayers. It is not the vast distance between heaven and earth, not the thick clouds, not the threefold regions, not the sevenfold orbs, not the firmament of heaven, but only our sins, that hinder the ascent of our prayers. 'When ye make many prayers I will not hear you.' Why? 'Because your hands are full of blood,' Isa. 1:15. God will have none of those petitions that are presented to him with bloody hands. Our prayers are our bills of exchange, and they are allowed in heaven, when they come from pious and humble hearts; but, if we be broken in our religion, and bankrupts of grace, God will protest our bills; he will not be won with our prayers. Thus sin is the general cause.

Thirdly, In particular, it is the hypocrisy of sin, or the sin of hypocrisy, that makes God so angry with our prayers. When we honour him with the prostration of our bodies, and solicit him with the petitions of our lips, and yet still dishonour him in our sinful lives, is not this hypocrisy? When we speak before him in the temple as suppliants, and sin against him abroad as rebels, is not this hypocrisy? Like the outlaw that sues to the king for a pardon, and yet resolves to live in rebellion. We will not part with our beloved sins, and yet beg the removal of judgments; will not this dissimulation make God angry with our very prayers? If we shall, Judas-like, kiss his throne with the devotion of our lips, and betray his honour with the wicked works of our hands, should he not be angry at our prayers? We make as if we did lift up our hands unto him, but, indeed, we stretch out our hands against him; if this be prayer, it is such a one as deserves anger. Fear can make the devil himself fall to his prayers: 'I beseech thee, torment me not,' Luke 8:28. Another request he made which Christ granted; but it was in wrath, not in favour. The pride of our hearts, the covetousness of our hands, the blasphemy of our mouths, the uncleanness of our lusts, the wickedness of our lives; these make God angry with our prayers. If we could be thoroughly angry with our sins, God would cease to be angry with our prayers; but, so long as we run on in those sinful courses upon earth, let us look for no favourable audience from heaven. Do good and continue it, and then pray for good, and have it. It hath been said, 'Loquere ut te videam,' Speak, that I may see thee; so saith God to man, 'Operare ut te videam,'* Work, that I may hear thee. If we dishonour God's name by our oaths and blasphemies, and upon every trivial occasion toss it in our profane mouths, in vain we pray, 'Sanctificetur nomen tuum:' Hallowed be thy name. If we hear the gospel preached, and receive no instruction by it, nor give any regard or obedience to it, in vain we pray, 'Adveniat regnum tuum:' Thy kingdom come. If the current of our affections and actions runs cross to the will of God, in vain we pray, 'Fiat voluntas tua:' Thy will be done. If we extort the bread of the poor out of their hands, or seek to live by violence or oppression, in vain we pray, 'Panem nostrum da nobis quotidianum:' Give us this day our daily bread; for this is to attempt to have it, whether God will or no; he does not give it, but we snatch it. While we are indulgent to our darling sins, and will not part with the dear delights of our bloods, in vain we pray, 'Dimitte nobis debita nostra:' Forgive us our trespasses. While we seek to revenge our wrongs upon others, and bear malice in our hearts, our 'Sicut nos dimittimus,' as we forgive them that trespass against us, doth but beg for vengeance on our own heads. All the while that we listen to the suggestions of Satan, and like the allurements of the world, and awaken our own lusts to tempt ourselves, it is but a mockery to pray, 'In tentationem ne nos inducas:' Lead us not into temptation. While we seek that which is evil, and run with greediness into evil, in vain we pray, 'Libera nos a malo' Deliver us from evil. We do but flatter God, and compliment with him, when we conclude with, 'Tuum est regnum, potentia, et gloria' Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory; for it is our own glory we seek after, not his. All this cannot keep him from being angry with our prayers. So long as his people rebelleth, he will be angry with his people that prayeth. For some use:—

If God be angry with them that pray, what will he be with them who do not pray? with them that break his laws, and never cry him mercy? with them that live in wickedness, and never ask him forgiveness? 'The ungodly call not upon the Lord,' Ps. 14:4; will he not be much more angry with them? God is not in all their thoughts, but they are in the thoughts of God. He thinks of them with indignation, and will remember them to their cost. 'Remember, O Lord, the children of Edom in the day of Jerusalem,' Ps. 137:7. Yes, he will remember them in the day of their destruction.

If God be sometimes angry at our prayers, how will he brook our curses? If he beat back our petitions, how will he take vengeance on our blasphemies? 'Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing,' James 3:16; but God will not accept of a blessing from a mouth that is used to cursing. If he may be so angry with a people that prayeth, what will his wrath do to a people that sweareth? Think this, ye that, if it were possible, would swear God out of his throne, and the Judge of all the world out of his tribunal, your very prayers are abominable; your blasphemous breaths have put a stink into all your sacrifices. That tongue is fit for nothing but flames, which so flameth with oaths and execrations. Your prayers cannot be heard by reason of your sins, but your blasphemies shall be heard and plagued notwithstanding your prayers. If the instrument gives a harsh sound, there is trouble instead of music; a jarring organ grates the ears rather than delights them. Our sins have put all our instruments out of tune, and for them God is angry at our very prayers.

There is no way to take off his anger, but by turning from our wickedness. If we break off our sins, 'he will leave a blessing behind him, even a meat-offering, and a drink-offering to the Lord,' Joel. 2:14; he will both give and take our sacrifice. Let us do thus, and 'prove him whether he will not open the windows of heaven,' Mal. 3:10. Our repentance and our righteousness shall open heaven, so that our prayers may go up for a blessing, and a blessing shall come down upon our prayers. Prayer is vox fidei, as John Baptist was vox Christi: if we mourn and do not pray, our faith hath lost her voice; and prayer without faith, is John without Christ, a voice without a word. Faith is the soul, and repentance is the life of prayer, and a prayer without them hath neither life nor soul. If we believe not, we are yet in our sins; if we repent not, our sins are yet in us; and so long as this state continueth, no wonder if God be angry with his people that prayeth. But first, 'will I wash my hands in innocency, and then will I compass thine altar,' Ps. 26:6. 'Then shall my prayer be set before thee as incense, and the lifting up of my hands, like the evening sacrifice,' Ps. 141:2. When, with the sword of severe and impartial repentance, we have cut the throat of our sins, and done execution upon our lusts, then let us solicit heaven with our prayers; then pray, and speed; then come, and welcome; no anger, but all mercy then. Then the courtiers about the King in heaven, shall make room for prayers. Then the Prince himself will take our prayer into his own hand, and with a gracious mediation present it to his Father. Then 'mittimus proces et lacrymas ad Deum legatos.' Then is that court of audience ready to receive and answer our ambassadors; which be our prayers and our tears. Then Saint John sees twelve gates in heaven, all open, and all day open, to entertain such suitors.

This is our refuge, and that a sure one. Although the enemy begirts the city with never so strait a siege, and stop up all the passages, yet he cannot block up the passage to heaven. So long as that is open, and God in league with us, there may be relief and succour had from thence by prayer. Faith is a better engineer than was Dædalus; and yet he could make a shift to frame wings, with which he made an escape over those high walls wherein he was imprisoned. 'Restat iter cælo, tentabimus ire.' Let Pharaoh be behind, and the Red Sea before, the high rocks and mountains on every side, yet Israel can find a way for all that. When there is no other way to escape danger, a Christian can go by heaven, and avoid all by prayer. As it is the heaviest malediction, 'Let his prayer be turned into sin:' so it is a happy blessing when our sin is turned into prayer, when sin is so done away that prayer may take place. Then shall Jacob's ladder be never empty of angels; our prayers ascending to heaven, and God's blessing descending on us. Then shall prayer disburden our hearts of all sorrows, and God shall fill them with his sweet comforts. Then shall we sing with cheerful voices, 'Blessed be the Lord, that hath not turned away our prayer from him, nor his mercy from us,' Ps. 66:20. Amen.

MAN'S COMFORT

In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul.—PSALM 94:19

HEAVEN is a place of infinite glory and joy; yet there is little joy or glory in the way thither. The passage rather lies through much tribulation; so troublesome a gallery leads to so happy a bedchamber. There is not a soul in the cluster of mankind exempted from sorrow, much less shall those grapes escape pressing, which God hath reserved for his own cup. 'All that will live godly in Christ, shall suffer persecution,' 2 Tim. 3:12. Not all that live, but all that live godly; not all that live godly in respect of outward form, but that live godly in Christ. Paul, his attorney, pleads their afflictions with an oportet; and lest some should look for a dispensation, he backs it with an omnis. The saints that have overcome the hill, be singing above; we that are climbing up, must be groaning all the way. The anthems in the upper choir, the church triumphant, are all hymns of joy; the militant part must be content with sad tunes in this valley of tears. Not that the blessedness of immortality is no more perfect, but that it needs a foil of perplexity to set it off. Not that the joy of heaven is no more sweet, but that it needs the sourness of the world to give it a taste. Not that the peace and plenty of Canaan required the wants, and molestations of this wilderness to commend it; but so it pleaseth the Almighty King, who of his own free grace doth give the preferment, to interpose the conditions; that the sorrows and the ingloriousness of this world should be the thoroughfare to the glories and joys of his kingdom. For it pleased him to consecrate the prince and captain of our salvation through sufferings; and what privilege can the common soldiers and subjects expect? 'Deus filium habuit unum sine peccato, nullum sine flagello.' We that hold our inheritance in capite have no other title to it than Christ had before us, by suffering.

When we consider David and his troubles, we say, 'Ecce dolores viri,' Behold the sorrows of a man; but when we consider the Son of David and his passion, we say 'Ecce vir dolorum,' Behold the man of sorrows. Indeed, if the one balance were full of sorrows, and the other quite empty of comforts, there were an unequal poise. They that do not find some joy in their sorrows, some comfort in their dejections, in this world, are in a fearful danger of missing both in the next. But as it is said in case of bodily sickness, if the patient and the disease join, then in vain is the physician; if the disease and the physician conspire, then woe be to the patient; but if the patient and the physician accord, then vanisheth the disease. So we may observe in spiritual distempers: if the soul and sorrow desperately combine, then the Spirit departs, the physician is grieved; if God and sorrow join in anger, or in anguish, the former justly, the other sharply, then woe to the soul, for that cannot be comforted; but if the soul by faith, and God by grace, unite themselves, then away flies sorrow, for that is expelled. Here David's soul joins itself with the spirit of consolation, and sorrow loseth the day, and the end is comfort. In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul.

Here is a twofold army, one marching against another, seditio et sedatio; an insurrection and a debellation; a tumult and its appeasement; a band of thoughts assaulting, and a host of comforts repelling, resisting, protecting. There is a multitude of those thoughts, and no less is the number of these comforts. These troublous thoughts have got into the citadel of the heart, 'apud me,' within me; and these consolatory forces have entered as far, even into the soul; 'they delight my soul.' Those thoughts fight under the colours of flesh and blood, but these comforts under the banner of God; they are my thoughts, but thy comforts; the cogitations of man, but the consolations of Jesus Christ.

1. Look upon the adversary power, 'in the multitude of my thoughts within me.' O that there were some external grievances, a foreign war, no domestic, intestine, civil broils, not turbulent thoughts. Or if they be thoughts, rebellious, heart-breaking cogitations, yet that there were but some few of them, that they might be sooner suppressed; not so numerous, not a multitude of thoughts. Or if they must be thoughts, and a multitude, yet that they had chosen some other place to rise in; not my heart, the fort, the court, the bedchamber of my spirit; that they had not presumed unto so bold approaches, as to mutinise 'apud me,' within my heart, nearer and closer to me than my own bowels. But now to be thoughts, of so tumultuous a nature, multitudes of so mighty a number; within me, of so fearful a danger, without vent, composition, or quiet, here is a full anxiety.

2. View the defensive forces, and in the midst of this conspiracy make room for preservation: 'Thy comforts delight my soul.' They are comforts; against litigious and unquiet thoughts; a work of peace; comforts. They are not scant and niggardly, but against a multitude of thoughts many comforts and every one able to quell a whole rout of distractions. They are thy comforts; not proceeding from men or angels, but immediately from the Spirit of consolation, against my sorrows, THY comforts. They do not only pitch their tents about me, or, like a subsidiary guard, environ me, but they take up their residence in the heart of my heart, 'In my soul.' These refresh more than the other can offend; against the thought in my heart thy comforts delight my soul.

Thus if we be not entered into Aceldama, a field of blood, yet are we got to Meribah, a field of strife; or the mountains of Bether, a field of division, not unlike that of Rebekah's womb, where Jacob strove with Esau for the victory. We have seen both the armies; now let us marshal them into their proper ranks, setting both the squadrons in their due stations and postures, and then observe the success or event of the battle. And because the malignant host is first entered into the ground of my text, consider with me: 1. The rebels, or mutineers, thoughts. 2. The number of them, no less than a multitude. 3. The captain whose colours they bear; a disquieted mind; my thoughts. 4. The field where the battle is fought; in the heart; apud me, within me.

In the other army we find. 1. Quanta, how puissant they are; comforts. 2. Quota, how many they are, indefinitely set down; abundant comfort. 3. Cujus, whose they are; the Lord's, he is their general; thy comforts. 4. Quid operantur, what they do; they delight the soul. In the nature of them, being comforts, there is tranquillity; in the number of them, being many comforts, there is sufficiency; in the owner of them, being thy comforts, there is omnipotency; and in the effect of them, delighting the soul, there is security. There is no fear in them, for they come for peace, they are comforts. There is no weakness in them, for they come in troops, there are many comforts. There is no disorder in them, for the God of wisdom is their captain, and leads their forces, they are thy comforts. There is no trouble in them, for they evangelise joy, 'they delight the soul.'

1. The rebels are thoughts. Man is an abridgment of the world, and is not exceeded by it but in quantity; his pieces be not pauciora, sed minora. If all the veins of our bodies were extended to rivers, our sinews to mines, our muscles to mountains, our bones to quarries of stone, our eyes to the figures of the sun and moon, and all other parts to the proportions of such things as correspond to them in this world: man might stride over the sea, as the Hebrews feigned of Adam; the air would be too little for him to move in, and the whole firmament but enough for this star; yea, indeed, this little world would be the great one, and that great one appear but the little one. There is nothing in this world for which we may not find some answerable part in man; but there is something in man for which we can find no answerable part in the world; I need not say 'part,' for the whole world is not able to give any representation. Man hath a soul, made after the image of God; of this the world can yield no resemblance. The world produceth innumerable creatures; man yet in more abundance. Our creatures are our thoughts, creatures that are born giants, that can reach from east to west, from north to south, from earth to heaven. These can survey the whole earth, bestride the ocean, comprehend the vast air, and span the very firmament.

How capable, how active, is the soul of man! It is even comprehensive of universality, and hath 'virtutem ad infinita;' nature hath set no limits to the thoughts of the soul. It can pass by her nimble wings from earth to heaven in a moment; it can be all things, comprehend all things, know that which is, and conceive of that which never was, and never shall be. The heart is but a little house, and hath but three chambers, yet there is room enough for a world of guests. God, the Creator of all, made this soul in a cottage of clay, and this soul is a kind of creator too; for though it dwell in a close prison, it can produce creatures, even thoughts; and any one of these creatures can move with the heavens, move faster than the heavens, overtake the sun and overgo the sun; contemplate that which the sun never saw, even the dreadful abyss of hell, and a glimpse of the glory of heaven. So various and innumerable are the thoughts of man, that he had need of an astrolabe, to mark in what height and elevation they are, and so either to advance them or to stoop them, as they deserve.

There be three sorts of actions proceeding from the soul: some internal and immaterial, as the pure acts of our wits and wills; some external and material, as the mere acts of our sense; others mixed between both, and bordering upon both the former, which St Augustine says, the Greeks call $\tau\alpha\theta\eta$, the Latins perturbationes. As the heart inspireth one and the same strength and life into all the parts of the body, for the better discharge of their diverse functions, though all the parts do not receive it in the same degree. The stomach, by the virtue it receiveth, is made able to digest; the liver, to concoct the nutriment into blood; the spleen, like a sponge, by sucking up the melancholy spirits, to purge the vital parts;—so the soul breeds all these creatures, gives life to all these thoughts, yet according to their several acts and offices, they have several names. If they be sensitive, we call them passions; if sensual, lusts; if fantastical, imaginations; if reasonable, arguments; if reflective, conscience; as they are evil, the suggestions of Satan; as good, the motions of the Holy Ghost. As the world produceth vipers, and serpents, and venomous creatures, worms and caterpillars that would devour their parent, so the soul breeds noxious and mutinous thoughts, that are like an earthquake in her bowels; and while they maintain civil broils and factions one against another, she feels the smart of all.

Some thoughts be the darts of Satan; and these non nocent, si non placent. We cannot keep thieves from looking in at our windows, but we need not give them entertainment with open doors. As the hermit said, he could not keep the birds from flying over his head; but he could keep them from building their nests in his hair. 'Wash thy heart from iniquity, that thou mayest be saved; how long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?' Jer. 4:14. They may be passengers, but they must not be sojourners. God hath made a statute against such inmates; it is an unblest hospitality that gives them lodging; and he is no friend to the king that harbours these seminaries. Other thoughts be the motions of God's Spirit; and these must not only be guests, but familiar friends; salutation here is not enough, but glad entertainment, welcome and indulgence. Let no man like himself the better for some good thoughts; the praise and benefit of these is not in the receipt, but in the retention. Easy occasions will frighten away good thoughts from a carnal heart; like children who, if a bird do but fly in their way, cast their eye from their book. But David's thoughts here were anxious, commotive thoughts; otherwise, they stood not in such need of comforts. It is likely they were either timoris, fearful thoughts, or doloris, sorrowful thoughts; thoughts of fear for what might be or thoughts of sorrow for what already was.

The thoughts of fear are troublesome enough; as the ill affections of the spleen do mingle themselves with every infirmity of the body, no less doth fear insinuate itself into every passion of the mind. David might find this complication in his mind. I will please Saul with my harp; but then fear replies, He will strike me through with his javelin. He will give his own daughter in marriage; but fear says again, Now, if this prove a fatal dowry, if this match be my snare, I will refuge myself with Achish at Gath; yet what trust is there in infidels? I will be hidden in Keilah, or Hachilah; but fear suggests, How if the Ziphites discover me? What shall I do? whither shall I go? where shall I rest? These were thoughts that stood in great need of comfort.

The thoughts of sorrow are yet more distractive, and such were this royal prophet's; as our Vulgate reads, 'In the multitude of the sorrows that I had in my heart.' What was the cause of those griefs? The slipping of his foot, his errors, his deviations, his sins. Other sorrows may disquiet the soul; none but these have the promise to be comforted. As in martyrdom, it is not the sword or torture, not what we suffer, but why, that makes us martyrs. So in our sorrows, it is not how deep they penetrate, or how sharply they cruciate, but wherefore, that approves their goodness. If our sins be the why of our sorrows, we are blessed. 'Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted,' Matt. 5:4. Vain are the sighs and groans that proceed only from the thought of worldly losses. A medicine that cureth the eyes, we say, was made for the eyes, and nothing else. We lose our wealth, and sorrow for it. Will sorrow recover it? We are despised and abused, and we grieve for it. Will grief right us? We bury our friends, and mourn for them. Will mourning restore them to us? We are crossed by unkindly children, and weep for it. Will weeping rectify them? We are anguished in our bodies with pains and sicknesses, and are sorry for it. Will sorrow heal us? Nay, will it not rather hurt us? All our thoughts, and cares, and griefs, and tears, can do us no good, no relief in these calamities; sorrow was not made for these things. But we sin and offend the Lord, and we are sorrowful for it. Here is the disease for which sorrow is the proper remedy; penitent sorrow shall take away sin. Quamvis peccavit David; quod solent reges: tamen pœnitentiam egit, flevit, jejunavit, quod non solent reges.* Saith Saint Ambrose, who wrote him an apology, 'While the ground of our sorrow is our sin, the choicest descant on it must be our sorrow.' Our thoughts and griefs may be many, but if they be not spent upon our sin, we shall not be comforted.

2. The number of them is a multitude. We may say of sorrows as it is said of shrewd turns, they seldom come single. Like a volley of folding waves, one tumbling on the neck of another, all threatening to overwhelm us; undæ superadvenit unda. It is too scant a name which Leah gave her son, calling him Gad, 'a troop cometh,' Gen. 30:11; and but enough what the demoniac answered Christ, 'My name is legion, for we are many,' Mark 5:9. If they were a multitude, and not sorrows, then the more the merrier; if they were sorrows, and not a multitude, then the fewer the better cheer. But to be disquieting thoughts, and a multitude, makes up a terrible agony. 'Many are the troubles of the righteous,' Ps. 34:19; great or many, a great many, a great deal too many, but for the comfort of the deliverance. When Job's afflictions began, they came in troops and hurries; so thick, that he could scarce take breath; one messenger pressing in with his woful relation, before the other have ended his sad tale. 'While he was yet speaking,' Job. 1:16. How did that fugitive prophet amplify and aggravate his dangers? 'Thou hast cast me into the deep, in the midst of the seas; and the floods compassed me about; all thy waves and thy billows passed over me,' Jonah 2:3. It was no shallow river, but the sea; not near the shore, but in the midst of the sea; nor was he floating on the waves, but plunged into the deep, or bottom; the floods compassing, the billows overwhelming, to keep him down. I need not travel for exemplifications.

Let him be our instance that spake what he felt, and felt what he spake; sorrows enough to break any heart, but that which God had framed according to his own. His son Amnon ravisheth his own sister, and is murdered by his own brother. That murder is seconded by treason, and that treason with an incestuous constupration. The insurrection of his own son hath driven him from his house, from his throne, and from the ark of God. All this went near him; but that son is slain by his servant, and that went nearer him still. In what a miserable perplexity may we think the heart of this good king was all the while! Here was thought upon thought, and thought against thought. How at once to spare the son of David, and yet to save the father of Absalom; fear against hope, north against south, and wind against tide. Arma armis contraria, fluctibus undæ; a multitude of thoughts, able to rend the heart in pieces, but for that recollection of mercy, 'Thy comforts delight my soul.'

Not seldom fares it thus with us. Thought calls to thought, jealousy to fear, fear to sorrow, sorrow to despair; and these furies leap upon the the heart as a stage, beginning to act their tragical parts. Man hath more wheels moving in him than a clock; only the difference is, that the wheels of a clock move all one way, whereas his faculties, like the epicycles, have a rapt motion. His sensitive appetite gives him one motion, his fantasy another, his reason a third, and his imperious, impetuous will crosseth them all, driving the chariot of his affections with the fury of Jehu. He desires and thinks, and chooseth, argues, consents, and dislikes, and makes more business than time itself. There are not so many hours in one year, as there may be thoughts in an hour.* The philosopher that had shamed himself by weakly disputing with Adrian the emperor, thus excused himself to his friend, 'Would you have me contend with him that commands thirty legions?' Alas! what can quiet that soul which is distracted with such legions and multitudes of thoughts, and throngs of sorrows?

3. The captain of this troublesome soul is himself; my thoughts. From what suggestion soever our thoughts come, we call them our own; as whosoever begot the babe, the mother calls it her own child. Indeed, the praise and propriety of good motives we ascribe only to God, without whom we cannot so much as think a good thought; as the channel may gather filth of itself, but it cannot have a drop of pure water but from the fountain. Bad suggestions, though they proceed from Satan, we call them our own, because they are bred in the womb of our natural corruption; stubble is blown by the wind into the fire, and, being inflamed, it becomes fire. The devil tempted David to sin, yet he calls it his sin; not Satan's, but his own, 'I will be sorry for my sin.' However Epictetus could say, When evil happens to a man, one of the vulgar will blame others, but a young philosopher would blame himself; but one that dived into the depths of nature would blame neither the one nor the other; yet a Christian hath learned to blame himself, as knowing that all his sorrows proceed from himself.

My thoughts: thus easy is it with God to make a man become his own punisher. Under whose regiment are all these troubles? Under myself; my thoughts. As God threatens Tyre, that ancient and glorious city, that 'her own feet shall carry her afar off to sojourn,' Isa. 23:7, so our own feet shall carry us, our own creatures torment us; like diamonds, we are cut with our own dust. When David had numbered the people, his own heart smote him; God finds the rod within us wherewith to scourge us. As some vapour engendered in the caverns of the earth struggles for vent, and being barred of free passage, causeth an earthquake in the foundations that bred it; or as some fiery exhalation, wrapped up in the bowels of a thick cloud, breaks through that watery resistance and delivers itself to the world with a dreadful noise; so the griefs and perturbations begotten by our own lusts become terrors within us, and rend our very hearts till they get vent by confession and repentance; thus do we muster up forces against our own peace. We pray, Lord, deliver us from our enemies, and in that number do we wrap up our unthought of selves, for we are our own enemies. 'Turn thy hand upon mine enemies,' for thou canst do it with the turning of a hand. 'Deliver me from the evil man,' Ps. 81:14. Who is that, saith St Augustine? he is not far to seek; libera me ab homine malo; that is, a meipso, deliver me from the evil man, that is, from myself. I am the aptest to beget destruction upon my own soul; no enemy could hurt us if we were our own friends.

But we must not extend it so far upon this holy king; they were thoughts indeed, and thoughts of sorrow, but of godly sorrow, and he calls them his own, to shew his near acquaintance with them, my sorrows. He was not a stranger to his own soul, his heart was not dead flesh. Satan had given him a fall, and he felt not that; sin had given him divers falls, and he felt not them neither: at last God undertakes him, wrestles with him, and gives him a fall too: he felt that, yea, that made him feel all the rest. Now is he sensible of every pang and stitch, the least thorn makes him smart, and he cries out of the multitude of his sorrows. There be some that can drown their griefs in wine and music, as they did in Hinnom; the cry of the infants with the noise of the instruments, as if they would forget that they are the owners of their own thoughts, because they trouble them. Many deal with their souls as some old women do with looking-glasses: they turn the wrong side toward them, that they may not see the furrows of their own faces. They are loath to think of a reckoning, lest they should despair of making even the arrearages. Men have the courage to dare to sin, but they dare not look on their souls, as they are polluted with sin. I have heard of a melancholy man that would not believe he had a head, till his physician made him a hat of lead and put it on, which weight enforced him to cry, 'Oh, my head.' So men lost in sensual pleasures, scarce remember that they have a soul within them, until miseries, like talents of lead, or quarries of stone, with their heavy pressure, squeeze out a confession.

No things be so near as a man and his soul. 'Tota domus duo sunt,' the whole household is but two; yea, why should they be called two? We may say in a right sense, 'Mens cujusque, is est quisque,' every man's soul is himself. If there be any division, sin made it; a just punishment, 'ut qui nollet cum Deo uniri, non possit in semetipso non dividi.' All these quarrels and brawls may thank sin; that is the make-bate betwixt God and us, betwixt us and ourselves. But that man and his soul be grievously fallen out, that will not speak one to another; when he shall pass a whole day and not ask how his soul does. This were too much between man and wife; when he shall he down in his bed, as the beast doth in his litter, without bidding his soul good night; when he shall have fouled and besmeared his soul with the nasty aspersions of lusts, and not sweep out the dust before he shut the door; not wash his soul with tears before his eyelids be closed down with slumber; yea, when he shall have lived and wounded his soul with blasphemies and uncharitable injuries, and then throw it down in a deluge of drink, as if it were weltering in its own gore, without calling for repentance, the surgeon, to dress it. What madness and self-hatred is this? When the soul may not have leave to think over her own thoughts, to reflect upon herself, to search her own bruises, to survey the multitude of her sorrows, and feel in what need she stands of comforts? That 'plerisque notus, ignotus moriatur sibi? But the children of God have learned to commune with their own hearts, to examine every thought, and to weigh every desire in the balance of the sanctuary. Whether they find themselves pensive or joyful, they will search the cause; as Rebekah said when she felt the children struggle in her womb, 'Why am I thus?' Whether fear or hope, joy or pain, have invaded my thoughts, let me ask my soul the reason, 'Why am I thus?' The fathers were excellent good at this; they had their confessions and soliloquies, familiar conferences with their own hearts; that when a man reads them, he would think they kept no other company but themselves. Conference with others may make us wise or learned, but conference with ourselves is the way to make us holy. Tell thy conscience of all suggestions, as the chaste wife, after some peremptory denials to her impudent tempter, professes to tell her husband of those solicitations; such and such be my thoughts, thus and thus they harrass me; what shall I do with them? Indifferency is no less than self-treachery in matters of such consequence, that come so near me as to be 'apud me.'

4. Within me: for this is the field where the skirmish is fought; within me. It is unhappy when soldiers march over the palaces of peace and seats of justice, where the councillors and senators used to sit. If there must be war, let it be in foreign countries, or if it will be in our own land, yet let it proceed no further than the borders; but when it is gotten into the chief city, though it be subdued, it will cost a dear victory. As Pyrrhus, when his friends congratulated his victory over the Romans, with a great loss of his own side, replied, 'Yes; but if we had such another victory, we should be undone.' There is no penitent heart that hath felt the bitterness of these combats, remembering what sighs and sorrows, what groans and tears it hath cost him to make his peace, but would be loath to be put to the charges of such another conquest. Durius ejicitur, quam non admittitur hostis sin may be kept out with ease, but will not be driven out save with woful expenses.

Within me; not before me, as the host of the Philistines lay before Saul; not behind me, as the chariots of Egypt came thundering behind Israel; nor above me, as Fabius Maximus on the mountain above Hannibal. Imminet nubes, a cloud hangs over me; not round about me, as the Syrians compassed Dothan to take Elisha; but within me. 'Without were fightings, within were fears,' 2 Cor. 7:5; and those fears within were worse than those fightings without. There are external calamities enough to shake the most fortified soul; but 'Summus dolor est ab intus.' St Paul reckons up twelve of his inflicted sufferings, nine dangers, and eight continued passions; yet, as if these were scarce worth putting into the catalogue, he adds, 'besides the things that are without,' 2 Cor. 11:28. He had an inward trouble: the care of the churches, seeking the lost, rebuking the proud, and comforting the dejected. Here was the pain.

Within me. There may be bellum intestinum a kind of unkind battle. When victi victoresque invicem dolent; the soul bespeaking her affections, as Jocasta did her quarrelling sons. Bella geri placuit nullos triumphos habitura.

According to our Saviour's prediction, a man's foes shall be they of his own household. Intra me est, quod contra me est; that is within me, which is against me. We say he wants an enemy, that fights with himself, and because he fights with himself, he wants no enemy, sibi pessimus hostis. With external assaults we may grapple, threatened mischiefs we may prevent; from persecutors too potent for us we may hide ourselves, but who shall keep us from ourselves? Nescis temeraria, nescis quem fugias, ideoque fugis. Whithersoever we remove, we carry our sorrows with us. Outward afflictions are a war, turbulent affections a worse war, both against us; but this latter is within us. He needs no other misery, that is troubled within himself. Ask not the anger of heaven, nor the trouble of earth, nor the dangers of the sea, nor the malice of hell, against him whom his own thoughts have beaten down. He will say to all other miserable complainers, 'You are happy.' Outward things may go cross with us, and yet the peace of the soul remain sound; but a wounded spirit who can bear? who can cure? As man's heart is the first that lives, and the last that dies, so it is the first that Satan assaults, and the last that he gives over. Yea, were there never a devil, the heart hath an ill spirit of its own to vex it. As some boroughs of this land plead a privilege, that they can hang and draw within themselves, so man's heart is such a corporation. It can execute itself within itself, without any foreign judge or executioner. If we look no further than among the multitude of our thoughts, might we not make a shift to think ourselves to hell? If we had neither hands, nor eyes, nor feet, would not our hearts find the way thither?

Within me. The proper seat and lodging of these troublesome inmates, the thoughts of sorrow, is the heart; whithersoever they wander, there they centre. Vagabonds taken roguing out of their own precincts, are sent with a passport to the town where they were born; there they must be kept. Extravagant thoughts may rove up and down, but back again they must to the heart: the house that hatched them must harbour them, must answer for them. As all faculties of sense have their several seats; seeing is confined to the eyes, hearing to the ears, feeling to the flesh and sinews: so these perturbations are limited to the heart. The local seat of the sensitive apprehension is the brain; of the sensitive affection, the heart. In the former is softness and moisture, fit to receive intelligible forms; in the other are fiery spirits, fit for passionate and affectionate thoughts. 'My spirit is overwhelmed, and my heart within me is desolate,' Ps. 143:4. In such a distress, let sense inform reason, reason speak to will, will to conscience, conscience to faith, faith to Christ, and Christ to his Father; and they will both send the Holy Ghost to comfort us. If there be a fire in the heart of a city, all the suburbs will come to quench it. This fire may burn within, but it will break out. It is as easy to stifle thunder in the cloud, or fire in powder, as sorrow in the heart. It will have eruption either by the voice in cries, or by the eyes in tears, or by the speaking silence of the look in a dejected heaviness. The seat of sorrow is the soul; but it will overflow the boundaries. 'Why art thou cast down, O my soul?' None ask their eyes why they weep, or their voices why they lament, or their hands why they wring themselves. But Anima, quare tam tristis? 'Oh, my soul, why art thou disquieted within me?'

II. We see now the full advancement of the misery. The thoughts of sorrow, an army of those thoughts, the combination of that army, the terror of that combination; how miserable must that country suffer where these rebels march? Who can tell the taking of that heart which feels that combustion within itself? These be our enemies, where are our friends? The day is like to be fatally disastrous, if we have no defensive forces. Yes, 'the Lord shall fight for us, and we will hold our peace,' Exod. 14:4. As Moses comforted Israel, when the choice was hard, whether to trust the fury of the sea before them, or of the Egyptians behind them: 'Stand still, fear not, and see the salvation of the Lord.' Now are the white ensigns of mercy displayed against these bloody streamers: never to a handful of men almost famished in a fort, did the tidings of fresh aid to raise the siege arrive more welcome. 'Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died,' John 11:21. Though this multitude of oppressors overlay my heart, yet. Lord, if thou comest, my soul shall not perish. Let your patience sit out the success of the battle; and though I wish you not such conflicts, yet, if they do come, may you never fail of such comforts. 'Thy comforts delight my soul.'

1. Quanta. They are no less than comforts: not presumptions, nor promises, nor mere hopes; but solid and sensible comforts. God made comfort on purpose for sorrow, as mercy would want a subject to exercise upon, but for misery. The blessed angels are not said to be comforted, because they never knew what heaviness meant; they are conserved, they are confirmed, not properly comforted. There may be joy without any antecedent sorrow, as the angelical spirits ever were, and ever shall be, filled with unspeakable joy. But comfort is the proper physic for trouble: this happy nature was not ordained but for sorrow. There may be some that ducunt in bonos dies suos, that have their ways strewed with violets and roses; these have no need of comfort. What physician ministers cordials to the strong and healthful constitution? It is the broad thoroughfare of the world, which the devil is so studious to smoothe, that he leaves not a pebble in the way to offend them; as if he were that tutelar angel, who hath a charge to look to them, that they dash not their foot against a stone, Ps. 91:12. If they sigh, he sings to them; if they sleep, he sits by them: whispering to all troubles, as the spouse to the daughters of Jerusalem, 'I charge you, O ye transgressions of his heart, waken him not till he please.' Let there be no noise of fear, no alarm of repentance, no susurration of conscience to molest him: peace, peace, lie down in peace, with thy warm sins cleaving to thy bosom. The prophet gives you their character: 'They lie upon beds of ivory; they eat the lambs of the flock, and the calves out of the stall; they chant to the sound of viols, and dance to instruments, and drink wine in bowls,' Amos 6:4. What should these men do with comforts? Joy, and nothing else but the voice of joy, resounds in their habitations. It is poor, afflicted Joseph that needs comfort.

Consolation then is made for sorrow, and not for every sorrow neither. Some is produced by no other cause but temporal losses, pains, or injuries; so Esau may mourn long enough without recovery of his father's blessing. Worldly sorrow bringeth death, not delight, to the soul. Many weep, as Rachel did in Ramah for her children, because they were not; but they neither are, nor ever will be, comforted. There are tears that got sinful Esau nothing, and there be tears that got sinful Mary salvation. If the sorrow that swells our bosom with sighs, and is ready to burst our hearts, be spent upon our sins, it shall be sure of comforts. Are we full of grief within, and find no vent but by the groans and tears of repentance? God may let us bleed for a while, till we be thoroughly humbled; but then, like the woman, the pangs of whose travail be over, the son of joy shall be born in our wombs, even that son which the blessed Virgin bore from her womb. Filius dilectionis, Filius delectationis, Jesus Christ.

2. Quota. There is a plurality of them; many comforts. What should encounter with sorrow but comfort? Comfort, therefore, it is for the nature. What should oppose a multitude, but a multitude? Many comforts, therefore, they are for their number. Are we troubled with the wants and miseries of this life? We have a comfort for that: 'The Lord is my portion; he is my shepherd. I shall lack nothing.' Do we sink under the burden of our transgressions? We have a comfort for that. Mary Magdalene heard it to quiet all her storms: 'Thy sins are forgiven thee.' Are we haunted with temptations, hurried with persecutions? We have a comfort for that: 'I will be with thee in trouble,' saith the Lord. Let your Christian experience supply here my defects of remonstrance. I will sum up these comforts in a few words: 'The Lord is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenteth him of the evil,' Joel 2:13. We read of certain Fair Havens near Candia, Acts 27:8; here be five fountains of comfort, like those fair havens, as welcome for harbour and road of a sea-beaten conscience, as ever was the bosom of mother for her sucking child. Drink at the first fountain: 'The Lord is gracious,' free in his favours; if your thirst be not satisfied, go to the second: 'He is merciful,' he hath bowels of commiseration; if not yet, press to the next: 'He is slow to anger,' hard to conceive it, not willing to retain it. Wish we more? He is 'of great kindness' in the number and measure of his blessings. There is yet another well of comfort behind: 'Repenting him of the evil;' full often doth he turn aside his blows, and is easily entreated to have the rod pulled out of his hands. David, to encounter with the giant, took 'five smooth stones out of the brook,' 1 Sam. 17:40; here is the brook, and these the five smooth stones. Let them not lie in the channel unused, but put them in your vessels, bear them in your hearts; whensoever you are defied and assaulted by that monster Philistine Satan, one of these comforts, like David's stone, shall sink into his forehead and confound him.

How happily do these comforts meet with these sorrows! We are troubled with the sense of our sins, and of God's judgment upon them; how should his justice acquit us? Yet there is comfort, 'the Lord is gracious,' and cannot deny himself. But we are unworthy of his grace, because we have turned it into wantonness; yet there is comfort, for the Lord is 'merciful,' and sheweth most pity where most it is needed. But we have multiplied offences, and continued in our sins to our grey hairs; yet there is comfort, He is 'slow to anger,' evermore blessed for his long sufferance. But our iniquities be not of an ordinary quality, they are heinous and intolerable; yet there is comfort, for he is 'of great kindness,' and our wickedness cannot be so great as his kindness; for of that there is no comprehension. But we are out of his favour, because he hath smitten us, our bodies with sore diseases, our souls with agonies, and our families with privations; yet there is comfort, he will 'repent of the evil.' In the hour of death, when the senses are past working, the understanding asleep, the body in a cold and benumbed sweat, these comforts never leave us: 'Return unto thy rest, O my soul.' Ps. 116:7.

Our comforts vie with the number of our sorrows, and win the game. The mercies of God passed over in a gross sum breed no admiration; but cast up the particulars, and then arithmetic is too dull an art to number them. As many dusts as a man's hands can hold, is but his handful of so many dusts; but tell them one by one, and they exceed all numeration. It was but a crown which King Solomon wore; but weigh the gold, tell the precious stones, value the richness of them, and what was it then? Jerusalem was but a city; but go round about it, mark the towers, tell the bulwarks, observe the magnificent buildings: so consider the infinite variety of these comforts! 'Come, and I will tell you all that God hath done for my soul,' Ps. 66:16. I never felt that sorrow for which he gave me not a sovereign comfort. Sennacherib invaded Israel with a mighty host, yet the undaunted courage of Hezekiah found more with him than could be against him; and Sennacherib found it so to his cost, when he lost almost two hundred thousand of his army in one night. The prophet's servant rising early in the morning, sees the city besieged with a fearful host of foot, horse, and chariots; his eyes could meet with nothing but woods of pikes, walls of harness, and lustre of metals, and he runs in with this affrighting news to his master: 'Alas! what shall we do?' 2 Kings 6:16. Quiet Elisha sits in his chamber, as secure as if all these had been the guard of Israel, sent for his safe protection. 'Fear not.' This was a hard precept; as well might he have bidden him not to see what he saw, as not to fear seeing so dreadful a spectacle. But the task is easy if the next words find belief: 'They that be with us are more than they that be with them.' If the eyes of our faith be as open as those of our sense, to see angels as well as Syrians, to perceive comforts as well as sorrows, we cannot be appalled with the most unequal number of our enemies: 'Many, O Lord, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done for us; they cannot be reckoned,' Ps. 40:5. O God, what is man that thou art so mindful of him? Yea, O man, what is God that thou art so unmindful of him? All the works of God are excellent, and ought to be had in remembrance; alas! that we should ever forget any of his works that are of mercy and comfort, and done for the good of our souls. For he alone hath done them; that is the next point.

3. Cujus. Whose they are? 'Thy comforts.' Troubles may be of our own begetting; but true comforts come only from that infinite fountain, the God of consolation; for so he hath styled himself. The eagle, at her highest flight, will not lose sight of her young ones; if she perceive any danger approaching, down she comes amain to their defence. Christ is indeed ascended up on high, yet he hath a favourable eye to his servants below; no Saul can 'breathe out threatenings and slaughters' without a 'Quid me persequeris?' 'Nec timeas hostem fortem, qui ducem habes fortiolem.' 'Let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered.' There is none that fighteth for us but only thou, O God, Ps. 68:1. 'Cujusquam est rempublicam movere, Dei solius quietare.' Our own hearts can distract themselves, there is nothing to settle them but what the God of peace puts in. Who can reconcile a man fallen out with himself? yea, fallen from himself? None but the God of comfort, who, when the earth was void, without form, when darkness was on the face of the deep, day and night, land and water undistinguished, could reduce all this unshapen chaos of the world to form and order; when father, mother, brethren, kindred, friends, neighbours, and a man's own heart forsakes him, then God takes him up. The structure of Jericho was not more pleasant than the waters were unwholesome, and, thereby, the soil corrupt. Elisha cures them with a cruseful of salt. Our hearts are full of thoughts, but they be noxious thoughts; yet if God throw into those fountains a handful of saving grace, we shall be whole. Our sorrows would too often break our hearts, but, O God, for thy comforts: it is thou only that canst make these weak vessels hold such scalding liquors and not burst.

There is combustion of these thoughts within us, till God part the fray and pacify the tumult; as when scholars are loud in their brawls, the very sight of their master husheth them. When my heart, like the sea in a storm, is troubled, the winds raging, the waves roaring, thy comforts, like Christ's command, turns all into a calm: 'I thought on thee in the night season, and received comfort.' In the night, the region of fear; in solitariness, the full advantage of sorrow; in darkness, the opportunity of despair; upon an unsleeping bed, the field of troublous thoughts; yet I did but think of thee, and before I came to meditate, to pray, to send up my soul to thee, in that first thought I received comfort. O how short do all worldly things come of this sufficiency! If the heart be wounded with sorrow, in vain is all the chirurgery of nature. Gold is no restoration, riches no cordial; yea, they may be a corrosive. We say to wine, Thy spirits are dull; to laughter, Thou art mad; music grates the ear, and physic loathes the palate; company is tedious, and solitude dangerous; alas! what hope can there be till the God of comfort comes? Saul's evil spirit will not leave him till he be dispossessed by David's harp. We find as much ease when we rest our hearts upon temporal things, as he that laid him down to rest upon the cold earth with a pitcher under his head; and finding the pillow too hard, he rose and stopped it with feathers, thinking that then it would be wondrous easy. So be all temporary things to the soul, even when they are filled with the choicest mirth; nothing but vanity and vexation of spirit: vanity in their entertainment, and vexation in their farewell. Yet, O Lord, thy comforts

4. Delight the soul, which is the last circumstance; the effect of all. All God's war is for peace: pacem habet voluntas, bellum necessitas. We should never have had such a conflict, if God had not intended us for such a conquest. Sin disquiets the heart; yet, through his grace, this disquiet breeds repentance, repentance procureth forgiveness, forgiveness restoreth peace, and peace delights the soul. The sharpness of the trouble advanceth the sweetness of the joy; as Christ's sufferings abound, so his comforts superabound. Every penitent tear that falls from the eye, springs up a flower of comfort. Look how full the vessels were of water, so full doth our Saviour render them of wine. In hell are all sorrows, without any comforts; in heaven are all comforts, without any sorrows; on earth, good and bad, sweet and sour, miseries and mercies, sorrows and comforts, are blended together. If here were nothing but sorrows, earth would be thought hell; if nothing but comforts, it would be thought heaven. But that we may know it to be, as indeed it is, neither heaven nor hell, but between both, and the way to either, we have a vicissitude of troubles and delights. That as of old they painted King Solomon, because learned men were divided in their opinions of him, some casting him to hell, others advancing him to heaven; therefore a third moderate sort painted him half in heaven and half in hell. So the Christian, in regard of his sorrows, seems half confounded, and, in respect of his comforts, half saved. But as indeed Solomon, after all his errors, found mercy; so the Christian, after all his sorrows, shall find comfort. His beginning may seem troublesome, his proceeding not delightsome, but his latter end is peace. 'Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace,' Ps. 37:37. His heart was troubled, his soul shall be delighted.

As the grievances of the soul be most dangerous in respect of their nature, so are they also abundant in their number. Therefore let our care be to seek out that great elixir, that most sovereign and universal antidote and cordial.

(1.) One soul complains: I have obloquies, reproaches, calumniations cast upon me, which render me contemptible to good societies. Morality would thus argue with the heart. Be these imputations, thus charged on me, true or false? If true, let the integrity of thy future conversation so convince thy associates, that they shall both suspect those reports, and rest assured of thy constant goodness.

But the divine grace applies a more virtual medicine to thy conscience, which shall revive either thy patience or thy repentance. The soul shall argue with itself: If these imputations be true, here is work for repentance; I will weep in secret for my sins. If false, let them not trouble me; it is the slanderer's sin, not mine; neither am I bound to father another's bastard. But still upon this calumny the world condemns me. But thy faith and patience assure thee that thou shalt not be condemned with the world. Yea, there is yet a higher degree of honour belonging to thy patience. Have not the best of men been traduced? Was not the best of men, God and man, blasphemed? Yea, even upon the cross, he was jeered when he died, by some of them for whom he died. Thus do the comforts of God requite thee, that in all this thou art, in thy measure, conformable to the sufferings of Christ. So dost thou allay all these furious tempests with one breath of faithful ejaculation, 'Thy comforts delight my soul.'

(2.) Another complains: I am fallen from an affluent state to deep indigence. I have kept hospitality, to entertain friends; and made charity the porch of my house, to relieve the needy ones. The vessel of my means is now drawn out to the bottom, there is not sufficient provision for my own family. Inquire of thy heart, whether thy decay did not come by thy own riot, or through the vain-glorious affectation of an abundant hospitality. If this, or that, or any other habitual sin, were the first cause of it, begin with mortification there. First mourn for thy sins, then faithfully depend on thy Creator's providence, and thou shalt not fail of convenient sustenance.

But it may be this is not the complainant's case; he is not taken with a tabe or wasting away of his substance, like a scarce sensible consumption of his bodily vitals. But his fall is with a precipice, from a sublime pinnacle of honour to a deep puddle of penury. Such was Job's condition; so did he fall, from being rich and happy in the adverb to being poor and miserable in the proverb. He had not only abundance of good about him, but omnia bene, all things went well with him. Yet how suddenly did he fall from this abundant prosperity to the depth of miserable poverty! Did he now follow the suggestions of that corrupt nature which lay in his bosom, and whispered to him on his pillow, 'Curse God and die?' No; but he apprehended the inspiration of grace, 'Bless God and live.' So his last days were better than his first. That infinite mercy did so crown his patience with triumph, that his temporal estate was doubled. Yea, but what posterity had he left to enjoy it after him? Yes, but even the number of his children was doubled too. For besides those seven sons and three daughters, which were now with his Father in heaven, he had also seven sons and three daughters with himself on earth. Piety and patience cannot be cast down so low, but that the hand of mercy can raise it up again. 'In the multitude of all my losses and crosses, O Lord, thy comforts have delighted my soul.'

(3.) But another, that hath heard all this sad story, and seen the comfortable end sent of the Lord, is not satisfied; because himself is not redressed. Like a coward in war, that looks for the victory before he gives one stroke in the battle. What merchant looks to be landed in the place of traffic before he hath passed his adventure upon the sea? Still, saith such a repiner, I am in distress, and want even necessaries. But still thou and we all must suffer much more before it can be said, 'Here is the faith and patience of the saints.' Still, O my soul, wait thou upon the Lord, thy most faithful Creator; he will, in his own good pleasure, open his hand, and fill thee with plenteousness. Be thou penitent before him, patient under him, confident in him, and thou shalt have abundant cause to be thankful to him. Thy end shall be peace and comfort in Jesus Christ.

Yea, even now, in these dead, low waters of fugitive fortunes, my soul confesseth that I have the highest wealth. For Christ's righteousness is my riches, his merits my inexhaustible exchequer, his blood hath filled my veins with the most lively vigour. My treasure is in heaven, where no violence can take it from me. Still for ever and for ever thy comforts delight my soul.

(4.) It is another's complaint: I am shut up in a close prison, where I can neither converse with others abroad, nor let others in to communicate with me in this my confined home. The sparrow on the house-top hath more freedom than I. For that, though wanting a mate, hath an open air to fly in, and may so invite company to solace her. I have no society but my disconsolate thoughts, no friend to ask me so much as how I do.

Yet is thy soul at liberty. No barricaded walls, no iron gates or grates, no dark dungeons can imprison that. The jail is a strong prison to thy body, and thy body is but, in a metaphorical phrase, a prison to thy soul. Thy body may not walk abroad, thy soul can. Spite of all thy cruel creditors, and some unmerciful jailors, she can break prison. She hath wings that can mount her through clouds and mountains, through orbs and constellations, and, like Enoch, walk with God, in a heavenly contemplation of his infinite goodness. My ears cannot hear those heavenly choristers, singing their Creator's praise in the groves, but my soul, in speculation, can hear the anthems of the angels in heaven. I may not hear the hosannahs of the church militant in our material temples below, but I may conceive that my soul hears the hallelujahs of the church triumphant above. I may not walk in the green pastures and flowery meadows on earth, but my soul may move in the glorious and melodious galleries of heaven. Thus, O Lord, though in my strictest confinement here below, thou hast given me large liberty above, still I would glorify thee for all thy mercies, for thy comforts delight my soul.

(5.) Another's complaint is: I am vexed with a multitude of troubles. Not the law of the sword, but the sword of the law hath disquieted me. Let thy soul ask thy conscience this question, Who did first break the peace? If thou hast first overwhelmed that truth which should be apparent, thou art thine own enemy. For truth, smothered in wet straw, will at length overcome the darkness of that suppression, and set on fire the sins thereof. Thou hast forsaken the truth, and art therefore forsaken of peace.

There be two chief preservers of the soul, under the almighty Creator of it, truth and peace. How invaluable are they together! Parted, how miserable! Truth is the precious stone, peace the gold wherein it is both set and preserved. Truth is the glorious light of the sun, peace a clear and serene heaven. Peace is a most beautiful body whilst it contains truth, that more pure, lovely soul. Truth brings down heaven to us, peace bears us up to heaven. Both are sisters, the daughters of one Father, God himself.

Do thou first recover truth. By continual labour seek it, with prayers and tears beg it, with the expense of much sorrow buy it, and then peace will come into the bargain. God's comforts shall again delight thy soul.

(6.) Another complains: I am cast out of doors. I have no harbour but the hedges, nor lodging but the fruitless ground. Poverty hath sent out her excommunications against me. All that have an estate are forewarned to shun my company.

Consider, when had Jacob so sweet a night's rest as when the pillow he laid his head upon was a hard stone? Then was that ladder set by him by which his soul might climb up to heaven in a vision, whereof before he had but the speculation. The angels were dancing those measures, and singing those raptures about him, which did in a manner angelify him. His body lay on the bare earth; his soul, with those spiritual wings of faith and love, was mounted above the clouds, above the orbs, even conversant in the highest heavens.

When had Elias more excellent provision than when his breakfast was brought him in the morning, and his supper in the evening, by a raven? The messenger was homely, but the diet was heavenly. It came from the table of that great King, whose hospitality feeds, not only men, but even the fowls of the air, the beasts upon earth, and the fishes of the sea. The prophet's lodging was but a field-bed, yet, even then and there, the lions were a guard about him, the tutelar angels did surround him, and the divine providence preserved him.

If we be destitute of other lodging, and be driven to the common earth, yet we have a house over our heads, 'not made with hands, but an eternal mansion in the heavens.' There is also a canopy for us, a roof arched over with the two poles, and set with innumerable glistening stars. Yea, there is an omnipotent love that protects us, a material heaven encompassing us, and a spiritual heaven within us, the peace of a good conscience, assuring us of our eternal salvation through Christ Jesus. This is a softer lodging than the cabins of merchants, or the hammocks of seafarers, yea, than the most curious beds the harbingers can procure for princes. Oh, how sweetly doth the Christian rest, when he hears that voice out of the oracle of goodness! My grace is sufficient for thee, my comforts shall delight thy soul!

(7.) But another's complaint is: I am perplexed with sickness. I am a mark against which pain shoots his arrows. I waste away with languishments, as ice is dissolved by heat in water. Rest patient. This consumption shall be consumed. Death, that universal executioner of mankind, shall be executed. Time shall cut off death, and eternity shall make an end of time. Death shall have no grave left for his monument, or trophy of his victories; and the angel hath sworn that time shall be no more. Thy sickness may outlast thy physician, but thy soul shall outlive thy sickness, and nothing shall outlive thy soul.

But the pangs of my body are so violent, that they assault me with distraction. Fear not; they may beleaguer thee with distrust, but never overcome that faith which thou puttest in the God of all consolation. He is a most faithful Creator, and will, servare depositum, keep that soul safe, with which the believer hath entrusted him. The breaches of the body are the soul's windows, and afford her a more clear prospect into heaven, enkindling within her an ardent desire to be with God in glory. Job's abundant sores would have bred in him a continuity of sorrows, but for that antidote of faith, and saving cordial of hope, that his eyes should see his Redeemer in blessedness.

The smiling sun flatters the traveller out of his cloak, whereas the robustious wind causeth him to wrap it the closer about him. God forbid that the Christian religion should be but a cloak, yet the outward profession of it is somewhat loosened by wanton health, and sickness wins it more inwardly to the heart. Experienced merchants tell us that, in the hottest countries, they find most relief in the hottest drinks. A wonder to us that live in the cold climates; but that the sun's adventitious heat so sucks out the radical moisture and spirits, that it leaves the heart feeble, and destitute of its natural comforts. It is a maxim in philosophy, that one heat avocates another, the greater the less. The heat of the sun draws forth the heat of the heart, and leaves it fainting. Poor Lazarus, with his scabs and scraps, was yet in a better condition than the rich man, with his princely wardrobe and his costly viands. Continued health hath maintained wanton desires and delights upon earth, but sickness hath sent many souls up to heaven. Yea, Lord, even with sickness afflict my body, so that thy heavenly comforts do delight my soul.

(8.) It is a general complaint, Afflictions environ me; in my short pilgrimage through the sharp wilderness of this world, on the one side thorns wound me, and brambles scratch me on the other. This is not only the deserved penalty of sinful nature, 'Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward;' but even a kind of fatality inseparable to militant grace, 'All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution,' 2 Tim. 3:12. That is a rare path upon earth which hath never a rub, and a calm passage by water that escapes all molestation. But more,—

Be there not some afflictions that conduce to our preservation? We have found that the falling into one grievous sin, the worst of all dangers, hath brought us to repentance, one of the best preservatives. I have heard some seamen report by experience that, in a tempest, some raging billow hath swept a man off the decks into the main ocean, yet another wave on the other side hath tossed him up into the ship again, so that he was only drenched, but not drowned. The violent pressure of one affliction hath sunk a man to distrust in God; another, with a more furious storm, hath left him destitute of all earthly succour. He now resolves, The world hath forsaken me; I will never look for relief from it again. But my God hath not forsaken me; and he never will forsake them that trust in him through Jesus Christ. To him I fly; upon him I rely. He will not suffer me to perish. Still, O Lord, in all my extremities 'thy comforts delight my soul.'

(9.) Not offering to number man's grievances, which be innumerable, there is yet the last, and it may prove the best, complaint remaining.

I am perplexed with the woful consideration of my sin, those 'bitter things which God writes against me,' the irksome recollection of my transgressions. I can argue with philosophers, consult with politicians, hear the ingenious fancies of poets, reason in domestic concernments, enjoy the company of moral and harmless friends with delight. I can pray with confidence to be heard and satisfied; I do hope with some assurance of salvation; I lie upon a peaceful pillow. Thus far I am in a calm and serene atmosphere, and quiet be all my thoughts.

But after all this sunshine there ariseth a tempest. When I do recollect, or be represented unto my conscience, my innumerable, incomparable, intolerable sins, the remembrance of them is so frightful, the burden of them is so insupportable, that I dare not even look up unto heaven. Faith lies fainting, hope is in a swoon, fear stands by the bedside, despair lies gaping at the chamber door, and my soul is in an ecstasy. I am weary of all company but those that speak of mercy. I sit mourning all the day long; sorrow and solitude are my associates. I do shed some tears, and would weep tears of blood for my sins. I lament because my sorrows are not greater for offending my God.

Well, yet hear the Physician of souls, that speaks to thee from heaven. Weep on, bleed on; this bleeding shall not be unto death. Jesus Christ hath a balsam, that shall not only staunch thy bleeding, but fill the veins of thy soul with comfort. His blood is an antidote for thine. One drop of that shall satisfy for more sins than ever thou hast committed.

Weep on for thy transgressions. These floods of tears shall not drown thee. Yea, rather, like the waters of that universal deluge, in that saving ark, Christ Jesus, they shall bear up thy soul towards heaven. They shall not drown thee; yea, they shall rather save thee from being drowned. This is that secunda tabula after shipwreck, the main plank that shall preserve thee from perishing, emergent repentance.

There be two most valiant and puissant soldiers that are the soul's champions, Faith and Repentance. They fight not only against lust and sin, those giants of the world; but also against principalities and powers, those infernal spirits of darkness. Faith hath her weapons and forces, but Repentance hath many disadvantages.

1. Other soldiers fight standing; she kneeling. They in a posture confronting their enemies; she in humiliation, though not tergiversation, from her opposites. They send forth their messages of death in thundering ordnance; all her thunder is sighs and groans, sent up to heaven for mercies. They let fly their fiery engines of destruction; she hath only her ejaculations. Her most piercing darts are broken hearts. Their shafts are winged with fire; her arrows are feathered with water, her own soft tears. They swallow up the hope of victory with insultation; she, in a humble prostration, expects pity. Yet the God of all power and mercy, whom she beleaguers in heaven, yields her the conquest. He comes from his impregnable throne by his most gracious favour; and instead of confounding her as a rebel, he useth her as a friend or daughter. He takes her up from her knees, he wipes away all her tears, he folds her in his arms, he seals her a pardon of all sins, and assures her of an everlasting kingdom in heaven. O, victorious Repentance! yea, rather, O, triumphant goodness! O, God, teipsum vincis, thou overcomest thyself; thus thy comforts delight our souls.

It is reported of Alexander, that when he thought, and did but think so, he had conquered all this world, he fell a weeping because there were no more worlds to conquer. But there was remaining another world, a better than ever Alexander discovered; but this was not for an Alexander, by force of arms, but for a Mary Magdalene, by force of tears, to overcome.

It is true, the kingdom of heaven suffers violence; but the way of conquest is not through the blood of bodies, but through a flood of tears, gushing out for our sins. This is such a stratagem of war, such a policy of conquest, as the great monarchs of the world never understood. Yet even this, through faith, overcomes the world.

Faith hath a plot, which she hath taught her daughter Repentance, concedendo superare, to overcome by yielding. It is a stratagem among wrestlers, that if a man can get himself under his antagonist, he lifts him up, the sooner to cast him down; yea, to give him the greater fall. Repentance stoops as low as she can. She lies, like Joshua, upon the bare earth; yea, wallows in dust and ashes. She holds herself not worthy to be God's footstool. Let him trample upon her and tread her under his feet, she still holds him by the feet, washeth them with her tears, wipeth them with the hairs of her head, and kisseth them, though she be spurned by them. Doth this humble prostration provoke fury? No; it rather invites mercy. Parcere prostratis scit nobilis ira leonis. The Lion of the tribe of Judah will spare such lambs of humiliation, and in the pastures of consolation he will both feed and preserve them. That thunder which dissolves the precious metal, yet spares the yielding purse. When power and policy have spent their spirits, submission is found the only way of conquest. The fearful thunder of vengeance is resisted by the soft wool of repentance.

2. Yet hath this blessed grace another disadvantage. Faith, the chief of all the forces, may be sometimes benighted, through the conglomeration of the clouds condensed by our sins. Hope may be eclipsed by the interposition of the earth, our worldly imaginations, betwixt us and that great luminary of heaven, the Sun of righteousness. The sentry of a watchful conscience may be overcome with security. Sin is a subtle enemy, and his father, the devil, will shew him the opportunity. Now is the time of invasion; seize on them, and cut all their throats. What shall Repentance do, when Faith, the great lady-general, droops, and Hope, her lieutenant-general, is fainting, when the whole sentry is overcome with slumber?

Yes, there is a watchman in the tower of the soul, that doth seldom sleep, holy Fear. He wakens conscience; conscience calls up faith; faith rouseth hope; hope cries aloud to repentance; repentance troops up all the natural forces; the martial music gives the alarm; the soldiers are in battle array; the enemies fly; the mind is at peace; because God's comforts delight the soul.

3. One disadvantage more makes dangerous work for repentance. The troops of Faith are routed, one wing of Hope is cut off. Yet this conquering queen of the viragines, or maiden graces, always brings up the rear, and never appears till the day be almost lost. When those great commanders, Innocency and Righteousness, are foiled and beaten, and leave their queen, the soul, in danger to be taken, and slain by sin and Satan, her old adversaries, then this virgo, virago, that all this while lay in expectation of the event, this martial maid, this victorious Repentance, comes in with her reserve, sets upon the conquerors with her fresh forces, rescues the queen, our soul, puts the great general, Satan, to flight, and does impartial execution upon all his soldiers, which be our sins.

Thus one grace begets another, by a supernatural generation, till they increase in number and in measure by the divine inspiration. Faith calls up repentance; repentance brings in pardon and forgiveness; pardon leads in comfort; and thus, O my God! thy comforts delight my soul.

4. When God, by the preaching of his law, hath broken up the fallow ground of our hearts, and, by the applying of his gospel, hath sown the seed of eternal life in those furrows, he looks that we should bestow our labour in the watering of this plantation. The ground is his, for he made it; the seed is his, for he gives it; the harvest is his, and he owns it. Yet such is the bounty of his goodness, that he gives his farmers the fruits of it. The rent of that great landlord's glory being freely paid, the product is ours, even the comfort and salvation of our poor souls. All our pains is but to hook up the weeds that would hinder the growth of the corn, and dew the furrows with our tears, that it may spring up with cheerfulness. But when the reaping time comes, the whole crop is ours; and we come home singing with joy and thankfulness, 'Thy comforts have delighted my soul.' When those glorious reapers, the angels, shall bear up our souls to heaven, like sheaves in the barn, we shall sing harvest home, and glorify our infinite good Lord, and our sweet Saviour, Jesus Christ.

To conclude. Crosses are but the pursuivants to fetch in repentance, and afflictions but God's letters missive for mortification. When we are fallen into some heinous transgressions, we may better say, than in our other trouble, this will cost hot water. For so it will, indeed; it will cost the hot waters of our tears from our eyes, or it will cost the warm blood of our hearts. Our godly sorrow for our sins is like the pool of Bethesda; when that angel from heaven, gracious repentance, hath troubled the waters, the lazarous soul does but step into them, and is cured. For all our spiritual diseases, this is the remedy, upon which we may safely write, probatum est.

We have made ourselves sick by sinning. God is the physician, and he prescribes; affliction is the apothecary, and he prepares; the medicine is repentance, and that infallibly cures. It is a broken heart that makes us whole. God loves a true heart, and a clean heart, and an honest heart, and a humble heart; yea, and he loves a broken heart, too. 'The broken and contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise,' Ps. 51:17. It is true, we are bound to love him with our whole heart; but if it be broken with penitential sorrow for sin, he will heal the fracture, redintegrate the heart, and re-accept it wholly to himself. A contrite heart, broken in pieces with sorrow, and pickled up in brinish tears, is a sacrifice that God will not reject.

Whosoever hath such a heart, let him make much of it. It is a dish for the King of kings. Sin, repentance, and pardon, are like to the three vernal months of the year, March, April, and May. Sin comes in like March, blustering, stormy, and full of bold violence. Repentance succeeds like April, showering, weeping, and full of tears. Pardon follows like May, springing, singing, full of joys and flowers. If our hands have been full of March, with the tempests of unrighteousness, our eyes must be full of April, with the sorrow of repentance; and then our hearts shall be full of May, in the true joy of forgiveness.

Her soul. As there be no comforts like those of God, so there is nothing to which comforts are so welcome as to the soul. The pleasure which the body takes is but the body; yea, scarce the very shadow of pleasure. The soul of pleasure is the pleasure of the soul. There be many things pleasing to the body, wherein the sanctified soul takes no delight, especially in the day of trouble. In calamity, good nourishments are comfortable, good words are comfortable, good friends are comfortable, the physician is comfortable, a good spouse specially comfortable; but in respect of these comforts, which do nevertheless pass all understanding, we may say of them, as Job did to his visitant friends, 'Miserable comforters are ye all.' But blessed are the souls upon whom this Sun of comfort shineth; and happy are those showers of tears and sorrows, that shall be dried up with such beams of comfort; and 'blessed God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort,' 2

Cor. 1:3, to whom, with the Son and Holy Ghost, be all praise and glory, for ever and ever! Amen.

MONERGISM BOOKS

The Works of Thomas Adams, Copyright © 2021

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. By payment of the required fees, you have been granted the non-exclusive, non-transferable right to access and read the text of this e-book on-screen. No part of this text may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereinafter invented, without the express written permission of Monergism Books.

ePub, .mobi & .pdf Editions June 2021 Requests for information should be addressed to: Monergism Books, PO Box 491, West Linn, Oregon, 97068