The first Sermon upon the first Chapter

Here follow the words which Moses spoke to all Israel beyond Jordan, in the wilderness, in the plain against the Red Sea, between Paran and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Dizahab.

2 There are eleven journeys from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir, to Kadesh Barnea.

3 And it came to pass, that in the fortieth year, the first day of the eleventh month, Moses spoke to the children of Israel, according to all that ever the Lord had commanded him to say to them.

When god caused his law to be published in Mount Horeb, after his conveying of the people out of the thralldom of Egypt, thereby he showed to what end and purpose he had had pity of his people in delivering them: that is to wit, to be glorified thereby, as the mark where to we also must refer all the gracious gifts which he bestows upon us. Zachary the father of St. John Baptist, speaking of the great and sovereign deliverance that was made in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, faith, that Gods discharging of us from the hand and tyranny of our enemies, was to the end that we should serve him in holiness and righteousness all our lifelong. And this is a doctrine very common throughout the whole holy scripture. And for the same cause also is it said by the prophet Esa, that God has created a people to set forth his praise. Seeing then that the Law was given to the people, to make them perceive why they had been delivered from the bondage of Egypt: it was good reason that they should yield themselves to the obeying of God, which had showed himself their redeemer in such wise. Nevertheless the people were untoward, and could not find in their hearts to yield themselves pliable, in hearkening to the things that were told them in the name of their God. Yet ought they of right to have done it, feeling they had received so great & so inestimable a benefit. For God had uttered the mighty strength of his arm in delivering the people. Therefore ought they to have considered thus: Behold, our God has magnified himself towards us after a wonderful fashion, we have had as it were a visible presence of his majesty, if the heavens had opened and God had showed himself to our eyes, we should not have had a greater and more undoubted assurance of his nearness to us, to warrant us that he was our leader. Seeing then that God is so come down to us, and that it has pleased him to impart his goodness in such wise to us: is it not reason that we should be wholly his? And feeling he has reached out his hand to redeem us, ought we not to be his heritage, in as much as he has gotten us by his own mighty power? Had the people had one drop of wisdom, they should have yielded themselves with all humility, to receive the doctrine that was preached to them by Moses. Yeah and what authority deserved the Law, which was so confirmed with such store of miracles? For when God had chosen Moses to be his prophet: he not only commanded him to speak, but also took him up into the mountain, and separated him from the company of men, to the end that when he should come to set forth his Law, the people should accept him as an Angel, and not as a mortal creature. He was there forty days with out eating or drinking, to show that he was exempted from the common sort of men, and that God had taken him up as it were into his heavenly glory. And when he came down again, his face shone as bright as it had been another sun. Whereas men attribute homes to him, it is said that he had sunbeams roundabout him, that is to say, he had such a brightness as he was fine to wear a veil before his face. And whereto served that, but to ratify and confirm the law which God had given and committed to him, and to make it known that it was not a doctrine devised by a mortal man? Besides this, there was thundering and lightning and trumpets sounding [in the air,] so as it seemed that all one world should have gone to wreck: and there was not any place either high or low, which did not shake & tremble when God went about to utter his voice.

Seeing then that the law was so well sealed and with such majesty: must it not needs be that the people were worse than blocks, when they hearkened not to their God speaking with such force? Yet for all that, the law was despised, & even while God was preparing of his servant Moses to set it forth, behold, the people could not abide to since expressly the bringing of Gods will to them, but made them a Calf of gold, and fell flatly to setting up of new superstitions, even in spite of God, of whose power and favor they had so often had experience. Again, when the law was once given, the people trembled & quaked for a while, insomuch that they were enforced to say, if God speak anymore to us we be utterly undone: there is no way with us but death: and therewithal they stood aloof from the mountain, according also as they were commanded. It should seem then that there was some reverence. But the issue showed that all was but hypocrisy, and it appeared well that they were not rightly touched in their hearts, nor had taken lively root to profit in the doctrine. We see then in effect, that when God did first of all publish his law, it had very scant & slender hearing, & the people were not yet disposed to submit themselves to it as they should have done. By reason whereof God was fain to return to it again, notwithstanding that the people deserved not that God should cause Moses to serve still in that office. For was it not reason that they which had so despised the living God, should thenceforth have been left destitute of all truth? That the devil might have taken possession of them? That he might have made them stark blind? That they might have starved for want of lively food? And that they should have been poisoned with all the deceits and errors of Satan? Of a truth, the people were well worthy of such reward. But God had not an eye to the deserts of that wretched people. For he surmounted their sins with his infinite goodness, & proceeded in teaching of them still, even when they had showed themselves most stubborn & rebellious, and had matched their unthankfulness with such willfulness, as there seemed to be no way to come near them to do them good: & yet did God even use his mercy and vouchsafed to assay whether the people would suffer themselves to be brought back again or no. And that is the cause why Moses did not only set forth the Law in Horeb, but also used vehement exhortations therewithal, because he saw the lightness and inconstancy of the people, endeavoring and straining himself by all means to bring them back again to God.

Yet notwithstanding, God vouchsafed still, that in the end there should be an abridgement of the law, & that the same should be confirmed as it is contained in this book. And that is the cause why it is entitled Deuteronomy, which is as much to say as the Law repeated. Not that God brings in any new thing here: but for that he blames the people for their aforesaid lewdness, showing that his doctrine had been ill observed, like as when children do not profit well at school, but play the gross Asses, when they have school, spent a whole year and are never the further forward, they must be faine to return again to their Apci. And why? For notwithstanding that they have heard their schoolmaster, notwithstanding yet they be as ignorant as they were before, insomuch that instead of learning anything, a man shall see them continue still always at one stay. So then, our Lord upbraids the people of Israel with their brutish dullness, in repeating his law to them the second time. As if he should say, you be very ill scholars: for I have trained you sufficiently in my Law. The doctrine comprehended in the ten commandments contains the full perfection of all wisdom. Yet has not all this been enough for you, because you have no ears at all, or else they be too long, so that of all this while nothing is entered into your hearts, or rather you have not heard what I said to you. And therefore you must be faine to turn back again to your first lesson, and to your Apci; I must be faine to open my Law again to you, and to chew your meat to you, that you may digest it the better. And because you be so dull upon the spur, I must be fine to prick you forward, and to use greater force to waken you, that the hardness of heart which I see in you maybe amended.

Thus we see in effect, what the groundwork of this Book is: that is to wit, that God having erst already given his law to the people of Israel, and warranted it as much as was requisite: vouchsafed because of their hardheartedness & stubbornness, to give a larger declaration thereof, than Moses had put in writing as yet. And he has not only opened the meaning of the Law, but also exhorted the people to keep it better than they had done before, upbraiding them with their lewdness in that they had been so unruly and so ill disposed, to receive the instruction of their maker and redeemer at the first time. Now, all the things that we see in this people, belong to us. And would GOD we resembled not the Jews in any thing, I mean as in these points. But if ever there were too much hardness of heart in them, how much more is it to be found in us nowadays? For our Lord has spoken more than once once to us. If the law were well warranted in the hand of Moses: has the gospel been less confirmed to us in these days? If the earth were shaken then, if the trumpets sounded, if the lightning flew abroad, if thunder claps were heard: the Gospel also shaken both heaven and earth as now, as it is said by the Prophet Aggeus, and alleged by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Also we hear what S. Paul speaks of it in the third Chapter of the second Epistle to the Corinthians. The message of life and salvation (says he) which is contained in the Gospel, must needs be glorified as much or more than the doctrine of the Law, which was dead of itself and could not give men life.

Seeing then that God has uttered so great majesty in the Gospel, and his preaching of it to us has not been for once and away, but we have our ears beaten with it every day: let us see if we be good scholars, and whether we bear in mind the things that have been told us, so as God is honored at our hands. Are we linked to him? Alas, it is nothing so. For continue God never so much in setting forth his doctrine to us, wherein we do as it were see his heart laid open to us: yet are we locked up on our part, and we give him no entrance, but rather we be gadding and full of vanity, and we be so far off from being touched with the doctrine, and from receiving being to hold ourselves wholly to it, & to set our minds upon it, and to be settled in right obedience to it: that rather the clean contrary is to be seen. And so we see that the Jews are as a locking glass wherein we may behold our own rudeness, forwardness, unthankfulness & willful stubbornness against God.

Yes, and we be more blameworthy than the Jews for giving so slender ear to our God. For as I have told you already, the people of old time ought to have thought themselves bound to God, and to have yielded and given over themselves wholly to his service, because he had delivered them wholly from the thralldom of Egypt. And what is it that God has rid us from now at this time? Is it but from the tyranny of a mortal man, or of some earthly people? No, but we know that he has ransomed us from the chains of sin and of the devil, he has pulled us out of the gulf of death, devil, he has drawn us out of the dungeon of hell, and he has not only promised us the land of Canaan for an inheritance only, but also opened the heavens to us in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has taken possession thereof for us, Christ, to the end we might be sure that our abiding place and everlasting rest is made ready for us there. Seeing everlasting then that God has bound us in such wise to him, is not our unthankfulness double, yes or rather an hundredfold more shameful, than the unthankfulness of the people of old time?

Furthermore, whereas God has vouchsafed to hold on in the office of instructing, to teach the people which was so rude and rebellious: let us assure ourselves that he does the like towards us nowadays. Yes and it is requisite for us that he should so do (as I have said already): or else what would become of it? But since we see that God is so gracious as not to be weary of teaching us though it boot us not at the first day, teaching nor at the first year: let us assure ourselves that his dealing with us after that sort from day-to-day, is no more than needed. And it is a point well worth the marking. For men have itching cares, and be desirous to hear always new things: and if the doctrine of God be preached and set forth to them everyday, it becomes irksome to them and they wax weary of it. For to their seeming it is enough to speak of it once or twice, and they consider not how they forget the things which they ought to have born away. So then, to the end we wax not weary of the doctrine that is preached to us: let us mark that it is needful for us that God should put us still in mind of the things that he has taught us already: for our wits are short towards him. And therefore let us bethink ourselves well, and when so ever it is told us that there is but one God in whom we be, and that he is not only our maker, but also our father, and has adopted us to be his children, and moreover tied us to him by a much straighter band, in that he has redeemed us with the blood of his own son: when so ever we be put in mind of these things: although we have heard of them before, yet let us not say, tush, these things have been preached to us long ago: but let every of us enter into himself, and examine himself, and see whether the things that we have heard heretofore, be well printed in our hearts. Let us then enter into account after that sort. And why? For if we remembered well, that we be set in this world to the end to glorify our god: would we not be more mindful to discharge our duty towards him? If we considered the fatherly kindness that he uses in calling us his children, and which he has showed towards us once already in adopting of us in the person of his own son: and if we mark how dearly we cost our Lord Jesus Christ when he did set us free from endless death: should we not be desirous to give ourselves wholly to our God? Should we not be moved to yield him another manner of reverence than we do? Now therefore, when so ever we be unruly, so as the world carries us away, and we be entangled in earthly lusts and affections: let us assure ourselves it is because we have not given good ear to our God, when he speak to us, nor taken heed to it when he warned us of our duties. And therefore it is good for us to be put in mind of it, and to have God come back again to us and to say to us, you wretched folk, what mean you? When I have once taught you: the doctrine that is contained in my word ought to soak thoroughly into you, and yet notwithstanding you be still like little babes. This is it (say I) which we have to do, to the end we may find favor in Gods word, and be nourished therewith as with our ordinary food. We must assure ourselves, that the appointing of this order that we should be preached to all the time of our life, and that we should have our ears beaten continually with the things, which we ought to understand in one or two months, is not in vain.

Furthermore, if we do not so, if we subdue not ourselves to the hearing of our God, and suffer ourselves to be taught by him all the time of our life: let us be afraid least he execute the vengeance upon us, which he threatened once to the people of Israel by his Prophet Esa, saying that his law should be to them as a book shut up and sealed, so as if it were offered to men of skill, they should say, the letters are not to be seen, there is a seal upon then, I cannot tell what is within it: And if it were offered to ignorant and unlearned men: they should answer, we be not book learned, we never went to school, we cannot read. Love how God punishes all such as walk on in their brutishness, and will never submit themselves to him. True it is, that God bears with us for a time, and that (as I said before) although we be worthy to be cut off from his house, and to be bereft of his truth, so as he should give us up into Satan's hands, to be blinded with lies and to be poisoned by him: yet notwithstanding, our God having pity upon us, assays still to win us to himself. But if we continue still in refusing the good doctrine, and become never the better for it at the year's end, than we were at the first day: at length this threat must needs light upon us, namely that we shall take the holy scripture into our hands, and have it preached to us, and yet we shall understand never a whit of it, though we be never so witty: and that when as the unlearned shall say, I know not what it means, it shall also be as a letter folded up and fast sealed, even to them that are skill fullest and sharpest known. Wherefore let us stand in fear of such threatening: and least our light be turned into darkness, let us take hold of the opportunity which God offers us nowadays, that we may fare the better by his continual speaking to us after that sort.

True it is that speaking the things which are contained here were spoken to the people of Israel, and might have profited them in their time: but yet do they also belong to us at this day, and they be as a common treasure whereof God will have us to be partakers. For as we shall see hereafter, the Law was not only given as a rule whereby to live well: but also grounded upon the covenant which God had made with Abraham and his offspring. And by virtue of that covenant, we are become heirs of the heavenly kingdom, as shows Saint Paul. To seek our salvation, we must resort to the promise that was made to our father Abraham: and to be of the household of Gods Church and members of our Lord Jesus Christ, we must be of Abrahams spiritual lineage .Hereby then we see, that this doctrine not only served till the coming of the son of God: but also serves still to our behalf, and shall do so still to the worlds end. For it is a building that is founded upon the everlasting covenant, from whence as from the true fountain thereof, our salvation springs as I said before.

Wherefore let us mark, that when so ever God shall henceforth speak to the Jews, the same is spoken also to us: and we must receive it in such wise, as we must understand that God has shed forth his grace through the whole world by the coming of his only son, and built up the heavenly Jerusalem, to the end that we should all be linked together in one holy brotherhood, to call upon him as our father all with one mouth. Since it is so then, let us understand that it is good reason that we should give over ourselves to him, and that he should hold us in awe, and enjoy us, and that like as he has vouchsafed to give himself to us, so we on our side should be wholly his, to yield him the duty which children owe to their father; and that when we be negligent and slow therein, we should at least wise be moved with the exhortations that are contained in this book: and that seeing God calls upon us so earnestly, we should not stop our ears against him but every man awake, and one of us rebuke another: Yes and that if we were wise, we should not carry till God quickened us up so sharply, but rather prevent him, albeit that we ought to be moved to be ashamed of our lewdness and to return again to God, at least wise when he falls to correcting of us by thundering out his threatening against us, and by upbraiding of us with our sins. Thus we see what we have to mark in general upon this book.

Now let us come to the text that I have rehearsed before. These are the words which Moses spoke to the people in the wilderness, in the plain (or champion grounds) beyond Jordan, even from Horeb to the places here beyond before Jordan, rehearsed. Herein we have to note, that God intended to rebuke the people for their not keeping of the law, which had not only been preached to them by mouth, but also set down in writing: as if a man should make an instrument or conveyance, of some bargain between two parties. And God himself vouchsafed to engrave his Law (at least wise the ten commandments) in two tables, to the intent they might be remembered the better. For albeit that the doctrine was clear enough of itself, and god had provided to preserve it from forgetting: yet did not the people receive it forgetting. Therefore as now he casts them in the teeth, as if it should be said to us, Behold, the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ having been preached with such power and majesty is also left in writing. We have had the Gospel preached to us now a long time even the fame Gospel which is set down to us in Books. Therefore are we too inexcusable, if we cannot tell what God says to us inexcusable, there. If a man should speak after that manner, it were a blaming of us for our beastliness. Again, if it should be said that whereas we were baptized in the name of the son of God, when we were babes yet we know him not: that being come to mans estate, we be so brutish that after so often hearing of Gods truth, yet we be still but novices in it: and that we can scarcely tell what it is, or at leastwise have never taken any test of it at all: such manner of opening of the gospel to us, how it has been offered us of long time and after diverse fashions, were as a framing of an inditement against us. So now like wise Moses, to witness openly to the people that they had showed themselves too unthankful towards God, said expressly: These are the words that I uttered and preached to you from time to time, not for a day or two, but ever since the publishing of the Law in the mountain of Horeb. And because you showed yourselves so ill disposed, I have not ceased to put you still in remembrance of the things that you had heard before. Now let us learn hereby, to be the better quickened up and since we see it has been Gods will, that even from the beginning of the world, his truth should have some certain record among men and that he has not ceased to set it forth still, and to raise it up again when men have gone about to bury it by their spitefulness: let us acknowledge his wonderful goodness in so doing, and be moved to receive the things that shall be spoken to us. Mark that for one point.

But to the end we may be the better disposed: we must also weigh this saying which Moses adds, Even according to all that God had commanded him. Now by this preface he shows, that he brought not anything of his own, he meant to subdue the people to his own dotages, nor to anything that he could have devised of his own reason and wisdom as in respect of men, but that he did simply obey God, as a faithful and trusty messenger, without swerving aside either to the right hand or to the left; Now if Moses who had so excellent a record as we see, insomuch that God never raised up any Prophet equal or like to him: If Moses the prince of all Prophets next to Jesus Christ, and the chief of all under the old Law, do nevertheless protest that he puts not forth anything of his own head: I pray you what shall thing others do? May they compare themselves with him? No: but put the case that they be as highly advanced and placed as he: yet notwithstanding, the furthest that they ought to go, is but to set forth the things that God has commanded them. And therefore let us learn, that here all men's traditions are shut out of doors. And hereby it appears, that the Pope has marred and corrupted the whole order of the Church, by his taking up him to be a Lawmaker, to devise laws and to lay them upon men's necks at his own pleasure, to forge and contrive new articles of faith, and to enforce men to receive his inventions as the holy scriptures. Was not this a turning of all things upside down? Yes: for God never meant that men should have such liberty and sway in the Church, as to set forth any of their own inventions there, but he himself only be heard there. Mark that for one point.

But there is yet more in it: for it is not only said that Moses spoke according to the charge that was given him: but according to all that ever the Lord had commanded him. He shows then, that he did not as it were make a medley, or seek by any means to bring in what he himself thought good, or to separate himself from Gods word: but that he followed Gods will from point to point to the uttermost. You see then that there was a great singleness of heart in Moses, insomuch as he not only gave forth the things that he had received at Gods hand: but also continued throughout in the same singleness of keeping himself within his bounds, so as he ranged not abroad to say, this is good, or that is good, thus or thus do I think of this matter. No: but in all points he ruled himself according to the charge of his commission, uttering his message according as he had heard God speak it. Mark that for the second point.

Now here with all we be warned to receive the doctrine here contained, not as coming from a mortal man. In speaking to us, Moses protests that he himself is not our schoolmaster though he rehearses our lesson to us; but that must always be God and his holy spirit, that must be even our Lord Jesus Christ, in whose hand the Law was given, as S. Paul speaks of him. For he was the governor of the Church at all times. You see then that the thing which we have to consider here, is that we must reverently and carefully receive the things that were given us by the hand of Moses. Not that we may think that anything came of himself: but that God sent him and ordained him to be his instrument, so that when we receive anything that was spoken by Moses, we may warrant ourselves that God guides and governs us by his own pure truth, and that our faith rests not upon men nor upon any mortal creature, but that the living God is the author, and will also be the warrantor thereof.

Now after he has spoken so, he says, that his rehearsing of all these things was in the fortieth year, the eleventh month, and the first day of the month. As if it had been said, when the people drew nigh to the land of promise and were ready to enter into it: then did he repeat the Law of God, and make an abridgement of it, and rehearse all the exhortations and warnings which he had made to them before. Not that Moses had held his peace and kept silence ever since [the giving of the Law] Horeb: for as I have told you already, he ceased not to call upon the people continually, because he saw them so willful and stubborn, and so stiff-necked and hard to be bowed. But in the end, for as much as he drew near to his long home, and had as good as finished his race and should anon after depart out of this world, (as we shall see that he did in the end of this book:) he made a rehearsal of all the doctrine that he had preached by the space of forty years, of purpose to ratify and confirm it in such wise to the people, as their successors might be edified by it after his decease, and the profit thereof redound to us at this day, and we be taught all the lessons contained therein. Nevertheless, we see moreover, that the people ought ere that time to have been thoroughly subdued, and to have submitted themselves better to God than they did. For forty years are a good reasonable time to dispose a man to goodness if ever he will be good.

When we see a man has been let chaw upon the bridle by the space of forty years, and yet will give ear to no counsel nor reason: it is then near time or never for him to bethink himself, and to fall to better disposition and ripeness of discretion than he has done before, if he be told of his fault. God therefore perceiving his people to be so wild, gave them time and respect to become tame, and led them about by the space of forty years, which thing he did to them for their stubbornness sake, as we shall see hereafter. But the thing that we have to mark at this present, is no more but that the cause why Moses spoke now to the people, was for that he drew near his end, and God was at the point to take him out of the world, and also for that the people should be as it were renewed at that time. For it had been said to them that had refused to enter into the land [of Canaan,] Your carcasses shall rot here in the wilderness, you be not worthy to possess the inheritance which your God promised to his servant Abraham. You see then that when the people were after a sort renewed at the end of forty years, then did Moses set forth the Law again, and speak to them according to Gods commandment. Now must we also apply this to our instruction. That is to say, when so ever we have been so far overseen, as not to profit in Gods school, so as we continue Asses still, or at leastwise have but pickled upon the doctrine, without suffering it to work any true liveliness in us: if God subdue us and prepare us better by continuance of time to hearken to him: let us advise ourselves to make our profit thereof, and let us not be unamendable. For what shall we win by it in the end if we continue still unruly and be so stubborn that God cannot overmaster us? Shall it not turn to our confusion? Therefore as well publicly as privately, let us bethink us to profit ourselves by this warning, and if we have ill received the doctrine that has been long preached to us heretofore: let us consider that in as much as God does not yet give us over, but uses such mercy towards us: his desire is to draw us still to him, and therefore let us prepare ourselves, that we become not stubborn against him, but rather let us learn to be meek, and let us give way to the doctrine, that it may enter into our minds and hearts. Thus you see how we ought to behave ourselves.

Furthermore when God visits us and sends us any corrections, to humble us and to abate our over great unthankfulness and forwardness: let us turn over a new leaf and return again to him. And when we have done so generally for the whole body of the Church: let every of us do the like privately on his own behalf. If any man have run astray, and never known God aright, nor ever submitted himself fully to the wholesome doctrine: if God visit him by sickness poverty or otherwise how so ever it be: let him bethink himself and say, Alas, the Gospel has been preached to me, but how have I received it of all this while? I knew not my God, and although I processed myself to be one of his numbers, yet did it not touch me at the heart. How shall I now do therefore? Since it is Gods will to have me to be his scholar, it is good reason that I yield myself wholly to him and that I reverence him as I ought to do my sovereign master and teacher. Thus you see that the thing whereof we be warned in this text, is that when we see how our Lord endeavored by all means to bring us back, and is minded to beat down the rebelliousness that is in us, by rebuking our vices: and that he gathers us home to him when he sees us go astray, to the intent to reform us: we must not kick against the spur as I said, but rather meekly and mildly seek to be governed by him, and to profit more and more in his word.

Now let us cast ourselves down in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of the innumerable faults which we cease to commit daily against his Majesty: praying him to vouchsafe daily to wipe them out through his free goodness, and therewithal to bring us home again to him, and to work so in us by his holy spirit, as our consciences maybe mortified from day-to-day, until we be rid quite and clean of all the corruptions of our flesh, to be clothed again with his righteousness. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father etc.

On Monday, the 25th of March 1555

The second Sermon upon the first Chapter

3 And it came to pass, that in the fortieth year, the first day of the eleventh month, Moses spoke to the children of Israel, according to all the things that the Lord had commanded him to say to them:

4 After he had overcome Sihon, King of the Amorites which dwelt in Heshbon, and Og, King of Bashan which dwelt at Ashtaroth in Edrei.

5 And so Moses began to declare the Law beyond Jordan in the land of Moab, saying:

6 The Lord our God spoke to us in Mount Horeb, saying: you have stayed long enough at this mountain.

7 Turn you and depart, that you may go to the hill of the Amorites, and to all the Countries thereabouts, in the plain about the hill, and in the low places towards the South, and upon the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Canaan, and in Libanus to the River, even the great river of Euphrates.

8 Look about you, I have set the land before you, enter into it and possess the land which the Lord God has sworn to your fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give it to them and to their seed after them.

Have told you already, that the doctrine which is contained here, is not the beginning of a matter, as though it had been new to the people, and that God had not taught it them before: but a confirmation of the things that Moses had spoken in Horeb, because the people had not profited so well by them as they ought to have done. And it has been declared further; that God had spend the space of forty years or thereabouts in subduing the people, which had been over stubborn even at the very first, and could in no wise abide to take his yoke. For this cause is the time set out here, to the end that we might understand, that the people ought to have framed themselves to some obedience, after so hard and so long a chastisement as you had endured. Besides this, there is one other circumstance: which is, that people had already had some victory against Og, king of Basan and his neighbors, wherein they had had experience of Gods favor. And I told you that those things were worthy to be marked, because they be the two means whereby God draws men to him, to win them withal and to enjoy them. On the one side he chastises them, to that end they may learn to obey him as being under his hand and authority: and on the other side he uses gentleness, to make men in love with him, and to consider that nothing is better for them, than to stick to him at whose hand they look for all welfare. And both of these are expressed here by Moses: namely that the people had lingered in the desert forty years long, feeling Gods horrible punishment for their shrinking away from him: and yet nevertheless, had overcome Sihon and Og and such like kings, albeit not by their own power, but by Gods help.

Wherefore let us learn to profit ourselves, with them for offending him, as well by Gods scourges when we be beaten with them for offending him, as also by his benefits whereby he witnesses that he is ready to receive men to his mercy, and to have pity upon them when they return to him. And let such knowledge make us teachable. When so ever it pleases God to preach his words to us, let us have our hearts open to receive it: let us be playable to follow that which he commands: and to be short, let us yield ourselves wholly to his goodness.

Now it is said here, that Moses expounded the Law, albeit that in the Hebrew there is a word which signifies, that he vouchsafed, or listed to declare the Law. And that serves to show still that he performed his commission with a free courage or willing mind. For it may be that he whom God commands to teach his people, shall discharge himself thereof, albeit but as it were by force: and such necessity, if a man have an eye to it, does always import a constraint, so that all that all that ever we do shall be nothing worth. And here the ministers of Gods word are exhorted, not only to preach the word that is committed to them: but also to do it with a free and cheerful courage, according also as S. Paul avows it to be requisite, and protests that he himself did so. And therefore let the example as well of Moses as of S. Paul, serve for our instruction.

Moreover, let us mark also, that under this saying of the Law, is comprehended the rehearsal of the things that Moses intended to make, of the things that were come to pass. True it is that the word Law betokens teaching and instruction: and therefore a man might ask at the first blush, what instruction there is in the report of stories. It is not without cause, that Moses has said so. For when God puts us in remembrance of our sins, and of the benefits that he has bestowed upon us, and of the chastisements which we have received at his hand: it ought to teach us to our profit. Gods setting of such things before us, is not to make us pastimes: but to the end, that on the one side we should be the better disposed to serve him, and to continue in his fear, and on the other side be trained and allured to resort to him, and to seek all our welfare and all that ever belongs to our salvation, at his hand. We see then how it is not without cause, that Moses gives the name of Law or Doctrine, to the rehearsal of things that were come to pass, for so much as by that means the people ought to have been led to God, and to have been the better edified. And therefore let us mark, that when we read the holy stories, it is not only to know what has been done, to the end we may be able to talk to it: but to the end we should behold there the grace of God towards the faithful in delivering them. Also we must consider after what manner he has exercised his children in patience, and made them to wade through many afflictions, that their faith might be tried: and consequently how he never forsakes them at the point of need and necessity. Again we must consider the justice that he has executed in punishing such as have done amiss and transgressed his will. If we have such regard and discretion with us, the Stories will be as an instruction to us. For we shall be better assured by them, than if GOD did but simply tell us what he requires at our hands and what our duty is. That then is the thing which we have to bear in mind: and it will be a good preparative for us to the things that are to ensue. For otherwise it would be thought an unprofitable thing, to know that Moses chose men to govern the people, and that on the other side the people followed not Gods commandment in pursuing their enemies, and such other like things. What have we to do with those things, will some men say? But for as much as we be admonished, that all these things concern our instruction: we must put them to such use as nothing may be unoccupied: assuring ourselves that God procured our benefit and welfare, when he did set forth to us as it were in a painted table, the things that belong to us at this day, and may be applied to our instruction.

Whereas it is said, That it is enough that the people had tarried a certain time at Mount Horeb: therein we see that Gods delivering of the children out of the bondage of Egypt, was not to lay the bridle in their neck that they might go where they listed: but to be their governor forever. And that is a thing that ought to stand us in good stead. For we have a president, that when God receives us for his people, it is not only for a day or twain, but for purpose to have a continual care of us to the end, so as he will not leave us in the middle way, but proceed in guiding of us still, until we become to our right mark. And this is a very profitable doctrine: for what a thing were it, if God should once give us his law, and set us in a good trade and afterward let us alone without looking to us? We see our own frailty, in so much that we could not step one step but we should be ready to stumble or to start out of the way, and the encumbrances are so many and so great, as it would be impossible for us to overcome them, if god assisted us not. And therefore let us learn, that when God has once adopted us, and chosen us to be of his flock: it is not to the end we should but only take a taste of his grace for a day: but to the end that he will continue in doing us good: and his taking of us into his government, is of purpose never to give us over, so as we shall always be under his protection, and he will never cease to increase the good turns that we have felt and received of him, until we become to the full perfection. For as much then as we see that he never leaves his work unperfected, but goes through with it, as it is said in the Psalm: it ought well to cause us to magnify his goodness, and to encourage us to give ourselves wholly to him. And the same belongs to the spiritual health of ourselves, according to this saying of S. Paul in the first Chapter to the Philippians, that he which has begun the good work will go through with it, even to the day of our Lord Jesus Christ. Wherefore let us mark, that whereas God declares here by the mouth of Moses, that the people had tarried long enough about mount Horeb, and that he would have them to go forward: thereby he does us to understand, that feeling he has delivered us from the dungeon of death, and from the bondage of the devil and of sin: we shall have him to be our guide forever, so we hearken to his voice, and doubt not but he thinks upon us and will continually lead us still.

Moreover he says, Let the people turn and draw towards the hill of the Amorites, and from there invade and possess the land of Canaan, whether it be the plain Countries, or the downs, or the deserts, or the seacoasts: for the land (says he) is before you: that is to say at your commandment, I have delivered it into your hands, nothing shall keep you from the possession of it, if it be not long of yourselves. Why so? For I have sworn (says he) to your fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: I have promised to give it for an inheritance to them and to their seed after their decease. Here first of all we must mark the order that is set down: for God shows the cause why he gave that people the land [of Canaan:] namely for his promise sake. And thereby he betokens, that the land belonged not to them as by way of conquest through their own power, not yet for any desert of theirs, but only of free gift. God then assigns this title to the children of Israel, and tells them that they shall be as much bound to his mere goodness when they be brought into the land of Canaan, [as they were before.] And indeed the oath that Moses speaks of here, was made four hundred and thirty years before, even in the person of Abraham, before any of them was born. Seeing then that GOD had promised them the land, even before they had done either good or evil, and before they were born: it may be concluded thereupon, that their possessing of it was not for any worthiness of theirs, as though God had been beholden to them for some service: but because he had made them heirs of it, through his own free goodness. Now if this be verified of the earthly heritage which the children of Israel had: what is to be said of the kingdom of heaven? Are we able to compass it? Can we deserve at Gods hand to be partakers thereof? No: but contrariwise, it is of his mere goodness that we be brought in thither, and shall have fruition of it at the last day: for surely all that is spoken of the land of Canaan, must serve us for a figure and shadow.

Therefore when as God tells the people that they get it not by their own power, and sends them back to the promise that he had made long ago: it is to show us that whereas he is our father, whereas we be maintained by him in this world, and whereas we look for a better and more excellent life than this: we must not dream upon any desert or power of our own, but attribute all wholly to his mere free goodness, in that he utters the infinite treasures of his grace and love towards us. Thus much have we to remember in the first place.

Furthermore whereas here is mention made of an oath: let us note that God vouchsafed to stoop so low to the infirmity of the people, as to put them out of all doubt, by swearing by his own name: and so does he now likewise towards us.

For he is not contented to speak only, and to tell us what he will have us to do: but he also confirms his promises with a solemn oath. And why? For as much as we be inclined to unbelief, and would ever be wavering if we were not well under propped: therefore does he swear to the end to stabilize us the better.

Seeing then that God swears to uphold our weakness: let us consider, first that we be too untoward, if we cannot believe his single word: and secondly that his goodness is inestimable, in that it pleases him to bear with us, and to swear for the confirming of our belief. And wherewithal we have to note also, that we must not seek Gods will in the air, but content ourselves with his word; and that seeing it has pleased him to show himself to us, and to give us warrant of his will, we must hold us to it, and rest wholly upon it.

Now then, will we be sure that God will never fail us, neither in this life, not after we be gone hence? Will we have an infallible hope of the heavenly life? Let us have our eye upon the promises: let us not wander here and there as a number do, which are carried away with fond curiosity: but let it suffice us that God has certified and taught us, that he will not only be a father to us to guide us in this world, but also that he will never leave us, so as we shall always be governed by him, and that when he has tried our faith, we shall have full fruition of the things that are promised us: and when we be once rid of this mortal body, we shall be raised up again, and enjoy and immortality which is hid from us as now. Let us content ourselves (say I) with this word of Gods mouth for all other things, and let us not seen after our own foolish fancies how the matter shall go: but have God once spoken the word, let us hold us to it. And that is it which Moses meant here, in saying, God swear to your fathers.

Moreover we must note, that the doctrine which is set forth in the name of God, serves not for one age only, but for all ever, and keeps his force and strength continually. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were dead and rotten in the earth when these things were spoken: but yet the promise that God has made to them was alive still. Although then that men be mortal and transitory: yet is God's word everlasting. And if it be the seed of the incorruptible life, needs must it be endless and exempted from all corruption.

Therefore let us mark, that Gods speaking in old time, was not to the end that his doctrine should be set before us to the end of the world, and we receive it with all reverence. Likewise at this day, although the Prophets and Apostles be dead: yet does GOD work still by them, and the word that is brought among us in these days, not only has his lively force, but also quickens us, and makes us to receive the food of our selves by it. Our salvation must needs go toward, and we must needs be stabilized in it, in such wise, as we may overcome the world and attain to the kingdom of heaven. Thus you see what we have to bear in mind, when as mention is made here, of the promise that God swear to the ancient fathers that were dead long time before.

And it is said expressly, that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were their fathers: to the end that they might know themselves to be the successors of the blessing that had been promised. And therefore he adds, that God had sworn to give that Land to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and to their offspring. As though Moses should say, that Gods promise is not disannulled, but must now presently take effect, and be accomplished in their persons. Has God said so, says he? Then must you consider, that he speak it not only to your fathers which heard the promise, but also to [you which are] their offspring. For it is expressly said, that Abraham should teach his children the ways, rights, judgments, and features of the Lord. Then was it for the children of Israel, to have received the promise that had been made in old time to their fathers, as if God had spoken it within fresh remembrance. And indeed we ought to weigh well this circumstance. For it is not to those only which were at the beginning of the Gospel, that God says, I receive you for my people: but his will is that the same doctrine should be preached still, to the worlds end. Let us note then, that we also are comprehended with them that heard the word of god at the beginning. And for as much as his grace reached out to all men, and is common to all ages: it becomes us to give ear to it, seeing it is appointed and offered to us [as well as to them.] And why? For it is not to S. Peter and to S. Paul only, that god has said, I am your Savior: but he has ordained them to be messengers of his goodness, that we might be taught by their mouth, and we doubt not but God will do the like to us as he did to them. Thus you see what we have to consider, when as it is said that God promised the land of Canaan for an inheritance to the whole lineage of Abraham, and to them that should descend of his race.

And in very deed it behooved the people always to come back to this saying I am your God and the God of yours offspring after you. And again to this, I am the Lord which shows mercy to a thousand generations: as we shall see hereafter. Now, this was not said for that one time only, it must be accomplished nowadays also. Then let us consider that God having once planted the warrant of our salvation, will have it go forward daily, so as we should know that he calls us to the possessing of his kingdom, and that in us he calls them that are to come after us: In so much that the children which come to Christians, are already chosen of God to be his flock and of his household, and God has taken that to himself already, even before they come out of their mother's womb. Is not the knowledge of such doctrine an excellent strengthening to us, when we see that God has given our salvation a ground to build upon, before we were born or created? Yes.

But here it might be demanded how the land was promised to the fathers which never had possession of it? For we know that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob acknowledged themselves to be but sojourners there, and that they had not the Lordship of the land, but that they were as poor wanderers, and were tossed to and fro, in so much that even their water was taken from them, so as they had not water to drink, and not only were kept from coming to the pits that had been dug already, but also were put from water when they had dug pits by their own labor and travel. Where is then the promise of God which he made to Abraham, concerning the giving of the land to him? Hereby we be put in mind of that which the Apostle says in the Epistle to the Hebrews: that is to wit, that the ancient fathers had not an eye to the visible land: but only took it as a representation of the everlasting dwelling place where to God calls them: In so much that although Abraham had not any possession in the land of Canaan, yet was he Lord and master of it nevertheless, albeit that he held himself contented with the only sight that God gave him thereof, to the end he might have his heart lifted up into heaven, and wait to have his everlasting abode there. Thus to be short, the Lordship which Abraham had of the visible land, was spiritual. For although in mans opinion he had no whit at all of it, but was like to have been driven out of it every day: yet possessed the thing that God had promised him.

But now if we make comparison between Abraham and us, have we not greater cause to lift up our hearts to the kingdom of heaven than he had, seeing we not only have a mirror or image of it set before us by God, but also that Jesus Christ has in his own person opened us such a way thither, as our faith, may well attain to the glory of God? Therefore ought we to be the better confirmed in the promise that God has made to us, of advancing us into his kingdom to enter into it as his lawful heirs thereof.

And although we do but as it were crepe on all four here below upon the earth, and our body is to us as a corruptible and transitory lodging, and we be weighed down with these base things: yet must our true dwelling place needs be above, and we ourselves must needs be citizens of heaven and fellows with the Angels beforehand, and posses the thing beforehand by faith and hope, which we have not as yet in very deed, as the holy fathers have done before us, who notwithstanding had not things opened so plainly and manifestly to them, as we have now, nor nothing near.

Thus see you the manner how Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were not disappointed of the land which God promised to give you, although they never had the full fruition thereof themselves, but waited patiently till the convenient time were come, for God to put their successors in possession of it after their decease. Since it is so, let us walk on upon earth in sufferance of many conflicts, looking only upon the things that are promised us, not doubting but that we be sure of the benefit of them already, although we hold them not in our hands, not behold them with our eyes. For why? God cannot fail his promises.

But now let us come to the joining together of the things that Moses sets down: for he says, Draw towards the land and possess it, for it is at your commandment, according as God swear to your fathers. Here Moses matches Gods promises, with the exhortations which he himself makes: for the true fashion of building when men are to be brought to God, that they may honor him and serve him and seek his kingdom, is to begin at his free promises, and to view that he prevents us through his own mere goodness, that the passes not whether we be good or not, and that although we have not deserved ought at his hand, yet does he of his mere free goodness come to us, and bind himself to us without any cause why. Thus you see at what end we must begin. Again, men must be exhorted and warned not to despise such a benefit, but to receive it, and therewithal to enforce and endeavor themselves to answer God when he calls them. This is the order which we must observe in this text of Moses.

Draw hence (says he) and march forward. As if he should say, Go to, your God has called you longer time than you be aware of. For indeed, the promised of salvation was given us before we were created; yes, even before the creation of the world did God choose us, as S. Paul avouches: and again he has fetched us back to him, when we were as cattle gone astray. Look how Gods mere free goodness shows itself. We cannot allege here any strength or any worthiness of our own: We cannot say, oh, God has paid us our wages for our coming to him: There is no such thing at all. But at such time as we were forlorn and damned, our God opened us the gate of salvation: when we were in Satan's bonds, he did set us free: when we were become his utter enemies and were banished out of his kingdom, he made us heirs thereof. Therefore like as he has freely prevented us, and shows us still that it is of his own mere grace, that we can attain to salvation: so we on our side must not be negligent and slothful: but feeling he has spoken to us, we must also answer to him: feeling that he says, Go, march on, let us be going our way out of hand.

When there is any talk of doing good or of serving God, the Papists imagine by and by that men earn the kingdom of heaven by their own deserts or merits: but the holy scripture holds the clean contrary order, as we see here. For why? It is not said that men bind God to them by their meritorious deeds: but after that the inheritance is set before them, and that of free gift: and after it is showed them, that nothing bears sway in that behalf but only Gods goodness: then it is said to them, March forward. And so we learn to do good, and to give ourselves to the serving of God, and to become holy through his righteousness: not of purpose to make him beholden to us, but to follow his holy calling, least we should react his grace, albeit that we cannot stir one finger without Gods working in us by his holy spirit. For whereas it is said, Get you hence and march forward: it is not for that the people was able so to do: but when God has once encouraged us, he prints his doctrine in our hearts, and to the intent the same should not be unavailable, he quickens us up: and to be short, he works so mightily in us, that after he has once given us willingness, he gives us also performance therewithal, according to S. Paul avouches in the second to the Philippians. Yet for all this, we must bear well in mind the thing that I have touched already: which is, that

Gods offering of his grace to us, is not to the end we should as it were fall asleep and make none account of it: but to the end we should be quickened up to do good, according to this saying, that his goodness and love which he bears towards men, is uttered to the intent to purchase him a holy people fit for good works, and [to the end] that we should walk in all pureness, waiting for the discovery of the life which he has promised us. And if this had place under the shadows of the law: much more must we do it now in these days. So then, let us mark well, that Gods setting of the infinite riches of his goodness and mercy before us and his opening of the gate of heaven to us, is to the end we should mount up to him, and rid ourselves of all earthly affections, seeking nothing but to lift up our hearts on high, and to pass out of this world, and to be discharged of all bonds and fetters that hinder us and hold us back, endeavoring with all our might to come to him, as they that know how this present life is but as a race, and that men must not loiter and linger here, but rather go still forward according to gods calling of us, who says, Come, Come, draw nearer to me. And if we go to him, we shall no more be in danger of wandering here and there, but we shall keep on our way to the mark that God has set before us, and we will never rest till we become thither.

Now therewithal, to the intent to encourage the people, Moses tells them that they shall not travel in vain. Go (says he) and possess the land: and that is one point more well worth the noting. For if we should bestow our labor, and not know that we shall fare ever the better by serving God: we would become lazy, and our hearts would fail us every minute of an hour. But when we be sure that we run not in vain, and that God will reach us his hand, so as we need not to fear but our matters shall come to pass, though Satan strain himself to hinder us: when we stand upon such a sure ground that our Lord will put us in possession of the things that he offers us: it gives us an invincible courage and constancy to outstand all temptations.

And therefore let us weigh well these words where he says, get you hence and possess the land. God says not singly to his faithful ones, go your ways, see what you can do, try your strength, and in the meanwhile leaves them at all adventures: no, but he says to them, go to possess. As if he should say, do but only apply yourselves to serve me, and let me alone with the doing of it. For I will work after such a sort, as he that endeavourers to follow me shall not lose his labor, he shall not take pain in vain. I will make all his doings to prosper. That then is the thing that we have to mark upon this strain. And therefore what excuse is there for us, if we follow not our Lord whither forever he call us, considering that his voice, Go and possess, ought to found in our ears? And if it were spoken for the land of Canaan, much more shall it be avowed and verified still at this day. Wherefore when so ever we be slow to obey God, loath to part from this world, or astonished with distresses: let us enter into such thoughts as these: Alas, is it possible for to me to come to God? How many I overcome so many and so great distresses? It far surmounts all my power and strength. When we be so encumbered and brought in perplexity and doubt, let us bethink ourselves thus: well, seeing it has pleased God to show himself to me, it is good reason that I should be contented with the assurance that he has given me, and with the experience of his goodness which he has made me to feel. And so must we pass on forward still, notwithstanding all the temptations of distrust that may come in our heads.

And for a further confirmation of ourselves, let us also take to us this saying of his, I have set the land before you: for it expresses yet better how they should possess it. If men have an eye but to their own power, and consider but their own abilities: they may well distrust and utterly despair. But when we know how it is Gods office to give us the strength which we want of ourselves, and to perform our salvation whereof he himself is the founder: that is the thing wherein lies our trust. And therefore without presuming anything of ourselves, let us run on with a cheerful courage: but yet let us consider nevertheless therewithal, how it is God that utters his power for the working of our salvation, and that he is the author thereof, and reserves the leading of us to himself, in such sort, as the possession thereof is already in his hand. Now if we intend to fare the better by his doctrine, first let us put out of our minds all vain imagination of our own strength, of our own freewill, and of all that ever men have surmised. For those are the things wherewith the devil has made men drunken, an beguiles them still, by bearing them in hand that they can do much of themselves. And we see how the Papists are puffed up with that devilish pride yet still at this day. There is descanting among them of their own Freewill, there is descanting of their own forwardness: and yet as able folk as they be, they do no sooner set forth one step, but they be ready to break their necks. And well worth: for God must needs laugh their overweening to scorn, yes or rather punish it, because it is a robbing of God. But whereas it is said, that it is God which has set the land at their commandment: let us understand that there is no strength in us, and that we must rid ourselves of all self-trust. And when we be so beaten down, then let us take heart again, assuring ourselves that God will go through with his work, and that he has not forgot his cunning, and that he will never give over till he have brought the things to pass which he has promised us. Again, it if were so that the land of Canaan was to be set before the people of Israel, and that the same was to be done by the hand of God: I pray you must not we be fain to have the kingdom of heaven set before us? [yes surely.] For that people had but mortal men to overcome, that they might enter into the possession of a strange country. But we must overcome Satan the prince of the world, we must overcome a hundred thousand enemies that fight against us, yes and all that ever we have of our own must be done away. We must fly up on high: and what a distance is there from hence to heaven? Then seeing it is so, let us resort to our God, let us put ourselves wholly into his hand, let us call upon him with loveliness and reverence. And therewithal let us walk on in such sort, as we suffer him to guide and govern us, assuring ourselves that he will never fail us. For if we proceed after that fashion, we shall find that the trust which we have to attain to salvation, will not puff up with all self weaning, but make us to yield God his due honor in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them more and more, and that therewithal we acknowledging our infirmities, and perceiving ourselves to be poor and naked of all goodness, may run wholly to him, so as we seeing that there is no cause why we should glory in ourselves, may seek our whole glory in his only goodness and mercy. And that for as much as we have not now an only Moses to lead us into the land of Canaan, but Jesus Christ which is come down to us to draw us up into heaven after him: we may follow such a guide, yielding ourselves wholly to him, and in no wise dragging back from him, saying he will have us to come to God his father. That is may please him to grand this grace not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth et cetera.

The third Sermon upon the first Chapter

9 And at the same time I spoke to you, saying, I cannot bear you myself alone:

10 The Lord your God has multiplied you: and behold, you are this day in number as the stars of the sky.

11 The Lord the God of your fathers make you to increase a thousand times as many as you be, and bless you as he has said to you.

12 How shall I alone bear your cumbrance, charge and strife?

13 Bring me from among you, men of wisdom and understanding, and tried men, according to your tribes, and I will make them your heads.

14 Then answered you me and said: It is good to do as you have said.

15 Then took I the heads of your tribes, men of wisdom and skill, and made them governors over you, rulers over thousands, over hundreds, over fifties, over tens, and officers among your tribes.

Among the benefits that God bestowed upon the people of Israel after his delivering of them from the thralldom of Egypt, one is that he did always lay hold on them to govern them. For without that, what would become of men? If all things be well considered, there is less government in them, than in brute beasts. So that, it was needful that God should take order for the governing of them. And now Moses puts the people in remembrance how God had been their guide at all times, and had not only been contented to rid them out of the horrible thralldom wherein they had been held, but also had established such a government and state among them, as there was no let but in themselves, that they might not live in quiet, and also walk in all kind of uprightness. It is all one therefore as if Moses should say, See how greatly you be beholden to your God: For he has every way provided well for you: he has continually pitied you, and by all means procured your welfare. And in very deed, the remembrance of Gods benefits, ought to provoke us continually to serve him the better: and when we see that he has not failed us in many thing, is it not reason that we should be the more disposed to yield ourselves wholly to his obedience? For he shows how dear we be to him, what love he bears towards us, and what a care he has of our well doing, when he procures it after such manner.

And by the way, we have to note here for a special point, that when God sets a good order among us, and appoints men to have the guiding of us: it is a singular president of his goodness and love towards us. True it is that the thing which is rehearsed here by Moses, proceeded to the counsel of Jethro, his father in law, as he himself shows in the eighteenth of Exodus. And although Jethro was an heathen man: yet did God serve his own turn by him in this behalf. And so we see, that God applies all things and all persons to our benefit. Who would have looked that a man which had none acquaintance with the people of Israel, saving that Moses had married a wife out of his house, should have come and given such counsel? But so does God apply all his creatures to the benefit of his people, as I said before.

Besides this, we have to note the loveliness of Moses, in that he held not scorn of the counsel that was given him by one that was not so excellent as he himself, nothing near. Moses might have replied and said, what fellow is this? For I am chosen of God to govern his Church, and to be the chief of it. I have published his law in his name, I have represented his majesty, yes and he has given me such a visible sign thereof in my face, as though I were an Angel come down from heaven, rather than any earthly man. I have been separated from the company of mortal men by the space of forty days, as though God had glorified me already: and shall a common person presume now to teach me? Moses then might have cast forth such words: but he submitted himself to reason. Why so? For he knew that God deals his gracious gifts as it pleases him, in so much that the little ones may divers times further the greatest and excellence. And therein God intends to try the soberness and mildness of those whom he has advanced to degree of sovereignty. For when they forget not themselves, but are always pliable, and if a man bring them any better advice than they themselves wish of, they receive it willingly, and yelled to it: it is a true trial of their obedientness [to God.] Seeing then that Moses, who was chief among all the ancient prophets, could find in his heart to yield to the counsel of his father in law Jethro, who never knew what true Religion meant, but had only a little raft of it in a shadow: what shall we do which are not come to the like glory that Moses had? Wherefore let us understand, that although God have bestowed his spirit most plentifully upon us: it is not to the end that we should hold scorn of the advice and counsel of such as are meaner than ourselves. For that mean and very knot wherewith God will have us knit and joined together: is that the great ones should stoop to the least, and all agree in one. Moreover, as has been declared already, although Jethro was the instrument to put Moses in mind of it: yet ought it to be imputed to God, who had a care to provide for the benefit and safety of his people, that he might not fail them in anything. And to this intent is it that Moses speaks thereof. Now let us come to the words that are set down here.

First he says, that he himself is not able to bear them any more alone, because they were greatly increased: for you to be (says he) more than the stars of the sky: and we know that they were more than seven hundred persons. Seeing it is so then, I am no more able (says he) to bear your charges, your encumbrances, and your strafes: and therefore you must be fine to choose some men to be in office with me, men of wisdom and understanding, and well tried. First of all, whereas Moses protests that he was no longer able to bear the charge of the people: therein he shows us, that such as are advanced to any degree of honor or dignity, must not be as Idols without doing anything at all, but [are set in that state] with condition to take pains, yes and to do service for the welfare of the commons, in as much as God has laid that burden upon their shoulders, for the upholding of the common weal. And it is a point of doctrine well worthy to be observed. For we see how all men are given to ambition, so as every man seeks to be esteemed and honored, and all endeavor to grow great. And why? Because we consider not, that Gods advancing of us is to the intent we should represent his person in this world. And surely that cannot be without encumbrance. The more honorable therefore that any charge or office is, the more painful and cumbersome is it. But for as much as men imagine and idle honor: that fancy of their carries them into so fond or rather furious over lustiness, that they pass for no more but to have their own swindge, and to mount up on high, yes, even (diverse times) to break their own necks.

And on the other side it behooves us to mark well, how Moses says that he is not able to bear so great a charge: for it does us to know, that he betrays his own infirmity, or at leastwise shows it to be such, as he must be fine to bear a lower fail. Thus then the second consideration which we ought to have to correct all ambition and foolish loftiness in us with all, is that we must examine well our own ability, and then shall we find that it were more for our behoove to creep below upon the ground, than to covet to grow great to overrule our neighbors. These (say I) are the two respects that may abate our pride and fond desire of superiority. The one is, that we assure ourselves that the higher a man is exalted, the more also is he bound both to God and to them over whom he is set, in as much as there is no preeminence without burden, yes or rather without bondage as I said before. Mark that for one point, But we must also bear I mind, that we have no ability at all ourselves, and therefore much less is any man to be found sufficient to bear so great a burden. There cannot so small a charge be committed to us, but the same is able to make our shoulders shrink, yes and even to bow too. For our infirmity is so great that whosoever sifts himself thoroughly without hypocrisy and soothing, shall see that he is able to do as good as nothing at all. Therefore if we think well upon such weakness, it will be as a bridle to restrain us from climbing so high. For what follows but utter confusion, when men will needs be honored , and yet in the meanwhile not discharge their duty, but rather make themselves as idols, and moreover not have any regard at all of their own ability?

Furthermore we must mark also for a third point, that although Moses saw the burden to be over heavy for him: yet he did not quite and clean renounce his calling, to give over the office that God had committed to him: but sought to be helped and succored, saying, Let men be chosen free. And this is well worthy to be noted: for there might have been two faulty extremities. The one is that which we have condemned already: that is to know, that men have not an eye to their own slenderness, but bear themselves in hand that it is a matter of no importance to be in authority. And that is it, that makes him so raft and bold to grip more than they be able to wield, by reason whereof they see themselves confounded in the end, but it is too late first. For this foolish overweening makes men to forget themselves, and to take too much upon them for want of considering their own inability: and of such fond enterprise can come nothing but evil, because God punishes them for them.

Now there is also another evil extremity, which is, that when men see themselves to be very frail, they become fainthearted and thereupon, if God call them to any office of charge, they pluck back their necks because they see the burden cumbersome for them, and would fain shake off the yoke, and shun the vocation that God calls them to. That is a vice whereof we must beware. But there is a mean between both, which is, when we see that the cumbersomeness thereof passes our power: then to take as much thereof as we be able to bear, measuring ourselves by our own span, and moreover to pray to God to make us meet to go through with the things that shall be commanded us. Those are the things that are showed us here by example of Moses. For he did not fling away the government of the people: because that in so doing he should have been a rebel against God. We see how God dealt with Jonas, for he overtook him though he fled away. Therefore we must not refuse to obey God under pretence of our own feebleness, though the charges of offices which he allots to us be so troublesome, that we must be fain to grown under them. Whatsoever come of it, let us hold this rule: namely to submit ourselves to Gods calling, and to follow him whither so ever he will have us. And above all things let us pray to him to supply our wants: and in the meantime let us not take too much upon us, but let us measure our charge by our ability.

Were this well followed, we should not see so many outrageous disorders everywhere as there be. For what has caused so barbarous tyranny in the Church, as is to be seen in the Pope dome? Behold, the Pope has usurped an universal supremacy over the whole world. For there must needs be one head says he. Verily as who should say that Jesus Christ were discharged, who is ordained to be the head both of men and Angels. No: But the Pope will needs thrust the son of God out of his place. But if he wish what it is to reign over the whole world: would he not be loath to take upon him so impossible a charge? Yes: but it cost him nothing to call himself the universal head, and to spread out his wings every way. Therefore that devilish pride of his was the cause of the breaking and renting asunder of the order which God had set, according as S. Paul speaks of it in the fourth to the Ephesians, where he says that our Lord Jesus Christ is gone up into heaven to fill all things, and yet in the meanwhile has not forsaken his Church. For he has ordained Shepherds (says he) and men meet to teach. And he adds that that is according to the measure of every member, that we might all grow together, and Jesus Christ reign over us in cheese place.

Thus does Saint Paul distribute the offices in such wise, as every man must have his portion of them, because there is not any one man that is able to do all. But this order which ought to be inviolable, is rent asunder by the devilish pride of the Pope.

And afterward his tail, and the vermin of his clergy have followed the same: for there is none of them all that minds his charge. When they angle for their benefices, do they consider that Gods calling of them is with condition, that they shall yield an account of the souls that are committed to them? There is no talk among them but what a benefice is worth: and anon after, pomp and credit must be matched therewithal: and so they give themselves to all licentiousness. A man shall see, not only Bishops, but also Archbishops and Primates, which pass for nothing but for hunting, or drinking, or playing, or chambering: those are their ordinary trades. And why? For it never came in their thoughts, that the honor which they have usurped, should be matched with any bond of duty. And this has happened, not only in the Churchmen, but also in all estates.

If Princes nowadays did mind that charge which they have taken in hand: think you that the whole world should be so turmoiled with wars, and that every of that would be catching and snatching to enlarge his territories? No: for there is not any one which has but a country of one liege to rule, which finds not himself thoroughly encumbered, if he have a regard of his office and duty, as well towards God as towards his subjects. And yet notwithstanding he that has a country of two hundred leagues under him, would fain subdue the whole world to him. And why is that? Because he thinks not upon the burden that Moses speaks of here. As who should say, there were not a rule given to all such as are in any preeminence or authority, which is uttered and declared of God by the mouth of Moses as of his herald: namely that they be not Idols to sit over their people in pomp only: but that they must bear the burden of the people, which cannot be without an honorable kind of bondage as is said before.

Also this extends even to private persons. There is not that man which seeks not to get still more and more: and when he has three times as much revenue as he needs for his household, yet is he still laying of baits, to join piece to piece. For no man bethink himself, How discharge I myself of that which God has given me already? I have goods under my hands, I have an household, I ought to occupy myself in training my wife, my children, and my servants in the fear of God: I ought to have mine eyes always open, to see that nothing be done in my house whereby God may be offended. As touching my goods, I ought to use them in such wise, as they may be employed according to God's will. If I have abundance, I ought to relieve such as have want and need. Albeit, no man looks to this gear, but such as have goods are as gulfs to swallow up all that ever they can finger: there is no other talk with them, but how they may bring all things under their paws, so as no man may be succored at his need. For all is one with them, so they may make their hand. As for Gods honor, they pass not so much for it, but that they had liver to be spotted in the world, and to reign in it at their pleasure. And in the meanwhile they be still set upon gathering, and they consider not that in so doing they do but plunge themselves continually into greater cursedness.

Wherefore let us mark well the doctrine that is given us here by the example of Moses: which is, that first of all every of us must consider, that when God vouchsafes to put any goods into our hands, or to advance us to any degree: he binds us with the straighter bond, and we have the harder account to make: to the end we may learn thereby to hold ourselves within the bounds of our own slender ability, when it pleases God to have it so. Moreover let us also have a continual eye to our own infirmity, so as we may acknowledge that our ability is very small: and if it please not God to advance us, let us not bear envy towards them that are in that danger, and have that heavy burden upon their shoulders. If they feel it not: it is so much the worse for them. And for our own part (as I said before) let us be contented that our Lord let us alone fitting as it were upon the ground, and let us not covet to climb higher. Also therewithal let us have compassion upon such as bear the hard burden, and let us pray God to give them strength and might at their need: for we see that if God let them alone, they must needs be utterly undone. And thirdly, if it please God to put us in any office, let us be ready to obey him, at leastwise according to our ability. Albeit, let us not take too much upon us, that he which grips too much can hardly hold it. But let us advisedly offer ourselves to God, that he may govern us by his holy spirit, so as every of us may do his duties, and every of us employ himself according to his measure and ability, referring all our doing to the common weal, to the end that God may be served thereby, and our labor may redound to the benefit of the people committed to our charge. Thus you see in effect what we have to mark.

Now must we also mark this saying of Moses, Choose the men of wisdom and of good skill, men well-trying, that they may be set over you according to your tribes, even over Thousands, over Hundreds, and over Fifties, as we shall see afterward. Hereby it is showed us, that when men are to be chosen to bear office in the common weal, they must be chosen with discretion, and not taken at all adventure whosoever can thrust in himself first: neither must they be preferred at any mans pleasure for favor or for some fond bravery: but in such wise as God may overrule the choice, and such men be picked out as are known to be meet to occupy the rooms that they be called to. And specially we must observe that which is rehearsed in the eighteenth chapter of Exodus heretofore alleged: for there Jethro says that we must take such men as are stout, fearing God, lovers of the truth, and haters of covetousness. Who is he that speaks this? A poor heathen man, as I have said already: and yet God governs his tongue in such wise, as we cannot have a better teacher than him, when we be about to choose men to govern a people. First of all he requires men that are stout, such as are not womanish, but have wherewith to go through with such a charge, and have both good zeal, courage, and noble mindedness. Albeit, for as much as without the fear of God all that virtues in man do turn to evil: behold, Jethro who never heard any one word of holy scripture, does notwithstanding perceive full well that it is impossible for a man to discharge his duty in governing a people, unless he fear God. If a heathen man could speak after that manner: what a shame is it for us nowadays, that we should have less discretion than he? And yet a man may see with his eyes how the world goes. Have men this consideration with them when they go about to choose officers to Justice, that they will needs have the fear of God to be the first thin in that party? True it is that men will profess so, and even nature compels us to say, that we had need of men that are wise, and stout, verily as grounding covertly that there is neither wisdom nor courage, without that fear of God bear sway. Again, to express the fruits of the fear of God yet the better, Jethro adds, that there must be uprightness and truth. As if he should say, that a man shall never be meet to govern, unless he have fondness in him, so as he be not hollow hearted, but walk on with a good conscience. And because that bribes do blind the eyes of the wise, and make good men to swerve from uprightness: he says that if we will have men fit to bear authority, they must have covetousness and despise the goods of this world, so as they can find in their hearts to forbear that. Seeing then that such a lesson is told us by a heathen man: I pray you what a shame shall it be, that we which profess ourselves to be brought up in the law of God and in his Gospel, and have our ears so much beaten with it, should still be novices in the doctrine, or at leastwise put it so ill in practice among us? And yet for all that, if we use it not to our profit, it is written to be kept to our great confusion, and to make us inexcusable.

So then, let us weigh well this saying where Moses exhorts the people to choose men to understanding and wisdom, and tried men. For if a man be put in office but upon hope, without good knowledge and experience had of him: is it not a defiling of the feat of God and of Justice? Indeed God reserves to himself the sovereignty over all men, as he is also worth to have: and yet notwithstanding he will be served by mortal men as by his ministers and officers: and therefore the seat of Justice is (as you would say) consecrated or hallowed to him, as shall be showed in the next lesson. Now, there is taking of men at all adventure, and they know not what they ought to do, nor how to behave themselves. Well, such a one must needs make a trial what he can do, and when he is once set in his feat, he will have an eye to himself, yes? Shall he that would not take a Cowherd or a Shepherd into his house upon bare hope, without knowledge or understanding of him what he is: shall he (I say) go set a man in Gods feat, of whom he has no knowledge, and of whom he has no experience to judge what he is? Now then, let us be well advised, and for as much as God grounds us the grace or rather privilege of choosing officers to govern us, which is not common to all people: in any wise let us not abuse that gift to God, or else we shall be amazed to see ourselves bereft thereof. And smoothly that very cause why so many tyrannies are crept into the world, is that all nations have for gone their freedom, so as there is no more election, by reason whereof Princes do sell the offices of Justice, and things are so out of order as is horrible to see. And whereof comes that, but that when the people had the election in their hands, they abused it, and so were worthy that God should bereave them of the honor that he had done them. For is it not as good as a willful provoking of God's wrath, and spiting of him, when folk having free election, whereas they should choose men to serve God and to be as his officers, do instead thereof keep routings in Taverns of Alehouses, and even as it were in scorn and mockery of God, choose such as are most unthrift and furthest out of order? See that not how it is a perverting of all order? To be short, it should seem that men intended to trust God out of his fear, when they set his enemies in it after that sort, and such as despise him, and such as seek nothing else but to tread his name and Majesty under their feet. When men deal so, is it any wonder that God sends such disorder into the world as we see there is? Now then, it stands us so much that more on hand to mark well this doctrine, where it is said that when God gives a people liberty to choose officers, they must not abuse it, but must use discretion in choosing of them. Yes and for as much as we may often times be deceived, it behooved us to resort to God, that he may give us discretion and govern us with his holy spirit, as though he had pointed them out with his finger whom we ought to choose. And that is the cause why I said that election shall never be well ordered, except God overrule them by his holy spirit.

Last of all Moses says, I will set them over you to rule you. He shows that God had given him authority, and yet a man may see that he imparted it to that people, and showed by his doing, as we have seen before, that he challenged not to himself an inordinate power, but acknowledged that God had bound him to the common weal. So then, Moses has authority and knows well enough that God's will was to prefer him above the rest of the people, and yet does not he abuse his right for all that, but refers all to the people. As if he should say, I will but only show the way how to guide, and in so doing I will take the pain to myself, as for the honor, I give it over to you. And the same mind ought to be in all good magistrates and governors of people, that they may be able to maintain the authority that is requisite: for even to that end also has God set them up. But howsoever the world go, let them not seek their own profit, but let them endeavor to make themselves fit ministers as near as is possible, always maintaining the chief charge that is committed to you.

But now let us come to that which Moses interlaces concerning the multitude of the people. Your God (says he) has increased you, in such wise that you be now as the stars of the sky, and I beseech him to increase you a thousand times more: or else, he will increase you a thousand times more, according as he has promised you. Here Moses, in alleging the hardness that he had to decide all cases, does also show the people God's blessing and grace. And thereby a man may see, that his chief travel was to make the people conceive the benefits that they had received at God's hands and that is a lesson which we cannot be put in mind of too often. For on the one side we see what unthankfulness is in us, how we shut our eyes at the benefits that God bestows upon us. Not that we like not to have them: but for that we consider not from whence they come, that we might glorify the giver of them. And on the other side we abuse the gifts that we have received, because we bethink not ourselves how it is God that has put them into our hands. No, which worse is, we see how men do so vaunt themselves of them, that God's glory is darkened thereby, as though they were not beholden to God at all. And not only that, but it should seem also that they arm themselves against him to bid him battle, for showing of himself so bountiful towards them: and as shall be showed in the two and thirtieth Chapter, they play the over pampered Jades, which fall to kicking against their masters. See (I say) how God is unacknowledged of us in his benefits. And afterward when we have forgotten him, we grow after a sort heathenish, and all his gifts are defiled by us. Since we see this, let us consider that this doctrine cannot be too often set afore us: namely, that when God chooses us to do him service, he binds us to him the more exceedingly. And therefore his opening of his benefits to us, and his setting of them before our eyes, is to the end we should know that he is ready to continue them still towards us, if we let him not through our unthankfulness. Therefore if we be often told of the free goodness of our God, and it be showed us how richly he has powered out his benefits upon us: although it seem to be a very common matter, and that we have heard enough of it before: yet let us assure ourselves, it cannot be spoken too much. We see how Moses, who is the true pattern of all Prophets and true ministers of God's word, behaved himself in that case. And for as much as he stood so much upon that point: let such as have the charge of reaching in the Christian Church, be sure that they can never be too lavish in that behalf: and let all people also understand, that the often putting of them in remembrance of Gods benefits, is not a needless and unprofitable doctrine. Mark that for one point.

Furthermore Moses's intent is that the people should perceive and have it manifestly proved, that the great increase of them came not of the common order of nature, as we see that the world does multiply: but that it was a very miracle of God. And for the same cause does he also set down the similitude that was benighted to their father Abraham. For God had showed him the stars of the sky in a vision, and said to him: you seed shall be as the stars of the sky. Like as the number of the stars is infinite, so shall you seed be after you. Now then to the intent to magnify God's grace, and to print it the better in the people's hearts: Moses says thus to them: you know what was promised to your father Abraham, how that his offspring should be in number as the stars of the sky. Now therefore, see what a multitude is of you. For in very deed it is a wonder, considering how small a number went down into Egypt. When they went thither they were but one household, and little above therefore persons. But when they came out, they were not any longer sixty, but well near seven hundred thousand, and it was within less than three hundred years, that this number was so increased. For the four hundred and thirty years are to be reckoned from the promise made to the people. And we see that Abraham was long time without child. In the end he had Isaac, who by all likelihood should have been made away. There was some likelihood that Jacob should be increased: he had twelve sons: but what was that in respect of such a multitude? So then; Moses meant purposely to declare to the people, that their multiplying came of the grace of God, yes even after an extraordinary manner, and not after the course of nature. And yet notwithstanding, (which shall sever for an end) Moses prays to God to increase the people still, or rather assures the people that he will increase them more and more. Although this multitude was a great trouble to Moses: yet does he not grudge at it, but receives it as a blessing of God joyfully, and glorified him for accomplishing so his promise. And therewithal he has a care to provide for them by good means, seeking nothing but that God might be served and honored, and that the favor which he had begun to show to his people, might continue till it were come to full perfection.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to make us so to feel them, as we may come to him with true repentance to crave forgiveness of them, and he release them in such wise, as we may seek nothing but to give over ourselves wholly to him, forsaking all the lusts of our flesh, and all the untoward desires which pluck us back to the world, and turn us away from the obeying of righteousness. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, etcetera.

The fourth Sermon upon the first Chapter

16 And I charged them your Judges, saying, hear your brethren, and judge uprightly between a man and his brother, and between the stranger that is with him.

17 You shall have no respect of person in judgment, but hear the small as well as the great. You shall fear no mans countenance: for the judgment is the Lords. And the case that is too hard for you, bring it before me and I will hear it.

18 And at the same time I commanded you all the things which you ought to do.

E have seen already what warning Moses gave for the choosing of men meet to govern the people. For (as has been declared) if they had taken judges at all adventure, it had been a defiling of God's feat. Therefore in that case, it behooved them to use good discretion. But here Moses adds a point which we ought to mark well. For although he had procured, that such as were chosen were men that feared God, and were endued with singular gifts: yet ceases he not to put them in mind of their duty, and to warn them of the things that they had to do. Wherein we see, that even the wisest have need to be taught, and the upright left and justest have need to be warned. And therefore if God have set us in the good way, and bestowed gifts of his holy spirit upon us: let us not think that therefore we have no need to be taught. For we must be guided even to the end, and we know that our perfection is not in this world, nor so long as we bear our flesh about us, and are conversant here beneath. Again, whomsoever God has honored by setting them understand that they have need to be told of their duty, and to be quickened to discharge themselves accordingly.

But let us come now to that which is contained here. The first charge that Moses gives to them that are ordained to be Judges and Governors, is to hear men's causes. Wherein he does us to understand, that they ought to be attentive and diligent to understand every man's right. For if a judge vouchsafes not to hear, how shall he execute his office? We know that although men do the best they can to judge a right, yet their frailty is such as they may miss: and if they be negligent too, then must all needs go to confusion. Therefore it is not without cause, that Moses warns the Judges to understand well men's cases. And he says expressly, between the Jews and between the strangers. As if he should say, every man must be suffered to show his reason. Notwithstanding that the examination and sifting out of things may now and then procure favor or hatred: yet the judge that will do his duty well, must forget all things that may turn him from the right way. And for as much as the stranger has no upholder nor stay to lean to: the judge must supply his want. And although he can look for no reward, no nor for any great thanks at his hand to whom he may do right: yet let him not forbear to discharge his duty, for he does acceptable service to God: albeit that there come no reward on men's behalf, God is able enough to recompense him.

Now then, such as are Justices have their lesson here in writing: that is to know, that they must maintain right and equity towards all men that are committed to their charge. For (as has been declared before) the office of justice is an honorable service. They that are set in authority are not advanced to that high estate to the intent they should trample their subjects under their fear, or make non account of them: but contrariwise they be bound to them, and it is a kind of service. For God has, not made principalities for a few men's pleasures, to that end that all mankind should be their underlings: but for the common welfare and benefit of all men. Then if governors understand not that they be bound by God's will and by the order of nature, to them of whom they have the charge: they must be fine to yield an account to God for their abusing of his gift and of the honor that he bestows upon them. Thus much concerning the first point that we have to mark here.

And here withal let us mark also, that if they be so greatly bound to men: much more straightly are they bound to God. If a man be grieved in a matter of five shillings or less, and the justice cause him not to have right: we see what is said here. But now, if the name of God be blasphemed, if his honor be defaced, if wicked and detestable things be done, and they that fit in the feat of justice and bear the sword in their hand withstand it not, but are careless what injury be done to God: are they to be excused? No: for it they suffer but a poor man to be trodden down, so as he have but one penny loss: they shall be blamed for it before God. But yet much more precious is the Majesty of God, and the thing that concerns his honor and service. Since it is so, that Magistrates be bound to minister right to every man, in things that are small and in manner of no value: let us mark well that they ought in any wise to procure the maintenance of God's honor, more carefully without all comparison, especially when the café concerns the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, to which all the world is not to be compared, in as much as God's glory shines forth there. And that is the second point which we have to mark upon this strain.

Again, whereas it is said, that the Magistrates must accept no mans person: it betokens that they must not be moved with any mans riches, or poverty, or birth, or friendship, or anything else. For in the holy scripture, this word Person is taken for any quality in man, which may purchase him grace and favor, or disgrace and disfavor. When we speak of a person in our common speech, we mean, a man or a woman: but the Scripture means a more special thing: namely that there should no regard be had what manner a one the man is, whether he be our neighbor, our friend, a rich man able to do us good, a man of credit and authority able to revenge himself of us, or a poor man, a man of no alliance or kindred, or I know not what else. All these accidents which serve but to induce us to liking or disliking of the party, and to make us swerve from the right way, are comprehended in the Scripture under the word Person: as if we should use the word Visor. And in very deed, all these accidents which blear our eyes and beguile us to make us start out of the right way, are but as visors. If a man come before us without any quality: very well, we would hear him simply, and we would not be corrupted to judge amiss. But if there happen any stop, by and by we be overwrought, and our reason is so troubled, that we judge not any more as we ought to do. That therefore is a visor, which yielded forth such a quality to be seen in the party, as makes us either to favor him too much, or else to dislike him out of measure, so as we keep not an upright and even hand between the great and the small. And truly Moses declares the same very well in this text, in that he says, You shall hear the small as well as the great: for it serves to expound the word Person, and there needs none other gloss from elsewhere. And it is a phrase of speech which we shall see in other texts hereafter. Therefore it behooves us to acquaint ourselves with the terms and phrases of the holy Ghost, that the things which are contained here may not seem strange to us.

Albeit by the way, that we may fare the better by the things that are declared here, let us mark that the chief reason and ground of this doctrine, is because there is no accepting of persons before GOD> For the same cause ought Judges to have a stay, of themselves, and to keep them clear from all considerations that may thrust them aside, or make them to swerve one way or other: namely (say I) for that they represent the Majesty of God, in as much as he has made them his officers. Now then, there is no accepting of persons before God, that is to say, when he judges he has no respect to the things that men regard, and wherewith they be drawn to and fro, so as they judge not uprightly anymore, because their excessive affections do overmaster them. And this saying, that there is no respect of persons with GOD, extends very far. For when as Saint Peter speaks of it, first in the tenth of the Acts, and afterward in his Epistle, he shows that God chose who m he lifted out of the whole world, in so much as he passed not whether they were Jews or Gentiles. Whosoever does good (says he) shall have the favor of God, and as for Circumcision or uncircumcision, they shall none of them both be made account of. True it is that God must be fine to look mercifully upon us, before we can do any good. For of our nature we be utterly forward, and there can nothing come from us but all manner of naughtiness: in so much that God should hate and abhor the whole world, and cast us away everyone, if he should tarry till any of us gave himself to well doing: for our nature drives us always to evil. But God chooses his, without any ability of deserving beforehand on their behalf: and yet notwithstanding, after he has marked them to be of the number of his flock, he avows them and loves them as his children and household folk, yes even without regarding of what nation or state they be, whether they be rich or poor, or in credit, or endued with any good quality and handsomeness, or any other thing. God then does as it were shut his eyes against all the respects which are had in so great estimation. For he has an eye to nothing but to soundness of heart, he dots not upon these visors that are seen to the eye, according to this saying in another place, namely that the outward shows deceive not him, but that he looks upon that which is within. Thus much concerning the first point.

But we must apply this text to the same use that Moses puts it: which is, that after the example of God, we must have this impartiality in us, so as we will not be drawn one way nor other by the things that appear in needful doctrine. True it is that this is spoken expressly to Judges and governors, in as much as God has taken them near to himself by setting them in his own feat, and by willing them to execute his office in this world: and therefore ought they also to have the greater care to follow uprightness, that they suffer not themselves to be perverted by the things that are to be seen in men. But yet for all that, every man for his own part ought to take warning to follow God's example, and to frame himself thereafter, according also as Saint Paul send us thither, when he speaks of bondmen and of men of base degree that are easy to be oppressed, because men take leave to do evil when they see that a silly foul cannot revenge himself, and that if he have any wrong done to him he must be fine to put it up patiently: by reason whereof they presume that more boldly to say, Oh, as for him, when I have done the worst to him that I can, he has no means to hurt me. Thus are we the bolder when we see that men are base and have no maintenance. But in this case Saint Paul says that we must lift up our eyes to heaven, and that for as much there is no respect of persons before God, we must not think we shall escape unpunished when we abuse the privilege and authority that he gives us. He then that despises his neighbor ought to think thus: yet notwithstanding, we have a common judge in heaven, and although I be now rich and honorable to the world ward, although I be in authority and estimation, yet when I come thither, all this gear must cease: and although my counterparty be now despised, and have no man stand by him, yet has he a defender in heaven.

Lo here (say I) what ought to beat down all pride in us, to the end that none of us advance himself, nor take more upon him than is lawful, nor think he has leave to do evil, under color that our counterparties are of no credit and authority. Let us not tarry till ordinary Justice do redress our extortions, or till those whom God has set in his place to judge without respect of person, do punish us for committing of some outrage: but let every of us remember this lesson here, namely that in as much as God regards not any outward shows at all, it behooves every of us also to frame himself to the like uprightness and indifference.

And for as much as men do always put us in fear, so as there spring from thence the sorest and worst temptations that can be to hinder the performance of our duty: Moses warns Judges expressly, not to be afraid of men. Why? For the judgment is Gods, says he. Lo here a text well worthy to be marked. I have told you already, that which experience shows too much: that is to know, that they which otherwise are of good nature, do nevertheless overshoot themselves through fearfulness. You shall see a man in the place of Justice, who being not evil of himself, would that all should go well, it grieves him when he sees any fault, and he could find in his heart that every man should bridle himself, or else that there should be some good correction when any men have done amiss: but in the meanwhile, for as much as he sees that there will be some grudging and disliking of the matter, [he think thus with himself:] What shall I provoke every man to anger against me? That man has kinsfolk and friends, and such a one is able to be even with me if I trouble him. Again for as much as naughtiness reigns everywhere, and wicked folk have their full scope, and are most in number: I shall bring all the world in my top, and if I mind to discharge my duty, I must not set myself against two or three only, but I see that all are corrupt, and there is no man but he resists well doing. They therefore which otherwise fear God and would minister right and justice when they sit in judgment, are let through fearfulness. If they stand in awe of men, they shall surely be shaken down. And why? Because they be not grounded upon the foundation that Moses lays here, namely that the judgment is Gods. They know not (say I) that they offer great dishonor and reproach to God, when they prefer men before him. For he that swerves from his duty for fear, esteems me more than God. Why so? A Judge ought to consider, that God has set him in the place where he is, with another manner of convenience than other simple creatures. For he that sits in the seat of Justice, sits in the room of God, and is as his Lieutenant. A Judge therefore ought to consider that: and if he do not, he forgets God, whom he was bound to serve. It is all one as if a man being feed by his master to do him service, knows not whether there be a master to do him service, knows not whether there be a master in the house or no, but falls to singing and playing, and eats and drinks at his hours, and sleeps when he lifts without having any ear or regard of his master. Does not the servant that forgets his master after that fashion, deserve to have men to spit in his face? Now then, if Judges consider not to whom they hold their estate and dignity: their unthankfulness or rather blockishness is too shameful and beastly. Again, if Judges knowing themselves to be set up of God, do nevertheless shrink from their duty for fear of men, and be stopped and held back from doing the things which they know they ought to do, because men are against them: what yield they to God? What estimation have they of his power? And yet for all that, God has taught them their lesson, and promised them to stand by them, and to be their defense. Seeing it is so, ought they not to make a buckler of his invincible power, and to fight Justly though all the world should step up against them? Is not God mighty enough to aid them and succor them, if they trusted thereunto, so as they would rest upon it, and pluck up a lively courage and constancy to go on in the right way? Yes: but else, if they be moved by such temptation to swerve from their duty: let them assure themselves that God will leave them destitute of his power. Thus then we see, that this strain (as I said before) imports a very profitable doctrine.

But yet we must note also, that this pertains not only to them that are in authority: but also to all men in general. For there is as it were a comparison made between God and mortal men. And why? For nothing beguiles us more, than that we make too great reckoning of men, and in so doing either diminish God, or abolish his highness. As of as men come in our minds, God is nobody in comparison: in so much as if we put him in balance, he seems lighter than a feather: whereas men do always keep their full weight with us. Surely if we were about to compare other men with ourselves, we could set them light enough: for every of us would make much of himself. Or if we were to consider one man with another: look whom we liked of, he should give greatest gloss to disgrace the things that were to be disliked in the contrary party: in so much that we say, thus what is he? He is nobody. For why? We would make far greater estimation of the other. Thus you see how we could skill to disgrace men. But come we once to GOD, he must be as good as cast down, and men must be set up in his place. Lo how spiteful and forward we be. So much the more therefore does it stand us on hand to mark his saying, where it is declared that if God come in place, it is not for us to make any reckoning of men. For it is a great traitorousness that men or creatures should be in such estimation, that Gods right should be defaced, or anything be plucked from him. And yet for all that, we see it is too common a thing, and it hinders us that we cannot serve GOD as we ought to do. True it is that every man is turned away by his own lusts, in so much that although we have none other to withstand us, yet have we inward encumbrances of our own, and our nature is so sinful, as we cannot in anywise apply ourselves to do good. But yet is there this inconvenience more in it, that as soon as another man comes in place, by and by we be at our wits end. I would fine do my duty (say we), but what? Then must I purchase me such a mass displeasure. We see nowadays that a man cannot pleasure men, except he do as the world does, and follow the bias of other men. And again, behold here my neighbor, he will always be at deadly food with me, if I fashion not myself to his manner of dealing: behold, such a man is my friend, I must needs bear him out. Hence come all privy packings and other lewd tricks, namely that every man despises God, to please his neighbor or his friend. For when vices reign, as whoredom, drunkenness, and other disorders, so as every man is infected by that example of his neighbor, and one catches diseases of another: what is the cause of all this? It is for that we advance men too much, and consider not that it were meet for us to abase both great and small, and to frame ourselves earnestly to the will of God.

Now therefore let us bethink us so much the better of this doctrine that is set down here, not only for Judges but also for all men in common: [That is to know,] that for as much as the judgment is God's, we must not in any wise be shaken any more by me, but give God his preeminence, and thrust down all consideration of men, so as if men vex us we set ourselves against them, and be not so lewd as to rob God of that which belongs to him, to furnish creatures therewithal. Thus you see what we have to remember here.

Moreover also, whereas it is said that the Judgment is Gods: that speech imports another good lesson. True it is that Moses speaks here of the room that Judges and Magistrates hold: as if he should say, they have it not in see simple or as a Lordship of inheritance, but as an office: and God in setting them in that degree of honor, resigned not his own majesty to say, Sirs, you shall reign with absolute power, and I will henceforth be nobody. God therefore, when he did thus set men in office, did not for all that diminish his own estate. For he holds still the sovereign dominion over all men, and they ought to be but as instruments of his power, and consequently to serve him, and to refer all things to him. If this doctrine were well known, kings and Princes would not lord it so licentiously nowadays as they do, and men should have seen another manner of modesty in them at all times than is now seen. For they that are advanced to honor, do bear themselves on hand that the world was made for them, and for their fair eyes (as they say): and there upon they reject all informations, laws and statutes, and shake off the yoke from their necks, as though they held all things at their own swinge, and God is nobody at all with them. But yet in this text Moses tells them, that be they never so great kings and princess, their superiority ought not to diminish the authority of God, that his glory should not continue always disappeared. Why so? For what else are the princess of the world than Gods officers, to the end that by their means he might be obeyed, and all men do him homage, so as the highest should begin and give example to the lowest? Seeing then that the judgment is Gods: they that pervert the order of government when they be called to do their duty, shall be double blamed. And therefore shall Kings and Princes and all such as are in room of Justice, have a very hard account to make. For if they do amiss, they be not bound alone to men, neither have they offered creatures only: but they have violated the majesty of God, and defiled his seat. Why so? Because judgment belongs to him, and he reserves it to himself.

But like as it is said of the execution of Justice: so let us note that it belongs also to the spiritual government which god has ordained in his Church: yes and this doctrine ought to be kept more straightly in that respect, than in the earthly government. Why? When God ordains kings, Princes and Magistrates: therewithal he gives them authority to make Laws. True it is, that they ought to learn them in his school, according as it is said that laws and ordinances which are made in common wheels, do take their force of Gods wisdom. But yet for all that, civil or politic laws are made by men. Yet notwithstanding God has not resigned anything, that he should not hold still the sovereign dominion over men, I mean, even in respect of outward policy. And as touching the spiritual government of the Church, we know that God will be heard, and that he will have his word obeyed above all things, so as men may not take upon them to make laws and statutes, but must hold themselves contented with that which he commands them. For the rule that is contained in his word is the very perfection itself. Therefore when we go up into the pulpit, it is not to utter our own dreams and dotages. Why so? For God reserves the mastership and chief superiority still to himself, so as he will have me to receive his word, to rest wholly thereupon without any swerving at all from it. Seeing that God has once set it down so: it behooves us to rest upon it. Had this been well observed in the world, there should not be so great troubles and variances at this day as there are. Whence come the variances that are betwixt us and the papists, but of that men have not reserved to god that thing that belongs to him, but have framed articles of faith, laws, and ordinances at their own pleasure, and in the end are come to this horrible confusion of mingling the inventions of men's brains with the pureness of the holy scripture, so as he have marred all things? And whereof else comes it, that even at this day, the papists fight still for the maintenance of that tyranny, that a man might not know God from his Apostles as they themselves say, by which common proverb of theirs they condemn themselves and cut their own throats? Wherefore let us mark well this lesson wherein it is said that the judgment is God's, that is to say, that the superiority which men have, in what degree so ever it be, is not to diminish God's preeminence, but rather to maintain it. What then are the states of honor and all the dignities of the world? They are all means to bring to pas that God may reign over us, and to make all men to stoop to him, and to know him and obey him in all cases. So then, what ought kings, Emperors, and Magistrates to do? They ought to see that God be exalted and magnified as he is worthy, and that all their subjects do him homage, and they themselves must show them the way. Again, what ought schoolmaster and fathers to do, and all such as have any household [or servants]? Every of them ought to consider on his own behalf how greatly God has dishonored him? He that has children ought to consider, you holds God's place in this room of a father, but yet has not GOD Stripped himself to cloth you with his honor. What then? He is the father still, both of me and of my children, therefore must I endeavor that he may be obeyed. The master must think thus: is the mastership mine? No: but it is Gods, who has grounded me that prerogative undeserved on my part. It has pleased him to put this household under my government, but yet for all that, it is he that must rule me, yes both me and all that are under my subjection. After this manner ought we to put this doctrine in use.

And when we have passed through all the states of the world, we must also come to the spiritual government of the Church. Therefore let such as are ordained to preach Gods word, understand that God has not appointed them to set forth their own dotages, and to speak what they list: but to think upon God's superiority, specially seeing that our Lord Jesus Christ is now declared to be the head of his Church, according to the everlasting mastership which God gave him over us, in saying, hear you him. Seeing it is so, let such as have the charge of teaching in the Church and are shepherds and ministers, understand that they must not seek to advance themselves, nor to be heard, nor to bring the people in a mass with their own inventions: but [they must endeavor] that God may always have the overhand, and be obeyed, and his word be received purely and simple without any mingling or adding to it.

And like as they that are in that vocation and office, ought to have mildness, and loveliness, that they usurp not the authority which God has reserved to himself, yes and given to his only son: so all Christians ought to think thus with themselves. Wherefore come we to Sermons? Wherefore is there order in the Church? It is to the end that GOD should govern us, and that we should have our Lord Jesus Christ to be as our sovereign teacher, and that we should be his flock to be led by him. Now this cannot be done, unless we hearken to his voice, and discern it from the voices of strangers, so as we be not carried to and fro like wavering Reeds with every wind, but stand fast settled upon the pureness of the holy Scripture, and that our faith be so grounded thereupon, as the devil may never shake it down. Lo (say I) how we ought to apply this doctrine to our use, namely that the judgment and authority is God's. for if we do so, we may well see many contraries in this world, men may assail us with many troubles, they may well set themselves against us, and they may well speak against us: but yet shall we still keep on our pace. And why? For GOD is not variable. Although the devil keep never so great a stir here beneath, yet is God's purpose always unchangeable. And so is meant by this that is said of the truth, that it duress forever. It is not such a truth as is hidden or shut up in heaven: but it is said expressly that it is the same truth which God utters to us by his word, as he witnesses daily. Since it is so, let us look up to GOD, and yield him the government that is due to him, that he may reign over us: and then shall our faith be invariable, though the devil trouble and turmoil all things upside down, and stir up never so much strife and contention. Thus you see how we must put the doctrine in use that is contained here.

Now furthermore Moses says expressly, that if there were any hard case, it should be brought to him. And afterward he adds for a conclusion, that he had commanded them all the things which they ought to do. As touching the hard cases, Moses's reserving of them to himself, was neither for desire of praise nor for pride, but because they belonged to his vocation: he knew that God had ordained him to the same purpose. And therefore let us not be afraid to keep still that which God has given us, if we execute the charge that he has committed to us. For why? Like as a man must not esteem of himself, so must he not surmise, oh, this is hateful, it may be ill taken, it is subject to slander: but we must follow that which God commands us. And therefore let us not take anything upon us of our own head, that is to say, let us not be rash to say, this belongs to me, for ambition on tickles us continually, and every of us would have I know not what a privilege: wherefore let us beware of such folly. Yet notwithstanding like as there should no such boldness reign in us, as to usurp or take anything upon us: so on the contrary part, when GOD will have any office or charge laid upon us, it becomes us to take it. True it is that men may chance to speak evil of us for it, but we must overpass that, and keep on our pace still. That is the thing which Moses has showed us here by his own example.

And in his own person, he has set us as it were a looking glass before our eyes, to show us that we must follow the order that God has set, and not swerve from it at all. If we do not so, it is an intolerable unthankfulness. We know what infirmity is in ourselves: not only in some one point but in all things are we so frail as is pity to see. But our Lord has well provided for all our needs, and given us remedies for them. As for example, he has given us meat and drink to maintain this transitory life of ours, he has ordained Magistracy to govern us, he has ordained the ministry of his word to rule our souls, and he has given singular gifts of grace to several persons, so as they be able to give us counsel, and to comfort and encourage their neighbors, and to help them at their need. What is to be done then? When so ever we be cumbered or in any perplexity, let us look that we use the means of remedy that GOD gives us, yes and to use them always in his fear. For we may be abused, as we have seen. What is to be done then? We must not turn aside nor stop for such as have neither right nor reason in them, but every of us must further himself by such means as God gives him, even as though he were going to God himself. And that will make us to use the order of Law lawfully, which thing men do not now. And it is a point well worthy to be marked, to know, how men may repulse injuries, and how they ought to behave themselves, when any of us finds himself entangled or in perplexity, let us pray to God to direct us. If we did so, surely we would not go to law but with trembling, and we would say in ourselves, I go now to present myself as it were before my God. But how go men to it nowadays? Rather to seek a clock for all naughtiness: so as there is neither craft, nor spite, nor any other wickedness which is not to be found there. And why? For without having any regard of God, there is nothing though upon but how to beguile men, or how to wind them in by some wicked practice. So much the more need therefore have we to mark well what is said here, that is to know, that according as God has ordained states and degrees among men: so must men dispose things and direct them by the order that God has set and established.

And for a conclusion let us also very well this which Moses adds in the end: namely, that he had taught the Jews all things which they had to do. When he says so, it is all one as if he should protest, that they could not but know, that they sinned not through ignorance, neither could say, I took it to have been otherwise, I knew not what was to be done. You know (says Moses) there is no let but in yourselves, for I for my part have been faithful to God ward since the time that he did put me in trust to instruct you, I have taught you as he commands me: now therefore you cannot have any excuse to hide you with all. And if Moses had such a care to teach the people in respect of the earthly government: no doubt but he was yet more diligent in teaching them the doctrine of salvation. That is the first point which we have to note. Does Moses tell us, that he did not conceal nor hide anything from the Jews, in the things that concerned their worldly duties, for the maintaining of some order and human honesty among them? Then is it much more likely that he first preached to them the grace of God, and afterward showed them the rule of good conversation and therewithal told them of the covenant of salvation, which GOD had made with his people. It is certain that nothing was concealed in that behalf, but that he used an exquisite diligence, so as he left not the Jews in doubt without due warrant how to behave themselves to God ward.

Now then, if Moses discharged his duty after that sort, we must conclude that the Law was a sufficient doctrine to instruct the people, and that he used not any shifts to carry them here and there. Afterward came the Prophets, which added yet a greater light. Last of all, the Gospel was preached through the whole world. Now then, can we say that our Lord has not taught us sufficiently, and that all the Prophets, and the Apostles, yes and Jesus Christ himself have given us but half an instruction? Can we say so? No that were too villainous a blasphemy. Now therefore, let us have our ears open to hearken to our GOD, and he will be a good schoolmaster to us, and let us be contented with the doctrine that is contained in the holy Scripture. For there we have so perfect wisdom, as no fault can be found with it. Consider well therefore what we have to mark upon this strain, to the end that every of us may endeavor to profit daily more and more. And if there be any ignorance in us, let us assure ourselves it is through our own fault, in that we be as blind wretches, until God have enlightened us through his grace. Therefore it behooves us to pray him to open our eyes by his holy spirit. And on the other side, let us not stop our ears against the things that God speaks, nor pretend ignorance to excuse our naughtiness. But seeing that God tells us, that he has showed us all things by his word which we ought to do: let us hold us to it without coveting any novelties, and without fond curiosity, for we shall never escape from him; and therefore let us not be gadding to receive every new toy that is offered to us. And so let us ponder well the things that we have to mark upon this text, to the end that for as much as GOD has now given us a confirmation of his Law and of his Prophecies, and directed us to the right mark: we may take the Gospel [always] for our guide, in waiting till he have gathered us together into his kingdom.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, to the end we may return to him with true repentance, and being ashamed of ourselves flee for refuge to his mercy: and that for as much as we know he has set it forth most largely and abundantly in our Lord Jesus Christ, we may resort to him the more boldly, seeking continually for the great treasures which he has prepared for us in his kingdom. And [beseeching him] to guide us so henceforth with his holy spirit, as we may live in his fear, framing ourselves to his righteousness, and serving him according to his holy will, so that although we might be hindered by the stumbling blocks and cumbrances which we see in the world, yet we may not cease to follow our good GOD, whither so ever he calls us, notwithstanding that the world be blinded with never so outrageous confusion and disorder. That it may please him to grant his grace, not only to us etcetera.

On Friday, the 12th of April 1555

The fifth sermon upon the first Chapter

19 Then departed we from Horeb, and went through the wilderness which is great and terrible, as you have seen, along the way of the hill of the Amorites, as the Lord our God had commanded us, and we came to Kadesh Barnea.

20 And I said to you, come you to the Hill of the Amorites which the Lord our God does give us.

21 Behold, the Lord your God sets the Land before you: Shrink not, neither be afraid.

In this text Moses rehearses, after what sort he had exhorted the people to take possession of the Land that God had promised them, and by what means he would have encouraged them to it. And that is to the end that the people should know their own unthankfulness and naughtiness, in rejecting the benefit that was offered to them, and in that they obeyed not God, but were given too much to their own sensuality. This then which Moses does here, is as it were an upbraiding of the Jews, to that end they might know how it was long of none but themselves, that they enjoyed God's blessing no sooner: and that they might afterward yield themselves more pliable, and not be so willful any more in their own forwardness, but simply submit themselves to God as soon as they should hear him speak. That is in effect the intent of Moses.

Nevertheless he interlaces also another matter therewithal: which is, that he tells the people they be so much the less to be excused, because they had had experience of God's goodness, in that he had led them with his mighty hand. For, their passing through the horrible and dreadful desert, was not without the assistance of a singular and unaccustomed power of God: whereas they notwithstanding forgetting the goodness which they had felt, and which they ought to have born in mind forever, did grudge at God, and became willful, and would not go forward when he was ready to have led them to the end. And that is the cause why Moses says expressly, that they had seen. As if he should say, you wrought even against your natural senses, when you went not on as your God commanded you. The reason is this. So long as you suffered yourselves to be governed by his hand, and so long as you walked in the way that he appointed you: did you not even see with your eyes, that he made you to overcome all hardness? Was not the wilderness where through you passed, a very gulf? And yet notwithstanding you seeped out of it. And how came that to pass, but by the wonderful working of your God among you? Seeing that you heard his voice, you were sure that he was come among you. Then said I to you, now is there no more for us to do, but to enjoy the land which our God has assigned to us for our heritage. Go, let us fight, our God has promised it us, and he will not disappoint us. We know he has wrought mightily for us hitherto, and surely he will go through with his work. These and such other things did I allege to you: And yet you followed not them as you ought to have done. Wherefore acknowledge your unthankfulness in that you refused to enter into the inheritance which God had promised to your fathers, and which he has promised to your fathers, and which he has prepared for you.

Now by the way, the first good lesson that we have to gather here, is that for as much as God had already uttered his goodness towards us in making us to feel his blessing: we be the more worthy to be blamed, if we rest not wholly upon him, or put not our whole trust in him to walk on boldly and without doubting. For although God had never showed himself to our experience: yet ought we to give credit to his holy word. And it is good reason that we should do him the honor to believe whatsoever he says or speaks to us: for as much as he is faithful, and his word is better tried than either gold or silver, as it is said in the Psalm. And therefore if there were no more Gods uttering of his word with his own mouth: it were enough to condemn the whole world for their disobeying thereof. But seeing that God has confirmed his sayings by deeds, and has showed us as it were to our eyesight, that his making of his promises to us is not in vain, but he has made us to feel the things with our hands; so as we know in effect what his power is, and that it never fails those which are his: if after all this teaching we fall to checking still, and be so stiff-necked as we will not bow to submit ourselves to the things that he speaks, nor have any will to obey him: I pray you does not the greater condemnation lie upon us? What is to be done then? Let every of us consider advisedly the good turns that God has done him, and let him mark them and note them that he may bear them in mind. Very well, God has succored me at such a pinch, I have felt his help in such a case, I have been aided at his hand, and he has made me to perceive his mighty power after such and such fashion. After this manner must we make rehearsal of God's benefits, and of his helping of us all the time of our life. And after as he has uttered himself to us, so must we be the more confirmed to trust to his promises, and to rest wholly upon them. Here withal let us be stabilized in invincible constancy, to go which way forever he leads us, without fear of any distress.

Why so? For my God which has never forsaken me to this day, will not give me over now. As I have felt [heretofore] that he gives strength to those that are his: so am I sure that he will reach me his hand and succor me still. So then there is no more for me to do, but to commit myself to him. I see that this thing and that thing may cumber me, there are a number of temptation which may make me turn head: but yet for as much as my God has succored me hitherto at my need: I doubt not but he will do the like to the end. Thus you see that the way for us to eschew the blame of unthankfulness, is to call God's benefits oftentimes to our remembrance, thereby to strengthen ourselves still in trust that he will never fail us to the end. Also this will serve to make us overcome all temptations: and although the devil have never so many means and stops to turn us out of the right way, yet shall we not cease to go on still. And why? Because the hope which we shall have gathered, of God's former making of us to feel his goodness, will serve to carry us over all tempests in the midst of the sea: it will be as a boat, or as a ship, or as a bridge to convey us safely over. To be short, we shall have wherewith to strengthen us continually, so we shut not our eyes at the assistance which God shows us daily. Thus you see generally what we have to gather upon this saying of Moses. Anon the matters shall be laid out more particularly by similitude.

Let us proceed to the things that he adds: namely, that being come to the hill of the Amorites, he said, Let us possess the Land which the Lord, our God of our fathers promised us. For it is here before us, that is to say, at our commandment, as he had said before, for this is but a repetition of that which we have seen already. And here Moses sets forth the promise that God had made to the people, to the end to assure them of the Land in such wise, as they should be out of all doubt that it was their own. And why? Because it had been promised them of God. Behold (says he), you God meant not to lie to you, nor to beguile you: and therefore though majesty assure yourself, that the thing which he has spoken shall be performed. Mark that for one point.

Nevertheless, to the end that the people may the better understand, that they were not to possess the land for their own deserts sake: he tells them expressly, It is the God of your fathers that does it. For the Land was promised as well to Abraham as to Isaac and Jacob, before the Jews which then lived, were born. Thereby then are they put in mind, that they had not deserved such a benefit at God's hand, but that it proceeded wholly of his free goodness. And so much the more were they to blame, in that they had felt such experience of God's goodness, and their sin also was so much the heinous, in that they acknowledged not the mercy that he had used towards them. That then is the effect of Moses's meaning here.

But we have to note here withal, that although the promise was then grown old, yet had it not lost his force: neither ceased it to live still, though Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were dead. True it is that the promise which had been made, was not spoken to them that were presently alive at this time: [they to whom it was spoken] that it to know, Abraham, and the Patriarchs, were all deceased. But God's promise and his truth die not with men, they have not the course of a transitory and flight full life as we have. Therefore let us mark well, that whereas God had promised the land to Abraham was rotten in the earth, and they that followed him together with all the Patriarchs were consumed to powder and dust: yet the word that GOD spoke continued still, and forewent no whit at all of his force. This (I tell you) is a point which we ought to mark well. For it is now long ago since the Law was given: so that if we have an eye to the oldness thereof, it will seem to us to be an outworn and dead thing. About a two thousand years after that, the Gospel was published to the world: and we see that many years, yes, many hundred years are passed since. Then if we should measure God's truth by time: we might think it to be a thing as god as buried and quiet and clean forgotten.

Moreover, they that first carried the Gospel abroad, are dead long ago: but yet must we bear in mind, that God's truth is everlasting and and that although men be corruptible and pass and vanish away: yet the doctrine of salvation abides always unpaired, so as the force therefore abates not at all. That is it (say I) which we have to bear in mind. For although it was in old time that GOD spoke to Moses and the Prophets, and although it be now long ago since the Gospel was delivered to the Apostles: yet must we receive the doctrine thereof nowadays, as being in full force still. And that so much the rather, in respect of this saying of the Apostle, that our Lord Jesus Christ has made the way fresh by his blood. They that lived under the Law and the Prophets ought not to have despised the truth that had been manifested to their fathers, though it was done long time before: and yet did not God discover it so openly to them as he does to us. It is not for naught then that the Apostle says, that the way which Jesus Christ made is fresh. And why says he so? His meaning is, that the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ cannot dry nor putrefy, but is always fresh in remembrance before God, to the end that we should be assured of his truth, which he has sealed with his death and passion. Seeing then that we have such a pledge, we ought to be so much the forwarder to receive God's truth, for as much as we perceive that the force and virtue thereof duress forever.

Now must we mark further how Moses says here, You God has promised you the Lands, It is before you, possess it. By these words he betokens, that we must rest wholly upon that which God says, and not stand scanning after our won fancies. For if men content not themselves with the things that God speaks to them: where shall they seek for greater certainty? Or when they have fought it, where shall they find it? But it is an offering of too great wrong to our GOD, when we be not satisfied with his uttering of his will, and with his warranting of the same to us. For if thereupon we be still wavering and doubtful: what else is such unbelief, but a replying against God's truth as though he were not faithful, or as though he went about to abuse us by alluring us with vain hope? So then let us mark well, that all our life long we must content ourselves with God's word, and when we have it we must follow it without seeking any further.

For look how many doubts and mistrusts we conceive, so many over thwart nips and privy upbraiding do we give to GOD, as who should say there were no certainty in his saying. But we know that nothing is more peculiar to him than his truth. And so (as much as in us lies) we make it a thing of nothing. Therefore it is a very profitable warning when he says, The Lord you God has promised you the Land. For he speaks still in general, meaning that we must all our life long hold this rule of sticking simply to the word of God. Anon the things shall be laid forth particularly, as I said before.

But let us mark well, that Moses having alleged God's promise, and having said that the Land was at the people's commandment, because GOD meant not to fail in the performance of the thing that he had once promised: adds afterward, Enter into it and take possession of it. Wherein he shows us that although GOD perform in us all that he has said: yet must not we on our side be idle, nor be as blocks of wood, but we must offer ourselves to his service. For albeit that we cannot stir one finger to do well: yet has GOD made us instruments whereby he will work.

Therefore we must go forward when he commands us, and we must endeavor to apply all our members and wits to obey him. True it is (as I said) that men are utterly unprofitable, yes and that their will goes clean back from that which God ceases not to give us willingness, and when he has given us willingness, he gives us also performance, as Saint Paul avouches to the Philippians: and therewithal he makes us to do it with fear and carefulness. When as Saint Paul says, Do you and also, It is God that does: those two things seem to be contraries: but they be not. For God's working is in such wise, as he imputes to himself the things that he does in us: and yet for all that, he will not have us to be slothful and to fall asleep, but that every of us should endeavor himself. Let us learn then that when so ever God promises us anything, it is his office to accomplish the whole.

Nevertheless he will have us to take pains and to strain ourselves, yes even us which are utterly unprofitable. And having given us his power he will have us endeavor to make the thing available which he has bestowed upon us, and to make it to be profitable. That then is the thing which we have to note here.

Albeit, therewithal there is also the conclusion which Moses makes: namely when as he says, Fear not, be not dismayed. And hereby he does us to understand, that although we be armed and fenced with God's promises, so as we ought to be sufficiently resolved, that he will guide us to the end: yet shall we have many occasions to make us grudge and repine, so as we might swerve aside from the right way, or utterly forsake it, if we had not constancy to overcome all the stops and lets that the devil thrusts in our ways: for of nature we be fearful. True it is that in many things we be but too hardy. When any fond this is to be attempted foolishly: in that case men need not to be heartened, for they be but too bold already, to attempt this and that, and to mount above the clouds as you say. But when GOD should be followed whithersoever he calls us: our eyes run here and there, up and down, we be at our wits end, yes and if a fly do but whisk before our eyes or a straw stir at our feet: by and by we are at the stop. Now seeing we have this vice in our nature, let us determine to fight on all sides against this fearfulness, to the end we be not held back from following God whithersoever he commands us, but that we may overcome all the temptation of Satan, though he be never so wily in forging and framing of innumerable occasions in that behalf, to turn us away from our calling. And therefore let us mark this warning given to the Jews by Moses. For it is a warning to us as well as it was to them, that it is impossible for us to come thither as god calls us, if we overcome not this fearfulness and dismayedness, that is to say, if we fight not against all the encumbrances that Satan can set before our eyes to make us afraid. Therefore it stands us on hand to be armed with strength from above. Thus you see how we ought to apply this strain to our instruction.

Now the things will be the plainer and better understood, if we make a similitude between the land that was promised to the children of Israel, and the kingdom of God whereunto we be called. For in good sooth, the land of Canaan was but as a figure and earnest penny of the kingdom of heaven. Had the ancient fathers settled their minds upon the land which they saw: they had had a very poor rest and weak stay, for in very deed they enjoyed it not of all their life, they did but only travel through it as strangers and wayfarers. We see that Abraham had not one foot of it in possession, saving that he purchased a little piece to bury his wife in, no he had not so much as water to drink. Jacob was banished out of it a great part of his life. Isaac and all the Patriarchs had but their walk in it, they never possessed one foot of the land which God had given for an heritage to them and their issue. We must needs conclude then that the ancient fathers did not pass through this visible land, and that their acknowledging of it for their inheritance was after such a sort, as they tended always towards heaven, and that was the mark which they aimed at. Seeing it is so, we must make a similitude between this land, and the inheritance whereunto GOD calls us, as it has been purchased for us by our Lord Jesus Christ.

Whereas he says That God made the people to pass through a horrible and dreadful wilderness: the same belongs to us, and whence he has drawn us. For are we not all damned and forlorn by nature? Has not the devil a tyrannous dominion over us, from whence no man can deliver himself by his own power? Even so, if we consider where GOD seeks us when he calls us to him: [we shall find, that] the wilderness where through the Jews passed is not so dreadful and terrible, as is the damnation wherein we be under the thralldom of death, Satan reigned over us, and is king and prince of the whole world. Seeing that GOD rids us out of the miserable slavery, and sets us at liberty by his holy spirit: it is not all one as if he should make us way through the gulfs of hell? Yes: for we be there in very deed, and we cannot come at Jesus Christ, except we be brought out of the dungeons of death. Now then, if there were no more but this, that God has rid us from the curse which was brought upon us by Adam, and wherein we are all of us fast shut and locked up until he have pity upon us: the experience of that one point ought to make us perceive his goodness. And if there were no more but that: it ought to give us courage to follow him, and to give ourselves wholly to him. For if we be slothful, there is no excuse for us, because his goodness is sufficiently warranted to us, and it is long of none but ourselves that we be not fully resolved and persuaded that he will go through with the thing that he had begun. And that it is so, if every of us bethought himself well, we should find that God by infinity ways made us to overcome the things that seemed impossible. But what? To set forth our own valiant deeds, we can well enough allege this and that, and our memory is but too good. And though it be but a thing of nothing that we have done, yet we can skill to magnify it and to make great reports of it. Lo how men can be quick enough to remember all that ever they have done in their life, that may set forth their own glory: but in the meanwhile we do wickedly forget the benefits of GOD. And yet works he in such wise towards us, as ought to quicken us up to acknowledge his goodness, or else on the contrary part we do but thrust all under foot. He shall have delivered us from many after delays and he shall have made us to have passed many great lets, so as we may have thought that we had been utterly shut out and fordone, and he shall have reached us hi hand: and yet for all that, we never think of it again. Now then, whereas we see men to be reckless and slothful in following GOD, it is because they forget his benefits which they have had proof of, and become like the Jews. And therefore it behooves us to acknowledge our fault in this behalf, and to mourn before God, and to seek redress of it.

Thus you see how we ought to put this text in use by similitude: that is to know, when the promises o the Gospel are set forth to bring us to the kingdom of heaven: let us consider where at God has begun in us, by what means he has brought us to him, and how he has strengthened us, to the intend to bring us out of the damnation, whereof we are found worthy by too, too apparent conviction. Now therefore if we think there upon, and consider thus with ourselves, behold, our God has made us partakers of his power, we have had too apparent experience thereof, he has delivered us out of that gulf of hell, he has rid us out of the bond of the devil and of death: let us not doubt but he will always continue like himself hereafter, and hold out to the end.

Furthermore let us also mark well this saying in this text: The God of you fathers has promised you the Land. Behold therefore, it is at your commandment, enter into it and take possession of it. The meaning is that we should yield so much honor to God's truth, as to be fully and thoroughly resolved in ourselves, that in as much as he has adopted us to his children, our inheritance is certain and infallible in heaven. For to what purpose is the Gospel preached to us, but to make us know that GOD is our father, and that we being become his children by his free adopting of us, should be assured that the kingdom of heaven belongs to us? And in very deed for the same cause is the Gospel called the kingdom of heaven, for as much as it opens the gate to us, to the end that we nowadays should not doubt but that GOD avows us to be his heirs. But we must have a further consideration of the inheritance that God gives us, than of all the benefits that Moses speaks of. For it stood the Jews on hand to have held themselves still to the thing that had been spoken to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But now is the Gospel another warrant to us. For God is called the father, not only of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but also of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is our head in such wise, that being once united to him, we become partakers of his own substance and life, and [therefore] we must not doubt but that the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven belongs to us. Now then, like as Moses said to the Jews, The God of your fathers: so must this voice found in our ears, The GOD and father of our Lord Jesus Christ, has not only promised us the kingdom of heaven, but also given us wherewith to assure ourselves the better of it. For we have the performance and effect thereof, in that our Lord Jesus Christ suffered death, to recover us the inheritance, whereof we were bereft and dispossessed in the person of our father Adam. Now then we see after what sort we ought to look upon this doctrine: that is to know, that although we be unhappy wretches, although we deserve to be rejected of our GOD, although there be nothing but cursedness in us, and although that by nature we be plunged in the gulf of hell: yet notwithstanding, seeing that God has adopted us in our Lord Jesus Christ, and made us all one with him by faith: we need not doubt but we be heirs of the kingdom of heaven. And why? For GOD cannot lie, and for as much as he is unchangeable, we have sufficient warrant that we shall not be disappointed by putting our trust in him. Again, we have our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the mediator between God and men, and he has not only taken solemn recognizance as a public notary: but also accomplished the things that were promised on the behalf of GOD, his father. He has signed the evidence in such wise with his own blood, as we see he has paid that which he owed not, and that which he was not to be charged withal. So then let us have this steadfast assuredness with us, that God avows us for his children, and consequently that we be heirs of eternal life. Albeit, let us always take that assuredness out of the Gospel, accordingly as we see that Moses leads the Jews thither.

True it is that we must not forget the heavenly power that was uttered everywhere in the rising again of our Lord Jesus Christ. But how might we apply such a benefit to ourselves, or how could we enjoy it, if it were not by faith? Therefore like as our Lord Jesus Christ has purchased us the kingdom of heaven by his death and passion: so is it his will that comfort should be given us nowadays by his Gospel, where he witnesses to us that all that ever he did was for our sakes and for our welfare: so that having that once, and being assured thereof, we may enjoy the benefit that was purchased for us.

But yet in the meanwhile, we must do so much honor to the Gospel, as to behold that thing by faith, which is hidden from our eyes. It is said that the Land is at your commandment. Now if we believe our senses, we cannot perceive that the kingdom of heaven is ours, or in our hand: it will seem to be too far off from us, and that we had need of wings to fly above the skies. But what? We must so honor God's word (as I said) as we must not doubt but that the thing which is spoken there, is possible to be done, although we conceive not how by our fleshly understanding: faith must surmount all capacity of man. And if we find any hardness therein, let us fight against ourselves, and daily endeavor to recover to God. For the way whereby he will be glorified at our hands, is (as I said at the beginning) that if there were no more but his bare word, yet ought the same to content and suffice us. But seeing he has vouchsafed to deliver us this pledge which he has given us in the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ: we shall be the less excusable, if we have not a full and whole contentation. Seeing then that we have such and assurance of the kingdom of heaven, let us go and take possession of the land. For (as I said before) God will not have us idle.

True it is, that he shows us by the holy scripture, that there is not one drop of power in us that tends to good, but that we be wholly given to evil. And yet notwithstanding it is his will also that when he has put his gracious gifts into us, we should make them available, without challenging anything at all to ourselves. For in this case it is not for us to glory in ourselves, nor to trust in our own legs, according whereunto it is said in the Psalm to such as are given to the world, that they must not trust in their own strength, nor in the strength of their horses. If this be said of the things that pertain to this flight full life: what is to be said of the spiritual life which is much more excellent? So then without attributing anything to ourselves, let us endeavor nevertheless seeing that God commands us, and let us go on to enter into the possession of the spiritual kingdom whereunto he calls us. And that is the cause why I said that we must evermore come back to our Lord Jesus Christ, and there seek that thing that is wanting in ourselves. For we know that his suffering of his death and passion, was to exalt us above the heavens: and although we do but creep upon the earth, or rather be so lop heavy that we sink still downward, to plunge ourselves in the bottomless gulfs: yet will our Lord Jesus lift us up, according as he himself was exalted, to the same end and intent, as is declared in the third Chapter of the Gospel of S. John.

Furthermore, to the end we may be discharged of all self trust, let us look upon the notable example that was given us at the death of our Lord Jesus Christ. For if we will go the right way to heaven, we must follow the poor thief to whom he said, This day shall you be with me in Paradise. How can we be sure that GOD will bring us to the kingdom of heaven, seeing that we seek hell, and all our affections, all our thoughts, all our desires, all our powers, and all our works, tent wholly thither, even to separate us from God, and to alienate us from his kingdom, and to drive us away from life and salvation? How may we (say I) be sure that God will take us up into his heavenly kingdom? We must have recourse to this word that was spoken to the poor thief: This day shall you be with me in Paradise. Seeing it is so that our Lord died, and that he entered into such gulfs of sorrow, that he was pinched so far as to abide the torments that were due to us, and not only abode that reproach and grief of bodily death, but also felt that Justice of God, and became as a wretched offender to bear all the sins of the world: let us not doubt but he has delivered us from the pains and against which we should have felt, and will lift us up to himself, and therefore now let us not be afraid of death. But first of all it behooves us to follow the poor thief. What had he in him to bring him to the kingdom of heaven? He was fastened to a cross, he had his arms and legs broken, he seemed to be but a wretched carcass, there was nothing but reproach in him. Thus then you see how he was an ugly mirror to look upon: and yet nevertheless, Jesus Christ promised him to make him his partaker and companion of his heavenly glory. And what had he been all the time of his life? So lewd and wicked both before God and man, that he was worse than condemned and accursed. Will we then be the heirs of God? We must follow this thief who had the preeminence to go before us into the heritage of heaven. And how [must we follow him:] We must acknowledge that naturally there is nothing in us but utter wickedness, and that GOD might justly hold us accursed. Also we must think ourselves to be as folk that have their arms and legs broken, yes and as men utterly dismembered, so as we have not one whit of strength in us, at leastwise as in respect of ourselves. And yet for all that therewithal we must not doubt but that God accepts us to him, when we link in with our Lord Jesus Christ by right faith and pure affection, acknowledging him to be our king, and having our eyes fastened upon the invisible kingdom, as I said before. For if the wretched thief which saw death before his eyes, which was in as great torments as was possible, and saw himself as it were be hated of all the world, did put his trust in Jesus Christ: what ought we to do? Again, in what state was our Lord Jesus Christ at the same time? He hung upon a cross full of reproach and shame, all men did spit at him, all men did spite him. And yet, notwithstanding that reproachful state, the poor wretch ceased not to behold life in death, and to say, Lord remember me when thou shalt come into your kingdom. But now we know that Jesus Christ is exalted to the right hand of GOD his father, and has sovereign power over all creatures: so that if we yield him not his due honor now that he is entered into his glory, we shall have no excuse at all. True it is that he was once hanged upon a gibbet full of reproach and shame: but yet we see therewithal that the same was turned into glory and triumph, so as the victory which he obtained was more royal than all the triumph, so as the victory which he obtained was more royal than all the triumphs of all the Princes in the world. Seeing then that we do see that Jesus Christ has rid away all the slander of his cross by the power of his resurrection: ought we not at leastwise to look up to the kingdom where he dwells, whereunto he calls us, and which he has purchased so dearly? Thus you see after what manner we must put in use this text of the possessing of the land which he has promised us and purchased for us.

Besides this, when we head this saying, that it is at our commandment: let us understand that it were a disannulling of the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, if we should not be fully resolved of this inheritance, according also as Saint Paul shows. If you say, who is he that shall go down into the deep, it is all one as if you should fetch up Christ again from death. Then if we imagine with ourselves, alas we be wretched creatures, there is nothing but utter weakness in us, evil does so overmaster that we know not what to do, the devil torments us, on the one side, and on the other side we be so frail as is pitiful to see, and we be in trouble and unquietness: if we stand hereupon as quite out of heart and discouraged: Saint Paul says it is all one as if we believed not that Jesus Christ died for us. For why? The death and Passion that he suffered are no trifling thing, but a thing of very great price. Now then we must take it to be of power as it is, so that although we see ourselves in the midst of bottomless pits, yes and that very often and commonly, in so much that when we be out of one gulf, by and by we enter into another, and therewithal Satan has such power against us and we on the other side are so feeble, that we can scarcely stir one finger: yet let us not forbear to assure ourselves, that the inheritance belongs to us still: for that is the honor which we must yield to our Lord Jesus Christ. But therewithal let us go forward still. After what manner? Let us call to mind how the Apostle says, that like as our Lord Jesus Christ went out of the City as rejected out of the company of men: so we must not disdain to become like him, and to beat the shame and reproach of his cross: for it becomes the members to be fashioned like to their body. And therefore let us determine to go after him, For those are the true marks whereby he knows us to be his. And for performance thereof, let us understand that we must forsake the world in general, yes and ourselves too. For the matter stands not alone upon going out of the world. True it is that so long as it pleases God to have us lodge here, here we must abide: but yet howsoever we fare, we must ever have one foot up, ready to go hence when so ever it shall please God to take us to him” so that if we will be heirs of the heavenly kingdom, we must be but pilgrims and strangers in this world. Yes and (which more is) we must go out of ourselves, that is to say, we must not lean to our won will and know, but we must rid ourselves of all self weaning, and covet nothing but to go to God. And if the world shake us off and make a mocking stock of us, (as we see nowadays how the poor Christians are lightly esteemed, so that they be taken to be as the of scouring of the world, or rather as mire and dung, as says S. Paul:) I say, if we be so rejected of the whole world: let us bear it patiently. For why? Jesus Christ went out of the City Jerusalem, bearing the reproach and curse of the whole world upon him: and therefore let us be ready to be fashioned like to him. Also therewithal let us determine to separate ourselves from all the uncleanness that reigns everywhere nowadays in the world. And for as much as we cannot possess the heavenly heritage, unless we overcome this doubting and fearfulness which pluck us back in so much that if our minds run still upon our own feebleness, truly we shall not need any other thing to shake us down: whereas on the other side if we have our eye upon our captain Jesus Christ, who lonely has vanquished all fear, yes and even death, and the devil, and all his power: then may we boldly go on still, to overcome all lets that may hinder us or turn us aside from following God whithersoever he calls us: Let us shut our eyes against all that ever may turn us out of the right way, and let us not doubt but that God will always be our guide, and work in such wise, as he will outgo all our desires, yes and all the hope that we can conceive of him.

Now therefore let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make us so to feel them, that being cast down in ourselves we may resort wholly to him, and acknowledging ourselves to be wretched offenders that have deserved his wrath and vengeance, (yes even without ever being able to recover out of endless death and cursedness) flee for refuge to the redemption that is purchased for us by the bloodshed of his only son. And that seeing our Lord Jesus Christ has paid all our debts, to discharge us of them, and to bear the condemnation that was due to us, and for as much as he offers us daily the fruit and effect of his death and passion: we may not doubt but that he will accomplish the thing that he has begun in us, and by his holy spirit make the power of his resurrection available in us, to the end that we may lead a new life, and be established in him more and more, till we quite rid of all the corruptions of our flesh, to be taken up into his kingdom. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only, etcetera.

On Saturday, the 13th of April

The sixth Sermon upon the first Chapter

22 Then came you all to me and said, let us send men before us to search out the land for us, and to bring us word by what way we shall go up into it, and into what Cities we shall enter.

23 That saying liked me well, and thereupon I took twelve men among you, of every tribe one.

24 And they departed, and went up into the Mountains, and came to the river of Escol, and searched out the land.

25 And they took of the fruits of the Land in their hands, and brought them to us, and brought us word again and said, The Land which the Lord our God gives us is good.

26 Yet notwithstanding, you would not go up, but were disobedient to the commandment of the Lord your God.

27 And you murmured in your tents and said, because the Lord hates us, therefore has he made us to come out of the Country of Egypt, to deliver us into the land of the Amorites, to cause us to be destroyed.

28 How shall we go up? One brethren have made our hearts to quail, by saying: The people are more in number and taller of stature than we. The Cities are great, and walled up to the sky. And moreover we have seen there the sons of the Eukis.

ere Moses brings to their remembrance the things that are contained in the 13. Chapter of the Book of Numbers, albeit that there seems to be some diversity at the first blush. For there he declares that such as should have espied out the land, were sent by the express commandment of God: and here he makes no mention of it, but says it was done at the request of the people. Now these two things may very well agree: that is to wit, that the people should desire to have the entrance into the land known before they went any further: and also that God should allow that desire, yes or rather even prevent it, accordingly as we know that in all things he guided this people with a passing fatherly care, as shall be showed in the next Lecture. Therefore there is no inconvenience in it, that God, to show the people what care he had to guide them, should appoint spies to be sent: and that therewithal the people also on their part should require it. So then we see still that God bare with the people, when he granted to send men to spy out the land. And let us mark, that it was condemning of the people, when the thing that should have been to their help and furtherance, did pluck them back. And it is not reported lonely of those whom Moses speaks off, to the intent that we should blame them: but they be set forth as an example and looking glass, for us to see ourselves in, and to fare the better by it. If God bear with us and give us means convenient for our infirmity: let us apply them to our use, let them stir us up to obey him, and let us not in any wise be hindered by them. This (say I) is the thing that we have to mark.

But the chief point is this that Moses adds, namely, That the spies brought word again that the land was good, and that the people would not believe it but were disobedience to the mouth of God. It should seem that Moses rehearses not the story as it is contained in the place before alleged. For there it is said, that of the twelve which were sent, there were but two that heartened the people to enter into the land that was promised them, and that the other ten labored as much as they could, to discourage those which were not very well disposed themselves. Seeing it is so, why does Moses say here, that the spies reported it to be a good land, as though they had encouraged the people to do as God had commanded them? We have to mark here, that Moses has not an eye to the greater number nor to the multitude: but to the better sort of them. Although then that there was no more but Caleb the son of Jephunneh and Joshua the son of Nun, that made good report, and traveled to make the people to obey God: yet are they preferred at God's hand. Thus you see that God esteems more of the sixth part than of all the rest. And it is a very notable point, as whereof we may gather very good and profitable doctrine. For anon Moses will add, that the greater part of those that were sent to spy out the land, said that the Cities were great and walled up to the sky. But as now he speaks but of the two that discharged their duty.

We see then, that when so ever the greater multitude of men inclines to evil, we must let them alone as though they were nothing worth. They be not worthy to come in account, and we must rather hold with a handful of men whom we see to teach us faithfully and to give us good counsel: I say we must rather follow one or two such, and let a hundred, yes a thousand other go, than cast ourselves into confusion with the greater multitude. And if ever this were needful: it is needful now in our time. For on the one side we see how all things are turned upside down in the world: superstitions are so great and immeasurable as it is pity to see. IF we should frame our life to the common trade, what a thing were it? For all is infected with robbery, deceit, cruelty, treason, blasphemy, contempt of God, drunkenness, whoredom, pride and looseness. Now then, whosoever fashions himself to the custom of men, must forsake God and withdraw himself from all goodness: he must give himself to all lewdness, and plunge himself into all wickedness. Lo to what point we become. What is to be done then? Let us learn to look upon such as are able to guide us aright, though they be but few in number: and let us not be carried away by the greater multitude. For it will not serve to shield us before God, it will not serve to lessen or to mitigate our fault. If we say, every man did so: when I saw such a number of men follow that trade, I put myself in company with them: and to my seemingly thing that was so commonly used, could not be but lawful: the alleging of such fond excuses will stand us in no stead, for we shall win nothing by them, as I said before. And therefore let us follow those to whom God has given the grace to show us that right away. Though there be but three or four of them, let us esteem them no less than if they were an hundred thousand. For God passes not for the greatness of the multitude, as it is said already. Again, on the other side, as concerning Religion: are they that stick to the pureness of the Gospel, more in number than the Papists, Turks, and heathen men? No surely. In so much that if we be compared but with the Jews which are a cursed of scouring, whom God has so rooted out as there remain very few of them: yet notwithstanding the Christians which are willing to give themselves simply to the serving of God according to his word, are so few in number, as the other may far pass them. What would become of us then, if we should follow the greater number? And yet we see how a great sort of ignorant folks do take upon them to say, Tush, as for them that take upon them to alter Religion, they be but a very small number, and are they wiser than all the world beside? Thus you see how most men gaze upon themselves, and cast a stop in their own way, to bar themselves from coming to God's truth. And what is the cause thereof? Even their blearing of their own eyes, by gazing upon the greater multitude which goes to destruction.

But contrariwise, let us condemn the whole world, as Noe was fine to do in his time. And that condemning of his was not in vain: for he and his household were saved by it. And although they were not above eighth person in all: yet durst they set themselves against that whole world: and so must we do. Though all the whole world cry out with one voice, that it is not now needful to rest upon the holy scripture, and that the opinions of the great wise men of the world shall stand: let us give ear to that which GOD says. Albeit there were but one man that labored to bring us from the errors and superstitions that have full scope everywhere: yet let that one man be more esteemed at our hands, than a hundred thousand other. For we see the rule thereof that is given us here.

And although Moses was the writer of this Book: yet is it the holy Ghosts doing, who that fed him as an instrument. Now then, where it is said That the spies reported it to be a good land: we see that the two are set down at it were in the room of all the twelve, and the other ten are laid underfoot. For they were not worthy to be remembered, and we know that God destroyed them for their untrustiness. Then if there be any deceivers that seduce the common people, so as their wicked doctrine is received, and men like well of them, and in the meanwhile there are very few that teach us to serve God purely: let us hear those few, and let us not stick to say, These are the teachers that instruct us rightly what we ought to do. Though the number of their adversaries be never so great, let us not make any account of that, for as much as we see that God destroys them, and that they be as it were raised out of his book: for behold, this story written by Moses is the very register of God. In so much that whereas on the one side ten men had conspired to miscarry the people, they were all rejected, and God made no reckoning nor account of them. And [on the contrary part] whereas there were but two that encouraged the people faithfully: those were put in number for all that rest, for they were well worthy to be esteemed as ministers and shepherds in God's Church, for their due performing of their charge. Therefore if we mark this text, we shall be thoroughly armed and fenced against all the stumbling blocks that trouble most men, who when they see a sort of dogs barking at God's truth, are utterly at their wits end, and know not what to do nor where to become. Wherefore let us look to observe the rule that God gives us: and then shall we ever keep on our course, and never be turned out of the way for the troubles and divisions that we see in the world.

And hereunto also ought that to serve which Moses adds, You would not (says he) but were disobedient. To whom? He says not singly to God: but to the mouth of God. This manner of speech might seem harsh at the first sight: but yet it imports good doctrine. We know that men are always desirous to excuse themselves when they withstand God and encounter his word: and yet for all that they cease not to protest that they mean not to be against God. Their intent then is, that men should not think them to do that which they do. But here to cut off occasion of all starting holes, the holy Ghost says expressly, that we must yield to God's mouth. And what is met by this mouth of his? It is his uttering of his will to us, when he speaks to us by his ministers, by his Prophets, and by such as he rises up in his Church to govern his people. That then is that thing that we must take heed to: for God will not show himself to us in visible manner. True it is that at the same time he gave signs and tokens, to the end it might be known that he himself speak by Moses: but yet in the meanwhile he used Moses as his instrument, and therewithal confirmed his law which was published at that time. After him came the Prophets, and them also did God use as his mouth: but in the Gospel we have his mouth open most of all. So then let us mark well, that they which protest that their intent is to serve God, and in the meanwhile make none account of his word, as it is uttered and left in writing: are but hypocrites, yes even shameless hypocrites, because the deed itself proves them liars. For whereas they on the one side say that their intent is to serve God: and God on that other side intends to try our obedience by setting his word before us: that same is a good trial to discern whether our saying that we be his servants, be so in good earnest or no. For thereby it appears, that they hearken not to his word, but rather reject it, and prefer their own opinions and fancies before it. And so you see a point that you ought to mark well.

And hereby it appears how much that whole word is to be condemned nowadays. For that Papists can well enough say, that their intent is to be subject to God: yes and to what purpose else do they take so great pain, and marry themselves in their foolish devotions? All the Idolatries which they commit, they term by the name of God's service. But yet for all that, behold, we have the Holy Scripture wherein God has uttered his will to us, and he will have men to be ruled thereby. This is alleged to the Papists, to the end they should not follow their own likings, but submit themselves to the bridle in such sorte as God has laid it upon us, and bear his yoke quietly. But contrariwise, they will needs serve God after their own imaginations, as we see by the confused mingling that is among that, [which makes it manifest] that they have no care at all to observe God's commandments. For their saying is, me thinks that this is good, thus were we taught by our fathers. Whereby we see that they do flatly resist God's mouth. They will not stick afterward to say, Oh, we worship God. Yes Mary, but God will have men to hearken to his mouth, and we know what manner a one that is: namely even the same wherewith he has spoken by Moses and the prophets, and finally by the Apostles by whom he has taught us familiarity all that ever he would have us to do. So then let us now take good heed to this doctrine, for we cannot disobey God's mouth, that is to say his word, but it is a manifest despising of him: for they be things that differ not, neither can they be separated asunder.

Furthermore not only the Papists do provoke God by resisting his word: but also we see that even they which possess the Gospel, will believe nothing but that which likes themselves. For what reverence has the holy scripture nowadays among a number of men? In deed the word Gospel costs them nothing: but in the meanwhile, if a man tell them that God says not anything which is not there: every man takes upon him to be an interpreter: or else he says, me thinks this is hard, and as for that, I cannot disgust it. And so, after as every man dislikes of the holy scripture, so takes he leave to reject one thing or other, whereas notwithstanding, we should in all points have our mouths shut when God speaks, and our ears open to receive whatsoever he says to us. For as much then as we see that the doctrine of the Gospel is so despised throughout the world, and every of us shoots forth his own bolt, and we will needs have such shifts and devises as like ourselves, so as if anything seem evil to us, we reject it: it may easily be gathered by the fight thereof, what horrible condemnation is prepared for all such as disobey the mouth of God. And therefore let us learn to temper ourselves with such modesty, and soberness, that as soon as we have any record of God's truth, we may yield to it without gain saying. Let that serve for one point.

And moreover let us extend this doctrine yet to a further use: which is, not to be inquisitive of God's truth, further forth than it is uttered in the holy scriptures. For God will not have us to fall (as you would say) to pulling out of his bowels, as they do which will needs be searching out of measure, and more than they have leave to do. We shall see a number of fantastical fellows and giddy brained persons, which cast forth fond and trifling questions, and turmoil heaven and earth, and are never contented, but are always busy and full of unquietness. Now, this is a cursed and deadly disease. And therefore let us learn to hearken to God when he speaks to us, and not to covet to know any more than he has taught us, and sets daily before us in the holy scripture. Let all our wisdom be to receive that which is uttered to us by that mouth of God. It follows how Moses upbraided that people. That they murmured in their tents, saying: Behold, because the Lord hates us, therefore has he brought us out of the land of Egypt, and brought us hither at to a burial place. For our brethren have made our hearts to quail, telling us that they saw Giants in the land, and that the towns are walled up to the clouds. And to what purpose then shall we go. Here we see that when men begin once to do amiss, the mischief waxes still worse and worse, until it become to the full measure. It was an evil beginning beforehand, when the people resisted God, and would not follow to enter into the land at the commandment of Moses.

But is this all? No, behold here is yet a much more cursed blasphemy, in that the people spies GOD repining at his brining of them out of Egypt, and charging him with hatred towards them. And whereof cam this? No doubt but he makes it pain: namely for that men seek covert in doing evil, and make no conscience to accuse God and to blaspheme his holy name, to the end to have some color wherewith to hide their own wickedness. Thus you see how men deal, when they cannot find in their hearts to yield to God. They will never still justify themselves in their disobedience, especially when God preaches upon them and holds them at a bay, yes and lays in such evidence against them, as they be convicted: for then do they seek starting holes to justify themselves even in despite of God, accusing him and laying all the fault upon him. Truly this is a cursed kind of dealing, but yet we see it is common, in so much that men do make even an art of it. How many are there to be found, that will not blame God to clear themselves? If a man blame them for it, and charge them with their faults: they will not grant that their intent was so: but yet the deed reveals that it is so. If a man be rebuked for his vices, with whom has he to do? Indeed it may be that it is but a mortal man which finds fault with him and says, though hast done this or that: but yet must he understand that the judgment is God's. When so ever any man tells us that we have done amiss: we must not look at him that speaks, for God's word is the judge. Therefore must every man cite himself, and as of as he is warned of any office, he must offer himself to God's judgment seat, and consider that is the place where he must appear to make his account. Now let us see how every of us inclined or disposed to confess his faults. No, contrariwise we seek all that shifts we can, to shroud ourselves, and we have our lurking holes, in so much that even when we be too manifestly convicted of our sins, yet we cease not to wrangle still. But our Lord will not suffer us to seep him so by our fond excuses. He follows still upon us, and then begin we to gnash our teeth at him. We see that these would excuse themselves. But when they fall to replying, with how so? See we not that the evil is already apparent? Therefore when men perceive themselves to be so preached at by God's word, they become as wild beasts, they spit out and cast up their poison, they spite God apparently, and rail at his word. And would God that examples thereof were not so common as we see they be.

Wherefore let us mark, that this text ought to serve us as a looking glass, wherein to behold the forwardness that reigns throughout the world. And when we have done amiss, let us learn to abstain from willfulness. For else in the end we shall fall into the bottomless pit of blaspheming God, and if we continue in that stubborn and unwillingness to acknowledge our own vices, in the end we shall fall to resisting God furiously, as it befell to these to these wretches of whom Moses speaks here. For when men will needs maintain themselves after that sort in their wicked quarrels against God, they fall not only into disobedience, but also into sturdiness, yes even into most shameful and beastly sturdiness, as we see here. It was too gross a fault already, when the people had said, how shall we go, or what can we do, seeing the towns are so strong and the people so giant like? It was too much already to resist God after that fashion. But behold, there is yet a more excessive unthankfulness. For instead of bethinking themselves of God's grace, in delivering them from the thralldom of Egypt: they fall to railing at him. What (say they?) Would God have fetched us out of the land of Egypt, if he had not hated us? Now alas what hatred was it! When God pitied his poor creatures, they were even at the last cast: they were increased like wretched slaves, yes even to the drawing of the blood out of their veins: they were so cruelly handled, as was horrible to see: and in the end the tyranny was grown so far, that all their male children were murdered, of purpose to make clean riddance of them, and to wipe out the very remembrance of them. Even at this pinch, did God have compassion upon the people. Could any greater goodness have been showed? And when as he says by his prophet, My people, what harm did I you in bringing you out of the land of Egypt? Does it not appear thereby that they were too, too malicious and forward? I planted a vine [says God] and looked for good fruit: and now though will choke your master with my soberness.

Now then seeing that this delivering of them out of the land of Egypt, was a singular warrant of God's goodness, love and mercy towards them: must it not needs be that they were stark mad, when they twitted God with his bringing of them out of Egypt, charging him that he did it of hatred towards them? Were it possible that men should overshoot themselves so far, if they were not become stark devils? No: but as I said before, this doctrine is written of the Jews that were in the time of Moses, to the intent that we should profit in the fear of God by their example, and bear in mind that they which will needs stand so willfully in their vices, shall in the end fall to flat spiting of God, and blaspheme his name, turn good into evil, deface his mercy as much as they can, mingle heaven and earth together, and make a hellish confusion of all things. Wherefore let us stand in awe, and walk on in humility and wariness, glorifying God. Again, when we have committed God any fault, let us be afraid, yes and even mourn for it, and not pretend any matter or quarrel against God, but rather flee to his only mercy for refuge, being utterly ashamed and cast down in ourselves. And so you see what we have to mark upon this text, where it is said that the Jews murmured in their tests, saying that God's bringing of them out of the land of Egypt, was because he hated them.

Now furthermore it behooves us to mark, that the cause of their railing, was for that they knew not God's power, notwithstanding that it was apparent to them. For although they had felt it enough, and more than enough to have confirmed therewithal: yet nevertheless, as soon as they heard speaking of the tallness of their enemies, of their walled cities, and of their strong holds: by and by their hearts failed them and they were utterly dismayed. And why? Surely God had given them proof of his mighty power, to the intent they should have trusted to him as I have said heretofore. But what for that? They shut their eyes at all those things, and therewithal fell to grudging as soon as they heard of any distress. And even so do we. For when God calls us, or commands us to go: we will see beforehand whether there be any letters or no. How shall I go, say we? For there is this let and that let: and as for me, I have no strength at all. And in the mean season we consider not that God is strong enough for us, and that it is his power which makes us to walk on, and to overcome all that ever the devil trumps in our way. Now then, we can never yield God his due honor, to trust in him, to put ourselves into his hand, and to hope that he will help us and give us the upper hand of all things that may turn us out of the right way: except we have an eye to the benefits we have received before. And so we see that Moses rehearses not here a single story, that we might the better know what God has willed us to do: but rather that he sets before our eyes what we be, together with the vices that are but too common among, among us, to the end we should learn to put our trust in God's strength. What is to be done then? We see our own frailty, albeit not so much as were requisite: but yet, that which we see ought to make us hang down our heads. Nevertheless, when we know once that there is no power in us to follow God's will: let us step to the remedy, let us not be out of heart for it, neither let us do as they do which think themselves quit because they have not wherewith to stead that run, saying. Oh sir, I am of flesh and blood, I am a man. And what is to say, but that you are in sin, and unclean? But many mane say so, to the intent to wash their hands of it. They may well say, as for me, I have not so great strength: true it is that I ought to do it, but I am not able. Yes Mary, but is there not a God that can do it for us? Yes: and therefore when we once know our own weakens, let us learn to seek the remedy, for as much as god has promised us the spirit of strength, that being grounded thereupon, we may not doubt but that we shall overcome all our enemies, and all the assaults that can be made upon us. Furthermore let us also consider the power of our enemies, and the greatness of temptation. For we have not to do with flesh and blood, they that fight against us are not mortal and transitory men, but they be all the powers of the air, and the prince of the world practices alley he can to discomfit us. Now therefore, when we once know the force of Satan, and the means that he has to break us, and to undo us: let us not fail to take courage, and to be of invincible constancy. And why? For we know that our God has promised us the upper hand of all that ever Stan shall practice against us. And therefore it is he that we must trust to. Thus we see generally how we ought to put this doctrine in use.

Now have to go through with the rest of the similitude which I glanced at here before: which is, that we must consider, that seeing God does call us nowadays, not to the possessing of the land of Canaan, nor to be lodged here in this world for a few days, but to come to the heavenly life, and to the immortal inheritance: it becomes us to take courage, and to acquaint ourselves with this doctrine. And seeing that God has told us, that his reaching of his hand once to us is not in vain, and that he will go through with his work: we on our part must determine fully to go through with our course, and not to shrink in the midst of the way. Thus you see, first of all that we be more to blame than the Jews of old time, if we hearken not to God's mouth, considering that his intent is not only to give us an earthly dwelling place to lodge in, but to call us right forth to the kingdom of heaven, and to the immortal glory, whereof we be made partakers beforehand by hope. And besides this, we see after what sort our Land has called us. For he has not given us such Spies as were given to the people of old time, he has not given us a dozen persons to report to us what manner a land it is: but he has sent us his only son, who is a faithful witness of the invisible heritage, yes and he has given us good hands thereof in his rising again. We have the twelve Apostles which were chosen according to the number of the tribes of Israel, and they were as good as twelve trumpeters to make god's voice heard throughout the whole world. And besides them, there has been a great cloud of witness, as the Apostle terms them in the twelfth to the Hebrews, whereby he means that if we were not over dull, and worse than unthankful and churlish: it might well suffice us to have such an infinite multitude of witness [to avow and warrant] our faith. Now then let us learn, that if we fight under Jesus Christ, who has told us that sin is overcome by his death and passion, and the bonds of death are broken to the intent to set us free: it becomes us now to look up to heaven, and to march on boldly through the world, for as much as he being risen again, shows us that the possession of righteousness and life is assured to us, because the power of his spirit is uttered therein. Seeing we have such a confirmation to warrant us the kingdom of heaven that is promised to us: should we be cowardly? What excuse will there be if we play the dastards and nice cockneys? But to the end we may obey our God and not provoke his mouth: let us fall to strengthening of ourselves in him. For what caused this wretched people to turn away so from his calling? Even their considering of their enemies force according to their own nature, and their forgetting to God and his power in the meanwhile. Let us learn then to make such account of the strength of God, as that we may by the power of his spirit get the upper hand in all encounters that he brings us to: for he will not have us to be idle in this present life. He could well enough set us in quiet at the first instant, so as we should not be troubled any manner a way, nor the world make war against us, nor we be tempted at all by our own flesh, and that Satan should be far off from us. God I say could well maintain us in ease at the first instant: but he intends to try our patience: for he will have us to be men of war. Wherefore let us on our side fight, yes, let us fight justify: and if our enemies be too strong for us, (as we find that they be indeed) let us flee for refuge to the help that our Lord has promised us, and we shall overcome all let's if we fight in the strength of God. But yet let us mark that we must fight to death, and not die once only: but have death present daily.

For what else is a Christian man's life, than an endeavoring to renounce the world and all his own affection? And therefore look how many good thoughts we have, so many are the deaths of our won forward nature: so as it is not possible for us to serve God one day, but we must die a hundred, yes, and a thousand times: I say we must die by beating down the sinfulness of our own nature: for we be full of vices. So then let us mark well, that God is so far off from making account of Liver hearted servants, that delight in ease, commodity and pleasure: that he will not only have us to fight, but also to be ready to die, and to put the doctrine in use which I come now to touch: that is to say, to be changed and renewed every minute of an hour.

Moreover let us note also, that like as our Lord Jesus Christ was buried after he had been crucified and suffered that reproach of his death: so must we be buried too. For it is not enough for us to die one day and no more, as some do (which have good brides, so as you would think them ready to forsake themselves utterly, and there appears great willingness in them to renounce the world: but suddenly they will needs fall to resting there, and they can no skill of entering into the grave:) But we must hold out in it, so as when we have once learned to die with Christ, and to crucify our old man as S. Paul terms it to the Romans: we must also be ready to go into the grave, that is to say, all that ever is in us as in respect of the world and of our own flesh, must be utterly abolished, and we ourselves become nothing. To be short, we must desire nothing but to have our life hidden with Christ, (as says Saint Paul to the Colossians) yes and to have it hidden till his coming again. But in any let us beware that we be not unthankful: for we shall never take courage, but by considering the inestimable worthiness of that good things whereunto God has called us. And therefore when we hear that the people considered not God's bringing of them out of the land of Egypt: let not us follow that trace, for it were the next way to put us out of heart. So then, we shall never make any account at all of God's benefits which we have received already, and which he shall have made us to feel: except we have our eye always fast set upon the promised land, that is to know, upon the everlasting life. And therefore on the one part we must often times bethink, us of God's benefits, and call to mind his goodness and mercy towards us which we have felt. But that is not all that we have to do: when we have one considered how God has showed himself to be our redeemer, how he has taken us out of the horrible blindness wherein we were, how he has enlightened us with the brightness of his Gospel, and how he has done us so many good turns even in respect of our bodies, as we ought well to understand that he has showed himself a father and savior towards us: but specially when we have thoroughly weighed or rather worshipped the goodness which he has showed us in all the spiritual benefits that we have received at his hand: (for they be the excellent, and we also ought to esteem them more than all the bodily things that we could have had at his hand:) when we have once considered all these things: then must we also bethink ourselves whereunto it is that God calls us, that is to know, to the kingdom of heaven. Therefore we must always have our countenance as it were set fast upon the heavenly life, and look thitherward, so as all our wits, all our desires, and all our endeavors tend thither. For if we have not an eye to the kingdom of heaven: we must needs shrink at every encounter every minute of an hour. Thus then you see what we have to do in that case. And moreover to the intent our hearts quail not as Moses says here: let us endeavor to strengthen ourselves with the power of the holy ghost, and consider that (as it is said by the prophet Esay, and alleged by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews,) the Gospel has this property and nature with it, that when we feel our knees weak and trembling, when our arms are feeble and after a sort bruised and broken, and when we be hemmed in on all sides with impediments that hinder us from following our vocation: it makes us to resort to God's word, which ought to strengthen us and to make our arms and legs sound and justify again, and specially to strengthen us in our hearts and minds.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, so as may repent us rightly of them, and being ashamed in ourselves resort to him, assuring ourselves that (as he has promised to receive all wretched sinners that come to him upon trust of his grace by means of the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ) we shall be accepted of him and his wrath pacified towards us, though we have provoked him never so much. And let us pray him, not only that we may obtain forgiveness of our sins past: but also to guide us henceforth by his holy spirit, and to draw us from all the vanities of the world, so as he fashion us according to his own righteousness, and make us feel the fruit of the victory and triumph that is prepared for us in heaven. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to people and nations of the earth etcetera.

The seventh Sermon upon the first Chapter

29 And I said to you, dread not, neither be afraid of them.

30 The Lord your God which goes before you will fight for you, like as he did with you in Egypt before your eyes.

31 And in the wilderness where you has seen how the Lord your God bare you (even as a man bears his son) in all way which you have gone, until you be come to this place.

32 And yet for all this, you have not believed the Lord our God.

33 Who to provide you a place to pitch your tents in, went before you in the way, in fire by night to give you light in the way that you should go, and in a cloud by day.

f hardness were well taken, it were an excellent virtue worthy of great praise, and exceedingly requisite in all a man's life. For if we be fearful, and have not a stout courage to do well: it will be an easy matter to carry us to all naughtiness. But yet for all that, the world knows not how to be hard. And that is the cause why men are so much given to rashness, and so bold and overbold to adventure upon foolish matches without advisement. But if we adventure upon things on our own head and fancy, and put not our trust in God: it is a building without a foundation. Nevertheless, it is not for us to look for God's help, further forth than he has bound himself to it by his promises. The way then that we ought to be hardy, is that when we have once sought out God's will, we obey it simply without attempting anything at our own pleasure. Be we once at that point, we must examine our own strength and ability, and finding nothing but weakness there, we must utterly distrust ourselves and resort to God. And for as much as he of his own free goodness vouchsafes to assure us that he will not leave us at our need: we must thereupon conclude, that we cannot miscarry being under his protection.

Now then we see that the true hardiness which God allows of, is when men trust not to themselves, nor lean to their own know and reason, but yield themselves wholly to him that ought to govern them, and depend upon his grace for all things which they want, and thereupon go forward stoutly, without shrinking or swerving one way or other. And this lesson is showed us in the text that I rehearsed even now out of Moses. For there he exhorts the people to hardiness, and shows them why. The Lord your God (says he) will fight for you. As if he should say, If you esteem yourselves the more for your great multitude, or think to overcome your enemies by your own power: it is but foolish presumption, and God will punish you for being so puffed up with pride. And if you should attempt anything without God's leave: and without having his word for it: that also were an overweening which should not seep unpunished.

But for as much as God is on your side, and you have his promise that he will not fail you and you be not come hither but by his leading of you with his own hand: Be not afraid. Thus sends he them to lean altogether to God's promises, and because they could not have in themselves the things that were requisite: he will have them to hope that God will assist them. Now, this was spoken to the Jews whom Moses governed at that time: but yet is it a doctrine whose use is everlasting in, God's Church, as is said before. We have not the Canaanites for our enemies against whom to fight: but yet do we know that this present life of ours shall not be idle, but that God will have us kept occupied like men of war that are waged to battle. And who be our enemies? Satan with all the shifts that he has, and all the unbelievers through whom we must pass. For here we be mingled with such as seek nothing else but the destruction of God's children, we have infinity temptation, and to be short we need never to go out of ourselves to find encounters now: for all our Justice, and all that springs of our flesh, is deadly enmity against GOD, as says S. Paul to the Romans. Seeing then that God has ordained that we should maintain battle all our life long, and we have a great sort of enemies, yes and those very mighty and strong, which never cease troubling of us: it behooves us to get us hardiness: for if we shrink, anon we be overcome. Therefore it stands us on hand to be armed with invincible constancy, or else if every of us follow his own swing, God will let us alone. So then, are we desirous that God should guide us, and hold us under his protection, and withstand our enemies to give us victory against them? Let us walk in obedience, and learn to lead our life according to his will. For whosoever roves abroad at random, forsakes God's help. Again, let no man beguile himself upon trust of men, for as much as they are commonly disappointed of their enterprises. And it is good reason that God should laugh them to scorn, when they fling forth so at all adventure, and keep neither way nor path. But like as most men are so over justice, that they can away with nothing worse, than to bear the yoke that God lays upon us: so every man would have liberty to do what he lifts, and it is seen that all men make war against God and his word, so as their jollity cannot be daunted, but they be worse than wild beasts. And therefore do most men abuse themselves with their own devices: for they regard not what God permits them to do. When a man will advance himself for vain glory, he regards not what is lawful, but pills, polls, and filches by hook or by crook. He has an eye to the ordinary custom of the world, but as for to frame himself after God's law, he has no mind at all: He never thinks thus with himself, behold, my God gives me no leave to do this thing, and therefore I must forbear it. He has no such thought with him.

Well, may men cocks themselves for a time, and bear themselves on hand hat all the world favors them: but in the end, God will make all their enterprises to vanish away, so as they shall be all confounded. And why? Because they ran gadding about, and kept not the right way. Now then, if we will be guided by God's hand, and succored by him at our need: let us learn to rule our life aright, and to submit it wholly to him. If we be not at that point, let us not look for any help at his hand: but rather to have him against us as we be worthy. Thus much concerning the first point. But yet for all this, the matter lies not altogether in being desirous to serve God, and to abstain from the foolish attempts that carry men away. For there may be some that are pliable enough, and which would faine do the things that God commands: but therewithal they be puffed up with a fond self weaning, bearing themselves in hand that they be able to compass the things that they have to do, and trusting to their own reason. But our Lord cannot abide to be robbed of the honor that belongs to him. For what have we whereof it is lawful for us to boast? When we have gathered all our powers to us, we shall find them to be nothing but a vain and fond show. And therefore we must be faine to put to the second point which I have touched. Which is, that here we be warned to submit ourselves to the obedience of God, so as we seek the things that he gives us leave to seek, and ask counsel at his mouth what things he likes and allows: to the intent that knowing ourselves to be over weak, yes and that there is no wisdom, strength, nor forwardness in us, but that all our powers fail us: we may pray him to guide us and to give us good direction, and to hold us up with strong hand, so as we ground not ourselves upon our won weaning or opinion, but altogether upon the assurance of his word. Has God promised to help us? Then let us not doubt but he will do it. Have we no promise at his hand? Then must we needs be at our wits end, till he comfort us and strengthen us by showing us his will. Thus you see what we have to mark upon this text of Moses.

And therefore although it be impossible for a christen man to step one step without falling: yet must we not be out of heart. The reason is, because we have

God's promise, that he will fight for us. Our fighting (says Saint Paul) is not against flesh and blood; behold, all the powers of the air are against us. For the devil is named the prince of the world, he is above us, and holds us as it were between his paws and in his throat, so as he is like enough to swallow us up every minute of an hour like a lion: and we have neither strength nor sense to withstand him.

But yet for all that, we must conclude, that for as much we be in the protection of our God, we be sure of the victory, if we fight well. Therefore let this saying be well printed in our mind, that the Lord our God will fight for us. When there is any question of doing well, the Papists clings to their own freewill, and it seems to this that God lays the bridle in their neck, so as they be able to do this and that, whereby they overthrow themselves as they be worthy. But contrariwise let us flee to our God, and hope to have him do the things that we cannot do.

Furthermore let us mark well, that this doctrine could not stand, unless we were unable to fight for ourselves. For were we of power to resist our enemies, God's fighting for us were more than needed. Then does it follow, that his fighting is because we have no power at all, because our arms are as good as broken, and because we be lame from the sole of the foot to the crown of the head. And in good sooth, if the Jews having to do but only with mortal and transitory enemies, needed to have God to fight for them: what had we need of? I pray you, when we see Satan and all the world ready to give assault upon us, yes and that he has already gotten the forehand of us, and in the meanwhile we have neither wall, nor bank to hold them out, but (which is worse) all our own justice are as darts wherewith Satan may serve his turn to wound us with all: can we defend ourselves, having so hard a battle to bear out? No: and so we see how the poor papists are deceived, in presuming upon their own freewill, and in bearing themselves on hand that if they have never so little help of God, they can well enough get the upper hand of Satan. On the contrary part, it is not said that God will supply some little default with his power, and that we must fight first to prevent him: it is not said so, but that it is our God that fights for us. It follows then that all that ever we do, is done by the only power that he gives us, so as it is borrowed of him.

True it is that we would say run, and that we make great endeavors to serve God: but whereof comes that, but of this, that knowing ourselves to be utterly unable, we presume not upon any power or ability of our own, but do feel that we be not yet come to perfection? And so, to be short, all our fighting comes of the mere grace of the holy Ghost.

True it is that God works not in us as in logs or blocks: for his will is to exercise us as I have said already. Therefore when we should do well, we must have a good moving and a lively affection: and although we have been let and drawn away. Yet must we take courage to enforce ourselves, that God may work in us as in his instruments. To be short, the battles of the faithful are painful enough: but yet for all that, we must come back to this point, that it is God which works by us, and that all that ever we do proceeds of him, in so much that without him we could not stir one finger, no nor so much as think one good thought. And so you see how this saying that the Lord our God fights for us, is accomplished. When we be once come to that point, although our enemies be never so terrible, yet let us not be as men dismayed, assuring ourselves that God alone is strong enough for us, and that although all the world should set themselves against us, yet ought we not to care for them.

Have we made that account once, with full purpose to withstand all Satan's assaults: we must also put the same doctrine in use in all the rest of our life. And so, when we see ourselves beset with never so many wicked persons, and that they lie in wait for us, continually following their lewd practices and devices: what have we to do? We must walk on plainly and uprightly, and not hold with the hare and hunt with the hound as they say.

When we see that the wicked labor all that they can to overthrow us, let us not do as they do, but let us look what God commands us, and frame ourselves thereafter. And besides that let us consider, that we shall be as a pray to them, if God had us not in his keeping. But seeing he has promised us that he will have a care of us, (as indeed he is our father) and that he will maintain us in our just quarrels, and set himself against all such as labor to oppress the right: for as much as he is of his infinity goodness vouchsafes to take our case in hand: let us go on hardily, and although our enemies be never so wily, and have the world at will, and have a number of practices ready for us: let not all this abash us, nor make us to step out of the right way. For why? Seeing that God is on our side, what a shame were it to prefer mortal men before him, as though they were able to get the upper hand of him? So long then as the creatures are not able to prevail against God, let us assure ourselves of the victory, for as much as it cannot but fall on our side. Thus you see how we ought to apply this doctrine of Moses to our use.

Furthermore we must also weigh well this saying which he adds, namely that God had given them a handle thereof in Egypt, so as they had good warrant to put their trust in him, and that throughout the wilderness he had ruled them like little babes, and born them in his arms. Seeing it is so (says he) that you have had proof of the power of your God in delivering you from the hands of your enemies: and seeing you have also perceived his fatherly care towards you, and that not for one day only, but for a long time together: You be too unthankful if you make not this conclusion, that he will no more fail you hereafter. To be short then, to confirm this people withal, Moses alleged here the experience of God's favor which they had had. And although this point has been treated of heretofore: yet for as much as it is repeated again by Moses: I must needs rehearse it again and put you in remembrance thereof: for there is no superfluity in that speech of the holy Ghost. Wherefore let us mark well, that when God puts us in mind of his former help and grace, his meaning is that we should think well upon the great number of benefits which we have received at his hand. And the same ought to serve us for a warrant, that he will continue to the end. For he is not like mortal men which alter and change their mind: neither is his ability abridged and to be short, he never ceases to do men good: whereas on the other side, if a man have done his friend a pleasure, he will perchance be willing to do as much for him the second time. But if his friend make non end, he will be weary of him. For he may say he is not able to do for all men, and that he has other friends whom he must do for, as well as for him. Again, we know that men are not constant. But there is no such thing in God, for the more good that we receive of him, the readier are his riches for us, and they never diminish. And as for him, he does not things by fits as creatures do, but he continues always in one will. There is not so much as any overshadowing in him, as says Saint James, to show that he is always like himself, and keeps continually at one stay. Thus may we assure ourselves of God's grace for the time to come, by our former experience of his succoring of us at our need heretofore, in that he has reached us his hand. To be short, all the good that God does us, ought to serve us to confirm our faith.

But now let us see what our unthankfulness is. For has there passed any day since our coming into the world, wherein God has not assisted us a thousand ways? Yes and did we not find him a father, before we knew him, yes and even before we came out of our mother's womb? How should the child be nourished in the mother's womb when he is there as in a grave, unless God uttered a wonderful goodness therein? Be we once entered into the world? Behold, we be hemmed in roundabout with miseries. Could we pass over one minute of an hour, if God showed not himself to have a continual care of us? Now then seeing that our God has uttered himself to us so many ways: is there any excuse for us if we be still in doubt and distrust of him, so as we cannot lean to him? Again let every man look upon himself [how God has dealt with him particularly.] For besides the common course of this worldly life, and the things that are ordinary to all men, every man ought to consider thus: Go to, I have been in such a danger and in such a necessity, and god has helped me. How has he wrought with me to this day? Has it been long of myself that I have not been undone and destroyed a hundred thousand times? Was it through mine own power, that I have been preserved? No. Then must it needs be that I had his help to save me, during the time that I was as good as senseless. And afterward he showed me the like favor again, when I had not yet any discretion to acknowledge it and to honor him for it. Now if I have received so many benefits of him: ought I not to hope that he will continue to do so to me still hereafter? Let everyman then bethink him of the benefits that he has received at God's hand, as well for his soul as for his body: and then shall we be sufficiently convicted, that he has powered out the riches of his goodness upon us, and that in such sort, as we may well trust in him, that he will never forsake us nor put us out of mind. After this manner must we put this text in use, where Moses speaks to the Jews and says thus: consider what you have found at the hand of your God to this hour. How has he dealt with you? How mightily has he overmastered the land of Egypt, and delivered you from the bondage wherein you were? And besides this, Moses notes here a double circumstance, whereby the people were convicted of God's mighty working in their behalf. For (says he) He has fought for you in Egypt, yes even before your eyes. As if he should have said, that the miracles which God has wrought, were not darksome nor done in hither mither, but so openly, and apparently, as the people could not say, we know not how the case stands. God then showed himself after a visible manner in that behalf, so as you cannot but know that he reached out his arm. That is the first of the two circumstances.

The other is this where he adds, that from the time of the peoples deliverance, God had maintained them, yes and that with such kindness and gentleness, as a father that had born his child in his arms could not have done more for him. Now these two points belong to us. For they be the too means whereby God procures and furthers our salvation, until he have brought it to full perfection. On the one side he fights for us: for we shall never be without enemies as has been declared already. If we be not acquainted with God, the devil will reign peaceably over us, and we shall delight to be under his tyranny, as they that are naturally given thereunto. But if God call us to him: then shall we feel the devil utterly against us, and we shall see the world inflamed with deadly hatred towards us. To be short, there will be such a sort of enemies to bid us battle, as we shall not know on which side to turn us. Look in what plight God's children are. Now then, his power must be fine to maintain us, and to fight the battle: and if he have done it for the Jews, he must be fine to do it now for us too.

Thus you see that the first means whereby God shows himself to be our Savior: is that he arms us against our enemies, or rather that he himself is our shield, our strong hold (as he names himself oftentimes in the scriptures,) our bulwark, our captain, and to be short, all that ever we be. Mark that for one point.

Now therewithal, when God has to strengthen us, and given us the upper hand of all assaults that could be put to us: he must be fine to uphold us still within. For else should not we be able to go one step, and we should want all that ever belongs to our salvation. And even as a young child should die, if it were not succored: even so is it with us. If a little child be let alone, he will cast himself into the fire or into the water, he could not take one bit of bread to feed himself with all, he must be born in arms, he must be swaddled, he could not dress himself, he would starve for cold sooner than come to the fire, and to be short, we see that a young babe before he come to some age, is the miserable creature that can be devised: and so is it with us in respect of our God. Let us set as much store by ourselves as we list, as we see that men do, glorying marvelously in their opinion: and yet is there more infirmity in us than in little infants. He must be fine to rule us, he must be fine to feed us, he must be fine to carry us, he must be fine to cloth us, he must be fine to do all for us. For if we have any wit at all, it is of his gift: if we have any strength, it comes of him: if we have any ability or helps, is it he that gives them. True it is, that we could not enjoy the least benefit in the world, but by faith, I mean to our profit: but yet for all that, it is he to whom we be beholden for all. Now therefore, when we once perceive that God has given us strength and stoutness to withstand that temptations that Satan has stirred up against us: that we have not been wounded to death by his venomous darts and arrows: that we have not wallowed in the muck of this world: that we have not been caught in the snares of the wicked: that their practices and wills have not prevailed against us: and that God has succored us at all assays: I say when we have perceived that: let us also consider that God has born us, that he has fed and nourished us, that he has clothed us, and that he has as it were put our meat into our mouths. The thing then whereupon we must set our minds, that we may well bethink us of God's benefits: is that the same must serve us for a warrant and confirmation of our faith, both in life and in death.

But yet the similitude that Moses uses where he says, as a father bears his child:

deserves to well weighed. Truly if there were no more but this, that God compares himself with a fleshy father: it were a singular record of infinity and incredible love. What a one is GOD is he be taken upon him the person of a man, and a creature, and likens himself to them that bear their children: therein we see how he humbles himself, of goodwill to accept us in like case as if we were his own children. And what a token of love is that? Now as for us, we be nothing worth: needs then must we acknowledge an inestimable goodness in our God, when he puts off his majesty, to make himself like a man.

Nevertheless he contents not himself with this similitude only, as we shall see hereafter in the song. For there he likens himself to an Eagle, which stretches out his wings to carry his young ones, and to train them to force in the air. Seeing that God puts himself as it were under the shape of a bird, to show us the passing fatherly care that he has of us: I pray you, ought not we to be ravished with wonderment, when God stoops so to us, to make us perceive the love that he bears us, and the favor that he means towards us? [yes surely.] For what a majesty imports this word GOD? And what are the birds and unreasonable creatures? [Nothing.]

And yet notwithstanding, behold, God loves us so greatly, that to express the love which he bears us, and to witness his goodness towards us, he likens himself to a bird, and us to his little ones. Since we see this, let us learn to magnify the goodness and infinite grace of our God better than we have done heretofore, and let every of us awake and enforce himself to consider them thoroughly. For wherefore is it that our God transfigures himself in such sort, but to reprove our unthankfulness, because we be so over gross and dull headed, as we let the benefits slip which he bestows upon us, and digest them not to conceive the goodness of them, and to take heed of them? That is cause why he sets them before us after that fashion. And we see also how our Lord Jesus speaks of himself, in bewailing the destruction of the City of Jerusalem. How oft (says he) would I have gathered your little ones under my wings, and you would not? There our Lord Jesus speaks not as man: but shows that in as much as he is the everlasting God, he played the part of a hen towards the Jews, and had his wings stretched out to have brooded them: and that they on their side played the wild beasts that would not be tamed. When we shall once have known the favor of our God towards us: let us beware that it be not so defaced as we may justly be accused of unwillingness to suffer our God to govern us peaceably. What is to be done then? Seeing that our GOD shows himself so loving and kindhearted, that he protects himself to be as a father towards his little babes, in bearing with our feebleness and infirmities: and seeing that he says by his Prophet Esay, that although all the mothers in the world should forget their children, yet would not he forget us: and seeing the stoops so low as to liken himself to an Eagle and to a Hen, to show that he takes us for his chickens and birds: let us look that we yield to him, and lay ourselves as it were in his lap, praying him to bear us and to relieve our infirmities, that we may be comforted at his hand, as he is ready to do, if we flee to his mercy for succor. Thus you see that we have to do for the well putting of this doctrine in use.

But Moses adds yet one point more for the better confirming that God had as it were born his people in his arms, saying That a nighttimes he appeared to them as in a pillar of fire, and a daytimes he appeared to them as in a Cloud. We know that God's showing of these two visible tokens were requisite for the leading of the people. For else in the night they should have been flighted with the wilderness which was very dreadful, as I have declared already. God therefore did given them light by night, whereby he showed that he was continually with them. And because they were in a hot and dry Country, he did spread a cloud over them in the day, which shadowed them from the burning of the Sun. We see then that these two tokens of God's presence, served fitly for the easing of the Jews, and that in all these doings they felt his fatherly goodness. Again, the more of such figures they had, the more were they convicted that GOD had governed them, and that he had a continual care of their welfare. And therefore does Moses make express mention both of the fire and of the cloud, saying that neither night nor day GOD had ever forsaken them: so as they could not but know that he was with them, and that his grace accompanied them, as he saw meet and expedient for them.

But by the way we must note, that although we in these days have no such figures as the Jews had under Moses: yet notwithstanding GOD gives us the thing that is of equal value, according also as Saint Paul shows, saying that the cloud and the fire were a kind of Baptism to the ancient fathers. And the chief thing that GOD meant to show to them thereby, was that although as in respect of their bodies they were guided with fire by night, and had a cloud spread over their heads by day: yet God's meaning was not to have them stay upon these temporal benefits, but to lead them further. Then were they baptized in the cloud. And what have we nowadays? Does not Baptism warrant us God's presence more certainly and with a greater virtue, that did that ancient figure? Yes surely, if all things be well considered. For we must not stay our eyes upon the water: but for as much as the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ was shed, which is a spiritual washing to us: therein God shows himself more familiarly to us nowadays, than he did to such as lived under Moses. True it is that we have not the like miracles: but in the meanwhile, how excellent was the Majesty that appeared in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ? How excellent were the miracles that he wrought? To be short, how highly ought we to esteem the death and passion that he suffered? Again, have we not a passing excellent record of his Godhead in his rising again from death? Seeing then that we have the whole fullness of God's Majesty in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that not in shadow only, but in very substance as Saint Paul declares to the Colossians: I pray you were it not too shameful a thanklessness in us, if we should not be thoroughly resolved that our God has uttered himself sufficiently to us, to cause us to rest wholly upon him, and to trust in his power? Thus you see wherein we resemble the Jews as touching the cloud whereof Moses speaks here, and as touching the pillar of fire.

Furthermore, if we consider well how our Lord guides us: we shall find that the Cloud and the pillar of fire served not the Jews more, than the government that is established in the Church at this day, serves us. Whereas that people had the pillar of fire by night, and the Cloud by day: we must understand that in so doing GOD meant not to bless them for that one time only. For what had the Jews been the better for it, if it had not made them to know that God was their governor all their life long? Now then we cannot go one pace, unless we be led by our God and assured of his goodness. For our life is like the journey that the people of Israel made thorough the wilderness. God therefore suffers us not to wander in uncertainty, knowing not whether we were best to go or to stand still. For we have such a declaration of his will, as we can never stray, except it be willfully. Whomsoever seeks God's good pleasure, shall be taught by him. And therefore nowadays we have no need of the visible pillar of fire, nor of the cloud that was spread over the children of Israel, for so much as our Lord shows himself to be at hand with us by another mean, and stretches out his hand continually over us, and the way is wide and open enough for us. Now then we have good cause to be contented.

And so let us understand, that Moses did not only speak to the Jews after all sorts: but also that he has written these things for us, that we also might be confirmed nowadays in the doctrine which we have of God, and not be disobedient to him. And seeing we have need to be succored at his hand, against Satan and all our adversaries: let us learn to distrust our own strength which is none at all, and acknowledging our own wretchedness let us resort to him for aid and help at our need. And when we have once gotten hardiness to march under his banner: let us assure ourselves that he will never suffer us to miscarry, though we be assailed with never so many temptations. We see what threatening there is nowadays, yes even on all sides: we see how our welfare (as to outward seeming) is as a prey to our enemies, which seek nothing else but to swallow us up: and therewithal we see also how weak and feeble we be to withstand them: and yet for all that, let us not doubt but our Lord fights for us, conditionally that we walk on simply under the shadow of his wings, and play not the loose colts, nor attempt anything which he allows not. And so doing, let us not doubt but he will deliver us, and stretch out his hand upon our enemies to vanquish them and destroy them, so as we shall know that he has a continual care of us, and that his only desire is to guide and govern us, and to continue and increase his graces in us, and to have us always in his keeping and protection.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, that being ashamed of ourselves, we may crave pardon of him, and being desirous to be governed by his direction, seek nothing but to submit ourselves to his yoke more and more, till he have rid us quite and clean of all our fleshly corruptions and imperfections, and that we become to the full measure of his righteousness, whereunto it behooves us not to tend. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father and etcetera.

The eighth Sermon upon the first Chapter

34 Then the Lord heard the voice of your words, and was angry, and swear, saying:

35 None of the men of this wicked generation, shall see the good land that I have sworn to give to their fathers.

36 Saving Caleb the Son of Jephunneh, who shall see it: and I will give him the ground whereupon he has trodden, and to his children, because he has followed the Lord thoroughly.

37 Also the Lord was angry with me for your sakes, saying, You also shall not go in thither:

38 But Joshua the son of Nun, which stands with you, shall go in thither. Strengthen you him: for he shall put Israel in possession thereof.

39 Your little children which you said should be a pray, and your sons which at this day know neither good nor evil, shall go in thither, and I will give them the land, and they shall possess it.

40 But as for you, turn you back again, and get you into the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea.

fter that Moses has rehearsed the people's sin: now he puts them in remembrance of the punishment that followed upon it, that they might be better advised thenceforth, and not provoke God to wrath after that fashion. For when so ever God punishes men for any offences, the same ought to serve them for a warning, and other men for an example, to beware that they do no more so. True it is that they which had murmured after that sort against God, were already dead: but yet was it expedient that their children should have it printed in their minds, that God had not left such unbelief and disobedience unpunished. And so we see the intent of Moses. Wherefore let us note, that if God have showed us that he cannot away with some offence: his intent is that we should think upon it, and that the chastisements which he lays upon us should turn to our profit, and that they should serve us for the time to come, so as we should not look to have him to stretch out his hand against us: for it is good for us to be taught at other men's cost as the proverb says. But we must mark, that Moses rehearses here briefly, the things that are declared more largely in the fourteenth Chapter of the Book of Numbers, where God is so wroth with the people, that he would have destroyed them utterly. He says there to Moses, pass not you or it: I can give you a greater and excellent people than this: but as for these wicked folk, they must needs be rooted out, I cannot suffer them anymore. Hereupon Moses makes intercession for them and says: Not so Lord: for if it should be heard in Egypt, that it were so come to pass, your name should be blasphemed, and the wicked would make a scoffing at it, saying: because God could not perform his promise, therefore has he slain this people, and so has he beguiled them and betrayed them. Lord, wilt you suffer your name to be slandered after that sort? Thereupon God tells him that he will not execute his vengeance upon any other than such as had murmured, and yet notwithstanding that he would therewithal reserve a seed, on whom to perform the thing that he had promised to his servant Abraham.

By the way, that threat that is contained here, imports not that God was not determined in his own purpose what he would do: for if we should think that he altered his mind upon the advertisement that Moses gave him: it could by no means agree [with his nature.] Should a mortal man have more discretion and forecast than the living God? No: and on the other side we know that God does in no wise change his purpose. Nevertheless, divers times he utters somewhat rough threatening, to drive us to humble ourselves before him, and to make us feel what we have deserved. God then in telling Moses that he would utterly root out that people, so as there should not one of them be left alive, meant not that he was determined so to do: but shows that the people was worthy to have been quite and clean destroyed. And indeed there was just cause why, to the intent that every of them should be smitten down and subdued on his own behalf, and that Moses should pray after that manner. And yet for all that, God found the means to make good his promise, notwithstanding the willful forwardness that was in the people. And this is a point well worthy to be marked among others: that when God has chosen any people, although his grace be despised, so as all they whom he had called become unworthy of such a benefit, and banish themselves out of his house by rejecting that promise that was offered them: yet will God find the means to chastise them in such wise, as his Church shall not utterly perish, yes and he will even overcome men's forwardness with his goodness. I say it is well worthy to be marked. For we see that on the one side, the hypocrites, under color that God has manifested himself to them, and promised to be their Saviour, do surmise that they have him bound, and thereupon take leave to do evil: and if a man show them their sins, they harden themselves against it, there is nothing but pride in them, and they arm themselves with God's name, to fight against his Prophets. And this have they done in all ages. When the Jews were rebuked for their wicked life, and for their turning away from God: they were inflamed with such rage against the Prophets, as to say, How now? To whom speak you? Are not we the Church? Are not we God's inheritance? Has he not set his covenant among us? Have not we the sign of Circumcision? Have not we the temple where he is worshipped? We see then that the Jews did falsely abuse God's name, to advance themselves against him and his word. And this is reported of the Jews: but yet we may see the like on ourselves. For all they to whom God has done so much honor as to give them his word and to manifest himself to them, do imagine that they have him as it were in their sleeve: and yet for all that, instead of profiting themselves by God's so gentle alluring of them to him, they set themselves against all good doctrine, they cannot find in their hearts to bear any yoke, they will needs be as wild beasts, and yet in the meanwhile they will needs have God to avow them to be of his flock. But here we see, that although God had as then set up his feat among the Jews, and made a covenant with them to be their Savior to the end: yet when he saw they were not meet to have him, but that they drew clean back, and ceased not to spite him: he found the means to punish them, yes and that in such sort, as all those things went to naught, and yet he himself abode sooth fast, notwithstanding their destruction. And therefore let us not deceive ourselves. When God has once taken us to him to be of his household, and adopted us to be his children: let us not sooth ourselves in our vices, but consider how it stands us on hand to walk so much the more awfully, when God has showed himself so bountiful towards us, and that forasmuch as he has uttered his goodness in such wise, it is good reason that we on our part being so much beholden to him, should look well about us and endeavor to give ourselves wholly to his service, and be so loss to offend him, as we may also be afraid to be bereft of the grace that he has once bestowed upon us. Mark that for one point.

And therewithal let us mark also, that God in punishing the hypocrites and all such as abuse the goodness that he has done towards them, ceases not for all that, to continue faithful still. For if he should destroy the whole world and leave no after spring to call upon him, it might be said, indeed God has just cause to punish men after that manner: but in the meantime where is his promise? He has said that his Church shall continue forever, and that his name shall be called upon here beneath, as long as there is either Sun or Moon in the sky: but now is all dispatched quite and clean, the remembrance of salvation is utterly buried among men. Although then that God should do justly in punishing such as had done amiss: yet should his promise be vain and void, if he performed not the thing that he promised, and so would men blame him of unfaithfulness. But (as I said) he finds means to punish them that deserve it, and yet notwithstanding reserves and keeps still a people to himself, and suffers not his truth to fall to the ground, or to die without effect. And hereof we have a notable example in this place. For we see that God had made a covenant with Abraham, and had promised him to give the land of Canaan for an heritage of his offspring. As soon as the time came, the promise was performed. Yes verily: but all the posterity of Abraham refused and rejected the promise, whereby they disannulled it as much as lay in them. Thus you see they be deprived of it through their own unthankfulness. But yet to the intent that God be not accused of leaving his promise unperformed: it behooved him in punishing the fathers to preserve their race. They that come up afterward are also the offspring of Abraham, and they possess the land that was promised: by means whereof the covenant that God had made abode sure and fast settled to the end. And for the same cause it is said that God reserved the young children to himself. Now then, as many as had murmured and were above the age of twenty years, are cast off and banished from the good turn that was ready for them: but they that were under that age are preserves still, and God is glorified in them. And albeit that the accomplishment of his promise was delayed by the space of forty years: yet notwithstanding he showed himself faithful in the end. This is the matter which we have to bear away.

So now likewise, when we see the world so far out of order that all is marred, and it seems that all men will needs spite GOD, and shut themselves out of all hope of salvation, by driving away the light of the Gospel that is given them: let us look for some vengeance at hand. For though God be patient: yet must he be fine in the end, to stretch out his arm to be revenged of such malice and contempt. On the one side, they to whom the Gospel is preached, do grow altogether heathenish, and it is seen that a number wax worse and worse, and wickedness becomes more excessive than it was in the time of the abominations of the Popedom, so that (to speak properly) it should seem that men become devils after their hearing of the Gospel. What is it I pray you, that a man shall see, yes and that commonly? That there is now no more love of God, no nor countenance of loving him, that Religion is let alone cold and dead, and that there is no more zeal in us than in a timber log. It is apparent then that God's word is nowadays stained and defiled with our in quite, in so much that whereas we should be as burning Lamps to give light to fill ignorant souls, we give them occasion of stumbling. Again on the other side, we see how the faithless do fight against God, seeking nothing else daily but to overthrow his truth, and to cause it to be quenched out, that it might never be spoken off more. Seeing then that the whole world is so malicious, and that as well the one sort as the other do make open war against God, continuing still in their stubbornness which increases from day to day: must not God (after he has waited for some conversion and amendment) execute his vengeance upon us as we deserve? You see then after what manner it behooves us to prepare ourselves, considering that wickedness is so great nowadays; and so far past hope of recovery. But yet therewithal let us comfort ourselves, and look also that in punishing the offenders God will not sail to keep still some fed to himself, so as he will always have some little flock to call upon him and to worship him. Let us not doubt then but that our Lord will always maintain his Church, to the intent to show himself sooth fast. Although all things seem forlorn and brought to confusion: yet will God work after such a fashion, as we shall see in the end, that he has had a regard of his promise, and that he will show himself faithful and prove himself so indeed.

But let us mark well, that the Church shall not always be visible so as we shall perceive it. It shall seem [now and then] that all is come to naught: Like as when God made the people to turn back again, he said to them, Get you into the wilderness towards the Red Sea, as though they should have returned again into Egypt. Here is such a great confusion, as it might well seem that he minded not anymore that the land of Canaan should be given for an heritage to those to whom it was promised. You see then that for a time it seemed that God had falsified his promise, and that there was not anymore hope that the children of Abraham should have entered into the place that was promised them. Even so shall it fall out with us, as indeed it is come to pass. For when God withdraws his light out of the world: it will seem that there is no more any Church at all. If a man look round about him, he shall see that all is gone to havoc. And in good faith, what desolation was there in the time of Popery? Yes and even still at this day, a man might think that all should go to ruin and decay. But let us mark, that it is all one as if God should cause those to go back again which are not worthy to go forward: and that yet notwithstanding, he ceases not to hold on in such wise, as his Church shall still be maintained and preserved. Albeit, not that the same can be discerned with the eye, or perceived by man: but we must shut our eyes, until our Lord do work after his own manner, that is to say wonderfully beyond all our expectation, and beyond all that we be able to conceive. Thus you see how we may comfort ourselves in this, that although we see it is not possible but that God must not cast some horrible punishments in these days upon men's wickedness: yet nevertheless he will always reserve some people to himself, so as the thing that he speaks by his Prophet Joel shall be seen continually. Though heaven and earth (says he) do go together, though the sun be darkened, though the moon drop blood, though the stars lose their light, and though the earth remove: yet for all that whomsoever calls upon the name of the Lord, shall be saved: GOD will preserve them whom he has chosen to call upon him: and albeit that their life be hid, yet will not God fail to hear them in the end and to show them that he never was unmindful of his promise, but that he had a regard of himself, notwithstanding that men were not worthy to have anyone drop of goodness and mercy offered to them. This is the matter in effect which we have to remember in this first place.

But wherewithal we must mark the oath that God made against the Jew, as it is set down in the Psalm, and afterward applied to us by the Apostle saying: Today, if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts as your fathers did in the wilderness, to whom I swear in my wrath, that they should not enter into the land that was my rest. We see how it was that will of the holy Ghost, that the Jews should in all ages be mindful of this disobedience that had been committed: and that thereupon they should remember that for the same, their fathers were bereft of the benefit that had been promised them, and shut out from God's rest. For (as I said before) this served not for the Jews only, but the Apostle applies it also to our time. God then directs his speech to us at this day. Therefore we must have our ears open to hearken to him: we must not drive off from morrow tomorrow: we must seek no delay: as soon as God speaks we must be ready to learn, and not harden our hearts against him. Whereby we be put in mind that there is nothing which hinders our obedience to God, but our won resisting of him through a certain willful forwardness. For he for his part applies himself in such wise to us: as he bears with our rudeness and infirmity. So then, all they that are taught by the Gospel, shall obey God without gainsaying, if they poison not themselves through a certain willful forwardness to withstand God, and to drive back his grace. That is the cause why we be expressly warned, not to harden our hearts. Yes verily: for we must not think that God will suffer his grace to be so scorned, and dallied with, and set light by. If he were inflamed with anger against the Jews for refusing to enter into the Land of Canaan: if we nowadays do play the rest jades and fall to kicking, let us not think that such unthankfulness shall escape unpunished. And in good sooth, if the Jews were so punished at that time, that all the sort of them came to naught, wandering in the wilderness by the space of forty years: God showed yet more hard and rigorous vengeance upon them afterward, in the thralldom of Babylon and other miseries that happened to them: for the thralldom of Babylon lasted threescore and ten years. And at their return, although he showed great and wonderful power: yet were they but a handful which were saved, according to this saying of the Prophet Esay, though you people were as the sand of the sea, yet should but a small remnant of them be saved. And in another place he says, we had been as Sodom and Gomorrah, if God had not reserved a little seed, yes even a very little one. We see then that God increased his wrath against such as amended not at the example of their fathers. And why? Because they were the less to be excused, for they ought to have taken warning by the punishments that were prepared for them. Therefore did they double their offence. And what think we of the desolation that had happened since the [first] preaching of the Gospel, [for the refusal whereof] the wretched world has wandered so affray, as all things have been corrupted in the Church, so that in steed of God's service there has been nothing but abominations, instead of truth there has been nothing but devilish lies and errors, and all things have been put out of order there, and that the same confusion has lasted now so long time? [All these things do put us in mind] that God's voice ought to found shirker nowadays in the Gospel, than it did in the Law. For as is said by the Prophet Aggeus, God makes heaven and earth to quake nowadays, when the Gospel is preached. And besides that, we have all the things that befell to the people of old time, which serve us a lively picture. There must we behold God's wrath, to restrain ourselves from doing evil, as Saint Paul shows us in that tenth of the first to the Corinthians. But if we make no reckoning thereof: is it not reason that God should punish us sorer than he did the Jews?

Let us learn then to hearken to God's voice while it sounds in our ears, and let us beware that we harden not our hearts, least God swear in his wrath. For it is said expressly that God swear. And why? Because men think his threats to be vain, if he make them not to perceive that he speaks in good earnest. And of a truth we see daily, that when God's threatening are uttered to us, a great many of us do but shake our ears at them, and the number of those that are touched with them, is very small. Therefore the oath that GOD swears is no more than needed, even in respect of the blockishness that is in men, for as much as they be so foolish as to make but a mock of everything that is told them. And like as God to help the weakness of our faith, uses an oath when he confirms his promises: so on the contrary part, he uses to swear when he threatens to punish us. And why? To the end that being afraid and abashed at is, we should come to repentance. For if we be not made to stoop that we may take hold of God's justice: our faults will never dislike us. God's justice then must become as a thunder or lighting, as we must be abashed before him, that we may no more be so drunken in our sins as we were. And therefore when so ever God's threatening do not dismay us sufficiently: let us call to mind the oath that Moses speaks of here, and let us assure ourselves that it is we whom the same points at, according to that which I have alleged already both out of the Psalm, and out of the record of the Apostle.

And therewithal let us also mark well the words that are set down here by Moses. None of this cursed and wicked generation (says he) shall see the good land that I have promised. Here GOD makes a comparison between land and the people. This land then was a singular gift, in token whereof he calls it his rest: meaning thereby that he had chosen that land to be as a dwelling place and everlasting inheritance for the people to rest in under his protection. For there is no certainly in this world, and if we be lodged in any place, we may be put out of our nest again today or tomorrow. But God told them that he had assigned the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession to the children of Abraham, to maintain them and keep them safe there, so as no man should trouble the, not ever drive them out again. You see then that the land was not a common gift, but a gift that deserved to be esteemed as most excellent above all others. But behold, the people on the other side, are malicious and forward. Therefore it is all one as if our Lord should say, I see well enough how the world goes, I shall sooner make fire and water to agree, than cause this people to like of my benefits. For in my benefits there is nothing but mere goodness, and in this people there is nothing but mere naughtiness.

Let us mark well then, that to enjoy God's benefits, we must frame ourselves to his will and righteousness: for our naughtiness and God's goodness can never match together, in so much that if we will needs follow our own nature, God must needs withdraw his goodness away from us. True it is that God looks not for any worthiness at our hands why he should do us good: nay rather, he fights daily against our sins, and uses mercy whereas he might lawfully use rigor against us. But yet for all that, if he see that we continue in our naughtiness, he can no longer continue in doing us good. You see then that the doctrine in doing which we have to gather upon this consideration: is that there must be as it were an accord and melody between God and us, and that when he imparts his benefits to us, we must make such estimation of them, as we endeavor to serve and honor him for them, and consider that he calls us to him, to pluck us back from our sins. If we do so, the good that he has done us shall be confirmed more and more. Otherwise, it must needs be that our naughtiness shall cut off the course of his goodness. Why so? For (as I have said already) when God offers men his benefits, and they refuse them of a willful forwardness: it is as if fire and water should meet together.

But besides this, we must also mark God's upbraiding of the people, with their saying that their young children should be a pray to their enemies. They (says he) shall possess the land, yes even to the intent that you may be proved liars. Here it behooves us to mark well, that when men will needs doubt of God's truth, they must in the end be found liars, and God's truth shine forth the brighter to their shame. Now hereby we be warned to receive simply the promises that GOD offers us. And although it seem at the first blush that they should never be accomplished, and that there be a number of impediments to hinder them: yet must we do him the honor to believe that he is faithful, and to abide patiently for the convenient time of his performance of the thing that he has said. For if we gainsay his truth, and murmur, and fall to questioning and disputing, with how can this be? Is it possible? God seems to mock us: I say, if we go that way to work: Well may he perform his promise for all that: but it shall be our shame, so as we shall always be found liars. We may well triumph for a time, as we see the unbelievers do, which malapert despite God, spewing out their blasphemies against him: but yet in the end God shall be known spite of our teeth, and therewithal we shall be put to shame. And therefore let us beware of it, and that we may beware of it, let us mark well how the Jews are upbraided with it here. You have said that your children shall be made a pray: but they shall enjoy the land, and you shall be set beside it.

Moreover, the example of Caleb the son of Jephunneh is very notable, and so is also the example of Joshua the son of Nun. These two are reserved of a great multitude. And why? Because they had gone through stoutly. For this record is yielded to Caleb, that he had persisted [or continued] in following the Lord. When as God exempts here but two men of an infinity multitude: therein we see how it is a folly to look what other men do. For had Caleb and Joshua done so: what had come of it? They had gone to destruction with the rest. But they suffered not themselves to be carried away by that horrible tempest. When they saw so strange a turning back in the whole people: yet did they confirm themselves in the power of God, and although the people would have stoned them, (as is declared in the book of numbers, and as shall be touched again anon): yet did they their duty. So then, seeing that God allows the constancy of Caleb and Joshua, for that they did shut their eyes when they saw the people so excessively set upon mischief, and exhorted them to obey God: let us note well that although things be out of order in the world, and we see stumbling blocks to overthrow us, and vices rage like a water flood: yet is it not sufficient cause to suffer ourselves to be carried away, or to make us follow the common train, for it shall not abate our condemnation before God. We may well say, all the world does so: for all the world shall perish, and you with it, which speaks so in contempt of your God. What a thing is it, that men will needs abolish God's justice, and give no more ear to him when they give themselves to all naughtiness, but shut him up in heaven, and suffer him to have no more authority here beneath? Where to tends this? And yet for all that, we see nowadays that when the ignorant intend to shroud themselves, the greatest shield that they have is to allege, How so? I see that all the world behave themselves contrariwise. And in the mean season what becomes of God? God must be fine to be thrust under foot, and men must run leaping and frisking at their pleasure. Yes and even among ourselves, if a man tell one or other of their faults: [their answer is,] I see others are as bad as myself. We bear ourselves on hand, that our condemning of our neighbors will go hand by that mean. Therefore let us think continually upon the example of Caleb of Joshua. And for as much as GOD shows that he made more account of them though they were but two in all, than of all the other huge multitude which were about seven hundred thousand persons: for as much (say I) as we see that God gives such sentence of them: let us learn to submit ourselves to him, and to regard nothing but that which he commands. And though the world run gadding here and there in the meanwhile, let us follow the way that God has showed us by his pure word.

Moreover, let us way this speech where it is said, that Caleb held out in following the Lord. For it is not enough for us to begin well, but we must also stick to God through stitch, yes even without any fining or starting, and without fainting or giving over in the midst of our way. And in good sooth, it is not for naught that this record is given to Caleb. For (as I have touched heretofore) the people were in such an uproar, as they would have stoned him and Joshua too. In so much that if God had not taken them away, and his glory appeared upon the tabernacle: they had lost their lives for it. Yet for all this, they ceased not to do their duty still, but cried out against the people and rent their clothes. And after that manner strove they against those which would not enjoy God's blessing. We see then how there was a marvelous power in Caleb and Joshua. And therefore we be warned by their example, not only to enter into the way, about also to go forward and forward still, assuring ourselves that we cannot hold out to the end in serving God, but by bearing out of many hard brunts and temptations, [and therefore we have need] to strengthen our hearts in such wise, as nothing maybe able to make us to fleet. Thus you see where to our Lord and his holy spirit exhorts us.

Whereas the praises here the constancy of Caleb and Joshua: it is to the end (say I) that their example should serve to our instruction. For although the memorial of the righteous be blessed before God: yet is it declared for our profit. Therefore let us not have such a zeal as shall wax cold when it comes to the following of God: but let us determine fully with ourselves to hold out with it, whatsoever the devil practice, or how so ever the world set itself against us: like as at this day we see many resistances, and many occasions, that might make us start away: but yet for all that, we must hold on our journey, not for two or three days only, but all our life long. Let us go on therefore: and when there is any mention of following God: let us mark that it is to confirm the matter better which I have declared already: that is to know, that if we follow men, we shall run astray. For why? What else are the ways of the world but strains, so as every man gads in and out, when they once turn their backs upon God? What is it to be done then? So long as we look upon men, it will be impossible for us to go right: but we must follow God.

True it is that when God is so good to us, as to give us men to accompany us, yes and to go before us and to reach us their hand: it is a great help, and (as Paul tells us) we must look wisely upon them: and when we have good servants of God which teach us and lead us with good conscience, we must mark that, and fashion ourselves like to them: and in so doing we shall not follow men: for in fashioning ourselves like to them that follow God, we have his way for our way. We ground not ourselves one upon another, to say, Thus will I do, for I see most men do it. No: but for as much as God calls us to him, it behooves us to go, Yea though there were no more but myself alone: yet ought I to follow my God. But if furthermore he bear with me so far, as to give me company: then must I go to him with so much the better courage: and what so ever come of it, I must not swerve from his pure word. Thus you see why it is said here, that Caleb the son of Jephunneh followed the way of the Lord, and therefore was exempted from the common condemnation. Yes and it is said that he follows constantly, that is to say, he continued throughout to the uttermost. And so we see now in effect that all the people were condemned, and that only two were acquit, because they had given glory to God.

But the circumstance that is added, namely, that God spared not Moses because of the people: increases yet more the thing that I have said. Indeed this cannot be dispatched all as now: but yet must I add this point beforehand. For if God spared not Moses, (who notwithstanding had such record as we know), but punished him because he held not out constantly to the uttermost in resisting the lewdness of the people: I pray you what shall become of us? Is it likely that we shall go scot-free nowadays, when every man suffers himself to be carried away because he sees that naughtiness has the upper hand? Then if we happen to overshoot ourselves so, think we that God will let us alone? No, no: For if such punishment as we hear of, was extended upon Moses: needs must we feel far sorer, when we entangle ourselves in the common vices, and forsake God to follow the world. And let us mark well, that in swearing that the people should not enter into the land: he says, you shall reckon the years according to the number of the days wherein you sped out of the land. They that were sent to spy out the land carried forty days: and so behooved it the people to wander up and down by the space of forty years. And so we see that when God has used long patience towards us, he makes us to pay very dear for our abusing of his goodness. Wherefore let us not measure God's punishments after our won fancy: for they be sorer than our wits can conceive. But when so ever he threatens us, let us tremble at his only speech, and make hast to follow it. And forasmuch as his speech is directed to us nowadays, let us not drive off till tomorrow, but let us follow, and let every man be going on his way. Again forasmuch as we be frail and have a rough and thorny way to go, yes and there be many stops to bar us, so as it will seem that there be great mountains to make us turn back again: let us pray our God to give us strength to go on still forward. For if he strengthened Caleb and Joshua: let us assure ourselves he will do the like to us. And therewithal if we see that the world hinder us, and that there is store of stumbling blocks on all sides: let us pray God that he suffer us not to be corrupted with others, but that we may bear him the honor to stick to him, and to yield ourselves wholly to his word, giving them leave to perish that needs will perish, and in the meanwhile staying ourselves by the promise of salvation which he has given us, accordingly also as it is his will that we should attain thereto by any such knowledge.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to touch us better than we have been: and that above all things we may bethink us of the unthankfulness whereof we be guilty, in that we have not obeyed his word, nor been so willing to follow the things that he has declared to us as was requisite. And therefore let us beseech him, not only to forgive us our faults past, but also to strengthen and govern us in such wise by his holy spirit, as we may overcome all the temptations of Satan, and forsake all the lusts of our own flesh, to the end we may obey the voice of our God, and in such sort apply all our senses thereunto, as we may pass through all the gathered us together into his everlasting kingdom. That is may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth etcetera.

The ninth Sermon upon the first Chapter

37.38.3 9.40. Also the Lord etcetera.

41 Then answered you and said to me: we have sinned against the Lord. We will go up and fight as the Lord our God has commanded us. And you armed yourselves everyone with harness of war, and were ready to go up into the hill.

42 And the Lord said to me, warn them that they go not up, nor fight not, for I am not among you: least you be vanquished of your enemies.

E began yesterday to see how hard it is to abstain from sinning when a man is evil company, especially if he have the charge of government. For seeing it was Moses hap to be shaken down: how shall they do which are far weaker than he way? We know that God had made him to excel all men, we see also how he served his turn by him, and what record he has given of him. And yet for all that, behold here a fall which God dislikes of so greatly, that he disappoint him of entering into the land for it: and such dishonor and reproach was done to him, that he might not possess the inheritance that had been promised, as well to him as to all the people. Therefore we had need to call upon God when we be mingled with such as are able to corrupt us and to thrust us out of the way, so as we be hemmed it roundabout with evil examples. But yet they which have the charge of government, ought to stand in greater fear and dread, and to call upon God to strengthen them, and to give them such constancy as they may not swerve any whit at all.

But before we go any further, we must mark that whereas Moses reports that God was angry with him for the people's sakes: he does it not to excuse himself that he had not done amiss: for then should he reply against God who had given sentence upon him. In the twentieth Chapter of the book of Numbers it is said expressly, you shall not enter into the lands, because that you and Aaron have not glorified the Lord before the people of Israel. So then we see that God charges not Moses with the sin of the people as who should say that he himself had been guiltless: but his meaning is that he fell not to evil of his own accord and moving, but was driven to it as by a storm, when he say such uproar and hurly-burly among the people, the he was at his wit's end and wish not what to do, by means whereof he had not a present faith to give glory to God. The intent of Moses then is not to wash his hand, as though he were not blame worthy at all: but to do the people to understand that the very mischief sprang of them. Nevertheless it may be thought strange how Moses should offend, seeing it appears not in all the rehearsal of the story. It is said that the people grudged against God, because they wanted drink in the wilderness, saying: Had it not been better for us that God had killed us in Egypt? Must he needs bring us into this dry and barren place, that we might die here for thirst? It appears well that he hates us, and his intent is to make us to linger here in torments: and in the meanwhile we be past all hope of doing well. After this manner did the people murmur. On the contrary part Moses weeps and resorts to God, saying: Alas Lord, ought you to have so slender a reward for you delivering of this people through thin own goodness, as to have your holy name blasphemed by them? What could Moses have done better than this? For he is so far off from consenting to the wickedness of the people, to be any companion with them: that he weeps to see the offence committed against God. And David likewise shows an excellent and wonderful well disposed mind, in saying that he wore sackcloth for their sakes that blasphemed God. Moses did as much. It should not seem then that there is any fault in all this. For God commanded him to take his staff, and to strike upon a rock, and to make water to come out of it before the people. He obeyed. We see not there any replying at all: nor we see not that Moses did so much as once doubt. Moreover when he speaks to the people, eh says: Come on you rebels, must God be fine to make water to come out of this rock, which you see now so hard and dry? You see here rebukes the people sharply, and a man would think he could not glorify God better. And yet for all this, it is said to him, You has not given to me the honor that belonged to me, and therefore you shall be banished out of the land that belonged by inheritance to you. And did he sin then? As I said before, if we judge after our own fancy, it will seem to us that Moses discharged himself well in all points, so as he offended not, nor had any spot or blemish in him. But what for that? Hereby we see that it belongs only to God to judge, and that we may be deceived at all turns, in following our own wit and reason. Wherefore let us keep this rule which is very needful: that is to know, that we be far unable to discern good and evil always by eyesight, for as is said in the sixteenth of Saint Luke, the thing that is highly esteemed among men, shall be abominable before God. When we have sifted a thing never so well, and settled all our wits to utter it well: yet shall it seem to us clean contrary to that it is indeed. Now then, let us cast down our eyes and acknowledge that none but only God is the competent judge.

True it is that we have the law, whereby we may assuredly say, this is good and that is evil: and our yielding to that which is showed us there, is not to make us judges: for we take no authority to ourselves, but only yield to that things that God sets forth. And besides this, we must not only judge our neighbors doings by the law, but also examine our own lives by it. And when we find ourselves to have swerved from God's commandments, we must willingly condemn ourselves, and allow no further of our own doings, than they agree with God's will. Although they seem good to ourselves, yet let us not stand upon that. For our eyes are so troubled and weak, that oftentimes one sin escapes us and a hundred follow out after it: and that is because we be not sharp sighted enough, to spy out the things that God perceives, and which are hid from us. And that is the cause why Saint Paul says, that although he had walked purely in his office: yet was he not justified for all that. For God requires another manner of perfection than we can see. So then, seeing we have to weak and dim a sight, let us learn to refer ourselves to God: and let every of us put that thing in use in himself, which is showed us by David when he says, Who is he that knows his faults?

Lord forgive me the evil which I perceive not. We must not only ask God forgiveness of the sins that sting us, and whereof we have proof in ourselves: but we must also acknowledge that we have main sins which we know not of. Mark that for one point.

Furthermore, proceeding still herewith, let us not be hasty in judging, to acquit one and to condemn another: but let us reserve to God that which is his, for as I have said before, if God had not pronounced that sentence upon Moses, every man would canonize him, and say he did the best that could be devised. But what for that? Seeing he is condemned by the heavenly judge, we must bridle ourselves, and not fall to encountering against God. For we shall win nothing by it. And for the same cause also S. Paul intending to exhort us to modesty in the 14 to the Romans, alleges that we must all come before the judgment seat of our Lord Jesus Christ, where we shall not allow what we think good, nor reject what we dislike in our own fancy: for that authority belongs to the only son of God. Seeing it is so my brethren (says he) we must abstain from foolish overweening. Thus much concerning that which is reported of the sin of Moses.

Now let us come again to the matter that we were in hand with: Which is, that Moses means not to excuse himself: he seeks no starting hole to lessen his fault: but the thing that he alleges is reasonable, he sets forth the heinousness of the people offence, showing that their sedition was so forcible, that even he himself also was overthrown with it. The meaning then of Moses was as if he should have said thus: Behold you wretches, god has chosen me to supply his place among you, and he has governed me in such wise by his holy spirit, that I have had as it were his image printed in me: and yet notwithstanding I have done amiss, I have offended. And what is the cause of it? I excuse not myself: but yet are you guilty before God, of corrupting me, your murmuring has overthrown me, for by reason thereof I have forgotten my duty, and not yielded God such glory as was due to him. Seeing it is so: [I may well say] it is not long of you, that you bereft me not of all the grace that I had received at God's hand: for whereas he made me your head to guide you: you have done enough to carry me to Satan through your naughtiness and rebellion.

Now then acknowledge the sin that you have committed, for God has brought me low, and it is his will to show you in my person, that you be well-worthy to perish every chine of you. Therefore besides the thing that I have touched already, (which is, that we must not like that better of ourselves when our faults are unknown [to ourselves,] or when we can cover them, for God's eyes are not blindfolded for all that, and the things that seep men are enrolled before him): we must make moreover, that if we give any man an occasion [of stumbling or offending], although he on his part is not thereby discharged, yet must our offence needs be the more grievous and heavy, according as it is in very deed. Wherefore let every man so behave himself, as he give not his neighbors any occasion of stumbling. For if any man sin under presence of me, if he be misled by my lewd conversation, if he take ill example by my vices: all the whole mischief shall be laid in my neck before God, I shall be discharged, shall be to me as faith our Lord Jesus Christ, and it were better for me that I were cast into the midst of the sea with a milestone about my neck, than to have given my neighbor any cause of misbehavior. And therefore let us live in such sort, as it may not be cast in our teeth before GOD, that we have been the cause of other men's ruin and destruction. For it will cost us very dear, if the silly souls whom God has created after his own image, and whom Jesus Christ has so dearly redeemed, be lost through our fault and wickedness. Thus we see in effect what we have to note upon this sentence, where Moses says, that GOD was angry with him by means of the people.

And furthermore we have to mark here, that God's laying of his temporal chastisements upon his faithful ones, is not to drive them to despair, but to humble them for a time: for in the end all turns to their benefit, and therefore they must not be out of heart for it. It was a very hard and bitter punishment to Moses, to be banished out of the land that had been promised him:

The time is come that the people should be delivered out of the thralldom of Egypt, to be conveyed into the Land of promise: Moses is chosen to be their guide, so as he supplies God's office in delivering them: and yet notwithstanding this shame is done to him, that God shuts the gap against him and says, you shall not come there. You see then how Moses is (as you would say) branded with a mark of reproach before God. Now had he taken it in despite: it had been enough to have plunged him into some blasphemy. But he bare this correction patiently, knowing that it should be to his benefit, because it was but temporal. And therefore let us mark this saying of Saint Paul, that God's punishing of us is to the intent we should not perish with the world. Seeing then that GOD procures our welfare thereby, and his mortifying of us for a time as in respect of the flesh: and his condemning of us in such wise as we be ashamed before men, is to the intent that our souls should be saved at the latter day, and we live in his presence: seeing that that is the end and but that he shoots at: let not us on our part be so headstrong, as to chafe or sum at his corrections, but rather follow the example of Moses, who (as we see) did make no words against God. It might seem he had some occasion to say, how falls this out, that I am driven out of the land of promise? What shall a man say to it? For you have ordained me to be as a redeemer in your stead: and now must I carry here still. It was your will that I should serve in this office, to put the people in possession of the promised land: and why shall I not be partaker of the benefit that you have purchased them by my hand? What though there have been some little distrust in me, which continued not the turning of a hand? Is the offence so heinous, that I must be so grievously punished for that? Moses then might have held such plea with God: but he holds his peace, and yields to the sentence of condemnation willingly. Therefore let us follow that which is showed us here by example: and (as I said before) when GOD is gracious to us, that instead of casting of us away (as he might justly do) he does no more but chastise us as in respect of the flesh, and shame us before men, to the end to bring us to repentance, and to humble us: let us be quiet, and let it not cast us into sorrow, but let us pluck up a good heart to follow our vocation. This is the thing we have to remember. For if he spared not Moses, what will he do to us? Ought we to challenge greater privilege than he?

But herewith all let us mark, that Moses ceased not to be an heir still of the heavenly kingdom, though he were bereft of the outward sign of it. And thereby we be warned, that if God make us not to feel his favor and love in this world so fully as we would wish, it must not make us to be out of patience. For it may happen that we shall take ourselves to be miserable, yes and that when we look upon our own state, we shall deem it had been much better for us to have gone astray with the world: But what for that? Of all that time we have a life that lies hid in God. Therefore it is no hurt at all to us, though God cut off the blessings of this present life from us. For he knows to what end he does it: and it is good for us to be so exercised. Thus you see that the thing which we have to bear in mind, is that God does divers times hide the signs of his love from us, as in respect of the world: but he loves us never a whit the less, as we see how it happened to Moses.

As touching that which is said of Joshua: it is one notable point more. For behold, he is appointed to succeed in Moses room, yes, and yet was he but his servant. And afterward Moses is commanded to encourage him. Here we see that God will take the things that are not greatly esteemed among men, yes and exalt them above our opinion, as we see he has used to do at all times: and not without cause: for thereby he intends to pull down all pride according to this saying of Saint Paul, that he chooses the weak things, yes even to the end that men should not glory in their own strength: and he chooses the foolish things, to the end that men should not glory in their wisdom: and when he takes that things that are despised, it is to the end that men should not trust in their own credit, not be puffed up with their own worthiness. And it is very requisite that it should be so: for we see how every man seeks to advance himself, and we leave nothing to God as near as we can. Not rather if we do but yield him the titles that belong to him, it is but in way of dalliance: and in the meanwhile we would that all should be in our own persons. Now for as much as men have this pride rooted in them: God must be fine to show them by experience, that all of it is but vanity: and so does he, by choosing the things that are not regarded, and by serving his turn with such as are not esteemed to be of any great renown. If we look how God chooses men sometimes, to set them in preeminence: we will say, who would have looked for this? And God works after that manner, to the intent that those by whom he serves his turn, should learn to acknowledge themselves beholden to him for their dignity wherein he has set them, and understand that they obtained it not by their own power and police, but that it is God which has placed them in that degree. For if they think they have ought of their own purchasing: God will show them the contrary. That then is the thing which we have to mark, when it is here declared that God preferred Joshua before Moses in so much that although Moses had now of long time been clad with the grace of the holy Ghost: although he had been chosen to be the Redeemer [or Ransomer] of the people: although God had set his marks upon him: although that in executing his office, it was well seen that he was a new creature, and there appeared in him a majesty surmounting the nature of man: and therewithal although he had done so many deeds worthy of memory, as might astonish all them that heard speaking of them: yet notwithstanding, in the end God ordained his servant in stead, to lead the people into the land of Canaan, and to put them in possession of their promised heritage, and Moses himself is not worthy to come there. So far off is he from coming there even as a common member shuffled in among the rest of the body: that God drives him from it: and behold, God reaches his hand to Joshua, who had never looked for it.

But now besides that which I have said, (that is to know, that we be warned to forbear all presumption, and to lay down all pride): let us be well assured, that it belongs to God to advance us and to make us of estimation, through his mere grace: and that when we shall have heaped up all that ever we can together, all is nothing. Then besides that we have a good warning to humble ourselves: it is showed us therewithal, that we must not envy those by whom God serves his turn. And that is another good lesson. For we see how every of us repines, when God has advanced any man, especially beyond all worldly hope. Whereas we should consider thus, behold God serves his turn by such a one, every man commends him, and there appear manifest gifts of grace in him: when we see those things, we be so malicious, that we grudge and repine at it. But contrariwise we ought to mark, that when we be so pricked with spite and envy, it is an advancing of ourselves against God and not against mortal creatures. Therefore let us learn to honor God where so ever he shows himself, and to be glad when he vouchsafes to extend his grace to our neighbors: for if we do so, all shall fall out to our welfare. If another man have more gracious gifts than I am rich in his person. For when we confess that communion of saints: it is to show, that what so ever God gives to one man or to another, the same redounds to the benefit of all. True it is that we perceive it not at the first push: but yet does such diversity serve for the whole body of the Church. The member of a body have not all one operation: the eyes execute not the office of the legs, not the hand the office of the feet: and yet notwithstanding the body is so knit together in one, that what so ever is given to any one member, does benefit all the rest. Now then let us understand, that when God bestows the gifts of his holy spirit more largely upon some one man than upon others, he ceases not therefore to have pity upon us: for we also must be edified thereby. Yes surely, so we be not unthankful, and that we take no pitch at it when he lifts to hold us low and to exalt our neighbors. To be short, we make war against God when we cannot abide that he should keep the order which he has determined: that is to know, to pull down that things that are great to the world's ward, and to advance and exalt the things that are base and despised. Moreover we see that Moses is commanded to strengthen Joshua.

So little ought Moses to be grieved at the preferring of his servant before himself, that he must instruct him and hearten him. As if he should say, I see now it is God's will to honor you by dishonoring me. I am worthy of it, and I must be fine to bear it, and therewithal also to prepare you to thin office. Although you take my place: yet will I not set myself against you, but (which more is) I will help you to the uttermost of my power. Now am I become your servant. Whereas God had advanced me: I must now give up this preeminence, and you must take my room: and I must endeavor as much as I can, that the benefit which God's will is to bestow upon you, may avail in you. So then, if it please God to take any man to serve him, let us strain ourselves to help him, and let us not be ashamed to put our shoulders under him to heave him up. Let us not have any of these wicked respects, to say, oh, truly as for me, if God were so gracious to me as to advance me as well as such a one, I would bestir me. But for as much as he holds me down to the ground, I will not middle with other men. Let us beware of such churlishness. Nor rather when we see that God has chosen a man: [let us reason thus with ourselves] I see that God has chosen such a man, indeed he is not the ablest that could be devised, but yet is it God's will to be served by him, and we see he has a goodwill: therefore let us help him, let every of us reach him his hand, and let every of us consider wherein he may succor him to his furtherance. You see then that the thing which we have to mark here, is that although our working bear no great outward show, and that the things which we do have no great gloss to commend them to the world: yet we must not therefore cease to serve God according to our power, and to link in with those by whom it is God's will to be served, and not to imagine anything that may for slow us, or make us say, At whose hand shall I be recompensed? That which I have done is as good as lost, men make none account of it. It shall well enough come in account before God. And therefore let us suffice us to be allowed at his hand. These are the things that we have to note upon this, that Moses was commanded to strengthen Joshua.

Now finally it is said, that the people perceiving their sin, answered: We have offended the Lord, and therefore we be now ready to go up. And they not only used those words: but also every man prepared and armed himself, and so they went up to encounter with their enemies. Here we see the nature of men. When GOD bids them be still, they be too forward, and they be as hot as fire to do the thing that is forbidden them. But when they were bidden go, then their legs were broken. And yet notwithstanding it is said, that the people acknowledged their sin, when they had been so disobedient against GOD. Whereby it appears that there is such a corruptness in our nature, that even in minding to do good we do evil, and offend God, and overshoot ourselves without reason on measure. Here is then a fair looking glass for us to discern our own vices by: yes verily, so we consider in the person of that Jews, that not only they themselves are condemned, but also that God purposes to give a general lesson, whereby all men may fare the better. Now I told you first of all, that when God founds his trumpet and commands us to march, we stir not a whit: and that although we have some good liking of the matter, yet we be cold Interviewee: slow, as is pity to see. And on the contrary part, that if he say, Tarry still, we be lusty, and moreover so hot and hasty, that we desire nothing but to occupy both our arms and our legs too. When it was said to the people, Go, for your God is among you, be not afraid so long as you have such a power to defend you: The people relied again on the other side, not marry, how shall we go up? They be Giants, they will devour us with their looks, we shall be undone at the first chop, it were better yet to return to Egypt. When the people had replied so, and it was told them again, What mean you thus to distrust your God? He has given us this land, we have his promise of it: and besides that, you have had proof of his help already many ways, and he offers it you still: how think you of it, you faithless and rebellious people? When the people were thus laid at: did they yet return to their right wits? Yes, for you see they repented. What for that? It is but a false repentance. Go to (say they) since it is so, we will go and march against our enemies, seeing it is God's pleasure. Nor, you see here, that God meant to try their faith and obedience another way, that is to wit, by their forbearing to do anything at all. Because he saw they had not obeyed him at the first: now he will have them ashamed of it, and to tarry his leisure till he have pity on them.

And for as much as he had sworn that they should not come there: his will was that they should (after the example of Moses) have suffered themselves to be bereft of that honor as they were worthy. We see then that men have but too great forwardness when GOD commands them to sit at rest: and contrariwise that they be but too cold, when he would have them to go forward: nor they will rather creep into crannies, than go forth when God bids them.

Albeit, for the better understanding of this matter, let us mark that this people offended in preacing forward without promise. For as I have said before, we must not be hardy any further than God bids us. Therefore when we have but a word of his mouth, we must take courage, and put all lets under one foot that may turn us away. For the thing wherein GOD will be glorified, is that he command us nothing in vain. And especially when he promises us good success to our matters, and to prosper our doings: then must we rest thereupon, assuring ourselves that he will give us good dispatch. Nevertheless when God had sworn, that the people should not come there: then would they needs go up against their enemies, not considering that in so doing they resisted GOD, and advanced themselves against him. True it is that if a man had asked them, whether they minded to resist God or no, and to do clean contrary to his will, or whether they minded to have him to be their adversary: they would have answered, No: We believe that God will help us. For why? He has delivered us out of Egypt, he has promised our father Abraham to give this land in possession to his lineage, and the time is now come. Yes but there is no promise [to you,] and therefore it is but fond presumption or rather stark madness, when men take a toy in their heads, and adventure to do this or that, when in the meanwhile God has not promised any such thing. So then let us mark well, that we must not be bold upon our own head, but hearken till God speak: and when we have his promise, we must rule ourselves thereby, and not pass the bounds thereof. For else it may happen to us, as Moses reports here that it happened to this people: that is to know that we shall do all things adverse, and so offend God. In so much that when we wean to do well, we shall double our faults: when GOD commands us to go, we shall be as though our legs were broken: and when he commands us to tarry, we shall run too swift: and so, all our whole life shall be out of order.

Furthermore let us bear in mind, that (as I have said already) if GOD list to chastise us as in respect to the flesh, we must not be too much grieved there at: for it is for our benefit and welfare. If this people had been well advised, they would have thought thus: because we have offended God by our disobedience, he will not have us to enter into the land: but yet for all that he bereaves us not of the hope of salvation, let us content ourselves with that, and wander forth in this world till he take us hence. So likewise let us learn to wander on, if we mind to come to the heavenly life. And if God do now and then cast us down, let us consider that the casting down, will make us to go much more swift towards the mark of the heavenly kingdom that is set before us, than if we had ran never so fast, and had never left galloping all the way. Thus you see what we had to mark more, upon this saying, that the people would needs go up to discomfit their enemies.

Now Moses adds, that They made themselves ready with their armor and weapons. Yes for sooth, but it is all one as if you should put an armor upon a scarecrows back, and take him a sword in his fist: surely he were substantially well armed: but indeed all were to no purpose. Even so is it with us: if we were furnished with all the helps of man and with all inferior means, and in the meanwhile were not strengthened in our hearts, but were full of foolish self weaning, and as it were drunkenness, by presuming upon our own power: all the bravery that we can make, is but wind and smoke, because we have not an eye to God, but are rebellious against him. Wherefore let us learn to leave the arming of ourselves, and to seek strength and courage at God's hand, and then let us take armor and weapon as at his appointment. If we go that way to work, God will prosper the helps that he has given us: for he will bless that, because we sought them at his hand. Besides this, he himself will stand by us though all other means fail us. For divers times he will perchance suffer us to be made naked, and let that world mock us, as though we were undone beforehand: but yet will he provide well enough for all, at leastwise so that before all things we be furnished with his inward virtue. This is the thing that we had to mark, yet further upon this text.

And here Moses shows that God meant not to destroy the people, when he commanded them to turn back. Turn you back again says he. Here we see God's wonderful goodness, and that the threat which he spoke off yesterday, was not to the end that God would pursue the iniquity of the people without having any pity upon them: but to make them feel their own evil. For notwithstanding all that, yet does he use compassion and kindness towards them in forbidding them to encounter with their enemies. For although that at the first sight a man would say that God rejected them, and cursed them: yet notwithstanding, in so doing he shows them a sign of his mercy. For had he said never a word, what a thing had that been? Indeed the people increased their offence yet more, by being disobedient to the warning that he gave them. But what so ever they did, we must consider what God intended when he said, Go not up: for I will not be with you, neither will I help you. We see that when the people had once been brought low, they perceived and acknowledged a wonderful goodness in God, and therewithal became that better disposed to profit themselves by the correction that was sent them. Let us mark well therefore, that when our Lord utters any token of his grace and goodness towards us: therein he shows more apparently how much he loves us, than if he made no countenance of anything, but held his mouth shut, and suffered us to do what we listed. Why? For alas, we should but throw ourselves headlong into destruction, if we followed every man his own fancy. Seeing it is so then, when so ever God sets himself against us, when so ever he rebukes us, and when so ever he shows us our folly, yes though it be with such roughness as it amazes us: yet is it to our benefit, and therefore let us learn to bear his yoke.

Moreover let this be our rule to discern good and evil by: namely to depend wholly upon God's mouth, and not to be wise in our own conceits, but to suffer him to be our guide not to fall to gamboling at our won pleasure and fancy, but to follow the way quietly which he shows us. And then will he give us arms and legs, and guide all our steps in such sort, as he will make us to go still forward, and cause us to arrive at the good heaven. But on the contrary part, if we will needs be fantastical, and do things upon our won head and upon our won liking, and there upon fall also to foolish practices: God must needs be against us: And then albeit that all things go well forward with us to our seeming, and fall out according to our mind: yet will God turn all upside down, and overthrow us when we be at the highest. Those are the things which we have to note. And therefore let us set all our whole minds to obey God: And for the bringing thereof to pass, let us beseech him to give us the true understanding of his word, and to keep us from being forward and stubborn against him, as we see by the example that is showed us here, which I pray God we may eschew.

And now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him so to touch us with them, as we may profit more and more in faith and repentance, even until he have utterly changed us: and not suffer us to stand against his holy commandments, nor to double our misdoings when we have offended him: but to reform us in such sort, that being rid of all fleshy glory, we may seek nothing but to be mortified by him, to the end that he may so frame us to his righteousness, as our whole endeavor may be to rule all our thoughts words and deeds thereby. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also, etcetera.

The tenth Sermon upon the first Chapter

42 And the Lord, etcetera.

43 I told you of it: but you would not hear me, but rebelled against the commandment of the Lord, and were presumptuous, and went up into the hill.

44 Then the Amorites which dwelt in that hill, came out against you and chased you, as bees do, and smote you in Seir even to Horma.

45 And when you were come back again, you wept before the Lord: but the Lord heard not your voice, nor inclined his ears to you.

46 So you abode a long time at Kadesh Barnea, as the days do show which you have tarried there.

E saw yesterday how it is not lawful for us to put forth ourselves, except GOD call us and show us the way: and that although the thing which we take in hand, be never so allowable in respect of men, yet is it nothing worth unless God be our guide, and that we be sure that we adventure upon nothing but by his will. Therewithal we saw also that we have too ticklish a nature, in so much that when anything is to be done [that likes ourselves,] we be but too forward, and we cannot tarry till GOD show us his will. And that on the contrary part, we see what unjustness is in us when God commands us anything: for then we be so lazy as is pity to see, it seems that our legs are broken: and to be short, we be stark lame. Nor (which worse is) when we wean to do well, we mar all by our rashness. And this is confirmed yet better by that which Moses adds. For he rehearses what GOD had enjoyed him. You shall say to them, Go not up, nor fight not, for I am not with you (says the Lord,) and therefore shall be overcome. In this sentence we see how it belongs to God to say, Go: and likewise to bid us tarry, when he thinks good. And if we have not that voice to guide us: we may well seek all manner of furniture, and we may be well enough armed to the fight of the world: but yet shall there be nothing but confusion in our case. Then like as we must simply obey the thing that GOD commands, and hast forward with all speed when we see it is his pleasure that we should go: so on the contrary part, when he will have us to fit still, let his forbidding suffice us, assuring ourselves that he will turn all things upside down, if we think to further that matter by thrusting ourselves forward. To be short, we must yield God no less honor and reverence, in forbearing to do things when he forbids them: than in doing and executing the things that he likes.

And he shows expressly, that it shall not boot us to do anything unless God command it, according as it has been declared heretofore how it belongs to him to fight. True it is that he will have the faithful to enforce themselves, but yet in so doing we must attribute all to him. Therefore if he be on our side we shall be sure of the victory: but if he shrink from us, we shall have the foil though all the word helped us. Then it there but this one only respect that may give us courage. Which is, that God be at hand with us to succor us, so as we be sure of his assistance, and rest wholly thereupon. Nevertheless it is not for men to bear themselves in hand that God will aid them, further than he has assured us by his promise. But it is certain that God makes no promise to any, but to such as walk in obedience. Whomsoever then flings over the fields, that is to say, whomsoever gads here and there, and rests not simply upon God's word, does utterly refuse the benefit that God had promised him, and bereaves himself thereof willfully. For the receiving of God's word to the end we may know what to do, and be ruled by his mouth: and to trust in him, so as we be grounded upon his grace, and resort to him for succor at our need, are things inseparable. He therefore that will needs dally upon his own head, and trust to his own foolish imaginations without submitting himself to God: may well say, I hope God will help me: but his hope has not resemblance to the hope of that faithful. So then, seeing we perceive what our own imaginations are: let us look what things God gives us leave to do, and what is lawful for us to do by his word. And therewithal, let us be forward in doing that which he bids us, waiting for his blessing whereby he will make all to prosper. For although we see the contrary to our understanding: yet shall we overcome all impediments by his help.

But how so ever the case stand, let us bear this lesson in mind, that God, if we desire to be his, does bind us by his infinity goodness to be guided by him: and that as we would be shielded by his mighty power, so likewise we must quickly suffer him to rule us as his lambs and sheep, and not follow every man his own fancy. And if this ought to be observed in the things that concern this present life: how much more ought it to be so in going to the kingdom of heaven? I say that even in all our worldly affairs, we ought to do God so much honor, as not to take too much upon us, nor to range here and there, without having first asked counsel at his mouth, (as he says by his Prophet Esay,) and until he have ordered all our devils by his holy spirit. When we have any business to do, although it be not of any great importance: yet ought we to call upon God with all loveliness, and not to do anything till our conscience be thoroughly settled and resolved that he allows our doings. Now if God look to be obeyed in small things, and which are as good as nothing: what will he do when the matter concerns his service? And when that case concerns so excellent a thing as is the salvation of our souls? Therefore we see herein, how for the wretched world is blinded, seeing they give themselves to their own follies and to men's traditions, and think not at all upon the things that God has ordained: No: that shall be the last thing that they will do. And therefore it stands us to much the more on hand to study well this lesson of Moses, That God will not be with us, except we come near to him, and be diligent to hearken what he will say to us, and follow it when we have done, without adding anything to it, or diminishing anything from it. And thus you see in effect, what we have to gather upon this strain.

Now wherewithal Moses threatens them, That they shall be overcome of their enemies, and fall before them. Whereby we be done to understand, that if God be once gone away from us, we must needs perish, yes and our enemies must needs have the upper hand of us, according as we see in another place, that God leads us [into adversity,] and holds us as it were fettered in it. And when our foes have such power over us, it is because we be God's prisoners. Turn it is that men advance themselves enough in their presumption, but yet for all that, God daunts their courage when it comes to the pinch, and holds their hands fast tied, so as they cannot stir one finger. Let us mark well therefore, that we must needs fall before our enemies, if we be not upheld by God's hand. For there lies all our strength. Not moreover, though no man follow us, yet must we fall before our own shadows, and be overcome without any man pursuing of us. For God's wrath of itself without any other help or mean, is able enough to confound us. Nevertheless the devil ceases not to practice to destroy us, and we be assailed on all sides: therefore what would become of us, if God were not our wall and bulwark? Then if we consider well the state of our life, there is none other way for us, but to walk in fear and to be watchful, that we happen not to play the loose colts. As I said even now, you see that the devil ceases not, and he has innumerable wails to oppress us with all: we know what force he is of, and he is not without cause termed the Prince of the world. He comes with so great cruelty, as passes all the force of our fleshy enemies. On the other side, this world is full of Ambushes against us. To be short, when we have bethought us never so well of the enemies whom we see: there are an infinite multitude of enemies [whom we see not,] which seek nothing but to overthwart us when we should do good. Therefore let us fit still in humility, to the end that being shrouded under the shadow of God, we may be upheld and maintained by him. Let us look well to it then, that we follow not what every of us thinks good in himself: but submit ourselves to God's goodwill, as I have showed before.

Now it follows, That Moses spoke to the people, and that the people would not follow his advice but were disobedient to the mouth of God. This manner of speech has been expounded already heretofore. But here we see yet more clearly, the proof of that which has been said before: that is to know, that God is despised not only when he speaks from heaven, but also when folk make none account of his word that is preached by men. It is said expressly That the people were disobedient to the mouth of God. And how? It is not said that God appeared in visible shape, or that there was any voice heard from heaven: but it was Moses that speak: it is a man that says the people resisted the mouth of God. Now then we see that God will have his word receive with like humility when he sends men to declare his commandment, as if he himself were among them. The doctrine that is set forth in that name of God, ought to be of as much authority [in the mouth of a man,] as if all the Angels of heaven came down to us, or as if God showed his Majesty presently before our eyes: yes and it is the thing where in he will try the obedience of our faith. True it is that we ought to use good discretion when men speak. For if we should receive all that is put to us: there should be no difference between the liars and false prophets that seduce our souls, and the true ministers of God. But if we have sure warrant that the thing which is brought us, proceeds of God: (as if it should be showed us by the holy scripture, that men should not invent anything of their own heads, but hold themselves to the pure simplicity of that Law and the Gospel:) it is certain that whomsoever makes any resistance in that case, does not make war against a creature, but manifestly withstand God, who will be heard when he speaks so by men, and serves his turn by them as by his instruments. Therefore let us bear well in mind this order of Moses saying, which is, that he himself is the speaker, and yet notwithstanding. That the people in disobeying him disobeyed God. For why? Moses had not forged anything of his own brain, but showed to them how it was God that had sent him. And therefore it is no strange case that God should find himself grieved, and that his Majesty should be offended, and take that outrage to be done as to himself, when the message that he had sent by Moses was not received. In likewise is it at this day. And for the same cause does our Lord Jesus Christ avow, that if men refuse to hear the Ministers of the Gospel, he will take that wrong to be done to himself. Therefore let not men make a jest of it, when GOD causes his word to be preached nowadays, and stirs up men to publish it abroad: if any man think to escape by saying, they be but men with whom we have to do, and therewithal despite the doctrine: they shall know in the end, that it came from heaven, and that they set themselves against God and not against mortal creatures: for he will have his Majesty to be known there. Then if men take him for their sovereign Lord, let them stoop to him, and do him homage in his doctrine. For he has Printed his mark in such wise there, that if any man encounter the things that are contained in it, it is all one as if he would put his truth under foot, wherein he has showed himself openly as in his lively image. Look that we bear that point well in mind. For if earthly Princes revenge the despite that is done to their cot armors, and think themselves to be misused therein: I pray you is it not much more rightful reason that God should do so, when men make no reckoning of his word? [Yes verily.] For this case concerns not some painted picture or blazing of arms: but it is the image of God which appeared to us in substance, yes even with such powers as we ought to be transfigured into it, as says Saint Paul. That is the thing which we have to mark.

And therefore let such as have the office of preaching God's word look well to themselves that they go soberly to work, and that they may always be able to protest, that the things which they teach are put into their mouths by God. When they be once sure that it is so: let them labor to make all their hearts to feel God's power which is after a sort enclosed in his word, that it may be received as it deserves, and every man submit himself to it, and God by that means be worshipped of all men, and served with one accord. And therewithal let them denial rebel and despisers. When they see that heathenish sort fall to scoffing at the doctrine which they bear abroad: let them assure themselves that the things which they have uttered, shall suffice to send all these to the bottom of Hell, which do so set themselves against them, according to this saying of Saint Paul, that the Preachers of God's word are armed with such a sword, as is able to confound all such as will not obey the doctrine. And therewithal likewise let every man have an eye to himself, and when he comes hither to be taught in the name of God, let him be prepared with such loveliness and modesty, as he may perceive that it is God which speaks, and be moved to bow down his neck, to receive his yoke patiently. And as for those that will needs play the wild beasts: let them understand that here is sentence given upon them, so as they may well plead against it, but they shall with nothing by their shifts, because it is said that all such as obeyed not Moses, were disobedient to God's own mouth.

And now Moses adds expressly, That the people were presumptuous, in that they would not be at rest. And this imports very much. For it does us to understand, that there was never yet an unbelief or stubbornness in men, but it was matched with loftiness, and pride, which puffed them up in such wise, and made them so far out of patience with themselves, as they fell to checking against GOD, and to give themselves to all evil. And that is the cause why unbelief is so be hated before God. Sometimes it will seem to us to be over great rigor, when GOD punishes them so sore which cannot [find in their hearts to] hearken to his word. For we excuse them by ignorance, for as much as they were not well assured that it was God that spoke: and in the meantime we look not to the evil that lurks in covert, which God perceives and judges: that is to with, that men are inwardly as full of poison as toads, and that they be stuffed with pride, which makes that to mouth up in such wise, as in effect they refuse to obey God, for as much as they vouchsafe not to yield all superiority to him. That is the cause why pride or presumption, is matched in this place with unbelief. And it is that same thing which I have declare before, namely that the true hardness must be grounded in God, so as men must not attempt anything upon opinion of their own power, nor persuade themselves that they have this or that: but only stand to that which God promises us. If it be not so with us: then will our hardness be turned into presumptuousness. And in this respect ought we to condemn men's rashness when they advance themselves too much: and to commend their invincible constancy, then they submit themselves out of band to God's word, so that having once his promise, they rest upon it as upon a rock despising all stumbling blocks, and keep on their pace still, notwithstanding any trouble or storm that can be stirred up against them, or any threatening or menacing of them. It will be said divers times, that God's servants are willful: because they will not swerve for anything, nor for all that worldly reasons that can be alleged. This and that shall be brought in, and we know that nothing is easier than to strike fail at every blast of wind as they say. But we see that such as purpose to serve God, do shut their eyes against all dangers, in so much that although all should go to havoc, yet will they not cease to do the thing that is commanded that. Lo here a willfulness: yes verily, according to the opinion of the flesh: but yet in very deed it is the true hardness. Why so? Because it has the good foundation. Heaven and earth are of great weight: and yet is all that huge building grounded upon the only word of God. In what good plight then shall a particular thing be, when it is founded upon the same? Thus you see what we have to gather upon this text, that the people was presumptuous in that they yielded not to God, when he commanded them to fit still.

Now, to the end we may know, that when God has once spoken, they be no threatening to scar babes with all as they say: he adds for a conclusion, You went up, and behold, the Amorites that dwells on the hill came out before you, and chased you as wasps or Bees do, insomuch that they smote you in mount Seir even to Horma. Hereby Moses shows that the people were taught after the manner of fools, that is to say, by their own home. And good reason it is that when we will not believe God's single word, we should pay very dear for our experience, and be made to know in spite of our teeth, that he will be steadfast in his purpose, and bring the thing to pass that he has spoken. And hereby we be warned not to provoke God's wrath, nor to tempt him. So soon then as he speaks, let us stand in awe: for it is a part of faith as is showed by the example of Noah in the eleventh chapter to the Hebrews. It is said there, that Noah beheld the flood at such time as men made great cheer in the world. How so? For God had told him that the world should perish, and he contented himself therewith. And therefore let us not tarry till God arm himself and utter his power against us: but as soon as he has spoken, let us be afraid, that we may prevent his wrath: and then shall we be taught as we ought to be, to our welfare. But if we be hardhearted, and think that all that ever is said is but a mockery: we shall find to our confusion, that God has an effectual word, and that his hand and his tongue go together, so as all that ever comes from him shall be found to be certain and infallible.

Also we have to mark this similitude that Moses sets down here: namely that the Amorites came out like Bees. For we know that when Bees are angry, they sting men: and they regard not whether men be too strong for them, but they fly upon them with such choler and fury, as they cannot but be astonished. They seek to sting their eyes: so as there is not the hardest of them, but he is put to his shifts, and is faine to run away from those little pretty fowls. Moses then has used this similitude, to show that the enemies had Lion's hearts because God had encouraged them. For it belongs to him only to strengthen men. When it pleases him to defend us, though our enemies were as mad as might be, yet should they shrink away and be dismayed at a thing of nothing. But else, if there were but little children against us, GOD would so strengthen them, as we should not know where to become, but be discomfited before them. Therefore let us not have an eye to the strength of men, nor to their furniture. For our Lord will stir up folk against us, that could do nothing before, and in whom there was no likelihood at all: and we shall be so cumbered to withstand them, that to our seeming, all the world is against us: and moreover we shall be so dismayed, and GOD shall so bereave us of all sense and reason, that even a visor shall be enough to scare us out of our wits. Thus you see what we have to consider in this similitude which Moses has set down here in the text.

Finally he says that the people being to discomfited, fell to weeping, but God heard not their cry, and so they tarried in Kadesh Barnea according to the time that they abode there. Some supply it here with these words, according to the time that you abode in other places, and they say that they abode there nineteen years. But that cannot be proved by the holy scripture, and the makers of that gloss were the Jews, who have turned all the holy scripture top, with their dreams and dotages. The meaning of Moses is far otherwise. For his intent is to put the people in mind of their long abiding at Kadesh Barnea, because God held them there as it were at a bay: and to make them call to remembrance and consider the better that his pulling down of their pride after that manner, and his causing of them to feel that they ought not to range abroad at random when God shuts the gate against that by forbidding them, was a just punishment from heaven. Moses then intends here to establish the people the better in that knowledge which they ought to have had long ago concerning God's justice, to the end that the same may humble them, and touch them the better with repentance. That is the plain meaning of the text.

Now we see here first of all, that men recoil a hundred paces back, when they wean to go forward but one, at leastwise beyond the will of God. This people was near their enemies, they did but put themselves in a readiness, and as soon as they were armed, they gave charge upon them. They needed not to retry for the matter, that is to say, they needed not to remove: for we see how they be chased, and not only beaten down there in the same place: but that God also dries them before the wind, as chaff or dust is driven. You see then here is a fair looking glass to show us that when men presume to make themselves redoubted, they do no sooner set one foot forward, but God plucks them an hundred leagues back, and that to their great confusion. What is to be done then? Obedience must always be as a cresset to us to show us the way, so as we may first and foremost know what God has appointed, and thereupon take courage to go, when we be sure that he guides our footsteps. For thereupon we may boldly conclude, that the end thereof shall be good, and that there shall follow nothing of fit but prosperity. But contrariwise, if we will needs be leaping out, when God will have us fit still at home: it will cost us very dear. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this text of Moses, where he says expressly that the people were chased even to Horma, and that they came to Kadesh.

As touching the weeping that is spoken of here, it should seem that there was some repentance in them before, and that now the same was doubled: and yet notwithstanding it is said that it was but lost time, and that the people's weeping booted them not at all. This at the first blush might seem contrary to other texts of the holy scripture. For it is said that as soon as sinners acknowledge their faults and do but sigh for them, God receives them to mercy, yes and even prevents them. It is said that he tarries not till we cry, but that he prevents our crying: or at leastwise that when so ever we pray, he is ready to hear us. But here it seems that the people repented, and yet that God lets them alone, so as they languish still without faring any whit the better for their repentance. As touching the thing that we have seen, it was set down to show us that the people had a false repentance, as men commonly have, soothing themselves through hypocrite, and bearing themselves on hand that they be well sorry for their sins, when there is still some back nook behind, so as they consider not the mischief, so deeply as it were meet to be searched. True it is, that God will not suffer us to be plunged in [sorrow for] our sins, so we bethink us of them earnestly: but all our seeking is to cover them, and to forget them quite by our goodwill. Now then, we have so much the more need to pray God to work so in us, as we may not be double hearted to flatter ourselves. And for the same cause the holy scripture tells us, that he which knows not how hard it is to come to repentance, deceives himself.

The Papists imagine, that they can help themselves and further themselves to repentance by their own freewill. Lo what their overweening is. But let us understand that it is a singular working of the holy ghost, when it pleases him to lead us to repentance. For what else is it than a renewing of the man? Is it in any man's power to create himself? No: but God fashions us new again, and therefore that praise is to be given to him. Again, our wits are utterly dulled or rather stark blind. God must be fine to enlighten them. And is that in our power? Whereas there is nothing but corruption in our hearts: whereas there is nothing but secret rebelliousness and malice: God must be fine to rid and clean away every whit of it.

And therefore let us mark well that there was no repentance in this people, although they were touched before. It might well be a sign that God had compassion of them: but true repentance requires not only an acknowledgement of our faults, but also that we should be sorry for them, and that upon the feeling of our own evil, we should go to GOD, referring ourselves wholly to him, and seeking nothing but to be governed thenceforth by him, for as much as we have nothing but forwardness in ourselves. But the people were not yet come to this point: and so we see they were not rip to repentance. And as touching their weeping, true it is that they had some feeling and understanding: but that was not enough yet.

Furthermore let us mark well, that God's refusing to hear the cry of the children of Israel, was not to shake them off utterly. And there is not a text better worthy to be noted than this. For it imports great instruction for all our whole life. I say then that God hearkened not to the people's weaning, and yet notwithstanding that he did not utterly shake them off, nor was altogether deaf to their request. And how may that be? For sometimes God hears us not to outward appearance, and yet how so ever the case stand our prayers are not unavailable, but do us good.

As for example: When a man has played the unthrift, GOD plucks him back, (there are examples know to be seen thereof commonly:) and when another has been given to gluttony and excess: another has been a monger or drunkard, and another has been a blasphemy: very well, God seeing men become such beasts, subdues them by force, he sends them afflictions which last not for a day or a month only, but linger upon them a longtime: whereupon the one sort take the bridle in their teeth, and chaw upon it with fretting and chasing against God, continue still sturdy and stubborn in their sins: the other sort ground that they have offended, and are sorry for it before God, beseeching him to vouchsafe to moderate his rigor, and to assuage the pains which they endure. And yet in the meanwhile their misery abates not, but they continue at the same stay that they were at before. It should seem then that their prayers are lost, and that God gave deaf ear to them. Now although such folk pray heartily: yet let us mark that God's hearing of them is not to outward appearance. And why? Because he knows that it is good for them to be so under his rod still. Even so was it with this people: it was to their benefit for them to be put in mind of their lewd dealings every minute of an hour. But yet for all that, he fails not to have compassion of them: for he gives them patience, and afterward makes their afflictions to do them good: insomuch that although they were irksome to them, yet did they stand them instead of medicines. You see then that God does sometimes hear us, and yet notwithstanding it appears not so to any man's thinking, yes and even we ourselves may suppose that we have lost our time. True it is that God will surely reject the yelling of the wicked when they cry out to him, and that he will laugh at their weeping: and it is not to be marveled at. And yet in so doing he fails not to accomplish his promise, which is, that he will hear all them that cry to him. And why? For this promise belongs to none but such as cry to God rightly, and come not to him with windlasses and fining, according to this express saying of the psalm, that God is near to all such as call upon him, yes, as call upon him in truth. Then if we will be heard at God's hand, we must first and foremost have our affections cleansed. And therefore his rejecting of the hypocrites when they cry to him, is no counterworking against his promise: For they be unclean. Indeed they haul, and they will not stick to say, alas my God, they will make lamentation enough: but for as much as they seek not God of a desire to come to him, but instead of coming to him, would recoil back from him if it were possible: their crying out, my God, is as though they were upon the rack. Now then, this hauling of there is brutish, and has no affinity with faith to do them good withal. But the thing that I told you of even now, has another manner of thing in it: that is to know, that [divers times] God will not hear us to deliver us from the bodily punishments that he sends us: and yet in the meanwhile he ceased not to be merciful and well minded towards us. And therefore let us bear in mind, that when our Lord sends us any diseases, so as one is struck with poverty, another is smitten after another fashion, and every man has his grief: if we pray to him, and the misery is as though it were tried to our shoulders, and he makes no countenance to hear us: it is not to be said therefore that God lets us alone therein, to drive us to despair. But if we bear the adversity patiently which he sends, let us look to be delivered of it in the end: and in the meanwhile let it suffice us to be comforted by his holy spirit, and let us hope that he will not suffer us to be tempted above that which we be able to bear. Thus you see how God heard not the people's cry, and yet that they which have sought him with a true and right meaning heart, have not lost their labor. God showed not by outward deed, that he heard them, and yet in the meanwhile he made their bodily punishment to serve to the welfare of their souls: insomuch that albeit they lingered there by the space of forty years: yet were they not disinherited of that kingdom of heaven. Whereas they were disappointed of the land that was promised them: therein they felt God's wrath: but yet did they overcome that temptation through says: I mean them that came again into the right way, and grew not hard hearted as the most part did, which did nothing else but chase upon the bit, as we have seen before. And herein we see, that if we have true repentance of our sins, we shall find that God is not unmindful of our requests, though he hear us not so soon as we would: and that yet notwithstanding our repentance must keep us still under, so as although that (to our seeming) the gate to God's goodness is shut against us, and he will not admit us in: yet nevertheless, our prayers shall not be in vain. For God will show in the end, that he was not deaf to our requests, but that he heard them to give us such assuagement of our afflictions, as he knew to be meet and expedient for our welfare.

And finally let us mark well that if God have punished us, yes and that the affliction has endured a long timely remembrance thereof must be well printed in our minds, that we become not like those which forget God's chastisements within a day or twice. And that is the cause why Moses says to the people, According to the days which you have tarried there. As if he should say, you ought to bear it well in remembrance. For it seemed to you that you should never have come soon enough into the land of blessing: but God made you to retry from it, and it ought to have been yet longer time you had come there. Think upon it, and consider how it was God's hand that held you there as it were shut up in close prison. Now then, although God have delivered you from it: yet must you bear it in mind still, according as we see how king Ezekias speaks thereof in his song, saying that he will bethink him of the years past with heaviness and grief of heart, and call to mind that chastisements that he had received at God's hand, thereby to hold himself in awe that he fall not back again into the same faults for which he had been punished. Thus you see how we ought to think upon the corrections that God shall have sent us, that we may profit ourselves by them. And therefore let us not resemble this people that are spoken of here: but when so ever we be chastised at God's hand, let our sorrowing be in such sort, as we may have wherewith to comfort ourselves in his grace. And therewithal let us hold ourselves thenceforth in his obedience, never to provoke him as we had done before.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to touch us with them more and more, in such wise as we may not only ask him forgiveness for our transgressing of his commandments so many ways. But also desire to be reformed by his holy spirit, that by his power we may fight against all our own lusts, and against all the temptations of the world, and quietly go through with our calling, until such time as being delivered from all fighting, we be received into the heavenly rest that is promised us. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, etcetera.

On Thursday, the 24th of April 1555

The eleventh Sermon which is the first upon the second Chapter

1 Then turned we and drew to the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea, as the Lord has said to me: and we compassed about mount Seir many a day.

2 And the Lord spoke to me, saying:

3 You have gone long enough about this mountain: turn you towards the North.

4 And warn you the people, saying: you shall shortly pass through the borders of your brethren the children of Esay which dwell in Seir, and they shall be afraid of you: but take your good heed to yourselves.

5 That you provoke them not: for I will not give you so much as one foot of their land.

6 You shall buy vittles of them for money, and eat: and likewise you shall buy water of them for money, and drink.

7 For the Lord you God has blessed you in all the works of your hands. He knew that you should journey through this great wilderness. The Lord you God has been with you now these forty years, and you has wanted nothing.

re we see more fully the proof of the matter that I treated of yesterday: that God in chastising men, does teach them to obey him, and by that means holds them in awe by force, because they would not submit themselves to him willingly: And secondly that he tries their obedience, by reining them back, whereas we of our own nature are desirous to preach forward, and to purchase ourselves estimation. Moses then says, that the people turned back after they had been so beaten by their enemies: For before they could not be tamed by no means. God had commanded them what they should do: but we saw they rebelled for all that. When he said, be you still: they were in a heat and would needs be running upon their enemies: And when he said, go not: they would needs run faster than before. But were they once taught to their cost, and had God once performed his threatening, by making them to be overthrown by their enemies: then were they pliable enough: But it was all too late, as we commonly say in the proverb, a fool is never wise still he be well beaten. Now hereby we be taught how greatly it is for our behoove to be so dealt with. For except God bring us home to him by correction: it would be impossible for us to be such as we ought to be, so as we would hearken to his voice and follow him whithersoever he commands us. Therefore we must be fine to be prepared with stripes of the rod.

Furthermore, let us learn well the thing that has been declared heretofore, according also as Moses shows it to the eye: that is to know, that God will suffer us to languish: and that although he be merciful to us, and have forgiven the sins that we have committed: yet must we be fine to suffer for a time. We shall sigh to him, and yet will he let us alone in our miserable state and plight: but in the end, all shall fall out to our benefit. For had God set open the gap to the children of Israel, and given them entrance into the promised land: within a day or two they would have forgotten that horrible crime of their in murmuring against him, yes (and as much as in this lay) even in forsaking their heritage: they would never have thought upon their unthankfulness and disobedience. Therefore it behooved them to be chastised a long season, so as they might never forget the offence that they had committed. Now then, when so ever we have provoked God to anger by our disobedience: let us not think it strange though he do not at the first dash deliver us from the adversity that he sends us for a chastisement. For our sin would not be printed so thoroughly in our remembrance at the first day as it requisite. God therefore must be laid to work after such sort, and to make us to languish, as I have touched before. And in good faith, what else is all this present life but such an exercise? Wherefore has God made us subject to so many miseries? We be no sooner escaped out of one mischief, but anon there comes another in the neck of it, so as there is never any end. And all is to teach us this lesson, which we cannot remember if we be not enforced to it. Besides that, we would forget it by and by, if our Lord did not (as you would say) incorporate it into us, so as we may be prepared and led of nature to say, see how our God exercises us with many miseries, and he does it because we be wretched sinners. And yet for all this, can we frame ourselves to his lure, and not rather draw clean contrary to his will? Therefore is he fine to reach us, that spite of our teeth we be in his hand, and he has all sovereign dominion and Lordship over us.

Again to come to particularities, when so ever God sends a man any affliction, let him bethink himself, that besides the common miseries of this flight full life, god intends to give him a particular instruction. And let us not say, why does not this man or that man deserve to be chastised as well as I: according to the common manner, which is that every man would be privileged above others? Not let every of us yield to receive the rod patiently at God's had, assuming ourselves that he chastises us measurably, and as he knows to be for our profit. Thus much concerning that retrying that is treated of here.

Furthermore if our Lord pluck us back, and whereas things were in good forwardness, and there was good likelihood that all should have flourished and been in great prosperity: if we see a sudden confusion, and that the same continues afterward, and things go on from worse to worse: let us understand that it is for our sins sakes, and because we have perverted the course of God's goodness. For he [for his part] never fails to go forward with the good that he has begun to do for us: but we cannot abide that he should continue it, we hinder him as much as in us lies. And therefore is he fine to handle us as we deserve.

Besides this, let us assure ourselves that when we obey God, then has he made his corrections available in us. True it is that a great number do harden when God goes about to subdue them: you shall see them grow willful and full of venom against him. But God works after such a sort in his chosen, that when he smites them with his hand, he does also touch that inwardly with his holy spirit, so as their hearts become soft that they may obey, by reason whereof the corrections do them good. Although then that the miseries which we endure are hard and contrary to our nature: yet must we think them good, because God makes them to serve for our welfare after that fashion.

Now Moses says expressly, that after the people had set a windlass and trailed about the mountain Seir, they came to the north side, even as God had commanded him. Wherein we see the thing more clearly which I have touched: that is to say, that there is a pliable in the people which was not in them before: they be now become tractable. And although they wandered a long time, so as they might have been out of patience every day, and have taken occasion to murmur, and to have made sedition: yet notwithstanding they went still forward. And why? For the corrections which they had received, had wrought a change in them. We see then that God's reforming of men by punishing them for their sins, is as a furnace to melt them and cast them new again in. And therefore if God have let us along here at our ease, and we fall to kicking against him: let us assure ourselves it is more for our behoove to be corrected by some chastisement. And therewithal let us beware that we profit ourselves by it, and that we become not worse than they were which are set forth to us an example of disobedience and stubbornness. Harden not your hearts as your fathers did, says the Lord. And yet notwithstanding we see that this people (how stubborn and forward so ever they were) missed not to go about the mountain a long time, after God had so chastised them: that is to say, they were driven to know that it was in vain for them to resist the hand of God. Albeit we see yet some obedience, in that it is said, that they waited to have a new commandment, so as they durst not remove one step. [till they had it.] It might seem that God mocks them to go round about after that fashion. They might have said, what shall become of this in the end? If God will have us to tarry, why let's he us not alone? Or if he will have us to go, why shows he us not the way, to say, go forward? He holds us here likes little children, so as we do nothing but fetch a circuit, so as we do nothing but fetch a circuit without departing out of one place, and when we have tried our legs never so much, we are never the further onward on our way. The people might have descanted after that fashion. But what? They tarry till God say to them, Turn you that way. We see then yet still how this chastisement had done them good in that behalf. And hereupon let us mark what true repentance brings with it. Whereas we were deaf when God speak to us, and gave no ear to his voice: we must hold ourselves in awe under him, and look what he says, that must we do, and no more. That is the chief fruit of repentance. And if it appeared to us in this people which was so stubborn and untamable: what excuse will there be for us, if we will not receive the things that are spoken to us in the name of God: but rather will be still replying, and have not the wit and discretion to suffer ourselves to be guided by him who only can lead us alright? So much the more then ought we to restrain ourselves from attempting anything, unless God command it. Moreover it is said that the people shall pass through the country of Edom, without provoking of the inhabitants. First of all it is said, They be your brethren, the children of Esau. We know that Esau was the brother of Jacob, who was the Patriarch, and (as you would say) the well spring from whence this people descended. And for as much as Esau came of the line of Abraham: a part of the land of promise had belonged to him, but that he was cut off from the inheriting thereof, albeit not by the pleasure of man, but by the heavenly ordinance uttered by God, yes even while their mother Rebecca was with child of them, inasmuch as he said that the elder should serve the younger. But yet for all this, Esau ceased not to be Jacob's brother still. And their children ought to have continued the same brotherhood and kindred betwixt them afterward. Mark that for one point.

Another point is, That God gave mount Seir in possession to Esau: it was his lot. When he had excluded him out of the land of Canaan, he gave him the other country for himself and his successors. For as much then as it was assigned him of God: it was not for men to attempt to deprive or bereave him thereof. Now as touching this brotherhood, God will have it to move us, and to be as a certain bond to knit us together, so as nature may persuade us to be kindhearted one to another, and restrain us from doing wrong or harm to any man. True it is that there is not fleshly kindred between all men, to make them so near of blood as they might call one another cousins, and name themselves be any lineage whereof either other were descended: but yet is there a certain common kindred in general, which is, that all men ought to think how they be fashioned after God's image, and that there is one nature common among them all. Even the heathen men knew that very well. So then whereas we have some discretion to maintain peace and concord, and to yield every man his right without taking away of any man's goods, and without committing of any extortion or outrage: and we pervert the order of nature, and are worse than the wild beasts which make countenance one to another when they be all of one kind. For the wolves are not at such variance among themselves as men are. And therefore let us learn, that although there be not any near kindred among us, yet notwithstanding inasmuch as we be men, there ought to be some common bond between us, and a certain brotherly love. But there is yet another consideration among Christians: for God has adopted them to be of his household: and that ought to avail more than all the kindred on the earth. For seeing that God has told us that he intends to take us to himself, because that being of his Church we be as it were his own children, and call upon him as with one mouth, saying our father: if we nevertheless agree as cats and dogs among ourselves: may it in any wise be born withal, especially considering that we cannot claim him for our father, unless we be governed by his holy spirit? [No surely:] For either his spirit must cry in our hearts: or else we shall have our mouths shut. Again on the other side, by what title can we claim so great a benefit and honor as to be the children of God: if we be not members of Jesus Christ? But we be not of his body, but upon condition before said. Whomsoever then hurts his neighbor, whomsoever is void of loving kindness and pity, whomsoever lays to catching and snatching on all sides: the same (as much as in him is) rends Jesus Christ in pieces. And therefore let us mark well, that when God alleges kindred: we be warned to consider in what degree God has put us, and what union he has set among us, and every of us to discharge himself faithfully thereof, to that intent that whereas God has set us together to maintain us in good agreement and love: we make not a confused disorder. Let that serve for one point.

But if we consider the common trade of the world, how it should seem that men have conspired to do clean contrary to God's commandment: it is so far off from neighbors to think that God's placing of them near together, is to the end that every man should serve his neighbor's turn, and all employ themselves to the common profit, without hurting or grieving one another: that even brothers think it lawful to shift every one for himself, and there is none other life with them, but to draw still to themselves without any pity or compassion. How the shall the neighbors be brethren , which have but some acquaintance a far of: seeing that they which were born all in one belly, and are all one man's children, bear no more friendship one to another than wild beasts, but rather much less? Truly it should seem that some will needs be brethren, even in spite of God. For if it be to do some mischief, or to play some devilish prank to the overthrow of all goodness: then they can skill to allege, we have this, and we have that, we be countrymen, we be neighbors children born all in one town. Lo how the wicked can find themselves to be cousins and brothers. And what to do? To rise up against God, to put all things out of order, to make quarrels and frays, to maintain themselves in all looseness, and to procure all manner of stumbling blocks, that God's name maybe blasphemed and all honesty perverted. These are the brotherhoods and cosigning ships of the world, as is to been seen too much. But when it comes to the point that every man should help his neighbor, and abstain from doing him harm or annoyance: men be so far off from abstaining, or from thinking that God united them together, or that God has created the after his own image, or again, that they be bound yet with a straighter bond, inasmuch as he has adopted them by his Gospel to be members of his son Jesus Christ, and heirs of the kingdom of heaven: men (I say) are so far off from thinking any such things, that they pervert the whole order of nature, with worse than beastly fury. But yet is this text sufficient to condemn men if they walk not in all mildness, and be not more kindhearted one to another than they be.

Now let us come to that which is adds here in the second place: which is, That God had given Mount Seir in possession to Esau. True it is that when he compares Esau and Jacob together, he says by his prophet, Is not Esau Jacobs brother? And yet have I placed him in a hilly country, in a stone and barren country: and I have given you a fruitful and fat land. Hereby the people of Israel are put in mind, that God had bestowed many more benefits upon them, that upon those that went before that. For Esau was the elder son, and yet did God inherit him of the land that he had promised to his grandfather Abraham, and to his father Isaac. And why did God so? We see none other reason, but for that he listed to utter his free goodness towards Jacob and his lineage. The people of Israel could not say, we were the more noble and excellent: for the bright right belonged to Esau. They could not say, we were better. No: for we see they were a people set altogether upon malice and unthankfulness. Now then, their inheriting of the promised land befell them not for any worthiness of their own, but through God's mere mercy. And besides this, God had also provided for Ismail who was half a bastard. For the matching of Abraham with Agar was not a lawful marriage. And although it was no adultery: yet was not that marriage altogether allowed of God. But yet did God provide for Ismail, inasmuch as he said, I have heard him. If the case stood so with Ismail, much more reason was it that Esau should have some place, and that God should extend his blessing even to those that were of his lineage. And for that cause did he give him mount Seir. Now therefore consideration the people of Israel ought not to trouble him, but to let him alone with the portion that was assigned him from heaven.

Here we have a good lesson to gather, which belongs to us all. Although mention be made here precisely of the lineage of Esau, which were called Edomites and Idumeans: yet notwithstanding, as we shall see hereafter in the song, God declares that according as he made the partitions and stretched out his meet line, so were the realms and countries divided. Let us not think that the world is ruled by fortune, and that things are so entangled, but that God guides all by his providence and power. He then has stretched out his meet line to appoint every people their country to dwell in. But yet for all that, we see how man have transposed those bounds. They will not stick to confess that bounds are a very holy thing. And truly [the transgressing in that behalf] shall be more punishable, than if a man had offended in any other deed. Likewise money because it is that thing whereby men inter common among themselves, is a privilege and (as you would say) a sacred thing. In like case is it with the bounds [mires and buttes] of fields: for without them, all would go to havoc, so as men would care up one another. We will well grant this as in respect of a field or a meadow: but we see that the pride, Ambition, and insatiable covetousness of men have so carried away their minds, as they have not been ashamed since to transpose the bounds that God had set. For as touching such as have enterprise wars against their neighbors, to increase themselves: have they not all broken the order which ought to have been inviolable? Yes: So then we see how men are made to spite God through their ambition and covetousness. And yet this mischief continues still at this day, and is inflamed more than ever it was.

But yet for all that, this rule shall hold for ever: that is to know, that look what lands, what kingdom, what Lordship, what principality, what state, or what free city so ever there be: we may assure ourselves, that the distributing of them after that sort, is done by God: and that whomsoever wages battle against them, does as much as in him lies to break the bounds which God has set. I mean here such wars as are taken in hand through ambition, or covetousness, or pride. Otherwise, we see here, that the children of Israel ought to make war: for God avows their doing, because he had ordained that to be owners of the land, and will have the former inhibitors driven out as they deserved.

But are wars made nowadays by the authority of God? Have men an eye to the thing that is lawful? Yes, or do they tarry till they have commandment from God? Not, they go to it in despite of him, the devil drives them forward. True it is that if a man reason of Realms and Principalities as they be nowadays: it may be alleged, how has that country been conquered? Yes, but yet for all that, it is not for men to remove bounds. Although they have been confounded: yet is it not for us to enterprise anything. For our Lord has not given us commission so to do: he has reserved that to himself.

But let us mark likewise, that when man have once altered the order that God has set, he must needs overthrow them. And that is the cause why there happen so many changes, and it is marvel that there are not seen yet a hundred times more. Surely if God had not a special regard to the preservation of mankind: no doubt but we should see alterations of kingdoms every day, so that within two or three days, he that is now a king should be but as one that were drift in a player's apparel, to play an interlude upon a stage. But yet for all that we must mark well, that the alteration of kingdoms which happen, do serve to punish the changes that were made before, when men removed their bounds at the beginning, and would needs pervert the order that God had set. Nevertheless, how so ever the case stands, let us bear this lesson in mind, that God has limited realms and countries: and that whereas it is his will that there should be principalities established everywhere for as much as the same comes of his providence: it behooves us to hold ourselves contented and not to alter anything, unless we have good warrant that he opens us the gate and arms us. As for example, if violence be offered to us, then is it certain that if God give victory to him that was wrongfully assailed, so as he overcome his enemy and put him to fight: that is a change that comes of God. But as for to assail [unprovoked:] that (as I said before) is not to fight against creatures, but against the living God.

And let us weigh well the words that are set down here: You shall not provoke them (says he) and they shall be afraid of you. And he adds afterward, You shall buy the bread that you must eat, yes and even the water that you shall drink, so as you must always have your purse open to pay and content them. Here we see that when God intends to maintain a people in their possession, he provokes them not to make that misbehave themselves, for even therefore did he cast that fear upon the Edomites, to the end that the children of Israel should not have any occasion of war. We shall see hereafter how God hardened the heart of Sehon, and inflamed the other inhabitants of the country, so as they armed themselves against the people of Israel, because he was minded to drive them out. And so did he show the children of Israel by effect, that they had just cause of war. But whereas he held the Edomites in awe, and inclined their hearts in such wise as they gave passage to the children of Israel, and bought and sold quietly with them: therein we see (as I touched before) that when our Lord purposes to maintain a people in their possession, he will give that such a mind as they shall not provoke their neighbors, nor open them any gap by striking up the drum, or by sounding the trumpet first themselves. To be short, the war shall not spring on their own side. Therefore we must conclude, that when a people do put forth themselves, or when a prince will needs attempt foolish enterprises, and be meddling here and there: we may perceive it is God's doing, of purpose to overthrow him and to bereave him of the country that he had given him. So much the more then ought we to pray God to maintain us and to make us mild and peaceable, that we may not follow those whom we see to have their heads full of unquietness, so as they must needs be meddling with one thing or other. Let us abstain from such things, that our Lord may maintain us in peace: for that is the true mean, as I said before.

Therewithal also we be taught, how men should behave themselves in their wars (provided always that the war be rightful and holy, and such as God allows of:) that is to know, in such sort as no man be vexed, and that there be no pillage, no saccade, nor no extortion committed. For it is said, you shall buy the bread that you eat, yes and you shall pay ready money for the water that you drink. If God command the people of Israel to buy water to drink: how much rather should they that make war, pay for wine and victuals, and such other things as cost ready money, to those that are not their enemies? For the thing that is said here, is spoken of the Edomites. But how is this observed nowadays I pray? Indeed there are Edicts and proclamations now made: but the world sees how they be kept.

Yes and who be most troubled with the wars, but such as bear the burden of it? And that is even the country. When a king or a prince is about to make war, it seems to be for the common weal: and so are men made to believe. But in the meanwhile, when the poor subjects have paid a sort of tillage, taxes, and imposts for the maintenance thereof: yet must they be still bitten to the bone, so as the enemies shall not be more vexed, that they under whose name and title the war is made. They can well enough make markets for men to sell their wars in, and bear them in hand they shall have ready money. But what? The thing that is worth three shillings, shall be esteemed at one. And most commonly they take up vittles and pay for them as they list. And so we in effect, that will the wars which are made nowadays, are but robberies: and that the cruelty and unnaturalness is so excessive, as tends to utter confusion: so as it should seem that men are bent to banish all equity, and that war cannot be made without the forgetting of all uprightness, that there may be no more law, but that men may become wood beasts. Lo to what point the world is come.

But yet for all that, like as this doctrine cannot be wiped out of the holy scripture, so can it nor also be blotted out of god's book of records, that he should not judge the world according as he has pronounced thereof already: that is to know, that the men of war which will needs enrich themselves with other men's goods, are condensed at his hand, what so ever they allege for themselves, notwithstanding that they have taken it up of custom to spoil and rob, because they have not sufficient wages, or what so ever color else they can pretend. They may well appeal to kings and princes for to be their warrant: for they shall lead the dance, and be driven to answer as captains of thieves: and all their soldiers shall follow after them, as partners of their wickedness. Now for as much as we see such disorders in the world, we be warned thereby to pray to God, that he suffer us not to be wrapped in the same. And when he ask him our daily bread, let us have consideration to think thus: Ah good Lord, grant us the grace that every of us may live of his own labor, and be in peace: and that when the drum is struck up, we may not play the mad bedlams, nor give ourselves to spoiling and robbing, but hold ourselves in quiet, so as we may take pains and yield the thanks for your sustaining of us, and suffer every man to enjoy his own without offering of violence to any man. Besides this, if they that make war be expressly commanded to pay for their bread and water. I pray you what ought we to do in peace? For many disorders may seem half excusable when there is open war, and it may so fall out, that they which would faine be gentle, sometimes cannot, but are enforced to do things which they be loath to do, yes even to their enemies. And yet for all that, it is apparent, that if a man take anything without paying for it, so as the owner or party be grieved, GOD condemns I utterly, and gives sentence here against it, yes even though things be never so far out of order, whereby some color might be given to justify their doings. Now then I pray you what will he do in peace, when we have no cause to grieve one another, but that they which can skill of husbandry may find themselves thereby, the shops are open for merchants and handicrafts men, and there is common policy [for men to

Seeing that God induces us [by such means] to withhold ourselves from all outrage and extortion: if we then go about to rob other men for their goods, if every man seek to spoil his neighbor to enrich himself with his goods, if we be so spiteful as to eat up one another without any cause: must we not be condemned double? Yes certainly. Now then, seeing that men of war are commanded to pass without making spoil, and without offering any trouble or extortion: let us learn that we are much more commanded to walk uprightly and justly, without doing any outrage or any pilling and polling, seeing that God gives us greater means to avoid it. Thus you see the effect of that which we have to bear in remembrance.

And now for a conclusion here is made a rehearsal what GOD had done for this people. The Lord you God (says Moses) has led you in the wilderness: he has fed you with Manna: you had not any natural water to drink, but God gave it you out of the dry rock: you needed not any money to buy your clothes withal, or to pay for your charges as you wanted: and is it not reason now that this goodness and just dealing should cause you to deal reasonably with those by whom you pass? For the people might have replied, Yes marry, but we have not wherewith, we have been a long time in the wilderness, there were no mines of gold or silver there, we earned not a penny there, neither have we had any trade of merchandise whereby to get anything. But Moses answers hereto, Consider how the Lord you God has governed you. As if he should say, you have none excuse at all: for you have wherewith to pay and content every man. And why? For in the wilderness you spend not any whit o the spoil that you brought with you out of Egypt: you were not driven to buy bread, vittles, apparel, or any other thing. So then, now that you are at the point to possess the land that God has promised you, you should be too unthankful towards God, and too churlish towards men, if you should refuse to content those by whom you pass. And of a truth, although you had not wherewith, yet should it not be lawful for you to rob them. For our Lord changes not the order that he has set, for any poverty that is in men. But if a man that has no need, do rob or fleece his neighbor of his goods: therein appears so much the lewder and outrageous naughtiness. AN therefore let us mark well that God's alleging of this reason to the people, was to the end they should be the better persuaded and disposed to do the thing that was commanded them.

And herein we see first of all how God bears with us: for as a father flatters his child and uses great gentleness towards him, and although he might command him at one word, saying, does this or that, without alleging any reason at all: yet he deals so gently with him as to say, my child, mark, this is the reason why I would have you to do such a thing, insomuch that he falls even to flattering of him: even after the same manner does God of his infinite goodness bear with us. So much that more than are we to blame on our part, if we suffer not ourselves to be overruled by him, seeing he shows himself so gently and amiable towards us.

And for the second point let us mark, that although no necessity can excuse our sins: yet notwithstanding these are the more to be condemned, which offend unconstrained by any extremity. As how? If a poor man deal unconscionably when he has not wherewith to live, nor knows where to become: yet shall he be condemned: (and if a thief be punishable before men, much more reason is it that he should be so before God:) And what shall the man be to whom God has given wherewith to maintain himself, if he fall to pilling and polling, and be never satisfied, but is catching and snatching on all sides, and has no regard of God's blessings, but is always thieving, filching, and deceiving? Such a man is the more to be abhorred, and we must conclude that a horrible vengeance is prepared for such as have offended so willfully. Now then let us mark, that when God gives us wherewith to sustain and maintain ourselves, his will is to lead us thereby to be the longer to our neighbors, and to do no man any harm or wrong. And so you see that God's blessings ought to be instructions to us, to make us live uprightly, without attempting anything against our duty, or without troubling of anybody. This is it that we have to remember in the second place. The rest cannot be dispatched as now, and therefore it shall be reserved till tomorrow.

Now let us kneel down in the present of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may return to him with true repentance. And again for as much as he vouchsafes to maintain us now in peace, let us pray him to continue the same favor towards us, and not suffer us to be assailed, least we do wrong or harm to anybody, and so open a gap to such as seek to swallow us up, by provoking them against us: but rather that our mildness may make them to sit still though they were willing to be doing with us. And therewithal, our good God grant us also the grace to fight in such wise against our spiritual enemies, as we may get the upper hand of them by his power. Let us then be given wholly that way, and therewithal let us seek to serve men to the uttermost of our power, seeking peace and friendship with all men, till our good God have rid us from all battles of this world, to take us into the endless rest which he has promised us. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also, etcetera.

On Friday, the 25th of April 1555

The twelfth Sermon which is the second upon the second Chapter 8 Then passed we by our brethren the children of Esau, that dwell in Seir, by the way of the wilderness of Moab.

9 Then said the Lord to me, trouble not Moab, neither provoke him to battle: for I will not give you any piece of his land to possess, because I have given Ar in possession to the children of Lot.

10 The Emians dwelt there before, which were a great people and many in number, and tall as the Enakims. And likewise they were counted Giants as the Enakims, and the Moabites called them Emins.

12 Likewise in Seir dwelt Horian before times. But the children of Esau drove them out, and destroyed them before them, and dwelt there in heir stead, like as Israel has done in the land of their possession, which the Lord has given them.

13 Then said I, now then, get you up, and go you over the river Zared. And we went over to the river of Zared.

14 And the time wherein we traveled from Kadesh Barnea until we passed the river of Zared, lasted eight and thirty years, even until the whole generation of the men of war was consumed from among the host, as the Lord God had sworn to them.

15 For the land of the Lord was against them, to destroy them from among the host, until he had consumed them.

16 And it came to pass, that when all the men of war were consumed from among the people.

17 Then the Lord spoke to Moses, saying:

18 This day shall you pass the borders of Moab by Ar

19 And come to the children of Amon, whom you shall not besiege, nor provoke them: for I will not give you any possession in the land of the children of Amon, because I have given it in possession to the children of Loth.

20 This land also was counted a land of Giants: for Giants dwelt in it before times: and the Ammonites called them Zomzomins:

21 A great people and many in number, and tall as the Enakims. But the Lord destroyed them before them. And so they possessed it and dwelt there in their stead:

22 Like as he had done for the children of Esau that dwell in Seir, when he destroyed the Horims before them: by reason whereof they possessed their land, and dwelt there in their stead even to this day.

23 Also the Caphthorims that came out of Caphthor, destroyed the Evims that dwelt in Hazerin even to Gaza, and dwelled there in their stead.

like as yesterday we saw that the children of Israel were commanded to pass by the Country of Edom without doing any wrong to the inhabitants, because there was kindred betwixt them, inasmuch as they descended of Esau Jacob's brother: so now they be willed to pass by the borders of Moab and Amon, without doing them any hurt or harm, because that they also were of kin to them. For the Moabites and Ammonites came of Loth: and God would have the children of Israel to acknowledge it still. And herein we have to note, that here again God tried the obedience of his people. For the children of Israel had languished now a great while already: and although they had been fed by God's free goodness, inasmuch as Manna was given them daily from heaven: yet notwithstanding if we look upon their travel, the time thereof might seem very long to them, and they might have been exceedingly weary of it. Now again God commands them to pass on their way, paying for their meat and drink, and not to take any booty nor to seek any profit or advantage, but to go by entreat notwithstanding that they could have used force. This might have bred a new heartburning among them. Albeit for as much as they had been well tamed with afflictions: they yielded themselves the more pliable as was declared yesterday. And therein we see what the fruit of chastisements is. When God has once pulled down our pride, and taught us to bear his yoke: we can stoop to obey him, and we will make no great do of it. But until that time, our neck is so stiff as we can no skill to yield to any right or reason. You see then that one point which we have to mark, is that God tried here the obedience of his people, by forbidding them to make war upon the Ammonites or Moabites. And here Moses alleges the selfsame reason again, which I expounded yesterday entreating of Mount Seir and of the Country of Edom. You shall not provoke the Moabites, says he. And why? For God will not give you their land to possess. As if he should say, it is not lawful for you to attempt anything, which God does not avow, and give you leave to do. Now it is certain that he will not suffer you to prosper, if you assail the Moabites, and therefore forbear them.

And so let us mark well, that such as make wars wrongfully and forwardly, consider not that their ambition and covetousness shall be cursed of God in the end, and that all their preparation must come to ruin and confusion. True it is that such as take wars in hand upon a bravery, shall divers times have great victories and win many Countries: albeit that is not because God bears them any favor, but because he mean to punish men, sometime the one and sometime the other, so as every one of them shall have his turn. And in good sooth we see that the wars which are made nowadays, are like the game of the Barriers, wherein he that wins today looses tomorrow. And this is not done by haphazard, but our Lord gives Satan the bridle, who provokes and enforces the wicked to kill one another, and to knock one another upon the heads. For God uses them as Smiths, as he says by hi Prophet Zachary. But yet herein we have a good lesson, which is that when a Prince moves war, he must consider well against whom he does it, and whether God do give him entrance or no, or else the end of it must needs be cursed of God.

And hereto Moses adds the cause why the people of Israel might not take anything from the Moabites. For it is the Lord (says he) that has given them the land to possess. Yesterday it was declared, that God did cast out his lines over all the world, and that the partitions were made by him : insomuch that Principalities, Kingdoms, and Common weal have not anything of themselves, but for that he will have the world to be so governed. Therefore when any man goes about to change the borders that God has set: he does as much as he can to violate the order of nature, and the end thereof must needs be cursed. Were this marked thoroughly, we should not see so many garboils as are in the world. For men think not that they ought to yield any account to God. And in very deed they think not that God meddles with the governing of men. When they have gotten any victory, they make bonfires for joy, and they thank God with solemn procession: but it is not for that they think so, or for that they be fully persuaded of it: it is but for vainglory that they do it. For if they meant to show that God was on their side: they should lay down their pride in fathering all things upon their own power, or upon their good fortune. Yet notwithstanding it would be though a very strange thing nowadays, if a man should say to them that take wars in hand, Be well advised: for if you cause be not just, lawful, and allowed of God, so as you have sure and infallible witness that you were enforced to make war, and that God has reached out his hand to you and showed you the way: all your furniture must needs turn to your own overthrowing. If a man should say so to them, they would think he did them great wrong: but yet were it for their behoove to mark that lesson well.

Further let us mark, that this must serve us for a comfort. For if we be sure that God has called us into the place where we be, and that we live there in his service: we have here a promise, that if any man come to assail us, how great force so ever our enemies be of, although they come as a tempest that were like to destroy and mar all: yet notwithstanding we shall be maintained by the hand of God. Now then if our Lord take us so into his protection, and tells us that we dwell in any country at his appointment: you see we may well assure ourselves, and defy all our enemies. Contrariwise, if God lift to forsake us: we be undone, there shall need no great force to overthrow us. Therefore let us learn to submit ourselves continually to the tuition of our God, and to pray him to be our defense. And when we see great forces prepared against us, let us flee to his promise, and wait to be succored of him at our need. Thus you see that the applying of this doctrine to our use, consists not in thinking that only princes are taught thereby what they should do: for the mean people also are to be comforted thereby, for as much as they may see thereby that God defends them as his flock.

Also let us call to mind what was rehearsed here, concerning kindred. Indeed it was treated off at length yesterday: albeit for as much as Moses speaks of it again, in making mention of the children of Moab and of their brethren the Ammonites: and seeing that God sets before his people's eyes the kindred which they had with these nations: Let us mark that we must live peaceably and brotherly one with another, because God has knit us together. Indeed we shall not all be kinsfolk in respect of the flesh: but yet is there such a [general] union among mankind, as we ought not at anytime to be such strangers one to another, that there should not be some communicating together: and specifically for as much as we be all created after one likeness, and we see as it were our own flesh and bones in other folks persons, in respect whereof it behooves us to practice this saying of the Prophet Esay, that we must not hate our own flesh. But besides this, there is an image of God which shines in all men: and is it not reason that we should do it so much honor, as to reverence it where so ever it shows itself? Again seeing God has called us to the knowing of him, and will have us to call upon him as our father, and has vouchsafed that we should be marked with Baptism, and be grassed into the body of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that he open us his kingdom, to take us in thither as into our common inheritance: must it not needs be that we be worse than beasts, if yet for all this, we will not be kindhearted one to another, to be as brethren, and to abstain from all annoyance and extortion? And therewithal let us mark also, that the nearer God brings men together, and makes any neighborhood between them: the more ready ought they to be to do service one to another: and that if they do it not, it is as a defying of God and nature.

But now let us see what kindred there was between the children of Israel, and the Moabites and Ammonites. Truly the original of these two peoples was of incest, so as they could not boast of their Pedigree. And indeed the very names of them were everlasting marks of their shame. For what is Moab today? Of my father. What? That the daughter had conceived child by her own father? Yes: and that (you see) was a beastly and cursed deed. And again, what is meant by Amon: [It is as much to say, as] of mine own people, that is to say, of mine own blood: for he also was born of the other daughter, who had made her father drunken as her sister had done, and so conceived by him likewise: and all this was against nature. You see then that these nations are no better worthy than to be counted Harlots birds born in a brothel house: but that they were yet in more horrible plight, because their begetting was against all order and humane honesty. And yet notwithstanding, God will have the children of Israel to acknowledge their kindred with them, not for any honor or worthiness sake, but only because of Lot. For although he were so beastly drunken, as to be bereft of discretion: yet did God continue his goodness towards him, and therefore vouchsafed he to favor his lineage and the children that came of his race. And therein we see that God had not an eye to the Excellency of those nations to whom he showed himself so beneficial, but that he did all of his own free mercy. Likewise also as touching the children of Israel, if God had looked for nobleness to move him to show himself so gracious towards them, and to deal so friendly with them: what would have come of it? For that chief stock among them was the tribe of Juda. And whence came Pharos and his brother Zaire? Even of incest too. For Juda thinking to have meddled with a harlot as common as a Colman hedge, had to do with his own daughter in law, and played the beast as dogs and bulls do. You see then it was so great a villain, that even the Heathen men would have been ashamed of it. They that never knew of God nor of Religion, could not have done worse. To be short, it was enough to have made all his offspring to have been quite rooted out. And yet notwithstanding we see that David came of the same race, and that it was God's will to establish the seat of a kingdom in his tribe, yes and that not of an earthly and transitory kingdom only, but of such a one as should be a figure of the everlasting kingdom that brings us to heaven, insomuch that even our Lord Jesus Christ came of the same stock. And so we see (as I said before) that God sought not any worthiness in this behalf, as who should say that this people was of more dignity and nobleness than all the rest of the world, and therefore he would make much of them. Yes and the baseness of the children of Israel, caused God's inestimable goodness to be perceived the better, and gave the greater gloss to it. Then let us consider that whereas here is mention made of the Moabites and Ammonites: GOD alleged them not as in way of exalting the thing that is in man, or to put in balance, their deserts, their qualities, or any renown of theirs which they have gotten by their own travel. He means no such thing. But forasmuch as it pleased him to love Lot, and to continue his mercy towards him and his lineage, notwithstanding the foul and outrageous fault that he had committed: Therefore is it his will that the Moabites and Ammonites shall still enjoy the lands that he had given them.

And let us note further, that although God bestowed his blessing so largely upon those two Nations: yet they were never the better for it, but became so much that more inexcusable in the end. For surely their unthankfulness showed itself in that they knew not that God spared them. Let us mark well then, that Gods preserving of us in this world, and his defending of us with his hand, and his making of us to escape our enemies hands, and his sustaining of us through his favor, is not all [that we ought to desire]. For the having of all this will boot us nothing at all, if we want the principal: which is, that God be merciful to us, that we call upon him, that we refer ourselves wholly to him, and that we know him to be our father, not to maintain us here for a two or three days only: (for this life is but a little shadow that glides away out of hand): but to be our everlasting Savior, and that we walk in such wise under his awe, as we not only look to be guided by him for a little while: but also that he should gather us to him in the end, so as when he has made us to pass through this world, at the last we shall have a much better inheritance which is prepared for us in heaven. When we once know this, we have all. And that will make us to enjoy these earthly blessings to our welfare. Otherwise they shall be turned into a curse: insomuch that they to whom GOD has done most good, shall be sound most blameworthy before him. And why? Because they have abused them. For we do wickedly corrupt all God's benefits, when we see not lead and provoked by them. For when we be not lead and provoked by them to honor him for them, and to put ourselves wholly into his hands, to flee to him for refuge. Let us then put this doctrine in use: and while we pass through this world, let us not devour the benefits that God sends us, to become brute beasts here, pouring with our muzzles upon the ground: but rather let us lift up our heads to heavenward, and consider that God calls us to him, and that it is to no purpose to have had some earthly prosperity, except we go further, that is to wit to our GOD, to be knit to him forever. Thus you see what we have to bear in mind.

Yes and let us mark also that the two nations which are spoken of here, showed themselves too unkind, in yielding far other reward to the children of Israel than was to be looked for. We see that the children of Israel passed by them [quietly,] paying ready money for all things, yes even for the water that they drank.. The Moabites therefore and the Ammonites not only had no cause to complain, seeing they were not grieved nor troubled by the children of Israel, not received any harm or loss by them: but also ought to have considered thus, Behold, God's will is to establish the brotherhood that is betwixt them and us, and that ought we to print well in our minds. Insomuch that although they had had neither stories nor Chronicles: yet ought that to have been a thing of renown among them, and the report of it ought to have been common from father to son, to the end they might have applied and endeavored themselves to maintain one another. Though there had been none other alliance nor promise: yet ought that to have sufficed to maintain peace and agreement betwixt them. But contrariwise they became Scorpions to sting the children of Israel: and when they could not make war against them themselves, they linked in with their enemies, and procured them many quarrels. And when so ever any adversity befell them, they played the barking curs and made hue and cry after them, as we see is spoken of them by the Prophets and the Psalms: For it is said, Lord remember the children of Edom, which were the nearest of kin to them: for they came of Esau and were circumcised as well as the children of Israel, they bore the badge of God's covenant, as household folks of his Church: and yet for all that, in the day of Jerusalem they cried out, upon them upon them, root them out so as one stone may not abide upon another. Thus see you so great a cruelty, that even the enemies would have been more courteous, then these which and cause to have been so, and ought to have been as brothers. As much is to be said of Moab. For when the poor Jews were put to any after deal and fled to Moab, in hope to have some refuge there: they were betrayed by these to whom they had conveyed themselves. And therefore does God complain of such cruelty saying: Moab, you wart the covert of my people, but when they came to you, you drives them away, yes and detest more cruelly with them than their enemies. That was the recompense which those nations yielded whom God had so greatly born with all, and to whom he had showed so great kindness: and to whom he had showed so great kindness: but yet ought not that unkindness of theirs, to make the children of Israel to show themselves uncourteous towards them. For their sparing of them after that sort, increased their condemnation the more, I mean them that had so ill acknowledged the benefit. And therefore GOD failed not to punish such treachery.

Now then we be taught, first not to pass whether men acknowledge the good that we have done them or no. For albeit that we may seem to lose the thing that we shall have done: yet let it suffice us that GOD allows our obedience, in that he says, be kindhearted towards all men. And when we shall have endeavored to do good to all men, without hurting of any man: if men acknowledge it not, but do the contrary to us: very well, let us not pass for it, but let us bear their unthankfulness patiently. For why? We have served GOD, who will not forget what we have done. Therefore if the world be set upon such forwardness, as we may be occasioned to feel some grief and impatience: yet must we still keep on our course, which God has commanded us. Mark that for one point.

And it is a very needful lesson in these days. For if we should fall to reckoning of our cards, before we would show any kindness one to another: what a thing were that? When should a man begin to do good? [never:] for we see how all the world is so corrupted, as is pitiful to think. It seems that we cast our good turns into the throats of wolves or mad dogs, and that it is nothing else but a provoking of their malice more and more, which seek to abuse our simplicity. But yet for all that, it behooves us to have an eye to that which God commanded.

Now whereas men on their side are so malicious and forward: let us, that as God took vengeance of the Moabites, Edomites and Ammonites, for the children of Israel after that sort: so will he do the like nowadays. I told you even now that the Prophets do oftentimes make mention of the slender recompense, that these nations yielded to the children of Israel complained not: yet did God take their case in hand, and set himself as counterparty against those nations. He tarried not till the cry of the afflicted did come up into him, and vanish away in the air: but he sends them his prophets and tells them his Prophets, and tell them that for as much as he had taken the people of Israel into his protection, he will be revenged of the outrage that is done unto them. For although that they on their side did suffer it justly, for shrinking from their subjection to God: yet notwithstanding, the Edomites, Moabites and Ammonites ought to have pitied their brethren. And therefore did God set himself against them and said, You also must flee when your turn comes about, and no man shall receive you: you shall be scattered throughout the world, and not find any place to rest in. Again, when he speaks of the Edomites: we see he curses them, and in the mean season comforts his own people. There shall be a horrible spoil (says he) through the whole country of Jewry: but yet will I bring home my people again in time. But as for Edom, cursed shall he be that builds it again, or that goes about to build it and set it up again. He shall lay the foundation of it in his first born, that is to say, all the preparation that shall be made to set up this people again, shall fall down in the end, and they that help him shall perish: for there shall be no help, but it shall fall out against him. Now then, since we see this, let it suffice us that we have endeavored to do our duty. For our God will take the case in hand for us, and be on our side. If men be malicious towards us, and render evil for good: GOD will make himself the counterparty against them, and although we sit still and make no countenance to revenge ourselves: yet will GOD put to his hand. Thus you see what we have to bear in remembrance concerning these nations.

But there is yet this point to be noted where it is said, That there had been Giants in all the Countries of the nations aforementioned, and that God had driven them out. For Moses intended to do us to know, that the successors of Amon, Moab, and Esau, had been brought into those countries by the hand of God. As if he should say, there was no force in themselves to conquer the countries that they possessed: for they were too far over matched. And therefore as touching their bringing of their matters to pass: it must be concluded that it was god which wrought that change. Mark that for one point.

And he adds, that it was to be considered that the children of Israel had gotten the possession of their land after the like manner. He speaks here as of a matter already come to pass. As if he should say, Go to, look about you my friends; see how God brings you into the land that he promised to your fathers for an inheritance. When you become thither, and that he has settled you there: think you that he would maintain you there, if he had not compassion upon you, according as you shall have good need thereof? For you shall be hated of all the world: and therefore your God must be fine to maintain you. Now if you be desirous to be preserved by him, attempt not anything against his hand, and you shall perceive that he will set himself against all such as shall go about to hurt you. Therefore must you be gentle towards them that are in the same case that you are. Now we see that Moses meaning is. Wherefore let us learn to come home to ourselves when we consider not God's benefits towards other men, as indeed oftentimes we have our eyes blindfolded. If a man tell us that we ought to consider the good that God has done to our neighbor: we pass not for it. But when we enter into ourselves, then are we convicted, and we learn what it is to forsake others. That is the common lesson which is given us here. As how? For it would be dark still, if it were not set out plainly by example. If it be said to us generally, God has given every man that which his pleasure is that he shall have and possess: thereupon such as pill and poll their neighbors, and use violence and extortion, notwithstanding that they make their quarrel against creatures, do indeed match themselves against God, who will have order kept in the world. When any man tells us hereof, we are not persuaded of it that it should be so. For we have ever some fond toy or other to blear our own eyes with all. What, say we? Is such a man rich by the will of God? And how know we that? Not rather, I see he is enriched by evil means. We make no bones in construing the thing the clean contrary way. And why? Because we consider not God's grace in our neighbors. But if a man to us: See what God has done for you: you must do him homage for it: if you acknowledge it he will make you to enjoy it, yes and you enjoying of it shall be forever.

Again, look that you succor your neighbors according to the ability that he has given you: and if you go that way to work, all shall turn to your benefit. Now then we see to what purpose Moses has alleged this admonition: and after what manner we ought to practice it. And besides this, let us mark in general, that the changes which happen, come not but by God's hand and providence. When we see a mighty people, when we see strong and well manned Cities, when we see all other means that may serve to the maintenance of a country, and yet the same is conquered by enemies: it must needs be thought that God wrought therein. And therefore let us learn to behold God's judgments in all the alterations, that are seen in the world. And although all thing be on a boil: yet let us understand that God holds the stern above. True it is that men will make uproars, and run into disorder, and when they keep a great stir, to their seeming God is shut out of doors. But when they have practiced what they can, yet shall it not stop God from turning all things to such end as he has purposed in his mind. And therefore as I said before, let us not imagine that fortune bears any sway in the world: but let us assure ourselves that God has reserved the sovereignty to himself, to bring even all the turmoil that men raise up, to such end as he has ordained, of purpose to punish the sins of such as offend him, to pull down the pride of such as are too lofty, and to cut off his blessings when he sees them misused. That is the thing which we have to note.

And even these manner of speeches, That God draw out of the Giants before the face of the Edomites and before the face of the Moabites, do yet better confirm the things that are said already, according as we have seen heretofore, that it is he which puts men in fear. For if it please him, although men have no courage at all, but be fearful and hen hearted: yet will he make them strong and stout, so as they shall be as unmovable as rocks when other come to encounter against them. And on the other side although they be Giants and carry the countenances of Lions: yet can God weaken them in one moment, so as they shall run away from their own shadows, though nobody else pursue them. For as much then as Moses uses such manner of speeches: let us assure ourselves that men have not their hears in their own hands, to strengthen them at their need. And therefore let us take warning thereby, to trust that GOD will discomfit our enemies without the power of man: and that if they rise up against us with never so violent rage: yet shall they be beaten down, and not be able to do anything against us. And why? For GOD which when he lifts does put to flight not only men of small courage, but also even Giants which are so huge that they astonish skill how to put them back with all their boldness.

And therefore let us learn to call upon GOD, that he may vouchsafe to give us courage at need, and that we may be strengthened by him: for else what will become of us? We shall be as weak as water, though no man preach much upon us. And this must reach us to walk the more warily, considering the weakness or rather brittleness that is in us: to the intent we be not so foolish, as to ground ourselves upon our won strength and courage, but pray to GOD to hold us with his mighty hand, and to give us invincible constancy. Now if we be so unable to encounter with mortal men: how much more unable are we to encounter our ghostly enemies? Are we able to withstand Satan and all his assaults? Alas, we come far short. And therefore let us follow the counsel that is given us here: let us pray GOD to drive away Satan, and to cut a sunder all the cords which hold us here fast tried, and therewithal to give us such power to resist him, as we may have victory even to the end. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this text of Moses.

Furthermore whereas he says, that God led his people about by the space of eight and thirty years, until such time as all those that were able to heart armor at the time people murmured, were consumed: it serves still to bring to remembrance the thing that have been spoken: namely that god executed the vengeance which he had threatened to his people. And (as we see) it is a very profitable lesson, to teach us to tremble at God's threatening, as well as to be moved at his promises. Such is our nature, that when GOD promises us anything, we fall to scanning and disputing o it, so as we cannot rest upon it, to say it shall be so: we cannot conclude that it is God's will. True it is that we will confess it with our mouth:

but as for to be fully resolved of it, we will none of that, unless his truth be well sealed and warranted in our hearts by his holy spirit. And yet even then too, we be so inclined to distrust, that we draw still back from the thing that God promises us: so brutish and dull headed are we.

And this appears yet more when he threatens us, So much the more then ought we to think upon his judgments, and to consider that if he be provoked, the threatening that he has uttered with his mouth shall not fall to the ground, but have their effect and performance.

Thus you see to what purpose Moses rehearses again, that all they which were above twenty year old at the time that the people murmured, were consumed, and that not by casualty, but according to the Lords own saying. And this was to assure the people yet more, to the end they might perceive that God's threatening of them was in good earnest.

And herewith all let us also call to remembrance, that God cannot abide that men should despise and refuse the benefit that he offers, and let occasion flip: for it he open the gate, and men will not enter, he cannot bear with that negligence of theirs matched with disobedience. For what was the cause that God was so provoked to anger, that he swear that all the carcasses of the people should rot in the wilderness, and that he used so sharp words to them? It was for that they had refused to enter into the land that he had promised them. We see then, that unthankfulness provokes God's vengeance against us to the uttermost, especially when we refuse the benefit that he offers us, and that such refusal proceeds of willfulness and malice, which happens in manner continually. For what makes us so loath to receive the good turns that GOD would do us; but our own unbelief, for as much as we think not that he will keep touch with us, but rather fall to reasoning what will become of it? And therefore let us mark well that men shall never bereave themselves of God's benefits, but through their own distrust. Wherefore it stands us so much the more on hand to endeavor to believe all the promises of our God, and to receive his sayings purely and simply, and to yield to them without any gainsaying. Lo whereupon it behooves us to rest.

Now as concerning the time, true it is that God could have destroyed them all at the first day which provoked him so to anger: he could have sent an Angel to have made clean rid of them, and yet have preserved the young folk by miracle, so as they should have come into the land the first day: but he led them up and down by the space of forty years. And why did he so? To the end that others should take example by them. For God sees, that we profit better by his corrections and judgments in process of time, than if he should punish us out of hand and away. Indeed, in our own imagination we had lever that God should thunder down at the first dash, and we think we should perceive his power much better, if he wiped them quite out of the world which have offended him, and that we might see the wicked consumed at once. And what would become of it, if he should out of hand destroy and take away all those out of the world, which are not worthy to live in it? If it were so, we would within a day or twice forget the things that he had showed us before our eyes. We may well wean the contrary, but God knows that it is so. For he leaves the wicked here in this world, where they have their delights, sports, and triumphs at their pleasure: and that is to try our patience. Nevertheless sometimes God sets them languish as well as other folks, so as a man may see them drag their legs after them, and they be as it were upon the rack, and God sets them before us as looking glasses, so as we may well perceive, that it is more for our profit to see his justice so prolonged, by making the wicked to languish after that manner: that if he should defend them their punishments out of hand. This (say I) sticks faster in our remembrance. You see then how we be better taught by the delay of God's justice, than if it were executed at once and out of hand. And that was the cause why it behooved God to be forty years space in consuming the people, to show them that they were not worthy to enter into the promised land. For thereby the younger sort were occasioned to think, why did not God give us the fruition of the land at the first day? It is because our fathers murmured against him. And so are we deprived of the inheriting thereof from our childhood, and that nor for a day or two, but it was God's will that we should wander in this wilderness a long time, to the end that the sin of our fathers might be the better printed in our minds, to beware that we followed them not in that behalf. You see then that by this means the younger folk were taught to live in the fear of God, and to be better advised than their fathers were. And therefore when so ever God executes not his justice upon the wicked, to make clean riddance out of hand, but consumes them by little and little: let us learn to hold our wits always tied up and as it were in suspense. And in the meantime let us take the instruction that God gives us thereby, and learn to bear them well I mind, and never to forget them: for his intent is to put us in mind of them until we have thoroughly digested them. After this manner must we practice this doctrine, concerning the time that is set down here by Moses, where in God led his people up and down by the space of eight and thirty years, whereunto two years more were added afterward, to make up the full number of forty.

of our sins, praying him to vouchsafe to bring us more and more to such repentance, that we mourning for them before him, may acknowledge that there is nothing but cursedness and destruction in us, wherein we should dwell still, if he pitied us not, and that in the meanwhile we may not be so forward and malicious, as to turn head against him, though he handles us roughly than we would be, but that acknowledging it to be rightful that he should touch us with his hand, we may be so reformed, as our whole seeking may be to mortify all our affections and lusts, and to please him and to obey his righteousness: and that therewithal he strengthen us in such wise, as we may fight stoutly under his antigen, and by that means be maintained under his protection, until we have finished our race in this world, and be taken up into his everlasting rest, after we have outstood the battles that we have to endure here. That it may please him to grant this grace not only etcetera.

The thirteenth Sermon which is the third upon the second Chapter

24 Afterward the Lord said, Up, get you hence, and go over the river of Arnon. Behold, I have delivered Sehon King of Hesebon the Amorrhite and his land into your hand. Begin to take possession, King and provoke him to battle.

25 This day will I begin to send the fear and dread of you upon all people that are under the whole heaven: so that when they hear the fame of you, they shall tremble and be in anguish for your presence.

26 Then sent I messengers from the wilderness of the east, to Sehon King of Hesebon, with words of peace, saying:

27 Let me pass through your land, keeping on the highway, without turning to the right hand or to the left,

28 You (shall sell me meat for money, to eat, and you shall also give me water for money, to drink: let me but only pass through on foot,

29 (As the children of Esau have done which dwell in Seir, and the Moabytes which dwell in Ar) until I become over Jordan, and be entered into the land which the Lord our God give us.

ere Moses confirm yet better the thing that I treated of before: that is to wit, that men must not give themselves to foolish enterprises, as every man's fancy leads him: but we must have an eye what is lawful. And thereof there is none other trial, than to hear what God commands and then promise us. For his will must be our sure rule. Whosoever trusts himself forth to do what he like best, although he be able to justify his doings before men, and can let never so many fair colors upon them: yet shall he always be condemned before God. Therefore let us bear in mind, that to live as it become us, we must have this soberness and modesty with us, that we adventure not any further than his word will bear us out. True it is that the talk here is only of wars: but we must apply the doctrine only thereof to our general use. For like as God chose his people of Israel to make them as a looking glass for his Church: so must we apply all the things to ourselves which are written of them. For the perfection of the things that are contained here, belong to us as shows Saint Paul. Now were this well observed we should not have such disorder in our life, as we see. For every man has his liking by himself, and according to his liking, so fling he forth to attempt thing, and we never stand to inquire what God command, but our own affections carry us away, and inflame us in such life, that everyone runs after the thing that he light upon: and so we do but get up and down all our life long, But here it is told us, that men must not reach out their hands to adventure upon anything at all, further forth than GOD had given them leave. When he said, go: our going is not at all adventure, but it is matched with a promise, Behold (said he) the Lord had delivered Sehon king of Hesebon into your hands. As if he should say king, men must not have an eye to anything that may draw their desire to it before hand, as we see that our nature do drive us there unto: for fearfully can we tell how to open our eyes, but some lewd liking will tickle us. And what is the cause thereof? It is for that we be not fully persuaded of this principle, that we must let all things alone which are not granted us of God. If we followed this doctrine, such as are poor would be contented with their slenderness, and crave no more of God but to be sustained: and the rich sort would not be so blinded with unsatiable covetousness, as to increase themselves still by adding peace to peace. And therefore it stand us so much the more on hand to bear this doctrine in mind, since we see how for our life is disordered, and we cannot rule our lusts according to Gods will, which only can and ought to matter them.

Again on the other side, we see how we pick out enemies: whereas it belong to GOD to appoint us to them. In good faith what is the cause that men have one another, that they seek to eat up one another, and that there is so much strife, trouble, and quarrelling? It is for that as soon as any man is grieved, by and by he will need be revenged: and we cannot abide that any man should touch us in our goods or our any persons, but in continently we will be at open war with him. As for patience, there is none at all in us. But our Lord will have us to overcome evil with good, that in so doing we may be as his sheep. But no man will doing be brought to so much reason. Men then arm themselves where God command them to be quiet and peaceable: and they will need have them enemies, whom God would have them to labor to win by love and gentleness.

Contrary wise, if there be a just quarrel that ought to be maintained every man shrinks away. The name of God is blamed, and wicked deeds are committed: there ought such as have courage and manhood; to show that they fear not the hatred or anger of men. For GOD will have us to undertake war in his name: and every man does shun it. And therein we see how forward and untoward we be.

Again, it is said that our warring must be not against mortal men, but rather against Satan and all his wiles. Look how GOD found the trumpet and strike up the drum, and tell us that we must enter into battle against our ghostly enemies. But that will not sink in our stomachs: we be wedded to our own lusts: if any man anger us, if any man do us wrong, we must be revenged: and we consider not that in so doing Satan win greedy at our hands.

Now then (as I said before) we see that this doctrine was written for our use and instruction, so as we must always bear in mind the likeness, that is between us and the people of old time.

Wherefore, first of all let no man covet to possess anything which he had not received at Gods hand, according to our daily asking of him our ordinary bread. Then let us not go about to enrich ourselves by unlawful means, craft, and violence, neither let us practice one thing or other by subtlety: but let every man follow his trade simply, by and meddle with nothing but that which GOD give us leave to do, and let us learn to rule our lives according to his word, waiting for such blessing as it shall please him to give us. And let such as have goods, be always ready to forgo them, whensoever it shall please him: and let such as have not the world that will, bear their poverty patiently. That is the thing which we have to mark in the first place.

Secondly, when the case stand upon adventuring, let our hardiness be, that we dare be bold to do whatsoever GOD command us, specially when we have his promise, as is said before. That is the thing (as I have declared already heretofore) which put difference between the true wisdom of the faithful, and the rashness of such as play the loose colts and run galloping astray. For the faithful does wait for warrant from GOD, and that the end of the thing which they take in hand shall be good: and when they once have his promise, then go they forward without attempting anything to the contrary. But the unfaithful take a toy in their head, and when they have laid their plate, they conclude to do whatsoever seems best to themselves, without inquiring of Gods will, and thereupon they stick inquiring at nothing. In so doing there is nothing but presumptuousness to overthrow themselves. But the true foundation is to have God promise, and to rest upon the fame, doing the things that he command us. And if we have that regard with us: then shall we take the contrary way to that which I have spoken of. For where as now we be fearful in the good quarrels that God allow, and wherein we ought to hazard ourselves: we shall have an invincible constancy, and every of us shall have an eye to his duty, to say, behold, my God command me to do it. Indeed I shall have many assaults and many encumbrance, and may perchance be greatly hindered by men: but it is enough to me that God is my warrant: seeing he has appointed me to do it, it is not for me to stick at it.

Besides this, we have also a promise: God never said to us, does this, but he tells us also that he will be with us. Now then seeing we know that he is able to maintain us even in spite of all the wicked and of all them that are in a chase against us: what need we be afraid to do well? And if we be afraid, do we not wrong unto God as though he were not of power to defend us? So then we see now how bold and hard we ought to be in maintaining of good quarrels, for as much as we be sure that GOD will not fail us, specially when we be to encounter against Satan, and against all the things that he practice Satan, as well against ourselves, as against the whole Church. Therefore if we play dastards and shrink away when we should enter into such encounters, as we see most men does, who seek starting holes, and cannot find in their hearts to bear any burden for the honor of God: is it not too shameful treachery? Yes: for we cannot step out of the way, but our unbelief bewares itself. What cause us to be so cold in performing our duties? It is for that we believe not God. For were we thoroughly persuaded that he will keep touch with us, persuaded that we shall not be disappointed in waiting for the thing that he had promised: it would make us to forget all fear, and all the goodly shifts that we devise to turn the cat in the pan. And therefore let us learn to glorify our GOD in yielding to him the title of faithfulness: and then shall we be hard enough, not to follow our own fancies, but to obey his commandments. We shall have a holy presumptuousness, if we hold us to this line and rule of trusting in God, and of hoping that he will perform whatsoever he had said or uttered with his mouth. Thus you see how this lesson is to be put in practice.

Furthermore let us mark here with all, how God add here, that he will strike such a fear and terror into the peoples hearts, as they shall be dismayed when they does but hear of the fame of the Jews. Here we see that God hold men's hearts in his hand, to weaken them or strengthen them at his pleasure.

True it is that men imagine themselves to have this virtue of manliness in themselves. And the very cause why they despise God, is that every of them makes his account to compass his matters by his own power. But so far off are the common people from having any stoutness or manhood in them, without that God give it them: that God hold even the hearts of kings and princes in his hand, and although they seem to themselves to have much more strength and courage than others: yet does God make them to slip away like water, when he thinks good. So then let us mark well, that it is not in any mans power to be valiant, unless GOD strengthen him. And therefore we may apply this doctrine to double use. The one is that although a man see himself to be weak, he must not be out of heart for it: for there is a remedy ready for it, if we lift to seek it. I say we must gather strength of mind by seeking it in God, yea even whensoever we be hindered to do our duty for want of courage. As for example: God perchance call us to glorify his name, he fholteth us out from this world, accordingly as it is his will that every man should renounce himself, and that we should forsake our own lusts. Now we see how possible it is to obey, yea and we know how far all our ability stretch. Again, we see also a great number of hazards, and the devil will face us with this inconvenience and that danger, where at we shall be as good as dismayed, so as we shall not dare to stir one finger to obey God and to execute his commandment. And what is the reason? It is for that we be too saint hearted. Now it is not for us to stick still in this mire: but we must seek for strength where we can find it. Lets consider (say I) that God is able enough to amend the faintness of heart that hold us back, yea & which make us to shrink back from his word, and to turn head from it. You see then how we ought to take warning to flee unto GOD and to seek succor there, for so much as he, had men's hearts in his hand, and does both fashion and bow them as he think good. Likewise again, when we feel a good disposition in ourselves, again, so as we would fain give the onset (as they say), and we have no fear at all to hold us back: yet must we not stand upon that, for we hear how Saint Paul warn us to work out our salvation with fear and trembling, that is to say, to follow and draw that way which God show us. And after what manner? Fearfully, and as it were with trembling. Why so? For it is God (faith he) which give us both the will and the performance, and all through his own free bestowed goodness.

Seeing it is so then, albeit that we have the spirit of courage and stoutness: yet let us not cease to resort unto GOD, and to humble ourselves continually, and to pray him that he forsake us not, but rather continue the grace that he has put into us, and confirm the same until we have finished our course. And thus you see that we be warned to seek continually for new strength, notwithstanding that we feel that our Lord had strengthened us already.

Now the second use is, that when we see our enemies fearful and dismayed, we must consider how it is GOD that had discouraged them, and not impute any whit to our own prowess, or to aught else that in us? But yield the whole praise thereof to him that ought to have it. And on the contrary part, when we perceive our enemies to be like fiends, so as there is none other likelihood but that we shall be swallowed up: when we see a desperate boldness in them so as they go forward Hill whatsoever come of it: [finally] when we see them, all on flaming fire after that sort: yet let us not be dismayed there at. For why? God will make them to soak away like water when it comes to the pinch.

Now then, as for this devilish geerishness which the wicked have to overthrow Gods children with all, and to cumber and trouble them everywhere: let it not put us out of heart, though they pursue us never so deadly. For why? GOD will provide for us in such life, as he will make those afraid of our shadows, which seem as now to have their throats open to swallow us up, and to be as gulfs of hell. God will work after such a fashion in that behalf, as they shall not be worthy to be compared with little babes.

Let us mark then, that seeing it is told us that God hold men's hearts in his hand: we must always rather look to him, than rest upon anything here below, whensoever we see any stops that may put us in fear. And in so doing we shall never be confounded.

Moses add moreover, That he sent to Sehon with words of peace, saying: Let us pass through your country, we will pay for our bread and water, we will do them no harm, we will pass as your friends, as we have done to our brethren the Edomytes. It should seem here at the first sight, that Moses did against that which was commanded him. For these are two diverse things, [namely the God faith] go give battle to Sehon king of the Amorrhites: and that Moses instead of giving him battle, and instead of encountering him in the field, send an Ambassador unto him, and pray him to give him leave but only to pass through his Country, promising to do no harm, and to pay for all things that he took. It might seem then that here is some contrariety: and if it were so, then was Moses disobedient unto God.

Let us mark, that where as God commanded him to offer battle to Sehon king of the Amorrhites: his meaning was, that the war should in all respects be lawful, and that Sehon should well perceive, that he was justly assailed by the people of Israel. This therefore is no impediment, but rather a mean whereby God ordained his people to have lawful war with Sehon and all his subjects. Whereas God had said, I will give you the land in possession: it was requisite that the malice of Sehon should be discovered and bewrayed, that it might appear to the world, that the people of Israel had just title to discomfit him. For where as GOD promised the land of Canaan to his people: this was no part of that Country: he gave them this as an income or over plus, and extended his liberality further than the promise made to Abraham did contain. And therefore Sehon was not as yet declared to be an enemy to the people of Israel. And if they should have defied him as an enemy at the first dash, without giving him knowledge of the war: it had been a disorderly kind of dealing. These things then, agree very well: that is to wit, that Sehon was condemned beforehand by God: and that the children of Israel having chased out all the inhabitants of his country, should possess the same themselves: and also that these things should not be done, until the willful stubbornness of Sehon were disclosed that he might dispossess himself, and be the cause of the war, so as the fault might justly be imputed to himself. Wherefore let us mark well, that Moses had not swerved herein from Gods commandment, to play the wise man after the manner of the world, which is to have some politic devise by themselves, so as they must need invent some toy or other of their own head, as though they were better advised than GOD. And surely that is the common fashion of all. But such forecast is cursed, when we think to amend the things that God command us, by our own policies and inventions. Moses went by not that way to work, he followed simply Gods will.

But by the way it may seem very strange, that GOD does send a message of peace unto Sehon, and yet notwithstanding had determined beforehand that it should not avail him. In this case all worldly pride must stoop, and consider Gods manner of dealing towards us with such humility, that where our wits cannot reach unto it, we may honor his incomprehensible secrets. And certes it is a text worthy of remembrance when it is said, that GOD (or Moses by Gods authority) send unto Sehon to desire him to suffer the people to pass, gently in treating him and showing him the thing that was for his welfare: and yet notwithstanding thing that GOD had fully determined beforehand, that Sehon should make none account of it, but that he should be discomfited and destroyed. This may seem stranger to our imagination. When men will need scan of Gods works and providence according to their own reason: they shall find according things to grudge at, every turning of a hand. And that is the cause why venomous tongues rush out nowadays, and are not ashamed to blame God. When there is any talk of Gods secret ordinance, and of his disposing of things in this world, after a manner unknown to us, so as we shall not comprehend it until we be rid of this flesh of ours: they storm at it, and repine against GOD. And why? Because the same surmount their capacity. But if Gods justice be too high for us: ought it to be abased therefore? If his ordinance be above our understanding: should it therefore be hidden from himself, and should it have no authority over us? Yes: And this text is enough to stop the mouths of all such rascals. For one of the common objections that such beasts do make, is this: Howe so? If men had not free- will to take or refuse the thing that GOD says to them, and that the thing itself were not undetermined: it were in vain to preach, or to make exhortations, or to prefer the choice of good and evil for the matter were dispatched beforehand.

Thus does it seem indeed to these silly fools, which attribute more to their own brain, than to Gods doctrine, and which by reason of their slender exercise in the holy scripture, are the more presumptuous to judge at all adventure of the things that they know not. But let us look upon that which Moses rehearse here. The message that he sent to Sehon king of the Amorrhites, came of GOD, and must not be taken as the message of a mortal man, as I have declared before. But yet is Sehon disposed to receive the message? Or is there any casual uncertainty in this behalf, so as a man might think it might as well not happen as happen? [Nay] Moses was well assured that Sehon would not obey it: and I enter not yet so far as to discuss whereof that proceeded. It shall be declared in the next Lecture, that God had hardened Sehons heart, and that it was his will that it should be so. Likewise also it is said in the psalm, that God turned away the hearts of such as otherwise had been the peoples friends, and that he hardened them in such forte, as they could not abide to spare them. But I will not enter yet so far. I treat as now but upon this point, that GOD send messages to men in his own name and authority: which notwithstanding shall not persuade to reclaim them. And why? Because that those to whom he speak, are set upon evil beforehand: and there is none other thing to be looked for but that they shall be the more inflamed and wax woorle, at the hearing of Gods commandment. And therefore (as I have said, already) although it be not seemly to our human reason: yet must we humble ourselves and honor Gods secrets. When we find things contrary to our natural reason, is it meant that we should give liberty to our own wit, to say, Oho, I take it to be otherwise, and therefore it must need be so? Note: Let GOD rather have the master and let us become fools that we may be life in him. For at that end must we begin if we will profit well in GODS school.

We must follow that which Saint Paul tell us, which is, that we must be fools in ourselves, that is to say, we must not covet the cursed wisdom where with men are puffed up, when they think themselves To be sharp witted and wise enough to judge of [divine] matters. Let us beware of such imaginations, and riding ourselves quite and clean of all self weaning, let us profit ourselves by Gods self weaning showing of the things unto us which he like, and which are good in his sight. Let us then learn to frame ourselves wholly to his good will, for if we be counted to be fools and witless before men: it shall be but of such as judge after

Furthermore let us mark, that when we have searched things thoroughly, we shall find that Gods sending of his word daily unto such as receive it not, and are already daily condemned before him: is not without cause. Then is it uncertain to us, that when Gods word is preached, it is to the end to blind the reprobates and such as are incorrigible: and yet for all that, that it is Gods will to make them inexcusable. For commonly God refer that knowledge to himself, and when we be sent of him and do preach his name: we cannot tell whether our labor shall do good or no. He then which is appointed to preach Gods word, know not (when he has done as he was commanded) whether his preaching shall turn to the salvation or damnation of his hearers. But yet for all that let us labor still, and pray GOD to vouchsafe to give effect to his word, that it may so profit, as the wretched world may be plucked back from the destruction where unto it go. That is the mark which we must shoot at, and the thing which we have to do. Nevertheless sometime GOD will show us before our faces, that his word serve to condemn the hearers, and to bereave them of all excuse. We see it was once said unto Esay, Go to this people. And what to do? It was indeed to carry them the word of salvation. But yet therewithal it is said unto him, Go to harden this peoples hearts, go to stop their ears, go to shut their eyes, and to thicken their hearts, to make them utterly past recovery: for I will not have them convert. Seeing then that the Prophet is sent with such commission, as he know well that those to whom he speak, shall but wax the worse for it: in what case is he? But what for that? Yet must he execute his commission with all obedience. It is not for men to enter into counsel, and to take advice in this behalf according to their ability: no, but they must submit themselves to GOD as I said before. Look what was said to the Prophet, does show itself daily in effect. It might put us often times out of patience, to see that the more that Gods word is preached, the more does the world rush forth into all licentiousness. For they that conspire among us against GOD and his Gospel: are in comparison far worse than the Papists. The Papists have some devotion with them: and although they be grow brutish, yet nevertheless their chief intent is to serve GOD. But as for the other sort, they be stark Devils: and although they know they and see it sufficiently proved, that they war against God and not against mortal creatures: yet does their fury carry them away to proceed still. We see it. We see that whereas in the time of blindness there was some civil order, and men were more bridled: now it seem that all things are set at liberty. This were able to make Gods servants quite out of patience. But what for that? We must take courage as Saint Paul comfort us; He said that whether Gods word bring life or death to men, yet is it always a good and sweet favor before GOD. True it is that Gods word of itself (as shall be declared more fully hereafter) is always the favor of life. For what is it that God aim at, if we consider his word in it own nature? The calling of men back to the end they might be saved. And yet for all that, we see by experience that it is an odor and favor of Death, in so much as the wicked are strangled and choked with it, as soon as they do but take the scent or smell of it. They need not to taste of it nor to eat of it: if they do but take the scent of it a great way off, it is poison to them, so that the devil carries them away, and they fall to fretting and chasing against GOD: and all to their own destruction. And do we see that Gods word turn into occasion of death to a great number of men? Yet must we be of good cheer, said S. Paul. And why? Because it is a good and sweet favor unto God when men are made inexcusable;

But now let us come to declare how Gods word tend unto life, and how it has that property: notwithstanding that men through their own wickedness, do turn it to their deadly condemnation. This is sufficiently ex-pressed in that it is said, That Moses sufficiently sent a message of peace to Sehon King of the Amorrites. His desire then is to obtain from all annoyance, if Sehon could abide it. Now let us see to what end the Gospel is preached, and after what manner. What else is contained in it, but that God intend to be reconciled to the, world, as said Saint Paul in the fifth of the second to the Corinthians? In as much then as GOD send us things of peace, so as his desire is to show himself a father to all such as yield themselves teachable unto him, and our Lord Jesus Christ is offered us as the mean to bring us again into the love and favor of our God: it is surely a message of peace. And indeed the Gospel is so intituled, and not without cause. True it is that the law also was a message of peace, as in respect of the promises: If we look upon the law strictly, as Saint Paul speaks diverse times of it: it will be a very message of wrath. But if we look upon the promises that were made to the fathers of old time: [wee shall find that] even from the beginning of the world, Gods will was that] that sinners should know his mercy, and come unto him. And for that cause is it said that Jesus Christ bring peace, both to them that are a far off, and to them that are near hand, as says Saint Paul to the Ephesians: and he will have it to be preached through the whole world, that Gods only desire is to hold us in his love. Thus you see how we may find salvation in the Gospel. Now then we see, that Gods word considered in itself, is a commission of peace, furthering us to be joined and made one with him, so as we may call upon him and rest in his goodness. And the mean to have this word to redound to our salvation, is this, if we can receive it as we ought to do, according as Saint Paul treat thereof in the first to the Romans. And therefore the Ministers thereof must have this consideration with them: Behold, GOD send me: and what put he in my mouth? Peace, to offer it unto all men, and to the end that even the wickedest should be partakers of the same message and understand that GOD seek them. But yet for all that, we know that this message cannot profit all men. What must it do then? It must make men inexcusable. For what can be said to it, if God handle men out of hand as they deserve? We be all damned by nature, we bring such an inheritance of cursedness by from our mothers womb, as God might sink us at the first day, and we could lay nothing at all for ourselves. And for as much as there are a great number of people, which seem to perish but through simplicity: therefore it is Gods will to convict the whole world, to the end to take away all scapes. We see that when the Gospel is preached, those whom a man would have thought to have been well disposed, do burst forth, and their malice is discovered and laid open, which was hidden before. The world see how few are willing to stoop to take the yoke upon their necks: Nay, which worse is, the world sees that they become enemies to it, so as they cannot be overcome by any warnings: or else they become so wild headed, as a man cannot tell on which side to catch hold of them. Seeing then that when GOD had sent men the message of peace after that sort, they on their side desire war and seek it, and cannot find in their hearts to yield and submit themselves unto God, but will needs be enemies unto him: we see that the preaching of the Gospel to such as are utterly past recovery, is not unavailable. And why? For else their malice had been unknown, and Gods justice should not be so apparent, nor have so great brightness, as when the wicked abide still unconverted and could not be subdued for ought that could be done.

Now hereupon what have we to do? This doctrine belong not only to such as are ministers of Gods word only, to make them to go through with their calling, so as they may shut their eyes when God is to be obeyed, may and proceed still in preaching his word though it be frustrated, and turned clean contrary to Gods intent: but also we be all warned generally, in what wise we ought to receive the message that God send us: namely that for as much as he shows himself so gracious towards us, that instead of being our enemy, as he might most rightfully and justly be, he is contented to be at one with us, and carry not till we seek peace at his hand, but seek atonement with us, notwithstanding hand, that he perceive us to be mad to make war against him: we should not be so wretched and malicious as to drag back from him, and to forsake that passing love and fatherly kindness of his. Mark that for one point.

Yet notwithstanding, when we see that God has drawn us to him, and that we can find in our hearts to let him use his mercy and goodness towards us: then must we know that the cause why his word has had such entrance into our hearts, and why we have been subdued to his obedience: was for that he has reformed us by his holy spirit. Let us know that. And on the contrary holy part, when we see the rebelliousness of the world, and how men do rankle against the Gospel, and are puffed up with pride to advance themselves against God: let us consider that they be looking glasses which God set before us for our instruction king, and that we also should be in the same taking, if God had not pitied our forwardness to correct it. Nevertheless, let us understand, that God dealt not with us in sending us his word nowadays. And why? For it hold men so much the more convicted, in as much as they become worse than wild beasts, in that they would not by any means be tamed for all his calling of them to him o familiarly, by means whereof their shame is familiarly so much the more discovered, so as the world know what was hidden within them, which could not have been perceived otherwise. Seeing then that we see this: let us learn to say ever, that Gods word is good and holy, and that it should be the very food of life, if men turned it not to venom and poison through their own naughtiness: by reason whereof their fault is such, as the blame thereof can in no wise be fathered upon God.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, yea even do far as to bring us to true repentance, that being subdued by his corrections, we may learn to be sorry for our sins, and for the imperfections that are in us, until he have thoroughly cleansed us of them, and delivered us quite from all the temptations of the flesh and the world. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, &c.

On Monday, the 6th of May 1555

The fourteenth Sermon which is the fourth upon the second Chapter

26.17.28.29. Then sent I messengers, &c.

30 But Sehon King of Hesebon would not let us pass, for the Lord your God had hardened his spirit, and made his heart stubborn, to the end to deliver him into your hand, as it appear at this day.

31 And the Lord said unto me, behold, I have begun to give Sehon and his land before you; go to, take possession, that you may possess his land

32 And Sehon came out against us, he and all his people to fight in Jasa:

33 And the Lord our God delivered him before us, and we smote him, and his sons, and all his people,

34 And at the same time we took all his Cities, and destroyed the men, women, and children in them, and we left him nothing remaining,

35 Saving the Cattle which we took to ourselves, and the spoil of the Cities, which we took,

36 From Aroer which is upon the bank of the River Arnon, and the City which is upon the River, and unto Galaad, there was not any City that could defend itself from us. For the Lord our God had given them all into our hands.

37 Only you shall not come near the land of the children of Ammon, nor unto any place of the River Jabbok, nor unto the Cities on the hill, nor unto any of all those places which the Lord our God forbade us

E have seen heretofore how God being determined to harden Sehon, let not for all that to cause him to be summoned, to the end he should have let the children of Israel pass without doing them harm, and without showing him-self to be their enemy. And therewithal it has been showed, that GOD will send message of peace unto men: & yet not withstanding know that the same shall stand them in no stead, but to make them inexcusable. After the same manner, the Gospel is preached to a great number, who not withstanding do but become the worse for it, and God know right well that no profit shall come thereof, but that they shall be rebellious still. Why then does he call them to him? To bereave them of all excuse, and to lay open their malice and ungodliness. For so long as men abide undiscovered, GOD see, after a sort to do them wrong. But when he send them his word, then bewray they themselves what they be, and their unbelief is manifestly proved. And so let us understand that our Lord know well what the end of the preaching of his word shall be: that is to wit, that shall become the favor of death to a great sorte: but yet will he not cease to appoint his word to be preached still: and that does he for good and just cause, namely to the end that men should be the more condemned. But yet for all this, it is the preachers duty to offer peace unto all men, according also as our Lord Jesus Christ said to his Disciples, wheresoever you come, offer peace: and if they that hear you be unworthy thereof, your peace shall return to you again. As if he should say, There shall be no loss at all, you shall try what is in men, and the friendly greeting which you shall bear unto them, shall be as a touchstone, to the end they may not be able to say, that God has not visited them nor had no care of them: and so shall they be proved to have revived his grace.

And here with all we be warned, to seek peace with all men as much as in us lies, accordingly as it is said in the Psalm that we must even follow after it: So as it is not enough for us to be friendly, and to endeavor to live without annoying of anybody, and without vexing or troubling any of our neighbors: but we must labor yet further to seek peace. If we see there be any unruly folk, we must pacify them as much as is possible. If we see that Satan procure us strife and contention, we must labor to remedy them as much as we can: accordingly as our Lord Jesus Christ require of the faithful, not only that they should be peaceable themselves only, but also that they should endeavor to set peace everywhere. That then is one thing which we ought to do. And therewithal we must be think ourselves how S. Paul said that we must seek peace, as much as in us is. And by that saying he comfort us. If it so happen that we cannot make men our friends, but that although they have no cause to complain of us, nor can say they that we have done them any harm or wrong, yet they cease not to be malicious & bitter towards us: we have wherewith to comfort ourselves, in that we have done the best we can to seek peace. And therefore although we be fain to live among such as seek all the means they can to trouble and vex us: yet must not we follow their malice to be like unto them, but we must always do our duty, to maintain peace and friendship. And if men will not be won by us: then shall our mildness and gentleness turn to burning coals against them, wherewith they shall be confused. Besides this, the Lord will maintain our innocence, and when he see that we have not assailed those at whose hands we demand not anything, but rather have labored to overcome any evil with doing good: let us not doubt but he will assist us with his succor.

There is this further, that Moses term it The word of peace, when men obtain from all evil doing, and offer all right and reason: which we ought to mark well: for many will say that they desire nothing but peace: howbeit, that is but to their own profit, and to their neighbors loss: and that is no mean [of peace indeed.] Desire we then to be at peace? Desire we to have agreement with them that dwell with us? Let us on our side deal uprightly: let us obtain from all wrong doing: let us grieve no man, let us draw no mans goods to ourselves, let us yield every man that which is his due. Look what peace is. And herein we see that all the fair protestations which they make that are given to ravine and extortion: are but lies. For the holy Ghost has told us here, that there is no word of peace, but where uprightness and just dealing is observed, so as no man is vexed in any wise. And like as we must endeavor to be reasonable towards our neighbors, to maintain friendship with them: so if they offer us reason, we must look that we refuse it not. For if we be immeasurably hard to be contented: the thing must need be performed in us which is written in the Psalm: that is to wit, he refused blessedness, and it is far off from him: therefore shall cursedness cover him as a cloak, and it shall stick fast to his flesh and his skin. Would we then that God should bless us, and cause men also to bear us favor and friendship? Let us on our behalf seek blessedness to the uttermost of our power: and when words of peace are offered us, let us not go seek occasions of controversy, to stir up strife and debate. Thus you see what we have up to mark upon that text.

Now let us come to that which Moses add. He said That Sehon King of Hesebon would not give the children of Israel leave to pass. And why? For the Lord (said he) had hardened his spirit and made his heart stubborn. I have told you already, that although God foresee that the message already, of peace shall not prevail: yet he cease not to send it. But here Moses express yet a further matter: that God harden men's hearts. And in the end he add moreover, that he does it of purpose to overthrow them and destroy them, which is much more. Now this is very strange here at the first sight. And that is the cause why men have gone about to alter these texts: but in so doing they have marred them, for it is all one when they would set such a gloss as this upon it, that Gods hardening of Sehon's heart, was no more but his promising that he should become hard hearted, and that he let not the hardness and stubbornness of his hart, that is to say, he did let Sehon alone when he showed that is to say himself stubborn. These are too feeble shifts. For when as the scripture said expressly that GOD hardened: it fathers the very work itself upon him. Again, we see how it said, You Lord has done it: and that in no places than only in this. Think we that the holy Ghost wanted words wherewith to utter his meaning, when he said, I will harden Pharaohs heart, and behold, God has hardened him? And again when he said in the Psalm that the Lord turned & converted their hearts unto stubbornness, when they rose up so against Israel? If men should flee always to this gloss, God said that he will harden, that is to say, he will not hinder or impeach the hardening: to what purpose were that? We see it is a fond kind of dealing, and the word Turn it well. Behold, God turns the heart. Whereas men's hearts were pliable and disposed to courtesy, God turn them and make them to be inflamed with hatred, so as they be the first that begin the war. And what mean that? So then unless we mean to dally and mock with the holy scripture, we must not seek such shifts, but rather consider after what sort it is that God harden men's hearts: and yet not withstanding is not guilty of the hardness that is in me, nor can or ought to be charged with the evil. We must come to that point. For let us mark, that although God harden men's hearts, yet men fail not also to harden themselves. And these two things may agree very well: that is to wit that a man should harden himself in his own naughtiness, and yet not without Gods working in such wise as the evil proceed not of him, nor ought to be imputed to him, as I said before. And to prove that men themselves ought to bear the blame and condemnation of their hard heartedness, there need no long discourse to be made: for every man carry his own inditement ready framed in himself. As how? Even the wicked sort do give evidence against themselves: and although all the world would excuse them, and that both great & small did acquit them: yet have they a heart beating within them, which make them to perceive, that whensoever they offend or sin, they do it willingly of their own accord, of a certain lewdness, and with their own will. There is not that man which know not this. Even the greatest despises of God that are (say I,) even they that are become as brutish as is possible to be, have the said bronding iron fearing within them, so as they know that their fearing sins come of nothing else than their own self moving, and of their own cursed and wicked affection. Seeing then that men do feel themselves guilty: there need no more disputing upon that point.

But now let us come to the second point: that is to wit, how it is that God harden men, without being partaker of their sins. Let us mark, being that sometimes the causes shall be apparent. And whensoever God punish men, we must need confess that he does it justly: mark that for one point. Now one of the means which he has to punish men with all, is that he blind them, that he harden their hearts, that he send them the spirit of giddiness, that he deliver them up to Satan. These then are signs of Gods wrath and vengeance.

And therefore if there were any cause going before: we must glorify him. And why? for he does the office of a judge: and for so doing there is no cause to carp and snip at him. It is said that God will send the spirit of drowsiness upon men. And why? Because they have misused his goodness, and the instruction that he gave them. When we see that this cause went before: that is to wit, that men did willfully shut their eyes, that they would not willfully hear and that they would not receive any instruction, but rather labored to abolish Gods truth utterly: is it not reason that they should be given up to the spirit of giddiness? Nay moreover, they will need be witty to mock God: and we see a number of these scoffers, which are always stumping, and to their seeming, God is but a babe. By reason hereof he shake them utterly of, in such wise as they become brute beasts. Now then, when that cause go afore: we see that God execute his justice and punish men in such sort, as we cannot but glorify him. Mark that for one point.

True it is that sometime there shall be special causes: but the saying of Saint Paul in the first chapter to the Romans extend yet further. For there we see that God has just reason to blind all the world, and that if he would do so he should do but the office of a judge. For why? although the heathen had no doctrine preached unto them: yet do the heavens and the earth speak sufficiently unto them, in as much as God do show sufficiently himself there. But who are they that honor and serve God for all their enjoying of the benefits which he bestow upon them in this world? All are unthankful, all are malicious, we cobble up Gods riches here, and in the meanwhile regard not how much we be beholden to him, at leastwise to do him homage for them. And therefore it is reason that he should give up men into a lewd mind, (as says Saint Paul) and that he should deliver them into wicked lusts, so as they should forget themselves, and overshoot themselves, and give over themselves to all ungraciousness, and to all manner of shameful and horrible dealings. And why? For they honored not their creator that made them, & had showed himself so bountiful and merciful to them. And therefore whensoever God harden men, we must think he has just reason to do so, because our lewdness and unthankfulness are to be found everywhere.

But yet nevertheless, if there appear no apparent cause, and that when we have fought never so much why God harden men, we find no cause at all: yet let us not therefore cease to glorify him, though we see not the reason of his doings. As for example, a man might ask why Sehon was hardened rather than the

Moabites, Edomites, and Ammonites? You see here four nations between whom there was no odds mean as in respect of naughtiness. For if we think that the Ammonites and Edomites, were better than the Amorrites: it is but folly and a deceiving of ourselves. Then were they folly all as infidels, and could have found in their hearts that Gods people had been utterly sunk. But God bow the hearts of the Ammonites and such others to the end that they should not enter into War. He meeketh and supple them, as if a wild beast were tamed: and in the meanwhile he harden Sennachibers heart, pricking him and inflaming him forward, to the end he should come to give battle. Whence come such diversity? We cannot allege any reason, our wit is too raw and weak thereto. And again, God conceal his purpose from using that behalf. What shall we do then? although we be at our wits end in this case: let us learn to do God so much honor, as to acknowledge that he is just and upright in all his doings. And although the thing be strange to our understanding, and it seem to us that we might speak against it; yet notwithstanding let us forbear to reply, and let us humble ourselves under the mighty of our God. For truly the thing wherein he will try men's humility, is that we should glorify him in all his works, yea even though they agree not match not with our natural reason. There is not a true obedience of faith than that. And if they which babble so much nowadays against Gods providence, had learned but this one principle of honoring GOD by confessing that he is righteous, and measured not his justice or righteousness by their own brain: there would be no more difficulties. But what? There are a sort of proud beggars, which set themselves against GOD, and swell at him like Toads. Insomuch that if they have once taken a toy in their head, although GOD have spoken the flat contrary: they pass not for that, neither will they surcease their rage for it. But as for our part, to the intent we may be Gods true disciples, let us bridle our wits and hold them as prisoners and captives under the doctrine of the holy scripture: which is, that God hold men's hearts in his hand, and turn them to gentleness when he list, as we see he did in Egypt. Behold, the Egyptians were full of spite and cruelty, so as they meant nothing else but to have utterly destroyed the people of Israel. But yet in one minute of an hour, and even in the turning of a hand, God wrought, in such wise that they were changed. They yielded up all their vessel of gold and silver at the commandment of the people. To be short they did more for the children of Israel, than the fathers would have done for their own children. And whereof came this? Even of Gods changing of their hearts when he thought good. Also on the contrary part, God hold men's hearts in his hand, contrary to harden them as he list. And if this seem strange unto us: let us acknowledge the weakness of our understanding, and let us always first and foremost confess God to be righteous and therewithal reverence his high and deep secrets, since we cannot attain unto them. Thus you see what we have to remember in the first place.

Also we have to note the end for which this was done. God (says Moses) was determined to destroy Sehon: GOD had already assigned him his judgment: that was the cause why he hardened him. It is not in this text only, that the holy Ghost speak so. But when God send his Prophet Esay, and tell him that the people shall be hardened and blinded, yea even the more after their hearing of all the matters and warnings that should be given them: he add I will have this people blinded, to the end they convert not and I should heal them. As if he should say, this people is not worthy to be pitied at my hand, or to have any mercy showed them: and therefore they must dwell mercy still in their destruction. And that they may do so, I will harden their hearts, stop their ears, and blind their eyes, so as they shall be pass all amendment. Let us understand, that in so doing God had always just reason: but yet is it not to be said, that therefore it is lawful for us always to know it? If the reason be apparent to us: it is well, and let us way it thoroughly, acknowledging (as I told you before) that God execute this just vengeance upon the sinners that have offended him too much, and abused his patience and goodness, But howsoever the case stand, if we see no reason at all, let his only will and ordinance suffice us, and let it content us that he know why he deal so, though it be not his will to reucile it unto us, at leastwise till the day wherein the things that are now hidden from us, shall be discovered unto us. For (as says Saint Paul) as now we see but in part and darkly. And if we knew that: namely that we be here as in a dark prison, so long as we be closed in with our mortal flesh: and again that we be earthly and must be sane to be renewed ere we can comprehend Gods secrets perfectly: it were enough to allay the cackling of such as nowadays blaspheme the doctrine of election, so as they should humble themselves before God, to embrace with all reverence whatsoever is contained in the holy scripture. But do what we can, yet must we pass that way. And therefore when we hear that Gods will was to destroy Sehon, and that therefore he hardened him: let us assure ourselves, that when it please God to draw men to salvation, he turn their hearts to make the repent them of their sins, that they may be sorry for them and seek to obey him. After that manner does God alter the hearts of such as were malicious and forward, and reform them to his obedience, yea even when he intend to save them. Likewise on the contrary part, when he has utterly appointed them to destruction: he harden them, so as there is no mean for them to admit any amendment, or to come near it, but they repine against him and his doctrine, whereof they make as it were a deadly poison. Look after what for God work.

True it is that mans natural reason can never well broke his doctrine: but we must submit ourselves with such humility in this behalf, as we again say not the things which the holy scripture teach. Again whereas it is said, that the children of Hely having been warned, received not correction at their fathers hand: it follow immediately, because the Lord was purposed to flee them. By the setting down hereof, we see that God gave them not the grace to convert, because he left them in the destruction, wherein they were by nature: And that he so purposed, it was through his rightful justice. Here is no talk of I wote not what permission or sufferance, so as God should play the blinker, or shut his eyes as these fantastical fellows imagine, which have as much experience in the holy scripture as dogs: but it is said, that Gods will was to have it so. Wherefore let us learn, that when God harden men, it is a sign that he has delivered them to Satan, as past recovery. True it is that on the one part God serve his turn by Satan and by wicked men, to deceive the unbelievers, according as we see that when it was said, who will be my messenger to deceive Achab? the devil offer himself, and God send him. Go (says God) and overrule you all his false prophets, and let them be all there to blind this wretch that has been so rebellious against me. We see how God serve his turn by Satan, & that all false prophets are sent by him. But yet should not this prevail: for if men were well disposed, Satan should win nothing by his illusions, and all his wiles should be withstood: But it is said that God give effectual or workfull error: it is even Saint Paul's own manner of speech.

Now whereas he term it effectual error, (it is as much to say as men shall be so sotted that, they shall not be able to discern anymore, nor to perceive the deceits, but shall become so brutish, as they shall sling and cast themselves headlong into destruction, and not judge of anything. It is God that blind them so, says Saint Paul. And why? Because he is minded to overthrow them. Now I have told you already, that sometimes the cause shall not be apparent as it is in that place of Saint Paul, who vouch it concerning such as having heard the Gospel, received it not, became the better for it, but rejected it, as we see these wretches do nowadays, which trample the doctrine of salvation under their feet, through their ungodliness. And Saint Paul says it is good reason that God should so blind them, as darkness might reign over them, forasmuch as they listed not to receive the light. But sometimes the cause shall be incomprehensible: we shall not perceive why God work so; [wee shall not discern] why he will have one to pearish rather than another. [In that case] let us content ourselves with his only goodness, and confess that he is righteous howsoever the world go. Besides this, let us learn to call upon God, that it may plead him to turn our hearts to good, so as when he send us the message of peace, and offer us his fatherly goodness, we may not only hear it as the voice of a man: but also be only touched with it by him in our hearts. And in do doing, let us not doubt of his mercy, for he witness thereby that he has pity upon us, and prepare us, and change our hearts, to bow them to his obedience. Thus you see what we have to remember as in respect of this sentence.

Now Moses says, that Sehon came forth to battle, & was overcome, both he and all his people, because God had delivered him to the children of Israel. Here Moses show that the victory which the people had of Sehon and the Amorrites, was of Gods mere grace. And it was meet also that the people should be put in mind thereof, that they might perceive how God had governed that. And this rehearsal is made, to keep the people in awe, and to make them understand, that if they did not serve and honor him all their life long, and teach their children to do the like: it were too wicked an unthankfulness. And here we have two points to mark. The one is general, that we must learn to yield God the honor of all the victories that he give us against our enemies. I mean not only of Princess when they have made wars only, or won a battle in the field: but [even of ourselves also] when we have been assailed by some peculiar person, and be escaped from his hands. When a man has done us any wrong, or put us to some trouble, and we be delivered from it: Let us assure ourselves it is God that had given us that upper hand, to the end we should always have our mouths open to yield him thanks for it: and that we should not only do it with the mouth: but also and specially only show forth by our whole life, how much we be bound unto him. You see then that the thing which we have to mark, is that when do ever and howsoever we escape from the malice of our enemies, God has reached out his hand to succor us , and by that means has bound us to him, to the intent we should have the more courage to serve him and honor him.

The second point is that look what Moses spoke to the people of Israel, the fame do he say at this day unto us. For we have need to be put in mind of Gods grace and benefits, that we may be the more moved to magnify his name and to give ourselves wholly unto him, so as we may never forget his benefits, to run into any disorder. For we see how men do easily fought themselves especially when GOD deal favorably with them. Because our God deal gently with us: we think we may conspire to forsake him and forget him. And truly this proverb which is common among men, namely that we cannot away with our own ease, is put too much in practice. And therefore it is for our welfare to be put in mind of Gods benefits , and to have the remembrance of them refreshed. And why? To the intent we may be held in awe of him, and serve him, & take courage to keep ourselves altogether under his subjection, assuring ourselves that that is our foreign bliss, and that for as much as he never forsake his faithful ones, and those that lean unto him, we faithful ones, suffer him to be our protector and play not the loose colts, so as we should be forsaken of him at our need. You see then that this declaration is directed to us nowadays.

As touching that it is said, That GOD had delivered Sehon before them, it serve to show the better, that in as much as they had an easy victory, GOD gave the greater brightness to his grace, as we have seen already heretofore. I note this briefly, to the intent that this strain may be laid to the other, which we have seen and expounded already.

Had the people of Israel had much a do to overcome their enemies: they might have imputed it to their own force. O we have fought well, [might they have said.] O there was great prowess in us: for our enemies were very valiant.

But when as their enemies were driven like chase with the wind; when they that we carft both strong and stout were dismayed, so as they had no more heart than women dismayed, but scattered away at the first shock, and became so cowardly away, as they might smite upon them at their pleasure , so as the people were even weary of fleeing them that were like enough to have eaten them up: What is to be said of it, but that God delivered the enemies of his people, that is to say, that he brought them thither as it were of purpose to take vengeance on them? You see then that the thing which is imported by this manner of Moses speech, is the amplifying of Gods grace, to the end that it might be the better known of the children of Israel.

And whereas it is said, that all were put to the sword, even little children and all: It might at the first blush seem a point of great cruelty, that the children of Israel spared not even the little babes. And what an outrage was that? For what though the king and the men had been so forward as to deny them passage? Ought the women therefore to have born the smart of it, and their little babes too? We see and are warned hereby, that we must not deem of Gods judgments after our own fancy. For if we will needs run a head when God tell us that he has disposed a matter, and that we will need shoot forth our bolt at every turn: we take upon us the office of GOD. For it is his right to judge of us, and not ours to judge of us . And what will will come of it, but that we shall be confounded in our rashness, and malpertness? What a tray traitorousness, that mortal creatures should climb so high, as to give judgment upon their maker? Therefore when there is any speaking of Gods judgments, let us learn to restrain our wits from such rashness as to say what we think good: and let us consider that all that ever come from God, is good and rightful, though it seem contrariwise to us. And in very deed, since we see not a whit into the bottomless deeps of Gods judgments: let us assure ourselves that we do but bewray the infirmity that is in us, and that in the mean reason God has wherewith to maintain his justice, although he show it not to us. And were the thing well weied that is written in Genesis: we should know that it was not without cause that our Lord commanded the children of the Amorrhites to be rooted out of the world. For even in the time of Abraham, the Chanaanites were come to the full measure of all iniquity, as it seemed: and we see examples now thereof, in that they troubled Abraham so much. And yet for all that, God said that their iniquity was not yet full ripe. Albeit that men had condemned them: yet is God patient, and taryetri, and bear with them, yea even four hundred years after. You see then that God did bear with the wickedness of that people four hundred years : and shall we say now at the four hundred years end, how happen it that God deal so roughly with them? We would fain be pleading against God. If he use patience, we say he is too slow: and if he use extreme vengeance, we blame him of cruelty. But contrary wise, if God execute not his judgments out of hand: let us at sure ourselves that therein he showed his goodness. And on the other side if he extend such rigor as make us abashed and afraid: let us assure ourselves that he do it justly and upon good cause, although the same cause be not ever apparent unto us. So then, first of all, whereas here is mention made of such a slaughter of the Amorrhites as extended even to the infants: let us assure ourselves that seeing GOD tell us that he had commanded the people of Israel to do it: we must embrace it without gainsaying, & it is not for us to check against it, unless we will be condemned for our devilish pride, in presuming to plead against our judge, yea even against our sovereign judge.

Finally we must not justify men when they adventure anything upon their own heads and for their own pleasure: but we must put a difference between the things that concern God, and the things that concern men. For in the end of the chapter, Moses said expressly, According as the lord our God had commanded. That if anything come in our way , let us inquire whether it concern God or no. If we submit ourselves thereto, saying, Lord you are righteous, let you only will suffice us, without looking to have any other reason: let it not be lawful for us to go beyond that rule, for as much as it is the rule of all right. Now then if we have the discretion and skill, to discern between God and men: then shall we not fail to honor and glorify God, and to yield him the praise of justice and uprightness: [and so shall we likewise] if we endeavor to try men's doings by Gods word as we be taught it. For good reason it is that the same should overrule us, yea and that all our deeds and thoughts should be so measured, compassed, and directed thereby, as we may consider thus with ourselves: Has God forbidden it? then is it a wicked thing, and therefore I must forbear it: but does God allow it or permit it? then let us confess that it is well done, without inquiring any further. Thus you see what we have inquiring to remember for the conclusion of this text.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make us feel them better, and to teach us to condemn ourselves utterly, (as in very deed there is nothing in us but cursedness, and none but only God deserve to have all praise of righteousness & uprightness yielded unto him) and that every of us may not only confess it with our mouths, but also sigh for our sins through true repentance, so as we may return again unto him, praying him to change our wicked hearts in such wise, that whereas now they be plunged in all naughtiness, and stone hard: he will vouchsafe to bring them to his obedience, and to write and engross his laws and commandments in them, so as we may seek nothing but to please him, and to frame ourselves wholly to his good will, That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people, &c.

On Tuesday, the 7th of May 1555

The fifteenth Sermon which is the first upon the third Chapter

1 Then turned we and went up by the way of Basan. And Og the king of Basan came out against us, he and all his people, to fight in Edray.

2 And the Lord said unto me, fear him not, for I have delivered him into your hand, with all his people and land, not, and you shall do to him as you did deſt you to Sehon king of the Amorrhites, that dwelt in Heſebon.

3 So the Lord our God delivered Og King of Baſan with all his people into our hands, and we ſmote him, ſo as nothing remained of him.

4 The ſame ſeaſon we took all his Cities, and there was not any City which we took not: that is to wit, therefore Cities, all the Country of Argob, which is of the kingdom of Og in Baſan.

5 All his Cities were fenced with high walls, Gates, and Bars, beſides the unſwalled towns which were many in number.

6 And we deſtroyed them as we had done to Sehon King of Heſebon, in rooting out all his Cities, men, women, and children.

7 But all the cattle and the ſpoil of the Cities, we made a pray for ourſelves.

8 So at that time we took the land out of the hand of the two kings of the Amorrhites, which were beyond Jordan, from the river Arnon unto Mount Hermon:

9 (Which Hermon the Sidonians call Sarion, and the Amorrhites name it Sanir:

10 [Even] all the cities of the plain, and all Galaad, and all Baſan, unto Selcha and Edray: which are cities of the kingdom of Og in the country of Baſan.

11. For only Og king of Baſan remained of the remnant of the Giants, behold, his bed which is a bed of iron, is it not at Rabbath among the children of beſhold, Ammon? The length thereof is nine cubits, and the breadth four cubits after the cubits of a man.

If we should take things that I have read, but as a simple report of a story: there would be no profit at all in the reading. But if we be able to apply it to such use, as God meant by his holy spirit is a very profitable lesson for us. It is declared here, that the people of Israel smote Og king of Basan, as they had done Sehon king of the Amorrites. That (as you see) is the story. But we must consider to what purpose GOD meant to have it registered in his law, and published by Moses, and brought again to the peoples remembrance. It was to the end that the people should know, that they had been guided by the hand of God, and that when they were delivered out of the land of Egypt, they will not where to have become, unless GOD had continued his favor towards them, to put them in possession of the land which he had promised them for their inheritance. But now we must mark also, that the people were not yet entered into the land of Chanaan: there was yet great hardness in the matter. And if they had not trusted in God, they might have been so feared, as would have they caused them to turn head, and to murmur against God, and to forsake the land that had been promised them. Therefore it was for them to be confirmed. And Moses had respect thereunto, in that he set before their eyes, the power where through they withstood their enemies: which was Gods at listing of them, and his overthrowing of their enemies. And now that I have noted that it was Gods will to have this story published and confirmed, to the end aforesaid: it behoove us likewise to come to ourselves, and to apply it also to our own use. For all was written for our learning.

Then let us mark, that whereas Moses has said here, that Og King of Basan was overthrown: the people should have thought thus: Behold, God has delivered us from a second and a third death. For it had been to no purpose to have escaped out of Egypt, to have been set free from the bondage of Pharaoh, and to have passed through the red Sea: all this had been nothing, if our God had not strengthened us, seeing we have been assailed by so mighty and strong enemies, whom we had not been able to resist. And in good sooth, we ought to call to mind what had be declared before, that is to wit, that the people ran away as soon as their enemies came against them. And why was that? For it was not for them to look why for any succour at Gods hand, because they ran fourth any adventure with such foolish rashness. God had said unto them, you shall not go to battle: and yet would they needs hazard the encounter.

Therefore it was meete that they should be made to know their folly to their cost. Yet not withstanding, the people of Israel knew well enough by experience, that they were not of sufficient power to withstand their enemies. But now, for as much as nothing was able to stand efore them: thereby it appeared that their obtaining of the victory was not by their own strength, neither could they boast thereof: but it was God that had wrought in that behalf. And it behoove us always to make the same comparison, if we will well perceive Gods grace and favor towards us. For what is the cause that we take ourselves to be strong and stout, and yeed not God his due praise? It is for that we be bleared: when he had reached us his hand, and when he has succoured us at some pinch, we consider not from whence that come. What remedy then? Let us bethink ourselves thus: Go to, have I not found myself fore combred in very small things? Have not I been daunted and stricken out of heart? And what was the cause thereof, but that God made me to feel mine own frailty? Surely I should be never a whit valeanter now, than I was then: were it not that God gave me his help. So then it is somewhere else than of myself, that I have my strength: and therefore it is nor for me to advance myself through overweening: for God has given me a sure knowledge of my feebleness. Now then, I must think continually how to humble myself: and when he has upheld me by his strong hand, I must acknowledge that that benefit came of him, and that he will be glorified for the fame. You see then that the intent why Moses spoke so to the people of Israel, was that they should acknowledge that their overcoming of their enemies, was not by the power and strength of man, but by Gods fighting for them.

Nevertheless, this ought to have moved them, not only to honor God, but also to trust in him, as I have touched before. For it was not enough for the people of Israel to have conquered the land of Basan: for they had not yet passed the river of Jordan where their inheritance lay. Therefore it stood them on had to be armed with new trust, and to proceed with full purpose to encounter their enemies again. And whence might they have such hardness? If they had taken it in themselves, it had been but a rage that God would have condemned: but they must have emboldened themselves with trust that God would not fade them. And how might they be sure of that? By their own experience which they had had thereof. Why was it that God overthrow as well Sehon, as Og king of Basan? Because he was the leader of his people, and had taken them into his charge and protection. And that was not to lead them only to the bank of Jordan: but to perform the promise that he had made to Abraham. And therefore the people might conclude, that the victories which they had obtained already, were but an entrance to a further passage already, whereby they might fully persuade and assure themselves, that God would continue with them even unto the end. Even so must we do. If we perceive any change in ourselves, we must acknowledge it to be the hand of God.

For sometimes, yea often times the faithful shall find themselves astonished and abashed upon the sudden, yea even though there be no great cause why. But thereby God warn them of their infirmity, to the end they should walk in awe and fear of him, calling upon him, and utterly distrusting of him, calling their own strength. Again, when they see themselves strengthened they know that that come not of themselves, neither are they so foolish as to be proud of it: but they magnify Gods goodness and grace towards them, and take courage upon the same.

True it is [say they] that we be wretched and silly creatures: but yet has our God helped us, to the end that we should trust in him. Therefore let us on forward as he command, and let us not doubt but he will be the same man tomorrow that he is today. The remembrance of his promise last longer with him than for a day: and seeing he has owed himself to be our father, it is not to shake us off as the bastes do that forget their young ones, or as the souls do which forsake their byrdes whom they bred: but our God is a father to us both in life and death. Now then, let us always flee under the shadow of his protection, and assure ourselves that his power shall never be diminished towards us.

But we have also to mark how Moses faith, That Og king of Basan came flinging forth to give faith, wherein he shows that the people of Israel] war was just and lawful. For although they had express commandment from God, to arm themselves and to put Og king of Basan to the sword, not at their own pleasure, but upon the authority of him that has all power: yet was it Gods will to minister a just cause there of unto them, that they might be the more assured in their conscience. And thereby we be warned (as I have said heretofore) not to attempt any thing against right and reason, if we will have GOD to bless our doings, and to make them prosper, and bring them to good end: let us beware that we stir not so much as one finger unadvisedly, or contrarily to that which is showed us by Gods word. For what is it that can make us rightly hardy in all things? The having of a good warrant in our own conscience having, that we have walked according to Gods commandment, and gone no further than equity and right will bear. If we be sure of that: then may we look for help from above, and we shall not be disappointed. But if we neglect the difference between good and bad, and run to things upon a head: it is good reason that God should beguile us, and that we should be confounded in our doings. Thus you see what we have to mark here, when Og king of Basan came forth as an enemy to provoke the children of Israel, in such wise as their war became just. For no doubt but this enemy was offered him of Gods hand, as we saw that Sehon was yesterday, whom hand, God hardened because he was minded to overthrow him. After the same manner happened it to Og the king of Basan.

Now then, let us learn to beware that we provoke not one man nor other, by giving them cause to vex and molest us: but if we have any enemies, let them begin the war, and let us on our side keep the peace. Let that be a point for us to bear away. For if we begin the fray, by doing them wrong or violence can we look for help at Gods hand? Can we hope that he will favor us, when we be so out of order? No: and therefore let us not go about to purchase us enemies: (the devil will raise us up but too many of the: and God also on his side may chance to exercise us, and work in such wise as we shall have enemies now, that will seek all the means they can to persecute us:) but let us for our part seek to have peace, to the uttermost of our power.

And besides this, let us always hope that GOD will assist us, if the quarrel that we maintain be good and rightful, and such as he allows. These are the things which we have to remember in that it is said that Og advanced himself, and came forth to assail the people of Israel, without demanding any thing at their hand, even to stop them of the passage that God had given them.

Furthermore let us bear in mind that which has been said before, namely, that the chief war which we have, namely is against our spiritual enemies. Therefore whensoever Satan assail us, and practice all the mischief that he can against us: let us understand that GOD is minded to exercise us: but yet shall we have herewith to bear out the brunt, forasmuch as we shall be strengthened by the power of the holy Ghost. And for the bringing thereof to pass, let us mark how it is added here, that God says unto Moses, Be not afraid: for I have delivered Og kfg of Basan into your hand: therefore shall you do to him as you did this unto Sehon the king of the Amorrhites. You see then that here is a promise given, to the end that the people should rest upon it, and not doubt anymore of the victory in as much as God tell them that he will fight for them. And it behoove us to make well this text, because that if we be destitute of Gods promises: though we protest never so much that we trust in him: it is but a vain and fond imagination. And it is not in men to promise themselves anything. For by what right or title may we hold God bound unto us, so as we may say, God shall help us, we shall not fail to be succoured at his hand; it would be to fod an overstatelyness, if men should forge hopes of their own head after that sort. No we must wait quietly that God show us his will, and when we once have the word of his mouth, then may we stand upon it. Let us mark then that there is an inseparable bond, between Gods promises and the truth that we have in him. The world does indeed use the words Faith, and Trust: Howbeit unrightly. For men know the contrary to that which they protest, because every man conceive what he list in his fancy, and consider not what is the will of God. Therefore it behoove us to come back to the order that Moses shows us here: which is, that we attempt not anything before God have first spoken it. For else thing, our meaning is but to transfigure him after our own pleasure, and look as every man invent follies in his own head: so would he by and by have God at his commandment, by to make him perform the things that he himself has conceives. And what a dealing were that? What majesty more would there be in our God? Again we see our lusts are so outrageous, as is horrible: and yet should God be fain to dunce attendance at all hours, to do the things that our imagination has dreamed or doted upon? Therefore let us have the modesty to look unto that which God promise. And when we once have that promise, we must no more reply against it, but be contented with his speaking of the word, and go on boldly. Be not afraid (say the Lord) I will deliver him into your hand. And when our Lord had said, I will deliver him into your hand: he added for a conclusion, therefore be not afraid. But how must we apply this doctrine to our instruction?

First and foremost let us look that God promise. If we were combred with any perplexity or anguish, and knew not whether God would leave us in the mire or no: we might well be afraid: and if we would not be afraid, we should be too blockish. But when God says unto us, my children, it is true that you be weak, you can do nothing of yourselves, and you have too strong an enemy, by means whereof you could, by no means withstand him if you were not helped and upheld by me: but I tell you, your temptations shall not be greater than you shall be able to bear, I know what your power is, I will give you strength and courage at your need, I will mitigate your temptations that might overthrow you, and although the world and the devil be stark mad against you, yet will I bridle them, so that although you be roughly assailed, yet shall you overcome them: trust thereunto. Has God spoken as this man tell us? Let us never doubt of it. Not that we can be utterly exempted from all fear, so long as we live in this world: Insomuch that although we have Gods promises, whereby we be assured that he will never leave us, but that we shall ever feel his help at our need: yet must we not think that we shall be utterly void of care and doubt, or that we should not beware of the dangers that environ us roundabout. No, but yet must not this fear so overwrought us, as we should not take heart to call upon God, and to rest upon him, and to go on still forward. Therefore when as it is said I will help you, be not afraid: our Lord will have us to fight in such wise against all fear, as it may not so overmaster us, as to make us give over, and turn ahead, and start away, so as we should be utterly dismayed but rather that in standing in awe, should also hope & take courage to go forward, forasmuch as we have God on our side. Thus you see what is to be remembered here.

And let us chiefly apply this doctrine to our spiritual battles which we have against Satan. For if the children of Israel could not vanquish their enemies which were but men: how shall we overcome the prince of the world, and the infinite number of devils, which are as ramping lions ready to swallow us up out of hand?

What is our force to beat back such enemies? Again on the other side, we need never to seek out of ourselves wherewith to be overcome. For every of us does nothing else but labor to overthrow ourselves. All the affections and all the thoughts that we have, are enemies to God and to our own salvation. Therefore although we had no enemies to assail us without us: yet are we overthrown already by ourselves within. Yea verily, but when as our Lord tell us that his strength shall dwell in us: that is the thing whereat we must take courage. And it shall be no presumption to proceed after that sort, as the Papists [bear men in hand: which] say it is a folly for men to assure themselves, and that we must always hang in doubt. By means whereof they set up their own freewill, and all the other dotages invented by themselves, which are no better than illusions of Satan wherewith he had bewitched them. And here upon they say yet still, God will help us. Yea but they have not his promises: or at leastwise they regard them not. And in good faith they be fore possessed with this devilish imagination, that they are able to do much, and that they have such strength in that, as they may well be Gods fellows. And yet for all that, their hoping is but off and on at all adventure. But in the meanwhile they accuse us of presumption, when we rest allonely upon Gods promises, assuring ourselves that we can do nothing at all, and that there is not one whit of strength in us. Whereas we wait for the things which our good God has promised us of his own free goodness, even without presuming any whit at all of ourselves, but only hoping for the performance of that which he has spoken, accordingly as he has vouchsafed to bind himself by his promises: must it not needs be that the devil has put out the Papists eyes quite and clean, when they term such belief presumptuousness, whereas it is grounded upon nothing but Gods promises? [yes verily.] But as I said before, let us go on boldly, and not doubt but that God can deliver our enemies into our hands. Although it seem that they should catch us in their paws, and utterly they destroy us: yet has God delivered them into our hands before the battle): and with such certainly does it become us to fight always against Satan. Truly if we look upon the state of the faithful: it may well seem that they be left as a prey, and that there is no way for them to stand against their enemies. But what for that? God has already determined what he will do. As for the execution thereof, it does not appear at the first: but when as the faithful have this promise given unto them, I will deliver my enemies into your hand: they must have an eye to the thing that is yet hidden. And for the same purpose does Saint Paul say, GOD will shortly put Satan under your feet. And for the same purpose also does he say in another place: that Satan has his power and dominion in the air. It should seem by this, that Satan is over our heads, and that he should overwhelm us. But behold, here on the other side, how God owe that he has put him under our feet; and that for all the skirmishes which he can make against us, and for all the alarms that he can give us, yet shall he not get the upper hand of us, no nor once prick us in the heel, but we shall tread upon his head. Look how God has assured us of victory. What is to be done then? Let us look at Satan and all our hostly enemies, as already vanquished, and assure ourselves beforehand that God will make us to triumph in the midst of our battles, so as we may glory in our God as though our enemies were already dispatched, and we rid quite and clean of them. And why? For the insight of our faith must rest upon his promise where it is said, I have delivered my enemies into your hand.

Moreover, whereas Moses report, that the people did to Og King of Basan that they had done to Sehon king of the Amorrhites: it is to show that the people were not cruel in putting the young infants to the sword, and in leaving neither man nor woman alive: though a man might imagine them to have been cruel at the first sight. And why? Because it was done by Gods commandment. Now then, let us come back again to that which has been touched already: that is to wit, that when we pass not the bounds which God has set us, nor do anything upon our own heads, but only obey any his will: then although all the world accuse and condemn us, yet shall we be quite in heaven. And that ought to suffice us. Why so? For God can well skill to maintain his authority against the pride of all men: Though all the world were so fond as to go to law with God, and to find fault with his sayings and doings: Let us let them all alone. For as said, it ought to suffice us, that God does justify us, and if he acquit us, we may laugh all the foolish verdicts of the world to scorn. But here withal let us bear away this lesson, that is to wit that God do owe all our doings. And how shall we be sure that he will owe them? [verily] if we have not followed our own fleshly reason, nor taken leave to do things upon our own head: but have waited for Gods commandment. Now then, if God have given us his warrant, and we have walked in his obedience: then are we sure that all shall go well with us, though the world find neversomuch fault with us.

But we on our side also must take warning that we rise not against God, as we see these fantastical fellows do, who will need be scanning whether a thing be good or no, without inquiring whether it be of God or no: and so should God be fain to resign his majesty. For he cannot be GOD, if he be not righteous. And if men might put his righteousness to to trial of inquest, so as it might be lawful for them to give their verdict upon it: then if they condemned any of Gods works, his glory were like to go to wreck, and he should be quite berest of it. We see then what a treachery it is, when men will take such liberty to discourse of good and evil at their own pleasure, without asking counsel at Gods mouth. And on the contrary part, although things seem strange to our natural understanding: yet must we so dispose ourselves, that if our Lord do once say, this is good, it is my pleasure so to have it: as soon as we have that determination from Gods mouth: we on our part must hold our peace, not only to forbear all replying or grudging against him: but also to submit all our own reason thereunto, and to glorify him with a good will, in this wise. True it is Lord, that if I should judge after mine own fancy, I might speak forwardly and untowardly: but I must have mine eye upon you: and for as much as I know your will to be so, I must submit myself to it, and acknowledge it to be good and rightful, yielding you this praise therewithal, that you canft not do amiss. Surely this present example ought well to suffice us. For who is he which would not at the first sight condemn the children of Israel, for killing the little babies after that sort? Did they anything without Gods appointment? No: for Moses said the contrary. Therefore in condemning them, a man should set himself against condemning God: And so far it commonly with us. Wherefore if we judge of our neighbors, let us not do it upon our own brain, but let us give that authority unto God, without replying against his word, so as if he allow of anything, we receive it immediately: for we must have this modesty of ruling ourselves in all cases according to his good will. And therewithal, if God now end then do things which seem over rigorous. Yea and even do touch ourselves very near: let us stoop to them. As for example, if we be afflicted out of measure to our own seeming: yet must we not murmur nor fret at it, for in good foot what shall we gain by it? It will turn to our double confusion. Nay, let us pray God to frame us to such obedience, as we may patiently receive the afflictions that he send us, in suchwise as the things which seem strange to our own appetites, affections, and thoughts, may be deemed of us to be good, just, and rightful, because he will them. That is the point which we must come unto. To be short, let us learn, not to be wise in our own conceit, nor learn, to give head to our affections: for those two things are requisite, if we intend to glorify God in all his doings.

Now here is also that which Moses added, concerning the Cities and the greatness of them concerning the Country, and the great strength of Og King of Basan. We took (says he) therefore cities, which were very well fortified, and furnished in such wise, as there was no likelihood that they should have been easily taken. Moses added these circumstances, of purpose to magnify Gods grace the more, that the people might perceive that their strength came not flying in the air, but that it was GOD that gave it them. And that is a point well worthy to be noted. For if it be to vaunt of our own prowess, we can skill well enough to gather the things that may serve for the purpose. O (say we) I had such a thing and such a thing: I have compassed my matters trimly: such a crink was practiced against me a great way off, and I remedied it with such a shift. See my cunning, see my policy: there were such matches and such against me, but I shifted well enough with them all, so as I dispatched them everychone, and my enemies won nothing at my hand. To be short, we can skill to allege all things that may give a fair gloss and show to our own virtues. But if it be to glorify God, for the relief that we have had at his hand: we run over it as it were upon hot coals (as they say) we remember not the distress that we were in the danger that we be scaped out of seem to be a thing of nothing. See what our lewdness is. So much the more therefore does it stand us on hand, to mark what is told us here, that is to wit, that all the benefits which we have received of God, we must consider in what taking we had been, if we had gone without them: and we shall have matter good store wherewith to do that, if we be not willfully blind as we are wont to be. For was not the least danger that ever we fell into, enough to abash us? But when a thing touch us anything near: you shall see us as fore dismayed as may be. Indeed if we be once out of it, it is nothing with us: but that is for want of minding it. Yet not withstanding if we see but a mote or a fly withstanding by our eyes: by and by we be dazzled. But yet for all this, out of how great things does God deliver us? He will suffer us to go down as it were into our grave, and to be there as it were in a gulf of death, so as which way so ever we look, we shall find no way to escape out at, so deeply look shall we be sunk therein. And to what end? Even to the end that God may make us perceive his power better, when it please him to succour us. So then, we have matter enough and enough to give gloss unto Gods grace, if we be not minded to shut our eyes maliciously of set purpose, or to thrust the things underfoot, which are too too manifest and apparent. Therefore let us put this doctrine in use which is showed us here by Moses: that is to wit, that God will give us incredible victories, as he does already, and that when we have them, we must bethink us thus: Go to, came this of our own policy? came this of our own strength? No: it is God that has done it. For when we have well examined all that is in us: we shall find ourselves to come short in all, points, and that even from the one end to the other, our Lord must be fain to do all in man.

And look what Moses report here concerning the bodily enemies of the children of Israel, as in respect of the power of this world: that must we apply to the power of Satan, and to all shifts that he has against us. If we have that discretion with us, then shall we have wherefore to magnify Gods grace towards us, if we consider well whence we be delivered, that is to wit, out of the pit of hell. For which of us was able to break bars and bonds of Satan? which of us was able to abolish the sovereignty of death? It stood us on hand that God should work there. Now it is so, that we were all shut up in the bondage of sin, and consequently that death reigned over us. Satan had possession of us, so as none of us could scape from him. We could stir neither arm nor leg, but it was to thrust ourselves still further, and to sink ourselves still deeper. Seeing it is so: let us understand, that when God brought us out of the curse, wherein all of us are by nature: it must needs be that his mere grace wrought in that behalf. And that is more times than once, as Moses speaks hereof the threescore cities. Wherefore let us understand, that as soon as we be come to the end of one battle, strait ways we must enter into another: God helps us to day: and if he hold not on daily, yea if he make us not to feel his aid every minute of an hour: what will become of us? If we had had a thousand victories, yet were one assault enough to overthrow us. Therefore let us learn to magnify Gods grace towards us.

And herewithall let us mark also, that Moses speaking hereof the strength of Og King of Basan, faith: Behold he had a bed like a Giant: and again he faith that he came of the race of the Rephaims. Which serves to show more and more, that the people were as a sheep in a Wolfe's mouth. And if it were so with them at that time: what is it now with us? For we have enemies which are much stronger and stouter in comparison of us, than had the Israelites when they were to enter into the land of Chanaan. It should seem that they might eat us up at one bit (as they say.) We see what treasons and conspiracies they make: we see that the more gracious and favorable God shows himself to us, the more do we seem to take pleasure in grieving him, and in rejecting of his grace. And therefore let us look to it, that we mind well this doctrine, if we will have God to give us victory against Satan and all his assaults. And besides this when we have concluded that God will strengthen us against all temptations: let us not doubt but that he has a care of us also for this transitory life. And if men go about to root us out, let us put ourselves to his protection, and let us look to be preserved and defended by him: and no doubt but that if he reached out his mighty arm in old time, to succour the people of Israel: his power is not abated, nor his goodness diminished, to do the like for us at this day. Thus you see how we shall be safe both in life and death, and as well in body as in soul, if our Lord be ready to succour us. But without that, we must need be worse than forlorn. Wherefore let us look that we profit ourselves by this doctrine, by putting away all pride and foolish presumption, putting so as we rest wholly upon God, and learn to exercise ourselves in his promises, early and late, and to renew the remembrance of them, to the end that by that mean we may be armed against all temptations. Let not the devil find us unprovided when he comes to assail us: but let us have wherewith to resist him. And that we may so, let us take to us Gods word, for when we be armed with that, we be well enough fenced to beat back Satan, and all that ever he can practice against us. And therefore it behooove us to be so much the more watchfull, that we may give care to this doctrine.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them as we may be utterly cast down by them, at leastwise to mislike of them and to forsake them, so as our whole seeking may be to frame ourselves altogether to the righteousness of our God, and to proceed more & more in his fear and obedience, until he have joined us fully and perfectly to himself, beseeching him to fully bear with us in the meanwhile, and that forasmuch as it is his will that we should be in continual war in this world, he vouchsafe to strengthen us with his power, until he have taken us up into his heavenly rest, to make us enjoy the glorious immortality that he has promised us. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people, & c.

On Wednesday, the 8th of May 1555

The sixteenth Sermon which is the second upon the third Chapter

12 The same time we took possession of the land, From Aroer which is upon the River Arnon. And I gave one half of mount Galaad with the Cities thereof to the Rubenites and Gadites.

13 And the rest of Galaad and all Basan, which was of the kingdom of Og, I gave to the half tribe of Manasses: that is to wit, all the Country of Argob, and all Basan, which is called the land of the Giants.

14 And the son of Manasses took all the Country of Argob, unto the borders of Gessuri and Machati: and called them after his own name, that is to wit Basan Havoth Jair, unto this day.

15 And unto Machir I gave Galaad,

16 And unto the Rubenites and Gadites I gave from Galaad unto the river Arnon, the middle of the river and the end, and unto the river Jabbok, which is the border of the children of Ammon.

17 And the plain, and the Jordan, and the borders thereof from Kinereth to the sea of the wilderness, that is to wit, the salt sea under Ashdothpishgah towards the East.

18 And the same time I commanded you, saying: the Lord your God has given you this land to possess. All you that are strong men, go armed before your brethren the children of Israel:

19 But your wives, your children, and your cattle, (I know you have much cattle) shall abide in your Cities which I have given you,

20 Until the Lord have given rest to your brethren as well as to you, and that they likewise possess the land which the Lord your God gives them beyond Jordan. Then shall you return every man to his possession which I have given you.

21 And the same time I commanded Josua, saying: My eyes have seen all that the Lord your God has done to these two Kings. So will the Lord do to all the kingdoms through which you shall pass.

22 Fear them not; for the Lord is your God: it is he that fights for you.

Ere Moses continues still his matter, to show the people of Israel the great good that God had done them, beyond their hope. For as I have declared heretofore, the kingdoms of Basan and Hesebon were as an overplus, besides that which had been promised to the fathers of old time. God then showed himself more liberal than he had promised to be, in that behalf. Therefore it became the people to have signified Gods grace, according as Moses intent also was. Furthermore, to the intent the people should not think that they had gotten and conquered that Country by their own power and strength: it is told them how it was of necessity that God guided them, considering that their enemies were much stronger than they, in respect whereof here is mention made of their stature, and the land is named the land of Giants, to put the people in remembrance and to make them consider, that they could not have compassed those things, unless God had governed them. And so the whole matter is to be referred to this end, that the people should know Gods goodness in delivering them from the thralldom of Egypt, delivering not only in that he had given them the land which he had promised them for their inheritance, but also had added more than they looked for: that is to wit, that two kingdoms that were beyond Jordan.

And now herewithall Moses faith, that he gave that Country to the Children of Reuben and to the children of Gad, that is to say, to their Tribes, and to the half Tribe of Manasses. Not that Moses offered them that Country in partition: but they did sue for it, as is written more plainly in the two and thirty Chapter of Numeri. In so much as it is said there, that Moses was angry when he saw them so hasty to be beforehand, for it was reason that the whole land should first have been conquered, ere any partition had been made. But therewithal it is said, that the two Tribes of Gad and Reuben, excused themselves for that they had much Cattle, & it was a Country fit for grazing: & their desiring to be settled, was not to separate themselves from their brother, or to be in better taking that they. For they protected that they would go with the rest of the people, to fight with them against all their enemies, and that they would never rest in the land that was assigned them, until all the residue were settled as well as they. Upon the making of this promise, Moses agreed unto them. For before, he said unto them, behold, you increase the heap for your sin. For heretofore when you spied out the land, you would not enter into it at such time as the way was opened for you. And now you bring new lets: it should seem you seek nothing but to resist God, and to shut his grace out of the door. Moses then spoke sharply after this sort against the children of Reuben and Gad, until they had showed that their meaning was not to forsake their brethren, but to hold themselves still in the unity of the body, and in the meanwhile to leave their Cattle at a stay, to the end they might not be too much cumbered with their wives and children. And even in this we have to mark the goodness of God. For had not he been the defender of them that were to dwell in that Country, what had come of it? Behold, a sort of women and young children are left behind with their Cattle. Now we know that all the neighbors thereabout were desirous to destroy the people of Israel, and a general hatred rather burning fire was kindled every where against them. Therefore if the women and children had not been preserved under the hand of God, and under his protection: had they not perished a hundred times? And yet being so forsaken, they were not troubled by any man. Now then the people ought by all means to have acknowledge Gods grace herein, to strengthen themselves thereby against the time to come, and therewithal to understand that there was nothing of their own to boast themselves of, but that it was good reason that God should be praised, and they acknowledge that all that good came of God. Thus you see what the intent of Moses was in this text.

And we also in these days may well apply this lesson to our instruction. For seeing that God did so preserve the women and little children, which were destitute of defense and succour, & environed with enemies that were their next neighbors, and which were able to have swallowed them up at one chop, as I have told you before: let us assure ourselves that our safety consist not in the multitude of worldly defenses. Though we have neither wall nor bank, nor anything else to defend us: yet if God have the leading of us, and take the charge of our safety, we have enough, so as we may defy all our enemies. Contrariwise, if we may be destitute of Gods tuition: we may well provide all the defenses in the world: and yet we shall be never the nearer, all of it must needs tumble down upon our own heads. Therefore let us learn to call upon our God, and to put ourselves into his hands. And forasmuch as he faith that he will receive the poor that are in adversity: so as he promise to support those that are destitute of all help and succour of the world: let us go to him, assuring ourselves that we shall not have the gate shut against us. Be we once come thither: we may boldly trust that he will maintain us. And although we be hemmed in with enemies on all sides, and it may well seem that we cannot escape their hands: yet will God be our defense, though there be nothing but utter weakness in us. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this example.

Yet not withstanding it is not to be doubted, but that herewithall Moses does covertly upbraid the children of Reuben & Gad, with their over great hast. And although he accept their protestation and thereupon do grant their request: yet were they not to be commended in that they fought to have their possession so soon in that Country. Indeed their pretence was honest: but yet should they have held themselves still under Gods providence, and not have attempted anything. So then, as we have seen here before, if we will have God to bless us, we must hold ourselves simply to his word, without attempting anything at all, so as we step not one pace forward to do anything that he likes not, not swerve to the right hand or to the left. But the Reubenites would need be shifting beforehand, and fought to settle themselves before it was meete for them. They asked not whether it were lawful for them or no; they came not to Moses with submission, saying, let it be considered by general advise whether it be good or no: but they would needs determine the case themselves at the first dash. We have great store of Cattle say they: this Country is fit for us: therefore it is meete that it should be given us in partition. Herein they are not in anywise to be excused. True it is that they were made owners of that fat and fruitfull soil: but yet did not God bless them in all points. It had been better for them, especially for the half tribe of Manasses, to have been joined with their brethren, than to have had a possession so by themselves. For by that mean they were cut off from the tribe of Juda: & they were bereft of that prominence of being matched with their brethren that children of Joseph. And therefore if they had tarried with the rest, and waited Gods leisure as they ought to have done: it is certain that they had been blessed much more abundantly than they were, & consequently the others too. We see how the Prophets speak of that: The fat Bulls of Basan (say they) have their Pf cys stopped with greace. Because they lived at their ease in a fruitful & abundant Country, there was nothing but pride and stubbornness in them. Let us learn therefore to forbear the seeking of our own commodities, and not be self-willed upon one thing or other: but let us tarry for the blessing of God. We see how it fell out with Lot: for he had the like respect in choosing to dwell in Sodom. That plain was as an earthly Paradise: there was nothing but pleasure, there was nothing but fruitfulness in it. Lot gate him thither : but our Lord made him to pay very dear for his shot. Although he was one of his chosen, although GOD pitied him even to the end, and although he made his children to feel his grace not withstanding that they were begotten of incest: yet was he chastised as he deserved, for his tendering of his own ease and commodity too much. Hereby we be taught to bridle our desires, and not to be overgreedy upon any fleshly commodity when we see we may have it at advantage. If god give it us, let us accept it: but let us beware that our affections be not too inordinate, as they commonly be. Thus much concerning the words wherewith Moses upbraided the children of Gad & Reuben and the half tribe of Manasses.

Now herewithall we have to note this saying of his, that he gave them the Country in partition. For it should seem that he take upon him here to do that which belonged to God. What was Moses? Was the land his to give? By what title could he be named Lord of it? He is in that respect but as a member of that body. True it is that God honored him so much, as to make him the head of his people: But in the meanwhile how is the Land named? Gods rest, that is to say the land that God had assigned his people to rest in. It is not said to be the rest of Moses, but the rest of GOD. Seeing then that this land was in the hand of GOD: should Moses boast himself of the giving thereof? We must not think this strange giving: for when God's servants speak so, they challenged not aught to themselves, but showed in what trust they be put, and what charge is committed unto them, by means, whereof they separate not themselves from God. If a man be sent from a prince with authority to do the things that he has in commission: he takes upon him the name of the Prince as in way of borrowing, and faith, Jordan this, I appoint this, I command this, I will have, this executed. And he that speaks after that manner, means not to derogate his masters authority. Even so do Gods servants: for they know that he has ordained them as his instruments, and employs them in his service, so as they do nothing of themselves, their master is he that overrules them. That is the cause why Moses said, that he has given them their portion: yea verily, not taking himself as another mortal man, but as one whom God had set in his own place: and which did all things in the name of God. And so you see what we have to bear in mind.

It is a very profitable doctrine for us: for it extends further than so. And for proof thereof, if we had not the same rule: what would become of the government of the Church. Wherefore are we baptized, but to be washed from all our spots, that we may be pure and clean before God, that we may be members of Jesus Christ, that we may be clothed with his righteousness, & (to be short) that we may be renewed by the holy ghost? Now, ly it in that mortal & man that baptizes us, to give us all these things? No, if we consider him but as a man in his own peculiar person. But since it is Gods will that the ministers of his word should baptize in his name: baptism must needs have that virtue notwithstanding that it be delivered us by the hand of a man. And again, as touching the Lords supper we see how our Lord Jesus Christ does show himself there to be the food of our souls. Now is there any creature that can make us partakers of so great a benefit? No surely. But it is certain that the supper is not a vain thing: therefore when we come to receive it, we must consider that the [minister though he be a] man is not separated from Jesus Christ. And in the preaching of Gods word we see the like. It is said that the ministers are sent to enlighten the blind, to deliver prisoners, to forgive sins, and to turn men's hearts. How so? for those are things that belong all only unto God. And in very deed if a man should go about to bereave him of the least part of those things, it were an utter defacing of his majesty. For nothing is more peculiar to him than the forgiving of sins. Likewise does he reserve to himself the turning of men's hearts. Yet not withstanding he communicates all those titles to such as he had ordained to bear abroad his word: telling them that he separates not himself from them, but rather that he use them as his hands and instruments. And in this case men must not muse upon the thing that they see, but they must lift up their eyes aloft by faith. We see then what rule we ought to draw out of this text, where Moses said that he gave the land in possession. Namely that he treats not of his own person to vaunt himself: but only shows, that he had put the tribes of Gad and Reuben, and the half tribe of Manasses, in possession of those two kingdoms by Gods authority, according to the commission that he had given him.

Howbeit to the end that the profitableness of this doctrine may be the better known: let us mark in one word, that it expresses unto us the power that is in Gods word: namely that it is not a fleeting found, but that it has speedy execution, accordingly as we see that when the Prophets threaten the city Jerusalem, they say they have besieged it and beaten it down already. And how is that? By dreams and visions. This should seem to be mockery: Yea, but in the end it appeared, that it was not a rolling of their tongues only, but that they should not have had a greater mean, or power to raise the City of Jerusalem, though they had had a great host of men. For by what means did the enemies bring it to pass? By virtue of the Prophetesies. So on the contrary part, when they speak of making the people to prosper: their manner of speech is, that all impediments are removed, and their enemies overcome; And how is that?

Because Gods word is vain. So then, let us understand that it is greatly to our profit, to be told that when Gods ministers speak, they cast not forth a fading sound, but such a one as is matched with effect: and therefore let us be edified thereby to our salvation. Since we know that there mission of sins is not preached unto us in vain: it ought to assure us. Come we to a Sermon? Is Gods grace offered us? Is it told us that Jesus Christ has made amends for us, to rid us out of the cursedness wherein we were? When we be certified of these things, it is all one as if they were put into our hands. Why so? For when GOD sends messengers to tell us his will: he matches such force therewithal, as that the effect is joined to the word.

Likewise when he threatens us ,let us assure ourselves that vengeance is in a readiness, as said Saint Paul. Let us not think it a sport and dalliance when we be told of Gods curse and wrath against the despisers of the Gospel, and against the disobeyers of the same. Hereby we see with what reverence we ought to resort to Sermons. Also we see in what taking all these heathenish sort are that which come to Sermons as it were in scorn of God, with such brutishness as even little children are ashamed of them, insomuch that there is neither fear of God nor honesty in them. Let us be well advised to shun such men's companies, and to abhor them: assuring ourselves that if we learn not to mislike of them, we shall be entangled with them by becoming like them. These (says I) are the things which we have to remember, (in that Moses went not to exalt him-

Himself to deface Gods glory but showed that God wrought by him and by his means. Furthermore, by whereas he said that the children of Manasses, that is to say the half tribe, together with the whole tribes of Reuben and Gad bound themselves by the promise that is rehearsed in the book of Number 1 , to go before the lord that is to say in his presence: it is well worth the marking: say for it serves to express the better, with what loyalty they went to it. For if we set not our eye upon God: there will always be some seynedness in our promises, and in all our dealings, so as we shall never go to work soundly and substantially. We know that naturally men are double hearted, and that they naturally paint and disguise their doings, insomuch that if it were possible for them, they would keep no touch in anything that they promise, longer than it were for their own profit, or at leastwise unless they were driven to it for very shame. To be short, there will be no faithfulness in us, except GOD overlook us, and we look up to him in all our doings. And that is the cause why the men that were assigned their possession , did swear to their brethren, even in Gods presence, that GOD might be a witness to punish their lewdness, if there were any guile, saining, or treachery at all in their case.

Hereby we be warned, that whensoever we make any bargain or covenant: we must not only have amc to the party with whom we have to do but we must also as it were set GOD among us, and keep our faith and promise to him that we have bound ourselves , as though GOD watched us at every step, and that we could not so soon work deceit towards any man, but that by and by GOD would step before us to withstand it. That is the thing which we have to do: but there are very few of us that think upon it. For although the name of God be called upon, and solemn oaths taken, and promises made authentically enough, yea and that there be order of Law to make us feel his majesty: yet do most men shut their eyes, and in all the promises and others that are made, [commonly] there is nothing sought but to deceive one another. He that is fittle-left and fullest of shifts, is the handsomest man: and such kind of dealing is esteemed as a virtue. And why? For every man runs gadding after his own lusts and likings, yea & that in suchwise, that they be as blindfoldings to keep us from seeing God. Though we think not upon it now: yet will not God forget any of our deceits, spites, treacheries and falsehoods which we commit against men. For he has told us, that when an oath is taken: between man and man: his glory is defaced and himself openly mocked, if the promise be broken. Therefore let us be well assured that he will not put up such wrong, & that although we be never so blind, yet will not he play the blinker on his side, but will note and mark every whit of it to bring it to account. And so you see what we have to mark here for one point.

By way we see, that none but such as make lawful covenants can make them as in Gods fight. For as many as do lewdly link themselves together to help one another in naughtiness, (as to confound all right, to make wicked shifts, to work outrages, to oppress men, or to maintain themselves in their unthriftiness): as many (I say) as conspire after that fashion, are all fain to seek lurking holes: they are loth to show themselves to God or to come in his presence: no they must rather shrink away from him, but they cannot. Yet not withstanding, the wicked sort do fall asleep, when they make those shameful and detestable confederacies of theirs: they be fain to hold themselves there as it were in the dark, and to shun Gods presence as much as they can. So much the more then does it stand us on hand to remember this text, that in all our promises and in all our doings, we may deal as in Gods sight, assuring ourselves that he is ever at hand to take notice of our covenants, and to bear witness of them, yea and to govern and direct all things aright, if we proceed uprightly and soundly. And so you see what we have to mark.

Now here is yet moreover a certain uprightness to be kept, whereof Moses speaks when he commands the Reubenites and Gadites to go conquer the rest of the land with their brethren, notwithstanding that they had their portion already beyond Jordan. Hereby we be warned, first that if God have united us in one body or corporation: one part of us must not withdraw ourselves from the charges [of the common weale,] as if we would say, let us exempt ourselves, and let the rest shift for themselves: but it behooves every man to employ himself to the benefit of the whole state, and that he which could shift for himself alone, should not forbear to take part with his brethren, and to put under his shoulder

(as they say) to bear a piece of the burden. This might be declared morefully: but a glance will serve our turn well enough, and the chiefest matter is, that we must put it well in practice. Then let us mark well, that if GOD have knit us into one body, we must all do the office of members, as we see how the foot serve the hand, the hand the eye, and every other part employs itself according to his several property and power. So as all redounds to the benefit of the whole.

Likewise must we observe the same rightful and reasonable order of dealing, when GOD has set us in one common weale. It was well known of the wretched Paynims, that there could be no good civil order in the world, if every man were given order to his own profit. If the hand should separate itself and refuse to serve the rest of the body and the rest of the members also; You see there would be a good sort of pieces: but in the meanwhile they should all die and of necessity perish. In like case is it with men when they will need draw back from the communion of life, which they ought to observe, and no man think upon the common profit, but take it to be sufficient that he can profit himself: for in the end all must needs go to havoc. But this is chiefly to be observed in the spiritual government of the Church as Saint Paul shows it us. For in the Church there is not only a resemblance of man's body, but the son of God is our head in very deed. It is of him that we be, and of him have we grace and power, in such portion and measure as it pleases him to bestow upon us. Seeing it is so: let us learn to maintain peace and brotherliness among us. And that we may so do: let every of us yield himself to his neighbors, and let us not be so wedded to our own peculiar advantage, that we should not take pain to pleasure all, those with whom we be united. Neither let us allege, what have I to do with the bearing of such a burden as should be too heavy for me, and which I cannot well away with? Let us beware that we hold not back after that sort, to maintain ourselves in elderness. For according to the ability that God gives us, so does he bind us to serve our neighbors therewith. And why? For we be all members of one body: there needs none other reason to move us than that. So then, to be short we cannot be of our Lord Jesus Christ's flock, unless we consider what he has given us, that we may make the same profitable, and put it to the common edifying of the Church, as says Saint Paul.

As touching worldly conversation, let us live in such wise with men, that as we receive good by them, so we also on our side may look to do good to them: so as there may be a mutual answerableness on both sides. Now it is certain that none of us can forbear his neighbors. Let a man be of as good abilities he can wish, and yet nevertheless he must stand in need of other men's service in many things. Now, when he knows that he has such need and necessity of other men's help: should he draw back from his neighbors, or be so nice that he will bear no burden, but be loth to take any pain for the common weale? [It is no reason.] For if they that serve him should be at the same point, and be as peevish and proud as he: must it not needs be that all should go to wreck? Yes: and therefore let us learn, that in as much as even in the Church we have this bond of serving our neighbors: it behooves likewise in serving respect of this present life and of all worldly affairs, to consider with ourselves that in as much as God makes others to do us good, and to profit us diverse ways. So as we be succored by them: we also ought to render the like again on our side.

Now as concerning the people of Israel's case, there was a special consideration in their conquering of the land of Chanaan . Why so? For it was not promised severally to the tribe of Juda, or to the tribe of Benjamin, or to any of the other tribes alone: but generally to the whole offspring of Abraham. Therefore it behooved this land to be conquered by them in common, and that afterward lots should be cast for it, as was done in the end by Joshua. But now that God commands us to follow one common trace, we must apply this example to ourselves, and consider that the same rule which is set down here, is given to us also. As how? Does God command, that we should but every man severally for himself refill Satan, and proceed more and more in the Gospel? Is it not a common lesson? Yes. Seeing then that God calls us so one with another, and will have all to agree in one accord, like good melody: it is not for us to separate ourselves any more a sunder. Wherefore let us consider, that to advance the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ and the salvation of all his to build up his Church, and to make his Gospel to prosper and glorify, every man must not only work alone by himself: but we must also agree all in one, by and draw all by one line, and every of us strain himself to serve such as have need of his help. And so we see, that all such as will needs build so alone by themselves, do but work confusion. Of which sort there are that think themselves very able men, and that they could work wonders to their own seeming, in so much that they despise their neighbors, and would even bear down all other men before them to show themselves valiant fellows, and that they do a hundred fold more than all the rest. And what comes of such pride, but overthrow and confusion? Let us mark well therefore, that we shall never serve God by furthering of the glad tidings of our salvation: unless we have the said concord, that we be ready and well disposed to help, every man his neighbor, and that there be one common easing one of another. Thus you see what we have to remember further upon this strain.

Now in conclusion it is said here, that Moses encourage Joshua to be of good cheer, and to go through with the thing which he himself might not do, that is to wit, to convey the people over Jordan, and to conquer all the land of Chanaan. But first of all he sets before him the victories that the people had had against Og king of Basan, and Sehon king of Hesebon. You has seen (said he) how the Lord has deals with these two kings. He says not, as you have done to these two kings, [but as the Lord has done]. For as has been declared, here is no flattering of men, nor no tickling of their ears: for they be but too forward already in taking more upon them than belongs to them. Seeing then that men are so naturally given to self weaning let us understand that it is expedient for them to be meekened, and to be bereft of all their pride and lustiness, to the intent they may know that they have nothing of their own. But this cannot be done, without making them to understand, that whatsoever they have, they are beholden to Gods mere grace for it. That is the the cause why Moses said expressly, you has seen with my eyes, what God has done unto these two kings. As if he should say, if you know not the power that God has showed you : of whom is it long? The matter is not darksome of itself. It is altogether visible and apparent. Therefore it must needs be that your own unthankfulness hinders you, and that your malice blinds you. Seeing then that God has made you to perceive his goodness, even as it were by eyesight: be you mindful of it continually.

But let us mark, that Moses is encouraging Joshua, does not only exhort the whole people to give thanks unto God, and to praise him for the benefits that they had received of him already: but also harden them for the time to come, to the end they should not doubt but that God would go through with the thing he had begone. And the manner of his speech shows it sufficiently. You has seen (says he) how your God has succored & helped you against those two kings. As much shall you do to all the kingdom through which you shall pass? As if he should say, you have seen trials enough already of Gods goodness: and therefore you cannot distrust him, but you must be too too unthankful. For he has showed you what his power is, it is not for a pang and away, he has showed you that he is faithfull in all his promises. Now you know what he has promised to your fathers: therefore look you for the performance of the things towards you, which your father's hoped for, and be you constant in it. Think not that your God is weary of doing you good, or that in process & length of time he waxes unable to bring the things to pass which he has begun: no: but reach out your trust to the uttermost, & assure yourselves that he will likewise continue his goodness and power towards you. Thus see we what Moses meant.

Howbeit for as much as the encumbrances were greater he said expressly to the people, be you not afraid: and unto Josua, fear not. Wherein he shows that we must not measure Gods grace by our own understanding. For when things shall seem to us impossible: God will find means to overcome all things that are against him to the world ward, so as they shall not hinder him to bring all his matters to perfection, and to execute his determination.

But to the intent to gather the sum of the doctrine that is contained in this text: let us mark how it is not without cause, that Moses directed his speech to Josua. For albeit that the doctrine belong to the whole body of the people yet was it meete that Josua should be encouraged, as head and Captain of the people: For it may happen that a people shall be well disposed: and yet mar all for want of good guiding, accordingly as we see how all things go to havoc and to wrack, when the heads and governors are not such as they ought to be, yea even although there appear good disposition in the people: insomuch that when things go amiss, a man shall hear sighings and groanings, and everybody seeks to go the right way, so that if it lay in private men's power to remedy disorders and vices, they would surely do what they could. Two or three unthriftes are enough to trouble a whole common weale when they once let upon it and the devil drives them forward, if the governors set not stay in the matter. And therefore it is not for naught that Moses directs his speech precisely to Josua. For (as I said) it imports so much the more, that such as are in public authority should be well disposed, that they may the better guide the whole body. But for as much as it shall be spoken of yet more at large hereafter: I do but touch the thing briefly, to have a short conclusion of this text.

Furthermore whereas it is said, That God which smote Sehon king of the Amorrhite and Og king of Basan, will do the like to all the kingdoms of the land that he promised to Abraham: let us mark, (as I said before), that when God has made us to feel his gracious goodness: he will still give us courage for the time coming, to the end we may not doubt but he will hold on continually: And that as we have found the force of his power by experience heretofore: so we may assure ourselves of it to the end: not doubting but that if we do as he commands us, he will bring all our enterprises to good and happy issue, so long as they be according to his will. For without that, we should become too unthankful and churlish, burying his goodness towards us, and shutting our eyes, that we might not see it. And if we see such changes as may abash us: let us return to that which I have said: that is to wit, that we must not measure Gods power by the worldly means that trouble us, neither must we stand scanning after this sort, and say, how can that come to pass, how may that be possible? Let us not put forth any such allegations: for we must yield this praise unto God, that although things be impossible to us, although we have never so great dangers to pass, although things be far out of order as we wot not where to become: yet will God provide for them. Then let us resort unto God in that behalf, acknowledging such power in him, that although all our wits fail us, yet we put the matter into his hands, assuring ourselves that he can bring it to pass. That is the thing which we have to mark here. And without that, what would become of our salvation? True it is that God has showed himself heretofore to be our guide and king, and therein we have the more cause to magnify his grace. Nevertheless, when we come to the point that we should hope for Gods help, and that his succour shall not fail us at our need: we must shut our eyes at all stops, and refer all things into his hand, waiting for the accomplishment of his promises. Seeing he has bound himself to us of his own free goodness: let us put him in trust with the events of the things that seem impossible unto us. And if we do so, then may we certainly think ourselves safe against all the assaults of Satan and all his champions. And though they practice all that

That ever they can to overthrow us: yet shall we not be as men discomfited and forlorn, but God will work in such sort for us, as we shall not need to fear but that he will bring our salvation to perfectness: and albeit that to our seeming it be impossible to be done, and that we cannot find any way out by reason of the hindrances that let us: yet will he always make us to overcome them. Thus you see how we ought to put this lesson in vre.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to do them away, and to correct them immediately that we may obtain forgiveness of them: and that for as much as we cannot yield ourselves so wholly to him, as he might guide and govern us according to his holy will: it may please him to rid us of all our wicked affections, and of all the lusts of our flesh, that we may frame ourselves unto his righteousness and in the meanwhile be born with all in our infirmities, until he have taken us hence to himself. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, &c.

The seventeenth Sermon which is the third upon the third Chapter

23 And at the same time I prayed unto the Lord, saying:

24 O Lord God, you has begun to show your servant your greatness and your mighty hand. For what God is there in heaven or earth, that can do according to your works, and according to your mightiness?

25 I beseech you let me go and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, and this goodly mountain, and Libanus.

Told you heretofore that Moses made mention how God had bereft him of the benefit and honor of entering into the land of promise, for the sin of the people. Now he rehearse the same matter again, howbeit to another end. For it was convenient that the people should be done to understand, that they should not always have such a leader. To the intent therefore that the exhortations which Moses makes, might be the better received, and the people take the better heed to them: he tells them that he must leave them, and that he shall not have leave to pass over Jordan. That is his meaning, whereof I shall speak more fully hereafter. In the mean reason, let us see what he says here. First of all he rehearses that he besought god, that he might enter into the promised land. But he had already had the sentence of condemnation, that he might not go. It should seem then that he resists God as much as in him lies, and that he cannot find in his heart to admit his saying. And indeed we cannot utterly excuse him that he did not amiss. For we cannot be tickled with so mall a desire contrary to Gods will: but we be by and by blame worthy. But when we be so bold as to come unto God, to make a request clean contrary to his will: then is the offence double. And why? For the foundation of all our prayers is faith. But there can be no faith without Gods promise. Who so then comes to cast out his pangs, & desires of God the thing that he knows shall mislike him: do he not pass his bounds? Do he not go clean contrary to that which the rule of praying will bear? Yes. Now, this was seen in Moses, and therefore it follows that he did amiss. And indeed the answer shows it. For like as God was angry with him before, because he had not glorified him in the strife that the people moved for want of drink: so is he angry with him now again. Though we had none other witness, even this ought to suffice us, that God does expressly shut the gate against him for the time to come, that he should no more return unto him. Hereby we be done to understand, that we must be earnest in repressing our desires, and in bridling them. For hardly is there any man to be found, that ever yielded himself so pliable to obey God, as Moses was. Let us seek on all sides, [and yet shall we not find one.] It is certain that Moses was an excellent mirror of meekness, and such a one as had his mind utterly brought down, so as he fought not to follow anything which was not commanded him from any above. And yet for all that, it appears that he could not so restrain and overmaster himself, but that there was some excess in his affections. If this befell to Moses who had been accustomed to obey God in all points; how shall we do which have profited so evil in that behalf? So then, we see here a deed which shows us what the cheif exercise and study of Gods children is: namely to subdue their affections, that it may not befall them to desire anything, but such as they know does please GOD. For that is the only rule whereby to discern good from bad. Mark only that for where by one point.

Moreover we must not stay upon the outward appearance. If we have a desire to a thing, although the same seem good and just, yet must we not think that it is therefore lawful. For if we look upon Moses desire, every of us will say it was holy. Yea and we marvel how it was so refused, considering that he spoke not so much for himself considering, as for the common profit of all the people. For his desire tended to none other end, but that the people might have been the better established and confirmed in Gods grace. He saw the vocation whereunto he had been ordained, to be most excellent: he had executed it already by the space of forty years: he saw the hardest was yet behind: he was acquainted with the peoples vices: he knew the power of mind that was given unto himself: he was sure he had purchased great credit now long ago: Look here the causes why he wished to have entered into the land. For being a man offixe-fcorc years old, he was not wedded to this present life. And besides all this, we know that in as much as he had been taken up heretofore into the mountain, and had casted there of Gods glory: he was not entangled with transitory delights, nor with any worldly thing. You see then that Moses had no respect to himself, but would fain have accomplished his office, in setting the people in possession of the heritage that had been promised them, and by that mean have established the service of God in the holy land. Who would not say that this was a good desire, considering how it tended to the glorifying of GOD, and to the procuring of the welfare of the whole people? Look here the two principles ends whereunto the whole life of man should tend. And yet notwithstanding, Moses did amiss. Why so? for he refitted God. It ought to have sufficed him, when he had once heard that GOD would not be served by him in that case. Albeit then that the desire that he purposes be excellent in itself, and aim at a good and rightful end: yet does it not fail to be worthy of blame. The reason is, because he submitted not himself to God.

Now then, we see the thing that I said before: that is to wit, that we may now and then have fair colours to desire this or that: but in so doing we may go too far, yea and indeed we shall not obtain our requests. Why so? For obedience must go before: and without that we cannot build, but to our ruin and confusion. And it is a thing very requisite. For men cannot bridle themselves from being wise in their own conceits: insomuch that if we take a thing to be good: we cannot be persuaded to the contrary, GOD cannot win so much at our hands as to get the mastery of us. So much the more then behooves it us to take pain to hold ourselves wholly in awe, to the end we build not anything which God allows not, but that we always have that mark before our eyes, and rest wholly upon it.

Now if it be so that the desires which of their own nature are good, holy, and commendable, do nevertheless become sinful and blame worthy, when they advance themselves against God; what are they when we covet evil things, and give head to our fleshly lusts? We see that the thing which GOD has forbidden us is evil, and yet notwithstanding we take leave to desire it: is this to be excused? Now then, to the intent we may take profit by this doctrine, let us mark that although our desires to see to, are as good as can be: yet must we obtain from them unless God does like of them. For at that end must we begin. And furthermore, that if we ought to correct our desires, though there be no likelihood of evil desires, in them: we ought much more to be well advised that we cast not forth our bubbles when we be tempted to evil, and when we be carried away to fleshly lusts. All that geare must be killed away stark dead, seeing it is not lawful for us even to wish the thing that is good, except we have leave of God. But we must then specially observe this lesson, when we go about to pray: for as I have said already, the foundation of all our prayers is faith: and what imports that? Even that we should hear God speak. If we pray at all adventure, doubting whether we shall obtain the thing that we require or no; it is but hypocrisy and it shall not boot us at all, says the holy scripture. It stands us then in hand, to be well assured when we come before God so as we believe certainly that our praying is not in vain, and that we shall not be disappointed of the thing that we require. And that is the point wherein the prayers of the Christians do differ from the prayers of the infidels. For the infidels and unbelievers may well flee unto God, and crave this and that at his hand: but what for that? They be ever wavering, and wote not whether they shall obtain or no. For they depend not upon the promises. But as for us, we must assure ourselves of the love of our God, & that he is much redier to grant than we be to require, yea and that he is so pitiful and has require such a respect of our miseries and necessities to relieve them, that he even prevents us. We must be thoroughly persuaded of this when we pray. But how shall we know it? We must not bear ourselves on hand that we hold God bound unto us, and that we shall make him to grant all our desires: for what a malapertness were that? And what an honoring of God were it, if every man should say, I trowe God will do whatsoever I list to command him? But we must rest upon his promises. You see then that faith is requisite in our prayers: that is to wit, that no man thrust forth himself upon his own head, but that having the promise whereby God allures us unto him, we go unto him boldly, not doubting but that he will keep him in touch with us. Seeing it is so: we must not now that all our prayers are faulty, if they be not ruled that by the will of God. For when we presume to ask of him whatsoever comes in our head, there is no promise for us to trust unto in going to it so without advise. And therefore for as much as we pass our bounds, we be never a whit furthered by it. Thus you see that in praying we must always consider what god permits us, & what his is that we should ask of him: and that we must ever have this modesty and soberness with us to ask counsaile of him, as though his spirit speak in us, and indited unto us the very form of our prayer. And for that cause has our Lord Jesus Christ made as it were a sum of all the requests which we ought to make unto God. For although we be not tied to those words, to say hallowed be the name of God, his kingdom come, his will be done, &c. Yet must we refer all our desires, wishes and requests to those fix articles, which are contained in the prayer that our Lord Jesus Christ has given unto us. And although the Fathers of old time had not the same rule; yet were they always governed by Gods spirit, to keep them from wandering from the things that are taught us at this day, so as all their prayers were conformable to the rule that our Lord Jesus Christ has given us. Now then we see that all such as leave to pray what they list, do not direct themselves to pray God as they ought to do, and therefore are they likewise disappointed of their desires. And for the same cause is it, that I have told you, that in all our prayers we must be well advised, that the things be lawful according to Gods word. But now there are some things which God has promised without exception, and those we may demand without condition? Whensoever we have offended him, (which thing we never cease to do) we must resort thing to the remedy, praying God to forgive us our sins and to show us mercy. God has assured us that he is ready to do it. And seeing he has promised it, our coming to him to seek favor must not be as though we wish not what would be the end of our request: but we must be fully resolved that he will show us favor indeed. Yet not withstanding, if therewithal we desire him to release his chastisements: that is now another thing. For he may well pardon our faults, but yet in the meanwhile he will not cease to subdue us, until he perceive that our vices are corrected. I mean not as the Papists do, namely that God pardons the fault, and retains the punishment still, as they have surmised, saying that when God forgives men their sins, he ceases not in the meanwhile to execute his rigor upon them as a judge. It is nothing so. But God chastises us for our sins after he has forgiven them, howbeit, not in way of punishment, but to make us look better to ourselves & to be warer hereafter, so as we become nor so inconstant as to return to the self same fault again. Then if God perceiving us to have need to be tamed, do lift to chastise us: if we require of him simply & without condition, that he should by and by withdraw his hand: that request were out of square. For why? He perchance sends us some sickness or some other cross, & he knows that it is not enough for us to be sick a two or three days: and therefore the disease must continue and increase, until we be thoroughly cleansed of it. Therefore when we make any requests unto God, he must have the moderating of them. Why? For we know not his will: I know not what is meet for me, neither has God given me my promise of it: now must I in this case stay myself, and refer myself to God in praying to him, I must patiently wait for such issue as he shall think good, and I must yield myself as a prisoner wholly to his will, utterly forsaking all mine own affections. Now then we see that where we be not sure of Gods will: we must not warrant ourselves any thing upon our own heads, but we must go to it with condition, that God shall do to us as he lifts. And there withal we must pray him to make us think well of all his doings, and to deal so with us as we may agree there unto: howbeit, not as inforsed, but our own accord. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this example of Moses. Since it is so: let us beware that we pray not for anything, which we know does displease God and is condemned of him. As how? If we should desire him that we might live ever in this world: we know we be created to another end, yea and we cannot be his children, but we must be as pilgrims in this world, as said the Apostle. Seeing it is so: he that should desire to live always here, should renounce the kingdom of heaven, separate himself from god, and bar himself from all access unto him. So then you see here a thing that were clean contrary to the manner of praying aright: as much is to be said of all our praying sinful lusts. We know what God has forbidden us: if we deal to the contrary, is it not as if we should play the chased bulls or wild beasts? And suppose we that such manner of praying provokes not Gods vengeance against us? Is it not a heinous treason to him, seeing we cannot devise to abuse his name more falsely? Therefore we must always look well about us. Seeing the case stands upon the finding out of the will of our God: we must (I say) be well advised what he promises us, & then shall we have our requests granted us.

Yet notwithstanding we have to mark, that when Moses desired God that he might go mark, over Jordan: he did it not willfully of purpose to disobey God. For he had humbly received the condemnation that we saw, whereby GOD had banished him from entering into the land of promise: but as now he forgets himself, and this escapes from him. When as we see this, let us mark that we had need to be so much the more diligent in examining our own wishes, to wit whether they be conformable to Gods will and squared throughout by the rule of his word or no. For we may well protest that our intent is to be subject to God, and we may well say it with out dissimulation: but yet in the meantime we shall not cease to be entangled in wandering imaginations, and our wits shall vanish away. If Moses being a man wholly bent to obey GOD, were so far overseen wholly, as to confound in his own request: what shall we do? For we have a great sort of thick and dark clouds, which dim our sight that we cannot see clear. And therefore let us sharpen our wits, that we may consider what is lawful for us to demand with godliness, and what likes God according as he shall have declared it unto us. Thus you see what we have to bear in mind. And if we chance at any time to overshoot ourselves through heat, and to require the thing which we cannot tell whether we should obtain or no: let us by and by correct it with this addition, My God, you will be done. As for example, a man has his child or his wife sick, or he is in some other perplexity: Alas my God (says he), and he casts forth some vehement affection, ah my God, will not you pity me? Must I be thus afflicted with extremity? Well, when he has made this request, he must acknowledge that there is a fault in it. And let us not excuse ourselves by saying, As for me, I never meant to withstand God or his will: but when we once know the fault, let us go and add this correction, Alas my God, indeed such is my desire, that you knows to what end it is: but yet for all that, it becomes me to yield you your principal service which you prefers before all others: that is to wit, obedience, so as I humble myself wholly in this case under thy hand. Even so Lord, dispose you of me and of all mine at your own pleasure. You see then that in examining our requests, when we doubt whether God like of them or no: we must enter into this consideration, that God ought to overrule us, that we may yield him his deserved honor, and all our affections be so bridled, as he may have the mastery of us. That is the true manner of praying, if we intend to be heard.

But by the way we must also mark the thing that is set down here. Moses to the intent to obtain his request, faith, lord you has begun to you're your servants the highness of your mighty hand. When Moses speaks after that fashion, it is a kind of protesting that his putting of himself forth to pray, is not for any service that he has done to God: he alleges not any such thing. No: but he protests that God had showed him favor already, and therefore he desires him to continue it still. And it is a point that we ought to mark well, namely that when we come unto God, the best reason that we can allege unto him, to win our requests at his hand, is to say, alas Lord, we be exceedingly bound unto you already. If a mortal man have done us a good turn, we may well be ashamed to be always hanging upon him: but it is not so towards God: For he never ceases to do us good: neither can he be drained dry in doing good, as creatures should. And yet notwithstanding, if we should return three or four times to a man that has done us good or pleased us, we might say: Sir, the goodness that you have showed me heretofore, for the which I think myself greatly bound unto you, makes me bold to repair unto you again, even to increase my debt to you the more. If we might say so to mortal men: much more ought we to say it unto God, for unto him we can allege no deserts, for anything else of our own. Therefore we must follow thing that which is showed us here, saying: Lord, seeing you has begun to do us good, go through with it. For God binds himself to us in doing us good: not that he is tied to it of necessity, we must not step to him with such lustiness as though he owed us anything: but after as we have felt the experience of his goodness and grace towards us, we may be so much the more familiar with him. And that is the thing whereon we must cast our eye: and it is also the thing wherein GOD is rightly glorified by us. When I come unto him and say. Ah Lord, true it is that nothing I am, nor nothing I can: I have nothing in me but utter naughtiness: nevertheless, forasmuch as I have found you bountiful to me heretofore & you has showed yourself good to me so many ways: therefore do I resort unto you still. Behold, by my so doing, GOD (say I) is glorified, both for the present and for the time to come. And it is not only Moses that had used this manner of praying: We see it was common among all the ancient fathers. How often see we it used in the Psalms: and we see also that Jacob did the like. Lord (said he) I am stuffed full of your benefits: when I consider the good that you has done me, I cannot but acknowledge that you has used wonderful mercy towards me: and yet for all that, I am fain now to repair to you for still. Wherefore let us learn, that if Moses being a man of GOD, yea and such a one as had so excellent record, of the holy Ghost, alleged not any deserts of his, nor vaunted of any worthiness of his own part, in his praying unto GOD: much more ought we to confess that we be not worthy to open our lips unto him: and to stoop and to discharge ourselves of all self estimation when we come unto him, so as we presume not upon anything that is in ourselves. Mark that for one point.

But though we be unworthy to pray; we have well wherewith to embolden us, by reason of the great number of benefits that we have received at Gods hand. For his reaching out of his hand unto us, is not to do, us good for one day, but to continue, and to give us access to resort to him again tomorrow. In so much that when GOD has once been gracious to us, thereby he shows that he would have, us to come still to him seeing he has showed us the way and opened us the gate.

So then, Let us learn to call to mind the great number of benefits, whereby GOD has uttered his love towards us, to strengthen ourselves withal, that we may take heart to warrant ourselves by true faith, that he will here us at our needs. And surely, as for them that mind not Gods benefits: they be at their wits end when they come to the pinch. And the same is the very cause why we be so cold in praying, and why we go to it so unlustly, not knowing whether we shall obtain aught or no, or whether our prayers shall be in vain and unprofitable or no. Why so? For we bethink us not of the promises that GOD has made us, and (as you would say) of the hansels which he has given us. He has assured us often times that we shall never come unto him amiss: and we think not upon it at all. Our own unthankfulness therefore, is the let that we have not a true and right trust in him, and that we cannot repair unto him to say, Lord, I doubt not but you are merciful to me, and admits me always unto you, but not for any worthiness of mine. Nevertheless I beseech you remember the benefits that I have received at your hand: for it is upon that trust that I come unto you: hoping that as you has showed yourself gracious and bountiful to me heretofore, so you will continue still unto the end. Thus you see what we have to remember in that Moses said, Lord you has begun to you're your servant the highness of your mighty arm.

Now Moses speaks here expressly of Gods highness and greatness, and of the mighty power of his hand. As if he should say, that God had made him to feel an extraordinary working, and that the grace whereby he was induced to pray unto GOD, was a special one above that which every man feels. For God had uttered an unaccustomed manner of power, so as they were no common things which he showed unto Moses. That then was that cause why he desired to be brought into the land of promise. As if he had said, My God, you knows that you has chosen me, not as some other person among us, but as an elect vessel: & therefore forasmuch as you has used me in your service, now vouchsafe to bring me into the land. And herein we see, that Moses desired this, not so much for his own sake, as for the whole peoples sake, that all of them might have fared the better by it. For it was a thing that might have troubled that weaklings, to see the leader of that people die. You see they were a people that were overbold, at leastwise in rashness: but yet when they should obey God, they were seen to be cowardly enough: and when Moses died, it was enough to have made them utterly unwieldy, insomuch as it might have caused great offence among them. What means this [might they have said?] The Lord was determined to put us in possession of the land: and why does he now bereave us of him whom he had ordained to be our guide? Moses has been his lieutenant unto this hour, and now he goes away to die. It should seem then that God had altered his mind, and intended not to go through with the thing he had begun. Moses had an eye to all this. And therefore, if we look no further, we see so much that more, that his desire was good and holy: but his fault was, that being condemned of God, whereas he ought to have held him to it and not to have gone any further to reply against it: he did it not.

Moreover he adds therewithal, What God is he in heaven or earth, that has done according to your works and according to your mighty power? This manner of speech to say, What God is he in heaven or earth, seems perchance to be fond. For is there any other GOD, than he that had published his law by the hand of Moses? If he alonely be God, then is this comparison superfluous, yea and even fond, and to no purpose. But we have to note that in speaking so, Moses meant not that there is a multitude of Gods, so as every of them wrought according to his own ability and power, and that the GOD of Israel surmounted all the rest, and was mightier than they all: Moses had no such devilish superstition in his head. For he knew well enough that there is but only one God, even he that had revealed himself only to their father Abraham, the very same which had showed by his deeds, that he is that everlasting & unchangeable God: but he spoke so as in respect of men. Although men do generally confess that all good comes of God: yet cease they not to forge idols after their own fancy: insomuch that instead of referring to the true God that made heaven & earth, which revealed himself to the fathers: they wander away after their own imaginations (as says S. Paul,) and fal to devising of they wote not what. As soon as we conceive any whit of the divine Majesty: by and by we be gadding after idols, and turn away from the living God. And thereupon came it that every nation had his God. If man had asked them, what intend you to do, you wretched souls? [they would have answered] we intend to serve God. But yet for all that, they worshipped idols. And why? For they turned away from the simple essence of God, and worshipped the things which they had set up in their own dotages and foolish conceits. According whereunto, when any of them had any welfare or prosperity, they would say, God be praised, God has done us this good turn: but in the meanwhile they fathered all upon their idols. If a man had said to the Egyptians in the time of Moses, now first you have had a fruitful year, you have gotten in good store of Corn and Wine, and whence comes all this? [They would have answered,] it is GOD that has helped us. And yet notwithstanding they worshiped an Ox, they worshipped brute beasts, yea and even Serpents and the herbs of the earth; It was as brutish a kind of dealing as might be. Although this people was dealing sharp witted and subtle above all others: yet were they become so brutish, that they gave over themselves to all the abominations of the world. To be short, when they had either peace, or health, or abundance of wealth: they would say God, God; the word God ran trotting everywhere: But in the meanwhile every man had a God by himself. Such a one was Baal Peor (of whom we shall speak hereafter) which was the GOD of the Ammonites. Thus did idolatry reign every where, and every man had his Patrons and gods by himself. In consideration whereof Moses says, Of a true Lord, men abuse your benefit and when you do them good, (as indeed all proceeds from your hand:) they do utterly forget it, or mar it, or belie it. For they bear themselves on hand that they receive those things of their Gods, that is to say of their idols, which are but leasings and dotages. And so are men utterly overseen. But Lord, howsoever the world fares, you have uttered such a power towards us, as all the Heathen must needs have their mouths flopped, so as they cannot say, These are Gods that have wrought as great miracles as the God of Israel. If your delivering of your people be compared with all the benefits which you have bestowed upon men: it will appear that you are the foreign God, & that you have showed forth your mighty arm in such wise, as all other Gods must needs be cast down. Thus you see what Moses's meaning was. And the Scripture speaks often after that manner, as though it granted men their error. As if we should say, put the case, or admit; not that it is so indeed, but to come by degrees, to the thing that is to be proud. As for example: if we have to do with some Papist: to the intent we may teach him according to his ravenness, we will say: Go to, in praying unto God, let the one side have Jesus Christ for their advocate, and let the other side have the Virgin Mary with the rest of their He saints and She saints: and let us see which is the better. For when a man comes unto God, and sets Jesus Christ before him: he is assured by the holy scripture, that it is Christ's office to be the mean between God and him, and to make intercession for him. And so, he that prays in the name of Jesus Christ, is thoroughly sure that he goes not to work at all adventure. But roughly as for him that takes the Virgin Mary or any other patron, he shall be beguiled when he thinks himself most sure to be heard: for why, he has no warrant. Now then, which is best? We speak after that manner to the Papists, not that we mean it is lawful to have patrons: for then should we abuse Gods name. It is said, that in praying we must bring nothing of our own head, but faith must be our foreleader, and it is as the key to open us that gate. Nevertheless we use such manner of speech to the unbelieving and ignorant sort, to draw them by little and little. So then, Moses makes not comparison of the God of Israel, as though he had concerned in his imagination that there was a swarm of Gods, and that every of them wrought according to his ability: No: he knew well enough that there is but only one God: but forasmuch as he saw men overshoot themselves in that behalf: he said that although all other Nations imagine themselves to receive benefits at the hands of their Gods: yet notwithstanding, the God of Israel had uttered himself with such power, as he only ought to be worshipped, and men might well understand that none reigns but only he, and that the government of heaven and earth belongs to none but only to him, and all men might see by the miracles which he had wrought, that all creatures are in his hand. That then was the meaning of Moses.

Let us mark further, that when the fathers of old time, did by reason hereof despise idols and all those that worshipped them: God did show himself to them also, after a mighty fashion. Their saying is, where are the Gods that & can do like the God of Israel, which has uttered such a mighty power? And indeed we see no visible substance of God: but his will is to have us know him by his showing of himself in his works: that is the way that he will have us to conceive him. Seeing then that God has uttered his mighty power: it is our duty to magnify him and to worship him in such sort, as we defy all the idols that men have forged to themselves, and laugh all the things to scorn that have been brought in by the world. For why, there is nothing but vanity and leasing in them. But forasmuch nothing as we be not of sufficient capacity to judge of Gods works, though they be present before us, none can come right unto him, except he guide us there by his word: let us learn to hold ourselves to this doctrine. Therefore whensoever God makes us to perceive his mighty power: let us bethink us of our own rudeness and infirmity, and by and by take his word to us, to exercise us therein. And let us not play the Paynims and wretched Infidels, who are harping upon that word God with their mouth, and in the mean run trotting up and down knowing not what God is indeed. Let us then follow the infallible truth. And seeing that God has revealed himself unto us, yea even in such sort as we cannot be discerned nor beguiled: let us learn to stay thereupon, and to hold us to it throughout. Let us not be so fond headed, as not to profit ourselves by the benefits that God bestows daily upon us, and by the which he will be glorified: let all superstition and idolatry be beaten down, and let Gods truth have full scope: let all inventions of men cease, and let the world know which is the living God. Thus you see after what manner we must proceed: that is to wit, when we once know God we must worship him, we must go to the perfection, which is only he, and whatsoever is set upon the contrary side against him, it must be brought to naught. For it is not possible for us to worship God as we should do: except we put all things under foot, which men have forged and imagined in their own brain. Wherefore let us learn to exalt him in such wise, is nothing may impeach or darken his prominence. And forasmuch as we know not of ourselves how we should glorify God to yield him his deserved honor: let us take his word for our guide and fetch light at his truth which is in the holy scripture, to the end we may know that there is none but only God to whom we ought to resort, and that it is only he to whom we must yield all praise and thanksgiving.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our god God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done heretofore, that we may return unto him with true repentance: and may that forasmuch as our nature is so corrupted, we may fight without ceasing against our own desires, and hold them in such awe, as we may seek nothing at his hand but that which we know that he allows and likes off: not doubting but that in the meanwhile he will show himself bountiful towards us in providing of all things for us which are meete for us and necessary to our salvation, so as we may learn to submit ourselves to him, glorifying him, and giving him thanks for all his benefits, in such wise as his bounteousness be not buried, but every of us acknowledge more and more how much he is bound unto him, and yield him praise for the same. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also,&c.

On Friday, the 10th of May 1555

The eighteenth Sermon which is the fourth upon the third Chapter

26 And the Lord God was angry with me for your sakes, and heard me not, but said unto me, be contented, speak no more to me of this matter.

27 Get you up to the top of Phasga, and lift up your eyes towards the West, the North, the South and the East: and behold with my eyes: for you shall not go over this Jordan.

28 But charge Josua, and strengthen him, and embolden him for he shall go over before the people, & put them in possession of the land which you shall see,

29 And so we abode in the valley against Beth-Peor.

Told you yesterday, how it was not any fleshly lust that moved Moses to desire to go into the promised land, but a holy zeal, to the end that people might have been the better confirmed in the grace of God. And that it is so, a man may gather by this speech, where he desires expressly to see the good Mountain and the Libanus. For it is very certain, that Jerusalem & the Country about it, were neither the best, nor the fairest, nor the fruitfulest of all urie.it. There were other soils, which were both richer and pleasanter also. And yet does Moses prefer Libanus and the good Mountain before all the rest. And no doubt but he means the Mountain Morca. We see then that he rested wholly upon the things that were spiritual, because God had revealed unto him that the temple should be budded there, & that it was the place which God had chosen to be worshipped and called upon there. That was the cause why he set all his mind upon it. And therefore let us mark, that Moses desired not to enter into that land, to fill his belly there, or to hue in delight and pleasure there: but only to stir up himself the more to know Gods grace, which he had tailed already in spirit, and likewise to help the people by his example. Yet for all this, he is refused, howbeit by not in such wise as if God had utterly rejected him: but as in respect that he intended to chastise him by depriving him of a temporal benefit. And thereby we be yet more confirmed in the thing that was treated of yesterday: that is to wit, that albeit our affections be not always wicked, yet they shall not always be granted us, when God intends to humble us. For sometimes we may have offended him and he must be fain to cut us off from his benefits. True it is that our salvation abides always certain:

but as for our present state, it ap-paircth so far as we can see, insomuch that whereas God made us to feel his favor most abundantly and in very large measure: we have but a small piece of it. If this befell to Moses: let not us think it strange if God deal after the same manner with us.

Now whereas Moses says That he was not heard: it is to be referred to this special fute of his. For God does never quite shake off his faithful ones when they call upon him, at leastwise generally: for he is always merciful to them, and their praying to him is not in vain. But yet for all that, he grants them not every particular thing that they ask of him. It may so happen that a faithful man that shall make some request in his prayer unto God, (yea, for as was said yesterday, there is not a harder thing than to bridle ourselves in such sort, as we pass not our bounds:) there may some such request (I say) flip from a faithful man, as shall be good in itself, and yet notwithstanding, God shall not vouchsafe to grant it. Then is he not heard in that behalf: but yet shall not his prayer be vain and unprofitable. For though he obtain not in that point: yet ceases he not to be in Gods favor, neither does God fail to regard his necessities. So then let us note, that all the prayer of Moses was not rejected at Gods hand, as though he had obtained nothing at all of him: but only as touching that point, wherein it behooved him to have denial at Gods hand. That is the thing which he meant here.

But it is said expressly, That the lord was angry with him for the peoples sake, as we have seen already heretofore. Wherein he means not all together to justify himself but he does it to the end that the people should find their own fault, and humble themselves unto God. If Moses had meant to uphold that he was not in any fault, nor blame worthy: he had covertly accused God. For is it written, that he that sins shall bear his own punishment. Then must it needs be, that Moses was not clear: or else that God did him wrong in punishing him for the peoples sake. But I have declared heretofore, that he glorified not God as he ought to have done. Indeed this appears not by the story: for it should seem there, that he did his duty as well as could be wished: but only God is the competent judge thereof. Although Moses could not be condemned by his words, nor by any outward sign: it is enough that God finds fault with him, and owes that he yielded him not his due honor. You see then that Moses was faulty: and that Gods banishing of him out of the land of promise, was for his offences sake, so as he could not say that he had not deserved such punishment.

Why then does he lay the blame upon the people? As I said before, it is not to clear himself, but to make the people to know their own evil dealing: yea and also to consider, that seeing Moses being so excellent a man, and a man chosen of God, did suffer such reproach and dishonor: they themselves ought to be the more cast down. Thereby then the people is warned to think the better upon their own fault. And in very deed this offence of theirs was very grievous and exceeding great. For we know that Moses had an earnest zeal to serve God, and that it was his whole seeking. Nevertheless the murmuring that rose among the people for want of water, was a tempest to carry Moses away. Behold, Moses is as a rock, he is wholly settled in Gods service: and therefore it must, needs be that the peoples rising in uproar was with horrible violence, even as if a rock were shaken with some tempest. And so we see that the people were utterly destitute of all patience and as good as stark mad, and that it could not be but that the devil possessed them, seeing that the fire of it did even singe Moses. Also this punishment of his shows how great the peoples offence was. What had Moses done? For his own part he desires nothing but to live & die in glorifying God. And yet notwithstanding, God sets a mark of infamy upon him for all ages to see, in restraining him out of the promised land. Since it is so: what punishment do the people deserve, which were the cause of the mischief and the chief authors thereof?

Now to apply this doctrine to our use, let us take good heed that we drive not others to do amiss, least the whole blame light upon our own necks. Not that our thrusting of any man out of the way can quit him: for God will nevertheless correct him for it: but howsoever the World go, we shall be guilty of all the sins that we have occasioned. This ought well to bridle us, to the end that no cause of stumbling proceed from us. And besides this, let us consider that if God have given us governors that labor to discharge their duties: if we vex them in such sort as they swarve or start aside from the right way: we shall yield account of it before God, and at the last his curse will light upon our heads. Hereby all folks are warned to live simply & peaceably in obedience to their superiors, specially when they see them disposed to serve God: to the end that they may take courage, and continue & increase in goodness. And if we fall to raising of trouble and disorder: surely if they that have committed but half a fault be corrected, we shall be double punished, and answer for all the inconvenience, as of a truth we deserve well to be charged with it before God. Thus you see what we have to mark upon that speech, where Moses tells the people again, how it was for their sakes that Lord was angry with him.

Now let us return to the matter which we began with all: that is to wit, that although GOD chastised Moses by bereaving him of a temporal benefit: yet was that no impeachment to his salvation. And so means he by these words, Be contented, and speak no more to me of this matter. In saying be contented: he does him to understand that he had where with to content him, forasmuch as God is still merciful to him, & acknowledges him for one of his, and takes him still as of his household, & casts him not out of his kingdom. Seeing that all these things abide unto him still he showed him that he ought to rest without grieving of himself over much. And it is a very notable and profitable point: namely, that we ought not to be too sorrowful and grieved out of measure, so long as GOD bereave us not of the substance of our salvation. We hear what answer Saint Paul had, when he was afflicted, yea and even buffeted by Satan, and God had cast him down in such sort, that he was as one at the point to be trodden under foot. Now he besought God to be delivered from such temptations: but answer is made him at Gods hand, Let my grace suffice you. GOD tells him he will assist him, but as for the cumbrance, he must bear it still. Therefore let us learn to put a difference between the things that are of the substance of our salvation, and the appurtenances which are indeed the tokens of Gods love and goodness, but yet may be forborne of us wheresoever God thinks good, whether it be to chastise us, or to try our patience, or to any other purpose, that he deal so with us. As for example the things that are of the substance of our salvation are these; that God forgive us our sins, that he keep us under his protection, that he dwell in us by his holy spirit, that the light which he has given us by his Gospel be not quenched, & that we may take him for our father, to call upon him and to flee to him for refuge. So then, the substance of our salvation, is that the feed of faith abide continually in us, that God guide & govern us by his holy spirit, and that he make us feel his goodness, so as we rest there upon. But yet for all this, many temptations may befall us, us, yea even such as may pluck us back from calling upon God. Not that they can shut us quite out from him: but yet they may so cumber us, as we shall not be able to resort to God so freely as we would. Again, we shall be tossed with many sorrows and many heart bitings. On the one side we shall have sickness, and on the other side poverty: besides these, men shall do us wrong and diverse other inconveniences, and to be short, we shall in effect do nothing but pine and languish. Indeed if God dealt so mildly with us, as we might always have our mouths open to praise him, so as there were nothing but mirth and ease in our life: we should perceive his love the more plainly. But yet in the meanwhile, although we be afflicted, although we have much anguish and grief: yet do the substance of our salvation continue still. What is to be done in this case? Let it content us that GOD is our father. Although he handle us not as we would wish, but rather clean contrariwise: so as instead of sweetness, we find bitterness, and he grants not our requests at the first chop, but hides himself from us in our afflictions, as if he had forsaken us, and gives us not meat and drink at our pleasure: [finally] when all things fail us: yet let it suffice us that we have still the warrant of our adoption & that God ceases not to take us and owe us for his children. These (say I) are the things wherewith we must content ourselves, in such wise as all things else must be born patiently by us. And, that is it which we have to mark upon these words where GOD says to Moses, be contented.

But the unbelievers have not this prerogative: God shakes them off quite, if they cry he gives deaf ear to them, neither says he to them for their comfort, be contented: but he lets them chaw upon the bridle, so as they be in horrible unquietness and vexation, and have not wherewith to assuage their sorrow. For they believe not that God bear them a fatherly good will, nor that he receives them into his favor. So, now we see more clearly the thing that I touched briefly before: that is to wit, that Gods refusing of the faithful, is not an utter rejecting of their prayers, as though their calling upon him had not booted them at all: but he grants them generally that which is good for their salvation. And as for in the rest, he cuts them out their morsels, so as he grants them not whatsoever they wish, neither were it for their welfare that he should so do.

Therefore must we bear this lesson so in mind, as we may be able to put it in use: that is to wit, that if we obtain not all that ever we fain would at Gods hand: but that when we resort unto him, he fuffreth us to linger stil in our miseries & eases us not of our troubles at the first, so as we drag our wings after us as they say: we must bethink us of this, that we must be contented. And why? for it is good reason that we should yield to the good pleasure of our God, seeing he reserves this inestimable benefit and privilege to us, that we be still mustered in the array of his children.

And besides this, let us assure ourselves that God furthers our souls health, in refusing to grant us the things that he knows to be un-meete for us. We see that diverse times he granted that disobedient their desires: but that was not to their benefit. It had been much better for them to have gone without them, and that God had said them flat none of them. Contrariwise, when he denies our requests, and makes us to perceive that it is not reason that our lusts should range unbridled, and we have all that our fancy runs upon; his making of us to perceive all this, is to our benefit. As for example, if a child have a fickle head, (as commonly all children lack discretion) and desire his father some fond or evil thing: if his father set him have his swinge like a goose: he puts the halter about his neck, by cockering of him too much. But if he show him a grim look, and make him perceive that he is a lightheaded boy, without wit or discretion: his child will be the better for it afterward, and this correction whereby his foolish appetite is repressed, will do him good. Even so does God towards us: for he knows it is much better for us to have our lusts subdued, than to give them too much liberty. And that is that cause why he did so precisely deny Moses request.

We know that if ever man obtained favor in Gods sight, it was Moses in especially above all other. For God did him the honor to show himself familiarly unto him face to face, as a friend does to his companion: for so does the scripture itself report: and yet you see his request was refused: [for it was said unto him,] Speak no more to me of this matter. He does [as it were] threaten him. Now if Moses were thus dealt with: let us understand that we ought not to take it too much to heart, if God deal roughly with us nowadays, and make no haste to succour us, but rather that to our seeming the misery increases double, after we have prayed unto him. Let us not think the matter strange: for it shall turn to our benefit. To be short, let us learn to bear all temporal corrections patiently which God sends unto us. Although our condition wax worse and worse to the world ward, although we have a heavy burden to bear, although we have many hard and grievous things to endure: yet notwithstanding we must come to this point, that forasmuch as they be but temporal chastisements, we may well hold ourselves quiet, for our salvation abides still unappeared. And although we obtain not something which we ask: yet must we not think ourselves utterly barred from it, until our Lord show us by some evident sign. As how? When a man is in trouble, he repairs unto God, and craves mercy, and yet he finds no relief but instead of easement he finds himself tormented double. All that he gains by his calling upon God, is that his misery is increased. But yet for all this he must not be discouraged, but continue still in praying unto God. And therewithal we must consider thus: God knows to what end he does it. And his delaying to grant us our request, is to show us that although he suffer us to languish in our adversities: yet does he not forget us nor disdain to be our father still, but only teaches us to obey him and to be subject to him. After that manner then must we behave ourselves in praying. When it shall seem that we have lost our time in calling upon God: yet must we still come back calling to this comfort, saying: No, God shows me that it is not meete for me to ask whatsoever I think good, but that I must come and put myself into his hands with all humbleness, to receive what he thinks good, and to hold all my desires in obedience unto him. Seeing that he shows me this, it behooves me to frame myself thereunto, and to take that to be best for me which he shall vouchsafe to send me. Thus you see what we have to remember in the text where God tells Moses that he will not have him to speak any more of his going into the land of

But yet for all that, he showed him the land a far off. And no doubt but that the sight of Moses reached beyond the ordinary sight of nature, and beyond all that he could conceive within kenning. True it is that in the end of this book it is said, that even in his old age, although he was then fixefcore years old, yet his senses were not appaired, but continued still in their full strength. Nevertheless, when as it is said, that he extended his sight so far, as that he could view all the countries of the land of Chanaan: [it is evident] that God gave him sight above the power of nature. And all this tended to this end, that Moses might be assured, that Gods delivering of the people was not to the end to leave them in the midway, or to leave his promise unperformed which he had made to his servant Abraham. And his assuring of Moses thereof, was not only for Moses own sake, but also for all the peoples sake to encourage the weaker fort, that they might take heart to enter the more boldly into the possession of their inheritance after his decease, not doubting but that God would still reach them his; mighty hand. That was the cause why this great sight was given to Moses. And we must not marvel that God showed him the land of Chanaan after that sort: seeing he had already revealed Mount Sion & More unto him in spirit. Moses then was confirmed by all means, not for himself only but chiefly for the edifying of the people. Here by the way we be taught defying, to receive such taste of his grace as he gives us, though we have but some little sealing of it, and enjoy it not yet to the full. Moses standing upon the top of the mountain, saw the land a far off: it behooves him to stay there and to thank God for that sight. Likewise sometime God will make us to feel his grace very slenderly, at leastwise in respect of our desire: for we would fain have our fill of it, we would have him to give it us more plainly: but that would not be good for us. Why? Sometimes we might not call upon him: but all things ought to be submitted to his will? Yet notwithstanding, we may chance to see some little spark of Gods grace a far off or else perhaps he will make us to feel it: but that shall be so slenderly, as it shall seem that his intent was but to provoke our appetite, and to whet our wit, and not to content us.

But yet must we be contented to receive whatsoever he give thus. Although our flesh would carry us further: yet must we restrain ourselves as prisoners, and in so doing follow the example of Moses. For if Moses had been like to such as are impatient and fall to striving against God: he would have held scorn to go up into the mountain. It is to much purpose (would he have said) for me to go break my shins in climbing up this hill, to go see the moon shine in the water up. I can forbear such a sight. After that fashion would they deal, which are not yet come to such meekness, as to be as lambs and sheep. But Moses showed well, that notwithstanding that he was the shepherd of the people, notwithstanding yet was he also a very sheep indeed, so as GOD might guide and govern him as he lifted. When he said to him, get you up into the hill: he knew he should have no more but a sight of the land, and that the same sight should be a renewing of his grief, so as he should sigh at it might say, Alas I am banished from the possession of this good land, which I see before my face: my desire is but to make a step over this Jordan, and I am forbidden it. He knew this. Yet notwithstanding forasmuch as God had commanded him, he received his grace, yea and he received it with such affection, as he replied not to the contrary. Not that he could not have found in his heart to have had it otherwise: but for that he did thrust his own will under foot, to the end that GOD might have the whole mastery of him. Therefore let us learn to be meek. When our Lord is so minded to bring us under awe, and grants not the things that we could like of: let not us on our side refuse or disdain the small taste of his grace which he give thus, waiting till he give us a larger discovery and fruition thereof. For in this world we must be exercised after that manner: and we must apply all our endeavor thereunto. Insomuch that if GOD give us not such knowledge of his grace as we may hold it (as you would say) in our hands: or as we may have our fill of it: or as we may triumph in it: yet must we call upon him still, And if he give it us drop by drop, and there withal we have store of grief and sorrows, [so as we might say,] what will become of this? Why does not GOD admit me more familiarly unto him? Why does he not enrich me with his goods? Why does he not bestow his benefits upon me in greater measure? when we be in such case, we must come to this point, [that we may say,] he deals no worse with me than he dealt with Moses. So then let us patiently accept this manner of Gods dealing, which he uses to humble us: and in the mean reason let us not forbear to hope further. For if we perceive not out of hand whither we tend: let it suffice us that God shows us a far off, the good which he has prepared for us. And if we have not the fruition of it in this world let us be contented that he has laid it up for us in heave, and that it cannot fail us there: as in very deed the land of Chanaan was unto Moses as a sign and sacrament of the kingdom of heaven: and yet he did but see it a far off. Nevertheless, howsoever the case stood with him, he had still a warrant that God would not bereave him of his inheritance in heaven. That was the point that he rested on: and so must we do too.

He adds that he must instruct, strengthen, and encourage Josua, for it is he that must lead the people of Israel. Hereby the obedientness of Moses is yet better warranted unto us. For how many are thereto be seen, which would be loth to employ themselves in doing the things that God commands them doing, unless GOD gave them the honor as well as the charge? But Moses resignes the honor and dignity that he had received: God puts him out of office. He should have been the leader of the people, to bring them into the land of Chanaan, and you see he is deposed from his office with dishonor and shame. Now had he been as one of these worldlings which know not what it is to give over themselves plainly unto God: or had he been as a number are, who being carried away with ambition and vain glory, will always needs be had in estimation: he would never have yielded to do anything to Josua. But behold, God tells him here, you must resign your state to Josua, and you must instruct him, to the end he may be set in your place: and know you that he is worthy to be my lieutenant, to lead my people into the possession of their inheritance. Since we see that Moses was ready hereupon to give over his authority, so as God should bereave him thereof, and yet he himself not only bear no grudge to Josua his servant when he saw him exalted in his room: but also instructed him, and sought to surrender his own gracious gifts unto him, as if he should have plucked all the good out of his own heart, to have said unto Josua, take here that which, belongs unto you, to the intent that all may redound to the welfare of the people, and I henceforth become as a poor naked man: since we see (say I) that Moses was at that point: have we not an evident proof that he regarded not himself? and that he sought not anything else but that God might be glorified? and that when he had finished his course, the people might still have a faithful man to guide and govern them? Specially seeing that even in his lifetime, when he saw Gods grace flourish and increase in a mean person which was set in prominence over him, he not only envied him not, but also was willing to help & further him, that he might be able to execute his charge when he were succeeded in his place? This verily is written in commendation of Moses: but it serves also for our instruction, to the end we may learn to submit ourselves, to our God: that whensoever he lifts to exalt others in our place, we may be glad of it, wishing that the same may redound to the benefit of that people, and endeavoring to help those whom God has chosen and elected, so as he may always reign & govern, and that whensoever it pleases him to exalt men, it may suffice us that he be glorified in them, and none of us be self-willed in that behalf, but all in general seek the maintenance of the whole body of the Church in her state, and the benefit, welfare and prosperity of the same. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this text.

Furthermore let us mark also, that whereas Moses is commanded to strengthen Josua: therein God shows us the effectual working and force of his word. The encouraging of a man, specially to so excellent a work, is no small matter. And by what mean is that done? By good teaching, by and by holy exhortations. Thus are there two things to be noted in effect. The one is such as are set in authority have need to be instructed and strengthened, that they may be able to do their duty. The second is, that the Gods word has this use and property to frame those which else should be vnmccete, and to strengthen them when they be weak: and to be short, to make them fit in all points to execute their office, and whatsoever is appointed them by God.

Therefore let them that are called to any charge or authority look well to themselves. For they be not abler men than Josua was, who had done a notable act already now forty years ago, in outstandmg the rebellion of the whole people. Not withstanding that they would have stoned him, and that he saw so great, and (as you would say) so infinite a multitude against him, which was not of an hundred men, neither of rascals, or of no estimation, but there were more than six hundred thousand men that did set themselves against him: and yet for all that he bear out the brunt, with invincible constancy, and maintained Gods quarrel. Josua had done this deed forty years before: and yet not withstanding he is fain to be encouraged still, he is fain to receive new instruction, he is fain to be confirmed yet better and better. Now that, what shall those do which are as silly beasts, & can do nothing? If a man examine them thoroughly, although there be some good seed of virtue in them, alas, they come far short of the perfection that was in Josua. Then if they cannot find in their hearts to be taught, and to be strengthened that they may the better serve God: are they not worthy to be put to reproach, so as they may not discern what uprightness and justice mean, but commit so gross crimes as even little children may laugh them to scorn, and all the world be ashamed of them? Thus much concerning the first point.

Wherefore let them that are called to any charge, whether it be to that ministering of Gods word, or to the executing of justice as touching earthly government, or to be masters or fathers: let them all (every one in his own vocation) understand, that they have need to be instructed, or else that they cannot furnish out the place to perform their duty. Let that serve for one point. Now were this well observed: we should not see so many scornful persons as there are. For under color that a man is advanced to some authority, he may no more be spoken to: for he cannot be but wise enough, seeing he is in authority. But it is clean contrary, as we see here, and as God has also well showed, in that he has given Kings a special commandment to have the books of his law about them, as we shall see in due place hereafter.

And now must we also note the second point, which has been touched already: that is to wit, that if we purpose to be well taught, if we purpose to be confirmed, if we purpose to be wholly disposed to do the things that our duty requires: we must repair to Gods school. For he has given the power and efficacy to his word, not only to teach us to know what is good, and to give us wisdom and skill: but also to make us strong to go through with our affairs as we ought to do, so as we be able to withstand all evil, and to overcome all the stops and lets which the devil shall thrust in our way. To be short, to the end we may be able to compass all things well, and to go through with the things that God commands us: let us be ready to hearken unto God, and be willing to receive instruction by his word. And it is certain, that if we have that by, it will never fail us, for it is a good school master. But (as I said) it is good reason that men should continue in the beastliness, and that GOD should discover their shame, when they will not submit themselves to him, but are so stately that they think it a needless thing to be taught, because they be no young children any more. Alas, that is even the very cause why god withdraws his blessing from them. But contrariwise, let us do as Josua did. If God be so gracious unto us as to teach us: let us be ready to receive instruction, and then shall we be ready invincible. Albeit that Satan do practice all that ever he can against us: and albeit that the wicked be as bars to flop us, so as by all likelihood we cannot set forward one step, nor stir one finger: yet shall we be strengthened by the power of God, so we follow the order that is showed us here.

Now for a conclusion, it is said of Moses and the people, that they abode in the valley over against the Temple of Pheor. For Beth Pheor is as much to say, as the house of that Idol Pheor: and the word House is put for a Temple. This is not set down for nought: for it was Gods will to add this as the upshot of condemnation unto Moses, that he was fain to have the Temple of an Idol continually before his eyes, He was chosen to lead the people of Israel into the land of Chanaan. And it is certain that he himself murmured not against God, nor letted the people from coming there: but yet for all that, when it came to the point that he should have made the water to come out of the rock, he went not to it cheerfully, but was (as you would say) over grieved in his mind, so as he gave not glory unto God, By means whereof whereas Gods service should, have been set up in the land, and whereas there should have been such a melody in calling upon his name, as all superstitions should have been rooted out, and as all the things that had been showed him in the mountain should have been put in practice, that Gods majesty might have been seen shining in the midst of the people: instead of having so goodly and (as you would say) angelical order: he is fain to see himself as it were defiled with it, he is driven to behold the abominations that were daily committed by the heathen as it were in despite of God, he is driven to see the true religion overthrown: and this could not be but a great heartbreaking to him, and work a terrible vexation in his mind. Now upon this example we have to gather, how it is not for naught that our Lord causes us to see things that ought to offend us and to cast us into great heaviness. And why? For we be not worthy to see his service thoroughly in good order, and to see his religion purely and fondly observed, so as he might be worshipped with one common consent throughout all the world. We be not worthy to enjoy such a benefit. For the full perfection of all felicity that we can have in this world, is that GOD be served and honored, and that in such wise, as all superstitions, all abuses, and all other things that may corrupt his service, be laid down. But for example sake, we see at this day how God mingles many of his faithful ones among the Papists, where they be fain to behold among abominations daily with their eyes, and are held in so straight bondage, as they dare not open the mouths to speak against them. They see Gods temples turned into no better than brothel houses, and fraughted with so fowl and filthy baggage, that it were much better that Temples or Churches were never spoken of, than to have such as are in the popedom. But yet this are that poor faithful ones driven to behold. And why? For they be not worthy to see such reformation as they desire, God tends to humble them, and he knows, to what end. And least we should perk up above other men to say, here is no corruption: alas, what are we? Though there be not open Idolatry, among us. Is there not a horrible contempt of God by swearing, and a rebelling against his word? Is there not such a beastliness to be seen in a great number, as it were much better for them to become Turks and Heathen men, than to pretend the name of Christianity which they abuse so shamefully? Are they not seen to be manifest despisers of God, and to bewray themselves in such forte, as even little children may discern it? Now then since we see such corruptions among us: let us understand that they be the rewards of our sins. And therefore let us bewail our case, assuring ourselves that Gods suffering of such mingle-mangle among us, is to make us perceive that we deserve well to be so entangled. Yea, which worse is, we see this come to pass, even where the Gospel was purely preached. Is not the hellish corruption of the Interim returned again? Does not the world see how idolatry is set up again by it? And think we that this is happened without Gods just punishment? Now therefore let us look well to it, that like as it was Gods will to humble his servant Moses and all the people, by facing them with the temple of a cursed idol: so likewise now a days, since we see so great corruptions, since we see religion disguised, since we see on the one side idolatry, and on the other side looseness and occasion of stumbling: let us understand that all this comes through Gods just vengeance, by reason of our sins. Wherefore let us humble ourselves and mourn, until it please God to set al things again in such order and plight, as we may all call upon him with one common accord, may forasmuch as the same is the end whereunto he has set us together, and for the which he has redeemed us so dearly with the blood of his son.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to mortify them more and more, that we may learn to be so subdued, as our whole seeking may be to obey him, and to glorify him in all things that he lists to do, and that in the meanwhile we may not be wedded to our own affections and fleshly lusts, but that although we have never so many encumbrances in this world, & never so many means to turn us from the right way: yet not withstanding we may go through with the course of his calling, until he have delivered us from all Satan callings traps, and from all things that he sets before us to make us turn head, and to hinder us from going forward to our salvation, even till we become thither. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also &c.

The nineteenth Sermon which is the first upon the fourth Chapter

1 Now then O Israel, hearken to the ordinances and Laws which I teach you to do, that you may live and go in and possess the land, which the Lord God of your fathers gives you?

2 You shall not add anything to the word which I command you, neither shall you take anything from it, to intent you may keep the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you.

He conclusion that Moses makes here, is well worthy to be marked: for it makes for the matter which has been expounded heretofore: that is too wit, that we have need to be prepared to the obeying of our God, because we be disobedient of our own nature, and our affections draw contrary to his will, insomuch that whereas he will have us to walk uprightly, there is nothing but utter lewdness in us. Again, if we happen to have any good disposition & desire to walk after Gods commandments: we start away incontinently in the turning of a hand, and there is no constancy in us turning towards any good. On the other part, we have a forte of foolish dotages? which carry us away, so as we will needs be ever disputing with God, yea and wiser than he. Therefore have we, need to be subdued and humbled by all means, or else God shall never be able to weld us. For this cause it is laid, that the people heard not the law published unto them one day only, but that they were often times put in day mind of it. And that forasmuch as they were stubborn, GOD had subdued them by many chastisements, as by leading them about in the wilderness the space of forty years, to ensure them to obedience: and by trying them diverse ways to teach them that it was no refuting of such a master.

After that Moses has treated of all those things: he says, Hearken now O Israel, what I tell you in the name of God. As if he should say, it is time now or never for you to begin to walk in obedience, that you be no more like wild folk as you have been, that you give nor head to your wicked lusts, that you be not so fierce as to shake off Gods yoke, and that you stick not to your own fond inventions which make you to run astray: but that you bear well in mind what you have endured. For if you cannot yet bow your necks to submit yourselves to to your GOD: in the end he must be fain to break you, if you will not bow. Now hear you his voice, says he. And we must apply this to our use. That is to say, Seeing it is now a great while ago since we began to hear the word of God: we must not be still as young noises, we must not be like the young bullocks or Steers which cannot yet skill what it is to bear the yoke: but we must be thoroughly acquainted with obeying. If they that never were taught Gods truth be wild-headed and cannot find in their hearts to stoop at the first, but run gadding here and there after a number of worldly vanities: it is not to be wondered at. True it is that that shall not serve to excuse them: no surely: for seeing that God has created us to the end to serve and honor him: we ought to give ourselves wholly unto him, even from our mother's wombs.

Nevertheless if we be somewhat strange for want of teaching: it may be born withal among men. But if at the end of twenty years, when we have had our ears continually beaten with the Gospel, so as GOD has spoken unto us early and late, and [cried out unto us] to waken us: we abide still at our Abfic, and wot not what rule or doctrine means: must it not needs be said that we be of too untoward a nature? Yes: and that is it which the Apostle means in saying, you ought by this time to have been great doctors in respect of the time that you have gone to school: and behold you be still raw and unlearned, so as it should seem that GOD never spoke to you. According then to the time that God of his grace shall have bestowed in teaching of us by his word: let us learn to yield ourselves the more teachable, and to show that he has not lost his labor, but that we have profited well in his school. And this points at us in specially. For how long time has the Gospel been preached among us? so as we heard nothing else every day, but what Gods will is. Now then, it is good reason that we on our side should not be so strange, but that we should consider, that we ought not to be still new to begin, in the things that have been told us so often already. And again we must profit also as well by chastisements as by teaching. If GOD have humbled us in any wise, because he sees that we cannot otherwise be subdued unto him, so as he has tamed one with sickness, and another with poverty, after what fashion so ever GOD has made us to feel his hand: let us look well to it that we profit ourselves thereby, and that this word Now which Moses uses here, be wel printed in our heart: and mind. So that if we have been overseen, if we have not at the first been so well disposed to live as it becomes us, if we have not been so forward as we ought to have been in running to our God when he has called us: at leastwise let us not continue lo hardhearted and stubborn to the uttermost.

But now let us see in effect what Moses requires here. Hearken O Israel (says he) to the ordinances and statutes which I teach you to do, that you must live and enter into the land which the Lord your God gives you, and possess it. Here Moses declares that our life shall always be full of disorder and confusion, until we have yielded so much authority unto God over us, as to have the [whole] guiding of us, and that we have made our account to rest simply upon his word. To be short, we be taught here, to rid ourselves of all self-weaning, and that when the case concerns how to live well, we must not step to it upon our own head, and after our own fancy, to say, this seems good to me. Whereat must we then begin? At learning, as Moses declares. And therefore he that gives care unto God, to receive whatsoever is told him from him, shall be well learned; But on the contrary part, until such time as we have heard our GOD speak, and that he have performed the office of a teacher towards us: it is certain that our life shall be quite out of order. We may well flatter ourselves as ignorant wretches do, who bear themselves in hand that the world goes as well with them as is possible, when in the meanwhile they be no better than bewitched, so as there is neither wit nor discretion in them. You see then that the thing which we have to mark upon this text, is that if we mean not to lead a disordered life, and such a one as God utterly mislikes: we must hearken unto him. And here it appears of what value good intents (as they term them) are: whereof I will treat more at length anon. For if it behove us to hear God speak before we lift up one foot to go forward: what will become of us when every of us is wedded to his own fancy, and when our lusts are so wild? Does it not appear that God refuses all such things in one word? Again, Moses tells us that God on his side, will teach us faithfully, fondly, and perfectly: conditionally that we refuse not to be ruled by him and to obey him. And he uses no words than one. For he could have said, hearken to the Law, or hearken to his commandments: but he says, hearken to his features and ordinances. And in other places he sets down Statutes, ordinances, commandments, and rules. This is not a superfluous speech, but it serves to express the better, that it is long of none but ourselves that we be not well and faithfully taught. But what for that? Men are so lusty, as they cannot temper themselves to that simplicity of Gods word, to say that it shall suffice them to be governed by God, and to receive whatsoever is set before them in his name. Men cannot abide such modesty: but are always itching after their own inventions, and yet in the meanwhile do still arm themselves with starting holes: according as we see nowadays that a number do grant that holy scripture to be good, but they say also that it is expedient to supply that wants that are in it: & that is a cursed blasphemy, in as much as it accuses God of oversight, or else of envy, for not setting down all that is requisite to our salvation. But yet shall this saying hold, spite of all the world, that the law of God is a full and perfect doctrine wherein there wants not any thing: and that if our life be ruled thereafter, it is certain that there shall no fault be able to be found in it: and that we cannot walk after that manner, but that if the world condemn us, God will not fail to allow of us: and that ought to be enough for us.

But here with all Moses shows the end also why he taught the people: not to the end that every man should know what was good, and then make no further account of it: but to the end that their lives should be answerable thereunto. God then sets us down a doctrine of practice as they say. And therefore it is not enough for a man only to know Gods word, but he must also be transformed into it by beholding it as God's image, as Saint Paul speaks thereof. To what end then does God speak unto us? not to the end we should but nod at it or listen with our ear to it, to ratify his sayings by speech or by signs: but to that end we should give proof by our whole life that he is our father and master, and that he has all prominence over us: and that whereas we be his creatures, we be his children too. Let us mark well then, that our coming here to hear Gods word, must not be to go away as we came: but if our life be changed, and that we have learned to frame ourselves according to that which God has told us: that is the very right use of it. Otherwise we do but unhallow Gods word, and we shall be found guilty of high treason towards him, for disappointing of the operation thereof. But what? So little is this observed nowadays of such as name themselves Christians: that instead of performing the things that are commanded them, they vouchsafe not to come where they may be taught one word, but which worse is, do shun all learning.

There are to be seen which can brag well enough that they be faithful: and yet there needs none other try all to know what they be, than their manifest despising of Gods word more than the Turks or Jews do. For these have yet some reverence of religion, but the devils that are among us, come to sermons like dogs and Oxen, without any honesty or modesty.

Other some come there to sleep, so as it should seem that their meaning is to spite God openly and to spit in his face: it should seem that they be desirous to show some sign of their lewdness and beastliness, how detestable they be. To be short although they speak it not, yet do they bear a mark in their foreheads for all men to behold with their eyes, that they seek to deface Gods glory to the uttermost of their power. Another forte do make countenance to hearken, and yet make but a flim-flam of it (as they say). For what shall a man find in all their life? Nothing but desperate disobedience. But yet for all that, Gods word has not changed his nature. Wherefore if we look not about us to frame ourselves accordingly thereunto, we must needs come to account, for defiling so holy a thing, which GOD has ordained to so worthy and noble an use.

And herewithall Moses adds, that God requires not any thing at our hands in respect of himself, or for any profit that he shall have by it, but for our own welfare. To the end {said he} that you must enter into the land that it given you for you inheritance, and possess it. Herein Moses protests, that God looks not for any reward at our hands, for he has no need or anything: but it is for our profit that he would have us to serve him. He could well enough forbear us: but yet is he desirous to have us, and he would that we should suffer him to govern us. Seeing then that God in all respects shows such love and regard of our welfare: are we not worse than wild beasts if we be still hard to yield, and cannot find in our hearts to come to him but against our wills? If God should but only command us after a precise fashion, yet were we bound to do whatsoever he bides us: yea and although he should use the greatest rigor that could be, yet might not we refuse to do our duty towards him. But he forbears that authority of his, as though he yielded up some part of his right, and uses another manner of speech, [as if he should say,] you owe me all things, for you be mine: and yet for all that, the service which you do me shall be accepted in so good worth, as you shall perceive that I take you for my children, you shall feel my gracious goodness and benefits in all fortes, and to be short you shall not loose your labor. Seeing then that God stoops thus unto our rudeness: ought not we to be ravished at so great goodness? And although we had all the lets in the world against us: ought it not rid them all quite away? Otherwise, what an unthankfulness were it?

Therefore let us learn, that whensoever God matches promises with his commandments: it is to win us by gentleness, because he sees us so flow as is pitiful, and therefore he assures us as a father that flatters his children as you say. That is the that thing which we have to gather here.

Now if we consider this lesson well: we shall not say as the Papists do. That seeing God promises reward to such as shall have served him, it appears thereby that we deserve, and that God is as well bound unto us, as we to him. But clean contrariwise, Gods promising us, to do us good, is not for that our service can deserve aught at his hand, nor for that he is or can be beholden to us for anything: but his showing of himself so free hearted towards us as to forbear his own right, proceeds of his own free bestowed goodness, as I have declared afore, Surely the Papists do well show themselves. Surely to be puffed up with devilish pride, when they presume after that forte to abuse Gods fatherly goodness. He could do no more, except he should make us cockneys as I have said already: and yet notwithstanding, mortal men which are but carrion and dung, fall to advancing of themselves and lay it is a token that God is bound unto them. Now then let us bear in mind, that the promises which GOD sets before us to provoke and encourage us to do him service, serve not to show that he owes us anything, or that we can deserve aught at his hand: but they be a record unto us of his free bestowed goodness, inasmuch as he binds himself to us of his own good will, notwithstanding that he cannot be anyway indebted unto us.

Moreover it behooves way us to mark that in speaking, Moses sets that law in the first place, to the end to lead the people yet further. For by the law we know our duty and how we ought to live: that is to wit, that we ought to love God with all our heart, with all our mind, with all our affections, and with all our powers: and that we ought to love our neighbors as ourselves. Now when we once know this: we must see whether we be able to do it or no; But so unable is any man living to discharge himself thereof: that we cannot so much as stir one finger to begin it. Therefore are we all guilty before God. And what is there to be done? We must flee for refuge to his grace, and there withal beseech him to be merciful to us in forgiving us our sins: and moreover to vouchsafe to reform us forasmuch as he sees that we be not only weak but also utterly unable to do any good, because there is nothing but corruption in us: And finally that when he has made this law to be preached unto us, he vouchsafe also to engrave it in our hearts, and to, give us such a mind as we may seek to serve him. This is the manner of proceeding which we have to bear in mind, proceeding in that it is said that the law is preached mind unto us, to the end we should serve our God: as indeed the end whereto it tends is to show men what they ought to do.

Now here with all let us examine all our own abilities, and we shall find ourselves overwhelmed, and that we be all of us cursed and damnable, if God added not a remedy to draw us out of the curse which the law brings upon us. And therefore Saint Paul shows that if men will needs hold themselves to the law, they shall be damned without any further hope of salvation. And why? for it is written, he that does these things why shall live in them. Now then (says Saint Paul) let every man look into himself, and examine his whole life: is there any man that is able to vaunt that he has fulfilled Gods law? No, we be all disobedient. Seeing the case stands so, there is no more life in the Law: but we must rather flee to the free forgiveness of sins, and specially beseech God to give us power to do that which we cannot. And so whereas the Papists do make themselves drunken with their devilish imagination of meritorious works and such other like things: let us understand that after our Lord has assured us by gentleness, he adds a second grace: which is, that albeit we be not able to perform his commandments thoroughly in all respects, yet he bears with us as a father bears with his children, and inputs not our sins unto us, but receives our half services as though they were whole and perfect, not for any worthiness they that he finds in them, but because he purposes to play the father with us. Mark that for another point.

Besides these, there is a third grace which he uses: which is, that he engraves his law in our hearts, insomuch that whereas he sees our hearts to be as hard as stone or stithies, he makes them as soft as flesh, and meekens them they may be obedient. And he not only prepares us after that manner to serve him: but also gives us discretion, power and performance. Since we see this, let us put all meriting or deserving out of mind, and let us not be presumptuous as to advance ourselves anyway: but as we have just cause to abase ourselves, so let us with all humbleness give the glory unto god. Thus you see what we have to do, that we may take profit by that doctrine contained here.

And immediately hereunto Moses adds, That men must purely and simply follow the doctrine that he commands, without putting anything to it or taking anything from it. To the intent (says he) that your may keep the commandments of your God which I enjoin you. Before we proceed any further, we must mark the authority that Moses takes to himself in this text. He had said heretofore, I teach you: and now he says, I enjoin or command you. And why is that? To say that he speaks not in his own name, but as sent from a greater master, in respect where of it is meete that every man should wholly submit himself to him without gainsaying. And here we see how all true prophecies ought to behave themselves, and all such as have charge to preach Gods word, or have the government of the Church: that is to wit, they must be sure that God has sent them, so as they attempt not anything go of their own head, but speaks as in the name of God, and utter all their saying as on his behalf. Being once at that stay, then must they also maintain Gods majesty, and deal in such wise as the doctrine may be received with all reverence, and no man step up to encounter it. To be short, there are two things requisite in all good shepherds. The one is, that for their part they must not burden men with any tyranny or invent laws to tie their consciences, thereby to bring them in bondage, nor forge any doctrine upon their own head, but faithfully deal forth the things that are committed unto them. Have they that? Then let them advance the thing which they know to proceed of GOD, so as they suffer not the heavenly doctrine to be scorned, but show men that they ought to reverence GOD, and to submit themselves to his word, and let them withstand all lustiness that vaunts itself against him. After which manner we see how God strengthens his Prophets, telling them that they must not pass for any mans greatness, nobleness, or aught else, but rebuke the Mountains and set themselves against the Hills: that is to say let them not shrink for men, but let them show that the word which they bring, and which is committed to them, is as it were Gods royal mace, at the which all creatures ought to stoop and to bow their knees. You see then that all ministers of Gods word ought to seek those two things.

But yet for all that, we see the clean contrary. For such as reign with roughness and churlishness (as Ezechiel terms it) pass not to keep this rule of Moses, which is, to serve God purely. For we see that Pope and all the filthy rabble of the Clergy (as they term themselves) are ever thundering, and would not have men in any wise to open their lips against any point [of their doctrine,] but that they should without any gainsaying observe whatsoever they list to ordain. Yea Mary, but in the meanwhile whence have they their stuff? Whence do they preach it? It is enough for them that they may lord it, & they bear themselves on hand that they may hold the poor souls under their tyranny, which were redeemed with the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. But neither Moses nor any of that Prophets did ever give themselves such liberty: for they speak in Gods name, without setting forth anything of their own. Let us then learn to hearken to such as come in the name of God, and discharge their duties vnfeignedly. Again we see that such as should maintain Gods truth, do let all slip, and though they see never so much disorder: it grieues the never a whit, neither do they pass though all go to havoc. And why? Because they have no zeal at all to advance the Majesty of Gods word. Also on the other side we see a number that want themselves to be Christians, which can as much skill of the reverence that Moses speaks of here, as if they had been brought up in a swine's sty or on a dung hill. Are there not a number to be seen which will say continually, tuff, you have nothing to do to command me? Yes: and you my friend are a very brute beast in so saying, for if I have not to do to command you, you have no more Christianity in you than in a dog. For when we preach Gods word, to what end is it? That God should be the servant? Or the master? Let that be well considered. Speak we in our own names? Or set we forth anything that is not given us in commission of God? Now, he will have us to represent his person: and yet we must neither command, nor bear any sway at all for these rascals and vnthriftes, which advance themselves with exceeding unshamefastness to fight against God. But what? You see what the Christianity of Geneva is, where the Gospel has been preached this twenty years, insomuch that that very walls ought to ring of it, and the very paving of the streets ought to bear some mark of Gods truth: and yet these wood beasts continue still in their gross and barbarous rebelliousness, so as they be worse than bulls with their horns, or I ought not what other beasts. Yet notwithstanding it cannot be wiped out of Gods Register, but that whensoever Gods word is preached both great and small must receive it, at leastwise if we acknowledge it to be Gods truth. Yea and we must receive it with such reverence, as to think thus with ourselves: behold, it is our God that speaks: and if he be our master, do not we owe him all honor? What is to be done then, but only to show by our deeds, that uor whole seeking is to be ruled quietly by him? Thus you see what we have to remember here, in that Moses speaks not as in the person of a mortal man, but takes upon him the authority to command: howbeit not as challenging anything to himself, but as being desirous to be heard, because he was a faithful setter forth of Gods law: showing also that he had vengeance ready prepared for all such as would check against him, or reject the doctrine that he did set forth.

He said yet further, that men must neither add anything to that which he commands, nor take anything from it, to the end they may keep Gods commandments. Whereas he said that nothing must be added nor diminished: it is to show the thing that I touched even now: that is to wit, that God minds to try our obedience; by restraining us from fetching our windlasses, and from scoterloping over the fields, to raught at everything we like off: and to hold us fast tied and bound unto his word. Then is it not enough for us to receive that which God sends us, and to allow it as good: but we must acknowledge it to be our whole wisdom,(as shall be added hereafter in this Chapter)so as we be not skilful to mingle anything with Gods word, but conclude thus with ourselves: Seeing God has spoke it. it is not lawful for mortal men to interlace anything with, but they must be contented with that which they have heard of such a master. This is in effect the meaning of Moses. And this is not said in this place only: we shall see it repeated again hereafter in the twelfth Chapter, and in other places, and the scripture is full of it. And yet we see there is not any thing worse kept, than this present exhortation. And what is the cause thereof? That men do take it for a principle, that they have always some reason with them, and that they be of sufficient ability to govern themselves as they ought to do. Thus then does pride take the first place, when men will needs discern between good and evil after their own fancy. Contrariwise Gods will is to be wise for us, & that we as silly sheep should hearken to our shepherds voice, and quite forget the sufficiency which the unbelievers imagine themselves to have. Let us think, there is nothing in us but error and folly, there is nothing but vanity and leasing, until our God have taught us. That is the point that God would bring us to. But it is exceeding hard for men to restrain themselves continually from being puffed up with fond over weaning of self-wisdom. And therewithal is mingled curiosity: Our ears itch to hear this and that, we make discourses, we have our imaginations, and a number of things do run in our heads. Why should not this be good, say we? Why should not that be lawful? Because then that curiosity has taken so deep roöte in our minds: therefore cannot God hold us to the pure simplicity of his word. Besides this, we have a forte of naughty affections, which turn us away from God, and are all of them enemies to make away war against God, so as we cannot so much as think a good thought, but we be full of vice and corruption. That is the cause why we cannot hold ourselves in obedience unto God. And yet notwithstanding, when we have offended him a thousand ways, do we fall to amending of any whit of it? Yea Mary, but after what fashion? After our own guise. We lay on plaiftersifters that make the sore worse, as we see has befallen in all ages. For the Prophets fought against these same vices without ceasing. Although the people of Israel had the law with such straight restraints as you see here: yet were their fingers always itching to intermingle some inventions of their own therewithal. The Prophets cried out, how now? Shall your God never overrule you as his flock? He has purchased you by delivering you from the bondage of Pharaoh, he has given you his law, he has helped you a number of ways besides: and yet you cannot find in your hearts to have as he will have you. And wherefore was this people so unruly? First because of pride (which, as I told you, has reigned in men in all ages) for that the Jews be would needs be able to rule themselves. For they were of opinion, that whatsoever seemed good to themselves, that same ought to have been allowed of God. The very ground from whence they took their boldness, to make all the changes [of Religion] that happened among them, was their gazing about them, [& their thinking with themselves] we see that our neighbors do thus. Hereby superstition get full scope, so as they ran gadding after the idols of that heathen. And when they saw that they had trodden Gods law under foot: On (said they) this must be amended. And how? By doubling that mischief from time to time. We see that like in the Popedom: and would God we had the wit to profit ourselves by such examples and looking glasses. For what is the chief point that troubles Christendom at this day? we demand that men should hear God speak? and that thereupon there should no doctrine be received that is devised at the pleasure of men, but that the world should submit itself to God, that the holy scripture should be taken as the doctrine of perfection: and that we should acknowledge it to be Gods truth, whereunto to behooves our whole life to be framed, without adding or diminishing. That is our demand. On the contrary part, it is certain that all Popery must needs fall to the ground, except men's invention may have their full course, so as Gods word may be mingled, turmoiled, stuffed, yea and even falsified with men's devises. And yet not withstanding the Papists are so shameless still, as to upbraid us that we will need be too wise in our own conceits. Yea Mary, but wherein? When it comes to the trial, we desire no more but that Gods word may not in any wise be diminished, and that the things which we think good of ourselves should not be admitted, but that we should forsake whatsoever is of man, and thrust it utterly under foot and abolish it, so as only God may be exalted. Is it our intent to be only otherwise, when we confess, first of all that there is nothing but foolishness in men, and that such as will needs be skillful and witty [of themselves] are stark mad, inasmuch as they cannot put themselves wholly into Gods hand, to be governed by him as he uses? And yet not withstanding, that is the thing wherein we differ. And that is it that engenders most strife in these days, because the Papists cannot yield to this reason, that God should be obeyed according to his work, and that men should be contended to be taught by him in his school. Indeed they will not be so bold as to deny that Gods law is holy and rightful: but yet to their seeing, God has spoken but by haves, & men had need of a higher and profounder doctrine, and of straighter laws. But it is not said here, that men should but only hear that God says, & after do what they list themselves: No, God gives them no such choice. For what a thing were that? He should not only admit us to be his fellows, but also give us superiority over him. And that were even a turmoiling of heaven, earth together, & a hellish confounding of all things. Yet not withstanding, such has it been, & such is it still among the Papists at this day. For not withstanding that they grant Gods Law to be holy and righteous: yet they cease not to turmoil it with whatsoever seems good to themselves. O (say they) this is the commandment of our mother holy Church, this is a doctrine of hers that must be observed, this is a good devotion, this is a law of hers, this is an ordinance. To be short there is no ho. And is this an obeying of that which Moses said here? So then let us learn to give attentive ear to this exhortation, seeing it is not for nought that it is so often repeated unto us. And if that Prophets in old time had so hard hold with the people for this vice: let us assure ourselves that we also shall ever be unruly & wild headed, until our Lord have tamed us by long handling, & made us to stick to this ground, That is no more lawful for us in anywise to add anything to his law, that it is lawful for us to take anything from it. Now indeed the Papists allege that this was spoken to the Jews: but that as for us, we be now under the law of liberty. But they speak like beasts, For when the Gospel is named the Law of liberty: it is not meant that God lays the bridle in our necks, and that we may henceforth follow our own swinge: but (as I said before) it is because it bears with us, & continues not the extreme rigor of cursing us, when we have not performed Gods commandments in all points to the full. In that respect is that Gospel named the law of liberty. Nevertheless forasmuch as God has more fully revealed the things unto us, which were hid for a time: & forasmuch as we be taught much more largely now a days, than the Jews were: there is much more reason why we should hold ourselves more in awe, why and walk reverently before God. For in comparison of us, the Jews had a very slender teaching: and yet notwithstanding, they be forbidden to put anything to it. And shall we then presume nowadays to add anything to that which God has left us, when he has reached out his truth far and wide, and that besides his law and Prophets, we have this further perfection, that he has spoken to us with open mouth by Jesus Christ? What a presumptuousness were that? Besides that we should offer wrong and dishonor to the law: we should also blaspheme the Gospel. And therefore let us understand, that Gods spirit has not spoken it: for anyone time only: but that he meant to deliver it for a rule to continue to the worlds end when he said, Put not anything to that which I command you, neither take anything from it. When he said, Put not anything to it: It is to show us that only God must be wise, and have authority to govern us, so as we must not stick to our own foolish devotions, which we had in the time of our ignorance, when we were wretched blind Papists. Then let us learn to hold us to the simplicity of Gods word, that let our only wisdom be to obey that which he says, that he may have all prominence. And like as God forbids us to add anything to his word, so does he forbid us to take anything from it: and not without cause. For if we will needs obey God but in part, & in the meanwhile exempt ourselves from whatsoever we list: it is such partaking, as shall never be admitted. Accordingly as now a days we shall see many, which will be contented to obey, so far forth as it pinch them not over near: but if it be a thing that trouble them, they seek to be rid of it, and fret and chase against it. But it is not for us to proceed after that manner. For as I said, like as God forbids to add anything to his doctrine: so forbids he to take anything there from. He that said, you shall not commit adultery (said S. James) has said also, You shall not steal. And therefore let us be well ware, that we rend not Gods law in pieces. For it is not for man to put the things a funder, which God has put together. And let us assure ourselves we cannot break Gods law in any point but we violate Gods Majesty which is contained therein. That then is a thing which we have to remember upon that text. For otherwise we shall not be able to keep Gods commandments, that is to say, we shall not yield God that authority which he deserves. As for example when the Papists observe Gods law: how go they to work? They leave it behind them, & in the meanwhile rest upon the commandments of their Mother holy Church. And whereupon ground they themselves? Behold, there comes me an idol, even a stinking carrion, & he loads them with a law. A Papist imagines himself to be a little Angel, if he keep that ordinance of a worm that is but dung: and he will say it is Gods law. Now I pray you, in so doing what preferment yields he more to God, than to creatures? Is it not apparent, that in that case God is as it were rauged in array, to be but companion with men? Now surely such obedience of that Papists is devilish, because it sets up me in Gods sted. Therefore let all such dealing be done away, yea and let us abhor it utterly.

Finally let us mark, that whereas Moses said, That you must enter into the land & live: it is not meant that God gives us any payment of wages, as though he were bound unto it: but that he must ever more have the sovereignty of us, & we be subject to him, forsaking all our wicked affection which may turn us away from following his commandments. And although he speak to us by the mouths of men: yet let us cease to honor him in the Majesty which he utters by his word, but let us learn to hold ourselves wholly thereunto, without swerving one way or other, & let us give over all our own wit & reason. Again, let all our lusts be so beat down, as we attempt not in any wise to stand against God, but walk before him in such reverence & lowliness, as we may give proof that we be his people indeed, and that we take him for our father and sovereign Prince.

Now let us kneel down in that presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel the more & more, yea even in such wise as we may come to submit ourselves to him with true repentance, & proceed therein more and more, until such time as being quite rid of all our fleshly corruptions and clothed again with his righteousness, we be made partakers of the immortal glory whereunto he calls us daily by his word. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly Father, &c.

The twentieth Sermon which is the second upon the fourth Chapter

3 Your eyes have seen what the Lord did to Beelphegor, for the Lord your God has rooted out all the men from among you, which walked after Beelphegor.

4 But you which have cleaved to the Lord your God, are all alive at this day.

5 Behold, I have taught you ordinances and laws as the Lord my God commanded me, that you should do thereafter in the land which you are entering into to possess it.

6 Keep them [therefore] and do them: for that is your wisdom and understanding in the sight of the Nations, who hearing of all these ordinances shall say, surely it is a wise and understanding people, hearing it is a great Nation.

God shows his great goodness in laboring to draw us to him by gentleness: and great also is his grace if he draw us to him by force, when he sees that we cannot otherwise be subdued. And that is the cause why he not only sets his promises before us, but also adds threatenings, showing us his rigour, and making us also to feel it: even to the end to win us by some means or other. But yet does all this redound to our welfare, and God shows how much he tenders us, even in that he is so sharp and rough towards us. For if we could suffer ourselves to be led gently by him, surely such is his nature that he, that he would deal that way with us, according to his own saying that he is a kind hearted and pitiful God, forward to show mercy, and of long sufferance. When God intends to show what good will he bears us, he alleges all the properties of a good Father. Then will he never use any roughness, unless he be enforced, because he sees us dull upon the spur, and is fain to prick us, or else we would never go on our way. Therefore when we come to read the holy Scripture, let us always have this before our eyes, that our Lords desire is to draw us to him by gentleness, if we be pliable: and thereupon let us humble ourselves unto him, and not look to have him deal roughly with us, but follow him quietly as soon as he has showed us that he is willing to receive us. And if we have been so far overseen as to have given deaf ear to all his promises, and not to come at his call: at leastwise it were not meete for us to be drowsy still, when he adds his threatenings to waken us. Therefore let us understand that it is time for us to yield ourselves to God then or never. And that is the cause why that in this text, Moses puts the people in remembrance, of the punishments that God had laid upon such as worshipped the idol of Ammon which was called Beelphegor. But we have yet one point more to mark, which is, that God spares us and punishes others, to the intent we should learn wit at other men's cost, as they say. If God should step to us at the first dash, and correct us as soon as we have done amiss, or tell us that we should look for vengeance at his hand: yet ought we to take it as token of his fatherly goodness, as I said before. But his will is to bear with us, to make us know that his punishing of offenders is not without cause, & that we ought to take the same for warning to ourselves. And so does Moses use it here. For he said not, God will punish you if you offend: but he said, you have seen how they were punished which worshipped Beel-phegor. Now therefore, prevent Gods wrath, and tarry not till he be angry with you, & set on fire: but cleave simply to his word, and let the corrections that he has showed you avail you, & not be showed you in vain. Thus ye see the third point which we have to mark : that is to wit, that our Lord utters not his threatenings unto all men, but shows us how he punishes the unbelievers, to the intent that we should not be of their number, least we should be wrapped in the same condemnation with them. And it is the same thing that S. Paul shows. For after he has told the faithful, that they must abstain from covetousness, theft, whoredome, drunkenness, and such other like things, yea and even from all manner of looseness and wantonness: he adds, b not deceived, for Gods wrath comes upon the unbelievers for such things. He said not that Gods wrath shall come upon them: but he tempers his speech and said, Consider that God punishes the unbelievers for such causes, and therefore separate yourselves from their number and company. After the same manner speaks he likewise in the tenth of the first to the Corinthians. After he had told them how God had punished idolaters, rebels, and such as had coveted unlawful things: he adds that those things are written for us, that we might see and behold Gods judgments as in a lively picture, & keep ourselves from falling into the like punishment. Now therefore let us come to that which Moses rehearses here: Your eyes (said he) have seem what the Lord did in the case of Beel-phegor. In saying so, he tells not the people a tale that shall do them no good: but he does them to understand, that Gods uttering of his vengeance against such as had worshipped that idol, was to give a general lesson to all men: and therefore that they ought to think themselves worthy of double blame in that behalf, forasmuch as they had fared never the better by Gods scourges, but had shut their eyes all the while that he was about to warn them to their benefit and welfare.

Now remains to apply this cecre to our use. When God sends any trouble upon the world: let us understand that it is not without cause that he is so fore displeased. For if we consider the offences and misdeeds that have been committed: we must needs conclude that God shows himself a judge in punishing sins. But does that serve only for them that feel the strokes? No; Gods will is to show his just vengeance generally, that men may learn to stoop to him, and to walk in fear of him, and to give themselves no more to provoking of him. To be short, all the chastisements that we see in the world, ought to serve for our learning: according to this saying of the Prophet Esay , O Lord, when you executed your judgments, the dwellers of the earth shall learn righteousness. For when God winks, and punishes not the wicked and unrighteous: men take leave to do evil, it seems that all things should scape unpunished, and every man bears with himself, accordingly as all of us are naturally too much inclined to flatter ourselves in our sins. But when we perceive that GOD calls men's sins to account, and that all things are enrolled before him, he shows himself a judge in punishing men, whereas they thought they had been forgotten: then behold, we be wakened, so as every of us begins to bethink himself, or at leastwise it were good reason that he should do so. True it is that Gods judgments do sometimes pass before our eyes, and we make none account of them, by means whereof we can fare never the better for them: but unhappy are we when we be so blind. And why? For (as I said) Gods intent is that other men should take example, by his chastising of those that have offended. Yea and even the worldly judges observe the same order, insomuch that when they punish a thief, or a murderer, or any other evil doer, they do it not alonely to be revenged of that evil that he has done as in respect of himself: but also to set him forth as a looking glass, to the intent that all other folks should set a watch over themselves, and abhor such crimes, and not suffer them to have their full course and scope. And think we that God goes yet any further? So then, let us suffer ourselves to be amended at other men's cost, and let us have our eyes open to behold the punishments that he sends. And now in these days, must it not needs be that we be worse than asleep, if we be not moved at the great number of corrections that God sends? We see how the whole world is in manner past recovery, and (as the Prophet Esay says) there is not one whit of soundness from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot: Gods scourges run abroad every where: every man complains, great and small lament: On the one side we see wars, famine, and pestilence, (and those things happen not by casualty) and on the other side every man bewails his own private case. And why so? Wherefore do we not know the hand that strikes us? Wherefore do we not consider that God shows himself a judge towards us, to make us return unto him? For men's sins are not unknown, we see well that the whole world is out of order, and that God must be fain to put to his hand. And yet in the mean reason we abide still blockish, but we shall be held the less excused for it in the end. And why? For it may be told us to our shame, that our eyes have seen how God warned us: it was long of none but ourselves that we were not brought to repentance. Seeing that GOD did lay his judgments open to our sigh, and we marked them not: we must needs be punished the forer for such negligence, because we have played the deaf and blind folks, when GOD went about to bring us gently to him. And so the thing that Moses bring us gently to the people of Israel, is written to our use in these days . For it is as much as if the holy Ghost should tell us, that when God punishes men, be it generally or particularly: we must not be purblind, in that case but bethink us well and see whether we ourselves have not deserved the like: and there upon be sorry for our sins, and not tarry till God draw his sword against us, but by us apace to him seeing he warns us to return. And for the performing hereof, let us understand that the calamities which light upon the world, come not by haphazard, but from heaven, and are corrections for the offences where into the world has overshot self.

Now Moses speaks here by name of Beelphegor, which was the idols of the Ammonites, as is said before. And the word Baal betokens a Principal, a Master, or a Patron: which thing is well worthy to be marked. For when we here speaking of the idols of the heathen, they seem to us to be far other things than those that we see nowadays. But the Scripture shows us that they be in manner all one. And why? For the heathen were not so gross and dull witted, but that they knew there was a certain sovereign majesty which created heaven and earth, and held sovereign Dominion over all things. But therewith all they would needs have under gods, whom they thought to have the charge of several Countries: for every country had his idol. And so also this work Baal was the name as you would say of a God that had the governance of a whole country, and served to get men favor at the great Gods hand. Now it may seem at the first blush, hat this was defacing of Gods glory, nor any impeachment to the continual serving and worshipping of him: and yet is it such a corruption as he cannot abide. For he will have all prominence to himself, and he will not have men to give him or assign him any companion, as we shall see hereafter where Moses will say, The Lord your God is the only God. Again, when men make such mingling, and will needs have a multitude of Gods; we see how god speaks of it in the twentieth of Ezechiel. Go your ways (said he) I give you our, feeling you have other Gods than me: go serve the devil altogether, for I will have nothing to do with you. Let us mark well then, that Gods service can never be kept in his pureness, except all superstition be laid down, and men hold themselves simply to his word, without inventing of anything, & without intermingling of anything devised of their own brain. Thus you see that the true and pure religion, is the exalting of the only one god, so as is glory is not darkened by adding any companion unto him.

And now he says expressly, You that have cleaved to your God are all alive this day. This serves not so much to make the people glad: as to show them that seeing they be so greatly bound and beholden to their God, they ought to serve him with the greater zeal. Moses then tells the people thus: you have seen Gods wrath: and what has preserved you from it hitherto? For you might have been overthrown and destroyed as well as they that worshipped Beelphegor. Know you therefore that your continuing unto this day, is through the free savor of your God. And therefore look that you serve and honor him as he deserves, seeing he has maintained you after such a fashion, and against all hope. Now this such warning belongs, unto us, because we live not any other end than to serve our GOD, and woe be them which being in this world do raven up Gods benefits, and know not to what end, but are here as brute beasts. So then let us mark well, that as long as we be in this world, God will have us to do him homage for our life, and [for all things,] and to make that our mark to shoot at, according to this sentence often spoken in the scripture, I shall live and go into the temple of the Lord. Yea & when Jonas was come out of the Whales belly, and even when he called upon GOD being there as in a gulf of hell: he said not I will live and make good cheer, but he says that he shall yet again see the temple of God. And what to do? To give him thanks for prolonging his life after that sort. Therefore let us make, that in all the benefits which we receive at Gods hand, he binds us so much the more straightly unto him, to the intent that we should endeavor to serve him, and to give ourselves wholly unto him, and to walk in the obedience of his righteousness. This is it in effect which Moses meant to note.

And he sets down afterward, that he had given them statutes and ordinances according as God had commanded him. Wherein he protests that he had been a faithful deliverer of doctrine which he did set forth, to the end that the people might receive it as the doctrine of a man, but consider how it was God that had spoken it, and to embrace it with all reverence. And hereby we see that GOD of governing us as in respect of the spiritual government of ourselves. True it is that God would there should be civil policy in this world, and he has put men in commission for the same: but in the meanwhile he will have none but only himself to have none but only himself to have power to lay laws upon us. When the case concerns his own service, and religion, and spiritual things: then must only he himself be heard, and no man must usurp his office or meddle in it, nor no man step in to add one word. For if ever any man in the world was worthy to be heard: was not Moses so excellent, that he might well be foremost and chief? Yes: for we shall see hereafter, that there never was such a Prophet in the work, neither before him nor after him, even to the coming of him that is above all Prophets, that is to wit, the son of God. And yet for all his worthiness, Moses holds himself in the number of those which ought to hearken unto God without setting forth anything of his own device. Seeing it is so, whosoever takes upon him to make laws to rule men's souls, shall go to confusion with his devilish presumptuousness and over weaning. To be short, when any doctrine is to be followed, let us on our side look that we be sure that it proceed from God, & that our faith be founded on him alone, so as we hang not upon mortal men, nor upon any creature. For there would be no steadiness. Thus you see that the first point which we have to make upon this text, is that Moses protests that he comes not in his own name, nor sets up Laws at his own pleasure, but received the things at Gods hand, which he taught. And forth at cause he said, the Lord my God commanded me. True it is that people might have said so as well as Moses, according also as Moses adds oftentimes, The Lord your God. But here he appropriates the title of God to himself, saying, The lord my God. And why? It is like as in a Country where there is a Prince, every man may well say, yond same is the king, yond same is the Prince: and yet notwithstanding, they that are of his household or bear any office may add these words over, the King my master, or they may say, the Prince my master. And why? For they be his officers or his household servants. After the same manner dealt the Prophets. As for example, Esay in his seventh chapter speaking to Acaz, said: You house of David, is it not enough for you to [grieve men, but you must also] tempt my GOD? Here you see how Esay sets himself alone. And why? For he is Gods officer, and has his commission to be his Prophet. We see as much in Helias. And Saint Paul likewise encroaches upon the title that is common, and says. The Gospel which I have received of my God. Where by he shows that he was ordained to be an Apostle. Even so is it in this text, where Moses declares that he was not a Prophet of his own making, nor came forth at adventure, but that GOD had called him to that state, and committed that charge unto him. The reason then why we must give ear to men that reach us, is because they be sent of God, so as he diminishes not his own authority, nor discharges us to go where we list, but will have us always ruled by his word.

Now Moses adds immediately, that he has set forth the statutes and ordinances, to the end that the people should do them, when they were come into the land to possess it. Wherein we see the fame that has been showed heretofore; that is to wit, that God will not have me to dally with his doctrine, but to embrace it with all reverence, and to obey it by framing themselves thereafter,. Wherefore let us be well advised, that if we will be well taught at Gods hand, we must serve him all our life long. For without we do so, we shall be condemned of self- abusing the doctrine, which was given us to kill our vices and to alter our lewd and inordinate lusts. As often then as we come to hear Gods word, let us always have this before our eyes word, that his will is to bring us home to himself, and not to have us wander after our own wicked lusts and likings but to bow down our neck under his yoke to yield him obedience. And hereby we see how the Gospel is unhallowed nowadays. For we have our cares sufficiently beaten with the things that we ought to do: but who is he that does but so much as lift up his finger, to strain himself to serve God? The number of them is very small. But there is great store of them that take great liberty to do evil upon the preaching of the Gospel, and in then- opinion God is much beholden to them, in that they suffer his word to be preached, themselves holding scorn of it. But needs must such ungodliness and devilish pride be horribly punished. Why so? For the word that GOD sends us, is the seed of life which ought to yield fruit in us: and yet for all that, we make no reckoning of it but trample it under our feet, and we become stark blocks. And it is not enough for us to be a barren ground that bears no fruit: but we do also bring forth the fruits of bitterness, as God complains by his Prophet Jeremy: insomuch that you shall see a great number that do even spite God and rankle in malice against him, leaking nothing else but to kindle his wrath more and more. Such folk must needs look for dreadful damnation and merciless vengeance.

And truly like as Moses has declared here that he came not in his own name: so also, his protesting that he had enjoined them the laws and ordinances as GOD had uttered them unto him, shows that men cannot devise to spite God more openly, than by striving against his word. Indeed they will allege that their intent is not so, like as we see in these days that these scornors of God which make none account of any doctrine, do doss with their horns like mad bulls against all good government and policy, and would fain that there were nothing but utter desolation in the Church: and yet notwithstanding to cover themselves, they will [not stick to] say, what does the matter concern the Gospel? who is he that would not maintain it? Yea if the devils of hell maintain it. We see some such among us, yea even which show themselves much wicked than the Papists. And the devil also must needs be fain to show his fury, and the liberty that God has given him against such despisers. But all is well if they can cover themselves always with this fair excuse, that they mind not to fight against the Gospel, but against the preachers. Now seeing they be at that point, we must fall to scanning of the matter, to wit whether the preachers do set forth any strange doctrine, whether they have put forth any forged dotages, or whether they have set any up any laws at their own pleasure. If it be found that the ministers preach Gods word purely: that they are glad and fain to advance the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ: that they procure the fame to the uttermost of their power: and that they seek to have such order in the Church, as God may always be worshiped, and good policy be maintained among men: with whom have they to do which strive here against? And we must be fain to come to the protestation that Moses made, saying: What are we Moses and Aaron? What have we set forth, which we have not received of God? What cause have you to move this sedition and uproar, in saying that you cannot abide that we should reign saying over you? What is the sovereignty, what is the dominion which we would have over you? we desire nothing but that God be obeyed, and that he have the authority and prominence that belong unto him. Look how Moses speak of his time. And after the fame manner speak we nowadays to these roisters which seek to bring all to confusion, under shadow and pretence that they intend to maintain the Gospel, whereas it appears that they make a flat mockery of it, and rail against it. Yet for all this, they that have any taste of Religion, will defy such plagues, and separate themselves from them, least God wrap them up with them in the same condemnation: and they will look to make the knowledge profitable which they have received, yea and with all humbleness they receive the things that are taught them by men, so they be sure that they come from God. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this sentence.

Now afterward he commands them to keep these things and to do them. And why? for (said he) Behold your understanding and your wisdom in the sight of all Nations, is that you be taught of your God. Whereas he said, you shall keep them therefore and do them: is is a conclusion well worthy to be noted. For must it not needs be that men are stark mad, when they have no mind to hear God at such time as he teaches them? What are we that GOD should take the pain to do the office of a teacher towards us? Is it not a great stooping down from his highness? But seeing that God does so lessen himself, as to stoop to our rudeness to teach us: should we let his word fall to the ground and despise it? So then let us understand, that whensoever we be spoken to in Gods name, we ought to tremble under his majesty, yea and to embrace his word with all reverence, truly, heartily, and zealously. For it is but a counterfeit worshipping of God, if we be not as Lambs, suffering ourselves to be led by his only voice: and it is certain that if we follow not after him as soon as he does but but make a sign, we be wild beasts, and he will not know us for any of his. And so we see what authority the name of God carries with it: insomuch that when Gods word is set before us, we must all cast down our heads, and bow down our necks to receive the yoke that is laid upon us, and seek by all means to please him and to be obedient to him.

Now Moses returns to that which I touched at the beginning: namely, that God endeavors to draw us to him by gentleness: and he shows it here to the people of Israel, in telling them of the excellent prerogative that had been given them. For behold here (said God) this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of all nations. We know that naturally it is a grief to men to be counted beasts. And why? For they know that the thing wherein they differ from beasts, is that they have discretion and reason in them. God to the intent to make us excel Oxen, Asses, Dogs, and Swine, has printed his image in us. And wherein consists this image, but in the having of discretion to discern between good and evil? And therefore it is not to be marveled at, though men covet to be skilful, and to have, wisdom and ability to judge. But yet for all that, there are very few that seek rightly to have a true judgment, insomuch that all do rather turn away and wander after their own fancies, and become brutish in themselves. Yet nevertheless, (as I said before) we make great account of the having of discretion and wisdom to judge between good and evil. But here Moses shows, that men are unable to rule themselves. Indeed we wean yes: but it is but a weaning, yea and an overweening. For our life is utterly out of order, and there is nothing well ruled in it, until GOD have showed us the way, and that we have profited in his school. That is the thing where unto Moses leads the people as now. All men [says he] are desirous of knowledge, and loath to be as brute beasts. Because they be shaped after the image of God, they would fain have discretion, that they might know how to live.

Now it is so that GOD gives you discretion and wisdom, by vouchsafing to set his word before you. So then, vouchsafing be not so unthankful towards him, as to misuse so inestimable a benefit. Suffer GOD to make you profit in such wise by his word as you may be skilful and wise, and not wander any more. We see now in effect the meaning of Moses.

Now have we to gather upon this text, what the weakness of man's mind is. True it is that our father Adam received understanding and power to discern between good and evil in his creation: but after he had sinned he was after a fort blinded. And we like wise are corrupted, so as we discern in a manner nothing at all. We take white for black, as it appears by our corrupting of the whole service of GOD by our superstitions. True it is that God has left us some discretion, so as we know it is evil to commit theft, whoredom, murder, &c. but yet notwithstanding, we he dazzled insuchwise, notwithstanding that our insight is not so clear and sure as to make us walk aright. You see then after what fort men are mardet, and it is the thing that the scripture shows us, insomuch that the wretched Paynims and such as knew not God, could not but be plunged in darkness and so destitute of reason, as they could not discern anymore. That is the first point which we have to mark.

And when as Moses entitles Gods word and his law to be our wisdom: thereby he shows that we have no wisdom in ourselves, nor know how to behave ourselves, but are as brute beasts, until such time as our Lord have taught us. That is another point. And were the lame well born in mind, surely men would not be so bold to invent things, after their own liking? but would hold themselves soberly and meekly under Gods word. And so much the more need have we to mind this text, because we know there is no other wisdom in us, than to submit ourselves teachable unto God, and to harken what he said to us, to stick thereto quietly, refusing all that ever we can conceive of our own head. According whereunto Saint Paul said, that we cannot be wise before God, until we be become fools in ourselves: that is to wit, until we know that there is nothing but vanity & leasing in our own understanding, and therefore that we must give understanding, overall that we think good, and not know aught but that which God commands. And therewithal, as Moses meant here to bereave men of all self weaning, to the intent they should stoop and submit themselves unto Gods word: so on the contrary part he meant to show that when men have Gods Law for their rule: they shall want nothing, but all shall be well and perfect. That is a second point which we have to note. I have told you already that men must understand, that there is not one drop of found judgment in them, but that to become wise, they must yield themselves wholly unto God. It is not enough to know this: for we might partly here GOD, and afterward add thereto of our own, as we see the Papists have done. They will not say that the Scripture is false, (howbeit that they themselves do falsify it most wickedly: and yet for all that they be enforced spite of their teeth to say still, it is the word of God:) But they would fain mingle their own laws with it: whereby it is evident that they have made such confusion, as a man cannot discern between the holy scripture, and their fancies. And why [have they done so]? Because that to their seeming there is some want in Gods word, and he has not taught things perfectly enough: but that is a cursed blasphemy. For Moses, to give due authority to Gods word, said expressly that it is the wisdom and understanding of such as hear it, and taste of the doctrine that is contained in it. As if he should say, Covet not to know further than your God shows you. Hold you there: for those are your bounds and lifts, and whosoever passes them confounds heaven and earth together. So then let us learn, that when God is so gracious as to teach us, it behooves us to yield simply to that which he says. And how may that be done? Verily if we take things whole as he tells verily us them, and not by half as we see these brave lads do, which would cut off Gods authority from him by the waste. Well, say they: Let the Gospel be preached: but if there be any thing that we mislike, let that be laid away, such doctrine must be let alone. Yea? Shall God then be subject to men's fancies, so as they shall receive nothing but what they think good themselves? What a madness they is that? Now when we see that these rascals advance themselves after that sort: let us on our side learn to give ear to God in all points, and to make no exception to restrain his authority, but to receive obediently whatsoever proceeds, from his mouth. Let that serve for a principle. And again, when we once know what is in the holy scripture, let us reject all the rest as strange and bastard stuff. For our Lord has not taught us as it were an Apsy, to send us to a greater and excellent master than himself: For what a presumptuousness were it [to think,] that God has showed us but only the first entrances, and that men must lead only us higher? What a comparison were that? And yet notwithstanding it is the thing that is done in popery. For the Pope said, that the laws which he has made, are the revelations of the holy Ghost, whereof our Lord Jesus speak when he said to his disciples [I have many things to say unto you,] but you cannot bear them all away as now. Verily as who should say, that God had given but some small entrances in his Law and his Gospel: and that the Pope were inspired above the Prophets and above Christ himself to bring a much more exquisite doctrine than theirs. We see then that the devil has passed all measure in this behalf. Wherefore let us learn to know nothing but that which we receive from above, and which it pleases God to show unto us. Take that for a principle. Moreover, if this was verified of the law of Moses. Let us assure ourselves there is much more reason that it should properly be justified and verified of the Gospel, so as they which have profited therein, may assure themselves that they have perfect learning, wherein to behold even the heavenly gifts, as Saint Paul speaks of it. And therefore let us humble ourselves when we see our Lord so gracious to us, as to teach us familiarly as it were with his own mouth. This is it in effect, which we have to remember upon this strain. Indeed it deserves well to be laid forth more at length and I must touch it again hereafter: nevertheless I will now conclude with a complaint. I see walkers yonder, & I know for what their coming is, except it be to show a contempt of God and his word, which is an intolerable lewdness. They come here to the door, and that not twice or thrice, but more than a dozen times. It shows well that they despise God manifestly. Such is the honor of Geneva, that when the Gospel is a preaching, men come even to the Church door to make a flat mockery of it, and after the same manner also is baptism honored here: and it is too common a dealing.

Therefore let us kneel down in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of the innumerable faults which we have committed against his majesty, and for the which we be worthy of eternal death if he pity us not. And therefore let us pray him to shed out his mercy upon us: and that we may the better feel the same, let us beseech him to vouchsafe to train us so unto him henceforth as he subdue all our stubbornness and all the wicked lusts of our flesh, and reform us in such wise to his obedience, as we may fare the better by the chastisements that he send thus: and therewithal grant us the grace to receive our Lord Jesus Christ for our guide and shepherd, and to hear him as our teacher and master, like as he speaks to us daily by his word. I hate it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and Nations of the earth, &c.

The twenty first Sermon, which is the third upon the fourth Chapter

6 Which you shall keep & c.

7 For what Nation is so great, that has Gods coming so nic it, as the Lord our God comes unto us, in all things that we call upon him?

8 And what Nation is so great, that has so righteous ordinances and laws as all this law is, which I set before you this day?

9 Therefore take heed to yourself, and keep your soul diligently, that you forget not the things which your eyes have seen, nor let them depart from your heart all the days of your life, but teach them to your sons, and sons sons.

10 Forget not (say I) the day that you stoodest before the Lord your God in Horeb, when the Lord said to me, gather me the people together.

T was declared to us yesterday, that forasmuch as GOD sees that we know not how to live: he takes pain to teach us, and does it in such fort, that as many as list to obey his doctrine, have a perfect rule to deal by. And at this day it is long of none but ourselves, if we be not wise and well advised to guide ourselves. For we have a God that will not fail us, and his word is a sure rule for us. But here in we see men's lewdness and unthankfulness, in that they cannot find in their hearts to submit themselves unto God, but will needs be wise in their own conceit, and still follow their own inventions. Yet notwithstanding this maxim cannot be rased out by men: namely, that we have neither wisdom nor discretion, except we have profited in Gods school. And therefore we be warned hereby, to hold ourselves simply to Gods commandments. For as soon as we fall to adding of anything to Gods word, it is by and by but corruption: and when we be out of those bounds, we can do nothing but stray. Nevertheless, a man might make a question here, how Moses could say that the people of Israel should be counted sage and wise among all Nations: seeing we know that the heathen did glory in their own follies and superstitions, even in despite of the law. Seeing the Infidels were so proud that they rejected the good learning [of the Law,] and rested upon their own fond toys, it should seem that this was not accomplished in such wise as Moses speaks of it here. But we must weigh well the speech that is set down here: that is to wit, that the nations which should hear the Laws in such wise as God had given them, should say, behold here an excellent and noble people; now as for those that held scorn of Gods law, and were carried away with pride and over weaning, did they ever understand what Moses had said unto the people? No. So then, you see that the question is resolved in this wise: namely that as many of the heathen, as had known and tasted well the doctrine that God had delivered to the people of Israel, confessed (as truth was) that Gods choosing of a certain people for himself, was a great and singular privilege. But very few of them vouchsafed to consider that: for all of them lay weltering still in their own dung. And although it was apparently seen that the people of Israel had a several law and Religion by themselves: yet did all men shut their eyes and stop their ears. And that was the cause why they made no reckoning of so great a benefit.

Now herewithall Moses shows in two things, how greatly the people ought to have esteemed of the grace that was given unto them. For let us (said he) be compared with the rest of the world: and it shall not be found that those which worship Idols do find such power among them as to be succour that their need, or that their Gods whom they call upon, be so familiar with them. There will no such thing be found. For as soon as we pray unto our God, and resort unto him: we feel him near us by and by. You see then an inestimable benefit. Again, we have his laws and Statutes which he has given us, we have his righteous ordinances; all others do but go astray. True it is that they wean they do well: but in the meanwhile they have no certainty in their religion: for they have no truth concerning God. Therefore let us consider the good that he has done us, to the end we may enjoy it. For all this is treated of by Moses, to the intent it should be applied unto us, and we learn to serve our God with greater zeal, and to hold ourselves in awe. For the setting of his benefits and gracious gifts before us, is one of the ways whereby God intends to win us to him. And whereby it is a shame for us if we serve him not, seeing he has chosen us and adopted us to be his children. Thus much concerning the first part, where it is said that other nations have no Gods that come so near them.

This saying (as I have touched before,) is meant of Gods helping of his people of Israel as often as they called upon him: yea and oftentimes also even before they required it, after which manner we see that he deals with us also. He thinks upon us while we be asleep, he watches for us, and he makes us to feel his succour at our need. Nevertheless, in telling them that God will succour us, even in all things that we require at his hand: his intent is also to encourage folk to call upon God, and to make them to blame themselves for their own negligence whensoever they be destitute of help and succour at Gods hand: and to do us to understand that Gods forgetting of us, is for that we flee not to him for refuge as we ought to do, nor seek unto him, who is always ready to help us at our need. Thus you see that the intent of Moses was to exhort the people to prayer and supplication, and therewithal to show that God had always showed himself at hand unto such as had returned to him.

It is not so with any of the Gods of the heathen. If this saying were well observed, the wretched world would not overshoot itself so far as it does. We see what windlasses men make to seek salvation: but there are very few which go right forth unto God, there and yet does he assure all of us: the way and the gate is open. Whereof is it long that we go not on? It is for that even of nature we desire to be deceived. We see how all men do devise patrons and advocates to themselves, and It seems to them that they cannot be disappointed, when they have their own devotions after what sort forever it be. Thus do men willfully beguile themselves, and run gadding up and down. But when they have toiled themselves never so much, in the end they find themselves over wried, & yet that they have gained nothing by all that ever they did. We see then how it is not without cause said, that if we look well to ourselves, none of all the wretched unbelievers which torment themselves to attain unto God, and hold not the right way thither, have such advantages we have. For whensoever we call upon God simply and according to his word, we be never disappointed.

But now let us come to that which Moses adds concerning statutes and laws, which is the principal point of this sentence. What people is there (said he,) which has so rightfull statutes and ordinances as we have? Truly if a man would have believed the heathen, they thought very well of themselves in their own dotages, and they bare themselves in hand that there was nothing but found perfection in them. But yet for all that, it is a wonder to see how they became so dull. They that otherwise were of great skill and sharp-witted, were become so brutish in their superstitions, as even little children might justly have been ashamed of them. But the light must be fain to shine in the dark: or else it will never be possible to discern a right. And for proof thereof, what is the cause that the heathen are so hardened in their own dotages? It is for that they never knew Gods Law, and therefore they never compared the truth with the untruth. But when Gods law comes in place, then does it appear that all the rest is but smoke: insomuch that they which took themselves to be marvelous witty, are they found to have been no better than besotted in their own beastliness. This is apparent. Wherefore let us mark well, that to discern that there is nothing but vanity in all worldly devises, we must know the Laws and ordinances of God. But if we rest upon men's laws, surely it is not possible for us to judge rightly. Then must we needs go first to Gods school, and that will show us that when we have once profited under him, it will be enough. That is all our perfection. And on the other side we may despise all that ever is invented by man, seeing there is nothing but fondness and uncertainty in them. And that is the cause why Moses terms them rightfull ordinances. As if he should say, it is true indeed that other people have store of ceremonies, store of rules, and store of Laws: but there is no right at all in them, all is awry, all is crooked. True it is that they perceive it not: and what is the cause thereof, but for that it is not possible for them to discern good from evil, without Gods word which is the truth? Howsoever we fare, we cannot do the thing that is just or right, except we have first learned it at Gods hand. And if we have been so far overseen as to allow our own doings, let us not go on still, for God will disallow every whit of it, because, we must take all our rightness at his truth. In this case it is not for every man to bring his own weights and his own balance: but we must hold ourselves to that which God has uttered and does utter. True it is that Moses does greatly magnify the people of Israel here: but yet nevertheless we must understand, that the privilege which is so greatly magnified here, did nothing advantage those which rejected here, the law and profited not themselves thereby. The Laws are termed here a wise and skilful people, a noble people, a people that has nothing but excellency and worthiness in them. And why so? Because, God had chosen them, and uttered his judgments and righteousness unto them. But yet for all that, on the other side they be termed blind and deaf. And why? Because they did what they could to have quenched the light that God had kindled for them. We know that they were taught by the doctrine which contained their whole wisdom. We know that they were taught by the doctrine which contained their whole wisdom. And therefore when they despised it, they could not be but double blinded insomuch that the ignorance of the heathen and infidels, was nothing in comparison of theirs that had so rejected Gods grace, when it was put into their hands: And that is a point well worthy to be weighed. The Jews do arm themselves yet still at this day with the same text, when they lift to comment themselves; Tuih, say they: it is said that we be men of understanding, a people of great wisdom, a people of passing nobility and worthiness. This is true, if they had held fast the treasure that God gave them, and kept it well. But seeing they be fleeted away from the law, or rather that a veil is cast before their eyes, because of their rejecting of Jesus Christ: yea and seeing that even before his coming, they disobeyed the Prophets and became hardhearted against the doctrine of salvation that was brought to them: it could not be but that (as I said before) they must needs become more ignorant than all the rest of the world. For if the heathen be as good as destitute of reason, because they have not been in Gods school: needs must they to whom GOD has spoken, and yet are disobedient thereunto, needs must they (I say) be stricken with the spirit of dizziness, and be carried away by the devil, and become as wild beasts, so as they shall not offend of simple ignorance as they do which never heard anything, but of willful rage more than beastly. Even after that manner is it happened to the Jews. And it is the very same thing where with the Prophet Esay upraid them in his two and fortieth chapter, saying: Harken you deaf, see you blind. And why speaks he to die deaf and blind, to hear and see well? He adds the reason by and by, saying; you have seen enough, and you have heard enough: but you have not regarded it.

Also God complains of his pains taken in teaching of his people, and of losing his labor therein. For (said he) have not I done works now among you? Yes, but what for that? You have had neither ears nor eyes. And now if you be compared to the rest of the world, you pass all the heathen and unbelievers in blindness? And why? For you have had teaching enough and too much. And his upbraiding and blaming of them, is not for that they had not sufficient experience whereby to have been duly taught: but for that they did shut their eyes, and would not profit themselves by the things that GOD showed them.

Seeing that the Jews are thus blamed by the Prophet, notwithstanding that Moses had reported them to be a people of wisdom and understanding: let us come to ourselves, and consider that if this be happened to the natural branches, what shall become of the imps [that are grafted into the tree,] as Saint Paul speaks of it in the eleventh to the Romans. It is certain that the Jews went before us in prominence, or at leastwise they had the birth right in Gods Church, and have it yet still. And which more is, at such time as we were strangers unto God, they were his household folk, and in his house and Church. Yet not withstanding, even after they had been enlightened as we see here, they were condemned of greater blindness than the wretched Paynims that never had any taste of the truth, nor anyone spark of good knowledge. And why? for they had made themselves unworthy of such a benefit. But God in these days shows himself more familiarly to us than he did to the fathers in the time of the law. For in the Gospel his face shines forth in such wise, as we may behold it to be transfigured into his glory. Is not our Lord Jesus the lively image of God his father? And does not he show himself in such wise in his Gospel, that we may discern him as well as if he dwelt among us? Now then, if we have not our eyes open to receive this doctrine, nor be diligent to profit in the same: must not the vengeance which the Prophet Esay speaks of, light upon our heads? that is to wit, that we shall be more blind and brutish than the heathen, for as much as we have seen and would not see? And in good footh we know it without his telling us thereof. Look me upon the Turks: they have some reverence to their religion, and so have the Papists also: & yet are both of them cut off from the Church of God through their own fault, but yet are they not so much to blame as we. Therefore when men slide back again after they have once known the Gospel, you shall see them become like dogs, so as there is no more honesty nor feeling of God in them, but they be utterly bewitched, and grow into the senseless of mind which Saint Paul speaks of, namely that they make no remorse of conscience at anything. And we need not to go far to seek examples hereof. For even among us there are divers to be seen, who having unhallowed Gods word after that sort, are become stark mad and fall at defiance with GOD, being possessed with such devilish rage, as there remains not anymore shamefastness in them. Therefore when we see this geerc, we ought to quake at it and to say, Look how GOD revenges the contempt of his word. And therefore let us bear in mind, that when God has been so gracious to us as to do the office of school-master among us, and to teach us by his word it behooves us to follow the light thereof. For if it be put out through our naughtiness: it must needs be that we shall become more dull of understanding, than all the rest of the world which never wift what GOD or true Religion is. Thus you see what we have to mark as in respect of this sentence.

Now Moses adds immediately, Take heed to yourself and keep your soul diligently, that you forget not the things which my eyes have seen, nor let ever depart from your hears: that is to wit, the day wherein you God made you to appear before his Majesty in the valley of Horeb. There he taught you his law, when he willed me to make you all to appear together before him. There be mindful of that day, and let it never be forgotten. Now when as Moses said take heed to yourself & you're your soul: He shows that he cannot sufficiently express the care which we ought to have to walk in the fear of God, and to make and keep good watch, for fear of starting from him, least the devil carry us abroad and make us become as stray sheep. Now if this be not superfluous, what needs any more to quicken us up with all? See how God speaks here: he said not only, take heed to yourselves: but also, take heed to yourselves and take heed to your souls. That is to say, upon peril of your lives take heed to yourselves and watch well, that you be not taken unwares. And this is not said without cause: for we see how frail we be. Although God have given us so sure a foundation, as we can never be shaken down if we hold us to it: yet do we nothing but totter, and everything of nothing makes us to reel. Seeing then that our nature is so inconstant, and we swarve so easily from Gods truth: let us assure ourselves that this exhortation is not set down here without cause. Again, we see also how wyly the devil is, and how many means he has to beguile us, and we are easily led to give ear to such as seduce us. Also there is great policy used to deceive us: insomuch that the cou-finers do shroud themselves even under the name of GOD, in their foisting in of their false doctrines and errors: and the devil disguises himself by transforming himself into an Angel of light (as S. Paul speaks of him): and he assaults us not some one way only, but when he perceives that he has missed on the one side, he runs straight to the other, so as we have no sooner withstood one assault, but we must by and by come to another. Seeing then that we on our side are so frail, and the devil has such shift of wiles and flights to beguile us: we may well assure ourselves it is not for nought that Moses wills us here to beware, even upon peril of our souls. But what for that? We see nevertheless how ill this doctrine is put in practice. For we be careful enough for the things that concern this earthly life: insomuch that we stand always upon our guard for fear of being taken unwares, and on what side so ever a man come to assail us, he cannot enter upon us, for we are ever armed: but as concerning Gods word, we forget that out of hand. True it is that men will come to some Sermon now and then for fashions sake: but when they come home again they never think more of it, it is quite out of their remembrance, it goes in at the one ear and out at the other, as says the proverb: so that [in the end] they find themselves empty and hungerstarven, because they made none account of the warning that is given us here. So then, let us learn to be more watchful and to keep better ward: and let us weigh well this saying, That we must take heed to ourselves. Why so? For if we do not keep good watch and look well about us: we shall wonder to see how soon the Devil will have snarled us in his snares. Moreover forasmuch as it is very hard for us to do so, and we see that at one time or other we be quickly thrust out of the way: let every of us take good heed to himself, and rouse up all our wits, and gather them about us, applying them earnestly to this care & wareness which Moses speaks of here.

And he said purposely, Take good heed that you forget not the things which your eyes have seen, and beware that they never depart from your heart. When as he said, The things which your eyes have seen: thereby he means that the people are utterly without excuse, if they regard not the things that God had showed them, according to his former using of the same manner of speech. And whereas he said that our eyes have seen, it serves to express the things which our Lord has showed us too evidently, so as we cannot allege ignorance, nor say, this or that was too high or too dark for me. Your eyes have seen it, says Moses. As if he should say, No no, you need not to be great Clerks nor Doctors in this behalf, you need not to be very subtle-headed: our Lords manifesting of himself unto you has been in such forte and so evidently, that even the veriest idiots and rudest forte of you have perceived the things that he told you. And in good sooth, although Gods word contain wonderful secrets: yet notwithstanding they be so manifest unto us, as we may be able to conceive them, at leastwise if we ourselves be not in the fault. For we see how God low-licth himself and stoops to over rudeness, because he knows what we be able to bear. Now then seeing it is so: let us but open our eyes, and when God has once showed himself to us, let us take good heed that we forget him not: for [if we doe] we shall be inexcusable, and our unthankfulness will be manifest and sufficiently proved. Again he shows that it is not enough for us to have some light remembrance of it swimming in our brain: but it must be well rooted in our hearts: And after that manner ought Gods word to be sown in us. It is not enough for us to have skill to talk of it, and to be able to say, I know this & that: but we must hold fast the things inwardly which we have heard outwardly. Now then, if Gods word be settled in our hearts, and reign there: then have we good remembrance of it. But if we be not touched with it, nor have any willingness to keep it: it is all one as if we had never heard of it. Thus you see what we have to mark concerning this speech of Moses, where it is said, that the things which we have once known must never out of our minds.

But forasmuch as God had uttered himself diverse ways to the people: it behooved Moses to show his meaning more particularly in this text. And therefore he adds, The day wherein you wart before the Lord you God, you diddest appear before God in the valley of Horeb, at which time he commanded me to summon you, and to call ou all together. Albeit then that God had showed himself to the people of Israel by diverse miracles, by sundry kinds of sights, and also by diverse revelations as in respect of his word: yet does Moses bring back the people here, chiefly to the law, and to the solemn day wherein the law was, published. And that is according to the matter that we have seen. In so much that if we have not that ground, we shall but build in the air, and all that ever, can be said unto us will slip from us. The ground that I mean is the submitting of ourselves unto God, to be guided by his word and to bridle ourselves thereby, so as he alone may have the whole authority and mastership over us, and we become his true Disciples in flicking to his pure doctrine. That then is the cause why Moses does make special mention hereof the solemn day wherein the law was given to the people of Israel. For he saw well that it would not have booted at all to have uppened never so many things by parcel meal, if he had not set down the chief ground work, which is that men must suffer themselves to be governed by Gods law. Likewise at this day, when we shall have disputed at large of a number of points, if we do not first and foremost win that men, should obey God, and make them to know that his word is the right truth whereunto they must hold themselves: to what purpose is it? They will be still wavering and inconstant, accordingly as we see how a great number will be tasting of this and that, and can find nothing whereon to rest. And why? For they know not the first point of Christianity, which is, that the holy Scripture is our whole wisdom, and, that we must hearken to God speaking there, and not add anything thereunto. Now then, until such time as we become to that point, we shall bee ever changing, and do nothing but totter and waver like Reeds. And for the same cause does the Prophet Malachy say, Be mindful of the Law that was given you by Moses in Horeb. For it was Gods will that thenceforth there should be an intermission, so as a certain time should pass wherein the Prophets should speak no more till the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Now in the meanwhile the Prophet Malachy said, Be mindful of the Law that was given. As if he should say, you cannot do amiss if you hearken to your GOD, and suffer yourselves to be taught by him: but you shall have perfect learning, for it is uttered there. Now therefore we see what the meaning of Moses is, and how we ought to apply the same to our own use: that is to wit, that above all things we must assure ourselves, that our Lord has uttered himself unto us in such wise, as he will be a good and faithful teacher unto us, if we be good scholars unto him. And therefore let us settle all our wits to the obedience of faith, so as we presume not to add anything to that which GOD tells us. When we be once come to that point, then shall we be guided forth from point to point, and from degree to degree to our perfection: but yet must we have the foresaid groundwork, before we can build well.

Now let us come to this saying of his, Call so mind the day wherein you were before the Lord. This saying imports much. For although that GOD did then testify his presence in the valley of Horeb, as we shall see hereafter: yet notwithstanding whensoever he speaks unto us, we appear before his judgment seat, though we have no visible miracles. And it is all one as if a Prince being set to hold a Court of estate, should cause his statutes and ordinances to be proclaimed by the found of a trumpet, to the intent that all men might have knowledge of them. After the same manner does GOD deal in this case. For when he vouchsafes to have his word preached unto us, it is as much as if he summoned us to him, and called us to his throne, there to appear every man for himself, to yield account as before our judge. And (as I told you) this imports much. For we be greatly destitute of wit and reason, if this move us not to hear Gods word with other reverence than we have done. If we considered well, that when we come to a Sermon, or when we take the Bible in our hands to read, God cites and summons us, so as we cannot cast our eye upon his word, nor receive so much as one word that is uttered to us in his name, but that his Majesty is present there with it, and we ourselves are present in his sight. If we thought well upon that: I pray you should we not be otherwise prepared and humbled to yield ourselves teachable? Should we not be in another manner of forwardness than we are seen to be? Therefore if we come here with such coldness, as it were but for orders sake, or when in reading of the Bible, some of us are carried away with fond curiosity, some think themselves discharged to Godward with the having of two or three sentences, and othersome make but a pastime of it: does not this dealing of ours show well, that we never tasted of this saying? Namely, that if GOD speak unto us, we must come before him and feel his Majesty, to be as it were beaten down under it, to the end to submit ourselves the better to his word. That is one principal point.

Besides this there is also an assembly that Moses speaks of, how he was commanded to gather the people together. For it has been Gods will to keep that order from the beginning for the better exercising of us in the unity of faith. True it is that he could well teach us everyone alone by himself: and indeed he uses that way too, so that whether he instruct us by teaching, or give us grace to profit by reading, it may well be done by ourselves alone: but yet therewithal there is the common order, which he will have to continue inviolable. And why? Forasmuch as we have all one faith, and have need to be tie and knit together in one: GOD uses this mean of teaching us all as it were by one mouth, and makes us to meet together as it were in one body: and that, not only to the end that a great multitude may take profit at one mans mouth but to the end we should know that there is but one rule, one truth, one God that speaks, and which causes us to be of one accord and one melody in that behalf, in so much that when every man holds in with his neighbor, it is because there is a right conformity. That then is the thing whereunto Moses had respect, in saying that God commanded him to assemble the people, as he that was his Lieutenant. He gave the Law generally to the intent that the people might by that means be taught to think thus with themselves: behold, our God will have us to be one accord in him, and to be one body wholly conformable to his word, so as every man shift not for himself, like bands thay were scattered and put to flight in battle, but link together in one right and holy union. And this is not for one time only: but it must be put in vre unto the worlds end. For it is Gods will, that his Gospel should be published. And how? Not in hudder mudder and in folks ears: but he will have men to be taught openly, and it meet together, yea and their meeting to be to the end that he be preached, so as there may be a good unity of faith, & that the mark where at all of us do shoot, may be to be gathered and knit together in our head Jesus Christ, who is the bond whereof S. Paul speaks, which proceeds of the common preaching. Wherefore let us learn that we cannot be rightly of Gods household, nor of his flock, unless we meet together, and that our meeting be not only a coming together in the Church, but also a continual linking together in unity when we be gone thence, and when every of us is alone by himself from company, so as we show that Gods gathering of us together unto himself is not in vain, but that there is a right brotherhood among us, to come all unto him in that name of our Lord Jesus Christ. For the devil seeks by all means to break that bond, as we see he has labored in all ages to stir up sects to rend afuhder the body of the Church, and it is the thing that he strives to do in these days more than ever he did erst. And if he cannot obtain that false doctrines may have their full scope to make havoc of all things: yet will he sow darnel among us, so as instead of being united, we shall be heaving one at another, or at leastwise as good as drawn a funder, so as our bond shall not be straight and well knit together. When we see the matter in that taking, let us understand that it is a practice of the devils driving. And why? Gods intent is that we should be gathered together before him, yea even before him. For the wicked will well enough make leagues and confederacies: howbeit, that is but to spite G OD : and in very deed they turn their backs upon him, and hide themselves from him, and by all means possible eschew to come at him, for they have no liking at all of him. But we on our side must come together in the presence of our God. Since it is so, let us be afraid to shrink a funder, and let not the Devil separate us as we see he labors to do: and he knows that he shall have overthrown the principal point of our salvation, if he may win that at our hands. And therefore let us abhor all such sowers of discord in the Church of God. We see now a days, that instead of assembling together, there are diverse which seek nothing but to scatter Gods flock: and we need not to go any further than to this present place. We perceive anyhow these rascals do now a days serve the devils as though they took wages of him, or were utterly fold to be his servants. A man may see where at they shoot. There needs no gassing or conjecturing, there needs no great enquiry of the matter: let a man but look upon their doings, and he shall find that their whole seeking is to break all union, and to pluck a funder seeking the things that have been knit together in the name of God. If GOD did ever work miraculously in any place: he works here as miraculously as in any place of that world, and he shows the power of his word as mightily as may be. Go whither you will, and such as are scattered from all other places, resort hither to shroud themselves as it were under Gods wings, and to be as it were one flock gathered together in his name. And what does the Devil on the contrary part? There is nothing else but banding, that the wicked may shed abroad their venom and poison. And how? Even by unjoining the things that GOD had joined. Indeed they will not say it: but the thing itself is too apparent, and there needs no long disputing or discoursing of the matter, if a man do but open his eyes shall see it. And it is a great shame that it is suffered and winked at: for the matter is too pen and manifest. Yet notwithstanding it is not our Lords will that the things which he has knit together should be so unhappily rent a funder, and all be put out of order after this sort. Wherefore let us abhor such plagues, and beseech GOD to rid his Church of them & the world too, by powering out his vengeance upon them, seeing it appears that they be utterly reprobate, and that there is no mean to reclaim them again. God so thunder down upon them, as men may know how highly he esteems the unity of the faith, and highly his Church be maintained in true brotherhood and concord. And in the mean season let us labor to bring this to pass: and if we be true members of Jesus Christ, let us do the clean contrary to that which we see the wicked do. For since that they do strain themselves so to put all things to havoc: let us on our side walk on in good union, and look that we come together in the presence of our God, and that in such wise as his word do maintain us in good agreement, and cause us so to serve him, and we being conversant one with another in good brotherly friendship, may be followers of the fatherly goodness of our GOD, whereby he gathers the things together which were scattered afunder before.

Now let us fall down in the presence of our good GOD with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may repent us of them aright and seek the remedy of them, which is, that he cleanse us from all our affections and lusts, making us to renounce all our own desires in such wise, as we may no more be given to our own fancies and likings, but seek altogether to be ruled by his word, and to profit therein after such a forte more and more, as our whole wisdom and perfection may be to be ruled altogether by that fame. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us, but also to all, &c.

On Wednesday, the 22nd of May 1555

The twenty second Sermon which is the fourth upon the fourth Chapter. and I will make them to hear my words, which they shall learn, to the end they may fear me all the days which they shall live upon the earth, and that they may teach their children.

11 Then came you and stood under the hill, which burnt with fire unto the midst of the sky, and there was darkness, clouds, and mist.

12 And the Lord your God speak unto you out of the midst of the fire. You heard the voice of his words: but you saw not any image besides the voice.

13 Then declared he his covenant unto you, which he commanded you to do, that is to wit, the ten verses, and you, he wrote them upon two tables of stone.

14 The same time the Lord commanded me to teach you the ordinances and Laws, to the end you should do them in the Land which you go into to possess it.

Declared yesterday after what manner we must come together in the name of God, to appear before him. For the meeting of the wicked is to make confederacies, and it is apparent that their seeking is but only to conspire against God and all goodness: but yet their meeting is by hiding themselves from Gods presence, & they would fain turn their backs upon him, so as he should not see them. Truly they do but loose their time: for all things must needs come to account before God. And if mortal men espy their wicked practices, so as they perceive that their banding of themselves is but to overthrow all order: the same must needs be, known to the heavenly judge, from whom nothing is hidden. If their lewdness, appear even to little children: think they that God has his eyes stopped? But it behooves us on our side to present ourselves before God in all our meetings, to the intent that he may fit among us, & we be taught as it were by his mouth and governed by his hand. Furthermore forasmuch as we see that the wicked seek altogether to rend a funder the union of the Church: let us endeavor so much that more to come together in Gods name. For we cannot prove ourselves to be his children, if we have not the mark whereof Moses speaks here. And thereby it may be judged, that such as pass not to haunt the companies of Christians, when they meet together in the name of God to hear his word and to pray unto him: are but as dogs, and deserve not to be reckoned in the common array of me, but are to be abhorred as dung and filth, because they have cut off themselves from Gods house. Thus you see what we have to remember concerning that text.

And now Moses adds, that if we mind to fare the better by the meetings that are made in the name of God: Wee must hearken to the things that he tells us, and that must be to the end that we may fear him, that is to say, to the end we yield him all reverence, and it may appear that we take him for our Father and God. For if we think to content God with ceremonies, we deceive ourselves, as they do which could find in their hearts to have no Religion at all, and therefore resort here, some but once a month, and othersome as seldom as may be. There are also which come here upon the Sundays and Wednesdays as it were for fashions sake: but in Wednesday the meanwhile does it appear that they be any whit edified in the fear of God?

Does it appear that their coming here to crowd themselves into the flock, does any whit amend them or make them the better? Nay rather they become the more venomous against God, & therefore their coming to infect Gods house, is to their greater condemnation: for they be unworthy to come here, they be no better than swine. Therefore our coming to the Church must be to another end: that is to wit, that we may profit in the fear of God. Now (as I have touched already) this fear imports that he should overrule us, and that we should be subject unto him. And for the same cause also does Moses match these two sayings together, namely that we must do the things that God commands us, and also, that we must fear him. Many men think they fear God well, when they have some fond devotion towards him, as we see in Popery, where every man says that his intent is to serve God: but after what fashion? Even every man after his own fancy. But that obedience which God requires at our hands in yielding ourselves wholly to his word, and the reverence which we owe him as to our Father and King: are things unseparable. Wherefore let us mark well that if we be minded and desirous to come together as we ought to do: Gods word must have all authority over us, so as our receiving thereof be not only to confess it with our mouth, but also to frame only our lives wholly thereafter. For if we will needs live after our own swinge, and every of us do what seems good to himself: God holds scorn of us and disclaims us, though we protest to fear him and serve him us, [never so much.] For it is no reason but that he should be heard, specially seeing he takes pain to teach us. That therefore seeing is the first point.

Again let us understand that our keeping of Gods Law, and our walking according to his will, do not advantage him at all: for what can he receive at our hands? But it is to the end that the world may know that we fear him, that is to say, that we take him for our master, & that we would fain be wholly his, and that he should govern us. That is the effect of the matter that Moses shows here. Howbeit forasmuch as Churches are often times defiled with hypocrites and wicked folk which crowd in covertly, who notwithstanding are worthy to be even thrust out of the world: Let us mark what is said in the fiftieth Psalm, where God declares that he separates his [true, servants] from such as falsely abuse his name: so as his voice thunders to summon those that fear him aright, and have not covenanted with him unsanedly, nor serve him only with Ceremonies, but also in very deed: them will he assemble together. And on the contrary part, he upbraids those that take his name in their mouth, and yet notwithstanding do take part with robbers, murderers, thieves, and tray tours. Therefore when men will needs match GOD and the devil together after that fashion as it appears that most men do: God complains of it, and protests that it shall not scape unpunished. Now if he show such a separation beforehand: Let us be well assured, that when the day comes wherein the Goats shall be put afunder from the Lambs, the shame of such as have preaced after that forte into Gods Church shall then be discovered, and they shall be abhorred of all creatures as they deserve. But in the meanwhile let us see that we separate ourselves from them as near as we can: and when we see such uncleanness, at leastwise let us beware that we mislike them, and let us pray God to rid and cleanse his Church of such infections. Howsoever the case stand, let us be mindful of the thing that Moses speaks in this text, whensoever we intend to meet together in the name of God.

Afterward he adds that when we ourselves have walked in the fear of God, every of us must teach his children to do the like. Wherein we see that it is not enough for every man to discharge his duty in living orderly himself: but that we must (to that uttermost of our power,) procure the continuance of Gods honor and service after our deceases. And in good says, is it reason that Gods name should be buried with our death? We know how flightfull our life is: but Gods glory must endure, forever without decaying. Therefore let us learn our own duty: that is, to walk righteously all that time of our life, and to endeavor to train up our children aright, so as religion may flourish and prosper when we be dead, and God be always honored in the world, that his name may be called upon purely. And that is the, very cause also why God commands fathers so straightly to teach their children. For he could well send his creatures into the world, though no man had any special ear of them: but he charges fathers to bring up their children. And why? To the end they should know that they must yield an account of them. And for the same cause also does he communicate his name unto them. For the title of father belongs to himself alone: but yet he honors men so much as to grant them the name of fathers. And to what end? That they should be the earnest and careful in teaching their children their duties.

So then, let us do our endeavor, that there may remain a good afterspring after our decease, so as Gods Church may flourish still, and his name be worshipped from age to age. And we ought to labor so much the more in that behalf, because we see how the devil practices to overthrow all that ever is budded in the name of God. So far of is it that the fruit which ought to come of the Gospel does ripen: that men do labor to pluck it up. Or else to mar it and to turn it out of the own kind. Since we see this, ought we not to be the more provoked to do the duty that is commanded us here? Without going any further, what is to be seen here among us? The Gospel has been preached to us now a long time: and yet for all that, what manner of ones are they which have been born of all this time, to whom God has granted the grace to be suckled with Gods word even from the teat, and to be brought up in it likewise, so as they being then but little babes, did never see any of the devilish abominations of popery, and therefore ought to be even thoroughly soaked in the doctrine of salvation? what manner of ones are they ? does it not appear that most part of them are so forward, as if they were the brood of Serpents? The world may see that they despise God openly, and commit such wickedness and lewdness, that there is much more honesty and more show of Religion among the Papists, than there is among these. Seeing then that thing are so far out of order, and the devil endeavors to put all to havoc, ought we not to be the more inflamed to do our endeavor, that there may remain at leastwise some little feed after our decease, so as the remembrance of the Gospel, be not utterly abolished, nor the thing that has been set up so happily in the name of GOD and by his wonderful happily power, be decayed and pulled down again by the enemies? Now then, seeing that God has granted us the grace and privilege to be called to the hearing of his word, and to have it set forth in the pure simplicity among us: let us understand that we be the more bound to serve and honor him, not only severally for our own parts, but also by teaching our children, and by raking pains to make them also to live virtuously, so as the doctrine which they shall have heard in their youth be not lost nor mard, as we see too much by experience. And generally let us all have this by regard, that such as come after us may agree in the true religion, so as there may be no change. But so far off is that from being done, that the enemies of the truth, (I mean the household enemies and not the Papists, for they be far worse than the Papists,) think they shall never come time enough to overthrow all order and to pull down all that GOD has set up here. Since we see it is so, let us understand that we ought to be as earnest in building up to the Lord as the devils in pulling all down. For let us not mistrust but that Gods power is stronger than all the fiends of hell. Thus you see what we have to note upon this strain: but the chief matter is the putting of it in vre.

And now Moses adds, that GOD showed himself to his people with dreadful tokens, which were able to have astonished them. For he speak to them (says he) from the midst of the fire. And therewithal there was a great cloud, darkness, and mist. By these words Moses shows that the law was not brought without good warrant; for it was accompanied with wonders that were able to astonish the whole world. And to what purpose served that, but to make it certainly know that the law came from heaven, and that God was the author thereof? According whereunto it is said in Exodus, that when God appeared after that forte in a thick cloud, and a flaming fire, making the air to roar and the mountain Sinai to shake, and the found of trumpets to be heard: all those things (say he) were done of purpose to make you hearken to your Lord God, and to know that it was he that speak, and that whosoever receives not the doctrine that I have brought you, must fight against the majesty of God. But [if he do so] he shall find God too strong for him. Thus you see what belongs to this text. And so we see now wherefore Moses made mention of the cloud, darkness, and mist: namely to the end it should be known, that the law was not put forth but by the authority of the living God, and that men might be fully assured living that it came from heaven.

And let us mark by the way, that Gods choosing of the sign that is mentioned here, was to do us to understand, that we must not enquire of his majesty further than he gives us leave. GOD showed not himself in any visible shape, least it might be thought that his essence or being had some shape, whereof we will treat tomorrow by Gods leave: but he did set a cloud, darkness, and mistiness before him. And why? To the end that we should learn to be humble, and to know that he dwells in unapproachable light. We know how curious and overbold men are, for they would fain know what Gods being or substance is, and search out every whit of him by inchmeal, and that so presumptuously as though they would push up their homes into heaven. Such is their nature. But God will have us to worship him in fear and humility, as good reason is it should be so. And he withdraws himself the further from us, when we inquire further of him than he commands us. For otherwise were it not all one as if we would make him our underling? What prominence should he have if he were so shut up within mans conceit? Therefore to express so great and so excessive rashness, he did set a dark cloud before him. But we must mark, that when God did set darkness before the eyes of the people, it was not to the intent to be utterly unknown, but to hold the people in awe, that they should not preace nic the hill where the fire and flame appeared that are spoken of in Exodus as is said before: and therefore was there a great and thick cloud hard by the people. That then was the mean which God used to show himself to the people. Mark that for one point.

The other point is that God did utter himself in such manner, as the people fought no further than was lawful for them, but held themselves contented with such discovery as was given unto them. And these two points are well worthy to be marked. For many men when they lift to excuse their ignorance, will say that we ought not to be inquisitive of Gods secrets: No truly, but yet is it not meant that we should be brute beasts. Wherefore has GOD created us after his own image, but to the intent that his truth should shine forth in us? And yet notwithstanding, it is as a common proverb that has reigned and does reigned still in the popedom: insomuch that the foundation whereon they have grounded their implied faith, is that they must not know anything, but that it is enough to believe as the Church believes. And in the meanwhile they ought not at what mark they shoot, nor what God they worship, nor how his name is to be called upon. But as I touched before, Gods meaning is not that men should so abolish and destroy the grace that he has put into them, for it were an utter defacing of his image in despite of him: but rather after as he comes nearer unto us & we unto him, so will he have his image that more known in us & his truth that more shine forth there. Let us understand then that Gods intent is not that men should be ignorant of him, but to utter himself in such wise, as we may be able to discern him from the idols that have been forged, so as we may take him for our father, and assure ourselves that we be called to the knowledge of his truth, and that we may boldly resort unto him to call upon him, and to boldly seek succour at his hand. After that manner was it Gods will to manifest himself to the people of Israel at the letting forth of the law: and after that same manner continues he still at this day.

But yet for all that, the cloud is still before his face, to make men know their own rudeness. Again forasmuch as we be oversickle and would know double as much as is lawful for us, insomuch that we attempt to know the things that are impossible to be known: therefore did God cast a great and thick cloud between himself and the people. And if we were thoroughly persuaded here of, it would be as a thoroughly to open us the understanding of that whole holy scripture. For why? Whensoever we came to the reading or hearing of it, we should be sure that our Lord jests not when he speaks after that manner, and when he protests thus by his prophet Esay: I have not spoken it in secret, neither have I said it in vain, that men should seek me. Therefore whosoever hears me, and receives the truth that I tell him, shall not be disappointed in seeking me. Thus you see that we shall profit, if we bear well in mind that GOD manifests himself unto us, so far forth as is behoofc-fall for our souls, health. And besides this, we should with all singleness reverence the things that we comprehend not, we should every of us walk according to the measure of his faith, and we should continually endeavor to come nearer and nearer unto him and to gather strength. And moreover if the things were too high for us: very well, we would (as Saint Paul warns us in the third to the Philippians) tarry till God showed them more plainly, and yet in the meanwhile not cease to glorify him.

But we see the clean contrary. For under pretence that Gods word seems dark, many shrink from it, and make a defense of it to excuse their ignorance with all. Othersome again do rush forward with devilish presumptuousness, to seek out things that God has not revealed, and through unsatiable desirousness of knowledge, do pick out new questions every minute of an hour, and if they may not see all things at will, they bend their homes against God as we see these rascals do, which spew out their blasphemies when Gods secrets seem strange to them after their own fancy. If they perceive not Gods eternal election, if they perceive not how he chooses the one fort & refuses the other even according to his will: if they understand not how he disposes of his creatures, and that nothing happens but by his good will: by and by they fall to fretting and chiding, yea and they dare even murmur against God and would have all things raised out of the holy scripture, which agree not with their fantastical brain. So much the more therefore does it stand us on hand to remember well what is told us here: namely that God casts a cloud before our eyes. And why? To the end we should be sober in inquiring of him, and endeavor to profit according to his teaching of us: for it belongs him to know what is for our behoof: and moreover that we should always walk according to the measure of the faith which he shall have given and imparted unto us. Thus much concerning the cloud.

And now seeing the Law was given with record that God is the author thereof: Let us in these days learn to rule ourselves thereafter, and not call the thing any more in question, which we ought to be most assured of. Secondly if we compare the law with the Gospel, let us understand that there is much more reason why we should humble ourselves, and reverently receive all that is contained in the Gospel. For although the law was ratified with so many miracles: yet did it not fail to strike the people in fear, and to bring them in great vexation of mind, insomuch that they said, Let not the Lord speak unto us, for then are we all dead. And why? For if a man look no further but to Gods commandments, there is nothing but cursing. By reason whereof men beholding themselves bound to things impossible, and perceiving that God will be their judge: must needs be cast down, yea and driven to utter despair. After that manner was the law delivered to the people. But that Gospel nowadays is friendly unto us. For there God calls us to be of his household, not for any desert of ours in performing the things that he commands, but of purpose to bear with us as with his children, forasmuch as he has adopted us in our Lord Jesus Christ. Seeing then that God assures us to him so lovingly, have we not the more cause to receive the doctrine of salvation with all reverence, considering that it is the message of life, whereas the law was a record of death to verify the people, I mean the people of the Jews? And as in respect of miracles, we are sure that the Gospel has been warranted with more, than every law was. And besides the miracles that have been wrought, behold, Jesus Christ in whom dwells all glory and majesty, is come into the world to bear witness thereof. Seeing then that we have the Gospel & the doctrine of Jesus Christ, who has fullness of that Godhead in him: ought not we to be more humbled under the obedience of that Gospel, than that people of old time were under the subjection & bondage of the law? yes - and therefore is it said, that heaven & earth were both shaken, as that prophet Aggeus speaks of it, saying that earth was thoroughly shaken at that publishing of the law. And the Apostle alleges that same text in the Epistle to the Hebrews, saying: but now must all be shake, & the power of God must utter itself far greater in the Gospel. So then let us learn that if the cloud and darkness which appeared at that time to that Jews, ought to have taught them to obey God & to submit themselves to his law: much more ought the same to prevail with us at this day: specially seeing we have not a dark cloud: for (as says S. Paul) there is not so much as any veil before us, but we have that image of God shining forth, and we see him as it were face to face. Seeing then that God does nowadays appear to us after another manner than he did to that fathers, so as he shows us his lively image in our Lord Jesus Christ, to the intent we should behold him for our father and Savior, and instead of the dark cloud we have nowadays the great light of that Gospel: Let us assure ourselves that we ought to be that more desirous to obey him in all things. That is the thing which we have to remember here.

Here with all thing let us also wcy this saying that is set down here: namely, that the people ought to have rested altogether upon the voice that was uttered unto them, as the very mark whereby God will be known. Tomorrow it shall be declared more at length, why God would not have any visible image: but yet notwithstanding we must at this present, wey well this point, that GOD did utter forth his voice. And why? To the intent that thereby the people should be restrained as with a bridle, and consider with themselves that their eyes must not be wandering and gazing about, to seek any shape of God, but that their ears must be attentive to hear his voice, so that whensoever God speaks, men must be as it were imprisoned to it, and content themselves to be taught by him. Therefore when we come before the Lord, accordingly as it is said that they which meet Lord, accordingly together in his Church do appear before him: let us note that we must make account of his voice, [and think thus with ourselves] What come we hither to do? Whereas the Papists gaze upon their Church walls, and fise about after their foolish ceremonies and after murlimewes of their own making: insomuch that although they think they please God, yea and hold him bound unto them, yet they do but play the brute beasts in that behalf: Let us have Gods word as that certain mark that he sits in the middle of us, & is [always] at hand with us. After that manner must we think, if we will not err: for the true mark for all the faithful to shoot at, when they assemble together in the name of GOD, is to have his voice as a warrant of the presence of his majesty. And of a truth, like as the ear was the cause of the withdrawing of the first man from God: so must it draw us to him again at this day. What was it that banished our father Adam out of Gods kingdom? What carried him away from the hope of life, but his ears which received away the voice of Satan, and the falsehood that was put to him? Now then, like as we be separated from God by that damnable voice, when we have yielded by unto evil: so now we know that the only mean to be called unto God and to enter into his house, that we may be of the number of his children: is to hear Gods voice and thereby to be united unto him. Thus much concerning that word.

Moses adds thereunto, that at the same time God published his covenant which he had made before, and commanded Moses to bring them the ten articles in two tables, charging him to teach the people his laws and judgments, that they might do them. Hereby we see again that which I have touched heretofore: that is to wit, that God will not have his doctrine to be as a dead thing, but to be of power to reform us, so that whereas naturally we be forward and given to all naughtiness, we naturally must be subject to him in such wise as his righteousness may reign in us. To that intent was the law set forth. True it is that the law being written in two tables of stone, could not be kept unless God subdued the hardness of men's hearts by his holy spirit: and therefore it served as a figure to show that the law ought to be written in men's hearts, though they be never so hard. Those stones then were as an image of our hearts. For as God owes by his prophet) we have such a hardness in us, as he can never bow us till we be softened. Nevertheless like as he engraved his law in the stones: so also does he print the same in us when it pleases him to touch us by his holy spirit. And this was done at the same time that the law was put forth. And here you see why comparison is made between the Gospel and the law. God told the people how it behooved them to know themselves, for such as they were indeed, that is to wit that they were hardened, in naughtiness, stubborn, and full of all corruption, so as there was no concord nor agreement between the thoughts and affections of them, and the righteousness of himself. And for proof thereof, let us mark that there are two things betokened by that which Moses rehearses here. The one is the goodness that GOD has showed in letting forth his law. For it is not enough for men to be taught: that will not boot them until such time as he subdue them. We may have our ears beaten long enough with the doctrine of the Law, but we shall continue still given to our own naughtiness: and therefore it shall be but labor lost and misspent to preach Gods word unto us. And why? For it will slip out again, and so shall we continue always like ourselves. That is one thing that is betokened unto us.

And there with all God has showed, that yet notwithstanding, the letting forth of his word in that wise by the mouth of a man, is not in vain, for it served to put the people again in hope of things that were yet hidden, whereof we have not only a full sight, but also the effect and accomplishment, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, according as it is said by the prophets Jeremy and Ezechiel, that God will make a new covenant, after another manner than that which he made with the fathers of old time. For that covenant (says he) was soon broken, because they had no hold) of themselves: but I will engrave my law in your hearts. God then did testify this new covenant by Moses in mount Sinai, which our Lord Jesus Christ has performed by his coming into the world, and which is offered unto us still everyday. And therefore let us learn that when we come to be taught, it must not be to any other end than to be renewed by God, so as he put away the hardness that is in us, and soften our hearts after such a forte, as we may stoop under him to receive his yoke, and he hold us in awe, because we be so fickle that we would start away from him everyday, if he gave us not steady constantness to go through with our vocation. That is a thing which we ought to mark well. And why? Even to humble us, and to make us know that although GOD spare our lives yet should they be turned into death, if he should let us alone in our own plight, and not add a second grace in referring us by his holy spirit. And therewithal let us be of good comfort, forasmuch as we see that nowadays we have not only the ancient figures, and the tables of stone wherein God wrote his law: but also that he works effectually by his holy spirit, as Saint Paul shows in the third to the Colossians. Seeing then shows that God works after such a forte, as we perceive that our hearts are no more stony, forasmuch as we be willing to stoop under him, and desirous to honor him, insomuch that although there be many lets and hindrances in us, (as we see that the flesh strives continually against goodness:) yet not withstanding our Lord gives us the grace to be sorry for our infirmities and sins, being desirous to eschew them, endeavoring to withstanding, and enforcing ourselves with all our hearts to serve him: Let us acknowledge the singular grace that he vouchsafes upon us, and therewithal let us learn to preacc boldly unto him, and not to stand aloof underneath the hill as is said here. And it is the same thing that Apostle shows in the Epistle to the Hebrews when he says, that we be not come to the mountain where there was nothing but fire, where nothing was heard but thundering and tempest, where lightnings flashed, where trumpets sounded, and where there was nothing but terribleness: we be not come to that mountain: we be not nowadays called to bondage: but we be here in the presence of our God, where we have friendly fellowship with the Angels: wee be matched and knit in company with the holy fathers, and with the souls whom God has already taken out of the world: and we be all called to the end we should with open mouth call upon God as our father. Then if we bethink ourselves hereof, let us go boldly to our God.

Moreover let us always bear in mind how it is told us here, that Gods enjoining of us to keep his law, is by way of covenanting with us. And that ought to give us the more courage. True it is that if God did simply use his authority, even in showing us our duty towards him, and dealt with us by plain rigor, saying, you must obey me spite of your teeth: yet ought we to do it, and it were not meete for us to gainsay him. But now when we see that Gods subduing of us unto him is in such wise, as he vouchsafes therewithal to be our saviour and father, covenanting as it were by mutual consent with us, and binding himself to us in requiring us to come to serve him: ought it not to move us greatly, if we were not worse than blockish? Ought it not to provoke us to give ourselves over to our GOD, seeing that he vouchsafes to join with us? and therefore let us always mark well this word Covenant. And that word ought specially to touch us to the quick in these days, when we compare the law with the Gospel. For if God in those days made a covenant with the people of old time: it is in far other taking with us nowadays, that is to say, infinitely better. And for proof thereof, the pledges of those times were earthly, and served to keep folk always in fear. True it is that God did always set to his mark, so as the ancient fathers had an eye to the Lord Jesus Christ, and were not destitute of this warrant, that he of his free goodness was their Saviour: howbeit that was done but (as you would say) aloof. But nowadays God utters his covenant unto us so largely, that we be sure of the forgiveness of our sins: and that although there be many things amiss in us, although we have a number of encumbrances by reason of our infirmities, although we limp and hang our wings, yea and although we stumble and take many a fall: yet shall not all this let him to use that inestimable goodness of his still towards us, whereof he speaks by his prophet: namely that he will not deal roughly with us, no more than a father does with his children. Seeing then that we perceive that our Lord of his free favor accepts our service though it be unperfect and full of faults: we ought to be the more willing to give ourselves unto him even with all our power. And since we see it has pleased him to stoop so low, as to show himself to be our father and teacher, dealing more familiarly with us than he did in old time with the fathers under the law: let not us on our side be slothful in coming to him, but let us labor the more earnestly in his commandments, and strive to withdraw ourselves so from the world, as nothing may keep us from attaining to the holy union, which is contained in the covenant that God has made with us on the behalf of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good GOD with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make us feel them better, that we may mislike of them in such wise as after we have condemned ourselves for them, our whole seeking may be to feel the mercy that he has promised us, not only in not imputing our faults to us, but also in correcting them by the power of his holy spirit, that we may all have in his obedience. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, &c.

On Thursday, the 23rd of May 1555

The twenty third Sermon, which is the fifth upon the fourth Chapter

15 Therefore shall you take good heed for yourselves, that you saw no manner of image in the day that the Lord your God spake unto you in Horeb, from the midst of the fire:

16 That you mar not yourselves, nor make you any graven image, or representation of any portraiture, be it the likeness of man or woman,

17 Or the likeness of any beast: upon earth, or the likeness of any bird that has wings, which flies under the sky:

18 Or the likeness, which of anything that creeps on the ground, or the likeness of any fish that is in the water under the earth.

19 Also that when you lifted up your eyes unto heaven, and beholdest the Sun, and the Moon, and the stars up, with all the host of heaven; you be not deceived and bow down before them, and serve them, seeing the Lord God has imparted them to all people that are under the whole heaven.

20 But as for you, the Lord has taken you and drawn you out of the iron furnace of Egypt, to be unto him a people of inheritance, as you be this day.

E have seen already heretofore the cart that God had of his people, in willing them to take heed to themselves, willing and to watch well for their folks. For by those words he shows how dear & chare our soul health is unto him. Here we see the like again. Take heed to yourself (said he) and keep your soul. If God did not bear a singular good will to men, he would not speak so. And therefore we have a sure and infallible warrant that God seeks our salvation, to the end that we on our side shall think upon it also. But we must mark therewithal, whereof he treats here: that is to wit, of the worshipping of God purely without disguising of his majesty. Then is it a token that the same belongs chiefly to our salvation, and that we run to ruin and destruction when we swarve aside from the pure religion, and fall to devising of anything that beseems not God. If we do so, the devil reigns among us, and GOD must needs forsake us. Wherefore let us learn that the holding of religion purely & in such forte as God allows it, as a thing of no small importance. For this kind of speech were inexpedient, if to make images were either lawful or but a small and light fault: and surely God would not speak so vehemently as he does. And therefore whensoever the case concerns the worshipping of God, let us mark well that it is one of that principal points of our salvation, & that men must not presume in this behalf to take leave to do what they themselves think good, but rather this warning that is set down here must induce us to walk in fear and carefulness. For what ashamed is it, that our Lord shall tell us we must stand upon our guard: and we in the meanwhile shall run at rovers, as though we needed not to pass greatly for the matter. And that God should so procure our welfare, and we make none account of it? And so you see what we have to mark upon those terms.

But now let us come to the chief matter of this sentence. You saw not (said he) any image or portraiture, in the day that the Lord spake to you in Horeb. Take heed therefore that you mar not yourselves, by making you any carved image, or the likeness of any thing, whether it be of man or woman, bird or beast, worm or fish: Beware of al such things. For your God has showed himself to you in such wise as was expediet, and not in any shape. So then let us beat this lesson in mind, namely to worship him in spirit, because he has not a body, nor any thing in him that can be represented by the things that are seen with our eyes. Now this doctrine is clear enough of itself, if men would follow it, and that the world would not willfully resist so certain a thing. But this, fully has been in all ages and reigns yet still at this day that men will needs have a presence of God after their own fashion and device. But surely their wits are fleshly, by reason whereof they conceive and imagine of God after their own nature, and thereupon make images unto him. Nevertheless it is not for us to counterfeit God, or to attribute any thing unto him: but it belongs to him to utter himself: and therefore we must but only receive that which he shows us, and hold us wholly there unto.

Now let us mark the ground that Moses takes here: that is to wit: At such time as God spake unto you in mount Horeb, he showed not himself in any visible shape. In speaking after that manner, Moses shows that we must not be hasty beforehand to conceive what we ourselves think good, but must tarry till God show himself. Take that for one point. For if men will needs give way to their own fleshly reason in that behalf, they shall overthrow themselves and break their necks with their over much haste. But on the other side Moses shows, that GOD did manifest himself in such wise to his people, as there is no cause why men should anymore say, how shall we know God? How shall we be sure that he is neare us? How shall we worship him? How can we call upon him? God therefore has cut off all occasions of fond curiosities, by showing himself to his people. And the same agrees now fitly unto us. For when God published his law in mount Horeb: although he had then chosen the offspring of Abraham: yet was it his intent to give forth a doctrine that should continue to the worlds end. Then let us understand, that God in manifesting himself by voice, meant to bar all images, not only in respect of the Jews, but also in respect of us too. And therefore we see that their beastliness is so much the greater, which nowadays maintain this corruption concerning images in the Popedom: for they allege that this was spoken for the Jews & not for us: Verily as who should say that Gods manifesting of himself by voice, and not in shape of man or any other living creature, served not for all ages, but only for the people of old time.

Again, what is to be said of the reasons that are alleged, through the whole holy scripture? served they but only for a time? or rather ought they not to stand fast for ever? Behold, Esay upbraids the Jews, that they had disfigured the majesty of God. And why? To whom have you likened me , says he? The complaint that God makes is this: does wood or stone resemble me? As for them, they be but dead & corruptible things. Does it not well appear then, that dishonor and wrong is offered to my being, when men go about after that forte to represent me under such shapes?

Now is God changed since that time? Is he not the same that he was? Then if he had no likeness to wood and stone in old time: neither is he like them now. And therefore it follows that this neither ought to be nor can be restrained to any one time, but must continue, for ever: Furthermore any whereas the Papists allege, that Gods restraining of idolatry so straightly, was because the Jews were so much inclined to superstition: I would with all my heart that it were in their power to amend men and to draw them from their error. But what? The world sees it is all one still. For if ever the Jews were fleshed in their foolish vanities: the world is never a whit amended now, but rather become worse. As soon as men do think upon God, by and by they will needs have somewhat that resembles their own kind, and thereupon they fall to making of images. And when they once have anything to gaze at, they cling to that, and their devotion is tied to it, so as they never go about to lift up their hearts to heaven, to worship God and to call upon him. We see this with our eyes. What a beastliness then is it to say, that only the Jews were forbidden to worship images, that it is lawful for us nowadays to do it? Yea, but we see how the new testament also does speak of it. For the reasons as well of Moses as of the prophets which we have touched already, are alleged by Saint Paul, who said that men went astray or rather vanished away in their own imaginations, and turned all things upside down, and falsified Gods truth, whensoever they made any counterfeit of him, whether it were in the likeness of man or of beast. Does Saint Paul speak there but only of the Jews? Yes: and even in the Sermon which he makes in the seventeenth of the Acts, he speaks not to any one people alone, but to all the heathen universally. And to the same purpose he alleged them a saying of their own heathen writers. For it is written by a heathen Poet, that we be Gods generation. Saint Paul reasons hereupon, if we be the generation of God, is it either comely or reasonable that we should make him any image either of wood or stone, gold, or silver? None of these things can resemble him. But we must mark that when this poor heathen man spake after that fashion, he meant not that we resemble God either in eyes, or in nose, or in ears, but in soul, forasmuch as we have reason to discern between good and evil, understanding to conceive and comprehend things, and are so excellent above all brute beasts, that there is no creature in the world so noble as man. That is the thing wherein we resemble God. But now, with what painting can man's soul be expressed? Seek all the cunning that can be, & what portraiture can be made thereof? And yet for all that, what are our souls? They be but as little sparks in comparison of the infinite brightness that is in God. Our souls are created, and God is without beginning: He is the ground and wellspring of all things. Our souls are weak, subject to ignorance, subject to sin, and subject to many wicked lusts. But God with his infinite being and majesty is the perfection of all virtues. To be short, as often as we think of him, we ought to be ravished into wondering and astonishment. So then, is it not apparent that men are worse than mad, when they will needs take upon them to shape out Gods being, seeing that no shape can be made of their own souls, which are nothing in comparison of him? For seeing that S. Paul speaks so to that heathen, I pray you do not the Papists show that their meaning is to reprove him of ignorance, and of the misapplying of Gods law? Or else must they not needs be confounded in their blasphemies? Yes: and therefore let us mark well, that this doctrine that God will not have any manner of image made of him, serves not for any two or three days, but for all ever. And there is even one reason which ought to suffice us, which I alleged even now out of the prophet Esay. How now said God? Consider who I am. If I lifted to grip that whole world, I need not to stretch out my hand for the matter, For though I kept my hand shut, yet could I hold all the world close in it, as a little grain of dust. It is true that God has no hands, for he has nobody: but his speaking so is by a similitude. As if he should say, do you think me to be like any creature? No: for all the world is nothing in comparison of me. It is but as a grain of dust in a man's hand: & you yourselves are here beneath as a fort of frogs and grasshoppers. Now then, if you will needs make some puppet to represent me, is it not as good as a defacing of my glory, & a spiting of me to that uttermost of your power? We see that God is a spirit as the scripture declares: & shall we then go about to make him a body? It is he that gives life to all things: & shall we go take a dead thing to represent him thereby, and say: There is God: When we have shaped out a stone or a piece of wood, and made it a nose, ears, and all the rest of mans limbs, yet has it no feeling at all: and shall we nevertheless say, Behold, there is God? What a dealing were that? For the same cause is it said in the psalm: Are idols remembrances of God? Indeed men make them mouths, and they have feet, hands, noses, & ears, but yet have they no power to go, nor any other ability, they be but corruptible & dead things. And is their any remembrance of God in them? Serve they not any rather to lead men into error & beastliness, so as they should make no more account of God? The very heathen men themselves could skill to say it: not that they did practice it indeed: but God wrested such words out of their mouths, to that intent they might all be convicted. And albeit that neither Moses nor that prophets spake unto them: yet was it Gods will to condemn by themselves. You se then how it is a sufficient peremptory reason, that inasmuch as there is no likeness between God and any of all the shapes that can be made to represent him withal: he has wrong done unto him, and it is an abasing of his majesty and glory, when men do make images of him after that forte.

And therewithal let us also behold men's madness. Is it in mans power (as said the prophet Esay) to take a log of wood, and with part thereof to go heat his oven, or to see the flesh in a pot, or to bake his bread, or to warm himself: and to take another part of it, and to fashion a nose and ears upon it, and to say unto it: you are my God, and thereupon to worship it? Now when men make Gods, that is to say remembrances or representations of God, at their own pleasure, because they lift to put a difference between two or three pieces of wood [to prefer one before another,] and say, behold, this is GOD: is it not too great a beastliness? yes, and the very heathen men themselves have affirmed it, as I have declared. Behold, a Paynim, a blind wretch that was before the coming of Jesus Christ, said: Since the time that images came into the world, there has been nothing but error, and it has been the mean to make men brute beasts, and to turn them away from the truth. Seeing that even blind men knew this, or rather that God did cast forth those words by their mouth: is it not a horrible condemnation to such as term themselves Christians, if they take not heed to it? Another heathen man brings in an idol speaking thus: The Carpenter or Carver (said he) was in doubt what to make of me: in the end he thought best to make me a God, and so am I now worshipped. See how this blind wretch scoffs at the beastliness that was among men, and yet he himself ceased not to worship idols still. But what? God wrested this acknowledgement from him by force, to the end that all mankind should be condemned, and that there should be no more excuse. But as for us, we will vaunt ourselves to be taught by Gods word: and yet we will not know so much as the silly infidels have spoken. And truly, are not we warned by them? If we hear not the Prophets and Apostles: atleastwise yet ought those heathen men to teach us to our shame. Therefore it must needs be that we be worse than bewitched by Satan, if we consider not all these reasons, specially seeing they be of Gods own alleging, who will have men to receive them even with all reverence, as at his majesty's hand, and that for a further confirmation he adds the sayings of the infidels which I have alleged. And therefore let us forbear to take that upon us which belongs not to us, that is to wit, the choice and liberty of making images of God, for men to worship, or to cast the wood into the fire to make the pot seethe, and such other like things. For it is too much against reason.

Furthermore, let us also take heed to ourselves. For asloneas we begin to entangle ourselves in our own imaginations: by and by there follows a sea of foolish thoughts, which make us to run gadding here and there, so as they carry us quite & clean from God. If men knew their own nature surely they durst never adventure to make any image. I told you at the first, that we ought to know God, & that the same knowledge would be a good bridle to hold us in simplicity, and to make us to prevent all superstitions. And when we enter into ourselves, that also ought to teach us well, that it is a turning of all things upside down, when we make any image of God. For what is the cause that men are so eager to have some representation of God: but for that they cannot mount up into heaven, for as much as their wits go groveling downward, and are always wedded to the earth? And therefore would they have God to come down unto them. Now it is true that God comes down unto us: howbeit, that is after his own manner, and not at our appointment. And he must be fain to stoop unto us, because we cannot move up unto him but yet he keeps such a fashion & measure, that there with all he lifts us up to him. We for our part could find in our hearts that God were (as you would say) under our feet, so as we might tread upon him: And that is the cause why we have idols. For that beginning of idolatry sprang of this, that men feeling their own infirmity, would needs have God in such wise as their own wit was able to brook. Now their wit sties not high, but rather rucks beneath upon that ground. And therefore although men had no idols at all: yet is idolatry in them, & they have that seed of superstition, inasmuch as they would have God to fashion himself to their liking. Now then seeing that this naughtiness is rooted in us already: must not that mischief become double, when we meet with an object? that is to say when we have any thing to set us forward, & when any new occasion is ministered? So then, if there be any idols or images to portray or represent God: it cannot be but that men shall be double seduced. Seeing they be to much inclined thereto of nature: it is a great enforcement when they be further driven forward by that thing that they behold. Therefore if we wist it were such a vice, surely we would abhor idolatry, knowing that turns us quite away from God. And for the same cause does the prophet Jeremy say, that there is nothing but doctrine of falsehood in Idols: and the prophet Abacuck verifying the same, & comparing idols with the living God, says that they be a school of lies.

But yet for all this, the Papists will affirm that images are laymens books: and that be cause all men cannot read nor are clerks there must be some help for the ignorant. Very well: if a representation of God be made, that is a book, that is as good as the Bible, say the Papists: and it is their chief ankerhold that they flee to in this case. True it is that this shift is not of their own devising: it was devised by a man not wicked of himself, notwithstanding that he was somewhat attainted with the corruption of papistry. For he was a Pope himself, howbeit not when the Poppedom was in such plight as it is nowadays: but yet when it had already been greatly corrupted, and the world was for degenerated. Now then, this good man Gregory thought it good to have images, and that they would be as books for the unlearned: this have the papists received as if it were that oracle of some Angel from heaven. But contrariwise that Prophet Jeremy owes that all the doctrine of idols is mere falsehood, and likewise Abacuck in the second Chapter said that they teach nothing but lies. Were it lawful for a man to coin false money on his own head, because he can get none of the right stamp? No: but yet has God given his word to all men, so as he has vouchsafed not only to speak to great Clerks, but also to stoop to the rudeness of the little ones. And for all this, men stop their ears, and say they cannot know God but by a Puppet: and under that pretence they will needs have it lawful for them to bely the things that God has reported of his own being. Forasmuch then as we have warrant that there is nothing but falsehood in images: let us send home such Books to the devil: for it is certain that he is the author of them, and that they came all out of his shop. And herein we see how that cursed Counsel which allowed images, was first carried away. For these were the worshipful reasons that they alleged for the having of images. It is not enough (said they) that men be taught by the ear: but their eyes also must have some instruction too. And thereunto they wrested this saying of the Psalm, we have heard and seen that as we have heard Gods word, so must we also have some thing to look at: and (as I said) they refer this looking, unto images. But contrariwise the Prophets meaning is, that God (besides his uttering of himself to his people by his word) had bestowed so many and so apparent gifts of grace upon them, as they might well say, Our God has sufficiently assured us that he was our Savior, not only by his promises, but also by the deed itself whereof we have had experience. And yet notwithstanding under colour of that text, these rascals will needs bear men in hand, that God must be represented by puppets.

But if they will needs that there must be visible images: our Lord has given us as many of them as he knew to be for our behoof. When we have Baptism, is it not a visible image of the thing that is spiritual? That is to wit of the washing which we have by the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, when we be renewed by his holy spirit? And have we not a representation of the heavenly mystery set forth to us in the Lord's supper? Yes: but yet for all that we must not make any image at all of Gods being. And why? for it were not for our profit as I have declared before: but it would rather turn us away to lies and besot us in all manner of superstition. God therefore knowing that the having of images is an untoward thing and as a deadly plague: has not lifted to give us any, but rather holds us back to this, that having such signs as may convey us upward, we should travel towards him, howbeit without having any representation of his being. Thus you see that the thing which we have to remember in effect, is that although the scripture did not expressly forbid us to have any image or bodily representation of God: yet the reasons are such as we ought to worship God in spirit, and to fly up aloft into heaven, and not to stick fast here below. Why so? For in knowing God, we must consider his Majesty, how there is no proportion or likeness between him and the creatures. Therefore it is but a misshaping of him when we make any bodily image unto him: he that is the wellspring of life cannot be represented by a dead thing. If we go this way to work, by then shall we never be marred nor embaccd,, but rather we shall seek God in such wise? as he has vouchsafed to utter himself unto us, and we shall not be so shettle headed as we be. For as soon as we have taken any toy in our heads, we be so doted and entangled, that we think the ground bears us not. If we knew this (I say,) we should be soberer. But what ? The world must show itself blind as it is, and be sotted with this drunkenness of Idolatry, to be carried away thereby, that it may ever turn away from God. For although men be naturally contented to have some Religion: yet seek they by all means not to come at God, I mean in truth. They will well enough say always, God is to be worshipped, and our intent is to do so, we must resort unto him. But how? Whereas they should seek God in heaven by faith: they will needs go about the bush. Very well say they, we will have some image of God. And that is all one as if they should say, Behold, here is a God that shall not trouble us: for we will deal well enough with him at all times, he shall not speak a word, he shall but only make a move. See how the world making countenance to seek God, does drag back from him as much as is possible, shrouding themselves under this pretence, that it is enough to have a representation of God, & that his power shall nevertheless be infinite still. But now we have to mark, that God is not contented with such reasons, forasmuch as he has told us that it is not lawful for us to have any image of him to represent him withal. And shall we reply against him when we have the word of his mouth? What shall we win by it? When we have pleaded our fill, suppose we have any devises in our brain, that can make God believe that he considered not all things well? No. and therefore (to be short) as many as covet to have any image of God, bewray themselves to be rank rebels against him, they bewray a devilish malapertness, in that they presume to forge and set up Gods after their own fancy: yea and they bewray their own beastliness also, in that they do against nature. For they would also, allow God such a representation, as agrees as fitly to him, as if they should liken him to a stick, or I ought not what else. Men therefore do in all respects sufficiently show themselves to be inexcusable, when they turn so away after their images.

But by the way we have to make further, that all manner of images and representations are not meant here. For our Lord said expressly that he showed not himself to his people any otherwise than by his only voice and therefore that it is a corruption to make images. If this should be drawn to conclude, that it is not lawful to make any picture at all: it were a misapplying of Moseses testimony, as some do, who being too simple in this behalf, do say it is not lawful to make any image: that is to say, it is not lawful (to their seeming) to paint any story or to make any portraiture. But when the holy Scripture said, it is not lawful to shape any resemblance of God, because he has nobody: it extends not so far: for it is otherwise as concerning men. Now then look what we see, that may we represent by picture. And therefore let us see that we apply the texts against the Papists as we ought to do, that we may be armed to prove our case just. But yet must we be fully resolved of this, that if any man go about to express Gods Majesty by any shape: he does him wrong, and it is high treason to him, because he is incomprehensible in his glory. Mark that for one point. Now we see that the Papists have gone about to express God by shapes: therefore it follows that they have marred all Religion. And whereas they allege that there were Cherubins painted upon the veil of the Temple, and that two likewise did cover the Ark: it serves to condemn them the more. When the Papists pretend that men may make any manner of image: What say they? Has not God permitted it? No: but the imagery that was set there, served to put the Jews in mind that they ought to abstain from all counterfeiting of God, insomuch that it was a mean to confirm them the better, that it was not lawful for them to represent Gods Majesty, or to make any resemblance thereof. For there was a veil that served to cover the great Sanctuary, and again there were two Cherubins that covered the Ark of that covenant. Whereto comes all this, and what is meant by it, but that when the case concerns our going unto God, we must shut our eyes and not preacc any nearer him, than he guides us by his word? Then let us hearken to that which he teaches, and therewithal let us be sober, so as our wits be not ticklish, nor our eyes open to imagine or conceive any shape. That is that thing which God meant to betoken in his Law. And so are we the more confirmed in the doctrine that I sake of. But as for the images which the Papists make of their He saints and She saints as they term them: there is other reason to condemn them. For GOD has forbidden two things. First the making of any picture of him, because it is a disguising and falsifying of his glory, and a turning of his truth into a lie. That is one point. The other is, that no image may be worshipped. But now, do not the Papists worship images? If they say, it is requisite so to do, for it is a continual stirring up of the people's devotion: that is too fond a reason. For first of all, when we come to the Church, it cannot be but that we shall be caught in some error, if we have never so little occasion offered us. For (as I said) although there be no image at all to draw our eyes: yet are we inclined to earthly imaginations even of ourselves, and we nourish superstition in us of our own nature. Now then if we be furthered and thrust forward unto evil, so as we find as it were spurs to prick us forward: I pray you shall we not be as good as mad? Therefore the setting up of images in Churches is a desiling of them beforehand, and can serve to no purpose but to draw folk from the pure and true knowledge of GOD. Again, to what end do the Papists set up images in Churches? Is it to have knowledge of their Histories? No: but there stands a sort of puppets with demure countenances, as it were to summon folk to come to do them homage: insomuch that an image is not so soon set up in a Church, but by and by folk go and kneel down to it, and do a kind of worship to it. And can a man devise to tear the Majesty of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to deface his glory more, than by things that the Papists do? Behold, they paint and portray Jesus Christ, who (as we know) is not only man, but also God manifested in the flesh: and what a representation is that? He is Gods eternal son in whom dwells the fullness of the God head, yea even substantially. Seeing it is said, substantially, should we have portraitures and images whereby the only flesh may be represented? Is it not a wiping away of that which is chiefest in our Lord Jesus Christ, that is to wit, of his divine Majesty? Yes: and therefore whensoever a Crucifix stands mopping & mowing in the Church, it is all one as if the Devil had defaced the son of God. You see then that the Papists are destitute of all excuse. Again we see how they behave themselves: the images are worshipped among them, as if God were present there in his own person. Where say they their Paternosters, but before some puppet? And yet are they not contented with that: for they will needs make idols of all things, yea even to the very Sacraments: insomuch that they have falsified them, to draw the world from the right Religion. Is there a more abominable idol, than that which they have invented under pretence of that Supper of Jesus Christ? No: for they say, that GOD is there, and there he must be worshipped. So then, no marvel though they abuse their puppets and pictures after that fashion, seeing they have been so bold as to pervert the things, that God has appointed to the furtherance of our faith.

And by the way let us mark, that the true mean to seek God after such sort as he utters himself, is, that after we once know him, we do also consider that he stoops to our rudeness, and yet cease not to seek him by mounting up higher, and by conceiving the things spiritually which the Sacraments do show us. It is true that by them God comes down to us: howbeit, that is not to hold us down here beneath still: but to make us fly up aloft unto him. It is all one as if he should reach us his hand and say, Come to me, and worship me spiritually. Wherefore let us learn worship to seek GOD evermore above us, and not to tie him to our fleshly and earthly understanding.

Now finally Moses shows the unthankfulness of the world in seeking new Gods, and in conveying over of the Majesty of the living God to dead creatures. It was a very common thing in the East Countries, to worship the Sun and the Moon and the Stars, because that to their seeming they were not as the earthly creatures are, nor had any corruption to earthly be seen in them, nor were subject to such changes as men, beasts, trees and waters are, for we see how all things under the sky are changeable: but seemed to be things immortal and incorruptible. Yea, so seems it to men that are become brutish, and have not the wit to go to the creation, to know that God has given the Sun, Moon & Stars such nature and propriety as he listed: but yet for all that, howsoever those creatures fare, they be liveless. But here Moses rebukes the wicked fantasticalness of men in worshipping the Sun. They saw there a kind of Majesty. Oh (said they,) these lights of the sky are excellent things: finely there is some Godhead in them: therefore must we needs worship them. But in so doing (said Moses) we became unthankful towards God. For why? What is the Sun? Our Servant: & the Moon is our Handmaid. And for proof thereof, was not the Sun ordained to give us light? Is not he our Candlestick? Yea and besides that he is the Candlestick, he is also the Candle itself, even to do us service. It is true that God could well give us light without the mean of that Sun: but he meant to show how greatly he esteems and loves us in that he has put such servants under us, and advanced us so high as to make the Sun the Moon and the Stars to do us service. Now then, since we see that God has made his heavenly creatures subject to us after that fashion: are we not too churlish and unkind if we worship him not? Is it not a refusing of the good turn that God has done us, and a shutting of our eyes to reject his gracious favor, as if they would say in despite of him, we will not acknowledge the good that you has done us? Indeed we see that the Sun & Moon do serve us: but yet will we not take them for our servants. Must it not needs be that men are become stark devils, when they be so forward & malicious, as to refuse the receiving of so great a benefit at Gods hand? That then is the thing that Moses shows here.

Moreover he adds for a conclusion, that the people of Israel excelled all other Nations. It is true (said he) God has vouchsafed to make that Sun & Moon servants to the whole world: but you excell all other nations of the earth, inasmuch as he has chosen you for his inheritance. And seeing it is so: that oughtest at leastwise to worship him as your God, and to fear him and reverence him as your father, & in any wise to beware that you defile not yourself with the abomination of idolatry, For what thing were it, if a Kings son should refuse to be in his father palace, & go keep company with some swine herd, yea or go wallow abroad with brute beasts, & fall to rooting up of the ground to eat filthy things like that swine themselves? What a thing were it? But Moses tells us, that those who God has chosen to be his people, do the like, when they go to cast themselves down before creatures. Therefore let us learn to worship our God in spirit & truth, and to do him homage, worship & to acknowledge the good that he does us, specially for that it has pleased him to adopt us to be his children, through free bestowed adoption in our Lord Jesus Christ.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him so to open our eyes, as we may no more adventure to devise anything after our own fleshly understanding, but resort altogether to his holy word, whereby he has revealed himself to us, & also receives his Sacraments whereby we be yet better confirmed in his knowledge, so as our whole seeking may be to follow the pureness that is set forth in his doctrine, that no error may lead us away from him nor from the pure religion that has been taught us: And in that mean season, that as we do him homage in spirit, so likewise we may serve him with all our heart, assuring ourselves that we cannot serve nor worship him by any Ceremonies or outward things, without yielding him the honor & praise that he requires. And finally that it may please him to correct all that idolatry & superstition in the world, & to rid it in such wise from the earth which he has appointed to that use of men: as his name may be purely called upon there. For the performance whereof, it may please him to raise up true and faithful ministers of his word, &c.

The twenty fourth Sermon which is the sixth upon the fourth Chapter 19.20 Also that when you lifest up, &c.

21 And the Lord was angry with me for your words, and swear that I should not pass over Jordan, nor go into the good land which the Lord your God gives you to inherit.

22 For I shall die in this land, without passing over Jordan: but you shall pass it, and possess that good Land.

23 Beware that you forget not the Covenant of the Lord your God which he has made with you: and that you make you not any graven image, nor the likeness of anything which the Lord your God has forbidden you.

24. For the Lord your God is a consuming fire and a jealous God.

Esterday I began to show men's unthankfulness, in that they cannot find in their hearts to profit themselves by the benefits that God puts into-their hands, as this present example shows sufficiently. Behold, God has ordained the stars of the sky to do us service. There ought we to espy his infinite goodness towards us, how greatly he loves and esteems us, in that he has made so noble creatures our servants. But instead of magnifying our God, and of worshipping him as we ought to do, we clean contrariwise fall to devising of some error and idolatry in our heads. After which manner the Gentiles took occasion to worship the Sun and the Moon, because they saws great benefits that were received by them. Yea, but therewithal they should have mounted up higher, and have considered that God is the author of them, and that the Sun and Moon and the Stars are but instruments of Gods fatherly love towards us, and have not any power which proceeds not from him. Furthermore let us mark that men sin not in this behalf through simple ignorance, but through willfulness, because they cannot find in their hearts to yield themselves to God with a single mind. For if we intend to serve the living God, we must not go to it by windlasses, but we must go right forward. But when men see themselves so pinched: they seek starting holes, and devise new fashions of serving God on their own head, so as they never come near him. And that is the cause why the world has ever gone astray, and loved better to follow laws of their own inventing, than to cleave to Gods pure doctrine, and to rest upon the same, as we see is done still at this day in Popery. What is that cause that the superstitions which reign there, do seduce men so much, and make them to be so far overseen? Even for that it is easier for me to overrun a few gay Ceremonies, than to serve GOD rightly and with a single meaning heart. Behold, God will not be outfaced with a fort of pelting trifles, but commands us to walk soundly before him, so as we forsake our own imaginations and desires, and seek to be governed by him & to have his holy spirit reign in us. Surely it is a very hard thing to forsake our own reason, so as we should not be wise in our own conceits, to behave ourselves after our own liking, but yield that there is nothing but vanity and untruth in us, and learn to humble ourselves. That (say I) is a thing contrary to our nature: for we have a fond belief that we be wise of ourselves. But God on the contrary part will have us to be bereft of ourself wit and self reason, and to give over ourselves to be governed by his spirit. Also our affections do carry us away, in so much that men would fain have the bridle laid loose in their neck to do all manner of evil, and that God should give them leave to do what they list. Now our affections are sinful, and God will have us both to condemn them and to restrain them, so as we may be as prisoners in that behalf, and with main force withstand whatsoever carries us away to evil. But ye see that men list not to serve God with that condition. Again we be commanded to love our neighbor as ourself. Whereas we be given to seek every man his own profit: God pulls us from it, and contrariwise will have us to procure the welfare of our neighbors. And whereas we be given to subtlety, to shifting, and to all manner of naughtiness: he will have us to deal plainly, and to lay aside all desire of revenge. If any man do us harm or wrong: the world sees how hot we be to acquire like for like. But Gods will is that in such cases we should yield him such service, as to forgive the wrongs quietly that are done unto us. Again whereas we be desirous to run at rovers in taking our delights and pleasures: Gods will is that we should but waifarc through this world, still having our eye upon the everlasting life: that we should mortify whatsoever is earthly in us: and that although he give us some commodities and ease, yet our using of them should be but as it were in running by them. Moreover he will have us patient in all our adversities. If it please him to keep us occupied with never so many crosses, he will have us to bear them meekly. These things are good & holy: but mas nature strives altogether against them. And what do men instead hereof? It is a much easier matter to have a fort of gawdies,& gewgawes. Churches are fraught full of idols, & and they be worshipped with great pomp, so as they be thoroughly perfumed, besenced, &

painted, and a number of ceremonies are done unto them: there is great solemnity, with goodly chanting on the one side, and with ringing of peal upon peal upon the bells on the other side: there is scudding from altar to altar: there is fasting on this day, and forbearing of flesh on that day: there is trotting to thirst, and gadding on Pilgrimage: men found You reminds, and cause Masses to be sung by note. Thus that world ranging away from GOD, will nevertheless needs seem away to be dutiful towards him. [And all is] because we be so forward, that we covet nothing but to mock God with our hypocrisy, and that he should hold himself contented with our doings, which are no better than rattle bags to please babes withal. So then let us mark, that instead of worshipping God, the world is given to fondness and superstition, worshipping, and yet notwithstanding that it does it not so much of mere ignorance, as for that it cannot abide to be obedient as were requisite, and therefore it goes to work by windlasses, and seeks by all means to stray from the right way. To be short, we shall find that men are always guilty of willfulness in committing idolatry, and that it is vain for them to shroud themselves under pretence of simplicity. For contrariwise they bring it with them of nature, and they will needs be deceived and so they be. And therefore does God blind them also. For (as said S. Paul) it is reason that as list not to serve their maker, should be underlings to the creatures: and that such as cannot find in the hearts to bear the yoke of God, should endure the tyranny of the devil, as is come to pass, and as we see accomplished still at this day in the unhappy Popedom. Now therefore let us mark well the thing that I have said already: that is to wit, that men instead of being thankful to God for the good that he has done them, do turn his creatures to their own decay & condemnation, & falsely abuse them: for they pervert that use of them clean contrary to Gods meaning. And this is seen to be done, not only in the Sun and the Stars according to that which Moses said here: but also in all other things whatsoever. So much the more therefore behooves it us to watch and to stand upon our guard, as it is said here, to the end that in using of gods benefits, we may ever have our eyes upon him to do him homage for them, and never be turned away from him.

Moreover let us mark the saying that Moses sets down here, namely, Least you shall, least you be provoked. Hereby he shows that we have in us the seed of falling: that is to say, that we have such a crabbedness in us, that as soon as we have never so small an occasion, by & by we be down, yea & we do even seek occasion when none is given, as I said before. Whereas god has ordained his creatures to do us his service, and the same should be a help to guide us unto him, so as we should be the more provoked to love him, because he shows himself so good & loving a father towards us: we take occasion thereat to stumble. His dealing is as though he should set up a ladder for us: or make a pair of stayers for us to go up upon: & we fall to jostling against it. Greeces & stayers are made to help us: but if a man fall to rushing & dashing against them, he may hap to break his legs & to hurt himself, he shall rather be hindered than helped up by them. Even so deal we. For gods meaning is to draw us to him by his creatures, and we fall to rushing against them willfully and as it were in despite. Now then it stands us on hand to mark well this saying, that we may look the better about us, to profit ourselves by the things that God gives us for our help and furtherance to bring us unto him. Thus you see what we have to bear in mind. But now we see that Gods goodness extends even to the unbelievers & infidels, according as it is written, that he makes his Sun to shine both upon good and bad. Likewise in this place Moses said, that God has imparted the light of the Sun and the Moon, together with their influences and properties, not only to such as use them well, but also to all folk under the cope of heaven. Now we know that at that time all Nations were idolaters, and there was no truth nor knowledge of God among them: and yet notwithstanding God ceased not to do the good for all that. And it is an excellent token of his goodness above all that he sends them the light of the Sun, & marks the stars to the them service. Then let us mark well that although god was neither worshipped nor known of the heathen: yet failed he not to do the office of a father towards them, and always to their condemnation. For in as much as they abused this benefits in such wise, & could not find in their hearts to look up unto him: it must be that they were that more inexcusable.

But yet herewithall let us mark well the condition that Moses sets down here, As for you (said he) your God has rid she from the iron furnace of the thralldom of Egypt, to the intent that you should be unto him a sure people & as inheritance. Although that Moses have declared that the use of the sun & of the stars is common to all folks yet does he show that they be specially appointed to the people whom God has specially chosen. As if he should say, that the order of nature is common to all that world: we see that both great & final are partakers of that benefits that God bestows: the earth brings forth corn wine and all other things, to sustain both faithful & the unfaithful: the wicked & the despisers of God do eat & drink as well as we may (which more is) we see they abuse gods creatures with all excess, & have more abundance of them than that faithful: for he that knows that God sustains him, will use his meat & drink and all other things soberly & measurably, & he will consider that he must not unhallow things which god has ordained to a good & moderate use. But what do the wicked> There is nothing with them but cramming, as if they were minded to spite God of set purpose. But yet for all that, it is Gods will that the propriety of his creatures should belong to us. And after what sort? Even to use them as his true & lawful heirs, and to have them so warranted as we may owe that the things which he gives us are our own, & belong unto us of right, & that we possess them by just title. And soothly there is not a more singular benefit than this. For although that wicked do cram themselves with gods benefits till they burst, as I said before: yet have they always a heartbiting within, so as they know not by what right they eat & drink, nor can skill to desire God to sustain them. Nay verily, we see they could find in their hearts, that all remembrance of god were abolished. For when they make good cheer (as they term it), they must mind nothing but to play the brute beasts. But contrariwise nothing when we consider in our eating & drinking, that it is god which feeds us: it is a warrant unto us that he is our father, and that he takes us for his children. And surely (as I said) there is not a treasure that deserves greater estimation, than that growing of corn and wine in the world, & the increase of growing cloth & other things that serve for mans use, together with the fruition of all the other creatures whereof god has given us the sight & hearing, to enjoy them all in such wise, as we may say, that the world enjoy is created for us, & that our God will not have us destitute of anything at all, but has provided for all our need, and shows himself so liberal to us, as we have indeed just cause to magnify him, & to be ravished with wonderment at the sight of great goodness. This then is the cause why Moses said here namely, but as for you. After he had generally declared that god causes his mercy to extend even to the infidels & unbelievers: now speaking to the chosen people, O (said he) you have a state of prominence, you have a much more singular privilege then that ignorant & blind wretches have. For why? They ought not by what title they possess the good things which they have. But your God will have the world to belong by right unto you: for as all the faithful are his children, so be they heirs of his good things likewise. Therefore we must conclude, that if the unbelievers be to be condemned for abusing the benefits which God had bestowed upon them: much less excuse is there for us that are taught in his law and doctrine. Thus you see what we have to mark.

But with all let us also bear in mind the lesson that is set down here: that is to say, to know and feel this, that when we enjoy Gods creatures, we possess them as our heritage, & yet that this is not for any worthiness of our own: (for we must not here imagine any desert of ours,) but because our God had chosen us, as it is said expressly here. Moses said not, You yourself gotten this privilege: but he said, your god had taken you. He referred all to that free election of God, at what time that it pleased him to choose us to himself: that he showed himself to be our father, why he adopted us to be his children and will have us to be of his household and that we should be as it were his flock. Therefore let us mark well that we have not anything which we can say is our own for any desert of ours, but only because it has pleased Gods goodness to have it so.

Moreover Moses sets down two things here: You was taken from the iron furnace, & now you are become Gods people and his inheritance. Here he showed what the state of the people was before God chose them to himself: and also to what dignity they were exalted afterward. Now although we have not been fetched out of Egypt: yet does the thing that Moses speaks here belong to us. For in what case are we, as long as God lets us alone? Are we not accursed long, if we continue the children of Adam? And if God shake us off, are we not under the tyrannical of Satan? Does not sin reign in us? Do we not see here a furnace much worse than the, furnace of Egypt? And he uses here a similitude in calling it an iron furnace, as a place that was so to consume the people, as there was no remedy for them to get out of it. If a furnace be once inflamed, and that the fame be made of iron, must not a man needs perish out of hand if he be cast into it? If a furnace be but of brick: yet do we see how sore it burned. But here is mention made of a furnace of iron. Therefore it is all one as if God should say, You had left no hope to get out of that thralldom, you wast as a people utterly forlorn: and yet have I delivered you from it after a wonderful manner. And now at this day, could we escape out of that bondage unto Satan, until such time as God delivered us out of the same? must not that curse have altogether lie upon us still, if we had not remedy from else where, that is to wit, from the mercy that God had showed us in our Lord Jesus Christ So then let us mark, that here we be warned to think upon our beginning, that so we might always know from hence God has delivered us, and in what taking we were when it pleased him to choose us. [Which thing if we do,] we shall be ashamed of our own wretchedness, yea & we shall be even astonished to see how we had been utterly damned, if our God had not pitied us. And thus much for one point.

Secondly let us consider again, that our God thought it not enough to have delivered us from such a bottom less pit, and from so horrible confusion: but he had also made us his heirs, and likewise vouchsafed to take us for his heritage. What are we, or what can God receive at our hands? [Nothing:] and yet does he call us his heritage, to show how dearly he loved us. Like as a man loved a peace of ground that finds and maintained himself and his house hold, and set it as it were his heart upon the same: so does our Lord show that he delighted in us, yea even in us that are but worms and rottenness, and which have nothing but all manner of sin and corruption in us. we see then hereby that Moses meant to magnify Gods grace, to that end that being humbled in ourselves by beholding the miseries whereout of we be waded, beholding we might again and again magnify Gods goodness, in that he thought it not enough to rid us out of the bondage wherein we were, but also had set us in so high degree, as to choose us to be his children. And besides, by terming us his own heritage, he showed that he will have his heart as it were fast tied unto us. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this text or place.

Immediately here unto Moses added, that the Lord was angry with him, because of the people's words, and that he had sworn to him that he should not pass over Jordan to go into the land of promise. But as for you [said he] you shall pass over, and enjoy the possession thereof. Moses does still upbraid the people with Gods bereaving of him of the inheritance that was promised to all their tribes, not so much for his own fault, as for the common fault of them all in murmuring against God: but yet had Moses a further meaning. He speaks this as it were by the way, yea as having respect to this, that he should shortly die: and for as much as he himself might not enjoy the land, he had a care to instruct the people, to the end that they might abide in Gods covenant, and continue steadfast in it, without swerving aside, or without any changing of religion to pervert the doctrine that had been given them. The effect then is, that Moses being at the point of death does as it were make his last will, & has so much the more care of the people's welfare, for fear least they should start away after his death, as he had seen them do often times in his life. And he interlaced this particular matter that I spoke of: namely that their words were the cause that he should die before he passed over Jordan, and before he entered into the land of promise. For as I have touched heretofore, Moses meant not to justify himself: for indeed he was greatly blameworthy before God, & surely God never used any cruelty towards such as are his. Now, the case is so, that Moses is shut out of the land with an oath: therefore must it needs be that he had offended. But his doing of this, is to the intent that the people on their side should think the better upon the fault that they had committed and in good sooth, so ought all faithful teachers to do. That is, they ought to touch sinners to the quick, that they may have remorse of their sins, that they may cry to God for mercy & ask pardon thereof, that they may be sorry for them, that they may mislike of themselves for them, that they may hate them, and utterly forsake them, For when men are flattered in their vices; first they be hardened in them, and take always greater liberty to do evil: secondly they think not that ever they shall come to account before God: and finally they never forsake the world that so they may glorify God, & consider or feel how much they may be bound & beholden to him. By this means then is Gods mercy defaced, his grace slipped away and is utterly abolished. Besides this, there is yet a greater enormity, namely that men go on still from evil to worse, until they be fallen into utter confusion. Now then for this cause it is the duty of such as have the bearing abroad of Gods word, to exhort their hearers continually to consider their sins and to search them thoroughly. And to what end? Not only to make them barely ashamed of them: but also to make them humble themselves before God, & to go forward continually in repentance that so they may learn to mislike of their faults, & to glorify God when they wholly repair to him for refuge, by asking him forgiveness of the offences that they have committed. But what? There are very few that can away with this order of teaching: for there is not so wicked a man, but he would be flattered. And the world sees that as soon as a man speaks, some gnash their teeth & seek nothing else but to bite him: and other some though a man, do but by the way glance at their faults which are too too far out of all square, fear not to check him, or to stand with him face to face in the maintenance thereof. But yet for all that, the rule which God has appointed us, as I say which have the charge to bear abroad his word, is that we must daily labor in warning our hearers, to call themselves to account and to examine well their own faults, that they may be sorry for them.

When as he speaks of hearers: we ourselves are comprehended in that number: for we must not condemn others, & exempt ourselves: but he that speaks to others. Must first stick & look to himself & cite himself before God. But yet nevertheless we must proceed in this order, that we must all of us be summoned before God, & have our inditement ready framed & made, and not tarry till God pronounce the sentence of condemnation upon us, but every of us play the judge against himself, & that, not by saying in a word or two, I have done amiss: but by being thoroughly wounded within, so as we be ashamed of our misdeeds. After this fashion must we deal. In the main season if we perceive that the wicked cannot away with any correction, but conceive rancor against Gods word, as we see these despisers of all religion do, who cannot abide that any man should rebuke them, let us not marvel at it, for if they be pinched by & by they spit out their poison like toads as they be: But if we purpose to show ourselves to be they Gods children, let us learn to suffer correction willingly, & to have our sins laid afore us, that we may condemn them. For our acknowledging of them, will be a mean to have them buried before god. Thus you see what we have to note upon that text.

But now let us come to Moseses chief intent which I have touched afore. I shall not go into this good land, said he. And therefore I warn you continue steadfastly in the covenant of God, so as you never forget it, to worship idols in his stead, but serve him, seeing he had once chosen you, & vouchsafed to show himself your god & father Here we see that Moses was not out of heart, though God chastised him roughly. And here we see how the faithful ought to behave themselves. That is to say, if God punish them, yet must they not therefore cease to love him, and to go forward in their course still, yea & to give over themselves wholly unto him. As soon as the wicked feel but one yirke of the rod with Gods hand, and by and by they kick against him, and if they may escape from him, they play the horse that having shaken of the bridle castes his rider down, & afterwards becoming as if he were mad, he stormed as though no man were able to lay hold on him, or to restrain him: Even so play the wicked, which can never abide that God should chastise them and tame them, to hold them in obedience to him. If he make them to feel their sins, they burst out into impatience, & thereupon fall by and by to rebellion & fury. But contrariwise, when our Lord visited us with afflictions: we know it is not for us to stay from him, nor to take occasion to escape his hands: but rather submit ourselves quietly to his service, & to keep ourselves from these tentations that run often times in our heads. If we fall to scanning, so as we say to ourselves, how now? Must I for serving of god have so hard & cumbersome a condition? It should seem that he is minded to discourage me: Let us beware of such conceits, & rather follow that example of Moses. He saw himself bereft of that inheritance that had been promised to that whole people, he saw he had as it were a mark of reproach for ever, as though God had withered him: for whereas God had chosen him to be the leader of his people, & to supply his room in bringing to the that welfare that they had looked for so long time: now towards his death he must be disgraced at Gods hand, and be banished from possession that was as a pledge of the kingdom of heaven. True it is that Moses continued and does continue still an heir of Gods kingdom: but he had not that earthly pledge of it, that was set before the people. He saw, that of six hundred thousand persons, (for the whole multitude was so many) there was not one among them all that was worthier to enter into the land than himself. Therefore he might have stormed thus with himself? How now? I see I have taken great Pain in leading this people, God had wrought so many miracles by my hand, I have yet still such zeal to the honor of God and to that welfare of his people as I never cease to procure the same, & there with all I may well say God had granted me that grace to walk more roundly than all that rest: and yet notwithstanding must I be barred out of that land, & the residue enter into it, which have not taken so much pain as I nothing neere? Moses might have been in a chase & chawed upon his bridle saying:

well, Seeing I have taken so much pain, & God meant to serve his turn by me heretofore: it is enough for me, I am contented with that which I have done, but notwithstanding I will give over my room, and, feeling notwithstanding that he will not set me awake any longer, let him serve his turn by some other. Moses might well have entered into such fancies. But what Notwithstanding that God lifted to abase him so before men, by bereaving him of the benefit that he esteemed above all other to prefer the meanest and miser ablest of the people before him who was so excellent a Prophet: yet ceased he not to discharge his duty, and to go through with it still. And we see with what carefulness he goes about it. My friends (said he) although I must dye here, and God cuts me off from you as touching the body: yet notwithstanding I will discharge myself both towards him and you, and seeing it had pleased him to make me his minister to teach you his doctrine, I will never fail to do my duty. Indeed he might have twitted the people, as them that had caused God to lay such punishment upon him: but yet for all that he ceased not to serve God and to love the people still, which (as I said) had caused him to be disinherited of try Land that was promised to Abraham.

Therefore had Moses good right to say, Because of your words God swore that I should not go over Jordan to enter into this good land. Neither murmuring nor blaspheming proceeded from Moses: Nay (which is more) we see he crucified himself when he saw that god was not honored as he ought to have been: whereas on the contrary part there was a forward & willful people, which could not be brought into order by any means. It seemed then indeed that Moses had just cause to be angry with the people, seeing that God had punished him so grievously for their disobedience. But yet for all that, a man may see he showed himself still a father towards them, and takes them as his children, for he knew to what state he was called. True it is that he used sharpness and rigour in due time and place, especially when it behooved him to show the people their offences. We see that Moses was [in that behalf] as a burning fire: we see how vehemently he rebuked the despisers of God and the Rebels. But when that was once over, he showed himself always to bear an affection of love, towards such as could abide it. As for example, God had now punished the people by the space of forty years, in so much that they which had brought punishments upon the people, and had been the authors of sedition, were already dead and their carcasses were rotten in the wilderness: & yet now behold, Moses pitied the children that were descended of them, and ceased not to love them. So then let us mark, that if God call us to the preaching of his word, the unthankfulness of such as ought to hear it, must not stay us from procuring their salvation as much as in us lied. Moreover let us not forbear to pronounce Gods justice against the wicked. And though there be some that are utterly willful & past hope of recovery, whose diseases are incurable: well, yet let us do our duty towards them: let us cite them to Gods judgment, & let our doctrine serve for their condemnation to send them to hell. And in the meanwhile, look where we can reclaim them that have done amiss: let us give good heed thereto and bestow our labor thereon. Behold yet what we have further to remember out of this place.

And here with all we see also, that when Gods servants perceive themselves to be near their end, they must be the carefuler to establish the doctrine which they taught in their lifetime. And why? For we see how men do easily flip away, & that even such as have showed some good sign, will anon after start aside, if they be not held in with a double rein as they say. And when a servant of God sees that in his lifetime he was greatly hindered in the maintenance of Gods service, and had much ado to repress evil: what should he think but that the devil will take possession after his death, if God remedy not the matter? Therefore such as have felt and found by experience in their lifetime, how painful a thing it is to maintain the church, ought even for this cause to take so much the more pain & travel when they draw towards their death, to cause the sincere religion to be maintained in his pureness, that men being once set in a good course, may not swerve away from it. Behold the example which Moses showed us.

And besides this let us mark also that he does not only discharge himself here at his death, by uttering some sodaine speech, or by showing some sign of zeal only: but that he stood upon this, and did most urge it, to wit, all his lifelong that the people might be edified in the fear of God. For you shall see a number that are negligent all their lifetime: and yet they think that if they do but once exalt God and make a fair protestation at their lives end: it is enough. But Moses dealt not so. For he never forget the commission that was given him, but continued throughout in preaching to the people. Nevertheless, whatsoever he did all his lifelong: yet when he saw his death at hand, he enforced himself the more, and burned the hotter in earnestness of zeal, because of the urgent necessity aforesaid. Wherefore let those whom God had ordained to preach his word, look well that they discharge their duty all their lifelong. And that when they shall have done their endeavor to establish the true religion, and brought to pass that God is honored, and that they have builded Gods Church as much as they could, and taught those to walk in the fear of God which were committed to their charge: let them endeavor to seal up all the same doctrine, & to cause it to continue after their decease. This then is another thing which we have to remember.

Also let us mark further, that seeing Moses was so careful for the people of Israel: we also have need to be upon our watches. Do we see that God takes away a man that has served faithfully in his time? Then let us be sure that anon after, the devil will endeavor to marry all and that he will soon make some breach to enter upon us, if we be not lustily upholden & kept.

And there is not a more profitable lesson than this fame. For we know not how great a good turn God does us, when he gives us such men as seek nothing else but to hold us in awe of him, and to bring to pass that he may reign over us, and we live under his obeisance. On the contrary part, when our Lord takes such out of the world as are able to build his Church: we be careless of it, and this carelessness is the cause, that the devil finds a gap open amongst us, that so he may utterly make havoc of us. So much the more therefore does it stand us in hand to be watchful in this case, & to know that we be well fenced when God gives us men to guide us in his fear. Contrariwise if he leave us destitute of such: it is as if a man were without munition in a town, whereas were no power nor mean of defense. You see then how it stands us in hand to bethink ourselves, and to pray god that when it pleases him to take away those that have taught us faithfully, that then the doctrine which we shall have received by them, may not die anon after them, but live still & continue always fast settled in our hearts, and that it may have full force and strength, and we be fenced by it against all Satans temptations, never to turn away from it, but evermore to remember what we have learned & always to set our minds upon it, that it may serve us for a shield toward all Satans blows withal, and that we may be so armed with it from top to toe (as they say) that Gods word may be a sword to us, our hope a helmet, & our faith a buckler, so as the devil may not be able to foil us in any wise whatsoever: that when the means shall be taken away wherewith Gods will was to have us edified, yet nevertheless he may still continue with us, and we likewise keep on our way to him.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make us perceive them better than we have done heretofore, so as we may learn to mislike more and more of ourselves for them: And that in acknowledging the great benefits which he bestowed upon us, we may call upon him as our father, seeking nothing else but to give ourselves wholly unto him, to be governed by his holy spirit as his teachable and meek children: & holy & saying that he does us this honor to take us for his heritage,

& to give himself to us, that we may also remember, since he takes delight in us: to be unto him such a possession, as may serve to his glory, & that he would never cut us off although we well deserve it. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, & sea.

The twenty fifth Sermon, which is the seventh upon the fourth Chapter

23 24 Beware that you & c.

25 When you shall have begotten children, and children's children, and shall have dwelt long in that land: if then you shall corrupt yourselves, & wake carved Images after the likeness of anything, and work wickedness in the sight of the Lord your God to provoke him to wrath:

26 I call heaven and earth to record against you this day, that out of all doubt you shall soon perish out of the land whether you go over Jordan to possess it: and you shall not prolong your days therein, for you shall be utterly destroyed.

WE have seen heretofore the exhortation that Moses made, to the intent that Gods service might not be corrupted. He showed that to worship GOD purely, there must no image at all be made, because it is not in any wise agreeable to his nature: but men must worship him after another fashion. His service (say I) is spiritual: and therefore we must rest wholly thereupon. For as soon as we swerve one way or other: it is but presumption, which God condemned. That is the thing which Moses had treated of hitherto. Now to confirm this doctrine the better: he sets before the peoples eyes, the covenant that God had made with them: for when God manifested himself unto us, it is the principal mean whereby to hold us in the pure religion. Naturally whereby we be blind wretches, and therefore it is very easy for Satan to beguile us, And although there were none to deceive us: yet does everyone of us wander away in our own conceits and imaginations. Therefore there is nothing in us but darkness: and Gods majesty is so high and incomprehensible a thing, as it is no marvel though we be at our wits end, before we can come nigh unto it. Then if we were not duly taught, nor had a grounded doctrine to show us that right path: what could we do but go astray? But now seeing that God had showed himself unto us, & that so seeing familiarly as we may discern him from all the idols that have been forged in that world, & we are able to say that it is he whom we ought to worship: there is no more excuse for us if we be carried to and fro. And our un-thankfulness is the more shameful, if we shut our eyes against the doctrine of salvation, and turn our backs upon God when he has showed himself to our face, and vouchsafed to be known of us familiarly. Now we see what Moses meant. For his meaning is to set forth the grievousness of the peoples sin, if it should so fall out that they should turn away from the pureness which they had learned in the law. As if he should say, True it is that even from the creation of the world most men have not ceased to overshoot themselves into a number of errors and follies: but that came to pass because they had not so special a teaching, as you have, whereby they might have had certainty of faith to rest themselves upon. Therefore the wretched infidels went astray: but yet was not their sin so grievous and outrageous. For although they were un-excusable: yet had they not any such teaching as you. But as for you, you have had Gods covenant, whereby you were brought into his house: he has showed himself as a father towards you, & taught you as his children: this is that holy band whereby god has tied himself to you: now then if you should turn back again, and become like those wretched beasts which never knew nor tasted of gods truth, what a thing were it? Might you pretend them for a shrouding sheet and say, other men do so as well as we. Yea, but yet had not those other men such teaching as you have had. Now therefore acknowledge the grace that God has bestowed upon you, in hauling you out from all nations of the earth, & in coming so nigh unto you. And indeed that fame is the very cause why that when the heathen are condemned in their superstitions: it is said on the contrary part, that that Lord dwelled in Sion, & his majesty is known there. After that manner doth the Prophet Habacuc speak in his second chapter: and it is a doctrine that is rife enough everywhere. As if it were said, The world runs at random, and every man forget and sets up some God privately to himself: but as for the God which has showed himself to be the true living God: his voice sounds in mount Sion where the temple was builded. Then since it is so: although the whole world be carried away & go wandering in the dark: yet must not we be removed, for as much as he has set up his feat among us, and we know him by his voice & by his word. And here we see why it is said in the Psalms where Gods kingdom is spoken of such wise as it was to be established in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, as well in the fourscore and sixteenth psalms as in other psalms: The Lord reigns. Let that far countries rejoice thereat, let all idols be confounded, and let all that is set up by men be thrown down. For when we have the truth, which drives away all darkness & ignorance, then have we the very mean to destroy all superstition. And to the same purpose also is there this like saying in Essay: when the Lord reigns, then shall all the idols of Egypt fall. And why? For the wretched Infidels wean they do well, and think they do God good service in following their fond superstitions. But when God is once set afore them: then his majesty bereaved them of all excuse, and he must need as then be magnified. And that is that cause why it is said in another place, this is the Lord, this is the Lord. the prophet in the person of all the faithful, defied the idols with their abuses, because GOD should be known, accordingly as all things were accomplished at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Now then the thing that we have to gather upon this text, is that when we once know God by his word, we must be so fully resolved and assured by thereof, that although the whole wretched world run roving after their own abuses and superstitions, yet we must keep on our way still & that saying we have a sure foundation which can not be shaken, that is to wit gods infallible truth: we must let those blind wretches break their necks, since we cannot remedy it, and in that mean while we must go forward still as the Lord commands us, saying he had reached us his hand to draw us to him. And although this was spoken to the Jews by Moses: yet it pertains even now unto us. For we see what favor God had showed us above others. All the world is full of error and devilish imaginations, & wretched men are become brutish imaginations, in their ignorance. But what? Neither had he doctrine of life been preached unto them: neither have they ever in good earnest understood what God is. Indeed they can speak of him, but that is but at random & without order. But we have the scripture declared unto us, and by that mean God communicated himself to us, and by allured us so sweetly unto him, as he could not do any more for us, except he should take us into his lap, and yet we see he applied himself to our infirmity, he chaws our morsels to us, he feeds us with pap, & speaks to us like a nurse. Now when we see that our God manifests himself so familiarly unto us, there is no more excuse for us, we may no more mingle ourselves in the order or rank of unbelievers. For our state is clean contrary. God is hidden from them: and yet shall they not fail to perish in their ignorance as they be worthy. But as for us, if we be so stubborn against God, that even of a spiteful malice we will not obey the things that he showed us, but will play the wild beasts with him, so as he cannot reclaim us to himself: and that even when we know him and do understand that it is he which ought to be honored, yet we be so un-constant and wavering still, as to turn away after our own dotages: Shall we not be doubly condemned? Shall not horrible vengeance hang over our heads? Then let us bear in mind, that in as much as our Lord has made a covenant with us, that is to say, had called us into his Church to be taught by his word: that this is the only mean, wherewith we may be armed and fortified against all superstitions. This is one point. And let us also mark therewithal, that horrible condemnation hangs over our heads, if we wander away, and hold not ourselves to the simplicity of Gods doctrine, but be carried away hither and thither by our own lusts. These are the two points which we have to mark upon this text. Wherefore let us learn to make our profit and commodity of the word that is preached unto us for the same purpose. That is to wit, albeit that all be full of corruption and error, yet let not us be shaken down, nor be wavering as many men are, to say,

Yea Mary, but there is so much disagreement [that I wrote not what to do]. Let us not allege this: but let us say with the prophet Esay, Behold, this is our God: behold, this is our God. And by that means let us defy all that the devil can set before us to turn us aside. Yea let us not make any reckoning at all of it, And why? Because the light that God gives us, is strong enough to drive away all darkness, and the truth is strong enough to beat back all lies. Thus see you I say what the power of faith ought to be: When we have well printed in remembrance the doctrine that is preached "unto us, and yet notwithstanding continue still for all that in blindness, and be still as reeds shaken with every wind: Let us understand this that we know not God, nor yet ever understood of what great value his covenant towards us was, nor ever were knit to him as we should be: but that there was hypocrisy instead of that protestation that we made to follow his word. But let us mark herewith all, that our condemnation shall be doubled, if we run astray after we have know the truth. For if Gods covenant cannot hold us in obedience: must it not needs be as clouds? And what un-thankfulness is that? Indeed many will say, I have not been sufficiently confirmed, I understand it not: but those are fond shifts. We need but to open our eyes and our ears saying we have Gods word preached, and our Lord will certainly make it of power and force, so as we shall have sufficient instruction by it, seeing he regards us especially, and therefore we must needs be found blameworthy if we swerve one way or other, after that God has showed us his truth. And this much then concerning the covenant that Moses speaks of here.

Howbeit, to set forth the heinousness of their crime the more, he adds that he takes heaven and earth to witness, that if the people turn away from the law, and invent or set up any new Religion, they shall perish out of hand, and not possess the land any long time, which should be given unto them. Now this serves to waken such as are puffed up with vain presumption, under colour that God is gracious unto them, and had given them some privilege above others. And it is well worthy to be noted. For although we cannot exceed measure in trusting in God: yet do we see that a great number do falsely abuse Gods name. If they be once baptized and taken into the company of the faithful: it seems to them that God is greatly bound unto them. Whereas they should greatly consider that they be called of his free goodness, and ought to give over themselves to walk in fear and wariness: behold, they be puffed up with pride and vain overweening, and bear themselves in hand through fond hypocrisy, that they be escaped out of Gods hand, and in the mean while they do but dally with him. he see then what the pride of men is, how that when God shows himself bountiful towards us, and uttered the great and infinite treasures of his mercy they think still that he is greatly beholden to them, and there upon do overshoot them-selves, and take leave to do amiss. According as we see that the greatest strife which the Prophets had against the Jews was for that they bragged of their having of Gods Temple, and of his sacrifices, and of such other things. Now according hereunto Moses faith in this place, It is true that he do now enter into possession of the heritage which God promised to your fathers: it is true that therein you have an excellent warrant of his preferring of you before all other nations: Surely it is a great and inestimable dignity, that your God should purchase you with his own hand, and drive out the inhabitants of a country to set you in their place, yea and that when you be in that land, you shall be sure to be of his household, and that he dwelled among you, and that his so doing is to take you up into his everlasting Kingdom: surely it is a singular benefit which your God had vouchsafed upon you: but yet for all that, deceive not your selves to despise and reject his word, or to shrink away from him, & to corrupt his service. For like as now he performed the promise that he made to your fathers: so can he also drive you out again, when he had settled you there: and he can well enough weed you again out of his heritage, & so scatter you abroad that you shall be dispersed every where. Now then, the more that you're God does presently increase his goodness towards you: the more diligent be you in serving and loving of him, and hold yourselves under his shadow, and beware that you alter not anything in the religion that he had ordained for you. Mark that for one point.

And now furthermore, whereas Moses called heaven and earth to witness: it imports yet a greater vehemence. True it is, that some take this for Angels and men. But that is not the meaning of Moses, as we shall see by the like manner of speech hereafter in the 32 Chapter, where he will say, Hearken O you heavens what I say. And let the earth hear the words of my mouth. And so said the Prophet Essay, Hearken you heavens, and let earth give audience unto me, for the Lord has spoken. Behold I have nourished children & brought them up, and they have despised me. When God called heaven and earth to witness after that manner, it is to rebuke men's brutishness so much the more. For we be created after Gods image, to have reason & understanding: & where to should we apply such gifts, but to know God and to give ourselves wholly unto him? Shall men have wit enough to comprehend the whole order of nature, and shall they in that mean season despise the Lord? It is all one as if a man should think himself well forward, when he had toiled in traveling and running all day long: and had wandered all the while with out keeping any path. And is not the knowledge of our God the final end of all our perfection? Yes, and therefore when God intends to show men that they be more than blockish, and that they bee so marred as they be not worthy to be taken any more for reasonable creatures: then does he direct his speech to heaven and earth.

As if he should say, I have not now anymore witness in that world: for I choose these to be known of them: but hearken you to me you heaven and earth, hearken you to me I say now you that are unreasonable creatures: for I shall find more reason in you, than in those to whom I have given wit and knowledge to difference between good and evil, and to have skill not only of this present life, but also of the immorality of heaven. So then, Moses called heaven and earth to witness here, to do us the better to understand, that if men fatter themselves and play the brute beasts when they have offended God, and think by that means to go quite: they beguile themselves: for when men shall have conspired together in naughtiness, and that every man may say, I have done as all others have done: so as there remains no more but heaven and earth, although they have no understanding in them, yet shall they be sufficient witnesses. Why so? For shall they not be able enough to bewray our naughtiness without speaking, seeing they were ordained for our service? We have seen already what Moses said heretofore of the Sun, Moon and Stars. What is the Sun? A right noble creature. And yet notwithstanding, what is he in effect, but our servant? And the Moon that mounted so high is, our handmaid, & God has appointed all these own to our use & commodity. Seeing then that these creatures being without understanding, do know that the end whereto God has applied them, is to do us service: what a dealing is it, that when we shall have enjoyed so many benefits, as namely that we shall have received the light of the Sun and the Moon, that the earth shall have fed us with her own bowels, and that we shall have been fraught full of a number of other good own: yet notwithstanding we fall to defiling of the world with our filthiness and infection, defiling so as Gods glory is darkened by us, and we overthrow his service, and set up idols against him to deface and discredit his majesty? Whither go we in so doing? Shall not the creatures ask vengeance against us, when we shall have so abused them, and defiled and brayed then without our filthiness as much as we could? Yes: and so we see now what the meaning of Moses was.

mark well, that if we have been received into the Church, and God for a time have admitted us to be of his people and flocks, and have bestowed many benefits upon us, specially if we have had any excellency or preeminence above others: we must not be proud of it. For if we abuse Gods grace, he can well enough root us out: and if we follow not his calling, he can as well cut us off, as he could adopt us. And in good sooth, if this befell to the Jews which were the & natural branches (as Saint Paul terms them) and which came out of this stock of Abraham: if that holy and high exalted lineage was nevertheless so cut off upon the sudden, and disinherited of the possession that God had given them: what shall become of us which are grafted in as it were against nature? For we were wild imps: we came of the Gentiles, which were enemies to God, & separated from his Church, & had not any acquaintance with him. Seeing then that our Lord gathers us to him, not only by Baptism but also by the holy supper, and we have his word daily, wherein he assures us that he is our father, that he will be the keeper of our souls, and that he will take us for his people: let us learn to look diligently about us, that we abuse not so great a benefit. But if we mind to enjoy it forever: let us fear our God and walk in his obedience: and that (I tell you) is a thing which we ought to bear in mind.) For if think to hold God in our sleeve, and imagine him to be bound unto us because he has once chosen us: he will easily show us that he came to us, so will he go again from us, if we will needs be over lusty. Will we then have our Lord to continue our shepherd still? Let us be pliable to him, so as we live quietly under his subjection. To be short, let us always bear in mind the threat which our Lord Jesus Christ uttered: That is to wit, that the kingdom of God shall be removed far from us, when we cannot profit thereby, and that it shall be taken away from us, and given to a people that shall glorify their God, when they have been taught by his word. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this point.

Furthermore let us mark well, that whereas it is said here, that heaven and earth shall bear witness against us: it is to put us to the greater shame, in that the Angels need not to come down from Paradise, nor the Prophets and Apostles to rise from the dead, to give evidence against us before God: but only the liveless creatures are sufficient witness for God to use to condemn us with all. It is true that GOD could bring other witnesses also, as we see, that sometimes he called forth the heathen and infidels to make us the more ashamed. For (as said the Prophet Jeremy) go every where, and yet you shall not see that the idolaters be so fickle, as those that have been duly instructed in the pure word of God. Look me upon the wretched infidels, which be headstrong in their follies. Although they have no certainty to lean unto (as also they cannot indeed have any) &

(which more is) their minds be so entangled in their own dotages as they cannot wind themselves out: yet notwithstanding, say what man can, they stick still to the own that they have learned. And although they keep one course still: yet do they nothing but they go astray, without keeping either right way or path: & yet notwithstanding they be held still to it what this persuasion, that they must not change their God. But yet they never knew him for all that. And shall wo then be carried away at the first dash, which know to the living God and have been taught his truth, and have had so good warrant thereof, as it is not for us to waver any more? Shall we start away after we have been trained up in the pure doctrine of the Gospel? O what means this? Look me upon the Turks, Paynims, Papists, and Jews. Notwithstanding that all these e bewitched at this day in their errors: yet shall they rise up and be found sufficient witnesses to make us ashamed before God, and to disappoint us of all starting holes. And why? For they go on still in their superstitions, whereas we for our parts fall to reeling at every blast of wind, and the devil plucks us out of the place wherein we were planted. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this place.

But above all own let us mark, that in as much as God has bestowed infinite benefits upon us, and displayed his liberality towards us after so many fashions: all that he shall have bestowed upon us shall serve to our condemnation, if we do him not homage for the same. To be short, both heaven and earth shall be armed against us, and ask vengeance upon us. And how shall we be able to find any excuse, when our Lord shall raise such a cry to confound us and put us to shame? Therefore let us now look well to ourselves, and let us walk in the way that he has showed us.

Now here is express mention made of Images and other likenesses: but under one kind, Moses comprehends all. For it is a manner of speech rise enough in the holy scripture, to mark out some one kind of superstition, thereby to warn us that we must keep ourselves from all, superstitions in general. And Moses himself does ever observe the same manner of speaking, as we shall see in the next Chapter, where he used to speak of the heinousest own, to the intent we should the more abhor them and mislike of them, to keep ourselves from them. And yet for all that the holy Ghost meant in this place by the mouth of Moses shortly to show that when God has once made his covenant with us, we must hold us in the simplicity of his word, without mingling any superstitions with it. Now that wee understand the natural sense of this text: let us look that we make our commodity thereof. For although we have no images either carved or molten: although we have no puppets either in graven or painted: yet fail we not to be idolaters, if we stick not to our God to keep his word throughout. For the matter that the Covenant itself imports is not that we should confess in words, that the God which gave his Law by Moses is a lonely to be worshipped: but that we should understand his will, after what manner he will be served, that we should have his promises printed in our hearts, that we should know how and by what means we ought to worship him, and that we should keep on our way to the inheritance whereunto he calls us. That is the thing that Gods covenant imports. And without that, in what case were we? If we should say, very well, there is but one God which has created heaven and earth, he has revealed himself unto us, and he has given us his Law: and yet notwithstanding we knew not his will, but every of us should behave himself as he lifted: to what purpose were this? It were better for us never to have known Gods word, than after the knowing of it to despise, and to take leave to do what we lift.

Therefore let us bear well in mind, that Moses meant here to show the people generally, that seeing they had been taught the truth, it behooved them to keep themselves from all errors and leasing. And this is that which I have said already, that Gods word ought to suffice to guard us in such sort, as the devil may not seduce us, do the worst he can. Now then will we be exempted from the threat and condemnation that is contained here? Let us give over ourselves wholly in all respects to our God, let us hearken to his word, and let us obey his voice without any exception or gainsaying, so as his service remain in such sort among us, as he has commanded by his word. But let us compare the crime that Moses reproves here, with other crimes that are less to be excused. For although there was un-thankfulness and rebellion at that time in all such as suffered themselves to, be misled, after they had been taught by Gods word: yet committed they not so cursed sacrilege against God, as that caitiffs do in these days, which to the uttermost of their power do blot out all religion, and are so full of wickedness, that they could find in their hearts to confound heaven and earth together, in working spite to the whole Majesty of God. Take me a man that has been taught in the Gospel, and afterward through lightness overshoots himself and turns away from well doing, how be it with a mind to do well again: truly such as one is not to be held guiltless, as I have said already: but yet is he not worthy of so much blame, neither is his fault so heinous before GOD, as another that outraged so far as to scoff and scorn at God and all his doctrine, and to play the mad bedlam, of purpose to thrust all Religion under foot, so as he could find in his heart that men should live like beasts: and for the bringing thereof to pass, spewed out blasphemies not only against the manner of the superstitions in Popery, but also even against the word of God. For is not such a one far more horrible, than the ignorant wretch that is still snarled in some imagination, and thinks he serves God, though the same be but vanity, as I said afore? But now let us look to our own time. God tells the Jews here, that he would not bear with them if they happened to overshoot themselves in any superstitions, but would bereave them of the inheritance that he had promised them. We at this day have a more excellent benefit than that people had, and therefore shall we be the more to blame, if we yield homage to our God, which has esteemed and honored us so much, as to call us into his Church. But now how do most men behave themselves, after they have been taught by the Gospel? Indeed we meddle not with the superstitions of Papistry, we pass not for shrift, nor for Masses, nor for such other like trash: but what for that? We could find in our hearts plainly and shortly to defy God, and that he should have no further audience among us than we lift ourselves. After this manner do a great sort deal even to this day, who nevertheless will needs be taken, not to e of the common fort of the faithful, but as the pillars and upholders of the Church. And yet have they gone about to stop Gods mouth when anything has misliked them, or fallen out otherwise than they would have it. O This must be taken away. And why? Behold, GOD not only speaks here of the things that have been invented by men: but also holds us in awe, so as it is not lawful for us to encounter him. He passed not for them. And again let us see what their life is. We see that they mock GOD to the full, and their desire is to have their own swing in all things. And yet notwithstanding when the devil raises up such plague folk to infect the whole flock with their poison: we see a great number, whose whole desire is to mingle themselves with them. For as soon as some lewd fellow, or two or three maintainers of wickedness, (which show themselves to be ready to uphold all disorder and offences) do but step up: it is as good as the displaying of a banner, and by & by all vnthrifites run after it. And would God that the experience of it were not so great as it is seen to be. But what? When we be told of it, we must repent yea and we must mourn before God, praying him to keep us from such deadly plagues as are seen intermingled among us. And so let us mark well how it is said here, that it cannot be that such as do so pervert themselves, did ever know what Gods covenant is, or of how excellent value. For if his truth ought so to restrain us that we be not led away by any of the wiles and flights of Satan: how were it possible that men should so cast themselves into destruction, if they had known God in good earnest, & been strengthened in his word? Although then that such folk profess the Gospel, yea and have taken some smack of it as said the Apostle: yet may we perceive that it never entered into their hearts in good earnest. They be but hypocrites, which make countenance to serve GOD for a time, and afterward do fleet away, as we see these roisters do which band.

themselves together. As soon as they see any aid or support to uphold their wickedness, they fall to practicing and confederating, and they continue all the drifts that they can possibly, to overthrow Gods Church. Therefore let us understand, that although the Gospel be preached among us: yet are there many deaf folk which hear not what God said to them: not that that shall seem to lessen their fault, for they shall not fail to be taken for guilty as well as others.

Now here a man might demand a question, wherefore Moses said that they shall not live in that land that is given them, but shall be shortly rooted out of it: for we see that God is patient: and indeed it appears sufficiently. And therefore it seems at the first sight that the thing which Moses said here, should not come to pass. God spared his people a long time. Although they gave themselves to idolatry and superstition: yet did God use long patience towards them, insomuch that the Prophets labored to bring them back again when they were revolted. Although they were willful and hardhearted, yet did God assay to win them to him. Notwithstanding all this, it is said here that they shall soon be rooted out. Yea, but this soon or shortly must gree with that which is written in many other places: that is to wit, that although Gods wrath light suddenly upon offenders, & overwhelm them as a storm that comes unlooked for: yet do he not fail to be patient, and to delay 1 his vengeance till men's wickedness be grown ripe, yea and even till it be stark rotten. Therefore it is to be understood that God punishes not offenders out of hand, for he said that he is slow to wrath, and he must needs keep his own nature. Nevertheless in using patience, and in bearing with them that have done amiss: he overthrows them sooner than they would. You see then that this soon, shortly, by and by, or out of hand, must be referred to men's carelessness, who make their account that all shall go well with them, and bear themselves in hand that they have made a covenant with death (as said the Prophet Esay,) and they be as drunken folks in that behalf, so as if God wink at them for a time, they think they be escaped from his hand. See how the hypocrites abuse Gods goodness, bearing themselves in hand that they shall never come to account for it. For this cause does Moses say here soon or shortly. Not that God forgets his own nature (as I said,) or tarries not a long time for the amendment of offenders: but that when all is done, his vengeance is always in a readiness, & there needs no more but to kindle it, and by and by without any further tarriance, yea before one finger can be stirred, there needs no more but to show forth his wrath, and we shall be every one of us overwhelmed as it is said in another song of Moses, or in the XC. Psalm. Since it is so, let us not think it strange that Moses threatened the people here, that they shall soon be rooted out.

And to the same purpose, (that is to say, for a further declaration thereof) serves, this also which he adds: namely, When you shall have begotten children, yea even a two or three descents: if superstition do then reign among you, the God can root you out. Hereby Moses shows, that long possession will stand us in no stead. For though we bear ourselves on hand, that is between God and us, as it is between man and man, yet it will not prevail. If a man have been a long time in authority & estimation, so as he be well friended or of great kindred and alliance: he bears himself on hand that he shall never be put from it. But we see how the world passed away, and small occasions will serve to overthrow even them that are mounted highest. And therefore the Prophets upbraid them with their pride, which glory in their own credit and authority, saying unto them: you bear yourselves in hand that you be so fast settled, as you can never be shaken down: and yet if God do but blow upon you, by and by you be gone in the turning of a hand. Now according hereunto it is said here that if we think to claim any title against God by prescription (as they term it,) that is to wit, because we have possessed his benefits a long time, imagining that we can never be diseased or dispossessed of them, but that they must continue still in the same state, not only to us, but also to our children, even to the third & fourth generation: both they and we shall for all that be bereft of them, and God will withdraw his hand which he had erst stretched out to do us good. So then let us mark, that when so ever God shall have been patient towards us, it is not to be said that he has forgotten our transgressions: but his bearing with them, is for that it is not yet convenient time to punish them. Therefore let us not trust to that: but let us always bear in mind how it is said here, that if we serve not God, we shall soon be cut off. Although it please him to wink at things, and to tarry a time for us: yet shall his wrath come suddenly upon us, though it seem not so to us. And when we shall say, all is whist and still, imagining ourselves to be safe and sure: then must we be overwhelmed by his hand. Let us consider this, that we may walk warily and keep good watch, and not tarry till the fire be kindled.

And for that same cause is this saying set down: The God is a consuming fire and a jealous God. When Moses speaks after that manner, specially when he calls him a jealous God: he shows that God cannot abide that men should mock him and despise him, but that he will maintain his own honor, as good reason is that he should: and in so doing he shows us how dreadful his wrath is. Behold then, here are two points which we must mark for a conclusion. Not that we can lay them forth at length as at this time: but that it shall suffice to have some foretaste of them. Let us mark then that the cause why God uttered himself unto us, is that having once known his goodness, & that he has chosen us & called us by his word: we should covet nothing but to be quietly governed by him, and acknowledge that it is he to whom all honor & praise belongs, & thereupon apply our whole endeavors to the glorifying of his holy name. That (say I) is the end why our Lord has once called us to his knowledge, and why he calls upon us daily, and exhorted us still to come unto him. But yet let us consider there withal, that if we do not serve and glorify him as he deserved, and as we bee bound: we shall feel him a consuming fire: that is to say, we shall feel that it is no dallying with such a Master: not that this is said to make Gods Majesty terrible unto us, so as we should be afraid to come at him: but rather that we shall not be a whit dismayed, if we take him for our Father. But if we will not behave ourselves as children towards him, but continue un-amendable: he will lay away the person of a Father, and show himself to be our judge: and that, not such a judge as needed to make long inquiry, & to call the hangman to put his judgments in execution: but if he do but cast forth the fire of his spirit, or but his breath, by and by the fire is kindled as says the Prophet Essay, so as we must needs be consumed by it. So then, if we will not have the Majesty of our God terrible unto us, but rather that we may go unto him: let us look that we glorify him in all our life, and not give him cause to kindle his wrath against us, nor provoke him unto jealousy. For then does he tell us that he will provoke us to jealousy likewise, by casting us from him & by taking another people in our place. Wherefore let us look that we persist in the vocation whereunto he has called us, and that we kindle not his vengeance against us. And seeing he has once uttered his goodness and manifested himself unto us in our Lord Jesus Christ: let us not doubt but that he on his side will continue to make us feel the same still, if we on our side continue in glorifying him.

Now let us kneel down before that majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, so as we may be sorry for them and depart from them by the power of his holy spirit. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, & sea.

The twenty sixth Sermon which is the eight upon the fourth Chapter

27 And the Lord God shall scatter you among the Heathen, and you shall remain few in number among the Nations whither the Lord will bring you.

28 And there you shall among serve gods which are the work of mans handing, wood & stone, which neither see nor hear, eat nor smell.

29 And there you shall seek the Lord your God, and you shall find him if you seek him with all your heart and with all your soul.

30 And when you art in tribulation and all these things are come upon you: in the end you shall return unto the Lord your God and obey his voice.

31 For the Lord your God is a merciful God: he will not forsake you, nor destroy you, nor forget the Covenant of your fathers which he swore to them.

E have said heretofore, that Gods using of the similitude of fire, is not to dismay us in such sort as we should not come un to him: but contrariwise to make us come to him with reverence. For what should it boot men to be stricken in such terror, as should make them shrink away from GOD, and loath to have any thing to do with him? Again we know that our Lord has not any other mark or intent, than to win us to him and to draw us to salvation. Now the only mean thereof, is to go right forth unto only him, and to be joined unto him. Wherefore let us bear well in mind this lesson, that Gods intent is not to scare us in such wise, as we should shun him: and that is the thing which we have to gather at this time upon that which is rehearsed here. For the threat that Moses gives here, is hard: but yet it served to bring the people back to God. If you disobey the voice of the Lord your God (said he,) you shall be scattered. Flatter not yourself what his choosing of you from among all other Nations to be his inheritance, nor with his giving of you this land in possession: for he can well enough bereave you of all these benefits. Yet notwithstanding, he adds that if God see repentance in his people, after he has chastised them: he will bring them again & deal favorably with them, so as they shall feel him to be a merciful God, and such a one as powers not out his rigor with extremity upon offenders, when he sees that they be not utterly past amendment. What is to be done then? First of all, when we hear this sentence which God gave in old time upon his people: let us learn to beware that we abuse not his goodness. Let us go to him with all humility while he allured us by gentleness, as the Apostle declared in the Epistle to the Hebrews. For there he said that we be not come to Mount Sinay where there was nothing but flashes of lightening, and Thunder cracks: and where the people were so amazed, as they looked for present death. What remains then? Behold (said he,) God calls us by his Gospel, to the intent we should be fellows with the Angels, & with the spirits of the faithful, and that we should be very Citizens of his kingdom. Seeing it is so (said he :) let us enter into the heavenly Jerusalem, for our God is a consuming fire. It should seem at the first sight that there is some contrariety in these two sayings, That we should come boldly and after an assured manner to our God: and also that he should be a consuming fire. But both these agree very well together. For first the Apostle shows that we ought not to be so afraid of the Majesty of our God, as that we should shun him, but rather consider that there is nothing in him but gentleness. But yet therewithal we must know also, that we must worship him unfainedly: or else we must learn that he can well revenge himself of such as shall have abused his grace, and of such as shall have held scorn of it. Therefore let us receive Gods goodness when it is offered us, & that with such reverence and lowliness, as we provoke him not to wrath against us, he make him to arm himself as he does against the despisers of his grace.

But now let us come to that which Moses said here. The Lord your God (said he) will scatter you among the Heathen, and there you shall be few in number, and you shall serve strange Gods that ore made with mans hand. Here Moses sets Gods: curses against all the benefits that he had promised to his people. It was a singular benefit that the people were gathered into one body, that they had a land alone by themselves, that they were settled quietly there, and that every man had a house of his own. But here he said that they shall be driven out of it. The first threat then betokens that the people of the Jews shall be thrust out of the land that God had given them. And let us mark here withal, that the bringing of the people into that land, was not only to the intent they should live at their ease and in rest: but to the intent they should also be sanctified unto God. The Land of Canaan was as a mirror of the heavenly life, so that by dwelling there that people were assured that they were the children of God: and therefore this threat that they should be driven not among the heathen Nations, was not to be esteemed lightly. Also it is said that there shall be a small number left of them. But we know that among other things, God had promised Abraham to multiply his seed as the Stars of the sky, and as the sand of sea. It is said here that they shall be few in number: yea, and we see they had been even as Sodom and Gomorrah, so as they had perished everyone, if God had not vouchsafed to reserve some little seed to himself, as is said in the Prophet Esay. Lastly it is said that they shall serve strange goddess which are made with mans hand. This is the grievous punishment of all, that the Jews which had Gods Law, should nevertheless be subject to such tyranny, as to be fain to worship the idols of the Heathen, so as they should have no Religion among them but such as should defile them, and that all their toiling of themselves should be but to their greater condemnation. Thus we see in effect what this text comprehends. Now remained that we apply it to our instruction.

First therefore let us learn to use well the benefits that God bestowed upon us, and to submit ourselves unto him seeing he us, and shows himself so friendly and loving towards us, assuring ourselves that he can well take away the things that he has given us. Not that we must be afraid that God will not continue his goodness still towards us, yea and also increase it if we on our side walk aright, and continue in the possession of that things that he has put into our hands: but that such as despise God, shall feel that he is not bound to them, nor unable to pluck that things out of their fists which he had given them. Let us therefore possess Gods benefits in fear and carefulness. This is the thing in effect, which we have to gather upon the said saying of Moses. True is, that we have not now a days a land of Chanaan, so as Gods Church should be separated into some one country, where it pleases him to have his name called upon: but yet notwithstanding if we have a place where we may serve him uncorruptly, he grants us a special grace, and we ought to set great store by it. And if we know not that: we shall feel that Moses has not said in vain, that we shall become like other nations. How many nations see we in these days, that enjoy the like benefit as GOD has bestowed upon us? Nay contrariwise, they that have any tast of the Gospel, do languish among the enemies of the faith, and are there as sheep in the wolves mouth, wandering up and down as in a wilderness, while in the meantime our God keep thus, as in his flock. Seeing then that we have such an advantage: is it not reason that we should strain ourselves to serve God, and that we should live peaceably under his hand, seeing he does us the honor to receive us, as indeed it is he that governs us, and the thing is as apparent as anything may be? Now then if we will needs be overlusty, the threat that was uttered in old time against the Jews will light upon our heads. And as it is said here that they shall be few in number: so although GOD have gathered a great forte of us together, he can well enough diminish our number, if we misbehave ourselves: and in the end, that thing that is most of all to be feared will come upon us, that is to wit, that we shall serve strange Gods. And indeed, if we cannot find in our hearts to bear Gods yoke, but are loth to be subject unto him: is it not reason that we should be under a clean contrary government, that is to wit, that we should be bereft of the true and pure religion, and be plunged in idolatry? We hear what he says by his prophet Ezechiel. For having blamed that Jews for their unthankfulness, he adds that his delivering of them into that hands of tyrants, is rightfull. I have given them (said he) a good & holy law, yea even with promise, that if they walked in it, they should find life and welfare therein: and I cannot tell what I might have done more for them. What a thing is it that God does us the honor to rule us, and to take the pain to guide us all our life long? Again, seeing he adds a promise, that his teaching of us is for our welfare: if we will not yield ourselves teachable unto him, but shake off his yoke like wood beasts: is it not reason that we should be cast into most vile slavery, seeing we cannot abide such a master as our God, specially since he desires not to ruler us otherwise than to our welfare? [yes, and therefore] the creatures, yea and even the devil himself in the end must reign over us. For that is the thing which Ezechiel means by the Tyranny thing of Babylon.

For there (says he) they shall have laws given them for their own tooth, and such laws as they can find in their hearts to keep: but they shall not live by them. When they have toiled they themselves to by the uttermost, and paid imposts and tributes to the infidels: yet shall they be fain to serve their idols too, so as they shall defile and bewray themselves with all superstitions. And what shall be their reward? Everlasting death. That is the payment of all such as cannot find in their hearts to serve God quietly, and to keep his law and his word. But to the intent we may not think that this served but for that one time: Moses shows that the like should befall to all such as misbehave themselves and withdraw themselves from the Church. And this vengeance of God has been accomplished upon the greater part of the world, as we see already. For whence came the hellish confusion of popery? Even of gods just punishment for the rebelliousness of the world, because men were hardhearted and would not stoop. For when God caused his Gospel to be published: then was the trumpet founded, to the end that all men both great and small should have been brought unto him. But we see what befell on men's behalf. They would in no wise stoop: they were very loth to do that. And not that only, but also some defied God openly when he would have brought them to his lure: and othersome made countenance of obedience through hypocrisy, but it lasted not: for they were unconstant and fled touch anon after. Therefore it behooved him to punish such spiteful wickedness, and so he did. Because they would not obey the truth: therefore did lying get the mastery of them. God gave Satan the bridle, so as his errors wrought effectually, in besotting such as had willfully shut their eyes, against the doctrine of salvation when it was offered them. Now then since we see that God offers us great good nowadays in gathering us into his flock, and in giving us his word whereby we have life and salvation: let us learn whereby to enjoy so create a benefit. For God mocks us not when he tells us that he is our father and Savior. He takes not the things with the one hand which he gave us with the other. Only let us be contented to continue still in the possession of his grace.

But yet besides this, let us stand in fear of this horrible curse of serving strange Gods, and of being bereft of the pure religion, for refusing to make our commodity of the honor and privilege that God give thus in drawing us to him, and in showing us that he is willing to reign among us. And Moses speaks willing here expressly of the vanity of idols, to the end that the people may be the better touched therewith. For the wretched Paynims in worshipping a peace of wood or stone, could not conceive what an abomination it is to worship a dead thing. But they that knew the living God, even the GOD that gives life to all things, ought better to perceive that it is against nature, yea and a detectable thing, to worship a puppet so, whether it were made of wood, or cast of metal either gold or silver. For they be all of them corruptible creatures: and without GOD there is no life, without his power there is no moving.

So then Moses has set down these circumstances to that end that the people might know that they should not be punished lightly, but that in disobeying God and in refusing to keep themselves holy unto him: they should defile themselves. And it is good reason that when God has shed forth his grace upon us, we should be punished the more grievously, if we cannot profit ourselves by it. The more then that every of us has made proceedings in Gods grace: the more earnest let him be to love him and serve him: unless we will have him on the contrary part, to use the extreme rigor that is spoken of here.

Howbeit herewithall (as I have touched already) Moses shows that God will not so punish his people as to leave them in despair: but that he intends a clean contrary end, that is to wit, to bring them to repentance. And surely this is a very notable place. For although God thunder against us, so as to our seeming we may judge by all likelihood, that he is minded to make clean riddance of us without any mercy: yet notwithstanding he seeks our salvation by that means, and gives us always space of repentance: atleastwise so long as his word is preached unto us. For sometimes the gate is shut up, and we must ever bear in mind how the prophet Esay said, Seek the Lord while he may be found. And again in another place correspondent unto this, he says, I have heard you in convenient time, I have succored you in the day of salvation. Hereby it is showed us, that there is still space of repentance, and the gate is still open for us to come unto God, so long as he gives us his word. But if we pass not to enter while GOD gives us the mean: we shall be bereft of his word, and then may we well seek after him, howbeit but as blind folks that grope in the dark: for the Lord will have shut us out from him. But here Moses teaches, that although God seem unmeasurably sharp in chastising his children yet notwithstanding he gives them space of repentance, and ceases not to have a care of their salvation. For he said, When you are so scattered, if you seek your God: you shall find him: yea verily, if you seek him with all your heart and with all your soul. Now, that we may the better understand the things that are contained here: let us note first of all, that when men are once gone away unto wickedness, it is very hard to fetch them back again, unless they be subdued by main force. And that meant Moses to express in saying, Then shall you seek the Lord your God. When is this then? not when the people are full fed, nor when they have store of all Gods benefits: for we shall see in the song, how the people are likened to over pampered horses, which are kicking and wincing against their masters, and will not suffer themselves to be handled. Moses then means that the people should be fain to be reformed after a forcible manner: for (as I said before) that is our nature. If we be once gone astray, GOD shall never get us home again, till he have thoroughly tamed us. True it is that he could go another way to work, and it is not for that he is unable to reclaim us by his holy spirit, if he listed: but he intends to show us what our lewdness is, and that is the cause why he uses these inferior means. This is the first point which we have to mark upon this place.

And hereunto answers that which is written in the second of Osee: for there our Lord complains of the Jews, saying that they be like a harlot that has forsaken her husband, and given over herself to all commers, bearing herself in hand that she is best at ease when she may receive rewards, and be catching and snatching on all sides: so that (to her seeming) if she were an honest wife, she should be fain to be contented with a little, whereas now being a strumpet, she eats of the daintiest morsels, and has store of presents brought her. God therefore said that the Jews were in the same taking, when they were in love with their idols, and in the meantime fathered all their good things upon them. What shall I do now, says the Lord? When you say, it is our idols that give us meat and drink: you be unthankful unto me: for you have received all these things at my hand. Now therefore must be same to bereave you of them. I will take away the bread and wine wherewith you have been sustained, and your wool and flax & all other things. I will bring you out (said he) into the wilderness, I will make you to pine away there, you shall be like a wretched harlot which after she has played the naughty pack, and has run gadding here and there, and in the end has been driven to eat her own dung and filth, is rejected of all men, and dies for hunger and thirst, not having wherewith to cover her shame. Thus will I handle you (said he) and then shall you find that there is nothing better than to stick to me. You shall say, Alas where is my husband that dealt so gently with me? I must be fain to return to him. By this similitude the prophet does us to understand, that when men give themselves to lewdness, and do not seem and honor GOD, after he has given them his word: they must be reformed by force. And why? For as long as they live at their ease, they forget themselves, they flatter themselves, they be proud, and think they may even despise God. For when God pinches us not, nor makes us to feel his strong hand: we take occasion thereat to sooth ourselves in our vices, so that we have need (as I said before) to be reformed by Gods striking upon us with main blows. For if he dally with us, it will breed our destruction and decay. And surely there is not a notable point than this: For we think it strange, that God should use so sundry fortes of rigor in this world: but in the meanwhile we consider not the hardness of men's hearts. For consider although Gods curses have their full scope, so as we see wars on the one side and famine on the other, and every man cries out alas: yet not withstanding; who is he that looks to the hand that smites? How many return to GOD for all that? does it not rather seem to GOD that sinners have conspired to resist God still? Now seeing it is so, let us mark that Gods showing of himself so rigorous, is not without cause, and let us impute it to our own selves. Then if any of us be afflicted alone, or all of us in common, so as we be smitten with Gods scourges: let us understand that we have need of it, and that it serves to stop our mouths, that we grudge not against God, assuring ourselves that his nipping of us after that fashion is not causeless.

Besides this, let us also learn to comfort ourselves since we see the end that God aim at. For like as he shows himself rough and sharp: so will he also have us to taft of his love and care towards us: that is to wit, that forasmuch as we have forgotten him & turned our backs to him, & not fought to him, but rather endeavored to flee from him: his intent is to draw us to him by that means, and to induce us to seek him again. You see then that the true comfort of wretched sinners when God scourge them, is to consider thus with themselves: yet GOD has pity upon us: indeed we remembered not him: but yet for all that, he has not forgotten us, and that does he show by the effect. Nevertheless, the chiefest [comfort] is in this that Moses adds, namely, that they shall find God if they seek him. For if we go to seek God, being only in distress and trouble: can we have any courage to come unto him? True it is that when the wretched unbelievers are distressed, they toil themselves and do all that they can to seek God. We see that even in the Popedom, when men are in sorrow and have their sins laid before them, [their saying is,] go to, let us see if we can pacify God. But as for them, they have no warrant that God will receive them, neither trust they to his free promises, neither pray they in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. They can well speak of repentance: but (to their own seeming) God should receive them for their own worthiness, and not otherwise. And so we see they come thither as it were doubting: for it is certain that such repentance is full of hypocrisy. For why? They be not sure of Gods goodness: No they never wist what it meant. But as for us, let us put the thing in vre which is said in the psalm, Lord, your mercy is ever ready in you. Hereby it is showed us that we can never return unto God, to submit ourselves unto him: unless we taste his mercy, that we may trust to it and rest upon it. That is the cause why I told you that we must mark the text where Moses said, if you seek the Lord your God, you shall find him. Will we then be provoked to repentance when we have sinned? Let us hearken to the promises that GOD has given us. For there he assures thus that as soon as we open our mouth to pray, he will stretch out his hand to succour us at our need: yea and that he will prevent us, so as we need not distrust him that he will not receive us to mercy, seeing we have such a warrant.

Howbeit forasmuch as men would always pacify God with countenances and ceremonies: Moses adds purposely, that we must seek him with heart and with soul. I said that men are ever desirous to content God with trifling things: and we see it too much . For when they speak of repentance or penance in popery: what mean they by that word, but that men must use much lip-labor, and make a forte of Apes toys? But the heart must abide still locked up, and men must in no wise rid themselves of their wicked affections, nor cleanse them away. They will always keep a back shop behind, and in the mean season if they show some good outward sign, they think it is enough, and that God ought not to press them any further. They be double hearted: and therefore they would have God to receive but the one half of that which he requires: and the other half they would pay him as it were in way of ransom. But as for us, let us on our side learn to understand, that to find him, and to be received of him, we must seek him with all our heart, and with all our soul. Not that we can come unto him with such perfection as were to be wished: but yet must we have this fondness with us, that we seek no lurking holes, but rather examine our sins thoroughly, and when we have condemned them, seek the remedy with fighting and groaning, that it may please our God to reclaim us to him, so as we condemning our own sins, may desire nothing so much as to be reformed according to his righteousness. Thus you see what it is to seek God with all our heart and with all our soul. And when we go so to work, let us not think that we shall be disappointed of the promise which he made to the fathers of old time. And so you see that the thing which we have to mark upon this place is that forasmuch as we come not to God of our own good will, we are fain to be driven to it by force, and that is the cause of the afflictions that God sends us.

Furthermore we must also consider his fatherly goodness in striking us: for he does it to bring us home again to him by that mean. And how come we thither? It would behoove us to be stripped stark naked out of all self trust, and to be utterly cast down in ourselves: but we cannot away with that, because our nature drives us that clean contrary way. But yet for all that, we see we have wherewith to comfort us in our afflictions, For our Lord seeks not our destruction, but brings us home again to himself: and that not doubtfully: but assuredly warranting us that if we come unto him, it shall not be in vain, neither shall we be disappointed. Why? For if we seek him, we shall find him. But there withal let us look well to it, that there be no faining nor doubleness in us: for God cannot away with such hypocrisy.

And now it is immediately said, when these adversities are come upon you, you shall return to your GOD and obey his voice. And because the Lord is merciful, he will not forget you nor cast you out of his presence, nor out of the covenant of your fathers. This serves to express yet better the doctrine which I touched where Moses said, When these miseries are come upon you, then shall you seek your God. For he shows that men play the drunken folk so long as God deals gently with them: and that they cannot perceive their sins, except they be made to smart. When these miseries have caught hold of you, then (said he) &c. By the miseries that he speaks of, he means the punishments wherewith he had threatened the people before. To be short, God must be fain to show us his wrath to our faces, and to make us to feel it: or else we conceive it not. And we see it is so. For when we be daily told of Gods wrath, we make but a sport of it, it moves us not a whit. And why? Because we be earthly and fleshly, and therefore God is fain to make us feel his wrath and vengeance according to our rudeness. Yet notwithstanding we be still nice and tender, insomuch that if we feel anything amiss in our bodies, and that we have not our own desires: we be by and by vexed & grieved, and by that means God amends us. Not that we be humbled at that first stripe: but we come to it by little and little and as it were by degrees, so as in the end God makes his corrections available. And whereas I say that God brings us home to him by the chastisements that he sends us: that is not general to all men. We see that the unbelievers become the forwarder, insomuch that when God chastises them for their sins, they storm against him, they gnash their teeth, and in the end they fall to despair. But this saying concern those that are rightly of Gods Church: those when they be chastised are willing to return to God in their adversities. Thus you see what Moses meant to express in saying, When these miseries shall have caught hold of you. As if he had said, so long as your God suffers you to live in rest, so long as he sets not your sins before you, so long as he calls you not to a reckoning: you think yourselves out of danger, and that no man can hurt you, and (which worse is) your faults never come to your remembrances. But if you be once pinched with adversity, then will you cling to your God. Hereby we be warned again, to bear the corrections patiently which God sends us: for they do us good: whereas prosperity blinds us and breeds our destruction. True it is that gods gentle handling of us, ought not to cause us to despise handling him nor to neglect him. When God shows himself loving towards us, surely we ought to be the more inclined thereby to love him. But what? Our dragging clean backward, bewrays that prosperity is not good for us. And therefore our Lord must be fain to scourge us. Wherefore let us learn not to be grieved out of measure when God beats us so with his rods: but to bear his stripes meekly, forasmuch as we see that the end thereof is to our welfare according as it is said here, when you are pinched with adversity. Yea and if our Lord having smitten us after one forte do double his stripes: let us not murmur against him as we be inclined to do. For [sometimes] they that have been patient in some one adversity, fall to storming and chasing against God when it comes to the second or the third. But we must not do so. For on the contrary part, we see our Lord withdraws not his hand at the first as soon as he has chastised us once: and we abide by it still. Indeed when we feel any adversity, we will set a good face upon it at the first, and say, very well, seeing that God chastises me, I must return well, unto him. But let him turn his hand on the other side: and we fall to fretting and chasing by and by. Therefore we must be chastised thoroughly: that is to say, God must let us alone in distress & adversity must so over master us, as we may be thoroughly tamed, & it may so stick by our ribs, that when he shall have withdrawn his hand. We may remember it all our life after. Then let us learn that we must be patient in our adversities, not only for a day or two, or for some affection: but only so as we hold out quietly under the hand of our God, even when he doubles and increases his stripes. That is the effect of the thing which we have to mark.

Now when Moses says, The Lord your God is merciful, and therefore he will not forsake you nor cast you of: he brings back the people to the nature of God that they might hope to be received to mercy, if they repented them of their sins. And it is another very notable point. Indeed I have touched it heretofore: nevertheless, Moses makes a larger declaration thereof, and not without cause. For like as he had erst said that GOD is a fire which consumes all things; so it behooved him to show on the contrary part, that Gods nature is loving and gentle, and that he is ready to forgive the faults of such as acknowledge them. And that also is the cause why God tells us so often of his mercy. But whatsoever be said to us concerning his goodness: yet can we not trust in him as we ought to do. There is not anything harder to us than to assure ourselves of the goodness and fatherly love of our God. It is a great thing, that when God shall have owed a hundred thousand times, that he loves us & will be favorable to us: yet we continue still in a wavering, and stand disputing upon the matter, & feed our own distrustfulness, as though we would needs disable the record that God gives us of his goodness. Now then, it is more than needs, when Moses tells us that God of his own nature is pitiful. It is a property that is evermore attributed unto him, and that not only in this text, but also in other places as we shall see hereafter: and the Scripture is full of the same doctrine. And why? Because that else it were not possible to assure men, forasmuch as they be so given to unbelief, as they still martyr themselves, and are always in perplexity and unquietness, bearing themselves in hand that God will never be at one with them. True it is that (as I have said already) we be but too hardy in doing evil: but when we should assure ourselves that God will have pity upon us, & when we should seek him: then does our unbelief bewray itself. Not without cause therefore does Moses say here that God is merciful, to the end that the people might conceive Gods nature and take hold of it, which is altogether contrary to their own, as God himself owes in other places. My thoughts (said he by his prophet Esay) are not like yours. For if a man be offended, although the wrong that is done him be but small: yet is there no means to pacify him, there will always remain some root of displeasure in his heart. Now we imagine God to be like ourselves, & we measure him by our own yard. For this cause: he protests thus: look how far heaven is from the earth, so far are my thoughts from yours. And therefore assure yourselves I seek nothing else but that all such as have offended me should be at one with me. Yea & although your misdeeds be never so grievous & heinous: Yet so it is that I am ready to forget them out of hand. So then let us hearken to that texts of holy scripture, where God tells us that he is slow to wrath, patient, and ready to forgive the faults that are committed against him. Let us bear this in mind, that it may be as a foundation for us to build upon, when the case concerns the forsaking of our sins, that we should be sorry for them, and obtain the mercy that God has promised us. Thus much concerning that point.

But it were not enough for us to know Gods nature, except we had his promise, and that he showed us his will there. For the Papists, the Turks, and the Paynims also can well enough say (as they have always said) that God is merciful but they cannot seek it to taste thereof. And the reason is, because they do not stick and lean to his promises. True it is that when they have once imagined that God is merciful, they enter into many questions. Yea but indeed they (say they:) what wote I, whether this mercy serve for me or no? And afterward they put Gods mercy into the balance with their sins, and stand as folk dismayed at it. Then is there a certain confused imagination of Gods mercy in all men: but yet can they not trust to it, neither can they return unto God, with full persuasion that he will reach them his hand to succor them. And why? for they have not his promises. So much the more therefore does it stand us in hand, to mark well this text of Moses when he adds: The Lord your God will not forget the covenant of your fathers which he swear to them. And so besides knowledge which we have that God is merciful, and will receive sinners when they come unto him: let us mark well that it behooves us also to have his promises to rest upon, so as our coming unto him may be because he calls and allures us, because he has showed us his will, because we need not fear that we shall loose our labor. And why? for we have a warrant that GOD will hear us. But Moses said expressly here, the covenant of your fathers which he has sworn unto. And why [has he sworn unto it] Because it is not enough for us to know that God has promised to receive wretched sinners & to pardon them: except we know also that his promises are directed specially unto us, and can apply them to our use.

True it is that his promises stand not upon men's doings, neither is it in every mans power to warrant himself that God will show him favor. For do we think him bound to us? Upon what assurance shall I conceive in my head, that God will accept me? That were a devilish presumption. God then must be fain to prevent us: he must be fain to promise us of his own free goodness, that although we be wretched & miserable: yet nevertheless he will have pity upon us. So then, if we will obtain forgiveness of our sins: we must begin at gods promises.

But it is not for naught that Moses said, the covenant of your fathers. That is to say, the covenant that was made with your fathers, which is as their peculiar inheritance. Now then we see how Moseses meaning is, that to come unto God, we must not only consider that he has promised to be merciful to sinners: but also every of us must apply it peculiarly to himself, so as he can say, indeed I am a wretched creature, I am plunged in cursedness, there is nothing but despair for me. No verily, if your God should not show your mercy. As how? It is to you that he speaks when he said, Come unto me all you that are weary and overladen, and I will refresh you. You are of that number. Now then assure yourself that your GOD gives you his promises, to the intent that you resting upon them, mightiest be sure of his goodness, that it cannot fail you. Wherefore let us not doubt but that the promises which God has made to his Church are ours, & that every of us ought to apply them particularly to his own use and benefit, so as when any man is in perplexity, that he woteth not what to say, he must always come back to this point, how now? has not your GOD promised that he will pity such as call upon him? Yes indeed: but I know not whether I be of that sort or no. Why? Have I not been baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ? Have I not his holy Supper as a second pledge, whereby he shows me that he receives me into the number of his children? Be you out of doubt therefore seeing you has so many records, that your God will be favorable to you, and fear you not but he will show you mercy. Thus you see the cause why Moses speaks here expressly of the covenant of the fathers, as it was made with their father Abraham, and to all his seed after him: For otherwise it would not have bootet at all in the time of Moses. But forasmuch as GOD had said, I will be your GOD to a thousand generations: his offspring is comprehended in it after his decease. And therefore the Jews ought to have assured themselves by the virtue of the same covenant, that they should be received: so as if they repented them of their sins, they should always find the mercy that they had need of.

And now let us understand, that seeing God vouchsafed to extend his goodness to the children of those with whom he had made his covenant: and that although they were slidden back, and utterly turned away from him, and had quite forsaken him, yet notwithstanding he ceased not to show them mercy. Now seeing he speaks nowadays unto us, and the voice of our Lord Jesus Christ founds loud in calling us, to reconcile us to our God, and that the forgiveness of sins is preached unto us in his name, and tidings is brought unto us that God desires to be friends with us, and that all war should be laid aside between him and us: let us assure ourselves I say, that it is not for us to be willful and stubborn, say but that it behooves us to submit ourselves to our God: and therewithal to assure ourselves thoroughly, that this promise of his is not deceitful. Why? for the covenant is ours, so as our God intends not that his promises shall vanish into the air, but that they shall be fled fast towards us, so as every of us may fare the better by them. Thus much concerning this saying of the covenant of the fathers.

But yet herewithall Moses fails not to show, that it was not men that did first make the covenant with God, but that God did prevent them: and that it is he, that of his own free goodness has bound himself unto them. And for that cause is it said that God swear to that covenant: and both of them are right necessary. For as I have told you, if we take not Gods promises as peculiar to ourselves, it is impossible for us to be so grounded upon them; as to call upon him with a a steadfast heart, but we shall be ever wavering. Therefore we must be fully persuaded, that God makes us partakers of all the benefits that he promised to our ancestors. And when we be once at that point, we must also consider on the other side, that it is not for us to be on the forehand with God, neither does our Lord tarry till we come to seek him: but it is he that has prevented us with his mercy. To be short, it is he that has vouchsafed to take us for his children: and although we were strangers unto him, & had not in anywise deserved to have any acquaintance with him: yet notwithstanding he has vouchsafed of his own accord to link himself with us. Lt behooves us to think so. For if we know not that Gods promises are of free gift: we will fall to seeking of some desert and worthiness in ourselves, and we will say, that was the mean whereby to come unto God: he bestowed such a benefit or gracious gift upon us, because we deserved it: we have gotten such a thing by the means of our own virtues. Let us beware of such fantastical imaginations, and let us not think to do ourselves any good that way. So then let us bear in mind, that whereas God has declared his covenant unto us, & calls it ours: yet notwithstanding he will have us to know, that his vouchsafing to utter himself unto us, & to give himself unto us, is of his own accord without being bound thereto, insomuch that we: did rather deserve to be utterly rejected at his hand. And Moses thinks it not enough to say singly that God made the said covenant: but he adds also that he swear it: and not without cause does he set that further here. For as I have declared already heretofore, when GOD speaks, we inquire whether the tiling be so or no. Truly such manner of inquiring is very wicked. But what for that? Our unbelief bears very such way with us, as we cannot simply trust unto GOD. Therefore does he simply our want, and swears to warrant his word the better which he has given us. If we believe not a man upon his bare word, we do him wrong. And therefore are mortal men put to their oath, because they be inclined over much to vanity. But when God swears at our request, what a thing is that? For seeing he is the unchangeable truth: why should not men trust him as soon as the word is spoken with his mouth? But hereby we see how forward we be, and on the other side we see also how God bears with us in humbling himself so far as to swear for our sakes because he sees that we would else be always unquiet, and that we should still be tempted to doubt. Therefore vouchsafes he to confirm us by swearing, to the intent we might be the better assured of the hope of our salvation, and not doubt any more of his promises. Thus much concerning Gods swearing.

Now again Moses shows after what manner men ought to seek GOD: and he shows it by deed. He had said before that such as seek God: with all their heart and with all their soul, shall find him. And now he shows by what means men shall yield good proof thereof, that is to wit of their true and unfeigned repentance: that is to wit, by obeying the Voice of God. For men will make brags know that they bear a good heart to Godward: and we see daily this shamelessness, that such as have not one vein that tends to Godward, cease not for all that to protest with full mouth, that they love God and they bear the world in hand, that they be wonderful zealous. But here Moses brings us back to the try all. We must show whereby, (says he) so as it may appear by our fruits that our sins mislike us indeed, and that we be desirous in very deed to seek God, to stick unto him. And how may that be done? Even by obeying his voice, according as we know also that obedience is the thing which God prefers before all other sacrifices. And that is a thing worthy to be well marked. For Moses here sets out two things: The one is, that when men brag of their willingness to seek God, if they show it not in good earnest by their whole life, so as it may be known by their fruits: a men may well tell them that they ly, and that they do but mock with GOD and the world when they say, we be sorry for our sins. That is the thing which we have to mark for one point. Therefore let us try our repentance by the said rule. When we seem to ourselves to by seek the God: let us look that it be with lively repentance, not in feet, hands, or eyes: but in that reformation of all our affections, so as they may be given over all wholly to follow God & his word. If it be not so with us: all that ever we can say of repentance, is but mockery. Mark that for one point.

The other is the obeying of Gods voice. When as he speaks of the obeying of Gods voice: it is to exclude all the fond devotions of mans own inventing. For when men intend to serve God well, how go they to work? Me thinks (say they) that such a thing is good: and thereupon they set up goodly gay services. Moses therefore excludes all these things, in saying that we must obey the voice of our God. Wherefore let us see that we submit ourselves unto him. Because we see the world is so greatly given to invent fond devotions: let us for our part learn to know, that whatsoever is of mans devising, is plain deceit, and even the highway to lead us to destruction: and that the only way to please God and to make our life allowable before him, is simply to obey his word, & to submit ourselves to him, when he provokes us to repentance, assuring ourselves that it is the very means also whereby we may obtain salvation, though we have deserved to perish a hundred thousand times.

Now let kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done heretofore, yea even in such wise, as having condemned ourselves for them, we may not forbear to rest upon his promises, and to resort unto him, and to pray unto him, that he may have pity upon us, as he that desires not the death of sinners, but that they should come home again to him, for as much as he is ready to admit them to the salvation which he has promised to his children. Wherefore let us repair unto him, even in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and if we convert not at the very first as soon as he chastises us, let us pray him to make us to proceed in true repentance from day to day, by forsaking the vice that is in us, so as he may govern us by his holy spirit, and the world may perceive that Gods word has such authority over us, as we desire nothing but to fashion ourselves all wholly thereafter. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth, & c.

On Tuesday, the 4th of June 1555
The twenty seventh Sermon, which is the ninth upon the fourth Chapter

32 For inquire you now of the days past, which have been before you, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and from the one end of heaven unto the other, if ever there were done so great a thing as this, or if ever the like thing have been heard of.

33 Was there ever any Nation that has heard the voice of God speaking out of the midst of fire, as you has heard and yet continued alive?

34 Or was there ever any God, that affaied to go and take him a people from the midst of another people, by temptations, signs, and wonders, by wars and strong hand, by stretched out arm and great terribleness, as the Lord your God has done in Egypt before your eyes?

35 He has made you to see them, to the intent you shouldest know that the Lord is God, and that there is none other but only he.

Lthough that all the things that ever God did, ought to, serve for our learning, & we know not anything but by I ancient stories: yet the later that things were done, so much the better ought they to touch us. And although we ought to profit ourselves by Gods works when we behold them afar of: yet ought they to move us much more, when they touch ourselves and concern our own persons. If a thing betold us, which we never saw: yet ought the story to serve to waken us. But if we be able to bear witness of it ourselves, so as our eyes have seen it, and we have not had it by other men's report, but every of us is able to owe it by his own experience: ought we not to be much better and much more assuredly taught by it? In like case is it when any of us shall have seen or perceived any work of God: for he ought to be touched so much the more to the quick. In the self same respect does Moses now speak unto the people, Look about you, inquire of the ancient times, see whether you can find the creation of the world, ass God has done in your sight. Seeing it is your unthankfulness shall be the more inexcusable, if you acknowledge not so great a benefit, by persuading yourself fully, that there is none other God than the same that has uttered himself to you, & has given you so evident and infallible tokens of his majesty. Therefore have a regard to serve the God that has purchased you: for you canst not henceforth allege any cause of ignorance. Now by the way we have to mark, that the intent of Moses is, to put a difference here between that God of Israel, & all those that were worshipped [for Gods] in the world: and not without cause.

For when men have forged any God to themselves, they may well toil themselves to serve him, but it shall turn to their condemnation. Why so? Because they rob God of the honor that belongs to him, to give it to a creature or rather to a shadow. For if we make idols, they be not worthy to be reckoned among Gods creatures. If we imagine of God among after our own liking: it is but vanity and leasing. So then, when men worship the thing that they have concerned in their own fancy: they convey the glory of that living God, not only to creatures, but also to that which is nothing at all. Therefore it is very expedient for us to know which is the true God, that we may worship him. For even at that time the world was perverted, so as all men went wandering in their own superstitions. Although God manifested himself so many ways: yet notwithstanding, like as the world was blind and ceased not to entangle itself in withstanding all errors: so every man forged idols to himself. True it is very, that all men said, we have a religion, and our intent is to serve God: but yet for all that, there was no foundness, there was no understanding among them. Behold, God gathered his people together, accordingly as he had chose that house of Abraham, and according to his saying that the same should be to him a holy lineage and dedicated to his service. Seeing then that the Jews were not mingled with the other nations of the earth: they should have considered that they ought not to have had any fellowship with the unbelievers, so as their religion should have been entangled and doubtfull: but that being fancified to the maker of heaven and earth, they should have worshipped him purely, and submitted themselves under his obeisance. Now then we have here the counsel of Moses, or rather the counsel which that holy Ghost intended to utter in speaking here by his mouth. And (as I have told you) that this doctrine is very profitable, so ought we to be the more heedfull in marking it. For naturally we be inclined to go astray. Insomuch that although we had no occasions before our eyes: yet would every of us deceive and beguile himself. And again, the devil ceases not to offer us many illusions, to dazzle our wits withal, and to make us swarve from the right and pure religion. Seeing then that there is such vice in us, and that we be hemmed in on all sides with so many dangers: let us learn to make our profit by his doctrine.

True it is that the thing cannot be said to us nowadays, which Moses tells the people of Israel here: for Gods showing of himself to us, or his stretching out of his arm to deliver us, has not been of any late continuance of time, as was his speaking to that people from the midst of the fire: but yet nevertheless the same exhortation belongs unto us also. And why? For Gods choosing of the people of Israel to himself, and his declaring of his wonderful power for the recovery of them, was not to the end that they should know him and worship him as the true God, by the space of a hundred years only: but to the intent that the remembrance of the same redemption should continue to the worlds end. Then let us mark well that Gods delivering of the children of Abraham from the bondage of Egypt, was to the end that we also in these days should take him for our true GOD which has all power in his hand, which disposes of his creatures, and which created the world and governs it. Since it is so, although our eyes have not seen the miracles that are rehearsed here: yet ought we to make our profit of them, and to be edified by them, so as we may be sure that we have not an uncertain GOD, nor a religion forged at adventure, or at the pleasure of men: but that it is the very true GOD, who has given so good proof of his power at once already, as we have no cause to doubt of him, or to think his majesty darksome, or to stand scanning whether he ought to have superiority and prominence or no. For he has showed that all the world is his, and that all that ever was worshipped at that time in the world, was but idols. Thus you see how this text is to be taken that we may apply it to our own profit. For it is not enough for us to know what Moses meant in speaking to the people of Israel: but we must understand likewise, whereto the same doctrine serves us at this day, so as we may receive instruction by it.

Now before we pass any further, let us mark the words that are set down here. Inquire (says Moses) of the days of old time, since God created man upon the earth. Here he shows us that our negligence is partly the cause that we know not God. True it is that we cannot attain to his high majesty by our own wit: for our sight is too short. Nay (which more is) not only Gods highness is incomprehensible to us; but also when we think to come near him, it overwhelms us. We be blind wretches that have nothing but darkness in us: and God in respect of himself dwells in unapproachable light. But yet for all that, if it be well and thoroughly considered and looked to: it will appear that men make none account of seeking GOD, but for slow it as a thing of no profit. So then let us mark the exhortation that is made here, that atleastwise when God works, we may apply all our wits earnestly to consider it, and that if there be the like endeavor in us as we make reckoning of, we may prefer that before all other things. For what a thing is it if we know not him that made us and fashioned us, and by whose power we have our being still? When we shall have ranged about heaven and earth, and yet know not God: must we not needs be wretched? Now then let us learn to be more diligent to know God and religion than we have been. And this stretches very far. For we see how we be sharp sighted and forecasting in worldly things, and we spare no pains in that behalf. If that case concern our own commodity or profit: we need no great calling on, for nature leads us thereunto.

But when we should go to God ward, and seek his will: then we have no leisure, every of us find an excuse, we be letted about other things. And is not this a token of great naughtiness? So much the more therefore ought we to come back to that which is told us here: namely that we be so far of from being excused nowadays: that if we be negligent and seek not after God, nor enquire how things go, nor what God has done, nor what he teaches in his Church: we shall be condemned by this text. For it is said, Inquire of the days of old time, since God created the world. True it is that all cannot be so great Clerks as to know all things that were requisite: but yet ought we not to sleep in that behalf, as though the knowing of God were a thing of no value. Therefore let us learn to place it in highest degree, so as all the rest of our cares and business may be put under it as inferior to it, as good reason would that they should be. Now Moses said expressly, since God created man upon the earth, because that that people had been taught concerning the creation of the world. But that was not known everywhere: insomuch that when those which took themselves to be very wise, were demanded how long it was ago since the world was created: some would make it six times as long ago, and other some thirty times. Wherein it appears how God punished their shameful negligence. And thereof came it that men knew not when the world was created: but that they were contented to shut their eyes, and to know nothing that had been done? Wherefore seeing that men do willfully shun instruction: it is good reason that God should give them over to such beastliness, as they should not know from whence they came, nor what their original was, but be utterly dilled. And for the same cause Moses speaking to the people whom God had reserved to himself, did put them in remembrance of the day wherein man was created upon the earth.

Now he said, Inquire from the one end of heaven to the other, to wit if ever there were so great a thing. Or if ever man heard of the like. After he has spoken of the time, now he speaks of the places. As if he should say, if folk will make good inquisition, it is not enough for them to know what things God has showed to themselves: but it were meet for them to seek about everywhere, and to mark well what they find, and to call to mind the things that have been done in far Countries. Therefore consider well (said he) what has been done from the one end of the heaven to the other. And this is it that I said afore, namely that we must profit ourselves by all Gods works, and although we behold them not with our eyes, yet if we do but hear of them, and tidings is brought us of them from a far, we must honor God in them. Indeed if we be witnesses of them, they ought to touch us so much the more. But yet howsoever the case stand, we ought to do our endeavor to know the things that have been done in strange Countries, according as is said here. And when as Moses said, so great a thing thereby he showed that the more that God manifested his power: the more ought we to be ravished with wonderment. Indeed there is no work of God so small, which ought not to move us to acknowledge some token of his Majesty therein. If we do but look upon a fly: surely we have there wherefore to magnify God. If we see but the slip of an herb, or any other thing be it never so little: we have therein whereby we ought to acknowledge the wonderful workmanship of God. But if he do moreover work much more evident miracles ought not all our wits to be much more occupied or spent about them? When God does after a sort alter the order of nature, and works after a new and unaccustomed manner: is it not all one as if he should rebuke us for our negligence and say unto us: Seeing you knew me not for God by the accustomed order of nature, at leastwise think upon me now when I go to work after another strange fashion, and consider you whether I be God or no. Thus you see what Moses meant by saying. There was never yet so great a thing, neither was there ever the like heard of. Let us mark well therefore that to attain to the right knowledge of God, when we have ranged up and down through the whole world, and spent up all our wits in looking upon all things whether they be great or small: if God give us any such inklings of his Majesty as may move us more than ordinary, we must be wholly may ravished thereat, and yield him the honor that is due unto him. And how that ought to be done, it shall be declared more plainly anon: for as now I do but go through the words of Moses severally as they lie.

He said afterward, Was there ever any people that heard the voice of their God speaking out of the midst of fire, as you has done, and yet continues alive? Here among other things Moses alleged that God had spoken to his people out of the mid of fire. For it was a visible sign of Gods Majesty, so as it was not for them to doubt anymore whether he were that living God, seeing they heard his voice thundering from heaven, and therewithal saw a great thick cloud and a flaming fire. Now seeing that this appeared to them: was it for them to inquire anymore whether it were God or no? No verily: for the thing was most evident. And furthermore, here Moses upbraided the people covertly with their lewdness, if they continue flow still in doing homage to the living God, seeing that all the heathen were inclined yea and willfully wedded to their superstitions, and yet knew no cause why. For had the Heathen men been asked by what warrant they worshipped their idols: they would have answered, by reason of their miracles. Yea, but what manner of miracles were they? fantastical imaginations, devilish illusions, and enchantments. But behold, Moses speaks here of a thing that was known: the hearers of it were present to bear witness of it. For he said, you heard the voice of your God from out of the midst of fire. Seeing that your GOD has showed himself to you so familiarly: there remains no excuse for you, if you worship him not as your GOD. Either you must forsake him through willful rebellion, or else you must needs grant that there is neither power, Majesty, nor glory in the whole world, other than that which was showed unto you, when the law was given you.

But let us mark by the way, that Moses matches here the word with the miracles. For the miracles had bootied them nothing at all, if doctrine had not been matched therewith, as had been touched heretofore. But yet is it good for us to be put in mind of it again, and it is not for nought also that the holy Ghost repeats it in this text: and we shall see it mentioned yet again hereafter. If the people of Israel had but only had some visions, to do them to understand which was the living God that had brought them out of the land of Egypt, and in the meanwhile had been let alone in their ignorance, so as they had had no law, no rule, no promise of salvation, no instruction of Religion: all the rest had been to no purpose. It is true that they might have lived, being once delivered from bondage: but what had the end of it been? They had become but a barbarous people, and they had corrupted themselves with superstitions as the Gentiles did. But when as God, (after his declaring of himself unto them, and after his showing of his Majesty unto them as it were in a mirror or rather a lively picture) did also teach them and give them a sure Law: he led them into a Religion that was sacred and holy. And so you see that God gave them such an evidence as was fit for their salvation.

Now remains how Moses added, That the people having heard Gods voice, continued still alive. Whereby he does us to understand: that it is a special grace of God that we be not consumed by his presence and by his word. It is said that the mountains melt at the sight of him. And again, that if he do but cast his eye upon the whole earth, it quakes. For Gods Majesty in it self is so terrible, as it were enough to sink the whole world. When he speaks, his voice does not only scare all creatures, but also utterly dismay them, yea and even bring them to nothing. Therefore it is a great miracle, that mortal men being so frail and brickle, and being no better than a shadow: are enabled to hear Gods voice, and yet are not consumed thereby. So then, Moses showed here, that God did not only make the people of Israel to perceive his Majesty & heavenly power: but also gave them a loving taste of his grace and goodness therewithal, to the intent they should not be too much dismayed at it, but rather have their wits at liberty and well settled to acknowledge, Behold, my God has showed himself to me, & therefore it is good reason that I should serve him and submit myself wholly unto him. Thus in effect we see two things: whereof the one is that God showed not himself to his people without teaching them by his word: & the other is, that the same word was not only so warranted as they might know it to be the word of God, and submit themselves unto it: but also was made sweet & amiable so far forth as was requisite. The people could not but be partly afraid (as I have declared already) when they perceived the Majesty of God: but yet howsoever they fared, God did so moderate his rigour, as they perceived him to be their father in that he showed them such reason.

Moses adds immediatly, Was there ever any God that took upon him to bring a people from among other people, by temptations, signs, wonders warres, and a stretched out arm, as you know that your God has done in bringing you out of Egypt? Here. Moses purposed expressly to confirm the people in the Religion that had been given them, to the intent they should not yield themselves to any of the great number of superstitions that reigned everywhere at the same time, as we be commonly wont to do. Truly if a people have ancient customs, they be loath to forgo them. And why? Because pride makes us to like well of the things that grow in our own garden, (as they say :) and to our seeming, all that ever other men have is nothing in comparison of that [which is our own.] But if God call us to him, and teach us faithfully what we have to do: we be so wild headed as we cannot abide the things that are showed us. We fall to seeking of this & that: behold (say we,) in such a Country there is such a custom & such a fashion: & why should not we have the same as well as they? Also we see how the unbelievers upbraid Gods children that they will needs be too wise, if they hold themselves in awe under Gods word. What is it that the Papists do cast us in the teeth all nowadays? These are the men (say they) which take upon them to renew the world, they will needs be singular by themselves, as though they had nothing at all to do with the rest of mankind. For this cause does Moses say here Passe not you for it though you see so many Nations have divers fashions, so as every of them has a Religion contrary to yours, and that you be alone by yourselves.

For why? Your God has chosen you in such sort, as he has showed you that you may be bold to defy all other nations. For has it ever come to passe, that any god has taken upon him to convey a people from out of the mid of another people? Seeing then that you are so schooled out, have you not a sure warrant that GOD will not have you to mingle yourselves with other Nations? Therefore if you have an eye to Gods bringing of you out of the land of Egypt, you shall always be put in mind, that the Religion which you hold of him is good and holy, and you may hold scorn of all other religions in the world. And moreover although other nations be greater than you: yet may he be bold to spit at their superstitions. For God has sufficiently showed, that he has not given you his Laws and Ordinances in vain. And why? For he has brought you out by yourselves: which never befell to any people of the world but you.

And to the end that these things should be the better esteemed: Moses showed here, that the said deliverance had no common thing in it. For it was wrought (says he) by temptations, signs, wonders, wars, strong hand, and stretched out arm. When as he says, by temptations: he means that the proofs were so notable, as the matter ought to be out of all eric. Seeing then that God had given them so many tokens: was it not enough to lay it wide open to them, that the idols of Egypt were nothing, and that Pharaoh with all his power was unable to do anything against that God of Abraham? True it is that the words Signs and wonders import the self same thing: but yet is it not without cause that Moses uses such diversity of terms: And why so? For we see how lightly men overpass Gods works, and make very slender reckoning of them. Therefore was it requisite that Moses should use such terms and speech, to set the more estimation upon the excellent greatness of the things that God had done in Egypt. Behold, (says he,) your God has given you signs and wonders, he has used his strong hand & stretched out his arm, in delivering you from such bondage: and therefore know you thereby that he has sufficiently warranted his Law, and the rule whereby he will have you to live, & whereunto he has put you in subjection.

Now he presently adds thereunto, That this was done before their eyes, so as they were certified that GOD was their maker, and that he only was the true GOD, and that there was none other God before him. Here again Moses intends to prove the people the more unthankful, if they profited not themselves by the things that they knew by experience. Your eyes (says he) are witnesses of it. As if he should say, If God of his gracious goodness did but send you messengers to tell you of that things that he had done: yet oughtest you to receive the things that were told you. But now it is not any other body that makes report of them unto you: but even your God himself has showed them unto you, and therefore there is no further excuse for you, for it has been showed even to the sight of your eye: and what more? that the Lord is the true God, (says he) and that there is none other but only he. Here we have the same thing to mark which has been touched already: namely that Moses speaks not simply of miracles or wonders, as it were to make a rehearsal of them: but also shows the end whereto they tend, which is that God should be magnified. And it is a very profitable lesson, [to understand] that when we have such things, we must learn in any wise to glorify our God by them. And had this point been well observed, the wretched world had not been turned aside to so many superstitions as it has been, under colour of false miracles. Whereof comes it that creatures are worshipped in Popery, but under the colour of false miracles? O (say they) such a Saint has done a miracle. And under that colour Gods glory must be diminished, insomuch that look how many miracles there are, so many stops are there to withhold the wretched world from coming unto God, and they be even fond gazing stocks also to make men stand pouring upon that creatures. Therefore does it stand us on hand to mark the things so much the better, which are told us hereby Moses: that is to wit that by miracles God will have himself only to be known without matching of any companion with him. He will have his glory to shine forth in such wise, as men shall stoop to him alone, and yield him all that prominence. To be short, (as Moses said here) he will have men to know that there is none other but he, neither above nor beneath. According whereunto he forwarns us here to make any undergods or mean gods, and does us to understand that the sovereign God will keep his state still, so as he will not abide that men shall in any wise abase it, nor diminish his Majesty, nor part his offices among his creatures, to allot any piece or portion of it, be it never so small, to one or other: No no, he will continue alone by himself. Thus you see what we have to mark in effect as concerning those words of Moses.

But now let us come back again to make a short conclusion of the chief matter which I have touched: which is, that Gods declaring of his strength and power in such wise, was to the intent he might be discerned from all the idols of the world, and that his people might be tied to the religion that he had delivered them. Nevertheless it belongs to us also, and in very deed it behooves us to apply it to ourselves. And surely seeing that God has authorized his law by so many miracles: let us assure ourselves he delivered not a doctrine of two or three days, but such a one as should continue for ever: in so much that the ratifying which he added unto it, ought to have full force even among us at this day. Is Gods Law abated, I mean as in respect of the substance? It is true that the Ceremonies are no more in use: they were all laid down at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. But as for the doctrine of the Law, which contains the promises of salvation, the covenant whereby God has chosen those whom he will have to be of his Church, that records of that forgiveness of our sins, and finally his will of that to show us the true rule of good life: all this continues still, and shall continue to the worlds end. Wherefore let us mark well that all the miracles and wonders that were wrought in delivering the people of Israel out of Egypt, do serve us at this day for a confirmation to cause us to receive Gods Law with all reverence, and to assure and warrant us that it is not a doctrine of mans devise, but of Gods own thundering down from heaven. Let that serve for one point.

But yet notwithstanding, we have a greater confirmation given us in our Lord Jesus Christ. For God has appeared more visibly in him, than he did to the father's in the time of the Law. We know that the whole fullness of the Godhead dwells in Jesus Christ, and that the same has been known well enough in him. Since it is so then: we may better assure ourselves now a days, than the Jews could in their time, that we have one God, of whom we ought not to doubt, and that we have such a Religion as was not not invented by man, and that we ought not to go at all adventure, but that we have a most sure way to walk in. And here you see whereof we ought to glory. For surely it is an inestimable benefit, that we stand not in a mannering, to say, I would fain do well but I ought not how: but are fully persuaded that God allows our doings, and that we have to do with the living God: and may take upon us to compare ourselves with all the wretched idolaters and infidels throughout the whole world. True it is that the Papists pretend to worship the same God that we do: but we see how they swerve from Gods word. And therefore it stands us on hand to put the thing in vre which I have spoken of heretofore: that is to wit, that it is not enough for us to conceive some Majesty of God, but we must also learn which is he, to the intent we wander not away in our own imaginations. For that is the thing wherein we differ from the Papists and the Jews. The Jews can say well enough that they worship that God of Abraham, and that they have the law that was given by Moses: but in the meanwhile they have renounced Jesus Christ who is the end of the law, and they have the veil that blindfolds their eyes, & moreover they have so perverted Gods service, that they be strayed quite and clean from the right way. Likewise the Papists will say that they worship God, and him whom he has sent: to be the Redeemer of the world: but yet for all that, men see how they have transfigured God, and abolished his service, they & made a hotchpotch of all the superstitions of the Heathen, with the Religion that God ordained. To be short, there is nothing but uncleanes among them in that behalf. In respect whereof, you see we ought so much the more to acknowledge the infinite grace of our God towards us, in that he has so schooled us out from among the unbelievers. And, we must also mark the mean: which is, that we have not only the miracles to prove that there is a God in heaven: but also that doctrine wherein God shows himself fully to us, to the intent we should know him, and not have our eyes bleared any more, nor run roving here and there: but follow the doctrine that our God has given us, and whereby it is his will to draw us to him.

Thus you see that the mean for us to put this saying of Moseses in vre, is not to look only to the miracles that have been wrought for the ratifying of the Law: but to go to the Gospel, and there to perceive that God has showed himself to us again in far greater perfection than he did to that fathers of old time. Besides this, let us bear that in mind the warning that I spake of before: namely that when we once know the miracles whereby God vouchsafed to confirm his Majesty: we must repair to his word, assuring ourselves that that is the very mean whereby God draws us to him. Therefore whensoever we have Gods word preached unto us, let us understand that it is a confirmation to assure us that he reigns over us. And therefore let us take heed that we make our profit thereby, seeing he grants us this grace and privilege, which (as we see) is not common to all men. And let us pray him to seal the doctrine in our hearts by his holy spirit, which we hear without fleshy ears, that seeing he has once called us to the knowing of him, he will increase the same more and more, and so guide us as we may rather look up to heaven than pore upon the creatures and things that are mortal. Therefore let us have a constant and invincible faith in God which has once manifested himself to us, so as we may defy Satan and all the abuses and errors that may have been brought in by men.

According to this holy doctrine we will cast ourselves down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, as it may bring us to true repentance: and we therewithal acknowledge the grace and benefits which he has powered out upon us, so as we may know better to make our profit by them than we have done, and not be negligent in considering his works, but diligent therein as becomes us: and moreover so receive the doctrine that is daily preached unto us, as we may apply our eyes to the discerning of the things that are daily showed us, and our good God make us to find his power and goodness by experience, as he has done to others in all ages, by that we may be the better confirmed in the love and obedience which we owe him, so as we may never be turned from it whatsoever the Devil may practice to turn us away from it. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

On Wednesday, the 5th of June 1555

The twenty eighth Sermon, which is the tenth upon the fourth Chapter

36 He made you to hear his voice from heaven, to instruct you withall: and on earth he showed you his great fire,& you heardest his words out of the midst of the fire.

37 Because he loved your fathers and chose their seed after them, he made you to come out of Egypt in his presence, by his great power:

Told you heretofore that if God had but only wrought miracles when he brought his people out of Egypt, it would have been to small purpose: for they had had no instruction to lead them to right knowledge. But in as much as his word was matched with them, now there wanted nothing at all. And that is the cause why Moses exhorts the people yet again, to consider how it is long of none but themselves that they know not God, yea even to attain to the heritage, not only of the land of promise, but also of the kingdom of heaven. Furthermore he tells them that Gods word had such majesty, as the people had no cause to doubt but it was God that spake it. Assure yourself (said he) that the voice which you heardest was not a human or earthly voice: but you God spake as it were from heaven. It is true that the voice founded from the midst of the fire that was seen upon the mountain: but here Moses means that the doctrine was not dark, forasmuch as God gave certain signs of his majesty, to the end that the peoples faith might be assured thoroughly. And for the same cause does he use the word instruction, which signifies not only to teach with words, but also to train on with often chastisement. As if he should you're your God in this case has as it were held you in awe, so as it is not now lawful for you to despise his law as though it came from an uncertain place. For why? It has sovereign authority, you canst not but thereby perceive that God has declared himself to you, to the intent you shouldest worship his majesty and do him homage. Now then we see that the effect of the things which Moses declares hereto the Jews, is that God had given them visible signs at hand, and as it were familiarly, to the end that his word should have due reverence, and be received obediently, and all things be done to the instruction of the people. And although Moses rehearse but the things that were done in mount Horeb, where the law was put forth: yet may we gather a general doctrine thereof. For we see how God stoops to our infirmity. Because we cannot mount so high as to come unto him, he comes down to our slender capacity. Seeing that he does so, ought not we to be the more provoked to submit ourselves to him? and if we do not, shall it not be cast in our teeth, that there was no let in him that we had not means and helps to instruct us with all? But what for that? Instead of coming to God, we have turned our back upon him and rebelled against him. Wherefore let us consider after what manner God applies himself to our rudeness, that we may be the more moved to resort unto him. And besides that, let us refer all things to the same end that Moses notes here: which is, that forasmuch as God is so gracious to us as to show us his truth: we must embrace it, assuring ourselves that it grows not in the world, but comes from heaven. Therefore let the doctrine of salvation be received among us with all obedience. For else it is to no purpose for us to protest that we call upon God and are willing to honor and serve him. For the proof that he requires thereof, is that we should hearken quietly to his word, and that our faith should be quietly settled, so as we resemble not the unbelievers, who are always doubting: but stand upon this sure foundation; that it is God which speaks it, & therefore it is not lawful for us to reply against it, but we must submit ourselves wholly in all points to that which he said. Thus you see what we have remember upon this place.

And herewithall let us mark when this was treated of. For it is not without cause that Moses speaks of this instruction. Why so? For if we be not subdued, it is hard for us to submit ourselves to God: nay rather we draw clean back from him. Therefore must our Lord be fain to correct this lostiness in us: and when he sees us after that sort, either rebellious, or stubborn, or that we be dull upon the spur: he must use such means as he knows to be fit to reclaim us withal. We see how Moses said here, that the wonders which were wrought at the publishing of the Law, served as it were for a nurturing, to the intent that the people should no more be so unruly as they had been before, but become more fit to be taught. But this vice reigned not among the Jews only: it is to be found continually among all men. Therefore let us learn to make our own profit of the things that our Lord has given us for the authorizing of his word, that we play not the wood beasts, but behave ourselves as meek sheep and lambs, to hearken to the voice of our shepherd. This is the thing in effect, which we have to gather upon this place.

And now he said, Because God loved your fathers, therefore has he chosen their seeds after them: howbeit that he say, your seed after him. Moses changes here the number, and not without cause: for after he had spoken of the fathers, he returns to one alone, that is to wit, to Abraham, because it was he with whom God made the covenant. And again it serves to magnify the grace that is mentioned here, as shall be declared anon more at large. The effect of that thing that Moses intends to tell that people, is that it is a great shame for them and that they be inexcusable, if they know not the goodness of their God. And why? Because God of his own free mercy chose them, not for that they were better than other nations, (as shall be showed more at length hereafter) or for that there was more nobleness, worthiness or virtue in them: but for that it pleased him to love their fathers. Now we see that the meaning of Moses was as if he should have said thus: You have here an inestimable benefit above all people, namely that God vouchsafes to reign among you, that he has sanctified you to himself, that you be his Church, that you be his flock, that you be his children, and (as it is said in another place,) that you be a kingly priesthood. Assure yourselves this is not given you for any desert of yours, for have you deserved aught at Gods hand? Are you better than all that rest of the world? No: why then has God given you such privilege? Not for any thing that he has found in you: but because it pleased him of his own good will. And whereof came that? Even of his choosing of your forefathers. You were chosen of him before you were born. And what was the cause that he chose your forefathers? Even his own love, (said he): that is to say, because he marked them of his own free mercy, to fhoule them out from the rest of the world: yea even at such time as Abraham was barren, and already stricken in years, and as good as decayed and half dead, when as yet he had no issue at all. And yet for all this, God chose him, so as that poor old fellow became the wellspring of your forefathers. Seeing then that God has chosen you after such a sort, you see there is none other cause of the coming of salvation unto you, but only his mere goodness. Now therefore consider how much you be bound to your God, and be not unthankful to him, neither suffer such a benefit to slip from you, so as you should be bereft thereof through your own lewdness and unthankfulness. This in effect is the doctrine that is contained in this place.

Now, that we may fare the better by it, we have to mark first of all, that when God calls us to be of his Church, so as he makes us partakers of the Gospel, and of the things depending upon the same: it is not for that we went to him beforehnad, but because he has chosen us. The word Chose is set down here to express the better that that thing came not of the people themselves, but that God was the first beginner thereof. That is one point which we ought to mark well. For it is not only here that the holy Ghost speaks thereof: but all the whole scripture is full of that doctrine: namely, of telling us that we must not seek the cause of our salvation in ourselves, as who should say we were better than other men. We see that God gives not his graces indifferently to all men: but that to set the greater show upon his goodness, he gives that thing to one man which he denies to another. We see that most men are destitute of the Gospel at this day: and we see that even where it is preached, most folk are as good as blind and deaf still. Now when the Gospel is preached in any place, it is a kind of choosing, and it is the very same that Moses speaks of here. Seeing then that God causes his word to rain upon us, so as we have our fill of it every day: and in the mean season other much greater, and nobler Cities want it and are destitute of it: let us understand that this so great benefit comes not of our own seeking, neither have we obtained it by our own travel or policy: but it is GOD that has chosen us to it of his own mercy. Mark that for one point.

Again, whereas it pleases him to give us faith, so as we take of his word, and are thoroughly fed with it, and it touches us inwardly at the very heart: let us understand that that is a second sort of choosing which God makes of us. So then, let us yield him his deserved praise, for in withholding it from him we be traitors to him, and we bereave him of the thing that belongs him, alone unto him: and in so doing we set up ourselves as Idols in his stead. For a man cannot take a greater honor to himself, than to bear himself in hand that he is the author of his own salvation, and that it is he that prevents God. If we imagine so, it is a defacing of Gods glory. And therefore let us bear this lesson well in mind.

Howbeit forasmuch as men are malicious, & when they cannot abolish Gods praise altogether, they darken it as much as they can: Moses excludes here expressly all worthiness of persons, and all desert of works, in saying, it is the love of God. For it is not enough, for us to know that God has chosen us to himself: but we must also know what it is that moved him thereto, and how he was induced there unto. Did he seek the cause of it out of himself? No: but his own love was the cause that he chose us. Now when the scripture speaks of Gods love: it means due free favor which he bears towards us, so as he respects not our persons nor services, nor aught else that we can bring. Since it is so, let us consider here Gods goodness two ways. For so, first of all when we have his Gospel preached among us, and his Sacraments, whereby he gathers us as it were into his fold, whereby, and shows himself to be our shepherd; it is (say I) a choosing of us for the which we be greatly bound unto him: in so much that our maliciousness must needs be called in our teeth, and be called to account to receive horrible vengeance, if we make no reckoning of so great a grace as he has bestowed upon us. Therefore let us make much of the benefit that we enjoy, that is to wit, of Gods gathering us here together in his name, to be as his household folk.

But there is yet a second choosing: which is when every of us perceives that God has enlightened him by his holy spirit and made us to rail his word, so as we stick to it by faith, and that he has grassed us into to the body of Jesus Christ, to the end we should be taken & held for members of him: which thing we must understand comes not of ourselves, nor of our own power: but of Gods will, which vouchsafed to mark us out. And why? Let us not make long circuits to find some reason in ourselves: but let us hold us contented with the free love of our God, for he is not bound to any man. He might destroy all mankind by his justice: but yet for all that, he has pity upon us. And whereas he pities not all alike, but lets whom he lift alone: therein he intends to give the greater show of his goodness (as I have said already) to the end that we should compare ourselves with others and say, Wherefore am I one of gods elect? I should have been as other are, if God had not reached me his hand. And what moved him to do it? His own mere goodness. This comparison then must induce us to glorify our God, when we see that he has stretched out his mightily arm over us. And so we see, that that doctrine was not uttered only for the instruction on of the people of old time: but that the same is common to us also at this day.

Remember (said Moses) that your God has chosen you. And why? Because he loved your fathers. And the same also is the cause why that in that high and excellent redemption which was made by our Lord Jesus Christ, the scripture sends us to the love of God: for that is the only wellspring. God so loved the world that he spared not his only son. What is the cause then that Jesus Christ is come to be our Savior? What is the cause that the salvation which he purchased for us, is preached nowadays unto us? What is the very cause that faith is given us, and that God enlightens us by his holy spirit? We must always resort to this ground, that it is because God loved us. It is true that Saint John said generally, that he loved the world. And why? For Jesus Christ offers himself generally to all men without exception to be their redeemer. It is said afterward in the covenant, that God loved the world when he sent his only son: but he loved us, us (I say) which have been taught by his Gospel, because he gathers us to him. And the faithful that are enlightened by the holy Ghost, have yet a third use of Gods love, in that he reveals himself more familiarly to them, and seals up his fatherly adoption by his holy spirit, and engraves it in their hearts. Now then let us in all cases learn to know this love of God, & when we be once come to it, let us go no further. Thus we see three degrees of the love that god has showed us in our Lord Jesus Christ. The first is in respect of the redemption that was purchased in the person of him that gave himself to death for us, and became accused to reconcile us to God his father. That is the first degree of love, which extends to all men, inasmuch as Jesus Christ reaches out his arms to call and assure all men both great and small, and to win them to him. But there is a special love for those to whom the Gospel is preached: which is that God testifies unto them that he will make them partakers of that benefit that was purchased for them by the death and passion of his son. And forasmuch as we be of that number, therefore are we double bound already to our God: here are two bonds which hold us as it were straight tied unto him. Now let us come to the third bond, which depends upon the third love that God shows us: which is, that he not only causes the gospel to be preached unto us, but also makes us to feel the power thereof, so as we know him to be our father & savior, not doubting but that our sins are forgiven us for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake, who brings us the gift of the holy Ghost, to reform us after his own image. When as God does so imprint in our hearts the doctrine that is preached unto us by the mouths of men: let us understand that he shows us a third love. True it is, that to speak properly, God has not diverse affections: we must not imagine so: but I handle these matters according to our capacity, and we must consider of Gods love according to our slenderness, because we cannot attain to his high majesty as I said before, and therefore even he himself also utters himself to us according to our ability. And so we see now that Gods love is uttered and showed unto us evidently three ways in our Lord Jesus Christ: the the cheefe whereof are when we have the Gospel preached, and that faith is added unto it therewithal.

And as I said, when we once have this free love of God, we must go no further. For we see what has happened to all such as have not held themselves in such soberness. And surely when men are inquisitive why God loves some more than othersome: it proceeds of a certain pride and spite, in that they cannot abide that the whole praise of their salvation should rest in god alone. Men seek always to challenge somewhat to themselves. And therefore when it is told them that God calls those whom he has chosen, and that he chooses whom he lifts of his own free goodness: they will needs fall to scanning, how so? Why does God prefer one before another? When they debate after that manner, it is not a simple inquisitiveness, but a pride as I said, because they would fain be esteemed and find somewhat in themselves wherewith to deface Gods mere mercy: And therefore it is good justice that Satan should afterward blear their eyes, & set many fancies before them. And that is the very cause that makes them to go always seeking, that God chooses those whom he foresaw to be such as would become worthy of his grace. Again, such as dare not allege altogether their own deservings, do say that they attain to faith because God foresaw that they would be faithful, and therefore reserved them to himself. So then, by that means faith should proceed of men's works. But such men do indeed show that they be as it were blockish, when they make such conclusions: and yet notwithstanding a great part of the world stands upon that point, and is still blinded therewith. But as for us, let us learn that whensoever Gods love is set before us we must wholly hold us to it and rest upon it, so as it must wholly suffice us that God is righteous, and yet notwithstanding not bound to any person, but at his free liberty to choose whom he lifts, because he receives them to mercy. For it is to the same purpose that he said to Moses, as S. Paul alleges, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have pity on whom I have pity. As if he should say, let not men fall to controlling of me in this case, nor be so malapert as to ask why I show not mercy to all men: or why all are not dealt with alike, or why I choose one and leave another. Let them not dispute so with me: for I have power to use my free goodness where I lift, and they must stoop to me: And whosoever dares repine at it, shall finally be confounded in his own pride. Therefore to be short, let us learn to glorify our God. After what manner? Even for his choosing of us. As for the cast aways, it is certain that they will do nothing but grind their teeth, to blasphemy GOD, and we see it to be so. But where unto does Moses bring us back? He said not that they which are chosen shall glorify God for anything that they have of their own. How is it then that God will be glorified at our hands? Even in this, that we beholding the benefits which he has bestowed upon us, should not exalt ourselves above others, thinking ourselves to be better or more noble and excellent than our neighbors: but acknowledge that he does all those things of his own free goodness. This is the doctrine which we have to gather upon this text.

And it is said here that God chose Abraham's seed after him, because of the love that had gone long time before. And this serves for a larger proof of the thing that I have touched: accordingly to Saint Paul's saying, that if God show mercy to men before they be born, & before they have done either good or evil: it is an excluding of all deserts. And that is well worth the marking. For God having chosen to himself the seed of Abraham because of the adoption that had been made: has yet a narrower choice, as has been declared already. For Esau was of Abrahams lineage as well as Jacob: and so was Ismael as well as Isaac: and yet you see that both of them were cut off from Gods covenant, and his adoption abides in the house of the others. What is the cause thereof? Gods choice, which I termed a testimony of a more straight and dear love, which is the first, and which also I placed in the redemption made by Jesus Christ: and I placed the preaching of the Gospel in the second degree. But forasmuch as here is no speaking but of the covenant that God made with Abraham: it is a general covenant that extends to all his lineage. Therefore all they that came of Abraham's seed are comprehended under that covenant which God had made. God in respect of himself, knew who belonged to his election: but yet for all that, anon after, he schooled out those whom he thought good, and took whom he listed to be of his household. Forasmuch then as we see it is so: Let us bear in mind that God continues his mercy to a thousand generations, as he himself said. And yet notwithstanding let us assure ourselves that in so doing his mind alters not. When he sets up his Church in any place, he does it not upon some sudden braid, but because he loved our fathers. Likewise nowadays when we have the Gospel preached and the Sacraments ministered: whence should we think that comes? First we must understand, that the gospel was preached through the whole world, and that our forefather were gathered into God's flock, to be made partakers of the salvation that was brought by Jesus Christ. Nevertheless by reason of their unthankfulness and wicked dealing, the devil got the upper hand or the world, so as there ensued horrible darkness and all things were put out of order. But now God has as it were raised up his word again: and what has moved him to it? Even the performance of his promise. For when he had once extended his covenant through the whole world: it was his will to renew it again, because of the promise that he had made before. And if it be demanded wherefore God would have his Gospel preached after that sort: it was for that it pleased him to come near to such as lived at that time, because he had chosen them before they were born. Again we must understand that the accomplishment of the fullness of time whereof the scripture speaks, is not ground upon men, but upon the good pleasure of God. We must come to this point, that God had ordained the preaching of his Gospel in his own everlasting purpose: and that our attaining to the possession of so great a benefit at this day by the virtue of that unchangeable ordinance, is because he had called our fathers before we were born, & that when they had made themselves unworthy of the kingdom or heaven, and banished themselves from it as much as in them lay: yet notwithstanding God vouchsafed to call us again, and all through his own free goodness. Thus you see what we have to mark where it is said, that God chose the seed of Abraham after him.

And by the way let us call to mind the thing that I have touched already, that is to wit, that Abraham was alone as the Prophet Esay upbraids the Jews. The truth is that he exhorts them to be of good cheer, though they be scattered abroad and cast down. Have an eye (said he) to the quarry whence you were taken, and unto your original. What was it? was it a great and infinite people? No: It was a silly old man all alone without child or issue. Behold, your mother Sara was barren all the time of her life, and her age was a further let that she might not conceive: and yet has God taken you out of that quarry that is to say, of one man alone. Why then should you be afraid though you were utterly consumed. But yet for all this, he upbraids them with their unthankfulness, because they trusted still in their own greatness, and if there were any likelihood at all, by and by it puffed them up. And therefore let us learn by this text, first that Gods choosing of our forefathers, was not for any worthiness or choosing nobility in themselves: but because he had pity on them, which pitying imports that they were in wretched case, and had been utterly forlorn, if God had not gathered them into the hope which they could never have conceived of themselves. Mark that for one point.

And secondly if we see Gods Church scattered, so as we be few in number, and it seems that there is no certainty nor assurance for us, but all is like to go to havoc in that turning of a hand: Let it not dismay us. And why so? For God having once chosen Abraham did also multiply his seed, notwithstanding that he was a man stricken in years, drooping, and childless. So likewise now, although there be but a handful of us, and we be despised and without power or strength to maintain ourselves. yet can God increase us, and having increased us he can preserve us. Wherefore let us learn to look wholly to his goodness, when the state of the Church lies in hazard, and let us not e out of heart: but although that to the worldward we see it cast down, and so diminished as it seems as good as nothing at all: yet let us not cease to be of good courage still, and to wait till God perform that which he has done in all ages. For the manner of setting up of the Church in good state again, and of the preserving thereof, must be wonderful to the sight of men.

Now after that Moses has spoken so, he adds, Your God chose you, even of purpose to bring you out of the land of Egypt, before his face. He shows that the deliverance of the people out of the land of Egypt, proceeded of the said election, and consequently of Gods free love. And it is a point which we ought to mark well. For it behooves us to be led from one thing to another. As for example, when God does us any good, we do indeed perceive his goodness: but we must mount yet higher. Wherefore has GOD provided so for us? not for any worthiness or desert of ours: but because he had chosen us. And when or wherefore chose he us? We must not range any further, but hold ourselves to this ground of Moseses. But in any wise let us mark whereof he speaks, that we may the better make our profit thereby. Your God delivered you out of the land of Egypt, because he had chosen you before, yea even before you were born. In so saying he shows, that although this redemption was (to see to) but a deliverance of the body: yet was it a figure of that salvation that God had promised before in the person of the Redeemer: and although the delivery of the people of Israel out of the land of Egypt, was but as a temporal redemption: yet does Moses say that it depended upon Gods free bestowed adoption. Seeing it is so in that case: what is to be thought now, when we be to be brought out of the gulfs of hell to be conveyed into heaven? (For by nature we be cursed, and plunged in the gulfs of hell:) are we able to get thence? Does it not belong only unto God to deliver us thence? And if it were meete that God should choose the people of Israel to deliver them from the tyranny of Pharaoh: let us conclude, that by a more strong reason it was meete that when he should deliver us from the bondage of the devil and from the bottomless pits of hell: he should declare this unto us: that he had chosen and adopted us. Wherefore let us not only take hold of the death and passion which our Lord Jesus Christ suffered for us, and of his saving of us by his grace: but also let us come to the mean degree, namely that the cause why we be made partakers of the salvation that Jesus Christ has brought us, is for that GOD has adopted us. And when did he that? After he had found some virtue or some good forwardness in us? no: but before we were born, and before we had done either good or bad, yea even at such time as we were already vowed and given up to endless destruction. This is it which we have to note in the first place.

Nevertheless it is not for nought that Moses said also, that God brought out the people before his face; if he should say, he was their guide. For had GOD reached out his hand to his people but for once, and thenceforth have let them alone: to what purposes had that been? Lt is not enough for a mother to help up her young child when he is fallen faine down: for he may fall a hundred thousand times; and in the end break his neck: but she must hold him up still. Even so our Lord declares that it was not enough for him to have showed himself to be a deliverer of his people for a day or two: but he held on still, and conveyed them before his face, as a man that has his eye continually upon his child. To be short, he shows here that his goodness abode with the people even to the end so as he held on in helping and succoring them, and maintained them throughout. And why? for else his bringing of them out of the land of Egypt had been in vain.

And afterward he adds, To destroy people mightier and stronger than they, that their land might be given them to inherit. He shows that God ceased not to go through with his favor towards the Jews, till he had performed the promise that he made to their fathers: that is to wit, of putting them in possession of the land of Chanaan as he had promised. But (as I have said already) we must compare ourselves with the state of that people. And therefore let us learn, that God not only draws us out of the gulf of hell, and out of only the cursedness wherein we were born, and which would hold us always locked under his wrath: but also holds on and continues his goodness towards us, so as he will not miss but have his eye still upon us, to watch over us unto the end. And if our Lord had not such a care to defend us: in what taking were we? Should not the devil snatch us up taking every minute of an hour? We see he trots up and down seeking ever to devour, and he has means to do it. And could we scape his paws if we were not defended from them by that goodness of our God? So then let us understand, that God does not only begin our salvation, and then let us alone to shift for ourselves: but that he goes through with us as long as we have need, and performs the thing that he has begun. Thus does he keep us always in his sight: that is to say, he never forgets us, but considers our necessities, to provide for them and to remedy them in due season. Now if God have his eyes so open to think upon us, that he may succour us at our need: Let us on our side also walk as before his face. And let us mark that we cannot hide ourselves from him: and therefore seeing he yields us such favor and honor as to have a care of us: it is good reason that all our life should be answerable thereunto. And so, Gods goodness ought so little to make us negligent, that it should rather spur us forward to repair to him with an earnest mind. Indeed a man shall see some dogs and swine that will defame this doctrine of Election. When it is told them that God knows which are his, and that he will never suffer them to perish: very well (say they), then will I cease to do well: and so they mock at God and his doctrine, showing indeed they that they never will what the word Election or Choice means. But as for us, we must take assurance by Gods grace, to live warely and circumspectly: and good reason have we to humble ourselves, considering that we were damned and forlorn, and our God has delivered us, and moreover showed himself so bountiful towards us as to make us heirs of his kingdom, even us that were the bond slaves of Satan. And on the other side it stands us on hand to walk in fear, seeing we can do nothing at all of ourselves, further-forth than Gods grace utters itself in us. Again it behooves us to pray unto him, forasmuch as if he should let us alone from the one end to the other, whereas we be now advanced up aloft, we should tumble into the pit every minute of an hour. Therefore we have cause here to call upon our God, and to resort under his protection. Furthermore seeing it is said that he guides us and keeps watch for our welfare: it becomes us to be the more wakened to walk as in his presence, knowing that he marks, not only all our doings, but also our affections, and thoughts. Besides this, seeing that Moses knits here the deliverance of the Israelites out of Egypt, with their possessing of the land of Chanaan: Let us mark well that God will have all his benefits linked together which he bestows upon us, until we be brought to the full perfection of our salvation. For it is not to be thought that God lets us alone when he has once called us unto himself, so as we should be in danger of being left up to the spoil: but contrariwise let us mark, that he will go through with the thing that he has begun, as S. Paul declares in the first to the Philippians, where he says that this his calling of us, imports a warranties that we shall never be left destitute of his defense, until he have brought us to everlasting salvation. Thus you see that the thing which we have to bear in mind, is that as God is the beginner of our salvation, so is he the finisher thereof also.

And as touching Moseses interlacing of Gods destroying and driving out of people that were stronger and mightier than they: it is true that God used an extraordinary manner of dealing, in his rooting out of the Chanaanites and such other like as dwelt in the country which the Jews possessed: but yet have we cause to think upon the like at this day. For whether is it that we ought to go? whether does our Lord call us? To the heavenly life from whence even the very Angels are fain. For we know that the devils, which as now are not only banished from the glory of the heavenly kingdom, but also appointed to horrible damnation, were sometime as the children of God, and held the room where into our Lord calls us at this day. And now, are we worthier than the Angels which fell in that sort from above? Moreover, if we come but to men: were not the Jew a holy lineage? Sprang they not of the root of Abraham? Yes: and what are we on our side? did the kingdom of heaven belong to us? No: no more than to the wild Cannibals. But yet those natural children and as it were lawful heirs by that adoption of their fathers, are cast off and banished from the salvation whereunto God calls us at this time. They be driven out, and we succeed as it were in an empty place. Have not we cause then to magnify the grace that God shows us in these days? Does it not appear that this text serves not only for the Jews, but also ought rather to be applied to our use at this day? Then let us understand, that seeing God has chosen us to himself, we ought in any wise to be wholly his, & to continue settled in the possession of his grace, howbeit not by walking in statelines & presumption, so as we should be proud of it: but by acknowledging with all lowliness, that we hang wholly upon the free goodness of our GOD. And let us not cease to assure ourselves that he will go through with the thing that he has begun in us, at leastwise if we abide under the guiding of his hand, to suffer ourselves to be ruled by him.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to rid us of them by forgiving them for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake: and therewithal to work in such sort as we may daily labor to renounce all our wicked lusts, and whatsoever else hinders us to serve him, and altogether to rule ourselves according to his commandments. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, &c.

On Monday the 16th of June 1555

The twenty ninth Sermon which is the eleventh upon the fourth Chapter 59 Understand therefore this day, and lay it up in your heart, that the Lord is God in heaven above, and upon the earth beneath, and there is none other but he.

40 And keep his ordinances and commandments which I command you this day, that it may go well with you and with your children after you, and you that you may just prolong your days in the land which the Lord your God gives you forever.

41 Then Moses severed three Cities beyond Jordan towards the sun rising.

42 That the manslayer might flee thither, that had slain his neighbor unwillingly, and not hated him before: who by fleeing to one of those Cities, should be in safety.

43 Namely, Bozor in the wilderness in the plain country, among the Rubenites: and Ramoth in Galaad among the Gadites: and Golam in Basan among the Manassites.

T was showed yesterday, that we must assure ourselves that God will continue his goodness towards us, and that when he has once begun, we must not doubt but he will show himself Savior unto the end. When we have found him such a one, we must walk on in the said trust, that we may call upon him all our life long: for else we should be saved but for a day, and that were all one as if God had never showed himself to us at all. Therefore our hope must extend to the time coming, and when God has rid us from Satans tyranny wherein we were to make us enjoy his heritage, we must hold on still as Moses said here. True it is that God has not brought us out of Egypt, but he has delivered us from the bondage of the devil and of death. And therefore let us trust that he will lead us to the place that he has promised us, that is to wit, to the immortal life. But in the meanwhile we must consider to what end he calls us, and to what end he bestows so many gifts upon us: namely to the end that we should serve him all our life long. And that is the thing which Moses adds as now, and which was touched also as yesterday: namely that our trusting in God must not make us idle and slothful, but rather the more inflame us to love and fear him.

Therefore he said here, understands you this day, and think well upon it in your hear, and bear it in remembrance, that there is none other God but the everlasting, neither above nor beneath. The cheese intent of Moses is to show, that Gods reaching of us his hand unto us, it not to the end that we should have no care to honor him: but rather that we should bend ourselves wholly thereunto, and that we pursuing how he has honored us so highly as to choose us for his people, should show in very deed by our serving of him as our God, that his so doing is not in vain. That is that meaning of Moses. But yet therewithal he does us to understand, that we shall never be able to yield God his due honor, until we know him. For if we imagine new Gods of our own head, we disguise the living God, and bereave him of his chief honor. I say he is disguised, when we attribute that thing to the creatures, which is peculiar to him alone, and it is alone as if we did make idols, though we confess it not with our mouths, as a great number do deal, which can protest well enough that their intent is to have no more but the only God, and yet notwithstanding fail not to rob him of the things that are peculiar to his majesty dealing them to the creatures at their own pleasure, as though it were some booty. When GOD is so spoiled, it is all one as if men should set up idols in despite of him. And so you see wherefore Moses said, Now understand that the Lord is God both above and beneath, and that there is none other. Here is the foundation where upon we must ground Gods service: namely to know that he cannot abide any companion, but that we must discern him from all men's devices and imaginations, to a say, This is the GOD that has revealed himself unto us. And Moses exhorts the people to think upon it that they might bear it in mind. For if we have not that care with us, we shall wonder to see how soon some wicked fancy will take place in our head. If such as know the truth do not stick to it, and walk warely and carefully, they shall soon let themselves run at rovers. And why? For naturally we be inclined to leasings, and thereto we be so wavering as is pity to see. Therefore it is not enough for us to have known the true living God for a time: but we must daily think upon the thing that is told us, and we must continually renew the remembrance of it. For otherwise we shall be at our wits end to see what superstition will step in our way. Then let us mark well, that it is a continual exercise for us all our life long, to know which is our true GOD that has manifested himself unto us.

And now that Moses has spoken so of knowledge: he shows that our confessing with our mouth and our feeling also with our heart that there is but only one GOD is nothing worth: unless we show by our deeds that we take him for our father, our master, and him, to whom we belong. And for the same cause he says that he has given us his laws, commandments, and statutes. So then, we see that the knowing of God is not a dead and uneffectual thing: but that it ought to pervade with us, so as we may show that we have been schooled by Gods word, by keeping his laws and commandments. The end therefore where unto God has chosen us of his own free goodness, and the end where unto he maintains us, and continues his grace towards us is this: that we should glorify him not only with our mouths, but also with our whole life. But here is yet one word more to be noted? which is, that Moses adds that he sets before Gods people, his laws & commandments: wherein he bereaves them of all excuse of ignorance. As if he should say, you cannot allege that you know not how to serve God: for I do show you his will, and therefore strive not against him. So then after as our Lord grants us the grace to be taught purely by his word, let us mark that we be the more bound unto him, and the less to be excused, so as it is not for us to use any shifting. For whereof is it long that we yield him not his due praise, and that we live not as we ought to do, seeing he teaches us what to do, and shows how we ought to live? Wherefore let us labor to make the doctrine powerful which is daily preached unto us, assuring ourselves that the preaching thereof is to the end that God should be the better honored among us. This is the effect of that which is set down here.

Now it is set down consequently, that before they passed Jordan, Moses consequently did sever out three Cities in the land that had been conquered from the Amorrhits, (as we have seen heretofore)& from their neighbors, as the land of Basan: and those three Cities, were appointed for such to fly unto as had slain anybody through unadvisedness. This Law is declared more fully in other places: and thence must we fetch the exposition of this present text. God had said and ordained, that if a man bearing no hatred to another man, did flee him unadvisedly, that is to say by chance medley (as they term it) without pretended purpose: he (should not be punished. For why? the man slaughters that are punishable must either be willful, or else proceed of revenge, or of spite, or of lying in wait which is worst, & greatest fault of all. But if a man seeing nobody did shoot an arrow & hit a man, & the man died: this man slaughter was not punishable as a felony. Nevertheless God would not have it simply pardoned: and that was for two causes. The one was to the end that men should in any wise mislike of any murder and the shedding of mans blood: and the other was that the kinfolk of the party that was slain should not be provoked to revenge: And therefore God had ordained that he which had given the stroke should get himself out of the way, and keep himself as a prisoner till the death of the high Priest: And then had he as it were a Jubilee, so that when there was once a new high Priest, then the party that had so fled to the place appointed, whether it were at the end of ten, twenty, or thirty years, might return to his own house if he listed: but until that time, it behooved him to be as a banished man. That is the thing which is spoken of here as now. Moses rehearses not the Law as it was given of God & as it is set down in the book of numbers: but yet in reporting the story, therewithal he gives an inclining of the foresaid law and ordinance as we have said. Now for the better understanding hereof, we must first mark the thing that I touched before: that is to wit, that God abhors murder, insomuch that although he punish not unadvised manslaughters rigorously: yet he chastises them: whereby he shows that he mislikes of bloodshed. This is a thing well worthy to be noted. For first we see thereby, how greatly God loves us: & he shows the cause thereof in the ninth of Genesis, to be for that we be created after his image. He says that the fleeing of a man is the doing of wrong to himself. You see then that God bears us such love, that he takes himself to be wounded and misused in our persons, because he has made us after his own image. And that ought to be a warrant of his great goodness and loving kindness towards us, to make us to trust wholly unto him & to honor him. And so you see whereat we ought to begin, when it is told us that God hates murder and cannot abide it: and therefore that when a man has slain his neighbor willfully, that is to say, either through malice, or quarrelling, or for revenge, or by laying wait for him: he is so detested of God that he is not worthy to live in the world. And in good footh we see the same by another Law, where god curses whole countries for suffering of murders, For it is said there, that if a dead body be found, fears must be made with all diligence, to find out the murderer. Why so? To the intent (said he) that the land be not defiled therewith. We see hereby that if Magistrates and Judges shut their eyes and make no reckoning to punish a murder: it is as a common defiling, which provokes Gods vengeance upon the whole land. And therefore it stands them on hand to consider that God sets great store by men's lives. Again if the door of the wicked deed be not found: let the Judges (said he) make solemn protestation, in this wise: We have inquired diligently whence this murder should proceed, but we cannot find the door thereof, and therefore are we clear and guiltless of it before God. And moreover Gods will was that they should offer sacrifice for the same, Now then we see how loathsome willful murders are before GOD. I call them all willful murders which are committed through treachery or in rage, or howsoever else it be where there was any enmity or variance before. Yea & although it be lawful for men to kill their enemies in the wars that are good and holy: yet does the Scripture use a manner of speech to show us that GOD has always misliked of murdering. For there it is said of a valiant man, howbeit without blaming of him, that he defiled his hands. Is it so? Nay rather it is worthy of praise that a stout fellow being injured to the wars, should go through with his duty. For if he offer no man any wrong, but behave himself valiantly when he comes to the encounter, does that deserve blame? No: but as I said before, Gods meaning is to show us, that we ought to tender our neighbors lives in such sort, as not to wish their death, nor to further the same, unless we intend to violate his image. That is the thing in effect, which is here set out unto us. Now then if God do so abhor the manslaughters that are committed when men assail as we seem to have just cause to defend ourselves: I pray you what is to be said to it when men fall to quarrelling with their neighbors, & will needs shed blood of set purpose? What means this? Suppose we that Gods curse is not doubled upon the land, when such crimes are borne withal and maintained? It is said that if a murder be let pass, and the doer of escapes unknown, Gods wrath is thereby provoked: and if the murder be known, then is it a more heinous crime to let him escape unpunished. But if a thief lie in wait for a man that mistrusts no such thing, and sets upon him: is it not a plain spiting of God, if that be suffered? And if it be not any one man that is assaulted, but there are such over lusty mates as will say, let us kill and flea, & when they have their swords out, they care not against how many they draw, but make a common havoc, and such slaughter as all is on a gore blood: are not the folks that stir up such broils, worse than the thieves and robbers in the woods? Men will at leastwise mistrust thieves in a forest: but [who would think] that where there should be civil order, where Laws [ought to] reign, where there is a feat of Justice: there men would fill all things with blood, and violate so many images of God as come in their way, & that the same should be suffered? I pray you is it not a bewraying that we be loth that GOD should bewraying reign among us, or have us under his protection? Yes. Therefore let us mark well what is said here concerning willful murders, how there is no pardon for them, but God will have them rooted out of the world and executed by Justice, which have violated his image. And why? To the intent we should always bear in mind the thing that I spoke of before, that is to wit, how greatly he loves us, and that for as much as he has adopted us to be his children, he will have a continual care of us, and keep us as charily as the Apple of his eye, as he speaks by his Prophet Zachary. Now if it be so that we desire God (as the holy Ghost teaches us) to keep us as the Apple of his eye, that is to say, as the tenderest and delicatest part of him: I pray you ought not we to gather thereby, that seeing he loves us, he will have us also to love one another, yea even with more than brotherly love? Yes: and therefore let us learn to abstain from all wrong and outrage. Moreover when so ever any murder is committed, or when so ever any folk are so wicked and cruel as to go about to shed mans blood: let us make account of them, not only as enemies to men, but also as deadly enemies only to God, for as much as he showed himself to be their adversary, and tells us that he takes it as an assaulting of him in his own person, and in his own Majesty. That is the thing which we have to mark.

And here withal we must pass yet further. For we know how S. John said, that whosoever hated his neighbor in his heart, is a murderer before God. True it is that we must in any wise keep our hands clean from all injury and outrage: but yet must our heart also be pure and clean before God. If it be not so: we shall be blamed, not for drawing of our swords, but for desiring to overthrow our neighbor, and for laboring, so much as was in us, to bring it to pass by overthwart means. Albeit that men can not blame us, yet does God condemn us for murderers, yea though our hatred were so secret as we never made countenance of it. For whereas S. John said, he that hated his brother in his heart: it is all one as if he said although the hatred appear not, nor men can bear witness of it: yet are we faulty, if our heart be infected with any rancor, or enmity. Since it is so, let us bear well in mind, that our Lords intent is to persuade us to brotherly love among ourselves, and to agree together, endeavoring to help one another. For all mankind is knit together as it were into one body. And therefore let us learn to abhor all murder, as well which is committed against other folks, as which is meant against ourselves. Howbeit let us learn to hate (that is to say to condemn) continually all murder, without saying little or much in excuse of it: in so much that although we were guilty of it, yet we should judge against ourselves if we would judge rightly. Will wee then condemn murder in another man? Let us condemn hatred in ourselves, by abstaining from all malice and revengement, that our hearts may be rid of it. If we deal with such uprightness, then will God dwell with us and make us to prosper.

But yet for all this, it is said that the manslaughters which are not committed through malice, nor in rage, not by quarrelling, shall be pardoned: and not without cause. For as I told you, the crimes that are punishable, must be committed with a will and intent. Then if one shoot and meaning to level at his mark do hit a man by the way, he is not punishable: for even the Laws of man have ordained so, and there is an example of it set down in another place of this book, where it is said that if a man be cropping of a tree, and his Axe fall down upon one that is under the tree, he shall not be guilty of the falling of his Axe upon the head of him whom he perceived not. And why? For it was God that did it (said the text,) whereas we say it was by chance or fortune: Because we cannot conceive that things happen otherwise than by chance. You see here how it is said to be Gods doing: that is to say, it was the will of God who governed all things by his secret providence, that such a one should be taken out of the world. Yet notwithstanding, he that gave the stripe unawares, ought not to be punished as if he had killed one in anger and in a fray. Thus we see here what manslaughters are pardonable.

Howbeit, there are two things to be noted therewithal: the one is, that inquisition must be made of it: and the other is, that although such a one be not to be taken as a felon, yet does God separate him from other men, & will have him to be as a prisoner for a time, to the intent he should be an example to others to shun murder the more, seeing that that manslaughter which was committed unwillingly is punished after that fashion. As touching inquisition and making of search, it is a notable point. For we see how men are abused with the things that are done in favor of offenders: in so much that if any thing be alleged that may move to pity, and a countenance be set upon the matter that the offender is very sorry: men must shut their eyes at him, and say, alas, what should a man do? And this is done daily, and would God that examples thereof were not so common. Justice is commonly abused: in so much that if there be any cause or reason to be showed that some man may happen not to be so faulty as he is accused to be: the same shall be wrested to another mans defense, which is not worthy to have any favor at all. And why is that? For want of examination. And by that mean wicked men are still maintained. For were there diligent examination made, and things sifted to the bottom: men might soon discern between them that are faulty, and them that are faultless. But what? Men are contented to shut their eyes, and although they cannot but see, yet will they make countenance as though they knew it not. And so are the wicked discharged. The matters lie open to the world, they may be pointed out with ones finger, the evidence is too too apparent: and yet nothing can be known. And why? Because men list not. O you purblind folks which blear your eyes in such sort, you shall be driven in the end, to know what place you hold, & that he which ordained you to be judges, sees for you, yea and that he sees clearly, and writes that things in his Registers which you forget and willfully overslip, and he will put you in remembrance of them to your cost. For when so heinous offences are committed, our Lord will not have them let slip under colour of simplicity or pretence of ignorance: but he will have them sifted out, and information given of them, & the truth tried by all means possible, so as men may not say, where are we now? What is to be done? And when it comes to judgment, he will have that matter laid forth & handled plainly, so as the truth of it may be known: and after al this diligence used, he will have sentence given according to that which is known. That is the first point: namely that we suffer not faults and crimes to slip for want of due inquisition and examination how the case stands.

There is a second point which I have touched already: and that is, that God would there should be some correction for such as commit manslaughter unawares. And thereby he shows (as I said afore) that he loves mankind dearly: in so much that if we offend that way, although it be not of malice, but by chance (as they say,) & in such wise as the law which he has ordained, means, & although we meant not so to do: yet nevertheless we must feel by experience & see with our eyes, how dear mans life is unto him. This is another thing which we have to mark upon this place.

And herewith all let us mark also, that God intended to prevent that dangers, (as we have said) that the kinsfolk might not be provoked: for we be too much subject to our passions, & therefore he purposed to cut of occasions & objects as they term them. Indeed it is a wicked imperfection in me, & it is a vice worthy to be condemned, when I hate one that had slain my brother or my neighbor unwillingly, or when I bear him any grudge. And why? For the poor man is not blameworthy, because God acquitted him, & there is no fault in him. And yet for all that, I cannot find in my heart to look upon him: but if he come towards, my heart rises against him, & I am moved at him. Therefore am I to blame. Nevertheless GOD seeing our frailty, has vouchsafed to bear with us in that behalf, & has not left us without a remedy for it. Now we are warned thereby, to eschew the occasions of all evil to the uttermost of our power: & if God on his part have vouchsafed to deliver us from such temptations, do not they overthrow themselves willfully, which thrust themselves into them? Sure this lesson is very profitable, & extends very far. For we see how a great number stick not to fling out at random & to offend God. And whereby? Through rashness. To their own seeming they be able to resist whatsoever comes in their way: & thereupon they step forth boldly and without discretion, & they marvel greatly that God should disappoint their overlustiness, so as they need not anything else to make them to stumble, yea and to tumble into some gross fault. Seeing then that we be over hardy in hazarding ourselves against a number of temptations: let us learn that God by giving us such a law, do warn us generally to walk in fear. It is true that if God call me to anything, all the dangers in the world must not hold me back nor stop me. For why? God calls me, and he will shield me. But if I of mine own foolish rashness will needs adventure upon a thing that God commands me not: if it fall out to my harm, what is the cause thereof but the overweening & presumptuousness wherewith I was puffed up? For I consider not mine own frailty, that I should have humbled myself before God to have walked in his fear.

Then let us mark well, that we must not cast ourselves over boldly in danger, and promise ourselves this and that as we see a number do, which say, as for me, I can well serve God: Although other men misbehave themselves, yet may I live virtuously even among the wicked. It is true: but are you sure that you does it? No: but this lusty gallant that speaks thus stoutly, intermingles himself with the wicked and with their abominations. If he hear Gods name blasphemed and outrageously misused a hundred thousand times, he winks at it and veils his bonnet: if he see any looseness and dishonest pranks he intermeddles himself with them: and if he happen not to give his full consent to them, yet he withstands them not. Thus you see how that under the colour of hardiness men cast themselves into dangers which they ought to shun, considering that God warns them of them after that sort.

And herewith all Moses here sets down the inquisition that was to be made, that is to say. Whether there were any hatred at that, present time or before. Wherein he showed, that it is not enough to hear a mans confession, and his protestation that he did it not upon any malice, we must not stay there. For if the offenders may be believed: there shall never be any hanged, may they will well enough clear themselves, and it is a common rule among them: but the judge must be of wisdom to bolt out things, & to seek out the truth somewhere else than at the mouth of the offender. True it is that the confession of offenders ought to be taken, but if a man should tarry till they utter things of their own accord, & condemn themselves: it were too great a mockery. Therefore they must be straitened and constrained to say the truth, and trial must be made by other means, that men may be assured and utterly out of doubt of it. And even very nature itself showed it us, though there were no law written by Moses. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this place.

Whereas it is said that inquisition must be made [whether there were any malice borne] today or yesterday or of any time afore: it is a manner of speech that is rise in the Hebrew tongue, whereby is meant whether any hatred or rancor were perceived to have been betwixt them at any time before. And why? For it is to be presumed that where there is any hatred, the party goes to work with malice. And contrariwise, if it be found: that there was no quarrel, no ill will, no hatred, no rancor: can it be said that the manslaughter was committed of malice and set purpose? No. And hereby we be put in mind, that the life and conversation of a man ought to direct and lead us to the finding out of the matter. True it is that we ought always to judge of matters without respect of persons, and we must ever have an eye to the deed & to the desert of the case as they term it: but that is for the time coming. I mean not that definitive sentence should be given according to that which has been known by a man aforesaid: but how should men deal to come to the truth of things done? Let them consider what manner a one the man has been. I see that one is a despiser of GOD, I see a lewd unthrift that has neither faith nor honesty in him, I see a drunkard that is full of fury and passes no more to murder a man than to cut the throat of a Capon or a Henne: I see this: also I see he is a quarreler, and is ever working of some mischief or other, yea I see and can point one with my finger that seeks to bring all goodness to decay and to put all things out of order: I see all this: now I pray you is not this a good inducement to lead me to the truth of the matter, by comparing the fault that he shall have committed, with his former life? As for example, a man is found at some murder, or apprehended for some other misdeed that he is charged with: and because there is not sufficient witness, he will deny that he knows any thing of it: notwithstanding, by the marks that God showed me of him, I see his whole life is an evidence against him. If I were to take information of the whole matter, and had a dozen witnesses that could say unto me, this is the murderer: I could not more clearly perceive the murder, than by beholding that the party is a rank naughty pack, a despiser of God, such a one as has neither faith nor honesty, a cutthroat and robber, of a spiteful stomach, and full of poison, so as he is utterly out of all square. I pray you is it meet I should be blinded still when I see such proofs? Now then let us mark well, that whereas Moses speaks hereof the time past: it is to show us that God will help us to the knowledge of matters and of the truth of them, so we on our side shut not the gate, nor quench not the light when it is offered us. Look what we have to bear in mind.

And on the other part let us mark also, that if we have known a man to be of a good conscience, and seen none other signs in him but of the fear of GOD, of honesty, and of upright dealing: we must not lightly take upon us to charge him with any crime. For to what purpose should it serve such as have lived as becomes them, to have given good example all their life long: if every ill report should be admitted against them at the first dash, so as they should be condemned without further inquiry? So then let us mark, that God meant hereto restrain us from judging unadvisedly, and from thinking amiss on such as have lived aright.

Now for the fume and conclusion of all, here is the promise that Moses makes: that is to wit, That the people shall prosper in the land that is given them to inherit, and that God will bless them for ever, and them also that came of their children. And this doctrine is very ripe: namely that if we serve GOD he will bless us, as though our service were recompensed. But yet we must not imagine hereupon as the Papists do, that we deserve any thing at all at Gods hand, & that he yields us like for like, as though he were bound thereunto or as though there were some hire or wages due to us: we must not enter into such dotages: but we must consider that the cause why God promised reward to such as serve him, is to hearten them by doing them to understand that it is not lost labor to serve God. By that means then God intends to encourage us to serve him and to do well: and not to make us proud or to put us in belief that we deserve aught. Then let us mark, that whereas God promised us reward: it is for that he had erst given us the grace to serve him. Whereof comes it that we live as becomes us? Comes it of our own freewill? Comes it of our own self-moving? NO: but of Gods governing of us by his holy spirit. Now then, although it were a recompense: yet ought not the same to be attributed unto us: but rather to that grace that God has put into us, which grace he crowns.

But there is yet one point more: which is, that although God bless us and make us to prosper: yet have not we served him as we ought to do, for all that: but he should always rather find somewhat wherefore to punish us, if he listed to use rigor towards us. Therefore let us not think that ever we have so discharged our duty, as that God should in any thing be bound towards us. But forasmuch as he bears with us, and imputed not our sins and offences to us,

But winks at them and takes all in good worth as at his children's hands: therefore does he vouchsafe to reward our works. And so we see that all such as attribute any desert to themselves, are surely besotted with fond self weaning; and must be faine to dislike of themselves, and not to make any account of their own wretchedness. And truly if we wish what our works are, we should always have cause to sigh, and to crave pardon at God's hand: and that will make our works to be accepted at his hand: and that will make our works to be accepted at his hand, notwithstanding they be imperfect. And why? Because he bears with us as with his children. And so he yields us, not that which he owes us, nor that which we have deserved: but that which it pleases him to give us of his mere liberality. Nevertheless he gives such recompense to our works, to the intent we should be the willing to serve him, and understand that our serving of him shall not be in vain: but that we must employ ourselves for him as for our master and prince, and give ourselves wholly to his service, though it be not with such perfection as were requisite.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good GOD with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them more and more, that being humbled we may be drawn to true repentance, and therewithal know to what end we are chosen to be his people, namely to the end we should worship him as our King and obey his laws, not only in outward deeds, but also with true and hearty affection: and live in such wise under him, as we may moreover be linked to our neighbors with brotherly love, and by that means be assured more and more that his adopting of us to be his children is not in vain. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, et cetera.

On Friday the 7th of June 1555
The thirtieth Sermon which is the twelfth upon the fourth Chapter and the first upon the fifth Chapter

44 This is the law which Moses did set before the children of Israel.

45 These are the Covenants, Ordinances, and Laws, which Moses showed to the children of Israel, after they were come out of Egypt.

46 Beyond Jordan in the valley against Bethphogor, in the land of Sehon, King of Amorites which dwelt in Hesebon, whom Moses and the children of Israel smote, after they were come out of Egypt.

47 And possessed his land, and the land of Og King of Bashan, two kings of the Amorites which were beyond Jordan towards the Sun rising:

48 From Aroer which is upon the bank of the river Arnon, to the Hill of Sehon, which is Hermon:

The fifth Chapter

And Moses called all Israel and said unto them. Hear O Israel the ordinances and Laws which I set before you this day, that you may learn them and keep them in deed.

2 The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb.

3 The Lord our God made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us which are all here alive at this day.

Or as much as it is hard to keep men in subjection to GOD: therefore after he had chosen him a people, he vouchsafed to rule then, not for once Hand away, but even so long time till they ought to have been well inured to his yoke. And after the same manner does he deal daily with his Church. One word ought to be enough to make us understand the truth of our God. But for as much as we believe not so speedily as were requisite: & when we have begun, we start away again: and finally forget the things that he had taught us: therefore he thinks it not enough to have told us once what is needful for our salvation, but he does also put us oft in mind of it, & prints it in our hearts as is possible. That is the cause why Moses rehearsed in this that he not only delivered them that law in Horeb, but also taught it them new again, after he had gone about with them a forty years or fast upon it, yes and ceased not of all that time to set the things continually before them which GOD had at one time commanded him to utter to them, as has been touched already heretofore. But the diligence of Moses is not superstitious in that he says, that being come to the side of Jordan, and banning vanquished Sehon king of Amorites, and Og the king of Bashan his neighbor, he did still put the people in mind of God's laws and ordinances, that they might stand to them and put them in use, and that if they had not had sufficient teaching already, they might at leastwise even then know God's truth and stick to it. That is the matter which Moses meant by this text. And here he sets down expressly: the Laws, Covenants, Statutes, and ordinances, to express the better (as I have told you heretofore) that God taught us not his people by halves, nor gave them a doctrine that was dark, short, or imperfect: but such a law as comprehended all that was for their benefit and welfare, so as if they stick thereto, they should not need to seek any further, for they should have wherewith to direct themselves in all points and all respects. Yes verily, for the law is a full doctrine accordingly also as the word has his original thereof. Again there are Covenants: which is as much to say, as that God covenants and indents with men, so as he neither forgets nor leaves anything out, that may make for the maintenance of the covenant betwixt him and us, in that it has pleased him to adopt us for his children and Church, to take us to himself. What so ever concerns the spiritual alliance between him and us, is comprehended under the word Covenant, because they be articles. For when men intend to covenant, they set down articles as well on that one side as on the other. We see then how God protests here, that the Law has enough to teach men withal, so they hold themselves to it. Afterward follow Statutes and ordinances. It is a wonder to see how painful GOD is in teaching of us, and how he tells us that he has not omitted anything: and yet for all that, our wits are so fugitive, that we still covet some better thing than we find in God's word. This devilish curiosity has reigned at all times in the world. And we see that even at this day, do what we can, this cursed desire cannot be overmastered, but that men will still need to be wiser than God would have them to be. And why? For when his word is preached to us, there is no cause for us to find fault that he has not showed us all that is for our behoove. Yet notwithstanding, we be ticklish still, and would faine have this and that, besides that which God has showed us. Seeing then that such faultiness betrays itself in us: it stands us so much the more on hand to remember the counsel that is given us here: that is know, that if we will suffer God to be our master, we shall find all perfection to wisdom in his school. For his law is of sufficient ability to make us wise. And again, (as I have said heretofore) it contained all the points that serve to unite us to our GOD: wherein consists our whole happiness and glory. Moreover it shows us the rule of well doing, so as we need not to seek anywhere else what GOD allows, for we have there his statutes and ordinances. Then may we well know and assure ourselves that our life shall please GOD, when we pass not the bounds that he has let us. But if we add anything at all to it, let us not think that GOD allows that as righteousness or as a good thing: for he forget not anything that was necessary or behoove. And these two points are well worthy to be noted. For they serve to make us to set the more store by the doctrine that is daily set forth to us in the name of GOD. Since we see it is the perfect wisdom, ought we not to apply all our wits to it, and to hold us to it? Since we see that GOD for slows not, but continues to teach us daily: ought not we also on our side to be attentive and diligent to profit under him? And though we be not so well given to it at the first as were meet we should: ought we not to enforce ourselves all our life long to know Gods will still more and more, till we be quite rid of all ignorance, which shall be when we be taken out of this world, and not before? Surely that which Moses did, ought to serve us for a rule and example at this day. For he did it not at all adventure. And besides that, God ordained him to be as a looking glass to all prophets, and to all such as have charge to teach in God's church. Let us understand therefore that GOD will not have us to learn his truth in one day, as though one lesson were enough for us: but he will have the things often rehearsed to us which we have heard, that they may tarry with us and be so rooted in our hearts, as we may no more allege in excuse of ourselves, O I have not yet been well instructed. God then on his part is always ready, so as we cannot err except we do it wittingly, willingly, and willfully as it were.

But here is express mention made of: the Temple of Pheor, to show that although the people had an eyesore there to turn them away to superstition: yet had they a remedy for it also, in as much as GOD called earnestly upon that by his word, that they should not meddle with the idolatries of the heathen. Indeed it was a hard chastisement for them, to be driven to have the temple of an idol continually in their sight. It was as if God meaning to have spited them, should have said, I have called you to possess a land that is allotted to my service, where you should have seen nothing that should have offended you: for my Sanctuary should have been set up among you, I should have been worshipped purely, according to my law, that land should not have been defiled with old superstitious, all such things should have been wiped out, so as you should have heard nothing down in your ears but my prayers. But now you be here in a corner of a country, where you behold the temple of an idol, and where shameful abominations are committed.

Therefore it is as a vengeance which you be fine to suffer for your sins, because you be not worthy to enter into the land that I promised you. Thus you see how it was God's will to chastise his people, when he did let them dwell by the temple of Pheor. Likewise if we in these days be mingled with idolaters, so as we be fine to look upon the filthiness which they commit, and upon their perverting of all religion: let us understand that by that means God punishes us, or at leastwise humbles us because of our sins. And we ought to be sorry, not only for the offences that are committed by the unbelievers, but also because we may well perceive that we be not worthy to see the whole world reformed, so as there might be one accord and consent of harmony in religion, and GOD be purely worshipped everywhere: I say we be not worthy to see it. Now then if superstitions be near us, and we be driven to behold the marks of them, or to hear any piece of them: Let us impute it to our own sins.

But yet howsoever the world went, GOD failed not to give the people of Israel a good remedy. For when the law was taught them so by Moses: it was as if GOD had separated those that were his, from the blind wretches that went astray in their superstitions. And hereupon we have to note, that although the whole world be perverted, and great confusion is to be seen, and all is full of error and corruption: yet notwithstanding we must take God's word for our guide, and that must strengthen us to defy all superstitions and idolatries. And if we be so full of vanity, as to flee to and fro after that God has given us his word: there will be no excuse for us. For as I have said before, God's declaring of his will to us, ought to be a sufficient bridle for us. Though all the world went the contrary way, and one sort followed their own fancies, and another sort had some likelihood of religion: yet ought none of those things to weigh with us, when we have once heard the voice of our GOD, and thereby gotten knowledge of his will. And therefore let us learn to make this certain and infallible doctrine available, that it may draw us from all wicked opinions, from all errors, and from the things which the devil has forged and men invented in the world. Thus you see what we have to remember, when Moses makes mention here to Pheors temple.

Now here withal he adds also, that this [was done] after their overcoming of the two kings, Og king of Bashan, and Sehon king of the Amorites or of Hesebon.

And this circumstance served to blame the public, if they yielded not themselves obedient to God. We know that the more favor GOD shows us, the more ought we to be provoked to love and fear him. God has showed himself beneficial to us: now ought not the same to draw us the more to him. Yes. For if we bind a mortal man to us by our well doing: he shall be taken and deemed unthankful, if he acknowledge not the good that we have done him: and how much less are we to be excused, if we do not so to the living God? Then let us bear in mind that Moses makes express mention here, of the two kings that had been overcome: to the intent that the people should have considered thus with themselves. Go to, we have had here two excellent victories. Heretofore when we would have attempted it against the forbidding of our GOD: we were stoutly beaten back, there was no strength nor courage in us, our enemies came like Wasps or Hornets to sting out our eyes, according to the similitude which has been set down heretofore. But now are two strong and mighty kings overcome, without any cost of ours: So as GOD has given them into our hands. Who was the cause of these two victories? Was it not God, who directed and ruled all? Seeing then that he has pitied us, and begun to perform the promise which he made to our fathers, and given us so good a handle of it already: ought we not to endeavor to give ourselves in such wise to him, as we may be wholly at his commandment? Should we not put ourselves into his hand, which he has showed to be so mighty for the love of us? Behold (say I) how Moses meant the things that he rehearses concerning the discomfiture of Sehon and Og: namely to blame the people for their unthankfulness, if they yielded not themselves quietly to the service of their God, which had bound that so greatly to him.

But now must we also apply this doctrine to our use. When so ever we perceive any sloth, or coldness, or rebelliousness in ourselves, so as our flesh falls to striving, and we labor not to Godward with so cheerful mind and lusty courage as were expedient: we must enter into account of the benefits that we have received at his hand. [and think thus with ourselves:] wretched creature how happens it that you are so loath to stick to your GOD, seeing he has showed you his will? Consider what you have of him, bethink you of the benefits which he has bestowed upon you to this hour. Let every man examine himself how much he is bound to GOD, that we may be the more inflamed to serve him. And let us understand, not only generally that he has created us: but also that besides his redeeming of us by the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, as he redeemed the Israelites out of Egypt: and besides his drawing of us to him by his grace: we have also had the doctrine of the Gospel, which was all one as to take us under his protection, and he shows it us daily by effect. How many helps and succors have we had in our infirmities? Should not Satan had overcome us a thousand times, if our God had not reached out his hand to rescue us? Surely we should be utterly overthrown. Yes we should not only be born down with temptations, but we should also be utterly overwhelmed, if we were not for such rescues I speak of. Seeing then that our Lord ceases not to confirm us daily in his grace: Let us on our side look that we take occasion thereby, to serve him the more earnestly, as we see is spoken of here.

Now proceeding herewith, Moses adds that he spoke thus to the people of Israel, saying: Harken to the Law which the Lord has caused to be set before you, that you may learn it and keep it. Here again Moses rehearses that preface which we have seen heretofore: that is to know, that God's law was not given, only to the end that men should hear it and know what it is: but to the end we should be reformed, and that God might have proof of the subjection that we yield to him. To be short, we see that God's doctrine consists in practice, and that we must show by our deeds that we have not been taught it in vain. Here Moses says first of all, Hear the Law which I set forth to you in your ears to learn it. As if he should say, God's meaning is not that the doctrine which is preached to us in his name and by his commission, should fall to the ground: but that we should receive it diligently, and set our whole minds upon it. For what is the cause why we profit so slender in God's word, but for that we busy ourselves too much about worldly matters? If we come to a Sermon, or if we read the holy Scripture, it is but as it were for fashions sake, we endeavor not to do as we ought to do, that we might observe the things that are told us. Wherefore let us see that we become diligent scholars, while God is so gracious to us as to teach us by his word. And for the same cause does Moses say that he sets it forth in their ears. Indeed this manner of speech were harsh in our tongue: nevertheless it imports, that God speaks not to us in a dark or strange language: but that he utters himself familiarly, so far forth as is requisite. Seeing then that God comes down to us, to the end we might have his will familiarly uttered to us: what excuse will there be for us, if his word be loft, or if it slip away, or if we take not hold of it too far the better by it? True it is that for as much as we be gross and ignorant, we shall ever find much darkness in God's word, so as it shall be too high and profound for us: but who is to blame for it? Let us mark then that all such as complain the God's word in an unknown speech to that: are here rebuked of Jyng" and they do god wrong in slandering him, for as much as they deny and despise the grace which Moses protests to have been offered to the Israelites in the setting forth of the law. For he says that at the time God spoke to the people's ears by the mouth of him. Since it is so: the doctrine ought to have been familiar enough to them. And much less cause have we nowadays to allege this shift, that we understand not the things that are contained in the holy scripture. For God speaks merely enough and familiarly enough to us. It is long of none but ourselves that we have not our ears bored to hear him. And so let us mark well, that there remains nothing for us to do, but to be attentive that we may profit by the doctrine.

But yet here withal we must resort to that which I have touched before namely that it must be kept and thoroughly followed. For if we do no more but only like well of God's word, and yield record to it that it is good, true, and holy: God shall be greatly beholden to us for it. What is to be done then? Behold, God will try whether he be our master or no. For the thing whereby to rule our life, is not only to enquire what he says to us: but also to give over our own desires and affections, and to desire nothing else but to please him, and to be governed by him and by his righteousness. When we be at that point, then is it a good proof that God has such authority over us as he deserves. But until we become to that point, we shall never know what it is to have profited in the doctrine. Therefore let this word Do or Perform run always in their minds which hear the word of God. How now, let them say? Behold God has granted us the grace to be taught. And to what end? Not to the end we should but only hearken to it to say, yes Mary, that is wells aid, this is good: but to the end that our whole life should be reformed, and that for as much as it is a good and sure rule, we should no more go astray as we have done, and as the ignorant wretches do, which are wandered out of the right way, and have not the teaching that we have, whom the doctrine ought so to mortify, as God may reign over us, and we be subject to him. Thus you see in effect what Moses meant by protesting to the people in this preface, that his setting forth of the Law to that, was not the intent they should but only hear it and have their ears beaten with it: but to the intent they should also embrace it and keep it.

And for confirmation hereof he alleges that God made his covenant with the people in Mount Horeb, the better to bring them to fear, and to obey him forever. For if GOD should but only exact his dew of us: yet were we sufficiently bound to cleave to him, and to stick to his commandments. But now seeing it has pleased him of his infinity goodness, to come as it were to a common treaty, and to bind himself interchangeably to us, whereas there is no cause why he should be bound: so as he covenants to be our father and Savior, and to receive us into his flock, to be his inheritance, that we may live under his protection, and he sets the everlasting life before us: Seeing he does all these things for us, ought not our hearts to yield, though they were of stone? Seeing that the creatures do see that the living God abacus himself so far, as to vouchsafe to enter into treaty with that, as if he should say, Go to, let us see at what point we be: indeed there is an infinity distance betwixt you and me, I might command you what I think good without having any further to do with you, neither are you worthy to come by me, or to have any acquaintance with him that can command you what he lifts, without making any other protestation than only this. This will I have you do, this is my mind: and yet for all that I forbear mine own right, I offer myself to you to be your leader and savior, I am willing to govern you, and you shall be as my little household, I will be your king if you will be continued in my world: and besides this, think not that my making of my covenant with your fathers, was of purpose to gain anything at your hands: for I have neither need nor want of anything, and if I had, what could you do for me? But I seek your welfare and your salvation: and therefore I am here ready to enter into covenant with you, and to bind myself to you for mine own part: Seeing that the living God stoops so low, I pray you must we not needs be too unthankful, if we yield not to humble ourselves under him, and forbear all pride and stateliness? So then, it is not without cause that Moses speaks here, of the covenant that God made with his people, to the end that his goodness and grace might be chiefly known. And if this took place in the time of the Law, there is much greater reason that it should take place at this day. For our Lords covenanting was not only with the Jews, not for that one time only: but when he sent his only son, then did he show himself much more fully to be our father and Savior than he had done before, and he did it after as sweet and friendly a manner as could be, so as it is all one as if he had even opened his bowels to us. Seeing then that God has given us his own heart in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, and we hear how Christ protests that he will not henceforth call us his servants but his friends, because he has imparted himself to us so familiarly: I pray you must not the devil needs have bewitched us, if we be not moved to yield ourselves wholly to him, and to forsake ourselves and all our own affections? Therefore when we feel any naughtiness in us that keeps us back from serving God, if we find any slothfulness in us, if we be fallen too fast asleep in this world: then to waken us up, and to cause us to magnify God, let us call to mind the covenant which our Lord has made with us.

Now hereupon Moses adds, It was not with your fathers that God made the covenant, but with us, even with us that are all alive at this day. This sentence may have a double understanding. For it may be taken as though Moses made a comparison, to show the better that the people which lived at that time, might have been the more inflamed to serve GOD, because they had received more grace than their fathers. And for the same purpose also does he say in Exodus, I have not imparted this name of mine to your fathers. God speaking there to Moses, tells him that he had not manifested himself so plainly to be God, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as he did command to be done by Moses. Hereby he means that the people ought to be that more attentive as now, because God revealed himself to them after an unaccustomed manner. And so the meaning of this text might be that God made not he like covenant with our fathers. True it is that God spoke to his servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and instructed them sufficiently. And it is said expressly in the eighteenth of Genesis, Shall I hide from my servant Abraham, what I intend to do upon Sodom and Gomor? No: for I know he will teach his household my decrees, ordinances, judgments, and laws. You see here that Abraham did sufficiently instruct his household and that not after a slender fashion, but in God's judgments, statutes, and ordinances, so as it must needs be said that he had God's law well printed in his heart. But yet for all that, it was a benefit not to be held scorn of, when God sent his Law to the people in two tables, and vouchsafed that there should be wherewith to instruct them continually, and also that the same things should be recorded for us likewise. The thing therefore which we may gather upon this text is this protestation which Moses makes to the people, as if he should say: my friends, consider the benefit which God bestows upon you this day, which (verily) he bestows not upon our fathers. For he gave not them the law in writing as he has done to us, neither uttered he things to that by piecemeal. True it is that he taught them sufficiently and as much as was requisite for their salvation: but behold, we all this day are come a step higher than they were: and therefore ought we to come the nearer to him, seeing that he is so come down to us. That is Moses's meaning if we take the text after the foresaid manner.

Likewise might a man say to us at this day, that God has not dealt with our fathers as he has dealt with us. And so meant our Lord Jesus Christ when he said to his disciples, many kings and prophets have desired to see the things that you see, and to hear the things that are preached to you, and yet have not had their wish. Seeing then that God of his infinite mercy has vouchsafed to prefer us before the Patriarchs and prophets: according also as it is said, that the Prophets served more for our times, than for their own: thereby we ought to learn to resort to him, and to give ourselves wholly to his doctrine.

Howbeit if all things be well considered: although the matter before rehearsed be very profitable, and that the same exhortation be oftentimes made in the holy scripture: yet if all the words be well weighed, Moses meant that God made not his covenant with those that had heard the Law at the first giving of it forth, that is to say, not only with them: but also with those that outlined them, and succeeded in their place after their decease. So to be short, Moses intended to show here, that the Law was not mortal, to continue only during the lives of such as had the first hearing of it: but that it was a doctrine which should continue in force and authority for ever. The Lord our God (says he) made not his covenant with our fathers: that is to say, he meant not that only our fathers should be his people, and so to bind himself in such sort to them, that his law should serve but for a forty or fifty years: but he has made his covenant likewise with us, and with those that were yet unborn when the law was given forth.

Although then that you were not at Mount Horeb, nor saw the fire upon the hill: yet notwithstanding assure yourselves that your God did adopt you at the same time to himself, and comprised you likewise in the covenant that he made. Therefore it behooved you to keep his law, because it was set forth to last forever, and to continue from age to age, and to be preached to the world's end. That is the true and proper meaning of Moses. And hereof we may gather a good lesson: which is, that although we were not at the first setting abroad of the Gospel, nor saw the things that are reported to us of the law: yet must not God's word forego his authority with us. And why? True it is that God's raising up of Moses was a special prerogative to the people that lived in that time: but yet must not the authority of the Law be impeached for all that: for it contains God's truth, which endures forever, and is not variable nor transitory after the manner of men. It is said that men are like a flower or as the grass that withers and dries away out of hand: but God's truth endures forever. And this truth which is unchangeable and invariable, is contained in the Law. True it is that the Law as concerning the ceremonies is quite abolished: but as concerning the substance of it, and the doctrine that is contained in it, it keeps his force forever and never decays. Now let us mark that although we were not in the time of Moses, yet is it not for us to despise the things that are reported to have been done [at that time,] or which are contained in the law. And why? For he spoke them to us. He spoke not only to the multitude that was assembled at Mount Horeb: but also generally to the whole world. Now if this be verified of the law: much more reason is it that it should be so of the Gospel. For as I said, the law, as concerning the shadows and figures, is gone to decay: but in the Gospel there is no such like thing. For here our Lord makes his new and everlasting covenant: it is a covenant that endures from age to age [without ceasing.] What is to be done then, when the Gospel is preached? We must assure ourselves that the son of GOD is come into the world: not only to teach those with whom he was a mortal man: but also to purchase them to God his father, and to call the world to salvation, by giving his Apostles commission to sound forth their voices through the whole world, that even those might be made partakers of his doctrine which never heard them: which doctrine we also must receive still at t his day , as if Jesus Christ himself were still among us, or as if the Apostles spoke to us with their own mouths. That (say I) is the thing which we have to remember upon this place. And therefore let us not make any alterations in God's Church, or attempt to innovate anything in his word, for as much as we know that he will have it to hold on continually in one equal course and train. For seeing he has given us his Gospel, and established a certain government in the time of the Apostles and in the primitive Church: it behooves us to come to the same, and to stay there. If we do otherwise: it is all one as if we would make God's word mortal and corruptible as we ourselves are. Wherefore let us learn, that although the world be variable, so as there be turns and returns every day, and there is not any of us all which has not a number of opinions turning in his head: yet must we not look to have the liberty to do now one thing and now another. Why so? For God has not made his covenant with our fathers, but with us that are alive this day. Then let us understand that as long as we be in this world, God governs us here and shows us the way, to the end we should not be as wandering Pilgrims roaming up and down, to gad after our own lusts: but be guided as it were by his hand. To be short, whereas Moses says here, us that are all alive this day: it serves to show that men must not of all their lifelong invent any new law, nor have one today and another tomorrow. For why? Our life depends upon God's Law, and that ought to content us: therefore let us but only profit in that, and have an eye to the things that tend thereto.

Furthermore, no doubt but that Moses upbraids the people here with their unthankfulness, if they should not dedicate their lives to the service of GOD. As if he should say, By what means live we? Is it not because our Lord has placed us in this world? Again seeing that life which we have comes of him, ought we not to bestow it in his service? Ought it not to be wholly consecrated to his will? Thus then you see how Moses tents all such as run astray and follow not God's word. But yet here withal we must bear in mind the thing which I have touched before: that is to know, that we have not a doctrine of two or three days continuance: but that we must be confirmed in it as long as we live. When we have once received the things that are contained in that holy scripture: we must endeavor to profit in them: and to go forward still in such wise, as we may still grow in them until God take us out of the world: assuring ourselves that he will keep covenant with us, so as he for his part will not be unfaithful nor inconstant, but steadfast in his purpose. Seeing that he is so: let us be the like, and so long as we live, let us have none other respect but to stick to him, even in such wise as he shows us by his word. For we must not go about to knit and link ourselves to our GOD by our own fancies: but look as he comes to us, so must we go to him, and when we be there, we must beware that we keep us there. Thus you see that we may be the better disposed to receive the instruction that shall be given us hereafter, concerning God's Law and commandments.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our GOD with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, so as our whole seeking maybe to submit ourselves to him, and he may vouchsafe to reach us his hand, not suffering us to be any more given to our own fancies and affections, but that we may magnify his goodness which he uses towards us, and fare the better by it by yielding him the obedience that he deserves: specially because he has vouchsafed to bring us his law and declare it to us, and has not only showed us the way how to live well, but also vouchsafed to adopt us to be his children, and to show himself to be our father and Savior for our Lord Jesus Christ sake. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us, but also to all people et cetera.

On Wednesday, the 12th of June 1555

The thirty first Sermon, which is the second upon the fifth Chapter

4 The Lord God talked with you face to face upon the mountain, out of the midst of the fire.

5 The same time I stood between the Lord and you, to show you the word of the Lord. For you were afraid at the presence of the fire, and went not up into the mount: And he said,

6 I am the Lord your God which brought you out of the Land of Egypt, from the house of bondage.

7 You shall have none other God's in my sight.

E have seen heretofore how Moses took great pain to make the people perceive the majesty that is in God's word, that they might receive it with all reverence. For although men protest enough that they be willing to serve God: (for even nature drives them thereto:) yet can they not submit themselves to his word, notwithstanding that that is the true proof whereby to know whether we be subject to GOD or no. But therein appears t he rebelliousness of the world. For albeit that they grant t hat God's word is to be received without gainsaying: yet shall you scarily find one among a hundred, that humbles himself in good earnest, to yield it the authority which it ought to have. And why is that? Because we conceive not the majesty of GOD which is uttered there.

You see then that it is not for naught that Moses has told us so often heretofore, that God's word ought to bear such a majesty towards us, as all creatures ought to quake at it. And now again he adds another confirmation of the same matter, saying, that God talked with the people face to face in the mount, out of the midst of the fire. As if he should say, you have now no cause at all a doubt, whether the doctrine that I deliver to you be of God or men. For it is warranted enough and more than enough: God has declared himself to you by visible and apparent signs, so as you cannot but know that it is he which spoke to you. Now we see Moses's meaning.

But before we go any further, here a question might be put, how it may be said that God spoke face to face, seeing that men cannot comprehend his infinity glory: and with what eye can we behold God's substance? We be so weak sighted, that if God should cast but one little beam of his brightness upon us, by and we should be altogether dazzled and confounded. Again, we know how it is said that we cannot behold God face to face, until we be renewed, which shall not be till the last day. For as now (says Saint Paul) we see but as in a glass, and in part, and darkly.

Moreover he says in another place, that as now the Gospel represents God's majesty in such wise to us, as we may see him there: but the law was dark, and there hung a veil before it, which hindered the fathers from knowing God in such sort and so familiarity as we do nowadays. But all this agrees very well. For if the Law be compared with the Gospel: it is certain that the thing shall be found to be true, which Saint Paul speaks here. For God declared not himself so familiarity at that time, as he does to us by means of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is his lively image. Therefore at this day the great treasures of God's wisdom are laid forth, so as GOD calls us to the kingdom of heaven, and shows that he takes us for his children and heirs: it was not so in the time of the Law. Again, although we have so great and familiar knowledge nowadays: yet does that thing stand always, true which I said: that is to know, that we see but in part. And why so?

For we be not yet made partakers of God's glory, and therefore we cannot come near him, but he must be fine to reveal himself to us according to our rudeness and infirmity. And albeit that God have appeared to men even from the beginning of the world: yet has he not showed himself as he is indeed, but according as men might be able to abide it. Therefore we must always come to this point, that God neither was known of the fathers, nor appears to us at this day in his substance: but applies himself to us, in so much as he is fine to stoop to make us perceive his presence according to our ability.

Nevertheless it is not for naught that Moses says here, that God spoke face to face. For he means that the people had not some glimmering or guess only, so as they might doubt or only conceive some opinion of him, but that they had an infallible warrant, so as they might conclude this: here is our GOD, who has so communicated himself to us, as our faith ought not to be any more uncertain, neither ought the doctrine that is set forth to us in his name, to be any more debated in way of disputation. As whether it be mere to be received or not. And why? For God has given us a sure mark, which cannot deceive us, nor leave us in doubt that it proceeded not from him. Thus we see now the meaning of Moses.

Hereupon we have a good lesson to gather: which is, that if GOD utter not himself in such stately manner as our liking could afford: we must assure ourselves that his so doing is for our profit and welfare. For if we consider our own infirmity, it will pull down our over lustiness whereunto our nature provokes us continually. For we would be enquiring of God's secrets without end or measure. And why? Because we feel not our own inability. Wherefore let us magnify the goodness of our GOD for that it pleases him to have regard of us and of our rudeness, and to hide his glory from us least we should be overwhelmed by it. For as I said before, we could not abide it, being so frail as we be. And here withal let us understand, that there is no excuse for us, if we yield not GOD his due honor when he shall have given us any evident token of his presence.

Therefore let us not look that God should come to us in his inestimable glory, that the heavens should cleave a sunder, and that all the Angels of paradise should appear to us: But when our Lord shows us that it is he that speaks, let that suffice us, and let us humble ourselves out of hand. For if we will needs be slothful in that case: it shall be cast in our teeth that we turned our backs upon him when he showed us his face. Indeed it is said to us in another place, that men cannot behold God's face without perishing. In so much that although he shows himself in such wise to Moses as is spoken of in Numery, so that he was familiar with him as with his friend: yet is it said that he saw no more of him but only his back parts. But that is to show us always that we must not presume to preach to GOD, so long as we bear this flesh about us: we must not thing to attain so high. For if the very Angels of heaven under the shape of Seraphins, do hid themselves when GOD shows himself: what shall we do, which do but creep here on earth? But howsoever the case stand, yet will God condemn us for our unthankfulness, if we have no list to behold his face, and that the tokens of his presence which he shows us do not suffice us. Above all things let us bear this in mind, namely that the case concerns our submitting of ourselves as well to the law as to the Gospel. For it is their chiefly that God will be known of men to the end they should worship him, simply receiving what so ever comes out of his mouth. Whereunto then shall we apply his saying of Moses? To this end verily that when so ever the scripture is set afore us, so as it is either preached or expounded to us, or we ourselves read it: this preface must serve to humble us, that we may exalt God with all reverence, and not adventure to reply against this word, but tremble at it, as is said in the prophet Esau, For all that ever is contained in the holy scripture, is so thoroughly warranted to us, as it may well be said that GOD has talked with men, yes and even showed himself to them

Now hereunto Moses adds, that he himself had been as a mediator between God and man, because the people were afraid and durst not go up to into the mountain. Whereby Moses does us to know, that the delivering forth of the law by a mortal man, ought not to diminish the authority thereof. And why? Because the infirmity of the people required it: that was their fault. And it is a text well worthy to be marked. For we do always seek starting holes, that we might despise God's word. Indeed we will not pretend it openly: but yet are all of us so lewdly disposed, that we think ourselves well at ease if we can find any color to say, Tush I know not whether this be God's word or not, I cannot tell whether it speak to me or not, I know not what condition is annexed to it. Thus we see how the world strives continually to exempt themselves from the obedience of God's word: and it is a very common excuse to say, yes, it is true that GOD ought to be obeyed, but yet for all that, they that preach are but men like ourselves: and must their doctrine be hearkened to, as though they were men that came from heaven? Many men bear themselves in hand that this should go for payment, notwithstanding that they be rebels against GOD, or rather that they pass not at all to submit themselves to him and to his world.

But we have an answer here, wherewith to cut off the occasion of all this: which is, that whereas GOD sends his word by the hand of men, he does it in respect of men's default and infirmity.

Nevertheless he ceases not to give us some mark of his glory, whereby his word is sufficiently known to be heavenly: insomuch that if the matter be duly scanned, it appears that God has warranted it thoroughly. So then, it is not only for the ancient fathers, that Moses spoke: but this warning is directed to us also: that is to know, that all though men be appointed as messengers to preach God's word to us, yet ought not that to diminish the majesty thereof any whit at all. And indeed we do miss consider our own frailty, when we desire that God should work miracles daily: nor verily we cannot tell what is met for us. For as touching miracles, there have been enough wrought already for the warranting of the truth as well of the Law as of the Gospel, that we might be fully certified of them. Yet notwithstanding it is expedient for us at this day, that God should send us men like ourselves, with commission from him to teach us in his name and in his stead, as one that allures us to him with all gentleness and courtesy. Think we that we were able to abide his presence, if he should come to us in such sort as he is indeed? Alas not: there were no shift for us but we should be all consumed. If God should speak in his strength: we know how it is said that it would make the very rocks and mountains to melt: and could we that are as feeble as anything maybe, be able to outstand such force, that it should not thunder down upon us and destroy us? Therefore let us mark well that when God ordained that his word should be preached to us, and that we should have it in writing, therein he applied himself to our weakness, dealing with us as if himself were a mortal man, to the intent we should not be afraid to come to him, but be drawn to him with all gentleness. Again, how highly does he honor us, in that it pleases him to choose men of no reputation among us, to represent his person and to speak to us in his name? For what could he give more to the Angels of heaven? Could he give them a more honorable charge or office? Seeing then that he vouchsafes to set men in so noble and excellent a room, as to bear abroad his word: therein he shows how great his goodness is towards us, namely that it is more than fatherly.

And on the other side, he tries our humility. For if he thundered from heaven, if he appeared visibly to us, if the Angels came down to us: it were no marvel though men believed his word. But when both great and small embrace the order that he has set in his Church, that is to know, when they obey his word that is preached to them: that is a good trial of our faith. Nevertheless, let us still come back to this, that God has showed himself sufficiently to men, so as we have no cause to doubt of his word, or to stand scanning from whence it came. For we be sure enough of his will, if we be not willful in refusing the signs that he has given us. Thus you see what we have to gather upon this sentence of Moses, where he says that the people durst not go up into the mount, by reason of the fear which they had conceived. And although we in these days would not refuse that God should speak to us: yet if all things be well considered, it would not be for our profit. And therefore let us understand, that God's using of men's service in that wise, ought not to diminish the certainty of our faith.

It is said consequently, that God taught the people, saying: I am the Everlasting, your GOD which brought you out of the Lands of Egypt. You shall not have any other God in my sight. Here to keep the people of Israel in awe, GOD tells them that the knowledge which they have of him, ought to keep them aloof from all superstitions. For it was not to be marveled at, that the heathen folk had idols, and went wandering after their own errors and fancies. We must understand that it is man's property of himself, to do so. It is pity to see how much we be inclined to vanity. We need not to go to school to learn to be deceived: for every of us is clearly great enough in that case. To be short, we go always forward to evil, yes even under color of good: insomuch that instead of serving GOD, there is nothing in us but corruption and idolatry. Therefore the Heathen had their diversities of superstitions: for every man might forge what he would of his own brain,) and in the meanwhile the living GOD was let alone of all men. And why? For he was not so gracious to the whole world, as to show himself to all men. And so, men became brutish, but that was for want of teaching. Nevertheless, that excused them not: for they be still guilty before GOD. Moreover, the fountain from whence idolatry springs, is the unthankfulness and lewdness of men in that they forsook the living GOD of their own accord.

And when the world was once grown out of kind (as I have said before,) the wretched Paynims ran astray like blind folks: for they had no light to show them the way of salvation. Now here GOD charges the people of Israel with rebellion, if they held not themselves to the law that he gave them. And why? For I am the Everlasting, your God. When as he says, I am the Everlasting: it is an excluding of all the Gods that have been invented by men. As if he should say, there is but only one Godhead, and that is in me. Therefore it is to be concluded, that such as know me and yet do turn away to idols, cannot excuse themselves, but that they have willfully forsaken that living God.

And whereas he adds that he is the God of that people: it is to show that he had declared himself sufficiently. As if he should say, I have shoaled you out from all other men: you see how all other men go wandering astray, and that is for want of guiding and direction. But I have chosen you for my people, and given myself to you.

Seeing then that I am your GOD: hold yourselves henceforth to me, or else you shall be less excusable than the Heathen. Your punishment must needs be double, yes and a hundred fold grievous than theirs, because you shall have falsified your faith which you have plighted to me, and broken the Covenant that I have made with you.

He alleges yet furthermore the favor that he had showed to the people, saying That he had brought them out of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Whereby he means that he has bound the people in such wise to him, as they cannot start away, but they must deserve to be still punished. For inasmuch as they shall have forgotten their deliverance: their unthankfulness shall be double. Seeing they had been redeemed by the hand of God: it behooved them to give over themselves wholly to the service of him that was their Redeemer. And he terms Egypt the house of bondage purposely, to make the people consider thoroughly in what plight they had been there. For we see that they which sighed and cried out when they were oppressed with such violence and tyranny as we read of in Exodus:

desired to return thither again as soon as God had delivered them. And whereof came that, but that they remembered not their oppression anymore, and the devil stopped their eyes, that God's grace might not be esteemed among them as it deserved? That is the cause why Moses terms Egypt the house of bondage. In the end the commandment is added, that the people should not have any other gods before his face, whom they ought to account for their God.

Now let us apply all this doctrine to our own use. First of all whereas he says, I am the Everlasting: let us learn to weigh this saying in such sort, that seeing God's Majesty is appeared to us, we imagine not any other Godhead. For God cannot abide any companion. If the Sun do darken the light of all the Stars: is it not reason that when God shows himself, all men should worship him, and that all the glory that was before should be then as it were utterly defaced? Yes: and therefore is it said by the Prophets, that when the Lord reigns, there shall be none other light but his: insomuch the even the Sun shall be dimmed, and the Moon be turned into darkness. This serves to show us, that if we mingle any of the fancies of our own heads with God: it is a diminishing of the right that belongs to him. For he cannot away with any companion. Therefore this word Everlasting must drive all fantasticalness from us, that we take not leave to imagine one thing or other. Let us be contented to have the only one God, and let his suffice us. And for the same cause also is it said, that when our Lord Jesus sets up his feat in the world, then shall the idols of Egypt fall down. Now this text belongs to us. For like as Moses said to the people of old time, The everlasting has appeared to you, and therefore you must drive away all idols from among you: so now, seeing that God has declared himself to us in the person of his only son, it is mere that all idols should down. We know that the Country of Egypt was full fraught with them above all the rest of the world. Now then whereas we were plunged in lies and darkness before, and had an infinite number of idols: all those things must melt and vanish away, when as God tells us that he is the Everlasting. And whereas moreover he terms himself our God: it is to acquaint us with him, that we may know his Majesty after a loving fashion. For if God should speak but only his everlastings and of his being: we should for the most part be utterly abashed. True it is, that this were sufficient to condemn all our dotages: But yet for all that, so it falls out, that we cannot be properly instructed thereby to our own use and profit. Therefore when God has once showed us that he only is to be worshipped and honored: then must he also come to us after a gentle and familiar manner, that we may feel him to be our father and master, and know that his will is to make a covenant with us, to the intent that we should stick to him. This is the thing that is meant by the title that is attributed to him in this text, as if he should say, I come not only as the everlasting to make you afraid: but therewithal I am also your God, I have chosen you to myself, I intend to have you for mine heritage. Now then we see how GOD authorizes his Law, to the intent we should receive it with all reverence and loveliness: and yet therewithal vouchsafes to make it amiable, to the end we should taste of it, and take pleasure to submit ourselves to it, and suffer ourselves to be ruled by the doctrine therein contained. And so to be short all excuse is bereft us, if we honor not our God nowadays be renouncing all superstitions, and all things that are contrary to his service. Why so? Because the titles which he attributes here to himself to hold us in awe, ought to draw us to him. When as he speaks of his sovereignty over us, and says he is our God: that ought to make us to taste of his fatherly goodness. And both of them are contained here. We see then that there remains no more to do, but to hearken to the things that are told using God's Law, and to hold ourselves simply to the same. And that is the cause why he upbraided the people of Israel, that they neither loved him nor feared him. If I be your God and master, where is your fear? And if I be your father, where is your love, says he by his Prophet Malachy? No doubt but the Prophet has an eye to the thing that Moses touches briefly here. For when God names himself the everlasting: it is to the end we should yield him the reverence that is due to him. And whereas he names himself the God of that people: it is to the end to win them by friendliness, and to show them that seeing he had chosen them, it was good reason that they should put themselves wholly into his hands. Now if it were so under the law: it agrees much more to us nowadays. For although God have vouchsafed to be as it were abashed in the person of his only son: yet notwithstanding he continued still in his glory, and it was no abatement of the highness whereof mention is made here. The abasing of our Lord Jesus Christ, was an infallible evidence of the mercy of our God: but yet howsoever it were, it ought not to make us to despise him. For it was Gods will to draw us to his infinite glory by that means, to the intent that we should worship him seeing he came down after that fashion unto us. Justly then may he upbraid us now a days, that we be utterly inexcusable, if we do not both fear him and love him. For he shows himself to be both our God and our master. Where then is our fear, if we make none account of his commandments, but be so hard hearted at his threatening as to set light by them, and to go on still in evil deeds, & to make but a mock of it though he show himself to be our judge and call us to a reckoning? Where is the reverence that we owe to our God? For if it were a mortal creature, we would stand in more awe of him than we do of the living God, who has all superiority over us. Again, it is not enough for us to fear God after a slavish manner, as by constraint: but our fear must be matched with love. And for the same cause he names himself our father. Yea and we have to note, that in showing himself to be the GOD of Israel, under that saying he meant to be our Savior also. You are our GOD (says the Prophet Abacuck) and we cannot perish. Now then, let us bear these titles well in mind, for they belong to us, that is to say, they ought to serve for our instruction at this day, when the Majesty of God is appeared in our Lord Jesus Christ.

And here withal we must also note what he adds concerning the favor that he showed to his people. I have brought you (says he) out of the land of Egypt. Of a truth God meant hereby to bind the people of Israel to him most specially above all other nations. And that is the cause why he makes express mention of their deliverance. Nevertheless, when God speaks, we must bethink us of all the benefits whereby he has bound us to himself, which are infinite & inestimable. But yet must we taste of them after our ability, and apply all our understanding to them, and forasmuch as we see that we come short, we must strain ourselves the more, to know at leastwise so much by them, as may teach us to fear and love our God. Does God then speak? We must first consider, that it is he which has created and fashioned us: and therefore we be his. Look here a benefit that is singular enough already. Were there no more but his setting of us in this world and his maintaining of us here: could we recompense it as we be bound to do, though every of us employed himself to serve him to the uttermost of our power? No: But yet further when we behold that records of his love which he gives us both above and beneath, as that he has made the world for our sakes, that he has ordained and appointed all things to our use, that he has printed his image in us to the intent we should be immortal: and that he has prepared a better inheritance for us than this transitory life: when we see all there things, must it not needs be that we be worse than blockish, if we be not ravished with earnest affection to worship our God, and to vow and dedicate ourselves wholly to him? Yes: but besides this we must bethink us of all the good turns which God has done us, as well in general as in particular: and then must we confess with David, Lord, when I think upon your benefits, behold, my wit is plunged as it were into bottomless pit: yea they be more in number than the hairs of my head, as it is said in the forth Psalm. Again, when we have acknowledged how much we be beholden to our God generally: let us also consider the benefits that every of us have received at Gods hand particularly.

And whereas it was said to the people of Israel, in old time, I brought you out of the land of Egypt: let us consider whence our Lord delivered us when he vouchsafed to admit us into his household and Church. For we be Adams children, by nature cursed, heirs of death, altogether sinful, and consequently must needs be loathsome to our God. Let men like of themselves and glory of the themselves as much as they list: yet notwithstanding this is their pedigree, this is a their nobility, namely that they be Satans bond slaves, that they have a sink of sin and corruption in them, and that they have nothing but Gods wrath and curse hanging over their heads and to be short, that being banned from the kingdom of heaven, they be delivered up to all mischief and woe. But our Lord has delivered us from there things by the hand of his son, he has not sent us a Moses as he did to the people of old time: nay he has nor spared his only son, but has delivered him to death for us. Seeing then that we be ransomed with so dear and inestimable a price, as is the holy blood of the son of God: ought we not to give ourselves wholly unto him? Furthermore if Egypt were termed a house of bondage: I pray you what is it when that devil holds us in his bonds and under his tyranny, so as we have no means to scape death, but are shut out from all hope of salvation, and God is utterly against us? Seeing we be delivered from all these things, is it not a much more excellent deliverance, than that which Moses here speaks of? Yes: and therefore whereas it was said to the people of old time, your GOD has brought you out of the land of Egypt: now it is said that we be not our own, as says Saint Paul in the fourteenth to the Romans, and also in the seventh of the first Epistle to the Corinthians. We be not our own: the faithful must not take leave to do what they list, nor to live every man after his own liking. And why? Because our Lord Jesus Christ died, and is risen again to reign both over quick and dead. Then is it good reason that Jesus Christ should be Lord of life and death, seeing he spared not himself when our redemption & salvation were to be wrought.

And moreover, besides that the son of God has offered up himself for redemption: let us understand that he makes us partakers of that benefit at this day, by means of the Gospel. For he gathers us to him to the intent we, should be of his flock. True it is that he is the Lamb without spot which wipes away the sins of the world, and that he has offered himself up to reconcile men unto God. But yet for all that, we see a great number of people that are let alone, against whom the gate is shut, and GOD does not grant them the grace to be enlightened by faith as we be. And therefore let us mark well that seeing the Gospel is preached unto us, and we have there a warrant that the son of God will make the redemption available in us which he has once wrought, and cause us to enjoy the benefit thereof: we must learn that our thanklessness will be the shamefuller, if we do not our endeavor to give ourselves to our God, who has bound us to himself after that sort. If the unbelievers play the look Colts, and overshoot themselves in their superstitions, and in wantonness of life well, it is because they have no bridle, he has not reigned them back as he does his household folk. We see the horrible confusion that is in Popery but yet there is not any doctrine to pluck men back to God: nay rather, that doctrine which is there, does draw them quite and clean from him. And we see that the dwell has gone such footing there, that all is full of trumpery and illusions, and the living God is quite forsaken. And so you see that there is a horrible confusion. But as for our part, seeing that God draws us to himself, is it not a straighter bond to make us to link in thoroughly with him, and to hold ourselves under obedience of the doctrine that is set forth to us in his name? Yes: and therefore let us learn to stick so to our God as we may renounce all that ever we can imagine of our own head: and let us consider that it is not for us to swarve one way or other anymore, or to be tossed too and fro in anywise, assuring ourselves that there is but only one God, who will possess us, yea and possess us in such wise, as his honor be not taken from him and bestowed upon creatures, that he watches over us to the end we should know that it is only he on whom we ought to call, and to whose grace we ought to repair for succor. And finally forasmuch as it is his will to have and accept us to be of his household: let us walk as in his presence and in his sight, and that in such wise as we worship him as our only God, not only with Ceremonies and outward protestation, but also in our hearts, as they that know that his service is spiritual, and to be short, let him possess both our bodies and our souls, that he may be thoroughly glorified in all respects.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, that it may lead us to true repentance to be mortified more and more, so as our wicked lusts may be cut off, and we be wholly given to fear and honor him: and that forasmuch as we cannot serve him thoroughly as he deserves, so long as we be held down under the infirmities of our flesh: it may please him to uphold us, until he have clothed us with his own righteousness. And so let us all say, Almighty God, &c.

On Monday, the 17th of June 1555

The thirty second Sermon, which is the third upon the fifth Chapter

8 You shall not make you any graven image nor the likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth.

9 You shall not bow down to them nor worship them. For I am the Lord your God, a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children, even upon the third and fourth generation of them that hate me:

10 And showing mercy in a thousand generations, to them that love me and keep my commandments.

Orasmuch as men are so inclined to corrupt Gods service with wicked superstitions: God is fain to threaten them, that they may be held under as it were by force, or else their fondness would carry them away to surmise of God, contrary to that which may beseem his Majesty. And this is a very notable point, as I have touched heretofore. For in as much as the people of Israel knew the living God: it may seem to be as it were needless to forbid them to make any image. Howbeit by reason of our cursed inclination, it was behoofefull that this forbidding should be added as straight as we see it here. And it is well for us that it is so. For this sin is rooted as it were in our very bones: in so much that if God told us not that he cannot away with idolatry, and that he wounded us not with that threat: there is none of us all which would not forge infinite idols to himself, and by that means the honor of that living God should be conveyed over unto our own imaginations. Wherefore let us mark well, that here we be convinced to have a forward and cursed nature which draws always to superstition, and that it is requisite for us to be restrained after a violent manner. For of our own will we can never serve GOD so purely, as to imagine nothing of him but as may beseem him. And here withal we see also whereunto our good intents serve us. For if there bee anything wherein men may excuse themselves, by imagining that they do well: it is in forging of idols. For to what end do they make them, but to serve GOD, that they may be stirred up to the greater devotion, and be the surer that God will grant their requests? Therefore by this means men might shroud themselves under colour of good intent. But we see on the contrary part, that God abhorred it: We see how he utters the grievous sentence of condemnation, against all such as proceed to behave themselves so after their own imagination.

They may well enough say, (and so it is indeed) that their meaning is to serve God. But what for that? He accepts no such service, but rather curses it and utterly dislikes it, & that justly. For (as I have showed before) it is a disguising of his Majesty, to make any visible image into him. Therefore this text teaches us to forbear to do the things that seem good to ourselves, and specially that when Gods service comes in question, we must not attempt anything upon our own head, but in all simplicity follow that which he ordains by his word, without putting anything at all thereto. For look how soon we swarve never so little from that: allege we what we can, and set we never so good countenance upon our case: God will not fade to punish us. For this threatening of his is not in vain where he says, That he is a jealous & angry God, which vifiterh the wickedness of the fathers upon the Children.

You see then how there are two points for us to remember in this text. The one is, that forasmuch as we be naturally too much given to idolatry, we must always set this threat of God before our eyes, that we take not upon us to mingle anything with his word, or to devise any worshipping of images, but serve God purely according to his own nature, and not after our own fancy. Let that serve for one point. The other is, that we must consider, that we must not pretend our own good intents, to justify the things that we ourselves have invested: but contrariwise bear in mind that the chief service which God requires, is obedience.

But now let us come to the words that are set down here. First God says, I am your everlasting God, yea even the strong or rather mighty God. Here again he sets himself against idols. For we have seen heretofore, that to correct superstition, he did set himself forth in his majesty. And surely Gods manifesting of himself, is to bereave men of all excuse. So long as we know not the true Religion, no nor can discern which is the true God: it is no marvel though our wits run at rovers, and we gad up and down without any certain stay, ao as we be ever straying. But contrariwise, when God has once showed himself unto us, & give us knowledge of his truth: it is good reason that all our own dotages should sink, and that we should stick to the thing that we know. For this cause God repeats the matter, how he had declared himself to the people of Israel, and chosen them to himself to the purpose to govern them, even by his Law which is now published. And he terms himself expressly a jealous or angry God: for the Hebrew word that is placed here, betokens both twain. And although he call himself God here: yet the word that he uses comes of strength. Now then whereas he terms himself jealous; no doubt but his meaning is, that he cannot abide the violating of his honor, or that men should rob him of that which is his own, to give it unto creatures: he is not so patient as to suffer such treachery. And therefore although Gods honor be not so greatly regarded of us as it deserves: this argues not that he neglects it: for in the end we shall find that he has not forgotten himself; but that he will maintain his glory, accordingly also as he declares through out the whole holy scripture.

Truly, if we had but one drop of good reason, we would be jealous over the honor of our God, so as we should need no encouragement thereto, but rather should endeavor to perform saying of the Psalm, that the zeal of him should even consume us, and we should be so set on fire within, that whensoever we saw his Majesty dishonored or lightly esteemed, we should feel as it were a burning fire within us. But what? We be nice in maintaining our own honor but in the meanwhile we suffer Gods honor to be trodden under foot, and to be scoffed at, and to be made sport of, or rather to be rent in pieces, when the world gives itself to idolatry. Howbeit, for as much as we do not our duty; our Lord having cast us in the tes with our lewdness and unthankfulness, must be fain to show us, that although we have been lazy & negligent, yet will not he fail to have such a zeal as is requisite for the maintenance of his honor, so as he will be revenged of men for defacing of it after that manner.

And to the end we should know that God being jealous of his honor, is also well able to punish idolaters: he uses that name of his which betokens strength or mightiness, as I have declared already. And it behooves us to join those two worries together. For Moses means the same thing that is better expressed in the Prophet Nahum where he says, The Lord is a jealous God, a God of vengeance, a God that punishes such as have offended him, a God that watches over his enemies, a God that will come with whirlwind and tempest. The Prophet uses this manner of speech, that God is jealous; that is to say that he forgets not himself, nor shuts his eyes when men despise him, but marks every whit of it, and inregifireth it before him, and they must come to account for it. And having spoken of the said disposition; that is to say, that God will maintain his honor: he shows immediately that he has wherewith to do it, and that he is armed with power to punish his foes, so as they cannot scape his hand. That is the cause why he speaks of whirlwind and tempest: that is the cause why he speaks of vengeance: insomuch that if God seem to dissemble things for a time, yet he has an eye to his enemies, and will in convenient season make them to feel with whom they had to do, and that they provoked the living God. Now we see what Moses meant here: that is to wit, that God sets great store by his own honor: and that although we bear ourselves in hand that we shall scape unpunished when we have violated his service, or by any means corrupted it: yet notwithstanding he will show that he has not forgotten himself, and that he will maintain himself. Mark that for one point.

Besides this, he is also mighty to put the same jealousy in execution. He is not like mortal men, which are angry and cholerick when dishonor, dishonesty, or wrong is offered them, but yet are not able to do as they would. God is no such a one: for he is armed with power to confound all his enemies. Indeed we must not imagine any human affections in God, that he should be moved as we see that men be. There is no wrathfulness in God. But forasmuch as we cannot conceive him as he is: he is fain to apply himself to our rudeness. Therefore whensoever the scripture speaks of anger, of wrath, or of indignation: it is not for that God is inclinable, or for that he resembles us, or for that he is moved thereto: [no,] he stands always at one stay, and there is not so much as any little overshadowing in him, as says S. James, who uses the same similitude to show that there can be no change in his being. Howbeit forasmuch as we conceive not Gods judgments and threatening, but by the terms of your anger, wrath, and indignation: therefore does the holy scripture speak so of him. Wherefore let us mark first of all, how GOD has showed us in this text, that it is a dreadful thing to fall into his hands. And specially that if we corrupt the pureness of his service with our wicked inventions, and will needs attempt whatsoever our own brain devises: we shall feel with whom we have to do, and that he is too great a Lord for us to dally with after that fashion.

Moreover God thinks it not enough to threaten the parties themselves that turn away from this Law through their idolatrousness: he thinks it not enough to tell them that he will punish the persons themselves: but he extends his vengeance even to their issue also. I am (says he) a jealous God which visiteth the sins of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation. It should seem at the first blush to be unseemly for Gods Justice; that he should punish the children for the offences of their fathers and mothers. And besides that it is utterly against natural reason: we see what is said of it in the prophecy of Ezechiel: namely that the party which sins shall bear his own burden: so as the son shall no more bear the sin of his father, than the father shall bear the sin of his son. This text then may seem somewhat rough and sharp, yea and to deface the uprightness and equity that is in God: for sin craves his wages, that is to say the death of him that commits it. Why then should he die which is guiltless? Again, although this reason were not so evident: yet does the holy scripture owe, that God tells us he will not punish the guiltless children for the sins of their parents. Yea and he rebukes the Jews for this blasphemy which ran in their mouths, whereof they had made a common proverb: Our fathers have eaten sour grapes, and our teeth are set on edge with it: Gods handling of us thus rigorously is not for any fault of our own committing, for we have lived as we ought to do: but he over reaches us with the sins of our fathers. After that manner did the Jews grudge against GOD. But he swears that such blasphemy shall take place no more.

Now if all be well considered there is no contrariety at all. For in the said text of Ezechiels, GOD meant nothing else but that those whom he punished could not allege innocence, nor say he did them wrong in using rigor against them, but that every one of them should find themselves guilty, so as he himself should be justified, and they well perceive that he went not beyond measure and reason. And this is very certain. For although GOD punish the children for their father's sakes: yet ceases he not to be righteous in such chastisements. For if the children be well examined, they shall find themselves guilty on their own behalf: yea (say I), even though they were but newly born, and had never done any open fault that were known to the world. For what manner offspring are we? What bring we with us by nature but utter naughtiness? You see then that even infants are sinners beforehand: they be condemned before GOD being yet in their mothers wombs. The evil is not yet perceived: but yet for all that their nature is sinful and forward, they have a secret seed within them, and they be already in condemnation, because of the original sin that is come from Adam upon all mankind.

Now seeing that the little babes are not exempted from the wrath and curse of GOD, in so much that if he punish them it is not without cause, neither can men say but that he proceeds always uprightly as a good Judge: much less can they that are men grown owe themselves to be innocent, but they shall much rather be found guilty. And so as concerning Ezechiel's purpose, it is an evident matter that God punishes not the guiltless children for their fathers sakes: for there is fault to be found even in them also.

Furthermore where as he says that he punishes the sins of the fathers upon the children: let us mark how that is done, and then will this doubt be yet better discussed. First of all we know that God is not anything intended unto us, and that if he do us any good, it is of his own free goodness, and not for that he is bound unto us. Now if he list to use rigor towards us, he may leave us all in condemnation as those that are there already. Let God but only withhold his mercy, and show himself as a judge to the whole world, and what will become of it? We be all forlorn, there is no remedy for us, both great and small, fathers and children, I say all of us without exception are damned every chone, if God draw us not out of the cursed case wherein we be, yea and that he do it not of his own free bestowed goodness, without being bound thereunto. Now then setting that God might destroy us and cast us all away: is he to be blamed, is there any fault to be found with him, if it please him to use his goodness and mercy towards some, and to call them to him, and to deliver them out of the bottomless pity wherein they be? No. For our eye must not be spiteful because he has pity upon his creatures. And although he use not like courtesy towards all men: yet does it become us to keep our mouths shut: yea and sometimes again we ought to open them wide to confess that all his doings are in uprightness and equity, though they surmount our capacity. For we cannot always perceive why God disposes so of men: but our prattling must be put down, and we must learn to reverence God in his judgments when they be too high and too secret for us to attain to. Howsoever the case stand, let this stand for a general rule, that God might let us alone in the destruction wherein we be if he thought good, and that by that means all the world might perish: but forasmuch as it pleases him to show himself pitiful and gentle, not towards all, but towards one part of them, therefore puts he a difference between the one and the other. And there upon he leaves whom he lists in their own cursedness wherein they were born.

Now if it be demanded why GOD uses mercy after that manner towards the one sort and rigor towards the other: truly the first cause thereof is unknown to us, and we ought not to be of it. And why? for it becomes our wits to be locked up and imprisoned in that behalf, and we ought to confess that God has free power to choose whom he lists and to cast away the rest. But howsoever the case stand, he makes this promise to the faithful, that he will have mercy upon their children: and that as he has begun his mercy upon the parents themselves, so he will hold out with it continually unto a thousand generations. We see now that there is some cause why God has pity upon the one sort rather than upon the other. Again on the contrary part, he threatens the unbelievers that he will curse them, not only in themselves, but also in their race, and in those that shall spring of them.

But now let us come to the mercy that God grants, and to the punishment that he extends. His blessing of the faithful folks children, is not in riches, in health, and in all other such things, or in making them to prosper to the world ward: Those are not the greatest blessings which God grants: that is not the end which he begins at: but rather the mercy that he shows them, is that he governs them by his holy spirit, that he gives them the badge of his adopted children, and that he corrects them and purges them from their sins, to fashion them again after his own image. You see then that the mercy which God extends towards the children of the faithful, is that he suffers them not to abide in their own corruption and naughtiness, but reforms and rules them by his holy spirit. This done, he proceeds yet further, and makes them to prosper, even in this world, until the full measure of his mercy be heaped upon them, that is to wit, till he have taken them up into his heavenly kingdom, and there given them everlasting life.

On the contrary part, whereas he punishes the sins of the fathers upon the children: it is as much to say, as he lets their offspring alone in the same plight that they be in. There is a wicked man, there is a despiser of GOD, there is an hypocrite, there is an unbeliever: well may he have children, but God cares not for them (as you would say) and takes them as strangers: and forasmuch as he acknowledges them not to be of the number of his, he vouchsafes not to show himself father like towards them, but lets them run at rovers, so as Satan must needs possess them. And when they, be so destitute of Gods spirit, what can betide them but utter mischief, so as they must provoke him to wrath more and more? Now then does our Lord punish them without cause? Can they say that they be guiltless? No: for there is fault enough in them beforehand. We see then much better, that the thing which God has spoken by Ezechial is true: that is to wit, that the party which had sinned shall receive his own hire as he deserves: and that the guiltless shall not be punished for the guilty and for the offenders sake. Nevertheless we see also, that his saying that he will punish the sin of the fathers upon their children, is not without cause. For why? It is in him to withhold his grace from the children of the wicked and faithless, or of the despisers of his word, or of hypocrites that abuse his name: God is at free liberty to withdraw his spirit from all the whole race of them. And when their children are so alienated from God: what have they, but the corruption of Adam? There is nothing in them but sin and corruption, and therefore they must needs be enemies unto God. You see then how he punishes them justly, and that they cannot shift themselves from his hand, to say that he does them wrong, or that he is cruel to them. All mouths must be stopped in that behalf. True it is that the rebellious sort will never be contented: for we see how there are some, which advance themselves against God with such boldness, as all modest and sober folk may be ashamed of them. But let us suffer those dogs to bark their fill, and let us in the meanwhile glorify our God with all lowliness, acknowledging nevertheless that he has authority and good right to be gracious and favorable to whom he lists. By reason whereof we must conclude, that if God withholds his spirit from the linage of the wicked, he cannot be blamed of cruelty for it: for you see they be punishable when they be so forsaken of him, and are not governed by his holy spirit. Wherefore let us mark well, that this saying impugneth not the saying of Ezechiel.

But let us come back again to the intent of Moses. It is not to be doubted but he meant to imprint a greater fears of God in us, than if he had said but singly, God will punish you when you shall have corrupted his service, by changing anything in Religion and thinks not to scape his vengeance, if you devise any shape of him: for he cannot abide to have his honor defaced after that fashion. Had Moses spoken after that manner, men are so stubborn and hardhearted they would not have been sufficiently touched with fears. But here he proceeds further. God (says he) will not only punish you in your owns persons, but also extend his vengeance to your issue, and not only to your children, but also to the uttermost of your offspring, so as you shall always feel his wrath as a burning fire, and the marks of your wickedness shall appear still after your decease. God will put you to open shame: so as you shall needs be a gazing stock. Although you be rotten in the earth: yet shall Gods vengeance pursue you in such sort, as your sins shall be remembered from age to age, and the world shall know that you have been disobedient, unto him that had bellowed so many benefits upon you, as you ought at leastwise to have been as sheep of his flock, to be ruled by him according to his word.

Now therefore let us learn to be no more so drowsy when God wakens us after that fashion. Surely if he gave us but some inkling of his displeasure by some word or outward sign: it ought to touch us with fear and terror. But we be dull upon the spur: and therefore seeing GOD tells us, that besides his punishing of us in ourselves he will continue his vengeance still upon all our linage, and that those which are begotten of us must be condemned after our death: his speaking after that manner ought at leastwise to make us more ware, to live in awe of him and to call ourselves home to him, least we should provoke his wrath, seeing it is so terrible. Thus you see how we may profit ourselves by this text.

Now he says, of them that hate him. By this term he means all such as break his Law. If it be demanded whether all such as swarve from their obedience to God ward do therefore hate him: this text shows that they do so, [Howbeit] not to their own seeming, but yet in very deeds. And in this case we must not rest upon our own judgment: for only God is competent judge to determine of that matter. And forasmuch as men when they glue themselves to naughtiness, will not say, no nor think in their hearts that they hate God in doing amissed it is requisite that that fault should be discovered. True it is that the hypocrites will indeed pretend, that the love of God causes them to show some good countenance, and in very deed they may well have some seed of it: howbeit, that is but a bastardly and sinful seed, insomuch that this hatred of God appears not in the hypocrites, no nor even in those that lead a disordered and loose life: but yet is it in them though we perceive it not. For like as malefactors could find in their hearts, that there were no judge nor order nor government in the world: so all such as acknowledge not themselves subject to God (at leastwise willingly) are contemptuous against him, and could be contented to have him plucked out of heaven. This is apparent enough in such as are utterly given to willfulness. When men have once let themselves loose to all wickedness: they can no more away with any correction, and thereupon they become so much the less teachable. If a man threaten them, they gnash their teeth at him, they storm at him, and they become as good as mad against God. Now then, this hatred of God is apparent enough in such as have taken lawless leave to do evil, and are carried away with their own lewdness, and as it were sapped in their sins. Again, it is true that this appears not in such as have yet any fear of God in them, & feel some remorse when a man speaks to them of God and of his justice: but yet is there some hate of God in them. Indeed they think it not: but God sees much more clearly than we, and whereas we perceive not things, he notes them. We must always remember how Saint John says, that God is greater than our consciences, that is to say, that if our consciences bear record of our offences, God will not sleep in the meanwhile. And so let us briefly bear in mind, that all such as submit not themselves obediently unto God, nor humble themselves under his majesty to serve him and to honor him: do every one of them hate him, although they show it not at the first by their deeds, nor can be deemed of the world so to do. And for the same cause does God begin at love when he speaks of such as keep his commandments.

He says that he will show mercy in a thousand descents to such as love him. And why? For it is impossible that we should be desirous to honor God and to be obedient unto him, unless we have felt the love that is spoken of here. And this may serve us for a good lesson according as we shall see hereafter, how Moses intending to give us a brief sum of the Law, said: What does the Lord your God require of you O Israel, but that you shouldest love him with all your heart, & that you shouldest stick unto him? Never (say I) do we know what it is to keep Gods Law, and to behave ourselves thereafter, unless we begin at the said love. And why? For God requires willing service. He will not have us to serve him, only upon a slavish fear: but he will have us to go to it with a free and cheerful courage, that we may even take pleasure in honoring him: and that cannot be done without we love him. Wherefore let us mark, that the beginning and as it were the wellspring, foundation, and root of obedience, is the said love of God so as we be not forced to come unto him, but have a singular pleasure in doing it, assuring ourselves that our true blessedness is to desire to be governed altogether, according to his will, and to frame ourselves wholly thereunto.

Moreover let us mark also, that this love cannot be in us, until we have tasted of the goodness of our God. For so long as we imagine God to be against us, we must needs shun him. Will we then love him? will we frame ourselves to the obeying of him, to take all our delight in serving of him? We must first know that he is our father and savior, and that he seeks nothing but to be favorable unto us. When we have so tasted his love towards us: then shall we be provoked to love him as our father. Insomuch that if that love be in us, no doubt but we will obey him, and his law shall reign in our minds, in our affections, and in all our members. For what is the cause why we be so disobedient unto God, but for that we hate him, as I said before? So on the contrary part the love of God will draw us to serve him, and to submit ourselves to his righteousness, so as men shall see a certain conformity and agreeableness betwixt Gods law and all our desires and affections. But yet for the better understanding hereof, let us consider what God is: For he will not be known according to our nature. And when we hear him spoken of, it is not enough for us to give him the title of God: but he will be known as he is indeed: that is to wit, to be righteous and good, as the perfection and fountain of all wisdom, of all power, of all right, and of all equity. Now then let us conceive God as he is: that is to wit, with his justice, righteousness and equity: and then shall we not desire anything else than to fashion ourselves like to him. Contrariwise if we love naughtiness and be wrapped in it, we must needs hate God. For why? Here is no talk of a naked being: we must not imagine God to be as an idol: we must conceive him with his righteousness and equity. Therefore when we hate the things that are in God, that is to say his justice and righteousness: we must needs hate his own self: for he cannot forsake himself, he cannot disguise himself, he cannot transform himself after our fashion: he continues evermore like himself. So then, (as I said before) all such as love God, need not be afraid that they shall not obey his Law and keep his commandments: for they be things united and unseparable. That is the thing which we have to mark upon this place.

And hereby we be warned to shun all stubbornness and all offending, more than we have done: for it is no small matter for us to be declared to be Gods enemies, and as makers of war against him. And yet the case stands so, as we cannot advance ourselves above him, nor turn away from him, nor shake off his yoke: but we be convicted to have been his enemies, and to have made open war against him. And is not that a cursed thing? So then let us learn to abhor our own sins and vices, because they attain us, as traitors to God, and he must needs show himself to be our adversary party. Also here withal we be warned to resort unto God with a pure and right meaning mind. For it is not enough for us to have withheld our feet, hands and eyes from evil doing: but the heart must go before, and we must serve God with a true affection: and this affection must not be enforced, but it must proceed of very love to Godward. Therefore if we mind to keep the Law well we must know that God is a good and kind hearted father towards us, to the end we may be fully persuaded of his love towards us. And therewithal let it never sink in our hearts to dally in protesting that we love God, except the same may appear by our whole life. For when as Moses speaks here of the loving of GOD: he adds, That those which love him do also keep his commandments. Therefore our life must be answerable in that behalf, and be as a certificate whether we love him or hate him.

Furthermore it is not without cause that God comparing here his wrath and vengeance with his mercy, says that he will punish those that bate him even in three or four descents: and show mercy in a thousand descents to them that love him. For thereby he shows the thing which is yet better expressed in other sentences of the scripture: which is, that he is slow to wrath and forward to mercy, and therewithal long suffering, so that where as his anger lasts but a very short time, his mercy is everlasting all the life long. You see then that the very nature of God is such, as he seeks nothing but to draw men to him by all manner of gentleness, and to use his goodness towards them. When he punishes them, it is (as you would say) against his nature. Not that it is not meete for God to punish as well as to show mercy: but his meaning is to show us that his goodness is far the greater: and to be short, that he is not rigorous, but that his only desire is to utter his good will to us, if we would suffer him: for in very deed he would fain be known to be good and pitiful, and it is the thing wherein his glory does chiefly shine forth. Therefore let us mark well how it is not for naught that Moses has assigned here a thousand generations to Gods mercy: and restrained his wrath and vengeance to a three or four generations. As if he should say: It is true that our Lord will not suffer superstition unpunished. When you shall have corrupted his service and defaced his honor by gadding after your own dotages, you shall feel the punishment thereof, yea and even your children after you must be fain to feel it to: insomuch that when the fire of his wrath is once kindled upon you, it shall not be quenched again so soon as you wean for: but yet for all that he will not fail to be pitiful still, and his mercy shall always be greater than his wrath. And indeed, like as by the threat which we have heard, GOD intended to hold the world in the true religion, to the end they should not make idols and puppets to themselves so was it his will also, that the promise which is contained here should assure us to him, if we bear him the love and reverence which we ought to do: and he had lever to win us by his goodness than to restrain us by his threatening. And therefore he said, My children, look not that I should punish you. Truly if you provoke me, I will not suffer myself to be so mocked at your hands: but yet for all that, when I have told you of my displeasure, I had much lever to train you and to win you to me by mercy. Therefore I tell you that if you abide pure and sound in my obedience: I also will continue in doing good unto you even unto a thousand generations, so as your children after you shall find me the same still. Thus you see what we have to remember upon that sentence.

Moreover for a conclusion, it is not for naught that God uses the term Mercy, notwithstanding that it be as a reward for the service that is done unto him. He might well have said, I will consider the service of such as shall have honored and served me: and when men shall have loved me by keeping my commandments, I will show them that they have not lost their labor in taking pains to honor me. God might have spoken so: but he said, I will show mercy. And how may that be? Does it not seem that if we serve God, he owes us recompense? No: but he owes that his doing good to such as honor him and follow his commandments, is not of bound duty nor for any desert of theirs: for even in so doing he uses mercy still. And the term Mercy serves to beat down all pride of men so as they may not boat of their own worker, as though they were worthy of recompense: but rather consider that thereby God meant to declare, that when we serve him the best that we can, we have still need to be born withal at his hand, and to have our faults and infirmities forgiven us. Thus are there two things for us to mark in this place. The one is that although we serve God never so purely, yet his recompensing of us is not upon any duty that he owed unto us. For indeed whence comes our serving of him, but of his mere grace? And what can he then owe unto us? Nay, there is yet a further matter: namely that we should all of us be found faulty in his sight, if he listed to examine us rigorously. So then, whereas God recompenses us for our serving of him: he does it for his own mere goodness, and therefore not of any bound duty: but (which more is) he is fain to pardon our sins and to bear with us, yea even in the good that we do. Wherefore let us consider that God shows himself so gracious and freehearted towards us, that whereas he might make us to feel his rigor, he is contented to make us taste of his mercy by bearing with us in our infirmities. For let us not think but that without his mercy we were all undone: and that although we strove never so much to obey him, yet we should be found faulty, if he used not that foresaid gracious goodness whereof he speaks. So then, that is the thing whereunto we must flee for refuge, if we intend to be sure of our salvation.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, that it may lead us to true repentance, so as being taught to fear him, we may stand in such awe, that as soon as he threatens us with his wrath, we may conceive the power that is in him, to the end that being humbled in ourselves, we may have recourse to his fatherly goodness, not doubting but that when he has once begun to show himself a father and Savior towards us, he will continue so still yea even after our decease, so that we shrink not from him through our own naughtiness and disobedience. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The thirty third Sermon which is the fourth upon the fifth Chapter 11 You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless which takes his name in vain.

F we were well advised, we needed not to be taught to yield reverence to our God: for nature ought to lead us thereto. To what end are we created in this world? To what end are we here, but to honor him to whom we be beholden for all good things, and to give ourselves to the glorifying of his majesty? That then is the end and whole sum of our life. But in the mean season, instead of honoring our God, and of applying ourselves that way: we seem to have conspired the clean contrary. For some of us would have all remembrance of God buried: some despise him and mock him: and other some blaspheme him with open mouth: to as we show sufficiently, that we know not to what end we live or should live. Now forasmuch as there is this vice in us: God intending to redress the same, tells us that we ought at leastwise to refrain from abusing his holy name: for that is as an unhallowing thereof. And therefore has he forbidden men to take his name in vain. By these words he means, that we must consider well which is the right and lawful use of his name. Of a truth we be not worthy to take Gods name in our mouth after any manner at all, for we must remember what the Prophet Esay said in his sixth Chapter: Lord (quote he) I have unclean lips, and dwell among a people that is altogether defiled. Seeing then that we have nothing but infection and filthiness in us: it is certain that we may not take Gods name in our mouth, at leastwise if it were not that God of his goodness were willing that we should use his name, so it be to glorify him withal. Therefore let us mark well, that when as it is said that we shall not take the name of God in vain: our Lord rebukes us for our unthankfulness, if we have not the skill to use his name as he has given us leave, by following the rule that is set down in his word: for that is the lawful mean whereby we may rightly use the name of God.

Nevertheless to the end that this may be yet plainly understood: we must mark, that under one particular, God meant to show us here what a majesty is in his name, to the intent we should not speak of it, but with all reverence and honor. Therefore he takes one particular kind, to wit, of an oath, specially when occasion serves to swear: and uses it for all prophaning of God his name whatsoever. We see how our Lord loves us, seeing he lends us his name whereby to communicate with our neighbors, so as if there happen any doubt or variance among us, it may be dispatched by that mean: that is to wit, if we be not believed, and a matter hang in doubt, the name of GOD may come in as an umber, to dispatch all controversy, so as the matter may be certain and sure by such confirmation. Is it not an inestimable goodness, that our God humbles himself in that sort, as to give us leave to use his name? Yes. And why? for it is certain that Gods majesty is so precious, as it ought not to be abased so low: but yet he vouchsafes to apply himself unto us, and therefore so much the greater is the villainy, if we unhallow Gods name in our oaths. And that is done, not only by forswearing ourselves: but also by taking Gods name at adventure, without regarding to speak with good discretion, or whether the thing that we have in hand, is worthy to be so confirmed or no. Therefore when men go to it so at all adventure, Gods name is as it were unhallowed. It is true that GOD takes it as a kind of his service, when men swear by his name: not that he is beholden to us for it, but clean contrariwise. For as I have touched already, we must in this case consider how GOD bears with us, in that he gives us leave to use his name. But yet do we by our swearing acknowledge that God has all superiority over us. The inferior swears by his superior, said the Apostle to the Hebrews. And surely if we wish to what end an oath serves, it cannot agree but only to the majesty of GOD. For our meaning is to warrant such things as are secret and have no proof among men. But that cannot be done by any creature: God must be fain to show himself in that behalf, as he that searches men's hearts to the very bottom. And again it is not for naught that he challenges to himself the title of truth. We see then that in swearing, we do homage unto God by protesting him to be our judge, and the only party to whom we have recourse in doubtful and secret cases, because it is his office to bring them to light, and again he will maintain the truth, since the same belongs to his honor. That is the cause why God takes it to be a kind of serving of him, when men do swear by his name, howbeit so as the others be not needless. And hereby we see that the fault of such as forswear themselves, or as swear rashly, is so much the grceuous: for it is as a violating of Gods service, and as an abolishing of it, as much as in us lies.

As touching them that commit periuric: they be not only guilty of taking Gods name in vain, and of abusing the same falsely: but also they be traitors and wicked caitifes. Can we devise to do a greater outrage to our GOD, than to abolish or deface his truth? No: for there is nothing more peculiar unto him. And therefore it is all one as if we would pluck him out of his seat, yea and utterly bereave him of all divine honor and glory: which thing is done when men turn his truth into a lie. Therefore whosoever forswears himself, that is to say, whosoever takes Gods name with an evil conscience, whether it be to colour lies, or to beguile, or to disguise matters: surely he blasphemeth in so doing. And I say expressly, if we go about to disguise matters. Why so? For many do dispench with themselves, under colour that they cannot be convicted of perjury before men. And why is that? Because they turn the cat in the pan, and set such a face upon their matters, as it may seem that they forswear not themselves at all. But God likes not any such subtleties. Wherefore let us not imagine that we shall be quit and scape scot-free before him, when we shall have used such fetches and starting holes. Thus we see in effect, that all such as take Gods name otherwise than soundly and simply, do commit blasphemy. Let that serve for one point.

Now as for them that swear to no purpose and unadvisedly: they show well enough that they make none account of God, and that they do but dally with him. Indeed they protest the contrary: they can well enough say that their intent is nothing so: but that is but hypocrisy: for the deed itself shows sufficiently that they bear no reverence unto GOD. If we have a mortal man in estimation, we will not take his name in vain, we would not that men should make a babbling of it, or intermeddle it with scornful and scoffing words. Nay we would take that in reproach. And would we have more privilege than the living God? We be wretched carrions and dung: and yet would we be had in honor and estimation, and that our God should be our underling? We see then that there are very few of good religion nowadays in the world. Although a great number pretend to be Christians: yet they never will what it is to worship God, or to do him homage, or to yield him the service that belongs unto him. For how does Gods name trot about? Men cannot bargain for a quart [of wine,] but some oath must be rapt out with it. If Gods honor were esteemed among us: surely we would abstain from such needless oaths: nay rather we would abhor them. And yet nowadays men make but a sport of them, and if a man be rebuked for his swearing, he thinks he has great wrong done him. If there be any talk that is not for a mans profile, he will be weary of it and grieved at it, yea and find fault with it: but if any of us be so zealous to Godward, as to be grieved at the abasing of his name: by and by a quarrel is picked to him, they despite him, and gnash their teeth at him. But seeing that the world takes so fast hold of the despising of GOD, and is so hardened in it: it is a sign that there is no more knowledge of his majesty.

Again although men take so lawless leave under colour that it is an ordinary matter, and have made custom a Law: yet will God show in the end, that he makes more account of his name than men have done, and that if we make havoc of it, we shall pay dearly for it, and we shall be driven in the end, to know that we have defiled the land where we dwelt, and we must be called to a reckoning for all the benefits that we received there, and which GOD bestowed upon us with his hand, because we acknowledged not the author of them, to yield him his due honor for them. You see then that the first thing which we have to mark in this text, is that God bears with us and uses such gentleness towards us, as he is well contented that we shall use his name in all lawful cases: by the which grant of his we may well perceive, that he is more than fatherly towards us. Nevertheless he warns us therewithal, to be more ware in abstaining from all wicked oaths. For as for perjuries, (as I said before) it is an offering of too outrageous and cursed villainy unto him, because his truth is turned into lying, and we be false dealers to the uttermost of our power. And so you see that that is a passing deadly crime.

But it is not enough for us to refrain from perjury: it behooves us also to look that our oaths be sober, and that Gods name be not tossed among us like a tennis ball: but that necessity may excuse us in our using thereof. And forasmuch as by our swearing we give to understand that GOD has all superiority over us: therein we see that the oaths which are made by creatures are wicked and proceed of superstition. As for example, whereas in the Popedom men swear by S. Antony or by, S. John: it is all one as if they made idols of them. And why so? For we must always bethink us of this saying of the Apostle which I alleged before, namely that by our swearing by the name of God, we owe him to be our superior, yea and our sovereign Lord. And that is the cause also why God swears to confirm us in his promises, or rather to waken us when he sees willful and hardened in our sins, so as we be not afraid of his justice. He swears: and by whom? Even by himself. He reserves that honor to himself, as shall be declared more at large in the 6. Chapter of this book. And therefore they that swear by creatures are idolaters. By reason whereof, in speaking of superstitions, the oath is set down as a record to prove that men are turned away from the pureness of the Law. The Shepherds (said Jeremy) which have the charge of leading Gods people, must teach them to swear by the name of God: that is to say, to lay away all other oaths, and to intermingle no creatures in that behalf.

Furthermore whereas the name of God is mentioned: let us mark that it is not the only speaking of that word, that is forbidden us: but that we must have a regard to the substance of it, as I have said already. God is not a sophister to use trifling subtleties towards us: but he has an eye to the deed itself. There are that will not swear expressly by the name of GOD: but yet they cease not to be faulty and offenders. For we must refer ourselves to that which our Lord Jesus Christ speaks in the fifth of Saint Mathew. When you swear by heaven (said he) is it not the seat of the living God? If you swear by his temple is it not the place where his majesty rests? Then if we think we shall not be condemned, so we express not the name of God: it is a fondness. Let us not beguile ourselves therewithal: for it is too childish an excuse. For why? Does not the heaven bear a representation of Gods Majesty?

You see then that his glory is thereby diminished. As much is to be said of the earth. For it is his foot stool, as Jesus Christ auoucheth in the fore alleged text. Wherefore let us learn in few words, that we must yield such reverence to the name of God, as to put away all oaths from among us, saving so far forth as necessity requires, and as God gives us leave to borrow his name. And moreover, let us always follow this, to keep this simplicity in our talk, to say it is so assuring ourselves that whatsoever is more, is evil and condemned by the law, that is to wit, if we take the name of God in vain. And indeed there is a double mischief to be seen in all needless oaths, and wherein Gods name is not honored as it ought to be. For when men let them fly so at all adventure: it is a token that they pass not what they say. Again, whereof comes it, but only of this, that folk are so full of lying and deceit, as no man can believe that which is said to him, when one speaks to another? Needs must be great forward ness and naughtiness among them. Whereas God has given us a tongue, it is partly to the intent we should common one with another thereby, so it is as you would say the messenger of the heart, so as thereby we express the things that we have conceived in our minds. We see then that needless oaths spring of the untrustiness of men. And there needs no inquisition or long trial of the matter: for every man has his own witness in that behalf. How so ever the case stand let us learn to use such modesty in this respect, as God commands that we swear not without cause nor unrequired.

Howbeit to make this matter the easier to be understood, many do bear themselves in hand that when they swear by their faith, it is not material. Indeed the most part of them swear by nothing at all: for they have no more faith than dogs: they have neither conscience nor Religion. But yet shall not the name of Faith fail therefore to be esteemed before God: for he sets much store by it, and counts it as a holy thing, which cannot nor ought not to be so unhallowed, except we will needs make ourselves guilty, and run in danger of the threat that is uttered here, as we see. Now then let us mark well that it is not enough for us to have forborne to swear expressly By God: but also that if a man swear by his faith, or use any confirmation wherein there is any mark of Gods majesty: his name is unhallowed in so doing. And what shall then become of such as not only use false oaths to countenance their matters withal, and swear at all adventure and as it were in scorn and mockery: but do also spite God with horrible blasphemies, so as they spare neither flesh, blood, nor death nor anything else? Are such men to be held as only guilty of simple abiding of Gods name? No: but as guilty of the heinousness villainy that can be done. Behold our Lord Jesus Christ the Lord of glory, abased himself for a time as says S. Paul. Now if there were no more but this, that he being the fountain of life, became a mortal man, and that he having dominion over the Angels of heaven, took upon him the shape of a servant, yea even to shed his blood for our redemption, and in the end to suffer the curse that was due unto us: were it convenient that notwithstanding all this, he should nowadays in recompense thereof be torn in pieces, by the stinking mouths of such as name themselves Christians? For when they swear by his blood, by his death, by his wounds and by whatsoever else: is it not a crucifying of Gods son again as much as in them lies, and as at rending of him in pieces? And are not such folk worthy to be cut off from Gods Church, yes and men from the world, and to be no more numbered in the array of creatures? Should our Lord Jesus have such reward at our hands, for his abasing and humbling of himself after that manner? God in upbraiding his people says thus: My people, what have I done to you? I have brought you out of Egypt, I have led you through the wilderness, I have brought you up with all gentleness and loving kindness, I have planted you as it were in mine own inheritance, to the intent you shouldest have been a vine that should have brought me forth good fruit, and I have tilled you and manured you: and must you now be bitter to me, and bring forth sour fruit to choke me withal? The same belonged to us at this day. For when the son of God, who is ordained to be judge of the world, shall come at the last day: he may well say to us: how now syrs? You have born my name, you have been baptized in remembrance and record that I was your redeemer, I have drawn you out of the dungeons where into you were plunged, I delivered you from endless death by suffering most cruel death myself, and for the same cause I became man, and submitted myself even to the curse of GOD my father, that you might be blessed by my grace and by my mean: and behold, the reward that you have yielded me for all this, is that you have (after a sort) torn me in pieces and made a jesting stock of me, and the death that I suffered for you has been made a mockery among you, the blood which is the washing and cleansing of your souls has been as good as trampled under your feet, and to be short, you have taken occasion to ban and blaspheme me, as though I had been some wretched and cursed creature. When the sovereign lodge shall charge us with these things, I pray you will it not be as thundering upon us, to ding us down to the bottoms of hell? Yes: and yet are there very few that thinks upon it. For if needless oaths were as greatly abhorred nowadays among men as they ought to be: they would not by & by after take such leave and boldness as they do to flesh themselves in periurte and forswearing.

As touching blasphemy, does not that world see what comes of it? And yet would we be jealous of our own honesty and reputation, when in the mean season Gods name is trodden under foot among us. If a man have spoken amiss of ones father, he could find in his heart to make a quarrel of it, and either to fiew him at the Law, or else much rather to be revenged of him with his own hands, and men bear themselves in hand that they may with honesty maintain the quarrels of their parents. Behold, our sovereign Father is injured after the same manner, even the same father who not without cause is named the Lord of glory, before whose son all knees ought to bow, as Saint Paul reports to the what Philippians, even he shall be so mocked as a man could do no worse to him, except he should spit in his face: and yet notwithstanding even they that name themselves Christians, and which pretend indeed to seek his honor, shall be the greatest and horriblemst blasphemers of him. But yet for all that, as I said before, our Lord will not cease to maintain his own honor, (as he himself owes.) When he sees men so heathenish as to deface his Majesty after that fashion, to the uttermost of their power: He makes a solemn oath that he will be revenged of it. As truly as I live (says the Lord) I will not give mine honor to another. And like as he will not have his honor conveyed over unto idols: so is it certain that the same saying has a further reach, that is to wit, that if men do falsely abuse his holy name, they shall feel in what estimation he had it. And therefore let us not look till this be accomplished upon ourselves: but let us learn to yield reverence to our GOD, and to him that has all sovereign Majesty, that is to wit, to our Lord Jesus Christ: and let us learn therewithal, to swear in such wise, as it may always be a warrant unto us, that it is he to whom we belong, and that he is our Father, our Maker, and our Judge. Thus you see what we have in effect to gather upon this text.

But withal there is a threatening added: whereby we see men's dullness, and how Satan has as you would say bewitched them, so as they conceive not Gods wrath, when it is set before them. I will not hold him guiltless that takes my name in vain. Look it is GOD that speaks. I pray you ought not the hair of them to stand up stiff upon their heads, which swear so villainously as I have mentioned before? If a man swear by his faith unadvisedly: behold, God arms himself and says: no sir, seeing you has not honored me, you must yield an account of such treachery. God cannot away with a simple lie: and if perjury be added thereto, it is yet worse. If a third fall to blaspheming, it is the uttermost point of all lewdness and as bad as an open defying of GOD, as though we would run upon him and wound him. Now if in this case a man thinks not upon the punishment that is prepared for all such as do so falsely misuse the name of GOD: or have dishonored it, may it not be said that he is beastly drunken, and as it were out of his wits, and that Satan has made him stark blind? Alas yes: and yet nevertheless, it is as common a thing as may be. If a master should say in his house, I will be obeyed in all things: but yet there is one thing above all the rest which I am desirous to have done, and I cannot abide that any man shall transgress it, that he shall by and by bee thrust out of the doors, and be punished for it as he deserves: If a Master have a thing in such estimation, although his men be not so circumspect in all the rest, yet will they stand in some fear of this.

Now then, behold, God curses all such as shall have transgressed his Law in any point. Cursed be he that honors not his Father and mother: Cursed be he that steals: Cursed be he that commits adultery: Cursed be he that performs not all things contained in the Law. And here specially, there is a threat upon all such as shall have abused Gods name. Hereby he shows us that although he will have us to keep his Law in all points, and to direct our lives thereby yet notwithstanding he reserves still this point to himself, and will have his name to be privileged. Now if this threatening slip away for all that, so as it sinks not in our minds, nor restrains us at all from presuming to dally so with God and his Majesty: must it nor needs be said (as I have touched already) that the devil has carried us away, and that we be bereft of all wit and reason? Yes: but if this threat do not waken us now: we must find in the end that Gods publishing of it was no false alarm. And therefore let us learn to be touched to the quick, since we see that our Lord sets himself so expressly against us, and shows himself to be an adversary to all such as abuse his name. For what cost is it to us to abstain, as well from all false oaths, as from all unadvised oaths, and specially from all blasphemies? The greatest excuse that they have which would lessen their fault, is that they cannot refrain because they be injured to it by custom. Yea, but if every man would set before his eyes that God is his judge: surely he might soon forget his swearing: and when the name of GOD were to be used, men would not do it but with great singleness of heart. In so much that if men went to law, they should have as it were Gods Majesty present there, so as he might be beheld sitting there as judge when he were called to witness, and men should not use his name but in such wise, as Saint Paul speaks of; where he says that we must not take Gods name but in all holiness.

This therefore might well be done. But what? Our tongue runs riot even so far as to the foresaid despising of Gods name: so that cry what men can, yea and (as you would say) beat they it into us with beetles: (for the things that the holy Scripture tells us concerning the abuse of Gods name, are like mighty blows with a beetle wherewith GOD strikes upon us:) ' and yet for all that, we continue still the same we were before, and Gods name has neither honor nor Majesty more than it had before. Yet notwithstanding, all such as have any understanding and feeling of Gods name, ought to think well upon that which is said here. And moreover (as I have declared already) when we be once warned of that which we have seen heretofore, that is to wit, that he which speaks is the Everlasting, and our Creator and Redeemer, which has showed himself more than a Father and Savior towards us: if this be well printed in our mind, surely all oaths will easily be forgotten. But if we keep on our way still: the saying of the Prophet Zachary shall be fulfilled upon us: which is, they shall see him whom they have perced, that is to say, whom they have wounded. For although men flatter one another, and make but a laughing at their oaths, and imagine that their swearing shall easily be forgiven them: yet is God wounded by it, and he will show in the end, that is not for men to rush against him after that fashion.

Here withal we have to mark, that under one kind, GOD meant to show what reverence we ought to yield in effect to his name. Indeed he speaks here expressly of Oaths: but yet this doctrine ought to be stretched further: namely that when we think of God, or hear any speaking of him, it must be done with all reverence, so as we may be wakened up, not only to honor and praise him above all, but also to consider, that even the Angels do tremble at the sight of his inestimable glory, and therefore that we which are wretched creatures and as transitory as may be, ought at leastwise to do homage to the sovereign Majesty of our GOD, whensoever he is spoken of. That is a principal point which we ought to mark well in this text.

Truly this doctrine is easy enough of itself: but it is dark to us, because it is so ill put in practice. What a sort of vain thoughts come in our heads when we think upon GOD? Indeed our nature is inclined thereunto, as of folk that are fraughted with all untruth, so as there is nothing but darkness in us. But yet for all that, if a man seed his own humor with lewd and wicked imaginations conceived against the honor of GOD: he shows sufficiently that he has conspired and consederate himself with the devil. Never the later how many are there that bethink themselves, when any lewd fancy comes in their mind, or which labor to suppress and beat down the things by force, which their own conscience tells them to be wicked and against the glory of GOD? Nay, they rather take pleasure in them, and welter in them. Now when men's spirit, that is to say, their understanding is so defiled, the residue is easily corrupted. And for proof thereof: how do men most commonly speak of God? What manner of talk have they of him? It should seem that their whole seeking is to be corrupted: there needs but a little leaven to sour the whole lump of Dough, as says Saint Paul treating of this naughty talk which mars and infects us with wicked vices. But the worst is when men speak of GOD in way of mockage: For what a thing is it that he should be scoffed at and that he should be scorned in words, not only vain and fond, but also shameful and horrible? Is it not a willful violating of his Majesty? And yet men do so, yea even over commonly, in so much as you shall hardly have long talk in any company, but somewhat shall be intermingled that may sound to the contempt of GOD. And do we not show thereby, that we never wist what it is to worship GOD? We can well enough say daily, Hallowed be your name: and yet we do the clean contrary. Needs there any other sentence of condemnation against us than that? When we come here to Church, we protest with our mouths that we desire that Gods name should be maintained in due honor: we say as much at the table; and likewise does every man both at his rising and at his going to bed, (I mean such as are not utterly brutish: for there are which wote not what praying to God means.) But as for those which have yet so much honesty as to pray unto God, they will well enough say with their mouth, hallowed be your name: but it is no sooner from their tongues end, but by and by a false oath is in their mouth, and they make Gods name to run too and fro. And what else is such falsehood, than a violating of Gods Majesty, and as a striking of him with a Dagger, or as a spitting in the face of him? Therefore as I have told you already, there needs none other Judge to condemn us for our foolish oaths, than the protestation that we ourselves make when we desire GOD to maintain the holiness of his name, and yet in the meanwhile endeavor to deface it as much as we can.

But now remains that we speak of God in all reverence, specially when his works come in talk. As how? In speaking of the weather, be it fair or be it rainy, they be marks of his Majesty. If he send us sad weather, he shows himself a Judge to make us perceive his displeasure, to the intent to make us enter into the examination of our sins, that we might be sorry for them and be led to amendment. But instead of humbling ourselves before GOD, and of being sorry that we have offended: we become wayward as we see men commonly be, who fall to repining, and say, must this weather last ever? and so we flee not to our GOD, nor ask him forgiveness of our sins. And after the same manner deal we in all other things: for I allege but only one example, to show that when we speak of Gods works we must either perceive him to be a Father by his goodness, or feel him to be a Judge by his rigor. Therefore whomsoever God does anything that mislikes us, and is contrary to our desire and wishing: let us understand that he chastises and tames us, to the end we should enter into the examination of our sins to condemn them and to be sorry for them. If we glorify not God in that behalf, we unhallowed his holy name. Again on the contrary part, when God draws us to him by gentleness as a loving and pitiful father: it is to the intent we should be brought unto him, and honor him the more. And if our unthankfulness be to be condemned for not honoring of him at the first words that he speaks to us: how shall we do when all things upbraid us, so as God having laid hold on us on all sides, can by no means win us to him, whereby he shows that we be utter despisers of his Majesty, and that we have trampled his works under our feet, or overturned them with our snouts like swine? I pray you shall it not redound to our dreadful condemnation, if this may be laid to our charge?

Now although God have set his mark upon all his works, so as we ought to know him both in fair weather and in foul, in heat and in cold, and (to be short,) in all the order of nature: yet has he set his mark chiefly upon his word. Of a truth it is an inexcusable crime, when we acknowledge him not in the good things that he has made and done for us. We hold our life of him: it is in him that we live, as speaks Saint Paul. If all these benefits make us not to be mindful of God: it is too unmeasurable a churlishness already: but yet (as I said before) it has been his will that his mark should be printed above all things in his word. Let us look upon Heaven and earth, and we shall see GOD everywhere. For what else is the world than (as says S. Paul) a lively image wherein God sets forth himself? Although he be invisible in his own being: yet does he show himself there, to the intent that we should worship him. But come we once to the holy Scripture: there is an image wherein God shows himself much more familiarly unto us, than he does either in the skies or in the earth. Neither Sun nor Moon, (though they give light to the world,) do so set forth the Majesty of God, as the Law, the Prophets and the Gospel do. And yet for all that, after what manner do men speak of them? How boldly do they deal with them? I pray you do not men take leave nowadays to speak of Gods name after their own fancy? And when they fall to reasoning upon the holy Scripture among Cuppes, in Taverns and at Tables, does their talk tend to the humbling of themselves, that they may all know their own rudeness and infirmity, and asks of God the gift of his holy spirit, to the end that we may handle his mysteries as becomes us? No: but those disputations are made as it were in way of mockery, and thereby it appears well, yea much more than were requisite, that there are very few true Christians nowadays in the world. It is apparent that some dally with the holy scripture, and wrest it to proverbs of laughter, making it a matter to sport and play withal, as though it were but as a nose of wax for every man to fashion and unfashion at his own pleasure. Other some hold fond discourses on it, demanding, why is this, and why is that? And again, when we come to Gods high mysteries: if anything mislike us, we would have it every whit wiped out. And that is all one as if we would pull God out of heaven.

Now then let us learn that God commands the honor and authority of his word unto us above all things: as if he should tell us that look whatsoever is contained in the holy scripture, we must receive it with all lowliness, and yield ourselves pliable to that which is contained therein. Yea and although the same be contrary to our understanding, and we could find in our hearts that God had spoken after our matter: yet let us do him the honor to imprison all our own wits, and to say: Lord, we be your scholars, and therefore we receive quietly whatsoever you has vouchsafed to teach us, assuring ourselves that the same is for our benefit and welfare. Therefore whatsoever is contained in the holy Scripture, let it be received reverently without exception. And when Gods holy mysteries come in question: let us not judge of them according to our own understanding: but if it happen that anything seem not good and convenient unto us, let us bridle ourselves, and let God have his full scope, so as his word may have all the liberty that may be. Also therewithal, when we read the holy Scriptures or come to a Sermon, let us always bear in mind to think thus with ourselves: behold, our God shows himself here, and he is set down as our judge: and therefore it is not for us to kick and spurn against him, as we see a great sort do when they come to Sermons. But what? They have conceived rancor in their heart against God and his word, and therefore they can reap; nothing by it but utter naughtiness: insomuch that they gather venom more and more, to bilk out their blasphemies at tables when men speak not to their liking. And is that (think you) a good honoring of Gods name? Now therefore, whether it be that we read the holy Scripture, or that it be treated of in Sermons: let us learn to have Gods name always in such reverence, as to quake at it when we hear it spoken of, specially when his word is preached, as is said by the Prophet Esay. For so shall we show, not only in words but also in deed, that we be true believers: and God also will owe us for his people, and in the end gather us into the heritage of the kingdom of heaven.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him, not to impute those unto us which we have committed heretofore: but that it may please him so to reform us to himself, as our whole seeking may be to honor him, and to glue ourselves to his service, he may dwell among us, and our Lord Jesus reign over us, both by his holy limit and by his word. And so let us all say Almighty God heavenly father, &c,

The thirty fourth Sermon, which is the fifth upon the fifth Chapter 12 Keep the day of rest, to hallow it as the Lord your God has commanded you.

13 Six days shall you labor, and do all your businesses:

14 But the seventh day is the rest of the Lord your God, You shall not do any work therein.

After that he had spoken of the pure worshipping and serving of GOD, to the glorifying of his name, without taking of it either in oaths or in other things, otherwise than in way of honor, now mention is made of Gods service accordingly as he has required it in his law, and of the order which he has set down for the faithful to exercise themselves in. As for example, the [Sabbath or] day of rest was a figure, partly to show that men could not serve God dutifully, but by mortifying all that ever is of our own nature, and by dedicating themselves there withal in such sort unto him, as they may be as it were quite separated from the world. Secondly the day of rest was a Ceremony to bring the people together, that they might hear the Law, and call upon the name of GOD, and offer the sacrifices, and all other things that concern the spiritual government. Thus then we see now after what forte the Sabbath day was spoken of: but yet would it not be well understood without destination, and without laying forth of the said two parts by piece meal. Therefore we have to note, that the Sabbath or day of rest, was a shadow under the Law till the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, to do me to understand that God requires that they should utterly cease from their own works: and that is it which I meant in one word, when I said that we must mortify all that ever is of our own nature, if we will confirm ourselves to our God. And that it is so, Saint Paul declares: and besides that, we have records now thereof in the new Testament. But it shall suffice to have alleged that which is most apparent, namely to the Colossians, where it is said that we have the substance and the body of the things that were under the Law, we have it (says he) in Jesus Christ. And therefore it was requisite for the fathers of old time to be trained in this hope, as well by the day of rest, as by some other Ceremonies. But now that the thing itself is given unto us, we must no more stay upon the shadows. Indeed the law is not so abolished, but that we ought to hold still the substance and truth of it: but yet is the shadow of it done away by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. If it be demanded how the fathers of old time knew that: Moses has given us understanding thereof, as is showed sufficiently in the Book of Exodus, For God having set forth his Law in the twentieth of Exodus, which he uttered unto Moses, tells him to what end it tended, saying that he had ordained the Sabbath day, to be as a warrant of the sanctifying of the people of Israel unto him. It is (says he) a badge of my holiness which I have ordained among you. Now when as the scripture speaks to us of being made holy unto GOD: it is to separate us from all things that are contrary to his service. But where is such pureness to be found? We be in the world, and we know that in the world there is nothing but utter forwardness and naughtiness as says Saint John in his Canonical Epistle. But men need not to go out of themselves to have battle against God and his righteousness: for all our senses and all our affections (says Saint Paul in the eight to the Romans) are enemies unto God. When men give heed to their own thoughts, desires, likings, and lusts: they make open war against God. We know how it is told us in the sixth of Genesis, that all that ever man can imagine is always evil, and that all that ever man devises in himself and has of his own store, is utterly untoward and corrupt before God. So then, we see well that we cannot be sanctified to our God, that is to say, we cannot serve him undefiledly, except we be separated from the defiling that are contrary to him, and that the things which are of our own nature be abolished. Now it was requisite that all these things should be figured to the ancient fathers, because Jesus Christ was not yet fully revealed unto them. But we in these days have the full accomplishment and performance of all things in Jesus Christ. And for proof thereof, Saint Paul says that the old man is crucified with him. Whereas Saint Paul speaks after that sort of the old man, he means the things that we have from Adam, all which must be ripened and done away. Not as touching the substance of our body or of our soul, but as touching that naughtiness that is in us. The blindness that makes us to go astray, and the wicked lusts & likings which are utterly disobedient to Gods righteousness, must be beaten down, because they be drawn from Adam. And how is that done? Not by our own power or policy: but by our Lord Jesus Christ: who by dying for us, to wipe away our sins that they might no more be imputed imputed unto us, has also purchased us this prerogative, that by the power of his holy spirit we be able to forsake the world & ourselves, so as our fleshly affections shall not overmaster us. And although we be full of disobedience: yet shall Gods spirit overrule us, to hold them down & to keep them in awe. And therefore it is said; we be risen again with him, as S. Paul declares likewise in fore alleged text to that Colossians. But this was not yet manifested under that Law. Therefore it was requisite; the fathers which lived at that time, should have some help, such as; sacrifices were, to feed them in the hope of the death of our Lord Jesus Christ, so as they might know that their sins were cleansed away by blood of that mediator. Likewise they had; Sabbath day as a warrant of the grace; was purchased us to mortify our thoughts & affections, that God might live in us by that power of his holy spirit.

Now we have some entrance to conceive that which was touched briefly before: that is to wit, that the Sabbath day was as a figure, to represent that thing; was fulfilled indeed at that coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. And therefore let us mark well, that the Sabbath day extended to whole service of God, to show that men could not honor him purely, but by renouncing themselves, & by being separated from the defilements of that world & of their own flesh. And for the same cause were the Jews rebuked likewise by the prophet Ezechiel for not keeping the Sabbath day. And it is told them in such wise as if they had broken the whole law generally. And not without cause: for he that despises the Sabbath day, has (as much as in him lies) thrust the whole service of God under foot. And if the day of rest be not kept: all the residue is nothing worth, according to this saying of that Prophet Esay, that men must bereave themselves of their own virtues, and be contented to forgo them: or else it is not the Lords Sabbath, neither does he like or allow of it. Hereby we see that it is to no purpose to observe the ceremony alone. For had the Jews kept the ceremony newer so straightly in assembling together on the Sabbath day, without stirring one finger in their household business, & yet in the meanwhile nourish their own wicked affections, & afterward put them in effect: it had been but a mocking of God, by abusing of his name, and by defacing and falsifying the whole order that he had ordained accordingly also as he upbraids them. But the chief thing was to have an eye to the true meaning of the figure: that is to wit, to the spiritual serving of God. And yet therewithal it behooved the Jews to keep the ceremony also that was commanded them. For God did so bridle them, as he vouchsafed not to let them have the substance of things (alone by it self,) but he would that they should also have the shadows of them therewithal, until the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

And hereby we see the thing that S. Paul speaks: namely that as now we be no more tied to the old bondage of keeping the Sabbath day. For we must do so much honor to Jesus Christ, as to hold ourselves contented with that which he has brought us in his own person, without the having of the outward things any more that were under the law. Now we see how this observation concerns us at this day. As touching the ceremony itself, it is past as I said, and therefore we must come to the substance: which is, that to serve God well, we must learn to forbear all our own wills, & all our own thoughts & affections. And why? Because; when we will needs be wise in our own conceits to imagine this or that to serve God withal, we mar all. Therefore our own wisdom must be laid down, & we must hear God speak, without following our own will or fancy. Thus the first entrance to keep the Sabbath day as we ought to do, is, not to believe the thing that seems good to ourselves: for we must rest. And how must we rest? Wee must understand at a stay, so as our thoughts run not roving abroad, to invent one thing or other. We must (say I) continue quietly at one slay in the obedience of our God. And when we be tempted by our own lusts, we must consider that all our lewd and disobedient affections, are enemies to God euerichone of them. Therefore we must rest still in that behalf, and refer ourselves unto God, that he only may work in us, and guide and govern us by his holy spirit.

Hereby we see God over slipped not anything, when he ordained the Sabbath day. And since it has so large a scope: what want we more to teach us a pedal doctrine of holiness, when we hate the things which the holy Ghost has set before us? The matter is that we should live holily in the obedience of our God. And how is that to be done? Even by receiving his single words, and by fashioning ourselves according to his righteousness. Now forasmuch as the things which we have of our own nature, are contrary thereunto: we must begin at this end of renouncing ourselves. That being done, we have all that is requisite to the serving of God. But is very hard to be done. And therefore when we hear that God commands us to keep the Sabbath day, let us look that we mark, and consider that it wil not be done with playing, but that we must enforce ourselves: & we shall have profited greatly all our life, if we keep it well, that is to wit by renouncing whatsoever we have of our own, and by dedicating ourselves wholly unto our God. And we ought to be the more inflamed to the spiritual keeping of the Sabbath' of the Lord, seeing we be set free from the slavish subjection of the law, and God has granted greater privilege to us, than he did to the fathers of old time: insomuch that he is contented with our mortifying of the old man, to be renewed again by the power of his holy spirit, & we be no more bond to the ceremony that was kept so straightly under the law. Seeing that God handles us so lovingly: it binds us the more to have an eye to the principal, that we may observe it duly. Yea & we must not allege; the ancient fathers had that ceremony to quicken them up, which served them as a spur: for inasmuch as our Lord Jesus Christ is come, we have much more than the outward and visible sign. And forasmuch as all the things that were figured in those shadows, are accomplished in him: we must not crave still the things that were under the law. Thus you see how the thing that is ordained here concerning the Sabbath day, is now fulfilled, at leastwise as in respect of the truth of the figure, which the fathers had but in shadow. And in very deed look what was commanded concerning the day of rest must needs belong to us as well as to them. For let us take Gods law in itself, and we shall have an everlasting rule of righteousness. And it is certain that under the ten commandments, God intended to give a rule that should endure forever. Therefore let us not think that the things which Moses speaks of the Sabbath day, are needless for us: not for that the figure remains still in force, but because we have the truth thereof. And for the same cause the Apostle in the fourth to the Hebrews, applies the things that were spoken of the Sabbath day, to the instruction of the Christians and of the new Church. For he shows us that we must fashion ourselves like to our GOD, and that this is our full felicity and perfection, because the whole sovereign welfare of man consists being created after the image of God. What is to be done now, seeing that the said image is defaced by sin, but that it may be repaired again? You see then that the way for us to attain to perfection, is to fashion ourselves like to our God and to yield to his will, and to inquire of his works: that we may do the like. Wherefore let us understand that to serve God well, we at this day be commanded to strain ourselves to the uttermost of our power, to subdue our own thoughts, affections and desires, that God may reign in us and rule us by his holy spirit. And therefore it is in vain for all hypocrites to gloss, & to set a fair countenance upon their doings. For so long as wicked covetousness lies lurking in their hearts: so long as they be full of envy, rancor, ambition, cruelty, or guile: it is certain that they do nothing else but break the Sabbath day. And therefore we may conclude that they overthrow the whole service of God, according to that which I alleged before out of Ezechiel. As much is said thereof Jeremy. And indeed that is that cause why the ceremony was so straightly looked to under that law. Think we that God did ever take pleasure in men's idleness? no surely. But he punished the party as for that wrought upon the Sabbath day, as him that had murdered a man. And why so? It seems to be a cruelty, that a man should be put to death for cleaving of a little wood upon that Sabbath day, as he had committed a murder. But yet does God condemn him to death that cleaved wood upon the Sabbath day. And why? Because that under that figure was comprehended the whole service of God. And for the same cause is it said in Jeremy, that they bear burdens, and went to cart upon Sabbath day: and when that was so despised by the Jews, it was a traitorousness, whereby they showed that they made no reckoning of the laws at all. So then, to come again to ourselves, seeing that we have not this figure so straightly nowadays, but God has given us a greater liberty, which was purchased for us by the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ: let us learn to give ourselves earnestly unto him, and to understand (as I said before) that we may all travel in all the residue, and yet it shall be to no purpose unless our affections be bridled, so as we strive to renounce all our own thoughts and desires, in such sort as God may have the whole governing of us, and we protest that we desire nothing else than to rest in him. And for the same cause also does God set forth himself to us for an example. For he thinks it not enough to command men to rest: but also shows them the way. For after he had created the worlds and all that is therein, he himself rested. Not that he was weary or had any need of rest: but to assure us to behold his works, that we might rest in them, and therewithal fashion ourselves like unto him. Will we then keep the spiritual rest? like as it is said that God rested from his works: so must we rest also, ceasing to do what seems good to ourselves, and whatsoever our own nature covets. If this example of God provoke us not: we show well thereby that we neither seek nor in anywise covet our own welfare, but that we will needs continue willfully in our wretched and cursed fate. The sovereign welfare of men (as I said before) is to stick unto God & to be knit unto him. Behold, our Lord calls us to him, & tells us that we can have no true holiness nor union with him, but by resting from our own works. Now if we be so unruly, that we will always be occupying of our arms & legs, & be still doing what we think good: surely it is as a breaking of that band that is between God and us, & a separating and estranging of ourselves from him as much as in us lies. And does it not appear thereby, that we seek to be left up as a prey to Satan, to be carried & harried away by him, for want of being any more under the protection of our God? Yes: but what for that? There are very few that think of that. The world sees what liberty all men take to themselves. If one come & tell a man that he must not walk after his own fancy. Tush (said he) I know how to behave myself. But a man could not devise to spite God more manifestly, than by inch rebelliousness. It is all one as if we would need show that we will not that he should have any superiority over us. Indeed men will not be acknowledged that it is so: but yet it is so in very deed. For (as I have said already) it is no serving of God, unless we begin at the abstaining from our own thoughts & affections. Therefore when men will needs be self wise & trust to their own wit, so as they take leave to do what they list, & to follow their own affections & fancies, & labor not to repress them, but are offended when others go about to reclaim them: it is a sign that they never will what it is to serve God, nor that it is the chiefest point of the law. And therefore let us mark well, that whereas God alleges his own exam example: it is to assure us gently to that keeping of spiritual Sabbath or rest we might think ourselves unhappy to be separated from him, as I touched before. And behold, that band of this conjunction is that we withdraw not ourselves from his religion & truth, but suffer ourselves to be ruled by him.

But now it may be demanded, why that Jews were commanded to rest but only the seventh day: for our renouncing of our own thoughts & affections, must not be for one day in a week: but we must continue in that mind all that time of our life. To be short, the rest that God commands us is everlasting, and not by pangs or fits as they say. And why then chose he but one day of the week? It was to show us, that when we have done what we can to renounce our wicked lusts, our false pretences, and whatsoever else is of our own nature: yet shall we never be able to attain fully thereunto, till we be quite & clean bereft of our flesh. True it is that faithful ought to keep a continual Sabbath all their life long, by forbearing their own veils and works, & by endeavoring to give themselves over unto God with all humility & submission, so as they may obey him quietly: I say we must do so, or else all that service that, we be desirous to do unto God, shall be but a feigning, & he will disallow it & reject it. Nevertheless we cannot so discharge ourselves in renouncing our affections, but that there will always be somewhat worthy of blame in us. S. Paul does indeed glory that the world was crucified unto him, & he unto that world: but yet for all that, he ceases not to say, that his flesh fights against his spirit, so as there is never any agreement betwixt them. Yea and he confesses in that seventh to that Romans, that he felt such strife continually in himself, as he did not that good that, he would have done, that is to say, he performed it not with so earnest affection, nor was so fully determined to walk according to that will of God, but that he had always some lets to hinder him, so as to his own seeming, instead of running strongly, he did but go limpingly. Since it is so: let us mark that Gods ordaining of that seventh day to rest in, was not without cause: for thereby he does us to understand, that we cannot attain to that perfect holinesses which he requires at our hands, neither in one day, nor in one month. Why so? Because that when we have sought never so lustily against the affections of our flesh, & against our wicked thoughts: there will always remain some drugs still, till we be fully united to our God, & that he have taken us up into his heavenly kingdom. Until time, we shall always have some temptations, trouble, & unquietness in us, so as we shall well perceive (I mean such of us as endeavor to serve God) that we be still subject to many temptations, & to the feeling of a number of stings whereby we be provoked to this or that. And are not all those things as many hindrances to hold us back from the spiritual rest? If a man rested himself in God as he should do: he should not conceive anything at all in his mind, that might turn him aside from the right way. He should not have any wicked lusts or likings. All such things should be far from him. Now then when as we conceive a number of lewd imaginations: then does Satan step into to assail us, & to vex us with unquietness. And when our mind is once inclined to do evil: there are a number of things in us, that tickle us & set us still forward. And although we hate that evil, yet so it is, that by such temptations we are provoked to go through with it. And thereby it appears that it is not an easy matter to wind ourselves from our wicked lust, & to bring to pass that they may no more reign in us. So then let us go forward with this endeavor of keeping Gods spiritual Sabbath, for we shall never attain fully to it, until that end of our life.

But hereby we be put in mind of two things. The one is to mislike of ourselves, & to mourn continually, & to consider that although to our own seeming we have taken never so great pain to obey our GOD: yet notwithstanding we be but yet on our way still, and we come far short of fulfilling the things that are required and commanded in the law. Thus have we a cause to humble ourselves, because God shall always find enough and too much to condemn in us as concerning our serving of him, and also because that the spiritual rest is not yet such as he has commanded, nothing near. And like as we have occasion to humble ourselves & to be sorry with true repentance: so ought we on the other side to be the more moved & quickened up to go forward, since we see our own wants as thus: True it is that God has given me the grace to be desirous to serve him: but how do I behave myself therein? Alas I am yet far off from doing it. Since we see it is so: what should we do but enforce ourselves? Therefore with our abhorring of that' evil which is in us, let us also be the more earnest to profit still in this rest, & to go forward in it, & let every of us daily call himself to account. You see then that God having given us occasion to humble ourselves all the time of our life, shows us that we so must be earnest in correcting our vices, & in mortifying our flesh daily more & more, & consider that it is not enough for us to have our old man crucified in part, unless we be also quite buried with Jesus Christ, as says S. Paul in the seventh to the Romans before alleged. Thus much concerning the seventh day, whereof mention is made in this place.

Now must we come to the second point: which is, that (as I have said already) that Sabbath day was a policy or order whereby to exercise the faithful in the service of God. For that day was ordained for men to assemble in, to hear the doctrine of the law preached, to communicate together with sacrifices, and to call upon the name of God. As touching these points, it belongs as well to us as to the people of old time. For albeit that the figure be ceased, (I mean the same that S. Paul speaks of in the epistle to the Colossians:) yet notwithstanding, so much as concerns the order, continues still and has his use. And to what end serves this order? To assemble ourselves in the name of God. True it is that this ought to be done continually: howbeit for our infirmities sake, or rather by reason of our slothfulness, it is requisite that some one day should be chosen out. If we were as earnest in serving of God as we ought to be: we should not appoint one day in a week, only but every man ought to meet both morning and evening without law written, to be edified more and more by Gods word. And truly this exercise is more than needful for us, considering that we be so inclined to will, as there needs not anything to thrust us out of the way: and therefore it were expedient for us to come together daily in the name of God. But what? We see that men will scarce meet upon the Lord his day, and that most of them must be held to it as it were by force. Considering then that there is such infirmity in us: let us understand that this order was not made all only for the Jews, that they might have some day wherein to come together: but also for us, so as it belongs to us as well as to them.

But yet herewithall we have to mark, that this is not all: for it were a very slender order to have a rest of our hands and feet, and to go no further than so. What then? we must apply this rest to a higher purpose: we must refrain from our own business which might hinder us from the minding of Gods works: and we must call upon his name and exercise ourselves in his word. If we spend the Lord's day in making good cheer, and in playing and gaming: is that a good honoring of God? Nay, is it not a mockery, yea and a very unhallowing of his name? Yes. But when the Shop windows are shut in on the Lords day, and men travel not as they do on other days: it is to the end we should have the more leisure and liberty to intend to the things that God commands: that is to wit, to be taught by his word, to meet together to make confession of our faith, to call upon his name, & to exercise ourselves in that use of his Sacraments. That is the purpose whereunto this order ought to serve us, But now let us see if those which name themselves Christians, discharge themselves as they ought to do. Behold, a great number think to have that Lord's day most free to follow their own business, & reserve that day for the same purpose, as though there were none other day for them to appoint upon of all the week long. And though the bell toll to bring them to the sermon, yet it seems unto them, that they have nothing else to do, but to think upon their business, and to cast up their accounts concerning this and that matter. Other some fall to gluttony, and shut up themselves in their houses, because they dare not show a manifest contempt in the open streets: but yet the Lord his day is to them but as a covert to shrink aside in from the Church of God. And hereby it appears what affection we have towards all Christianity, & towards that serving of God, seeing we make that thing an occasion of withdrawing ourselves further of from God, which is given us for a help to bring us nearer unto him. And again, be we once gone astray: it serves to pull us quite and clean away. And is not that a devilish spite of men? yet notwithstanding it is so common a thing, as is pity to see: and would God that examples were more rare and further of to be found. But that world sees how all things are unhallowed, insomuch that most folk have no regard at all of that using of that day, which was ordained to withdraw us from all earthly cares and affairs, that we might give ourselves wholly unto God.

Furthermore we must understand, that the Lord his day was not appointed all only to the hearing of Sermons: but to the end we should apply the rest of the time to the praying of God. Yea verily. For although he feed us every day: yet do we not mind his gracious benefits sufficiently to magnify them. Indeed it were a poor thing if we minded not Gods benefits but upon the Lords day: But because we be occupied too much about our own affairs on the other days, therefore we be not so much given to serve God in them, as upon the day which is assigned wholly thereunto. The Lord his day then must serve us for a tower to mount up into, to view Gods works a far off, as a time wherein we have nothing to let us or to keep us occupied, but that we may employ all our wits to consider the benefits and gracious gifts that he has bestowed upon us. And if we can put this thing well in v're (that is to say, if we can consider Gods works), upon the Lords day, surely we shall be the more given unto it all the rest of the week after, and the minding thereof will as it were fashion and polish us beforehand, so as our musing upon his works long before to the intent we may know how to fare the better by them, will lead us to yield thanks unto our God upon the Monday and all the week after. But if the Lords day be spent not only in games & pastimes full of vanity, but also in things quite contrary to God, so as men think they have not kept holy the Lord his day, except God be offended diverse ways: if the holy order which God ordained to bring us to him, be broken after that fashion: is it any wonder though men play the beasts all the week after? What is to be done then? Let us assure ourselves that it not enough for us to go to some Sermon upon the Lords day, to receive some good instruction & to call upon the name of God: but we must also digest the same things, and bend all our wits to consider the gracious things that God has done for us: and by that means we must frame ourselves to the things that may lead us to our God, without further travel on Monday or of all the week after. And to the intent we may not do aught else than record; things by good leisure, which we had learned before: let our minds be discharged of all things that may hinder us, or pluck us back from the considering of Gods works. Thus you see what the order is which we must keep at this day. It is not to keep the ceremony so straight as it was under the bondage of the law: for we have not the figure or shadow any more. But it serves to call us together, that we may be inured according to our infirmity, to apply ourselves the better to the serving of God, and to dedicate that day wholly unto him, so as we may be utterly withdrawn from the world, and the same may stand us instead all the rest of the week, as I said before.

Yea and we have to mark also, that it is not enough for us to think upon God and his works upon the Lords day every man alone by himself: but that we must meet together upon some day certain to make open confession of our faith. Indeed this ought to be done every day as I have said before. But yet in respect of men's rawness, and by reason of their slothfulness: it is necessary to have one special day dedicated wholly thereunto. It is true that we be not bound to the seventh day; neither do we (in deed) keep the same day that was appointed to the Jews: for that was the Saturday. But to the intent to show the liberty of Christians, the day was changed because Jesus Christ in his resurrection did set us free from the bondage of the law, & cancelled the obligation thereof. That was the cause why the day was shifted. But yet must we observe the same order of having some day in the week, be it one or be it two, for that is left to the free choice of Christians. Nevertheless, if a people assemble to have the Sacraments ministered, and to make common prayer unto GOD, and to show one agreement and union of faith: it is convenient to have some one day certain for that purpose. Then is it not enough for every man to withdraw himself into his own house, whether it be to read the holy scripture or to pray unto GOD: but it is meete that we should come into the company of the faithful, and there show the agreement which we have with all the whole body of the Church, by keeping this order which our Lord has so commanded. But what? There a man may see too apparent unhallowing of Gods service. For (as I have touched before) are there not a great sort which could well find in their hearts to show that they do but mock God, and that they would fain be exempted from common law? It is, true that they will come to a sermon a five or six times a year. And what to do there? Forsooth even to mock at God and at all his doctrine. Indeed they be very swine, which come to defile Gods temple, and are worthier to be in stables than there, and they were better to keep themselves at home in their stinking cabans. To be short, it were better that such rascals and filthy villains were quite cut off from the Church of God, than that they should come and intermingle themselves after that sort in company with the faithful. But yet how many times come they thither? The bell may ring well enough: for look where a man left them, there shall he find them. So then we ought to be the more diligent and careful, in quickening up ourselves to make such confession of our faith, as God may be honored with one common content among us. And besides that, all superstitions must be banished. For we see how it is an opinion in popery, that God is served with idleness. It is not after that sort that we must keep holy the Sabbath day. But to the intent it may be applied to the right and lawful use, we must consider (as I said before) how our Lord requires to have this day bestowed in nothing else, but in hearing of his word, in making common prayer, in making confession of our faith, and in hating the use of the Sacraments. Those are the things that we be called to. Howbeit, we see how all things have been corrupted & confounded in the Popedom. For like as they have allotted days to honoring of their he Saints and she Saints, and set up images of them: so have they surmised that they were to be worshipped with idleness. But seeing that world is, so given to corruption: it stands us so much the more in hand to mark well this discourse concerning the Sabbath day, as it is set down here by Moses. And let us consider to what end our Lord commanded the people, of old time, to have one day in the week to rest in: to the intent that we knowing how the same is abolished by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, may take ourselves to the spiritual rest, that is to say, dedicate ourselves wholly unto God, forsaking all our own reason and affections. Again let us retain still the outward order, so far as is meete for us, that is to wit, of forbearing our own affairs and worldly businesses, that we may intend wholly to the minding of Gods works, and occupy ourselves in the consideration of the good things that he has done for us. And about all things let us strain ourselves to acknowledge the grace that he offers us daily in his Gospel that we may be strengthened in it still more and more. And when we have bestowed the Lord his day in praising and magnifying Gods name, and in minding his works: let us show all week after, that we have profited in the same.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good GOD with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done. And forasmuch as we can by no means serve him, until the forwardness that is in us be done away, and inasmuch as he has told us that we shall not cease to fight against his righteousness, to long as we give head to our own lusts and imaginations: it may please our good God to grant us such grace by the power of his holy spirit, as we may be fully fashioned like unto him that died and rose again for us to mortify us and to quicken us. So then let us bear the mark of our Lord Jesus Christ even in renouncing ourselves, and let us so submit us to his will, as our whole seeking may be to be fashioned like to his righteousness, that his law may be fulfilled in us even as it is spiritual, and we be changed from flesh to spirit, to live under his obeisance. And because there is always so much in us to be misliked: it may please the same good GOD to bear with our infirmities, until his rest be fully brought to pass in us, and that he have taken us up into his heavenly kingdom. That it may please him to grant this grace not only &c,

On Friday, the 21st of June 1555

The thirty fifth Sermon which is the sixth upon the fifth Chapter

13 Six days shall you labor &c.

14 You shall not do any work therein, yourself, your Son, your daughter, your manservant, your woman servant, your Ox, your Ass, and your cattle, and your Stranger which is within your gates, that your manservant and your woman-servant may have rest as well as yourself?

15 Remember that you was a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord your God brought you thence with strong hand and arm stretched out. And therefore the Lord your God has commanded you to keep holy the Sabbath day.

Declared yesterday how and why the commandment of keeping the Sabbath day was given to the Jews. I told you briefly how it was a figure of the spiritual rest which the faithful ought to observe, to serve God in. Howbeit our Lord Jesus Christ has brought us the performance thereof, so as we must no more stay upon the shadow of the Law, but content ourselves with the crucifying of our old man by the power of the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, that we may be retitled to serve our GOD thoroughly. But yet in the meanwhile we have need of some politic and order among us. Therefore it is expedient that there be a day of rest for us to meet together, that we be confirmed in the doctrine of God, and profit daily therein, that is to say, all the time of our life, and also be occupied in calling upon his name; and in making confession of our faith: and that therewithal the residue of the day be spent in considering the benefits that we receive from time to time at Gods hand, that he may be the better glorified for them.

And now we have to mark what is said in Moseses text. Six days shall you labor, says the Lord. This must not be taken as though God commanded us to labor. It is true that we be born thereto, and we know that God intends not that we should be idle, while we live in this world: for he has given men hands and feet and cunning and wit. Yea and even before there was any sin, it is said that Adam was put into the garden to dress it. But the labor that men take now, is a chastisement for sin. For it is said unto them, You shall eat your bread in the sweat of your brows: that is a curse which is laid upon all mankind. For we be not worthy to enjoy state that was given to our first father, which was to live in pleasure without much troubling of himself. Notwithstanding, even before sin came into the world, and before we were condemned of God to this painful and constrained labor, it behooved men to occupy themselves in some exercise. And why? For it is against our nature to be as unprofitable blocks of wood. So then it is very certain that we must apply the whole time of our life to some labor. Nevertheless here is no precise commandment given of laboring six days. For in very deed there were other solemnities besides the Sabbath day, under the Law: There were other feasts which might fall in the midst of the week. But for as much as the number of them was small, (for they were but fower days in the year:) here is no mention made of them: he speaks but only of the Sabbath day. And whereas it is said you shall labor six days: our Lord shows us that we have no cause to grudge of the giving and bestowing of one day upon him, seeing he leaves us six for one. As if he should say, is it a great matter to you that I should chose out one day to be reserved wholly to my service, so as you shall do nothing therein but read and exercise yourselves in my law, or hear the doctrine that shall be preached unto you and come to the temple to be there confirmed by the sacrifices that shall be offered, and to call upon my name, and to protest that you be of the fellowship of my people? Should this grieve you seeing you have six days free and whole to do your business and affairs in? Seeing then that I deal so courteously with you: as to require but one day of seven: is it not too great an unthankfulness, if you complain of that time as though it were misbestowed, as who should say you were so churlish and niggardly, as to grudge me the seventh part of your time? I give you your whole life the sun never shines upon you, but you ought to consider my goodness, & that I am a freehearted father towards you. For I make my sun to shine, to give you light to go by that every of you might do his business. And why then should not I have one day of seven, wherein every man shall surcease from his own business so as you shall not be entangled in any worldly care, but that you may have leisure to think upon me? We see then that this saying of laboring six days, is not set down as a commandment, but rather as a grant that God makes even in way of upbraiding men with their unthankfulness, if they do not observe the Sabbath day and keep it holy as is spoken of it here.

But hereof we may gather a good and profitable lesson: which is that when we be slow to obey God, we must consider his benefits. For what should more sharpen our desire to follow Gods commandments, than to consider that he deals not roughly with us, nor over presses us not? behold God could rein us with a straight bit if it pleased him: he could drive us to so hard things as there should be no means to get out of them but he has a consideration to guide us as a father does his children. Seeing then that he does so bear with us: ought we not to be the more provoked to do as he appoints us? yes. So then, as often as Gods commandments are hard unto us, or at leastwise seem to be so: let us assure ourselves that he does not press us so much as he could, nothing near. For if God lifted to use his right with extremity: we should be tormented out of all measure. Therefore let us understand that he bears with us, and that he uses more than fatherly goodness in that behalf. It is true that the law of GOD is impossible unto us, insomuch that we be not only unable to observe it throughout: but also if a man would of his own natural power discharge himself to Godward, he could not stir one finger, nor have one good thought to know which way to begin. And so far off are we from being able to obey GOD, and to execute the things that are contained in his law: that all our thoughts and affections are enmities against God. If men could through their own power perform the Law: it should be said to them, Labor you. But contrariwise it is said, Best you, to the end that God may work. The law then may well be impossible as in respect of us, but yet is it possible for GOD to print it in our hearts, and to govern us by his holy spirit, yea even in such wise as it shall be a sweet and light yoke unto us, and there shall be no hardness in it that may weary us. Therefore when men have looked well about them: they shall find that God bears with them, as a father that pities his children. And therefore let us learn to be thankful, and to be the more forward to serve our God, seeing he commands us no such things as ought to seem over bitter or painful to us, but has a regard of our ability.

Thus yet see what we have to mark upon this text, where our Lord shows that he leaves men their commodity. True it is (as was touched yesterday) that we ought to bet so spiritual, as to assemble every day to call upon the name of God, and that we ought to mount up to the heavenly life, leaning all our worldly businesses. But what? God sees that we be compassed about with our flesh, that we creep upon the earth, and that our infirmities carry us away in such sort, as we cannot lead the life of Angels. God therefore beholding such rawness & weakness in us, and rewing our inability to discharge ourselves fully of our duty: releases us, and utters not his uttermost rigor, but says he is contented if we allow him one day: or rather if that day serve us for all the rest of the week, God is contented with it. And why? For (as I said) he goes not to extremity: because he knows that we be too feeble. Seeing then that he bears so with us, and leaves our commodity to us: we be so much the more lewd, dishonest and inexcusable, if we be not inflamed to glue ourselves over unto him.

Now it is said therewithal, that neither manservant, nor womanservant, nor Ox, nor Ass, nor any other Cattle must labor on the Sabbath day, no nor any stranger within your gates. As concerning cattle, it might be thought strange that God should comprehend them under the keeping of the Sabbath or day of rest, seeing it is a high and heavenly mystery, as was declared yesterday. Does such geere belong to Oxen and Asses? GOD. says, I have given you the Sabbath day, to be as a sign that I make you holy, and that I am your GOD which reigns among you. This is not common to all mortal men. For God grants not such grace and privilege to the Paynim and infidels, as to make them holy: He speaks but only to the people whom he adopted and chose to be his heritage. But now seeing that the Sabbath day is a sign of Gods separating of his faithful Church from all the rest of the world: wherefore is it extended unto Oxen and Asses? Let us mark that it is not done for the brut beasts sakes: but to the intent that men should have a monument before their eyes, to be the more touched therewith. This Sacrament then concerns not the beasts, which have no understanding nor reason: but it concerns men, who ought to make their profit of it. We see that the Sacrifices were made of the brute beasts: we see there was great preparation in that behalf: there were vessels of gold and silver & such other like things: and whereas all there things were hallowed, is it meant that God did put his spirit into the corruptible metals, and into the other things that have no feeling? No: but all this is referred to the men, for whose use and commodity they are made. God does not only serve his own turn with them in this present and brittle life: but also give them to us as tokens of his favor, to be as means and helps to draw us up to heaven. Now then, whereas God would have the Oxen and Asses to rest the seventh day: it is not meant thereby that he makes them partakers of the spiritual rest that we spake of before: but it was done to the end that Jews beholding their Stables and stalls shut up, should consider thus with themselves: Lo: God sets us down this sign and visible Sacrament before our eyes, and extends it even to the brute beasts: and that is to the end that we on our part should be held the better to his service, and consider that it were a breaking of the whole law if we should not think upon the thing that is chieftest in all our whole life: namely if we should not learn to forsake ourselves, and no more follow our own likings, reason, and wisdom, but suffer our God to rule us, and become as dead creatures that he may live in us, and not follow our own swinge anymore, which is utterly corrupted. After this manner should the Jews have looked upon the visible sign that extended men to the beasts, to the end it might have restrained them so much the more, and they by that mean have been put in mind to have kept the Sabbath day with all reverence.

Also we see how God at all times handles men according to their hardness, and how he has provided convenient remedies for them, because they be not overhasty to come unto him, until they be drawn thither after that fashion. And this serves not only for the Jews, but also for us. Then let us consider the goodness of our God, since we see he is not unmindful of us, nor over slips anything at all that may remedy our vices. And therewithal let us also consider the untowardness that is in ourselves, to the end that we flatter not ourselves nor give head to our affections, seeing it is so that we have need to be constrained, and that God should give us strokes with the spur, as it were to resty horses. Seeing then that God quickens us up after that fashion, let us assure ourselves he does it not causeless, but because we be forward and stubborn. And therefore let us mislike of all our affections, and learn to imprison ourselves, so as nothing may withhold us from following the trace that God commands us. And although our nature strive against it, yet let us so bridle the same, as we may go through without ceasing, even till we be fully obedient to our God.

Thus you see what we have to remember upon this place, besides that which shall be spoken anon concerning menservants and women servants, whereby God puts the Jews in mind, that they had been servants in the land of Egypt, and therefore that they ought to deal gently with such as were under their power. Your manservant (says he) and your woman servant shall rest themselves. And why? for you yourself has been in bondage. [The time has been that] you wouldest fain have had some rest and refreshing given you. Therefore now you must use the like gentleness towards such as are under your hand. Here it should seem that God ordained not the Sabbath day for a spiritual order only, as is said before: but also for charities sake. For he says, if you yourself were in bondage, wouldest you not that other men should give you some release? couldest you find in your heart to be always toiling? No surely. Therefore must you also bear with others. Now this is not done for the service of God, but rather for common charities sake which ought to be between neighbor and neighbor, how far so ever they be underlings to us in degree. Howbeit inasmuch as this commandment is contained the first table of the Law: surely the thing that is touched here, is but an accessory, I say the first table. For not without cause has God divided his law in such sort, as that he wrote it in two stones. Could he not have written it all in one stone if he had listed? Yes. Why then was it made in two parts? It was not without cause. For there are two principal points in Gods Law. The one concerns our duty towards him, & the other concerns our duty towards our neighbors in being conversant with them. For the end whereunto our whole life ought to be referred, is first of all, that upon knowledge that we have a God to whom we belong, we should walk in his obedience, and that forasmuch as we hold our life of him, we should do him homage for it: and that forasmuch as he has created us to a better hope, and adopted us for his children, wee should glorify him for such goodness: and that forasmuch as he has redeemed us with the blood of his son, we should be wholly his, endeavoring to withdraw ourselves from the defilements of this world we may be true sacrifices unto him, calling upon him alone, fleeing to him alone for succor, & yielding him thanks for all his benefits. You see then; the first point of our life, is the honor that we ought to yield to our God.

Another point is this: that forasmuch as it is his will to try our obedientness by living uprightly among men: none of us must be given to his own peculiar profit, but every of us must endeavor to serve other, and maintain mutual honesty among ourselves, so as we not only abstain from deceit, violence, and cruelty: but also lead a sober and modest life, without looseness lewdness, or beastliness. That is the second point of our life. Now since it is so that the commandment of the Sabbath day is contained in the first table: it follows that it belongs to the spiritual service of God, and that it concerns not the charity which ought to be betwixt neighbor and neighbor. And why then is it treated of in that place? It is all one as if our Lord should say, This Sabbath day shall serve you for an over plus, that your menservants and women servants may have some ease as well as yourselves. Not that that was the drift of Gods purpose: his chief intent was not; there should be a day in; week wherein we should cease from labor, that they might take breath & not be continually overhauled, so as they should be tired: that was not the cause which moved God to appoint the Sabbath day: But his ordaining of it was to do the faithful to understand; they ought to live after such a holy manner, as to rest from all their own lusts and desires, that God might work wholly in them. Also here is a very excellent benefit as men term it. Behold (said our Lord) in as much as you have this warrant among you, that I do sanctify you: see that you also endeavor to give yourselves unto me. For loe, this thing shall do you service, and it is to your profit: that is to wit, your household shall not be always overhauled: for your menservants and your women servants and your cattle must have some rest. Therefore you shall have this as an over plus. Now we see why here is express mention made, that the Jews had been bondservants in Egypt, and therefore that they ought to have regard of such as were held as prisoners under their hand. For whereas Moses speaks of menservants & women servants: he means not that manner of service that is common among us nowadays: for in those days servants were slaves, and they were held down like Oxen & Asses: they were handled so roughly and unkindly, as was pity to see. God therefore tells that Jewish people, that in keeping the Sabbath day, they should even benefit & prosper their own household. So little cause have you (says he) to repine at the time that I have reserved to myself, in taking one of seven: that if you were not over cruel and tyrannous to such as are at your devotion, (you would see that] the same day is to your benefit. If you had no further regard than so civil order, that is to wit that in that day your servants shall have some refreshing: it ought to persuade you thereunto. But you must understand that I have not ordained it alonely for your households sake but to the intent you should bethink you of the thing that I have told you: namely that in as much as you be shoed out from the Infidels, you must be to me a kingly priesthood so as you must seek nothing but to serve me in all soundness and pureness of conscience. Have you once that regard, you shall perceive that the lame day will yield you moreover some earthly commodity, but yet is not that the thing which you must seek thereby. To be short, our Lord shows us here that same thing which is owed by Jesus Christ: which is, that if we seek the kingdom of heaven, all other things shall be cast upon us. For we bear ourselves on hand, that if we seek the heavenly life, we shall starve for hunger, & it will be a mean to turn us out of all our commodities. To be short, the devil comes, & always tempts us to mislike of Gods service, under this pretence & guile, that if we give ourselves to the serving of God, we must starve for hunger so as we shall be in rufull case, & all the world will forsake us. But surely we cannot serve God, unless we be bereft of our own affections, & shake off the worldly cares that press us too fore. Nevertheless we must repose ourselves upon the blessing that is promised us: which is, that if we seek the kingdom of God, we shall be blessed even in these transitory things, so as our Lord will pity us. & give us all things which he knows to be requisite for this present life: only let us but wait upon him for the things which we cannot attain to by our own power & policy. That is that, thing which is showed us in this place.

Now this saying ought to serve us continually for a spur, to make us go forward with the things that God commands us. For the chief thing that stays us from ruling and directing our life in the obedience of God, is that being too much wedded to ourselves, we think that this thing or that thing will be more for our profit, and whatsoever come of it, we will needs lay for our own commodity, & for the things that pertain to the world. We see here that men cannot find in their hearts to follow God: but rather shrink away from him & draw clean back from his law, because that to their seeming, if they should settle God they should never thrive. But that is such a shameful thanklessness as enhances their rebelliousness a hundred fold more. What is to be done then? Let us mark well that we can never serve God with a free & cheerful heart, except we be fully resolved that he will provide for us all our life long, & not forget us as is said in the person of Joshua. For in the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Apostle applies this doctrine to all the faithful, even of purpose to withdraw them from over great carefulness: he says, Your God will not forsake you, neither will he forget you. Now if we could once be thoroughly persuaded that God watches over us, and that he will provide for all our necessities: it is certain that we should not be so overplunged in our earthly affections, we should not be turned away from the serving of him, neither should we be letted to mind the spiritual life: but we should pass through the world & use the creatures as though we used them not, because we would consider that we had yet further to go. Thus you see the effect that we have to gather of this lesson, is that where our Lord shows us his commanding of the Sabbath day to be kept, has a spiritual meaning: yet notwithstanding men shall not fade to find the same profitable to them, and that God will bless them for it, if they look right forth to him, and be not too eager seeking their earthly commodities.

And by the way we be warned, that if any have authority over others, they must not despise their neighbors though they be their inferiors. And this reaches very far. For we must not interpret it only of menservants and women servants: but also of the poor, of such as are not of authority or estimation, of all underlings & subjects, & of all such as (to our seeming) are not worthy to be compared or matched with us in respect of the world. For we see what the pride of men is. Although there be no cause why we should advance ourselves: yet does every of us covet some prominence. Now then, if we be so high minded, that every of us could find in his heart to overpeer his neighbor, yea even though there be no reason why: what will we do if we be advanced indeed? Look upon such as fit in seat of justice: they bear themselves in hand that the whole world (as you would say) was made for none but them, except God bridle them by his holy spirit, & show them that they ought to walk in all manner of mildness, & not oppress those that are under their charge, but rather behave themselves as fathers, & account of their subjects as of their children, yea & that because God honors them, Therefore they ought to live in the greater humility. As for those that preach Gods word, and have that charge to direct others: if they think they ought to be exempted from the common sort, & despise other men: wot worth them. For it were better for them to break their necks in going up into the Pulpit, than not to strain themselves to be the first that should lead a godly conversation, & live quietly with their neighbors, & show themselves to be sheep of the flock of our Lord Jesus Christ. But yet for all this, it is true that rich men may well be served by the poor. If a man have menservants & women servants for wages, he will not set his servant about himself at the table, neither will he lay him in his own bed: but yet, (notwithstanding all superiority,) we must come to this point, that we be knit together as one flesh, & that all of us are created after the image of God. If we considered that as many as come of Adam's race are our own flesh & bone: ought it not to move us unto kindness, though we were as wild beasts one to another? When the Prophet Esay meant to reprove men for their unnaturalness: he said, you shall not despise your own flesh. There ought I to behold myself as in a looking glass: namely in as many men & women as are in the world. Mark that for one point.

But there is yet more: namely that the image of God is printed in all men. Therefore whensoever I go about to oppress any man, I not only despise mine own flesh, but also hurt Gods image as much as in me lies. So then let us mark well, that by this text, God meant to show to all such as are in authority & estimation, and to all such as are richer than others, & to all such as are in any degree of honor: that they ought not to abuse those that are wider their hand, nor to vex or torment them out of measure, but evermore to bear in minds how we be all descended of Adam's race, & are all of one kind, yea & that all of us have Gods image printed in us. That is the thing which we have to note, specially now that our Lord Jesus Christ is come down to us, and has abased himself to condemn all pride, and to show that there is none other mean to serve God than withy lowliness, & moreover has made us all members of his body, as well servants [& underlings) as masters & superiors, so as there is no distinction in that behalf. When we come to our Lord Jesus Christ, and have an eye to him: we must follow him. And seeing that all of us both great and small are members of his body, and he is our head: it is good reason that every of us should fashion himself like to his neighbors. And besides that, seeing that God has showed himself a father more familiarly to us, than he did to them that lived under the Law: let the same move us to maintains brotherly love among us. Thus you see further what we had to remember upon this place.

Howbeit there is yet one point more, concerning Gods ordaining of this monument to put the Jews in remembrance, That they had been as wretched bond slaving the land of Egypt: And we know that they were naughtily and cruelly handled there. Now forasmuch as they would fain have been born withal in that case, and God hearkened to them when they sighed and groaned: therefore does he tell them, that they also ought to do the like to others. And this contains a good lesson: which is, that if we consider ourselves, we may continually be induced to discharge our duties. On the contrary part, if we be cruel towards our neighbors: it is because we be (as you would say) besotted in our own ease, & think not upon our wretchedness & misery. He has suffered hunger and thirst, because he has longed to be succored at his need, will think thus with himself when he sees a poor man: Go to, I myself have been in the like necessity, and I would have been glad to have been succored, & me thought that other men ought to have had pity upon me to relieve me. Now (say I) if a man bethink him of such things when he beholds a poor man in need: will it not make his heart to relent? Yes verily: but what for that? When we be at our ease, we think no more upon our human wretchedness: but rather we imagine that we be exempted, and that we be no more of the common sort. And that causes us to forget ourselves, so as we have no more compassion of our neighbors, nor of anything that they endure. Therefore have we so much the more need to mark this matter: namely, that, because our Lord sees us blinded with self love, so as it is enough for us to welter in pleasure, & we never think upon such as are in distress & necessity: therefore he shows us [our state, saying:] who be you? Were you never in any adversity? Yea & though you happen to overshoot yourselves towards them: do you not bethink yourselves again [and say,] Look, there are creatures shaped after the image of God, & if we misuse them, God will have no pity upon us? And so let us practice this doctrine all our life long. Therefore whensoever we see any folk pinched with adversity, let us call ourselves to remembrance in this wise: Have not I been in need as well as they? And if I were in like taking again, would I not be glad to be succored? Seeing it is so: why should we exempt ourselves from such condition? We ought at leastwise to do to other folks, as we ourselves would be done unto. Nature teaches us that, and we need not go to school to learn it. Then needs there not any other evidence to condemn us, that our Lords teaching of us beforehand by experience. If we have that: surely we shall be touched with kindness & compassion to succor such as have need and want, and we shall be moved a pity towards them that are in durance, so that if we have the mean and power to relieve them, every of us will strain himself to do it. That is the thing which we have to mark in this place, where it is said, You wart a stranger in the land of Egypt, & therefore you must now have a care to relieve them that are under your hand: for at that time when you yourself was a servant, you wouldest fain have been born withal.

But let us come now to such as were not of the Jewish nation, but only traffickers among them. God will have them also to keep the Sabbath day & yet were they not sanctified of God, neither could this sign belong to them, as I have said already. It seems then that, God unhallows the Sacrament, when he makes it so common to the Infidels & to such as were not circumcised to bear the mark of the covenant, & to such as had not the law & the promises. But we have to mark, that Gods speaking of strangers in this place, is as having always an eye to the people whom he had chosen and adopted. For we know if things should be permitted which are contrary to Gods service: although it might be said that they be no people of our body: we might be induced to follow them by their evil example. If strangers had been suffered to travel among the Jews: what would have come of it? The Jews would have dealt with them, & so have defiled themselves, and there would have been no difference at that time. For when occasions offer themselves, we be easily enticed to evil. And although there be no great occasion: yet is our nature so much inclined to evil, that we be allured to it by and by. And what will become of us then, when all shall be out of order? So then the liberty that had been given to stranger to labor & travel among the people of Israel [on the Sabbath day,] would have led them to corruption. Every man would have dispensed with himself, and taken leave to break the Sabbath day and not to keep it. Therefore to cut off such occasion of evil, and to have that day, observed with the greater reverence: like as Gods will was that the cattle should rest, so ordained he the like also for strangers. And now must this serve for us too. For it shows us that vices may not be suffered among people that make profession of Christianity, so as they should go unpunished, no not even in such as are but travelers or sojourners. As how? Whereas blasphemy is condemned among us, if a man here one blasphemy in passing by, so as he scorns God, and yet suffers it and winks at it: is not his bearing with such blasphemy, so as it has full scope unrepressed, is good as a defiling to make all other things stink? Yes: and yet is it to be seen. Surely so far of is it that blasphemy is punished as it deserves, among such as are not of our religion: that even in those which are mingled with us and profesfe Christianity as we do, men do as it were harden themselves: and that is to our greater shame. But yet for all that, if any man, be he Papist or be he of any other sect, (as nowadays the world is fraught full of despisers of God:) I say if any man be suffered to rail against the doctrine of the Gospel, and to blaspheme Gods name: corruption will ensue of it, so as it shall not be easy to redress it. If Whoremasters and Russians may be suffered to bring in their lewd tricks, and to sow more wickedness among us than we had before. If wanton persons unthrift may be suffered to come and play their lewd pranks here: must it not needs be that we shall play the unthrift with them, & be utterly corrupted? Yes: and therefore let us mark well, that our Lord intends to keep his people occupied in all cleanness, so as the professors of Christianity shall not only abstain from evil themselves, but also not suffer any, so far as in them lies. For we must understand that the earth is as it were unhallowed, when Gods service is defiled, and his holy name dishonored. The land wherein he will have us to dwell, is as it were defiled and accursed, or at leastwise it is not long of us if it be not so. But if GOD have given his children prerogative, so as they be able to rid idolatry out of the Country where they dwell: surely if they do it not, they provoke Gods wrath and vengeance against themselves. Now then if we should grant the abominations of the Popedom, to be mingled here with the pure service of GOD, so as the willful Papists that list to live here, should have Mass granted them by privilege, and they should be suffered to have some corner to work their idolatry and superstition in: it were a drawing of Gods wrath upon us, and a kindling of the fire of his vengeance against us. And why? Because that in as much as God has put the sword of justice into the hands of such as have the rule of things in this life, and given them power to drive away idolatry and all infections of Papistry: surely if they maintain them, it is as if they drove away GOD, that he should no more dwell among them nor reign over them. So then let us mark well, that it is not without cause that our Lord would that the strangers which dwelt among his people, (notwithstanding that they were of another faith and Religion,) should be compelled to keep the seventh day. Not for their own sakes nor for their own instruction, (for they were not capable thereof:) but to the end there should be no stumbling block to disorder his people, or to deface his service, but that the land which he had given to his servant Abraham to inherit, might be wholly dedicated unto him.

And hereby we be warned, not only to sanctify ourselves by Gods word: but also not to suffer any occasion of offence or disorder to be committed among us, but to see that all such things be clean rid away. Moreover seeing our Lords will have us to be so zealous in the maintenance of his service, as to constrain even then that profess not themselves to be of his Church, to yield and frame themselves unto us as long as they be in our company: I pray you how shall we excuse ourselves, if we on our side be not wholly given unto him, nor set forth ourselves as mirrors to draw wretched unbelievers unto us, and to win them to our GOD? For if we rebuke them when they do amiss, & in the meanwhile they perceive the like or greater faults in us: shall they not have occasion to laugh all our sayings to scorn? Now then seeing it was forbidden to suffer strangers to do things contrary to Gods service: let us assure ourselves that we be double commanded to walk warily and in such humility & soberness, as strangers may see by experience, that our desiring that God should be honored, is in good earnest & without counterfeiting, & that we cannot abide that any, man should work reproach to his Majesty and glory. That is the thing which we have to mark upon this place, if we mind to observe the thing nowadays which was commanded the Jews, accordingly also as it belongs to us in truth and substance. For like as our Lord in old time delivered that people out of Egypt: so has he now delivered us from the gulf of hell, and rid us from everlasting death, and from the bottomless pit of hell wherein we were plunged, of purpose to take us up into his heavenly kingdom, purchased for us by the blood of his dear beloved son our Lord by Jesus Christ.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgment of our sins, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, to the end that we endeavoring to reform ourselves more and more according to his righteousness, may fight daily against the lusts of our flesh, and shun all that is against the pure service of our God, holding out in the same encounter till he have fully rid us of it, and fashioned us again after his own image, according whereunto we were created at the first. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

On Wednesday, the 26th of June 1555

The thirty sixth Sermon, which is the seventh upon the fifth Chapter 16 Honor your father and your mother, as the Lord your God has commanded you, that your days may be prolonged, and that it may go well with you in the land which the Lord your God gives you.

Now we be come to the second table of the Law, where GOD shows us how we ought to have one with another. For as has been touched heretofore, there are two principal things in our life first that we serve God purely, and afterward that we live honestly and uprightly with other men, yielding every man his due. Now like as the honor of God excels all things that concern man: so was it meete that the rule thereof should be set down in first and chief place, that we might honor him as we ought to do: which thing is dispatched in the first table. Here therefore GOD begins to tell us how to direct our life, if we intend to serve him as in respect of men. Also I have showed you that God requires not any honor at our hands for that he has need of it or is ever the better for it: but he does it for our benefit and welfare. Now then his intent is to try our obedience, and the love that we bears him, by commanding us to behave ourselves uprightly and honestly towards our neighbors, and to live together in such fellowship and concord, as none of us be given to himself, but all of us communicate together, and every man strain and employ himself to do good, according to such power and ability as they have. That (say I) is the proof to know if we worship him with our hearts. For we may well make many fair countenances and Ceremonies: but God will not take them for payment. And even that is the cause why our Lord Jesus Christ said, that the chief points of the Law are Justice, Judgment, uprightness, and faith, that is to say faithfulness or trustiness, for so does the word Faith betoken there. Then if we live uprightly among men, so as we be neither guileful nor malicious, but desirous to serve every man's turn, maintaining the good and resisting the evil as near as we can: it is the chief point of the Law. Not that the service of God ought to be forgotten in the meanwhile, or that it is of less importance: but because it is impossible for men to discharge their duty towards their neighbors, if they be not led by the fear of God.

Now let us create of the forerehearsed commandment, which is of the honoring of our father and mother. Although mention be made here of father and mother by name: no doubt but he meant to deliver a general doctrine for the honoring of all Superiors. For proof whereof, we know that the Law is a perfect rule wherein nothing is wanting. But if there were nothing included concerning other superiors, as Princess, Magistrates, and such as have the sword of Justice, and Masters: there were some want. Therefore it is to be concluded, that here GOD has commanded the honoring and obeying of all such as are in degree of superiority. Moreover seeing it is so that all prominence comes of GOD, and that it is an order set by him, without the which the world could not continue: what a thing were it that God should have made none account of it, in giving us the sure form of good and holy life? It is not to be thought strange, that he should comprehend all under one particular: for I have told you already, that that manner of dealing is to be found in the Law, and we shall see more of it again hereafter. Neither was that done because GOD could not have spoken otherwise: but because it was best for our commodity and instruction. For we know that although men covet to seem subtle and sharp-witted: yet they cease not to shroud themselves under the covert of ignorance, when they see that Gods law presses them: for then we would fain have some excuse to exempt us from the subjection thereof. Now if Gods Law were not meet to teach the rude & unlearned: many would allege that they be no clerks, and that they never went to school, and so they would bear themselves in hand, that Gods Law bound them not. But in as much as we see that God has stooped to our rudeness, and spoken grossly according to our understanding: it bereaves us of all excuse, and cuts off all occasion of quarrelling, so as every of us must be fair to submit ourselves, and to acknowledge that there is none other impediment, but that we be stubborn against God, and loth to bear his yoke. Thus you see that Gods comprehending of all under one particular, was to train us on as little children, which are not of full capacity to be taught thoroughly and perfectly. Nevertheless, that is the true and natural sense of the text, as we shall see hereafter. For like as God gave the ten Sentences, as he terms them: so added be an exposition of them, to the end that nothing should be dark, nor men call the things in question and disputation which they had heard. We see then that God has opened himself more fully, and chewed how his will is that not only fathers and mothers, but also all superiors without exception should be obeyed.

Besides this, let us mark that God speaks here of the honoring of fathers and mothers, of purpose to draw us by means most convenient and agreeable to our nature. We know there is such pride in men, as they be loth to stoop one to another, and every man thinks he ought to be a master. And surely it is hard for men to yield and come down so low, as simply to obey those that are in any authority over them: until GOD have reclaimed them. GOD therefore perceiving subjection to be a thing so fore against our nature: has set us down the terms of Father and Mother, to draw us to it by a more loving manner. Now it is an ugly and unnatural thing, that the child should not know those by whom he came into the world, and by whom he was nourished and brought up. Therefore if the child disdain his father or his mother: he is a monster, & every man will abhor him. And why? For without Gods speaking, without having any holy scripture, without much preaching unto us, nature itself shows us, that the duty which the child owes to his father and mother, is such a one as cannot be broken off. We see then that the intent of our God is to win us to himself by setting down the terms of father and mother, to the end we should not be stubborn, but come meekly to receive the subjection that he lays upon us. And because all the authority which men have proceeds from him, he speaks according to the Law of civil order: meaning that we should be diligent in doing him his due honor, and every of us on his own behalf obey those that have superiority over us, and every man have an eye to his own state and calling, so as the children honor their fathers and mothers, the people the Magistrates, and servants likewise their masters: and to be short, that there be a good harmony of concord among us, according to the order that our Lord has set, which ought to be inviolable.

Furthermore whereas here is mention made of honor: it is not meant that children should but only speak fair to their father and mother, or put off their Caps or bow their knees to them: for God stays not upon such things: but Honoring imports much more, that is to wit, that the children should follow their fathers and mothers counsel, that they should suffer themselves to be ruled by them, that they should strain themselves to do their duty to them, and to be short, that they should know that they be not at their own liberty, so long as they have father and mother. That is in effect the thing that God meant by the word, Honor. And that it is so, we cannot have a better or faithfuller interpreter of this law, than the holy Ghost which spake by the mouth of Moses, and of all the Prophets, and also of S. Paul. For we shall see hereafter, that God expounds the effect of this sentence, that is to wit, that it is not enough for children to show some reverence with the head or with the knee to their parents: but that they must be subject to them, and employ themselves in their service to the uttermost of their power. And Saint Paul's vouching thereof is not to exhort us to observe some ceremony: but his meaning is that children should be subject to their Fathers and mothers. He sets down expressly the word Subjection. So then we see now what this imports, and what the natural meaning of this place is.

Now let us return to the thing that I touched briefly before, that we may profit by it, by gathering some profitable lesson of it. First and foremost let children understand, that seeing GOD has given them fathers and mothers, it is good reason that they should obey them, or else they show themselves to be despisers of God: and the stubbornness which they use to their superiors, concerns not men nor mortal creatures, but is all one as if Gods majesty and glory were trodden under foot. It is said that (to speak properly) we have but one father, which is in heaven: and that is meant, not only in respect of our souls, but also in respect of our bodies. Now then this honor of bearing the name of Father, belongs peculiarly to GOD alone, and cannot agree to men, further forth than it pleases him to make them partakers thereof. Seeing then that the title of father is as a mark which God has set upon men: we see that when children make no account of their fathers and mothers, they do wrong unto God, As much is to be said of all such as disobey their princess & magistrates: and likewise of servants that would have all degrees confounded, and reign without order. And for the same cause also did the Heathen men apply this word Godliness to that honor that we give to fathers and mothers, and to all such as are in authority over us. Godliness (to speak properly) is the reverence that we owe unto God: and yet the heathen, (notwithstanding that they were blind wretches) knew that God will be served, not only in his own majesty, but also by our obeying of such folk as have authority over us: To be short his will is to try our obedientness in that behalf. And therefore in as much as fathers and mothers, magistrates and all such as have superiority, are Gods Lieutenants and represent his person: surely if a man despise them and make light of them, it is all one as if he bewrayed that he would not obey God. He may well protest the contrary: but yet is it so indeed for all that. If the wretched infidels knew this, & that God left them such an affection: what excuse will there be for us, if we know it not yet better? Since we hear that all fatherhood proceeds of God, (as Saint Paul owes,) and that we be directed thither by the union of Jesus Christ: have we not a most express declaration of it? Must the heathen men be fain to be our teachers still? But if those which call themselves Christians, do play the blind beetles in this behalf, or stop their ears least they might understand the thing that GOD, has told them by silly ignorant souls: woe worth them, for their condemnation will be the more horrible. Wherefore let us well malice this: that we cannot indeed live here below on the earth together, except this order that God has established be holy and religiously kept, that is to say: Except those that be in authority be honored, esteemed, and obeyed: verily without that, there will be nothing but horrible confusion. They then that cannot find in their hearts to be subject to magistrates, they that disobey their fathers and mothers, they that will bear no yoke of masters and mistresses, do well show that it is not long of themselves that the whole order of nature is not perverted, and heaven and earth confounded together as they say. For that is the only mean whereby it is Gods will to preserve mankind. And of a truth we see that (as he himself said) when he sends magistrates and princess, he strikes a fear of them not only into men, but also into beasts. After that manner is it spoken of in Daniel.

And thereupon we may gather, that such as rise against the civil magistrate ordained of god, and labor to set things in a broil and to bring all things to confusion, are worse than brute beasts and worthy to be sent thither to school. For our Lord, to shame men which are reasonable creatures, says that the fear of princess and magistrates ought to extend even to brute beasts. It is not apparent then, that the devil possesses all such as cannot find in their hearts to submit themselves meekly to the subjection which God has ordained, and without the which all must needs perish and go to havoc in this world, as I have declared before? Yes: and therefore if we find ourselves overhighminded, so as it grieves us to be subject let us strive against pride, and let Gods authority suffice to bridle us. For though we were worse than wild: yet ought this to be as a fetter unto us, that we hear how God tells us he is not honored at our hand, except we honor him in the persons of those whom he has set in his place, and in whom he has printed his image. To be short, we see that charity begins at the humbling and meekening of ourselves, so as none of us advance himself through pride and presumption, nor make too great account of himself, but be willing to stoop and to yield to what so ever pleases God. And for the same cause does Saint Paul bring us back to charity, when he sets forth the commandment of obeying the Magistrate. For he shows us that if we have not the meekness in us to bow down our necks, when our Lord lays the yoke upon us: we have no love towards our neighbors. And if we covet disorder and turmoil, so as the superiors should no more be revered: all must needs go to havoc and spoil. It were much better for every man to live alone by himself and without company: than to see such confusion as would grow of it, if we should not keep the dull order which GOD has set. Wherefore let us bear well in mind, that if we will live among neighbors, every of us must pull down this lustiness and overweening, and not harbrough it in our hearts, but learn to be lowly and meek, assuring ourselves that it is our duty to submit ourselves even to the meanest, as S. Paul said. And that we may the better do it, let us consider what may enable us thereto. For behold, the thing that makes us overshoot ourselves, is that every man would have greater prominence than God allows him: for our blindness makes us to forget ourselves. And besides this we know not our own wretchedness and sinfulness. By reason whereof every of us thinks himself a marvelous fellow, whereas indeed he is nothing at all. Again, we be so inclined to make no reckoning of our neighbors, that we despise even the venues which God has put into them. Then is it spitefulness and churlishness that provoke us to pride, by means whereof every man takes more upon him than becomes him. And that is the cause why we cannot submit ourselves As we ought to do. But instead of doing so, let us learn to do homage to our God, forasmuch as we see he has commanded us to obey our superiors, & again we know that whatsoever they be, it is he that has given us them. If a child have a father or a mother, he must not say, Tush, my father is not altogether such a one as he ought to be, I find defaults in him. But yet is he your father, and that ought to content you: at leastwise if you mind not to bring all to naught, and utterly to deface the order of nature. Either the thing that God has ordained must be disannulled and annihilated: or else you must honor your father whatsoever he be. And why? Because that whatsoever father you has, he is of his giving which has commanded you to honor your father and your mother. As much is to be said of Masters, Princess, and all superiors. For they come not by haphazard: but they be of Gods sending, as S. Paul owes, and as all the scripture witnesses. Yea and we be led expressly even by experience, to know Gods providence and fatherly care towards us, in ordaining of Magistrates. Therefore let us learn to behold Gods goodness, in all such as have superiority over us, to the end to submit ourselves obediently unto them. Thus yet see what we have to remember.

Now seeing that so it is that God has in one word and in a brief sum given us here the rule of obedience to all superiors: let us mark that in so doing he resigns not his own right nor forgoes that which belongs to himself. Therefore God must hold still the highest degree. And indeed seeing that all fatherhood proceeds of him, (according to S. Paul's text before alleged): let us mark that when we obey father or mother, prince or magistrate, master or mistress: it is done unto them as officers of God. God then must be honored above all, and that in such sort, as the honor which we yield unto mortal men, hinder not the doing of the service and honor which we owe unto him, but that every of us endeavor to discharge our duties chiefly towards him. It were a goodly fight to see a man obey an under officer, & therewithal to spit in the face of the judge or of the Prince. What a dealing were that? But even in like case is it with us, when we dispossess God of his preeminence, and obey men in such sort, as in the meanwhile we make no reckoning of him that is above all. For it is against nature, that the authority which men have, should in any wise deface the glory of God. Therefore let us mark well that whereas we be commanded to obey our superiors: this exception is implied, that the same be no derogation or impeachment to the right that belongs to God, which has been treated of already in the first table. For we know that the service wherewith God is honored, ought to be preferred before all things. And for that same cause S. Paul minding to give us an exposition of this text, adds expressly that children must obey their fathers and mothers, howbeit in the Lord. And I told you also, that the foundation whereon we ought to build, that we may be obedient lowly and subject to our superiors: is to know that God is represented in their persons. Now take me away the foundation, and must not all the whole building fall and go down to the ground? But all they that regard not god, do take away the foundation of this doctrine: & so their proceeding is too faulty and forward.

Howbeit, this thing must as well warn them that are in authority, as them that are under subjection. Then if men and women have children: they must understand that there is no subjection due unto them, except they themselves be over ruled by God. Now then what is to be done? Let the father train up his child diligently in the fear of God, and begin himself to show him the way. Let the mother do the like, that God may have his honor both of great & small, old and young. Let magistrate endeavor to have God served and honored, & (as much as in them lies) maintain all things that may make thereto: and seeing he has done them that honor to make them worthy) to sit in the seat that is dedicated to his majesty, & to bear the sword that is consecrated unto him: let them show themselves to be his officers indeed. Seeing then that he has advanced them to such dignity, whereof they were not worthy: let them at the least show that they bear authority in his name, & let them refer the same unto him. After this manner ought princes to discharge their duties. The like ought every man to do in his own house and family. Let those to whom God has granted the prerogative to have menservants & women servants, bear well in mind that they themselves have a Master above that he must be so obeyed, as his whole right be reserved to him unminished, Look what instruction all Superiors (of what degree so ever they be) ought to take of this that they are commanded to obey God. Furthermore when fathers & mothers and magistrates will need a uance themselves against God with such tyranny, as to take upon the that which belongs only to god, & to turn us away from the obeying of him: it is an exception which I have let down before, for the which they ought not to be obeyed. God then must go foremost, & afterward the creatures must follow, everyone in his order of array. And in very deed, often times the cause why meekness & humility be foil kept in the world, that children set themselves against their fathers and mothers, and become like mad beasts: that subjects are full of spitefulness and rebellion: that servants are untrusty &

stubborn and that none of all these can by any means be reclaimed: is the just punishment of God upon superiors, for abusing of the dignity which God has given them. For often times we see that Princess reign not to magnify Gods name, and to cause him to be honored as he deserved but clean contrariwise they would fain make themselves idols, and as it were pluck God out of his seat to sit in it themselves. This is apparent: at leastwise a man may see that Princess reign loosely & therefore God must needs be revenged of them. What zeal or mind have fathers and mothers to bring up their children in the fear of God? They pass not for that, so they may advance them to the worldward. Nay rather it should seem that their intent is to train them up in all ungodliness, and in the contempt of God and his word. If the fathers be wolves, they would have their children wolvisish: if they be old Foxes, they would have them to be foxish: & if they be serpents, they would have their Image and offspring like themselves. This is to be seen. Therefore it is good reason that GOD should be revenged of the creatures, when they forget themselves after that sort, specially when men consider not how God has reached them his hand to advance them, and to make them partakers of his honor, one under another. This is always to be born in remembrance. But is it not a shameful unthankfulness, when a man that is in authority of justice, considers not with himself: what am I? Behold, I am a wretched worm of the earth, and yet GOD vouchsafes me to bear his name as from himself, and withal to put the authority in practice which he has given me: Is not a man too unthankful when he acknowledges not that? Again, when fathers consider not: Behold, God is the father of all mankind, and yet has he given me the same honorable title: Therefore it is good reason that I should look to yield him an account of it. When mailers and mistresses acknowledge not: We be no better than other folks, and yet has God vouchsafed to in-honor us, not only by creating us after his own image, but also by giving us this moreover, that others are subject unto us: if men (say I) acknowledge not this: is it to be laid that they be become stark beasts?

Then let us mark well, that diverse times the ground of rebellion & disobedience is this, that they which are in authority know not their own duty, namely that above all things they should find the means to have God honored, served, and obeyed. True it is that children, subjects and servants shall not be excused by that: but yet we see it is the just vengeance of God, & therefore so much the more ought we to be provoked to follow that which is told us, as well in this text as in all the holy Scripture, where this commandment is declared unto us. Then to be short, let us be well advised, that we discharge our duties every of us in his own calling and state. Let those to whom God has done the honor to give them the mace of Justice, & whom he has set in his seat, be well advised that they reign in his name, that they cause all men to serve and honor him, that they be as mirrors to give good example to their people, and that they hold their subjects in such good awe and order, as Gods name be blessed, and the mouths of all evil speakers be stopped. Mark that for one point.

Again let fathers and mothers have a care to bring up their children well, and to make them know God for their only father. And as touching their menservants and women servants, let them so use their service, as God have always the preeminence. Let them not follow the common trade: for men do commonly pile for nothing else, so as they may be served to their own profit and contentation. As for God, he is forgotten all the while. But let matters understand, that God must reign both over themselves and over those that are under them. Thus much concerning those that are in authority.

Now for our part, let us bear well in mind, that, when we have Magistrates, if we rebel against them, or rise against the State, endeavoring to overthrow the order that God has set: wee resist not mortal creatures, but it is God whom we assail. And what can we win by making war against him? Can we overmaster him? No: but he will revenge himself without handy strokes, so as men shall be utterly abashed, to see how he maintained the thing that he had spoken with his mouth, yea men by wonderful power. Thus much concerning the first point.

Again let children beware that they be not high-minded, nor wild headed, nor willful, but that they submit themselves quietly to their fathers and mothers, assuring themselves that they fight against God, when they cannot find in their hearts to stoop to the yoke which our Lord puts upon them. And let servants know that if they refuse the subjection of the men whom they serve, God is offended at it, and in the end they must be blamed for refusing to be governed by his hand.

But let us mark herewithall, that God must be honored first, and the subjects must so obey their Princess and Magistrates, as the same may be no derogation to the right that God reserves to himself, as he is worthy. And if Princess will needs enforce us to do evil, and overthrow the pure doctrine of God, (as we see too commonly in the world, insomuch that a number are so mad as they would fain wrest religion after their own fancy, to make as it were an image of wax of it, that they might writh it which way they lifted, as all men may see): God will not like of it that they should be obeyed in that behalf. For who be they? When they once revolt and climb above him that has all sovereign Dominion: forthwith they forgo all their authority. The very devils must bow their knees before God and our Lord Jesus Christ: and behold, moral men usurp such superiority, as the honor of God is defaced and all religion thrust down. So then let us learn to obey both princess and fathers and mothers in such wise, as God may holds still his right unimpaired, and we not belated to yield him his due honor. Nevertheless we must obey them quietly, so far forth as we may without hurt of conscience. And although that such as have authority over us discharge not their duty: yet must not children misbehave themselves when their parents are too sharp and rigorous to them. True it is that the parents are forbidden to use any cruelty towards their children, & specially to discourage them: but yet for all that though the parents be not so well advised as to govern their children with mildness: the children must bear it patiently. Finally wee must suffer at the hands of all such as have authority over us. And so you see what God meant to set out in this commandment.

Now he adds a promise. That your days (said he) may be prolonged, and that you must prosper in the Land which the Lord your God gives you. But there is yet one thing more: which is, that forasmuch as we be loth to yield ourselves to humility: God gives us here a stroke with the spur, saying: thy God commands you. And it serves to confirm the doctrine that I have touched already: that is to wit, that it is but a fond & trifling shift, to dispute whether such as are in state of honor above us do deserve to have that room: Or whether they do discharge their duty, as well as they are advanced thereto. All such geere must be laid aside. And why? For we must hold us contented with Gods ordinance, and rest altogether upon his good pleasure. And that is the cause why Moses adds here expressly, according as the Everlasting your God has commanded you. As if he should say, true it is that men do always kick against it as much as they can. If one would bring them under awe, they will not abide it by their good will: Again they have such lustiness in them, as provokes them continually to be desirous to exalt themselves too much. By means whereof there will never be any willing subjection until God have wrought it. But you be always rebellious against God (said he) when you once enter into such debating's as this: Should such a one reign over me, and I obey him, seeing he is no better than I? If you bear such spite towards men: God himself steps forth, and desires to know whether you will serve him or no: And if you will not receive his lieutenants when he sends them unto you: it is a certain sign that you refuse his yoke likewise, by means whereof his justice is impeached, and he feels himself to be injured by you. Since it is so then, know you (said Moses) that the children which are disobedient to their fathers and mothers, may well allege this and chat: and the folk that rebel against their superiors, may well make excuses: but none of those things shall stand them in any stead. The reason is, that God, who has ordained superiority in the world, will also have it maintained: he has spoken the word, and it cannot be called back. When God has once given his definitive sentence, it is not for us to call the matter in question anymore: but we must stand to it and hold our mouths shut. Yet notwithstanding, our Lord uses still his goodness in this commandment: and he does it to win us and to draw us the better to him, that we might willingly obey our superiors, seeing he adds a promise. For (as says S. Paul) it is the first commandment of the law, that has any special promise. Indeed we have seen heretofore, how God shows mercy in a thousand generations, to such as love him. And that was added to the commandment wherein God showed us, that he would have his service maintained in all pureness, without swerving aside to idolatry or superstition. But that promise extended to the whole Law, as we saw there: whereas this is annexed only to the commandment of obeying our fathers and mothers. For as much then as we see it is an acceptable sacrifice to God: let such as are in subjection hold themselves to it, and not play the rebels and mad bedlams, but bows down their necks and submit themselves, so as it may appear indeed that they be willing to obey GOD, because they refuse not to obey the mortal men whom he has sent, and appointed in his name.

Thus you see to what purpose this promise was given: namely, that God perceiving us to be dull upon the spur, meant to soften our hearts; and to win us to him by mildness and gentleness, to the intent it should not grieve us not be irksome to us to obey our superiors. But forasmuch as all cannot be dispatched at this present: Let us bear in mind at a word, that to serve God well, we must lay down all pride and presumptuousness. Although we have naturally in us the cursed room of desirousness to climb, so as ambition reigns both in great and small: yet must the same be laid down, if we mean to prepare ourselves to Gods service. And why? For lowliness is the thing whereas the true obedience must begin. And as concerning men, let us mark well that we shall never be able to live in peace and concord, except that those whom God has set in place of authority and preeminence, be obeyed and received for his sake, so as men submit themselves to them. For rise all must needs go to wreck, and we shall be worse than the wild beasts that are abroad in the woods. Therefore all they that are disobedient to lawful superiority, are as enemies to God and nature, and to all mankind: yea they be as monsters whom all men ought to abhor.

But when we have showed our obedientness by being subject to those whom

God has set over us: let us learn also, that it is good reason we should be humbled under him, and that in such wise, as he be served by us: not in way of ceremony, but in truth and pureness of mind, so as we do him his due homage, and make account of his honor above all things. Yea and all the civil orders of the world must lead us thereunto: namely that God may have his throne exalted above the heavens. And whereas children obey their fathers and mothers, and subjects their Magistrates, and the like order is to be seen in every house according to Gods ordinance, who has appointed that there should be some difference of degrees everywhere: Let the same draw us up higher, to consider that God who holds the chief sovereignty of the world, ought to overrule all creatures, and robe Master of our whole life in effect. And so we see that all the obedience which is yielded to mortal creatures must tend to the pure worshipping of God. Whereby we perceive the more plainly how much we ought to abhor the cursed Popedom. For it is an over stateliness crept up in the world, to none other end than to drive God out of his seat & to bereave him of the honor that belongs to him: For the Pope will grant well enough that he ought to be subject to his Superiors: But what shoe? Keeps he any order either of God or of nature? No: but contrariwise his meaning is to despise all that is contained in the holy Scripture overthrowing all the order and policy that God has commanded us. He terms himself Christ's Vicar: and yet notwithstanding the world sees, that he has thrust Jesus Christ out of his seat, so as he is no more the head of his Church. Therefore let us learn to abhor the thing, which the devil has so set up on the contrary part, quite and clean against that which God has ordained in the world. And therewithal though we see that sometimes things go not as they ought to do, but that superiors abide their power: let us assure ourselves they cannot overthrow Gods ordinance as in respect of kingdoms and Empires, and as in respect of the ground of Justice: but that all those things must be maintained still. For they have their foundation of God: and it is not with them as with this hellish, Popedom which has no foundation at all: but contrariwise we know that God will have kings and princess and magistrates of justice to continue still: and therefore those must needs be maintained. And if the fathers do not their duty, but use tyranny towards their children: let us be sorry for it, and assure ourselves that the same springs of our sins. Also when God suffered his ordinance to be unobserved, so as all is out of order: let us understand that we ought to run unto him the more carefully, and to beseech him to set those things in order again, so as it may be known that our whole desire is to be governed by him, as the only mean whereby he works our welfare.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to make us feel them better, that we may with true repentance learn to make of ourselves for them, and so return to him as we may profit more & more, even until we be rid of all our sins & thoroughly fashioned again like to him in righteousness. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, &c.

The thirty seventh Sermon which is the eight upon the fifth Chapter 17 You shall not be a murderer.

WE have seen already, how that to live well with men, we must obey our superiors. For it is the first thing that God commands us in the second table of his law: because the mean in descending from him to men, is to honor those whom he has set over us. Indeed when we speak of men, there is some equal fellowship: for we come all of Adams race: we be all of one kind: and all this imports an equality among men. Nevertheless forasmuch as it has pleased God to set certain degrees: we must hold us thereunto, and keep that order, so as the party which has any preeminence and dignity, may be acknowledged for such a one as is to be honored. And in this case we must not allege, why is he more esteemed than I? For that comes not of any worthiness that is in one more than in another: but of Gods will, who will have them so honored to whom he has given any preeminence. And it is not enough for children to honor their parents by yielding them some reverence: but they must also succor them, and spend themselves to the uttermost for them, accordingly as our Lord Jesus Christ shows how it is but hypocrisy, when children do but make some countenance of honoring their fathers and mothers, and in the meanwhile let them alone in their necessity, without regard of discharging their duty towards them at their need. It is a defrauding of the parents of that which is due to them, and a scorning of Gods Law, when men observe it so by way of Ceremony. In like case is it with all manner of subjection. For it is not meant that men should but only yield some sign of honor: but that they should yield the party his full right, which has any preeminence, yea and that the same should be done willingly. True it is (as I have declared heretofore) that men would fain be exempted from all bondage. Howbeit forasmuch as God has set a contrary order: we must submit ourselves to it with a good will, and not by force. For to what purpose is it to obey God spite of our teeth, when our heart goes clean against? Then must our will go with it, and whatsoever our Lord commands us we must think it good and amiable. Thus the entrance into good conversation among men, is to consider that our fathers and mothers and all our superiors are advanced to that preeminence above others, to the intent they should be honored: Otherwise, God is misused in their persons, and it is all one 50 as if we refused to honor him and to be subject to him.

Now after that Moses has set down this fifth commandment: he adds, That we must not be murderers. Indeed it may seem at the first blush, that God led not his people to great perfection in forbidding them to commit murder. But we must mark, that God intended to comprise (as it were in a short abridgment) all that is requisite for the well ruling of this our life: and therefore it was not for him to forget any thing, or to leave anything behind. Now we must understand that the way for men to rule their lives well & orderly, is to abstain from all evil doing, injury, & violence, and therewithal to line chastely and honestly with out hurting or hindering of any man, and on the other side, to keep their tongues from harming any man by any manner of falsehood and lying. All there good properties must be in us, if we will frame ourselves to Gods will and righteousness. So then, it is not to be marveled at, that God should speak here of murders. For it is done to hold us in awe, that we should not go about to do any outrage or harm to our neighbors. But yet for all this, we must come back again to that which I have touched already: that is to wit, that God speaks after a rude and gross fashion, to apply himself both to great and final, and even to the very idiots. For we see how every man excuses himself by ignorance: and if a thing be somewhat dark and hard, we think we have wherewith to wash our hands of the matter. When we have done amiss, we think all is safe, if we can say, Oh, it was too high and too profound for me, I understood never a whit of it. To the end therefore that men should have no such starting holes: Gods will was to speak after such a fashion, as even little babes might understand what he said. That is the cause why he said in short words, You shall not be a murderer.

Let us mark moreover, that God, to the intent to lead us by little and little to live well, sets us down the things that are most hateful that we might learn to keep ourselves from evil doing. As for example, he could have said, you shall do no wrong nor violence to your neighbors: he could well have said so: but he listed to set down the word Murder. And why? Because it is a thing against nature, when men go about to wipe out Gods image after that fashion. Needs then must we abhor murder, if we be not stark beasts. How be it, this teaches us that there is not a more heinous thing, nor a thing that we ought to abhor more, than murder. GOD therefore to tie us the shorter and to withhold us from all annoying, and from all wrong dealing, tells us that we must not defile our hands with the blood of our neighbors. Well then: If a man abstain from murder, is that all? No not by a great deal, as shall be showed anon, and as the matter affords already at the first entrance into it. For Gods intent is to hold both our hearts and our thoughts in subjection, and he will be served so purely at our hands, as we nourish not any ill will towards our neighbors. Why then speaks he of murder? [It is all one] as if he should say, although you had no law written, but were as heathen men: yet ought you to have this printed in your hearts, that murder is a shameful and ugly thing. Now I tell you, that as many as do any outrage to their neighbors, as many as devise any mischief against them, and as many as nourish any hatred and rancor in their hearts: I account and condemn them all for murderers. Thus you see the cause why GOD uses that term.

And now let us mark well, that it is not for naught that God forbids murder. Why so? For we can have no fellowship with men, unless we abstain from all wrong and violence, And under one particular kind, God forbids all. Why so? for had he used long speech: a man might have said, I cannot well bear my lesson in minds, and it is too hard for me. Therefore has God spoken here in one word, to the intent that his doctrine might be soon learned, and his law bee easily born in remembrance. There needs no great turning over of leaves: we need not to have many great volumes and registers: God has comprehended the rule of good life in ten words, and that is enough for us. Who is he now that can allege, I have forgotten such an article, I have not born it away? How so? Are we not able to remember so much as half a score words? Now then we see it was Gods will to hold men convicted of shamelessness, if they understand not what they ought to do. And so you see the cause why he spake so briefly. Moreover he has (as you would say) thawed the things to us, that we might learn to submit ourselves quietly to him, and that even the veriest idiots might know, that they need not to be great clerks to understand his Law, forasmuch as he has stooped so low, that there is not so ignorant a poor soul, but he understands what is contained in the Law. That is the effect of the matter which we have to remember here.

Furthermore seeing God has forbidden murder as an ugly and outrageous thing: let us assure ourselves that he which rises up against his neighbor to murder him, is not worthy to live upon the earth: for he is worse than a wood beast. We see how Bears, Lions, and other wild beasts do play together. And why is that? Because that although they have no reason nor discretion, although they have no Law nor equity: yet notwithstanding the common knowledge [or instinct] of nature holds them in order. You see then that the very beasts have skill to live well together with the beasts of their own kind, without hurting one another. And should not men be restrained by some consideration, seeing that God has imprinted it in their hearts that murder is a wicked thing? They see they be all of one nature, and every man beholds the image of God in his neighbor. And should not this serve them for a bridle, to withhold them from all violence? What a dealing were it else? So then, let us bear well in minds, that although God had never spoken to us, yet have we sufficient proof in ourselves already, that if any man set himself against his neighbor, he defies nature, and is unworthy to be reckoned in that array of men. But now seeing that the authority of God is matched with the knowledge which we ought to have had before hand, and that he shows us that there shall no blood of man be shed, but the same shall come to account before him: let the hearing thereof teach us to live without doing any man wrong, or else let us assure ourselves he will become our mortal enemy: for he let us that men are in his protection.

Indeed the threat is not expressed here: but yet is it all one, for as much as it is spoken of in other places. Seeing it is said that man is created after the image of God: it is not lawful to make any assault upon him. For it were all one as if our Lord should say, you bid me battle when you go about to hurt one another after that fashion: for I have printed mine image in you. If a man should but deface the arms of a Prince, it were so great an injury as should be punished as a murder. And why? Because it tends to the confusion of the state. Behold, Gods image is printed in men, and it is despised: and should not such an outrage be punished double? Yes. Now then let us mark, that God in telling us that we assault him when we do any man wrong, intends to show us that that ought to restrain us, or else we be too witless and mad. Yea and to the intent we should the better bethink us thereof: our Lord tells us that a murder cannot be committed, but the land is defiled with it, as is declared in another text, where it is said that the shedding of mans blood brings such a staining and defiling with it, as can scarcely bee wiped out. When there is any speaking of manslaughter, yea though it be done lawfully, as in war, which is allowed: yet is it said to be a defiling. And why? To the intent that we should learn to abhor the shedding of blood the more. If an enemy be slain in open war, although GOD pardon it because the slayer has just and lawful cause, and does it of necessity: yet notwithstanding it is said to be a stain, and the door thereof is said to bee defiled. And why is that? To the intent we should know that God has created us to live quietly together, and that we cannot give a phillup (as they say), but that it is straight ways a spot upon us, and we be by and by defiled before God. Seeing then that the holy scripture uses all these forms of speech, ought we not to be held the better in awe, to live without doing of any wrong to our neighbors? Yes.

Howbeit forasmuch as God does so chawe things to us here, according to our rawness and infirmity: let us mark further, that it is not enough for us to abstain from bloodshed: but that we must also abstain from all outrage and violence. To be short, men's persons must be dear and precious unto us. For till we be come to that point: God will take us still for murderers. If a man do but strike his neighbor, although he kill him not: yet is he a murderer already in Gods sight. And why? I have told you already how GOD used that word of set purpose to show us that although we take a quarrelling or the giving of a blow overthwartly, to be small and light faults yet they be not so before God. And why? Because there is always a murderous intent in it. And that is the cause why God calls it murder. And besides that, if we be forbidden to commit murder, let us understand that we be likewise forbidden to do any wrong, or to make any assault upon our neighbors. If we do but lift up our fist against one, or touch him in anger: by and by there is murder committed before God. If we thought well on this: would we not be milder than we be? We see some men so resty, that if a word do but mislike them, by and by their fist is up, to smite and beat the party. For they think is a final matter, so they shed no blood. But we must not make God to eat his word, in that he tells us that all quarrelers are murderers. So then let us learn to forbear our own fancies when we intend to judge of our faults, and let us quietly embrace the sentence that god has given, assuring ourselves that all such as offer any violence to their neighbors, are already guilty of murder before God. That is the thing in effect which we have to remember here.

But have we abstained from all annoyance? Have we done no outrage to the persons of our neighbors? Then must we go even to the heart. For God has not given a civil Law, only to make us live honestly: but he has given a Law agreeable to his own nature. We know he is a spirit, and he will have us to serve him in spirit and truth. Seeing it is so, we must understand that he has given us a rule, not only for our hands and feet, but also for our affections & thoughts. True it is, that inasmuch as men are fleshly, when gods law is first uttered unto them, they think they have well discharged themselves, if they cannot be blamed before the world: and so on the other side they do easily grant & take leave to do evil. And for the same cause, even the Jews themselves, who ought to have been grounded in law of God from their childhood, took this saying too grossly, You shall not kill. For they understood it, that they offended not god, so they made no open assault upon their neighbor to wound him. And therefore if the fault were not apparent to the eye: they bare themselves in hand that they ought not to be charged with it before God. Which thing our Lord Jesus Christ rebukes, showing that the law was too fondly expounded. Because it is said You shall not kill: you bear yourselves in hand (said he) that you shall be quiet before God, if men cannot bring you to the bar for it. But whosoever calls his neighbor fool, that is to say, whosoever does but show some token of displeasure against him, is forth with worthy of hell fire. Whosoever do another man wrong: is in danger of judgment from heaven, that God and all his Angels shall set themselves against him. And whosoever do but murmur against his neighbor, so as he do but mumble somewhat betwixt the teeth though he utter nothing at all: he is already in danger of judgment. We see whereto our Lord Jesus sends us: namely that when we may protest that we have not done any outrage, nor given any blow, and that we have so little meant to wound our neighbor, that we have nor so much as once drawn our sword at him yet is not all this enough, but we must consider that God will over rule both our tongues, our thoughts and all our affections, as good reason is he should. Since it is so: whosoever misuses his neighbor [in speech,] shows himself already to be a murderer: for the tongue cuts as a sword. Although then that you have not your sword in your fist to strike: yet if your tongue be armed to speak will of your, neighbor, so as you have railed upon him: it is a kind of murder, as in respect of God. And although you have not so misused him as all the world may be priuy to it: yet think not that you shall therefore go clear. For if you do but mumble betwixt the teeth: it is enough to make you guilty in the sight of GOD, and you shall be condemned before the heavenly throne, though you be quiet before men, and though worldly justice take no hold of you. When we hear this: we may well perceive, that he which speaks it is the same person whom God the father has given to be the judge of the world. Therefore we must not give ourselves too large scope in this behalf. For we shall win nothing by our caviling and shifting. But let us learn to look at God, if we will have the right and natural exposition of the Law. Who is he that speaks? Even he that reigns over our hearts and thoughts: even he that cannot abide to be served with eye service, nor that we should abstain from evil only to the worldward, but which will be served in spirit and truth. He will have our consciences to be pure & clean, so as we be cleansed from all naughtiness. Seeing it is so: if we consider the nature of GOD, we must no more restrain his Law to the outward deeds: but we must conclude that when God speaks of murder, he speaks likewise of all enmity, displeasure, anger, and rancor that we have against our neighbors. And indeed that is the very cause why S. John says, that he which hates his neighbor in his heart is a murderer. As if he should say, you may well set a fair countenance upon the matter: but be the hatred never so secretly hidden in your heart, and although you dissemble never so much, so as you enter no sign of any malice: yet think not that Gods eyes are shut for all that. Men may well be ignorant of the thing that you have not bewrayed but have you once hated your neighbors in your hearts, that is to say so secretly as no man may perceive it: by and by you be murderers before God. And truly the reason hereof is too apparent. Indeed when Princess and Magistrates make laws, it is not after the manner of God. It is but only to the end that men should behave themselves well as touching outward civil order, so as no man be misused, but every man have his right, & peace and concord be maintained among men. That is the intent of Magistrates in making of their laws. And why? For they be mortal men, and cannot reform the inward & hidden affections. That belongs to God. Again they cannot search men's hearts, for that is Gods peculiar office, and so does the holy scripture attribute it unto him. Nevertheless, when a civil law is once made: although there be not one drop of blood shed: yet is the offender worthy to be carried to the gallows, if he be known to have done what he could to have murdered one. If one draw his sword upon a man, who notwithstanding do so ward his blows as they never touch any bare of him: the Laws even of the heathen do nevertheless condemn such a one to the gibbet as he is worthy. For why? The Law respects not the success, but the purpose and intent. Now seeing it is so that earthly Princess and Magistrates do punish such as have endeavored themselves to do amiss, though they have been disappointed of their purpose, and not brought their attempt to pass: what shall God do? Shall he have less authority than a mortal creature? To that point (say I) must we come, to know that GOD does justly condemn all such for murderers, as hate their neighbors. Why so? As I said before, let us consider what his nature is. Will we then keep his commandment? We must in effect begin at murdering: And why? For God meant to strike a fear into us beforehand, to the intent that whensoever we went about to hurt our neighbors, or to do any extortion or wrong: we might understand that it is a detestable and horrible thing unto them, and such a one as he cannot abide. Why so? Because it is a kind of murdering. You see then how God meant to daunt us at the first blow: and that is the end that we must begin at.

Moreover if we think it strange that God should condemn a blow to be murder, yea or a wrong offered but in words, yea and even a frown though the tongue have bewrayed nothing at all, yea and even the secret and unespied heartburning that is deeply over covered within: I say if we think it strange that these things should be condemned for murder before God: let us consider what his nature is, and how he is worthy that we should allow more to him than to mortal men. For if earthly judges have power to punish a wicked intent when it bewrays it: what shall GOD have, from whom nothing is hidden? Again we must consider how the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews says, that the word of God resembles him that is the author thereof, so as it must needs be as a two edged sword, piercing in such wise to the very marie of the bones, that there is not a thought within us, which it espies not out. And why is that? Because nothing is hid in the presence of GOD. Now seeing that nothing is hidden before God: his word must needs search and flute men's hearts to the hard bottom. So then, the things that are unknown to men, must needs come all to account before God: whereby we must take warning to live in such sort, as we bear no enmity nor ill will to our neighbors.

But yet notwithstanding we must go yet further. For it is not enough for men to abstain from evil doing: but forasmuch as they be created to help one another, they must seek one another's maintenance. God then in forbidding us to murder, shows us on the contrary party that we must set store by our neighbors lives, & endeavor to maintain & preserve them to the uttermost of our power. But it was his will to begin at that end, to show us what he commanded. And why? For we see how sinful we be. Look how many thoughts we have, and so many briers and thorns we have. Look how many affections we have: and so many bushes, brambles, and such other things we have. Not without cause therefore intended God to weed out the naughtiness and vice out of our hearts, yea and to amend all the pastes in us that are sinful and corrupted. For without that, it were impossible to set so much as one finger to the doing of any good, that we should but so much as think one good thought. That is the cause why the Prophet said that men break up their lays & sow not among bushes. As if he should say, I see how the world goes with you: if a man tell you that you have offended God, you will make some fair countenance, & pretend as though you were reformed, & yet in the meanwhile continue still the same you were before. But it is not enough to sow corn in a field: but you must also stub up the bushes & cleanse the ground. So long as you do but endeavor to make some fair show: thorns, briers, thistles, and other evil weeds grow still within. Therefore there can be no good sowing, & much less can you bring forth good fruit before God. And for the same cause do our Lord say here, You shall not kill, instead of saying, Look that you preserve your neighbors life. Now we see by experience how men would fain discharge themselves to Godward with fair countenances, and yet retain still their vices and corruption, according to that which I have alleged out of the Prophet. For if a man speak to us of doing good to our neighbors: indeed we dare not altogether gainsay him. So then we would discharge ourselves after a sort. But in the mean season our sores do rankle within, & we do but plaster them above, like unto those that are loth to open their purses when their houses decay: but what do they? They parget them over, & stop the holes and rifts, but yet in the meanwhile their house is in decay. Even so is it with us: we do but parget or plaster ourselves over, of purpose to discharge ourselves as lightly as might be. But yet does nature teach us the clean contrary. For if a man be minded to sow a field, will he cast his corn among the briers and thorns? No: but when he sees his field fair and clean, then breaks he it up & tills it: and so must we do, Let us learn then that it is not without cause that God does first of all condemn the vices. For he sees they be rooted so deeply in our nature: that it is hard to weed them out, yea and that he can never hold us at such a stay, as to cause us to live in his righteousness, unless he pluck up the cursed roots of this naughtiness which he knows to be in us. That is the cause why he lays, you shall not kill. As if he should say, will you live in good love one with another? Every man must enter into himself, and examine well whether he have there any hatred, enmity, or ill will towards his neighbors. You must look whether you have not some heart risings & eagerness in you, which provokes you to threaten your neighbors or to attempt somewhat against them. You must consider all these things. For when you be clear from all anger, hatred, and enmity: then must you come to this point, that it is not enough for you to abstain from annoyance, wrongfulness, & violence, so as you have not practiced anything against the persons of your neighbors, nor nourished any rancor or malice against them in your hearts, nor been infected with evil will: but you must also a live in charity, and you must be as brethren one to another, worshipping God as your father. Look to what point we must come.

So then let us mark, that if we intend to profit well in Gods Law, we must have an eye to the vices and imperfections that are in us, and be sorry for them: and moreover strain ourselves to weed them out. Have we done so? that is not all that we have to do. For God will not have us idle in this world. His creating of us, is not only to abstain from evil (for stones and trees and other senseless things do as much as that comes to:) but wee must give and apply ourselves to the doing of good. Then let us understand, that whereas our Lord will have the life of our neighbors to be dear and precious to us: he shows therewithal that he which helps not his neighbor at his need, does what he can to murder him: insomuch that we become murderers, not only when we bear any ill will, or keep any hatred priuily towards our neighbors: but also even when we succor them not in their necessity. If we vouchsafe not to bestow our navel for them when they have need of our help, we shall be blamed before God. Since it is so, it is not for us to flatter ourselves any more in this case: for we see how straight the Law is: and yet not straighter than it ought to be. For can we refuse to be knit together in charity at Gods commandment, seeing he has created us after his own image? Or to yield him such reverence being our father, as to maintain brotherhood among ourselves, seeing he has vouchsafed to unite us in such bond? Shall we say that God is too straight to us, and lays too heavy a burden upon us, because he leads us to such indifference & uprightness? No: but howsoever come of it, let us beware we flatter not ourselves, seeing we understand that our Lord will have us to do our endeavor in helping one another, and that we should set as much store by the life of our neighbor, as he himself does.

Now have we the effect of this commandment, Of not killing. What remains then, but that we pray God so to guide us, as we may frame ourselves to his will? For it is to no purpose to allege that his speech is dark: Or to allege that there be so many commandments, as we cannot bear them in remembrance: (for God speaks in a word or twain, and uses briefness to take away all excuse.) Or to allege that we wote not whereat to begin: for he shows us it: namely that instead of taking leave to do evil as we have been wont to do, bearing ourselves in hand that the thing which we do is no great nor no deadly crime: we must contrariwise think always thus, if I do my neighbor the least harm that is possible to be named, I am a murderer before God. When we bee willing to do evil, se how the devil blinds us, to be desirous at the first dash to kill one and to cut his throat. This (as I said) is an ugly thing. For even nature restrains us, that we cannot be so mad as to say, I will kill. But if a man displease us, and we be no more but angry with him: all is well, it passes away as a smoke, and to our own seeming, it is nothing. Again, have we once conceived any grudge, we think it is to be pardoned if we require like for like, so we do it not with over great violence. Moreover if a man do but bend his fist to strike or to beat: tush, it is still but a blow, it is no deadly offence. Look how men dispense with themselves. And why? Because all their imagining is how to lessen their faults. But we must keep a contrary way to this, as GOD tells us: namely that when we go about to strike and to beat, or when we go about to do wrong, or when we go about to conceive any hatred or heart burning: we must set murder before our faces, and think thus without selves: Wretched creature, whither goes you? whither throwest yourself? Will you make your self-guilty of murder before God? So then let us no more allege that we wote not whereat to begin: for God shows it us, and we cannot be ignorant of anything but through our own willfulness: & therefore in the end it must needs be known, if we listed not to lift up our eyes, to see the things which we ought to have seen most manifestly. Those are the things which we have to gather upon this place.

Again, there is this further, that God has not without cause forbidden murder before he come to command charity, & to show us how we be bound to succor one another, according as need requires. And why? For we be full of evil affections which had need to be rooted out. Therefore like as a piece of ground that is full of thorns & briers, had need to be cleansed before it be sowed: so have we need to be cleansed from the vices that are naturally in us, or else we shall never be disposed to live in good love one towards another. But yet must every man have an eye to his own ability. If I have wherewith to help my neighbors: I must be fully resolved myself, that the things which God has given me are not mine own, that is to say, that I must: not love myself so much, as to have no regard of others: but if I be of ability to succor other folks that have want of my relief, I must bestow it upon them. For there is a common fellowship among all men. It was not Gods will to make so many several worlds, every one by itself as there be several men & women: but he has knit us all together. Seeing then that, God has brought us one near another: we must keep & maintain that fellowship that God has set among us, & we must always come to this point, that it is against kind to hate our own flesh. But yet there is a far other respect than this among that faithful. For they must not only consider themselves to be created after the image of God: but also remember that they be members of our Lord Jesus Christ, so as there is a much straighter & holier bond, than the bond of nature which is common to all mankind. And therefore so much the more ought we to mislike of those, which do so forget the union that God has set among his people, seeking nothing else but to put the things asunder which God has joined together, by dissevering the body of his Church, as we see these underlings of Satan do, who practice nothing but all manner of mischief, as though they were willfully bent to defy God because he binds them to men, & therefore do separate themselves from such as are not for their profit (as it seems to them,) nor yet for their fancy. Now when so brutish a disposition & so far out of square is entered into a mans mind, is it not a token that the devil dwells in him, and that spirit of God reigns not there, no nor any drop of him is there? Yes: and therefore let us learn to frame ourselves in such wise to that which is spoken here, that being rid of all rancor and malice, we determine to employ ourselves in the service of our neighbors, & to discharge our duty according to the ability that God gives us. Again, if wicked affections, (not withstanding that they be hidden) be taken for murder before GOD: what shall violence & outrage be, when men overshoot themselves so far, as to strike & flea one another as much as they can? Must it not needs be that they be worse than all the Paynims in the world? Yes: but whatsoever come of it, let us assure ourselves that we have ill profited in Gods school, if we only keep our hands from doing evil, and in the meanwhile leave our hearts unreformed. Now then, to show which is the true perfection of Christians, they must not only refrain from bearing any priuy evil will in their hearts: but they must also be as true brothers, to spend themselves in their neighbors behalf to the uttermost of their power. And if it be not lawful to nourish any secret ill will: much less is it lawful for a man to overshoot himself so far, as to smite, to kill, and to do outrage: and they that do so, are worse than wild beasts. Yea and if that that disposition was condemned even among the heathen, & by the laws of men: much more shall it be condemned by the Law of God. And therefore let us learn to submit ourselves to him, not after our own imagination, but according to his own nature. But forasmuch as he is a spirit, he will have us to serve him with such soundness, that besides the restraining of our feet and hands, our hearts also must be submitted unto him, and that with such subjection and obedience, as our whole endeavor be to show by our deeds, that we be his true children, in as much as we maintain brotherliness with all those whom he has called to the same alliance with us.

Now let us kneel down in that pretence of our good God, with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, and that we considering how he has bound us to our neighbors, and will have us to show the reverence that that we bear towards him by abstaining from all evil and wrongful dealing: may live in such brotherly love one with another, as the chief mark that we shoot at, may be to honor him as our father, and to suffer ourselves to be governed by him and by his holy spirit according to his word, so as we may be strengthened more and more in it, knowing that his reaching of his hand to us, is to the end to guide us and to hold us under his protection. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth, &c.

The thirty eighth Sermon, which is the ninth upon the fifth Chapter

aint Paul speaking of the life of Christians, and having exhorted them to the fear of God, adds that they must walk uprightly and soberly. Now it is not to be doubted, but that the same is to be referred to the second table of the law. Will we then observe the things that our Lord has commanded us in the second table? It is not enough for us to hurt no man either in his person or in his goods: but besides this rightfulness, it is required that we should live staidly and honestly, as is declared in another place. And in the former text of the Epistle to Titus which I have touched, he said that we were redeemed by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, to the intent we should live in the fear of God in this world, and also in soberness and uprightness. In another place to Timothy he says, that if there be good government, so as the Magistrates do their duty, we shall live uprightly and honestly in godliness. And as touching the fear of God, it is the same spiritual service that we have spoken of before, which casts of our pure worshipping of him, by endeavoring to trust in him, by calling upon him, and by yielding him his deserved reverence: and in respect of our neighbors, [it consists] of knowing how we ought to behave ourselves one towards another. These are the two pointer that he sets down here. The first, which is uprightness, is that we offer no man any violence, extortion or deceit as in respect of his goods: and the other, which he sets down by the name of honesty, sobriety, or staidness, is that there be no looseness, wantonness, lewdness, or unruliness in our life. We have seen that in expounding the commandment where GOD forbade to kill, I told you how he meant that we should abstain from all outrage and injury: and not only that: but also that we should endeavor to live quietly with our neighbors, and not suffer any man to be troubled. And is it so? When we come to treating of goods, it shall be declared that we must not play the thieves, nor bear false witness against our neighbors: which things pertain to justice or uprightness. Now if we will yield every man his right: we shall do no hurt nor wrong to anybody: and as touching goods also, we shall not attempt to rob any of their substance.

But here God interlaces a law that forbids to commit adultery: & that is comprehended under the term of sobriety or staidness. For although we steal away no mans goods, nor be murderers and barraters: yet if we be unchaste, wanton, or of beastly conversation: we must not think that God is contented with us. Uprightness & Soberness are things inseparable: for God has joined them together in his law, and we see that he confirms it by his Apostle, who largely expounds the thing that is here touched in few words. And therefore if we will have the true meaning of this text: we must understand that God commands us here to lead an honest and chaste life, so as there be no dishonesty nor looseness in us. That is the effect of this commandment. True it is that here we be expressly forbidden to commit Adultery, that is to say, to break the faith of marriage by enticing other men's wives to naughtiness. But let us also weigh that thing that I have touched here: namely how that under one particular, God comprehends the whole, and sets us down the thing that ought to dislike us even of nature, to the end we should abhor all manner of whoredom the more. I told you yesterday, that when men are tempted to do evil, they beguile themselves, weaning that the fault is but small, and so from the lesser they proceeds to the greater. Contrariwise, to hold us in awe, God sets before us the sins that are heinousest, to that end we should be stricken with fear beforehand, and not be led so easily to commit any fault. As if he should say, beware you fall not: for it will make you to break your neck: bear not yourself in hand that you shall but slide, for the fall will be deadly: and therefore take heeds of it. Thus you see in effect why God proceeded in such order in his law: & why he speaks not now generally of all whoredom, but of Adultery, which is the breaking of Marriage. Now we know that if anything ought to be taken for holy in the whole life of man it is the faith which the husband plights to his wife, and the wife to her husband. Indeed all the covenants and promises we make, ought to be kept faithfully.

But if we compare them together: it is not without cause that marriage is called the covenant of God. For in so saying, Salomon shows that God is the Lord of marriage, and therefore that if the husband break the promise which he has made to his wife, he is forsworn, not only towards her, but also towards God. In like case is it on the woman's behalf. She does wrong, not only to her husband, but also to the living God. For it is he to whom she binds herself: & like as he has ordained wedlock and is the author thereof, so will he have a care for the maintaining thereof. Therefore when we hear the word dumetrie: we ought to lothe it, as an express defying of God, by willful breaking of the holy bond which he has set in marriage, like mad beasts. And hereby we see in what estimation he has honesty. Why so? When he will have us sober, chaste, and modest: he says, If you be not honest and well stayed, you be no better than Advowterers. That is to say, whatsoever excuse you pretend before men, and make you your faults never so small and light: I hate you, for you stink, & your whole life is infected in my sight. We see the as I said before, that here is a straight commandment to keep ourselves honest & chaste. And hereby it appears how fond their excuse is, which say they do no man wrong, when they be full of disorder and unruliness. For our Lord knows well enough to what end he used such speech. It was not for that he was tongue-tied & wist not how to utter things in order: but because he intended to show, that if men made but a small matter of wantonness and unchastity: there is another balance [for them to be tried by] namely that he condemns & accurses all those for advouterers which behave themselves dishonestly or unchastely. Therefore we have so much the more need to way well the words that are set down here, where he says You shall not be an Advoulveerer. But yet here withal we must follow the degrees that are contained under this commandment.

First (as I said before) let us understand that God will have wedlock to be kept holy. For as our persons & lives are dear unto him: so will he have the faith and troth that is plighted between man & wife, to be maintained in their price and estimation, that so holy a thing as marriage, be not given up to shame & reproach. This ought to bring to pass, that no man should look upon his neighbors wife with unchaste eye. And why? For God has matched her to a husband already, & he will have her husband to shadow her. And when we think any evil, or feels any dishonest lust: he will have us to shun it for fear of that which is told us, namely that God himself takes vengeance of them that break the holy fellowship which was knit in his name. In like case is it with women in respect of their husbands: so as a wife may not yield to wicked lusts when she beholds a married man. Why so? For God has assigned her, her make. If we will not make war against our maker, we must live every one in his own house, with such match as he has: & order must be maintained without breach, because god is that author of it. That is one principal point.

But besides this, we must always come back to the nature of God: & remember that he is not an earthly lawmaker, which forbids but only the outward deed, and in the meanwhile lets the lewd affections alone: for God will admit no eye service, neither is he like to us. Men are contented if they perceive no fault: but God who searches mens hearts, respects the truth as it is said in Jeremy. Therefore he in his law meant not to restrain our bodies only: but also had a special regard to our souls. So then let us mark, that God not only forbids the act, so as wedlock be not broken by any actual deed: but also he forbids all wicked lusts and likings. And therefore does our Lord Jesus Christ say, that he which looks upon another mans wife with a wicked eye, is an Aduowter already before God. Though he cannot be blamed by the laws of men, nor punished as an aduowterer: yet is he condemned already before God, as having transgressed this commandment. Therefore when we hear this word Aduowtry, which is so greatly condemned: let us learn, not only to abstaine from all whoredom as touching the actual deed, but also to keep our thoughts and conceits chaste, so as we be undefiled both of eye and heart. For after that manner does S. Paul define true chastity, when he said that such as are unmarried ought to have a care how to please GOD, by keeping themselves pure and clean both in body and mind. He said not that those continue chaste which have not defiled their bodies with whoredom: but which have endeavored to keep themselves undefiled both in body and mind.

And when we have thus considered how God curses and abhors all aduowtrys: we must proceed further, and reach out and apply the same to all manner of whoredom. True it is that he which breaks the faith of wedlock commits a double offence, and it is much more heinous as I have said already. But yet must we always come back to this point, that Gods meaning is that men shall not only not commit anything against marriage, but also that they shall not lead a beastly life, so as whoredom may have full scope, and unmarried folk run loose to give over themselves to lewdness with every one whom they meet with, like brute beasts: but that we should be pure and clean both in body and mind. For it is said, that not only our souls, but also our bodies are the temples of the holy Ghost, as was declared even now. And they be Saint Paul's own words, where he tells the Corinthians that it was too too much to their reproach and shame, to suffer fornication and whoredom among them as they did. Know you not (says he) that your bodies are the temples of the holy Ghost? Behold, God has done us the honor to choose there wretched bodies of ours which not only are frail vessels hut also rotten carcasses and earth. GOD (I say) notwithstanding this, has so in honored them, as to vouchsafe to make them the temples of his holy spirit, that he may dwell there: & shall we go welter them in all filthiness, and make hoggerscots or swines styes of them? What a treachery is that? Again, that is not all. Let us have an eye whereunto S. Paul leads us. Our bodies are members of Jesus Christ: therefore if a man gives over his body to whoredom, it is all one as if he tore Christ's body asunder. For it is certain that we cannot mingle God's son the fountain of all cleanness, with our filth and loathsomeness. Now then if a man cast himself into whoredom: it is as much as a rending of the body of our Lord Jesus Christ in pieces, as much as in us lies. Not what we can do it indeed:

for the son of God is not subject to us to be so dishonored at our hands: but yet are we guilty of such traitorousness, forasmuch as we would have committed such injury against him. Now then let us learn that God will have every of us not only to keep our faith and troth in marriage for his own part: but also generally to be chaste, to walk in pureness of life, and not to give ourselves the bridle to any uncleanness or dishonesty. And why? The reasons that I have alleged, ought much to move us thereunto. And therefore look what has been said already concerning avows: let us apply it likewise to this present case: Namely that we hold all our senses in awe with such staidness, as the devil may always be driven back when he tempts us to any unchasteness, and not get any entrance into us. There was a certain heathen man that could well skill to say, that it was not enough for a man to have stay of his hands, (that is to say, that he could refrain from ravine, outrage, and doing of wrong:) but also that he ought to have stay of his eyes, that is to say, that he ought not to cast any unchaste look. If the blind and ignorant wretches were able to teach us thus much: what shall become of us when it is told us (as I said before,) that God has done us to much honor, as to repair for himself, not only our souls but also our bodies, notwithstanding that they be corruptible, and that (as we see) there is nothing but rottenness in them? Seeing then that God takes them for his own, and vouchsafes to dwell in them: ought we not to learn to live warily, that no uncleanness or filthiness be committed that may drive God away from us, when as he would have us to be his dwelling place and holy temple? Yes and we must call to mind how S. Paul says, that all other sins are committed outwardly of man's body: but whoredom is committed in the body itself. For it is right certain that we defile our hands by robbery and stealth (as is avowed in the holy scripture:) insomuch that when we do any man wrong, we have bloody hands, as says the prophet Esau. But Saint Paul very well perceiving whoredom to be yet more shameful, and that men have so much the more need to beware of it: tells them that there remains some scar thereof still printed in the body of the whoremonger, so that his body is put to reproach by it. Surely we would be very chare of the preserving of our honesty, and it would greatly grieve us that it should be stained or blemished by any man: and why that do we make so light account of it, as to stain and imbrue it within fame, before God, before his Angels, and before men? So then let us bear this in mind, and we shall be bridled. Although we find such frailty in ourselves, and the devil do continually tempt us: yet must this serve us as a bridle to pull us back to the foresaid clearness, not only we of body, but also of mind.

Furthermore we must mark likewise how it is said, that no man must deceive himself through vain words: for by reason of such things God's wrath comes upon the unbelievers. It is not now of late that men begin to flatter themselves, and to bear themselves in hand that it is not so great and deadly a sin, to commit whoredom. Nor we see how these scoffers do scorn God, terming whoredom a natural sin, and a matter of small importance. There are some such filthy swine which speak after that fashion. Now for that cause S. Paul says, let no man deceive you. Such scoffs flew abroad in the mouths of the despisers of God even at that time, and many were blinded with them, after the manner of the world, which is to be given to self soothing. Let no man beguile you with such lies, says S. Paul. Why so? For whoredom is a detestable thing before God, as he shows by the punishments which he has sent for it, as S. Paul notes in that tenth chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians. There he alleges this example, that a great number of men were slain for whoredom: whereby it appears that God cannot abide it. For the life of man is precious in God's sight, as was showed yesterday: they be creatures fashioned after his own image. Seeing then that a two or three and twenty thousand men were so dispatched, and God destroyed such a number of his own images, that is to say of that creatures that he had made: is it not to be said that there was a terrible fire of his vengeance kindled? Yes: and wherefore? Even for whoredom. Then let us conclude that it is not for us to deceive ourselves, as though it were a light fault and easy to be pardoned, seeing that our Lord, who is not over rigorous, did punish it so for: but rather let us assure ourselves, that we must come to account for it before the heavenly Judge. When men have pardoned us never so much, and we be opinion that such manner of uncleanness and filthiness is but a sport: then must God set to his hand. Therefore let us have an eye to him and to the example that he gives us, that we may continue under his fear, and endeavor the earnestly to keep ourselves from all spots. And so you see in effect how this seventh commandment of the law is to be understood: namely that we must not defile ourselves with any unchastely or un-staidness.

Now if it behooove us to keep both our bodies and our souls undefiled: ought we not also to eschew the occasions that may entice us to whoredom? Yes surely. Let us mark then, that whomsoever do give themselves to any looseness, do seek nothing else than to cast themselves into Satan's snares. And although they be not reprov'd for it to the world ward: yet they are whore masters already before God. Were this well considered: we should see no more of the wantons in the apparel, gesture and words, that is commonly in the world, which takes too much liberty in that behalf. And when men and women attire themselves of purpose to entice one another and as it were to lay baits of lewdness: are not such doings very tricks of bawdry? Indeed their excuse shall be, as for me, I have committed no whoredom: but yet they set themselves forth as a pray to Satan, and are willing to draw others with them, as much as they can. Then are they kinds of whoredom before God: and all the looseness and superfluity that is used in apparel and attire, is nothing else but a laying of snares for men. Likewise again there are gestures and words. When a man and a woman haunt one another's company, to open a gap to Satan by acquainting themselves together, so as they may be caught in his net, and give themselves over to him in bondage: it is whoredom before God. And although there be no deed done, no nor anything fully agreed upon yet will not God leave such doings punished for it is to manifest that they are attempted. And hereby it appeared how fond and childish a shift it is to excuse oneself by saying that it is not evil to do this or that for there be on intent to do evil. As for example such as delight in the dancing and dissoluteness is that so evil a thing {say they}, so long as there be no wholesome committed? Yet truly. It is all one as if they would mock God of set purpose, and blindfold his eyes to buffet him and in the meanwhile bid him guess whether it be evil or no. It is well known that dancing can be no better but a prelude to whoredom, to open an entry purposely to Satan: and a crying out aloud to him, that he should be bold to come in. That is always the very effect and substance of dancing. If you say, I meant no evil: you makes God a liar. Behold, S. Paul avows that lewd words corrupt good manners. Yes and he alleges that saying of an heathen man, of purpose to make us the more ashamed. If we admit not the doctrine give by S. Paul: let us go to school to the wretched infidels and idolaters: for you could good skill to allege, that dishonest speech corrupts good manners. Now when men's tongues are infected with naughty and unchaste talk, and there is nothing in their behavior and words, but sings and marks of utter dishonesty: if they say hereupon, that they had none evil meaning: is it not a manifest belying of the holy Ghost? Yes: and therefore let us mark, that whereas all whoredom is forbidden: it is mean that we should behave ourselves modestly both in our words and in our gestures, and that there should be no inkling of looseness in us that may tend to whoredom or whorishness. It is true that all things are clean to them that have a clean conscience: but yet for all that, we must beware that Satan overtake us not, least he make some breach upon us. Thus you see that this precept ought to be considered in such wise, as we must have an eye, not only to the very deed of whoredom but also to all that matches with it, to all appurtenances of it, to all that comes near it, and to all that may entice or endure us to it. To be short, we must come back to that which I touched even now out of S. Paul: namely that as we must not do any man wrong either in his person or in his goods: so must we also live honestly, and put away all looseness and disorderliness from us.

And like as all lewd talk, and dancing, and other unchaste dealings are condemned before God for kinds of whoredom: so let us mark that all other loose misbehaviors shall be condemned likewise. You shall see a sort of drunkards that cram themselves like brute beasts. And when they be so full that they be ready to burst: that fling they themselves into all manner of filthiness till they even stink again, not perceiving their own shame. Therefore when men behave themselves so beastly, that they play the drunkards and gluttons, and moreover abandon their bodies to all villain: think we that they shall scope God's hand, and not be cursed as whoremongers, though they commit not whoredom in actual deed? Yes, You see then that the soberness which Paul speaks of, does tell us that if we will be chaste and stayed before God: we must not only abstain from whoredom itself: but also use our eating and drinking soberly for our nourishment, and not to provoke us to lechery, so as we should have no more stay nor hold off ourselves. That is a thing which we have to mark further.

But now it will be alleged: and how then can we abstain from al uncleanness, considering the frailty that is in our flesh? For we see how little slay men have of themselves: whereby it appears (doe what they can) how sin full our nature is. True it is that men be not able to be chaste: for our Lord will have us to feel the cursedness of Adams sin in that behalf, that is to say in the unruliness of flesh, if he himself preserve us not by special gift, accordingly as it is said that it is not given to all, men, but every man mull consider what GOD has given to himself and he must use us: the gift, that he has, assuring himself that he is so much the more bound unto God. But yet how so ever he fare: manage is provided for a remedy to all such as have no stay of themselves. Although then that God list to leave this mark of infirm km in us: yet does he appoint a convenient remedy for it. Is a man frail his flesh, or a woman likewise? Indeed it is a vice: and although it bee as it were a natural inclination, (yes proceeding of the corrupt nature that we take from Adam:) yet is it to be condemned of itself. For all such unstaidness is far off from the excellent dignity which God did put in mankind, of purpose that we should have born his mark, & has been as Angels. Therefore all unruliness of the flesh is sin. Notwithstanding, forasmuch as our Lord bears with us, he has ordained a mean; whereby that said vice shall not be imputed to us for sin. Now then whereas the unruliness of the flesh is of itself sinful and damnable: it shall not be imputed to us before God, if it be covered with manage. And when a man sees that he cannot forbear, and thereupon prays to God, and having committed himself to him, takes a wife to the intent he may not lead a lewd life, by running at random like a dog, or a bull, or a brute beast: his entering into wedlock after such manner as God has ordained, cloth cover and hide his vice, so as it comes not to account. And herein we see the inestimable goodness of our God, that whereas he leaves this vice in us, yet in such wise as ought to make us ashamed: yet notwithstanding he ordained a good mean whereby to bury it. And although men be unchaste. yet are they not blamed for it before God and before his judgment seat, so they hold themselves within the bounds of manage. For all un-chastise is lawful. As for example, if a man take too much liberty with his wife, or the wife with her husband: it is no reason that they should make their bed a brothel house. But if a man hue honestly with his wife in the fear of God: although the companying in bed be shameful, yet hath it no reproach or shame before God and his Angels. And why? Because the covert of manage serves to sanctify the thing that is unclean and unholy of itself, and to make clean the thing that is fouls and filthy of itself. Seeing then that our Lord is so gracious, as to ordain such a remedy: are not wee the more lewd and unthankful if we use it not, and put not away all the excuses that men allege, as who should say that God had not provided for their need and, nor played the good physician with us in healing our diseases, yea and men prevented us as we see? Now then, seeing that our Lord vouchsafed to succor us in this behalf; and ordained holy manage to keep men from abandoning themselves to all naughtiness, which hue not, gift of chastise us put away all shifts of frailty. That is the thing which we have to mark.

And hereupon let us mark well how the Apostle says, that when men and women hold themselves within the sear of God and soberly, the bed of manage is honorable: And whereas it should justly be shameful: our Lord converts all to honor. It is no small matter, that the Apostle calls the thing honorable before God, which would be shameful even before men, if God pardoned it not: and yet pronounced curie & vengeance against all adulterers. Since we hear such a sentence: let us learn to shrewd ourselves under this honorable shadow, (if we have need of it,) to the end that our shameful dealings be not accursed and contented before God and his Angels: and wherewithal let us stand in awe of the dreadful sentence that is given against all avowers and whore hunters. Yes and if any be able to forbears manage, let them take good heeds that they forbears it not but for the present time, so as they reject not the remedy that God has appointed them, if they find not that God gives, them a stay of themselves. And so let their living out of marriage be but from tomorrow, being always ready to submit themselves to God, when so ever he shall call them to that state.

But here we see how Satan has displaced all order, yes and that under pretence of holy flare. The world sees what abominations have come of it. Insomuch that in peppery it seems to be the almost Angel like venue that can be, to have unmarried. The Rate of perfection (say the Monks) is to be unmarried. The priests say that they be vowed to God. Seeing wee bee the Clergy (say they) and as it were the flower of the Church: it behooves us to be separated from the common defilements of the world. So then, in peppery it is counted an approaching to the Angels of heaven, when men forsake manage. But in the meanwhile, we see how God is mocked with) such devilish pride: for worse than beastly abominations have happened through the despising of marriage after that sort. See how the Priests, Monks, and Nuns defy God, by resisting the benefit which he offers the: which is, that if they find infirmity in themselves, they should marry. But this doe they despise and disdain, esteeming it as an unclean thing: and that is a fighting even against nature. And therefore, was it not meet that God should be revenged of such presumption, when men trod the remedy under their feet, which he had given them? Is not that sick man out of his wine, which instead of taking a medicine for his health, does fling it against the ground in despite of his physician? As much is done by these hellhounds of the pope dome, even all this vermin of Priests, Monks, and Nuns which have refilled holy manage: wherein they have made open war against God. And they be a not contented with that: but we see they have overshot themselves so far, as to be bolds to litter blasphemies that ought to make all men hakes stand up upon their heads. If there were no more but that: the world may see that the devil has altogether overmastered them, and that the Apostle or backsliding Church of Rome is the very seat of Antichrist, inasmuch as it has given sentence, that such as are in the flesh cannot please God, but we must be separated from all uncleanness: And therefore marriage ought to be forbidden to priests. Those are the very words of a Pope: and yet notwithstanding, they have been registered as an Oracle coming from heaven. Now if the devil had his full scope, yes and were incarnate in this world: could he speak more detestably in despite of God and holy wedlock, than to apply this laying, they that are in the flesh, cannot please God, to married folk. It is as much as if he condemned all mankind: For in so doing he condemned not only those that are alive at this day: but also all the holy fathers that lived under the Law, and all the holy Patriarchs, Apostles, and martyrs. You see then that the devil of Rome intends to banish both the Apostles, and martyrs and all the holy fathers out of heaven. And therefore whosoever lifts to be in the Pope's paradise must be a fellow with the devils in hell. For although it bee a monstrous thing, that the ungracious Pope Syricius should utter such blasphemy, as to go about to shut the most part of the holiest folk that ever have been, out of the kingdom of heaven yet would God never have suffered so horrible blasphemy to be spoken, but that it was his will to make the Sea of Rome abominable, by letting those devils have their own swinge so far, as to my marriage under pretence of holiness, by means whereof (even through just vengeance) they took liberty to commit all wicked filthiness, and so infected the world with their detestable Sodomy, that even the very Paynims themselves did abhor it. And hereby wee be warned (as I said before) not to despise God's gifts: but to use them with all modesty. And as for such as have not stay of themselves: let them learn to bow down their necks, to receive the yoke of marriage, and to submit themselves thereunto, Minting themselves that if the husbands bear with their wives and the wives endeavor to live quietly with their husbands: it-is an acceptable sacrifice to God. And if they have charge of children: let them look to the bringing up of them, and to the finding of them, whether they be poor or riche: alluring themselves that God accepts that service. Also when the women take pains and are troubled about their household business: let them understand that their doings are acceptable sacrifices to God. And although marriage be despised by those fends, who in despite of GOD, do surmise an Angelical perfection in abstaining from it: yet notwithstanding let such as be in that state understand, that God accepts and receives them, yes and that he governs their household. For setting he avows himself to be the author of marriage: he will bless it, if folk proceed to it according to his will. Let such as are unmarried be well advised to walk nevertheless in the fear of God, and to have manage in estimation, and to honor it accordingly. And let both sorts be careful to maintain themselves in all cleanness both of body and mind, as S. Paul declares in the seventh of the first Epistle to the Corinthians. In that place he condemns not widows and such others as abstain from marriage: but exhorts them to do their duties. For widows and maids and such as are unmarried, ought to stick the faster to God, and to live as folk that are Idle hindered to glue themselves wholly to him. Why so? For they have not so many worldly things to draws them away. Married folks have; no encumbrances: but yet must they beware that they give not themselves the bridle, so as they should not walk continually in fear and carefulness. Thus you see how that in all states we must have sobriety and honesty in such estimation, as we may not only show tokens of chastity and honesty in our persons: but also make offerings & sacrifices both of our bodies and of our souls to God, seeing he has bought them so dearly by the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and will have them dedicated to himself, to dwell in them as in his temples.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good GOD with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to make us feel them better than we have done, yes even in such sort, that being rightly sorry for them, we may learn to repair to him, with acknowledgement of the faults whereof we bee guilty, seeking to give ourselves to his obedience, and to please him in all things, even until we have finished our course and pilgrimage upon earth, and become to the salutation that is prepared for us, as it is already in the kingdom of heaven. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but alto to all people and nations of the earth, et cetera.

The 31st Sermon, which is the tenth upon the fifth Chapter

If we understood God's will in one word, as he declares it familiarly enough to us: we should not need any long study, to know how to behave ourselves well, and to lead a holy and righteous life. But there is not so lewd and ignorant a person, as he that will not understand: nor so deaf a man as he that will not hear, as they say in the proverb. And that is the cause why we play the blind buzzards, though our Lord showed us his light to our faces. And wee fee it as well in this commandment of the law, as in the rest that have been touched. For if every man would enter into his own conscience to make true search: should he not find is easy to judge, that howsoever things be cloaked, we be guilty of theft before God if we deceive our neighbor, or do him any wrong in his goods? Yes. But what for that? So we may hide our shame to the world ward: it is enough for us. And in the meanwhile God's Justice is thrust under foot, and we think not on it.

Yet notwithstanding, all theft fig leaves shall stand us nstead, we must be fine at length to come to account before the heavenly Judge. And that shall we feel how it was not for naughty he said by his prophet Zachary that his curse shall light upon the forsworn person, and upon the thief: that is to say, where so ever we offend, what point of that law so ever it be: he will find means well enough how to punish us for it. Men then may well either justify or flatter themselves: but yet for all that, God will in the end utter his wrath, both against forswearers and against thieves.

Albeit, to the intent we may know God's will the better, let us mark that he uses the word Theft, to make us hate all deceit and robbery, and all manner of wrong that we can devise to do to our neighbor, as has been showed heretofore in the expounding of murder and avows. If a man call one thief, he will take displeasure at it, (for it is a word of injury) insomuch that he will not abide to be so dishonest before the world. Now God to bring us to the hating of all fraud, coin, deceit, guile, harm, hurt, and extortion which we may do to another man in his goods: sets them all down by the one name of theft. He could well enough have spoken after another manner: he could have said, keep ourselves from catching or plucking of other men's goods to you: keep yourselves from working any harm or loss to your neighbors: keep yourselves from doing any manner of violence: but he says in one word, Steal not. And why? To the intent we should the more abhor all deceit, all pilling and polling, all scratching and catching, and all manner of annoyance: and to the intent we should be ashamed, once to make mention of doing any man wrong, yes and even abhor it from our hearts, seeing we shall be guilty of theft of it before God. Moreover let us mark that there are divers kinds of theft. For some use privy packing and deceit in drawing other men's goods to themselves by subtle means and practices. Some use open force, and that is properly termed either robbery, or extortion, or spoiling. And other some deal yet more covertly, so as they seem not to touch a man, neither can they be accused to the world ward: nevertheless forasmuch as they deal not plainly and uprightly, they be thieves before God. After the manner must we come to the particular kinds of theft, if we intend to know what is forbidden us in this text.

But by the way we have to note, that God judges not of theft after the manner of men. For they that are in authority and estimation, shall not fail for all that to be condemned before GOD, yes even though no man accuse them but only the crying out of the poor for vengeance, whom they have devoured. And all though they say never a word, yet the affliction which they suffer shall cry out loud and shrill enough before God, and make an enticement substantial enough without uttering any word. So then we must not bring our own imaginations hither to judge of thefts, nor think ourselves escaped from God's hand, when we be not punished by men nor by worldly justice: for GOD looked far deeper. And therefore let us bear in mind at a word, that all manner of harm and all manner of coveting to rake to ourselves that which is none of our own, is called theft in respect of God throughout the whole Holy Scripture. And indeed when as GOD threatens by his prophet Esau, that he which has spoiled and robbed, shall have his turn [to be spoiled and robbed likewise:] he speaks not of the petty thieves that are carried to the gallows: but of the great princes and monarchs that bare sway in the world. Also in the first chapter when he speaks to the holy people that were the Church of GOD: Your princess and governors (says he) are companions of Thieves. Yet notwithstanding it is certain that they were not arranged: Nor, they themselves arranged other men: and yet nevertheless they failed not to be condemned before GOD. So then the thieves that are honorable here beneath, fade not to be accursed by the Law, and God has given sentence of them in this text. Therefore we must be far to cast down our eyes knowing that it shall not boot us though our thievery be excusable before the world, nor though it be concealed or faced out. For yet for all that, God's Law have his course, and the execution of it is ready at hand. God has not forbidden anything, which he calls not to account. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this text.

But now must the things which I have touched briefly, be laid forth by parcel meal and specified by examples that they may be expressed the better. As I said before, if we were diligent in harkening to the things that God declares: there should need no long exposition in this behalf. But what? All our seeking is to entangle ourselves, and to take occasion of doubting though the matter be known to us. And therefore does it stand us in hand to be pressed the more. I have told you already that there are more kinds of stealth or theft than one. For some play the thieves by stealing away other men's goods: as if a man say, such a one has stolen money, he has stolen money, he has stolen bedding, pots, platters or such other like things. Well the world can judge well enough of these kinds of theft.

But when a merchant takes more for his ware than it is worth, or if he sell unlawful wares, and the simple man that knows nothing of it is beguiled, and knows not how to wind himself out of the snare: men deem not this to be theft. Yet notwithstanding such a merchant is a thief though no man condemns him, because he has dealt so unconscionably. Surely he that has been bitten will be a good and rightful judge in that case: if he spy the collusion, he will by and by say, he loath me wrong. We need not to go to any doctor, [Sergeant, Counselor,] or great clerk to show us that we have wrong done us: every of us knows it well enough: but yet for all this, we discern not the same kind of theft in ourselves, neither do we sufficiently consider it.

Yet notwithstanding, God will fail to judge him for a thief, which shall have so abused a simple man, by delivering him unlawful wares, seeing he has beguiled him for want of judgment and skill. Likewise he that oversells his wares to an unskillful person therein, is a thief as well as the other. Again, if a handicrafts man make slight or false stuff, and the fault be not perceived, but he makes what he can of it, not regarding to sell it according to the value of it, but how to enrich himself, alleging these excuses for himself: he with whom I have to deal is a rich man, it is all one to me, he has a good purse. A man does indeed use these speeches: but yet true it is, that albeit his shifts may well serve him to the world ward, yet shall God's Justice still have his course and take hold of him. When every man has been asked his opinion, and all agree that it is no theft at all: yet will not God unsay his word for our pleasure. You see then that the thefts which men let slip, shall nevertheless come to account before God, notwithstanding that the takers of such liberty, would never so fine have the lewdness pardoned them. For behold, God's Law is unchangeable, as I have told you already: and it shall be showed hereafter that it carries execution with it.

Again since it is so that we must not go to work with craft and subtitle: we must come back to natural uprightness, which is to do nothing to another which we would not have done to ourselves. Seeing we have such a rule, we need no huge volumes to teach us that we should not steal: for every man may know in one word, how to behave himself towards his neighbors: that is to know, that he deal not lewdly, that he go not about to enrich himself by other men's losses, and that he rake not other men's goods to him as his own. Thus needs there not anymore words than this: and then the fairest coverings and countenances that we have, would vanish away. For when we have once beguiled men: we bear ourselves in hand that we have likewise bleared the eyes of God. Let us take an example whereby this point maybe plainer perceived. He that has gotten away another man's goods by suit at the law, thinks himself to have as just title as can be to possess them. Why so? Because he has them by order of law. I will forbear to say, that perchance the law was corrupted. Of a truth there are that make law a flat the every by their bribing and other wicked practices, so as they overthrow all right and equity, and the court of Justice becomes oftentimes as a market to sell other men's right in, and to pervert all equity. And although it be not so: yet if a man find the means to get another man's goods by craft and subtitle: allege he never so much that Law has so judged it, and therefore that there is not a better nor a right fuller title in the world: yet is it double theft, and he had been much better to have robbed and spoiled his neighbors house, than to have gotten his goods so unjustly by order of law. Why so? For in so doing there is theft, yes and the theft is committed under color of Justice, which is a most holy thing: and that is a treachery that God cannot abide. If a house be robbed, it shall be grievously punished: and is it not far worse than robbery, when the seat of Justice which God has dedicated to his own majesty, is so disordered that all things are turned upside down and confounded? So then let us mark well, that what pretence forever we can make before men: God's law shall still keep on his course: insomuch that if we use any craftiness or kinking, or any extortion or violence: we shall be condemned for thieves. If a man misuse his poor neighbor under color that he is in authority, and by that means oppress him: he is a thief, and half a murderer, and it is not single theft or robbery, but (as you would say) qualified with murder: and yet for all that, is scopes and is pardoned. It is true that men will now and then mutter at it: but that is but with half mouth: and in the meanwhile he that has misbehaved himself, soothes himself, and (which worse is) the greater thief that he is, the more is he honored. For the more a man has gotten to himself, and the richer that he is become: the more do men stoop to him, and the higher is he advanced. You see then that oftentimes men come to great honor in the world by thievery. And therefore let us not take any of those scarves to cover our eyes: but rather let us consider what the holy scripture says: namely that we be thieves, if we do not to others as we ourselves would be done to, nor yield to every man his right. For we must define a vice by the contrary virtue. If we will know well what theft is: let us consider what it is to do right to our neighbors. Now we do not right to our neighbors, when we spoil that of their goods, and by any means rake the things to us which are theirs. To be short, if we use any coin, violence, or extortion, it is proof good enough of our thievery.

Hereby we see that theft is committed, not only by taking away of money and other things with our hands: but also by withholding a mass own from him, and by neglecting to preserve the things that God has put into our hands, according as his will is that every man should keep that which he has. As for example, If a servant waste or devour his master's goods, he is a thief. If a laboring man look to have his wages, and in the meanwhile love to loiter and to have his hand in the platter: surely he is a thief, and we can well skill to deem him so. But it were expedient for us to come to the other kinds also, and to make this comparison, that if we render not every man the right that belongs to him, such indifferent dealing shall always be taken for theft before God, and we shall be condemned for it.

But now remains to see how we may live in such sort, as God may not curse us as if we were thieves. The first point thereof is to learn to love our neighbors, as Saint Paul shows in the thirteenth to the Romans. And it is a wonder than men should make so light of the taking away of other men's goods, seeing that if a man asks us whether it be so hard a matter to love our neighbors: we will answer, no. For nature has vouchsafed to link men together in unity, and God has created them all after his own image: and therefore it ought to be no hard nor cumbersome matter to us, to love one another. Now it is so, that if a man have love he will never be a thief, as says Saint Paul: yes and if we did willingly consider, what we owe to other men of right, and how we be bound to them: we should not need all these warnings, You shall not play the thief, You shall not play the advocator, You shall not play the murdered. All this were needless, as Saint Paul shows in the same place. But what? There are very few that think upon that. Not contrariwise, (as I have told you already,) when we have stolen other men's goods, we fall by and by so seeking of vain excuses: and when we have done any deceit, shrewd turn, or extortion, straight wise we shift it off with an excuse ready at hand: But yet in so doing it appears that we have no love in us, and that we be as wild beasts, so as we be not worthy to be taken for men, because we break the bond of unity which GOD had set among all the children of Adam. Thus much for that one point, namely that it behooves us to mind this lesson of charity, if we will not be counted thieves.

Again there is another point, which is that we must not covet to be rich. For as soon as the desire of gaining is settled in us: it is certain that we shall become thieves, and it cannot be otherwise. This will seem strange at the first blush: but when every of us shall have gathered home his wits to himself, [we shall find] (as the heathen themselves could well skill to say) that even nature teaches us, it is impossible for us to covet to be rich, but we shall be inflamed to rake to ourselves by hook or by crook. Will we then shun theft? We must lay aside covetousness, that is to say the desirousness of enriching ourselves. To the intent this word be not caviled at: how shall we do it? Let us learn to be contented with our state. For as for him that has no certain stay, but is always tossed and turmoil with coveting: his affections harry him to and fro, so as he can never have any rest, to say, Here must I hold myself within my bounds, I say that the state which GOD has given to every man, must be as a bound to hedge him in, as though it were said to him: Behold, you God will have you to stay upon that which he gives you, content yourself therewith: if you do not, you not only troubles the whole order of the world, but also defies your GOD, as though you means to bid him battle.

You see then that the thing which we have to mark, is that inasmuch as we have the rule of charity to lead us, we must learn to be contented with our state. And why? Because we know it is God's will, and that he will have a trial of our obedience. And that cannot be done without keeping of Saint Paul's rule: which is, that we have learned to be rich and to be poor, to be hungry and thirsty, and likewise to have abundance. Saint Paul's saying is, not only that we must be patient in poverty, whereof he protests himself to have felt his part, and therefore has give us an example thereof, and showed us the way: but also that we must learn to be rich and to have abundance. And how is that? They seem to be but words to no purpose: for every man knows we have need to be exhorted to patience when we be in poverty. Why so? For we shall be tempted: and it is a hard and grievous thing, when a man has not bread to eat. And although he had but brown bread, yet would he fine have east and quietness with it.

So then as touching poverty, every man will grant that we have need to be comforted, and to be told that we must not grudge against GOD, nor be enticed to do evil. But when he says that we must know how to be rich: men will laugh that speech to scorn, as if it were not grounded upon any reason, and yet is that lesson needful than the former. And why? Let us consider a little what rich men are: They be gulfs that can never be filled, yes and much more uneasy to be contented than poor men. If a man compare the rich and the poor together: like as he shall find poor men which martyr themselves, and repine, and are induced to filching and to do many lewd turns: so shall he find the most part of them contented with that which God gives them, and so keeping on their course. But if a man go to the rich sort, specially to kings and princes: he shall find them so inflamed, and so far in love with the riches of this world: as they cannot be satisfied. Nor, it even grieves them at the heart, that the sun shines upon the poor. To be short, it is seen that if God should give the whole earth in possession to the rich: yet the most part of them would never think it enough. For (as I said) it grieves them that the light of the sun should be common to the poor, or that they should have water to drink. Yes and although the poor take pains, and do the best they can: yet does the rich man malice him. Although he shed sweat and blood for him: yet the rich man thinks that he plucks the guts and bowels out of his belly, when he eats of his cost. This niggard ship, or rather beastly cruelty of their rich sort, is apparent: and it is too common a thing. Not without cause therefore does Saint Paul say that we have greatly profited, when we have learned to be rich: that is to know, when we be not desirous to gather still more and more, so as if GOD have given us any abundance, we follow our trade still without coveting in this wise: O, such a piece of ground were good for me: I must needs perchance that, and the next to it.

Again, not to be desirous to be still increasing, is not all that a rich man has to do. We must also be poor in our hearts: that is to say, we must not be proud to trust in our riches, nor take occasion by them to oppress the weaker sort, and such as have no estimation nor friends in the world to maintain them. And finally we must be ready to become poor when so ever it shall please God. Let him that is now very rich, which has his garners, storehouses, and Cellars full, which has his purse well stuffed, which has Lands and possessions, and which has a good trade of merchandise: let him (say I) not think it strange if GOD lift to bereave him of all, neither let it grieve him and vex him overmuch, but let him be patient as Job was and say, seeing it is God's will to take again the things that he had give me, his name be blessed for it. It is a very hard thing (say I) to have skill how to be rich: yes verily, if we submit not ourselves to God's will, to accept quietly whatsoever he gives us, that is to say to bear poverty patiently when he sends it, and to hold ourselves contented with the goods that he has put into our hands, without setting of our hearts upon them. Otherwise we must always needs be thieves. For the poor shall be tempted to do evil, and they bear themselves in hand that God dispenses with them for it: insomuch that now and then they use this shift, Oh, I see how such a man goes about to eat the flesh from my back, and he would destroy me if he could: and why then should it not be lawful for me to be revenged of him? See how every man would be his own carver: but it is not for us to do so. Verily when a man is become rich even by pilling and polling, by subtly and deceit: yet is it not for us to spoil him of that which he has, because he must make account of it to God. Now then if we be poor, we shall by and by be provoked to theft, if we have not this bridle to say, What though? It is our Lord's will to exercise us, and therefore are we needy of worldly goods: we have not as we would wish, and that is because God minds to humble us by that means. Mark that for one point. And therewithal, let us labor to overcome this temptation. For we see how that even Salomon desires that he may not be poor, for fear least he should be provoked to steal. Seeing that such a person was afraid, yes and made suit to GOD in the name of the faithful: ought not we to stand upon our guard? Yes: and therefore let all such as have lack and scarcity of bread and drink, and know not which way to turn them, but lead a very slender life, so as some time they can scarcely get half their fill of bread: and let others also which have not their commodities as they would desire: let them (say I) put themselves into God's hand, and pray him to grant them the grace to live in such sort, as they may not be carried to do any man wrong or harm, under presence that need drives them to it. And as for them that have the world at will, and money in their purse: let them take good heed that they oppress not the poor, as they commonly do, by laying their snares for them. Lo how the rich men deal. If they see a poor man going to decay: they play the Hunters, they fall by and by upon him, and they never leave tossing and turning of him about, till the poor soul be at length entrapped. Therefore let such as wealthy beware that they be not over greedy, but rather let them hold themselves back, so as they abuse not their abundance. Let not such as have abundance step up to oppress such as have it not. After that manner must we proceed in this case. Yes and instead of being subtle to seek things a far off, let us when occasion serves to do it, let us advisedly repulse all such naughtiness. And instead of imagining all to be well won when we can enrich ourselves by other men's losses: let us assure ourselves that such rich folk do cut the poor folks throats, and that they make many widows and fatherless children, though they think it not. Albeit for as much as our flesh is sharp witted and subtle in seeking such occasion: let us think upon our God, who intends to try us. We may well have a sword in our hand: but let us beware we do no harm with it, and let us consider that if we were in like case as poor folks are, we would gladly be succored. To be short, if we will abstain from theft, let us be neither wolves nor foxes. For as many as deal by deceit and craftiness, they be like foxes: and what need so ever the poor have, if they follow the provocation to do evil, they show themselves to be no more men, by their unjust raking of other men's goods to them. And as for them that rob with violence: they be like wild beasts, which seek nothing else but to devour all. So then, to the intent we be not thieves, let us not be cruel.

Therewithal, whatsoever worldly thing we want, let us wait for it to have it by the blessing of God. If we held this rule: surely all covetousness, all fleecing, all fraud, and all other like things would soon be amended. We should need none other medicine to heal all our diseases than this, namely that we could lift up our eyes to heaven to say, God is our Father, he will proud all that we want, it is he to whom we must trust for all things that belong to the maintenance of this present life, and at a word, his blessing is the well spring of all riches. If we were well persuaded of this: we should not need any more, either precepts of the Law to forbid us theft, or any other warnings and advertisements. This only one word would suffice us. But what? We ask GOD our daily bread, protesting that it is his peculiar office to seed us: and yet in the meanwhile we fall to filching, deceiving, and malice: and is not that an utter scorning of God? I say with my mouth, give me not daily bread: and in the man season I go and seek it at the devil's hand. For if we use unlawful means, so as we beguile one and fleece another: at whose hand fetch we our welfare? Is it at God's hand? Are we not companions with thieves and robbers? So then, it is certain that our whole seeking is to be enriched by the Devil, when we give ourselves so to craft and extortion. And moreover the same is a sure token of our unbelief, and that we look not for anything by God's blessing, nor think him rich enough to find us. Lo at what point we be. Nevertheless these things ought to profit us. When we hear that our Lord curses theft and robbery, and that he abhors it: let us likewise hate and abhor it, assuring ourselves that he judges not after the fancy of man, but will have us to live in such uprightness, as every man may have his right, and no man be hindered or impeached in his goods and substance, and therefore we must still have the more stay of ourselves. Again, for as much we be so inclined to evil: let us seek means to hold us in awe of our God, and to restrain us from stealing as I have showed you before. And since we know that he has knit us together: let us keep that Law and rule of equity. Furthermore let us not covet to be rich: but to be short, let us put this lesson in use, of bearing poverty patiently, and let us not be eager of getting, and of promoting ourselves out of measure. And finally let us abhor all cruelty and deceit: and specially let us learn not to be beastly, as to think that our catching and snatching by hook and by crook, is able to enrich us. Let us not beguile ourselves in that point. Why so? For the true richness (as I said before,) is the blessing of GOD. Then must we drink of that fountain, and be filled with it, if we will abstain from all theft.

But now here withal let us come also to God's threatening. When he has showed us sufficiently that his commandment is exceeding rightful, and has also given us means to live uprightly without hurting or wronging of any man: perceiving us to be hard hearted still, and that our wicked lusts do turn us the contrary way: he adds threats to make us afraid. And is it a small matter when he says, that thieves and robbers shall not enter into the kingdom of God? Now then, shall we set so much store by this present lie, that to gather a little good for the maintaining of it in this world, we shall willfully provoke God to displeasure? He tells us that we shall be banished out of his kingdom. If we had any spark of faith at all, would not this threatening pierce us to the heart? Yes: but our Lord proceeds yet further. For in as much as he sees us to be so fleshly, and so greatly given to the earth: he tells us that even in this world he will make us to go backward: in so much that he which thinks to further himself by his kinking, pulling, and deceiving, shall be consumed, and a secret curse shall waste him away. According whereto it is said in the for-alleged text of Zachary, that God's curse shall light upon the house of the thief, and there abide until he be consumed. Also we see how he speaks of it by the rest of the Prophets: Insomuch that our Lord tells us, that when men wean they have enriched themselves and done much: he will blow upon them, yes and he will blow after such a sort, as all shall vanish away, and that so suddenly, as a man would never have looked for. But God passes yet further. Indeed it is enough and too much already, when we see how our Lord mocks at those which martyr themselves so much in heaping up of riches, when all goes to decay and slips away like water: but a man shall see moreover, that the same goods are a cause of the overthrow of such as have been in some reputation. Look me upon a father that has pilled and polled and provoked God's wrath against himself all the time of his life: When he dies, he bears himself in hand that his children shall become little princes. Now had left them but a little, that they might have fallen in trade of occupying, and had he taught them to have travelled honestly, then they might have had competent wherewith to find themselves. But behold, the father spins a halter for every of his children, by making them to trust after that fashion in their evil gotten goods, so as they must needs either go to the gallows, or come to some other unhappy end. And what is the cause of it? The wrath of God which is present with them to consume all the goods that were gotten by stealth and polling. The house of them must needs be accursed: and God must needs show himself a just judge, both against the thieves, and against all such as daily with his divine Majesty. If a man tell them of it, they make but a jest of it, as thief scoffers do, who will say, well, well sir, the time is worth the money they think, all is one. And if a poor man be neither of ability nor of credit to make his part good against them: Oh, how they welter themselves in the meanwhile in their wickedness! But know you what? When God sees men so sot, and that he cannot bring them back to the heavenly life, in so much that they make no reckoning of being banished from the kingdom of heaven: well then go to (says he:) I summon you beforehand, for I will begin to put my sentence in execution. I will show how my curse lies upon evil gotten goods, and that they which have possessed them for a time, must be dispossessed of them, and that themselves and their goods with all their whole offspring must be consumed together. Now when we see all these things: must we not needs be moved at them, if the devil have not utterly bewitched us? Yes. What remains then? We must hold fast the good conscience which God requires of those that are his, so as every of us travel quietly for our living, and go not about to grieve other men, but seek by all means to pass our life without offending of God, that if we have no great revenue nor much to spend: sobriety may serve us for a double portion. After that manner must we deal.

But now if theft [to man ward] be so condemned of God: what shall be done if we rob him of his honor? For we must compare theft towards man, and theft towards God together. Behold, it is God that has forbidden us to be thieves. And why? Because he will have us to keep equity and uprightness one towards another. Yes and look what goods so ever he appoints to our use, he will have them so used, as we possess them not by wicked shifts. He that has much, must spend them as one that has but only the laying out of them, and not the ownership of them: and he that has but little, must be contented with it, as I have said already. Now if God will have us to keep such an even hand towards our neighbors, for the preserving of their goods which they have in their hands: if he make such account of the goods that he has created, as he will not have them defiled by guilefulness, by violence, or by such other like dealings: what will he do in the thing which he sets much more store by? So then, when we have lived soundly and uprightly in all respects among our neighbors, so as we have endeavored to give every man his due: let us also yield our God his right: that is to say, let us glorify him, and beware that he remain un-impeached in his Majesty, so as we take not more upon us than is lawful for as we see men commonly do, who are so bold, that when they have been so mad as to oppress their neighbors, by and by they set up their horns against God. When they have spoiled other men of their goods, they would make God their underling too, and they will not obey him further than they list themselves. Therefore we must beware of all these things. And to conclude, let us also beware, not only that we abstain from all injury and annoyance: but also that as near as we can we suffer not any man to be vexed or undamaged. For these are the two things that God commands: namely Justice and judgment: Justice consists in yielding every man his right: and Judgment consents not to any evils, nor suffers the poor to be misused, which have no mean to maintain themselves. For if I see a man oppressed before my face, and endeavor not to help him: I am consenting to the thief, so as the saying of the fiftieth Psalm may be verified of me, you saw a thief and ran with him. Now is it not a running with thieves, when we labor not to restrain them, but either wink at them, or give that the bridle [to do what they list?] Yes: and [in so doing] we be consenting to the robbery that is committed, and we must answer for it, as thieves before God, although no reckoning be made of it among men. Therefore let no man think that he is bound but only to keep his own goods: but let us also beware that we endeavor to maintain and procure the welfare of our neighbors as we would our own, and as the rule of charity wills us to do. Thus you see how we shall not be found to be thieves both before God and man, and how the goods that he has put into our hands maybe blessed, so as he shall make them to prosper, and we have such contentment, as we shall ever mount up to the heavenly heritage, being sure that there we shall have the perfect fullness of all good things.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgment of our sins, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, and that we may profit more and more in the keeping of his holy Law. And because we be so corrupt and forward, that all our thoughts and affections go the contrary way: it may please him to reform us by his holy spirit, and to draw us in such wise to him, as we renouncing the world and despising these mortal and transitory things, may mount up to the heavenly kingdom, where we shall have all contentation and rest. And so let us say, Almighty God, heavenly father, et cetera...

20 You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor.

We have seen heretofore, that it is not lawful for us in any wise to vex our neighbors in their persons, or to do them any damage in their goods. Notwithstanding for as much as harm may be done by the tongue: God has vouchsafed to make mention of that also in his Law, as we see in this text. Now then like as heretofore to forbid the doing of any outrage to our neighbors, (which thing he comprehended under that word Murder:) and likewise all grieving of them and all annoying of them by any means in their goods: so he shows here that we must not speak evil of them, nor use any such words as may cast any blemish or stain upon them. It is true that he speaks expressly of False witness: albeit that is according to the rule that I have set down, namely that he sets forth the things foremost which we ought most to dislike, to the intent we should dislike the sins that come near them. Then if we speak evil of our neighbors, so as we slander them: although it be not taken for a grievous sin before men: yet does God take it for a false witnessing. But here a man might demand a question, why GOD speaks here of false witnessing and privy: seeing he had already said, You shall not take the name of the Lord you God in vain. For it seems to be a needless repetition. For in so short a sum of the law, where there be not above ten sentences, it seems inconvenient to repeat one thing twice.

But we must mark that the things which have been set down heretofore, concerning the not taking of God's name in vain: were in the first table, where GOD respected only the Majesty of his name, to the intent it should be had in reverence. Therefore when so ever we speak of God, we must think upon the infinite glory that is in him, that we may never open our mouth but with reverence and humility. And whether we intend to swear, or to speak of him in any other wise: we must ever think that his name is to be revered, and that we must not fling it forth at adventure. Thus much concerning the things that we have seen already upon this matter. Now God speaks of another thing: namely of the not hurting or harming of our neighbors in any wise by our wicked tongue. So then, in as much as there is a double intent: we see now that these two sentences differ, and also that there is no superfluity at all. Heretofore let us mark well, that for as much as it is showed here how men ought to live together charitably and uprightly: although God's name be dishonored by lewd witnessing: yet the law is not superstitious which says, That we must not bear false witness against our neighbors.

I told you before, that God's meaning here, is to condemn generally all slanders, all false reports, all defamations, and all other such like things. And for proof thereof it is expressly said in another place, You shall not bring up any evil report, nor speak evil on your neighbor, to cast any blot upon him. If the Law of God contain all perfection of good life: it ensues that this also is comprehended therein. And where shall we put it, but under this sentence? Therefore we must conclude, that although GOD have peculiarly set down here the name of False witness: yet notwithstanding he meant to extend the doctrine thereof to all slanders, misreports, and crooked speeches that tend to the defaming or defacing of our neighbors, or to the hurting of their good name. We see then that God's meaning here, is to keep us in good friendship one towards another, and that so far, as he suffers not any man to be impeached any more in his name, than in his person or his goods. Therefore whomsoever defames his neighbor, or in any wise backbites him: does (to the uttermost of his power) break the bond of charity among men, and proclaim open war. And if we consider all things well: it is certain that sometimes misreports, slanders, and backbiting, do much more harm than robberies. Wherefore let us understand that if we mind to obey our God, we must maintain the honesty and honor of our neighbors, to the uttermost of our power. For seeing he has forbidden us to hurt any man's good name: it is his will on the contrary part, that we should endeavor to preserve all men's honesties. For it is not enough to abstain from doing of evil: unless a man do good therewithal.

Now must we proceed by the degrees which God meant to set out to us in this place, speaking of False witness. The first then is to beware that we utter not any false report, Lye, or privy in place of Justice, whereby to hurt them whose honesty, honor and welfare we be bound to procure. For he that bears false witness against his neighbor, does kill him and rob him as much as him lies, and does all the evil that may grow of his privy. Indeed most commonly men think it not to be so: but yet is it so in truth. And for the same cause did God expressly command in his Law that the witness should be the first in executing the party that was to be punished for any misdeed: to the intent a man might know, that their words and their tongues put him to death: and that the witnesses themselves might stand the more in awe, and consider that they should yield account to God, of their witness bearing against any man. Therefore when any evidence is to be given, it stands every man in hand to look nearly to himself, that he enlarge not his conscience, but speak the thing simply and plainly which he knows to be true before God.

But the case concerns not only the giving of false evidence in matters of life and death: but also in all matters that touch men's honor, honesty, good name, or goods. Therefore let us have a care to preserve the honor and welfare of our neighbor in all respects, when we be to bear witness. Yet notwithstanding we must not under this color, cloak the offence of him that has done amiss, or lye against God to maintain his good state. For is the honor of men be precious to us: how much more precious ought God's honor to be? God's forbidding of me to bear false witness against my neighbor, is because he will have friendliness maintained among men, and that no man should be impaired in his name or goods. Now if God have such regard of us which are but wretched Earthworms: think we that he forgets himself in the meanwhile? No. But if I by my false record, do go about to support or bolster an offender, so as I cover or conceal his crime: it is certain that I dishonor God as much as in me is. Why so? For I protest to say the truth, and yet notwithstanding I make a lie. And is not that a defacing of God's honor? Is it not an imposing of his glory? Yes: And therefore let us understand, that when God said, You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor: he meant not to gratify or pleasure evil doers, or to cover men's faults: but to show in few words, that we ought {as much as in us lies} to maintain our neighbors honesty, so it may be done with truth.

And let us mark further, that here God had an eye to the wicked affections that proceed of malice and rancor, rather than to the deed itself, as we shall perceive better in the things that remain as yet to be discussed. For I have told you already that in this place, God speaks not only of the giving of false evidence in place of justice and in cases where solemn oath is to be taken but also of all slanders and defamations, because that after what sort so ever a man backbite his neighbor, he shall sure be counted a false witness before God.

If I whisper any man in the ear to defame my neighbor with all: surely it is a false witnessing. It was true that I was not called before a judge: I laid not my hand upon the Book: I performed not the rest of the ceremonies in taking of an oath: but yet we see how God speaks of it: and therefore am I guilty in that behalf. But now must this be considered: if I spy a fault in a man without bearing him any will, whether am I to be counted a false witness before God or men for so doing? No. For god has a special respect to the evil will and enmity. Then if I hate a man and thereupon misreport him, carried thereto by the ill disposed mind that I bear towards him: in so doing I am to be condemned for a false witness. If I have desire to backbite, and that vice does so reign in me, as I must needs be snatching at every man: surely I am a false witness. And that is the cause why it is said that love covers the multitude of sins, but hatred betrays them to shame a man. Lo how Salomon has in few words, in this sentence touched the root of the false witnessing which GOD has forbidden and condemned by his Law: namely, that we be led by hatred. And why? For if we love one another, surely we will endeavor to maintain one another. We know it is as a kindling of a fire, when we backbite any man, so as he must needs be angry with us in defense of his own honesty: by means whereof all friendship is broken. So then, if we had any care to maintain charity: we would hid other men's faults as much as we could. But if there be any enmity, then will our tongues run riot. If the heart be venomous, it must needs have a vent, and we must needs utter the malice that lay lurking within. Let us mark well then, that in this text God condemned all backbiting that proceed of malice, and ill will, when we hate any man, and would with him undone, so as if we cannot annoy his person, nor hurt him in his goods, be bereaving him of his substance: we fall to touching of him with some privy nip, and we will go about to defame him. If we do so: it is a wicked root, which cannot but bring forth like fruits. That is the point that we must resort to, to have the right understanding of this commandment of God.

Albeit let us mark by the way, that whereas it is said that love covers the multitude of sins: it is not meant that we should flatter one another, and foster our voices by lying: but that we should not blow them abroad upon desire to defame the parties, who possibly might take such a stomach thereat, that they might give themselves over to all naughtiness through shamelessness, as desperate persons do. Wherefore let us mark well, that the holy Ghost intends nor to make us flatterers and fosterers of our neighbor's voices, nor yet liars: but that we should labor to reform their voices as much as we can, and yet notwithstanding bear with them, that we make them not desperate when they have done amiss. For when a man sees himself defaced, and that it is done upon revenge: it spites him, and he gives himself to the doing of evil, and so he hardens in it. therefore when men are in an evil plight already, if we reprove them boystowsly without any charitable affection: we cause them to disorder themselves the more. And therefore if we rebuke men's voices: let it be done with mildness, that the parties which are so rebuked may perceive that our meaning is to draw them back from the way of destruction. And for the same cause does Saint James apply this text so such as labor to draw their neighbors to God, by good, gentle, and friendly corrections. Therefore if I see a man deal lewdly, and I tell him his fault, so as by my warning I win him, that he returns into the right way: behold (says he) then is this saying fulfilled, that love covers the multitude of sins. True it is that Salomon speaks it to another end: but yet has not S. James misapplied this lesson of Salmon's by a similitude, for he does us to understand, that our covering of men's sins, must not be by winking at them, nor by holding of our peace when God is offended: (if a man destroy himself, we must not then dissemble to conceal his voices through love: that is an ill practicing of this lesson:) but we must rather use good and brotherly correction, and therewithal find the means that his faults may be buried before God, and also not come in remembrance before men. Therefore it must content us to have brought our neighbors home again: and we must always keep this measure, that when the faults are amended, we must not defame the parties if it be possible, least they have shame of their repentance, and fall into despair of the world ward. But this is ill put in use: and we see how men do amiss in going too far both the ways. For the mean way, (that is to know of correcting men's faults with gentleness, and so seeking to cover them to the end that every man should be reclaimed, and in the meanwhile not be defamed:) will in manner never be kept. Why so? For our desire to have friendship with men, is by flattering them. When we see them offend God diverse ways, we let it slip: and as we would that our friends should spare us, so do we bear with the naughtiness that is in them. You see then that this is a wicked clocking, because Satan blinds the wretched sinners by it: and we be the cause of it, for as much as we wink at the faults which we ought to rebuke. And yet that inconvenience suffices us not. For the world is come to that point nowadays, that we cannot seem to be good friends, nor to be faithful and trusty to those whom we match withal, unless we agree to all naughtiness for their sakes. If they have offended, and it come to the point that they must receive rebuke or shame for it: we must rather fall to flat periphery. And how?

Even thus men speak, Shall I willingly hurt my neighbor? I am beholden to him: and shall I depose against him? What a thing were that? Lo how we esteem God's truth. Lo how we turn it into a lie. Lo how we abuse the commandment that forbids us to defame our neighbors. Wherefore let us learn that this overcockering is wicked when we support the evil, and feed men's voices. And specially when we be called and required to give record, if we betray not the evil truly which is to be corrected: we shall be guilty of it as accessories to our power. I conceal a murder, a robbery, a lewd, prank, a bribery, a false packing: surely in so doing I entangle myself in all those crimes both before God and man. So then the foresaid covering of our neighbors sins through love, does no whit hinder the betraying o them, when it is needful and meet to be done, and when we be required thereto.

But there is yet another foul extremity, worthy of blame: which is that we be too hasty in blazing abroad the misdeeds which ought to be reformed quietly, and without making too great brute of them. And this grows sometimes of enmity, and sometimes of a fond desire to vaunt ourselves. Sometimes it is of enmity. For under color that we be desirous to chastise vice, and that we be loath to have God offended: we fall to lying in wait for those whom we hate, and to whom we bear any privy grudge: and if we find anything to be blamed or caught hold off against them: by and by their tale shall be told, and we abuse God's name falsely in playing the zealous persons after that fashion, when we seek nothing else but to undermine our enemies. And our malice appears the better in this, that having rebuked a voice in one whom we hate, we bear with it and cloak it as much as we can in our friends, and keep not an indifferent hand. And does not that betray that we do it not of any goodwill, and that we make not war against the sins and voices, but against the persons rather? It may be discerned too easily. And therefore when so ever we go about to betray men's voices and sins, let us understand that our hearts must be clear and free from all ill will, so as we may protest before GOD that we be desirous both of the welfare and of the profit of him whom we find fault with. Let that serve for one point.

Again we must keep ourselves from all fond ambition or vainglory, (as I touched before:) which is, that we must not be desirous to want ourselves before men as a number do, who would fine make themselves as holy as saints, by crying out against other men, and by finding fault with them. As soon as they spy a thing amiss: by and by men must be charged with it, and all the world must know it. Oh, this is a good zealous man: and yet in the meanwhile all is but a foolish desirousness to vaunt himself. For this cause God does oftentimes punish such pride, because they bear themselves in hand, that so they rebuke other men sharply, they themselves are saints and half Angels: whereas notwithstanding, they dispense with many misdemeanors in themselves, and though they offend more grossly than those whom they find fault with, yet will they needs have men to bear with them. And why? Because they have well hidden others. Yes and you shall see some that are not ashamed to say, What? Have I not done well in rebuking evil? Seeing I have behaved myself so stoutly, is it not enough for me? Yes, and if you could not bear with other men, how would you have other men to bear with you? If you had but one drop of good disposition in you, would you not hate the vice in yourself, as well as in another man? So then, when we cry out against our neighbors in rebuking them: let us beware that we be clear from all ambition. If we will discover the evil that we perceive in another body: let us deal so orderly, as to begin at ourselves. If we intend to condemn other men's faults: let us search and examine well what is in ourselves, and reprove ourselves first: and then let us step to our neighbors. That is the order which we must keep if we intend to proceed according to Godliness. But let us mark that here God condemns generally all injuries and all backbiting, so as if we do but open our mouth to speak any manner of evil of our neighbors, we be condemned for false witnesses before God. Nevertheless it is not meant hereby, that men should conceal the evil that is known. For as I have showed heretofore, that we must not foster men's sins through flattery and lying, under pretence of charitable hiding of them, so must we not say that black is white, under color that we be forbidden to do men wrong. And that is to be marked well. For there are some which would fine that nothing at all should be condemned, but that men should alter their speech, so as if there be a robbery committed, it should be termed by some other title, and voices should not be condemned by their proper names. This is to be seen: insomuch that if wicked men be to be reprov'd, which have not only offended God, but also caused others to play the naughty packs as well as themselves, and ate as an infection to poison all the rest: if a man fall to rebuking of them justly as he ought to do: by and by there are a sort of these nice lings which take grease at it. Yes (say they)? And ought men to proceed so far as to go up even into the pulpit, when they will cry out against voices? A man shall see blasphemy reigning, and a man shall see open wickedness against God and his word, a man shall see as shameful disobedience as may be, a man shall see so outrageous occasion of offence as he cannot possibly bear with them, except he will be a traitor to God: and yet if he cry out against them, by and by he shall be answered, what now? The Gospel teaches you to win all men by gentleness. Did not Jesus Christ call sinners lovingly to him, by forgiving them their faults?

Now then should the preachers of the Gospel use such rigor? Verily as who should say that Jesus Christ's will were that men should abuse his grace, to establish the kingdom of Satan, that sin might have full scope, and men wink at it and let it pass un-condemned. Nor, contrariwise, he says that by the Gospel he exercises a jurisdiction, to condemn the whole world. Behold, the thing that he aims at, is that when we be told of our naughtiness, we should be so ashamed of it, as we should not know whither to flee for refuge, but only to his grace, and that we should be utterly confounded in ourselves. Therefore let us mark well how we be forbidden to defame our neighbors, upon any hatred or evil will: but yet we be commanded on the contrary part, to blame the evil, and to rebuke them justly that do amiss, to the end we may assay to bring them to good again, and also make other men take heed, that they be not corrupted by evil examples. This will be the better understood, if on the one side we take the meaning of our Lord Jesus Christ, where he says that whomsoever calls his brother fool, shall be in danger of hell fire: and whomsoever does but grunt at him, is already damnable. And on the other side, whereas it is said that we must rebuke the fruitless works of darkness: let us abhor the evil as saint Paul himself says, avouching to the Corinthians that if the Gospel be preached as it ought to be, that they hear it shall be constrained to glorify GOD, by casting themselves upon the earth, that is to say, be being ashamed of their sins. And why? Because they be brought to light, whereas they were hidden before. Whereas their sins were not known: they see themselves as it were defamed before GOD, and that it is not for them to hide themselves anymore. Then if I do but grunt of ill will against my neighbor, yes though it cannot be said that I have called him naught pack, unthrift or fool, but that I have but only nodded my head at him, or made but a flirt at him with my finger: behold, it is a false witnessing before God. And why? For I despite my neighbor, and am desirous to shame him. And what moved me thereto? The disliking of him which I have conceived against him.

But on the contrary part, if I be desirous to give my neighbor good counsel, and to seek his well doing, so as I am not led by any evil affection, but I would procure his welfare as much as in me is: I may well say unhappy man, look to yourself, it seems that you intends to sell yourself to the devil, with you be a slave under that cursed bondage? You showed indeed that your art witless and stark made, seeing you with receive no warning, Wilt you needs perish so unhappily? Go like a wretch as you art, every man ought to spit in your face. I may allege all this to a man, and yet do him no wrong. For why? I could not otherwise reclaim him. When I see that Satan has so hardened him, that he had need to be quickened up with main strokes of the hammer: I may deal thus vehemently with him, and it is the next way to cover his faults. For to what intent do I so, but that they should be pardoned at God's hand, and that he should no more be defamed to the word ward? It grieves me to see him pointed at with the finger, it grieves me to see him set as it were upon a scaffold for all men to gaze at: I say this gear grieves me: and therefore I labor to bring him into the right way again. In so dealing there is no wrong at all. But yet for all this we must not take leave to over bitter. For although we be very well minded, and be not carried with any evil intent, yet may we soon do amiss, if we be too sharp in rebuking. And therefore does the Saint Paul want us expressly to deal mildly in rebuking such as how offended. And why? Consider {faith he} that though they felt also must fall. Therefore let us be mild and gentle to our neighbors, as we would they should be to us in like case. But how forever the world go, let us speak of voices without coloring of them, and let us endure lustily to correct offenders, according as they be able to bear and after we see them disposed, and let charity and brotherly love move us thereunto for if we pray God to guide and govern us in the is case by his holy spirit. The things that are spoken roundly and charitably lie counted as injury. You see then that the way for us to keep this commandment is to beware that we do not so much as once open our mouths to speak one word of railing or floundering, support enmity or evil will, and yet notwithstanding to rebuke offenders plainly and mildly as we would that others should do to correct us in like case if need required. If we see this righteousness then shall we not be false wittiness against neighbors.

Furthermore let us mark, that where as falsehood or false offense is spoken of, we be not only forbidden to invent or forge any lie. So as the thing that we speak should be contrived without any color of truth: but if a man do maliciously mar deface or disgrace the thing that is not evil of itself: behold, it is already a false witnessing. According whereto it is said that the parties which gave evidence against our Lord Jesus Christ, that he had said, Destroy you this Temple, and in three days I will build it up again, were false witnesses: and yet notwithstanding it is very certain that Jesus Christ had said so, and that he had spoken the self same words with his own mouth. Why then are the reporters of them called false witnesses? The reason is, because they wretched the words of the son of GOD, to another sense than he had spoken then, and thereupon went about to ground their own fury, and to charge him with wicked slanders, as though he had spoken of the material temple of Jerusalem, whereas he meant his own body, which is the very temple wherein dwells the fullness of the whole Godhead: for he is God manifested in the flesh.

So then, we see in few words, that the falseness which God condemns here, is not the contriving of some lie, nor the forging of something that was never done nor said, so as we should report some fable, and men should not know what it is: but also a malicious wresting or defacing of words that might have been well taken, and a turning of them to evil: if we do so we are false witnesses. As for example some are so forward, that as soon as they spy a thing that dislikes them, although it be not altogether wicked and ungodly: yet they fall to picking of some quarrel to it. Oh, say they, see, such a man has done such a thing. If they spy never so little a spot or speck, there needs no more with them to make virtue become vice. If we do but miss consider some one word that is well spoken, behold, we mischarge the party, and his good reputation is wounded. You see then that we be false witnesses, not only when we invent things that were never done nor said: but also when either by subtle caviling, or by any lewd and indirect slight, we wrest the thing amiss which might have been well taken. Now (as I said) this comes to pass now and then by reason that men are over captious. And if they be forward: needs must they turn all things to your worst. But it is said that love is not mistrustful, as Saint Paul speaks of it: and therefore we must be sure that a thing is evil, before we condemns it. It is true that we may sometimes be deceived in discerning of good and evil: But when there are apparent signs and tokens, and the matter is manifest as we may be able to say, This is ill done: if we be still too much wedded to it, it cannot be but sinful. And specially if our nature be so malicious as to bite men and to slander them where there is no cause: surely we be condemned for false witnesses before God.

Now if they that are stout in rebuking voices be to be condemned, when their stoutness proceeds of too rigorous a mind: what shall they be whose doings spring of manifest hatred and which will needs misconstrue such sayings and doings, as might nevertheless be well taken, and have no apparent fault in them? If they mar such things by their lewd constructions: are they not false witnesses before GOD? So then, let us learn in few words to maintain the honesty and welfare of our neighbors in such sort, that whether we rebuke them, or whether we speak of their voices to the intent they should be punished, and that such as might be seduced and miscarried by their evil example may be reclaimed: let us always have this regard in our speaking, namely that we seek their welfare and benefit as much as in us lies, and that we keep such an even hand continually, as we defame not men after such a sort as they should be out of heart with it. For we should rather bury their faults to the uttermost of our power both before GOD and man, to the intent they may call themselves home again, and not forgo all shame fastness, and so rush out into all naughtiness. That is a thing which we must needs take heed of.

Now if we will observe the things that are contained here: we must resort to a higher ground: which is, to consider for what purpose God has made our tongues, and to what end he has given us speech: namely to the intent we might impart our minds one to another by communication. And whereto should the communication of men tend, but to the maintaining of themselves in charity and love? Therefore at a word, we must learn so to bridle our tongues, as the union which GOD has commanded, may always be maintained as much as is possible.

And that is the cause why Saint James uses such earnestness in speaking of evil words. The tongue (says he) is a small thing, and but a little piece of flesh: and yet it kindles such a fire, as is able to burn up the greatest woods in the world. Now let us come back to the said ground: which is, to understand that God wrought us a singular benefit, in giving us ability to common together. Behold, the thoughts of men are secret: and yet the tongue serves us to utter our minds. Therefore let us be circumspect in using such a benefit, that it be not stained by our vice and naughtiness. And seeing that God has given it us to maintain love and brotherly goodwill one towards another: let us not abuse it in babbling, or in gadding up and down with it to sow rancor and malice among ourselves, by wresting our words amiss. Thus you see whereto we must come back.

And when we know generally, how to avoid the crime to false witnessing: forasmuch as it is a hard thing to bridle our tongues: let us take the more pain and heed to do it. We see that many evil words do easily leap us. And when we have talked to and fro unadvisedly: because we be accustomed to it, we think it is no fault before God. But let us mark that forasmuch as we be naturally too much inclined to speak indiscreetly, and to cast forth words of blame and reproach against our neighbors: we have the more need to endeavor to imprison our tongues and to hold them down. For though we be given to someone sin more than to others: that will not serve us for excuse before God. But when we perceive any fault in ourselves, we must not flatter ourselves in it, but rather be sorry for it and say, Alas I see this disease reigns too much in me, and therefore I must fight the more stoutly against it, and I must by God's grace enforce myself to attain to the repressing thereof, seeing I perceive that God condemns it. And therewithal let us bethink us of the threats that are given out neither whoremongers, nor drunkards, nor thieves, nor murderers shall inherit the kingdom of heaven: he adds also Cursed speakers, and he banished them likewise from all hope of life and salvation.

Now when we hear these things, is it for us to cover ourselves any more with leaves, or to bear ourselves on hand that there is no harm in speaking evil of our neighbors? Think we that the threat which God has uttered by the mouth of S. Paul, serves but to fear little children, and shall not be executed upon such as will needs exempt themselves from it, as it were in despite of him? Yes.

So then let us take pain in this behalf: and to conclude, let us specially make this comparison, that if God will have us to maintain the good names of our neighbors, forbidding us so straightly to lay blame or misreport upon it, whereby their honesty may be defaced: he will much more have us to regard his honor.

For are we not a hundredfold more bound to maintain God's honor, than to pressure the good estimation of men: seeing we cannot by any means benefit him? Yes: And therefore let us beware that we bear not false witness against God, according to S. Paul's saying, who vows that such as corrupt the pureness of the Gospel, are false witnesses against God and not against men. What is to be done then? We must maintain God's truth and deal so roundly in it, that forasmuch as we see the doctrine is good, we bear it abroad and maintain it, knowing that God has ordained us to be as his deputies. Then if I see the truth oppressed, I must not suffer it, to my power. Why so? God has appointed me to see that lying and untruth be suppressed in his name.

And this to be observed most specially, when the doctrine of salvation comes in question. As for example, when we see the doctrine in danger to be falsified, and that men would mingle Leven with it to imbrue men with falsehood and leasing: in that case we must be zealous indeed, not suffer false witnesses to have their full swing against God, unless we mind to consent to them, and to be partakers with them, as I have declared already. Finally let us learn, that when we have lived in such plainness among men, as it cannot be laid to our charge that we have gone about to deface any man by slandering, railing, or back biting: we must also have such zeal to Godward as his truth may continue found, and be maintained to reign among us. Thus you see in effect what we have to consider upon this commandment.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us perceive them better than we have done, and to lead us more and more to such repentance, as we may learn to bethink us of our sins, to be sorry for them, and to dislike of them, that having obtained forgiveness of them, we may learn to direct our life according to his holy commandments, so as he may be honored of us with true obedience and not only with consession of the mouth. That it may please him to grant his grance, not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth &c.

The forty first Sermon, which is the twelfth upon the fifth Chapter 21 Thou shall not lust after thy neighbor's wife; neither shall thou covet thy neighbor's house, nor his field, nor his manservant, nor his woman servant, nor his Ox, nor his Ass, nor anything that is thy neighbor's.

T might seem at the first sight that this commandment was more than needed, because that in condemning of theft and whoredom, God meant thereby to repress all wicked affections. For I told you that we must expound these commandments according to God's nature, and we know that it is God's peculiar office to search men's hearts, so as he know even the deepest, secretest, and hiddenest thoughts. It follows then that in forbidding men to be thieves and whoremasters, he meant also to bridle their affections and lusts. And indeed, if it were not so: God had no more power in making of laws, the mortal men. For if an earthly making man condemns whoredom, he will also condemn the intent of it. If there appears a wicked intent, it shall be punished. If God's Law were no more but so: it were a matter of no great importance: for it were but a civil order to govern us honestly to the worldward. But there is much more in it: for we see how S. Paul faith, that the law cannot be kept without a pure conscience and an unfeigned faith. If it be requisite for us to have such a soundness in us, for the well keeping of God's Law: it follows that all wicked lusts were forbidden under the name of whoredom. As much is to be said of the word Theft. Also we might allege the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is a faithful expounder of the Law. For it is by his spirit, that Moses and all the Prophets spoke. Why then is it added here, that we must not covet? If all wicked lusts were spoken of before; why should they be repeated again? We must mark, that in this place God mean not to repress the affections that are fully intended and determined upon: but the other affections or motions that stir us up and provoke us although we neither stick to them nor consent to them. This requires a longer and plainer exposition.

Sometimes Covetousness or Lust betokens the will in man. As for example, when I see my neighbors' goods and am tempted to covet them and to lust after them: Now if I seed this temptation in myself, and give myself the bridle: then does the sin so overmaster me, that my will is fully resolved upon it, and I would fain that those goods were mine. This is a kind of covetousness or lust that caries the will wit it: for the party consents to the sin, and he would put his wicked intent in execution, if he were able. Now such kind of wicked coveting and lusting were forbidden heretofore where it is said, Thou shall not steal, Thou shall not commit aduontry. For there God has forbidden us, not only the actual deeds of theft and whoredom; but also the very lusting and longing after another man's wife, goods or possessions.

But there is another kind of covetousness or lust, whereunto we doe not altogether cleave, as to consent thereto and yet notwithstanding it tickles and moves us in such sort as we feel some evil provocation in ourselves, which is against God, and strives against the righteousness that is contained, in the Law. Those are the lusts that are forbidden in this place.

And so we see that God having already condemned all wicked intents and purposes: does justly add, that that is not yet such a perfection as he requires at our hands: but that we must understand that all manner of affections which stir us up to evil, [are sinful:] insomuch that although we determine not upon anything in ourselves, nor purpose it at all, but only that some lusting or liking doe glance through our heart: A sin is forthwith committed, and we be guilty before God. We see then what manner of soundness is required in this text: namely how that our Lord having already forbidden wicked intents, adds that all our senses and wits must be so imprisoned under the fear of him, and so inflamed with love and desire to live in all holiness: as we may not bee moved or stirred one way nor other, by any wicked passion, to lust after another man's goods or wife.

Seeing we have God's meaning: now let us see whereto he binds us: for the Law should be as a looking glass unto us, to behold our own wretchedness in. And when we once know our duty, let us assure ourselves we be worthy to be condemned, if we draw not to the perfection which God calls us unto. Thus you see whereupon we must stand, that we may make our profit by this last commandment, may of the Law. And to the end we may take the better heed to it, and consider that it is such a doctrine as deserves well to have our whole minds applied unto it: let us bear in mind how Saint Paul says, that whereas he had been counted a. great doctor, and a wise man, and had been trained up in God's law from his childhood: yet notwithstanding he had been so blind that he wist not what God's Law meant, until he had been converted, and that our Lord Jesus Christ had enlightened him by his Gospel, and so made him to know where unto the Law ought to leade us. You see then how S. Paul had been brought up in such sort, that he was of great reputation among men, howbeit not among the heathen, as who should say he has been some Philosopher, but as one that had been trained up in the Law of God. And as in respect of his life, he protests that he had been unblamable before men. Yee see then that S. Paul was a holy and a wise man in common account: and yet for all that, he is but a silly beast as in respect of God's Law. Why so? He faith that he thought himself to be alive, and to have been righteous before God, not knowing that he needed the mercy which God offers to all sinners. For he abstained from whoredom, and robbery and such other things: and again he had no evil intents that any man could perceive or know, by reason whereof he thought himself to be a righteous man. But at the length when God had pitied him, he opened his eyes and made him to understand by this last word, Thou shall not lust. Loe how S. Paul began to learn the law new again, whereof he had been a teacher before. S. Paul making profession of the Law wherein he had been brought up from his tender age, faith that until such time as he had thoroughly bethought him of the meaning of this text: he posted over it as it had been upon burning coals as they say, so as he tasted not the strength and power of the law, nor knew what sin was that he might condemn himself and flee to God's mercy for refuge, wherein the hope of our salvation lies, and ought to be grounded. Seeing that S. Paul could not conceive the meaning of the law, nor attain to the right understanding thereof, but by this clause let us determine ourselves to travel that earnestlier in it. And since he was so blind all the time of his life until his conversion, that he understood not that saying: we ought to take the better heed of it, as I told you before. For we be not of better ability than he: but God must be fain to show us by his holy spirit, what is meant by this coveting or lusting, which is condemned in this place.

But now besides this, we have here another warning which is right necessary for us. For the devil has labored to cover this commandment, after such a sort, as God's intent and meaning might not be known, but that men might lightly pass over all wicked lusts, which were seen to be sin, and whereof every man might have proof in himself. Insomuch that men restrained this word lust, to none other affections than such as import a resolute purpose or full intent: but that is contrary to the plain meaning of Moses. And let us consider what is come to pass in the Popedome. For although the Papists cannot deny, but that to be provoked and stirred up to, evil desires, is a damnable fault, and springs of original sin, and of the corruption which we receive from our father Adam: yet notwithstanding they imagine that after baptism it is no longer sin, though there come a thought into a man's mind to doubt of God's promises, and to grudge and repine against him. If a man be afflicted, and his heart rise against it, so as he blames God of unrighteousness and cruelty; that is no sin say the Papists. And they be not the small fools that say so: but it is a general resolution in all their devilish Synagogues or Schools. There is not any synagogue in the Popedome, wherein this point is not received as an article of the faith, namely that though a man be moved and provoked by any wicked lust, yet it is no sin: insomuch that if he be tempered to murder, to poison, to commit whoredom, and to do all the crimes and outrages of the world: yet if he do not consent thereto, nor assent, (for those are the two terms that they use) that is to say so they determine not fully upon the matter to say I will go through with my wicked intent, nor stand upon it to delight in that wicked affection: it is no sin at all, it is but an exercising of ourselves in batell, where by we show ourselves to be valiant champions, and that sin overmaster us not. Indeed it is true that the faithful do well show that God's spirit reigns in them, by their beating back of such temptations. And when they hold themselves in awe, and as it were imprison themselves, and resist those things because they know they be contrary to God's will, and that he condemns them: it is certain that thing shows that God has given them the upper hand of sin, and that his power is resident in them, and that they be stout champions to fight against Satan: but yet doeth it not follow, that they be clear from all fault, and that they can pluck up sin, and fully deliver themselves from it, as though there were not any spot or blemish more in them. Alas, we come far short of that. For surely on the one side we have cause to praise God, for giving us the grace by his holy spirit to overcome all wicked affections. But yet must we sigh with all humility, acknowledging ourselves to be weak on our part, and that if he pitied us not, we have such a wicked mind already in us, as provokes his vengeance against us, so as we should well deserve to be utterly destroyed at his hand. Moreover it was requisite that God should discover the shame of the popedome, and show that the greatest clarks there, are duller witted than the silly Insidels that never hard one word of holy scripture. Why so? For we must take that which is written in the Law. It is said that the whole sum of the law is that we should love God with all our heart, with all our soul, with all our mind, and with all our powers. If it had been said, Thou shall love GOD with all thy heart: very well, a man might have concluded, that it is no sin unless the will doe fully resolve upon it and purpose it. For although the word Heart, do sometime signify the understanding: yet does the holy scripture take it also for the will. Now then a man might allege this shift: it is said that we must love God with all our heart: therefore so we have not our will bent contrary to goodness it is enough, we be quite discharged before GOD.

For men would take the will for the wicked affection, and so it would seem that the wicked lusts which stir us up and provoke us, are not comprised under the name of sin, so long as they hold us not captive. But When as he adds, they with all thy heart, with all thy thoughts, and with all thy powers: let us see whether a piece of my soul or mind be not already corrupted, when I conceive anything against God or when I conceive any wicked lust of whoredome or robbery, although I stick not to it. Is it to be said that I love God with all my heart, when a piece of my mind is bent against him? The case concerns not the very heart or will, as I have declared before: but the conceit that is in the soul of man. Now then I show that there is vanity in me, and that the fear and reverence of God restrain me not as they should do: and therefore it follows that I am condemned as blamable, because I have not discharged myself in loving my God as I am commanded. Again, is there no power of my soul which is not applied to the thinking of some one thing or other that is contrary to God and his righteousness? Yes. We see then that naughty and wicked thoughts are to be condemned, and we must no more qualify them that they should not be punished at God's hand: and also that the men which never consented to evil so far as to purpose and fully intend it, should not fail to be cursed before God, if he lifted to use rigor against them. Now therefore we have the true and plain meaning of this text, whereby we see that it behooves us to look nearer to it, that we be not beguiled nor mislead. And S. Paul's example ought to prick us the more forward, seeing he confesses himself to have been ignorant of God's law, until our Lord Jesus Christ had enlightened him by his holy spirit, to the intent he should know what was meant by the word: Lust or Concupiscence.

Now must we apply the fore-touched things to our benefit, and use? First therefore let us learn, that to serve God well, we must not only be desirous to do well, and go forward therein to effect: but also rid our hearts from all evil affections and corrupt thoughts, so as all our senses may tend to the giving of ourselves all wholly unto God. Let us not show ourselves to have been drawn aside to reel one way or other: but let us be thoroughly stayed, to run forward without slopping or stunting, yea even to run forward in the way that GOD showth us, so as there may be nothing but perfect pureness in us. And when we once know that well: then must we take warning to stand upon our garde. For we see how men run after and dispense with themselves. And what is the cause there of? It is for that they make their reckoning without their host, as we say. For they conster God's law after their own fancy, bearing themselves in hand that it is enough for them, so they had none evil intent with them, nor rested upon the thing with determinate purpose. Tush say they, God imputes none of all this. And thereupon they walk for ward in leawde lusts with a towel of their own tying before their eyes, that they may not discern their own secret deceiving of the selves. But yet when men have spoken so, they cannot scape the hand of the heavenly judge. And therefore let us look to the restraining of our lusts. For God has condemned not only the wicked intents and purposes: but also all the lusts that provoke us and thrust us forward unto evil. Wherefore let us live in the greater awe, and let every man hold himself short, even because there is no part in us which is not infected with sin. Let us make a trial of all the powers of our soul, and we shall find that sin is shed throughout, like as when a poison is soaked into a mans body, it infects him throughout, and so is there as it were an universal leprosy which has overgrown the whole man, both bones and marrow, and thoughts, and affections, and all that ever is of him. Seeing then that our nature is so corrupted, ought we not to be the more vigilant to hold ourselves in awe, considering that God by his law condemns all wicked thoughts, that tend to the provoking of us unto evil, inasmuch as there is a certain inward moving that tickles us, and we feel our will pricked forward, although it be not led quite and clean away as a prisoner? Since we see this, have we not good cause to gather our wits to us, and to walk the more warely and carefully under the hand of God? So then whereas we be drowsy and slothful, and would fain discharge ourselves to Godward with ease: yee see how this commandment ought to waken us. But we must understand that it is not for us to scape by such shifts. And why? After that God has condemned wicked intents: he proceeds still to the condemning of evil lusts too. And that ought to stand us to a double use. The one is, that we must pray to God the earnestlier, to govern us with his holy spirit, and to cleanse us from all vices and corruptions, and that having prayed unto him, every of us should enforce himself, and as it were doe violence to our nature, and to all our senses and powers of mind, forasmuch as there is nothing in us but rebelliousness against the Law of God, even as Saint Paul speaks not only of men's wills, when he says: that men in their own forward nature are enemies to God, but also of their affections and thoughts. He uses a word there, which extends even to the thoughts that we conceive. All of them (says he) are enemies unto God.

Seeing this so: let us assure ourselves, that when we have take never so much pain to hold ourselves imprisoned under the awe of God: yet there will scape manic evil lusts from us, the which it behooves us to bewail before God. And so the first point is, that we must be earnest in calling upon God, to govern us by his holy spirit, and do our endeavor and diligence to bridle ourselves in such wise as Satan may not have any hole to enter at, nor bee able to make any breach upo us, to win the possession of our harts: but that we drive them a great way of, so as if we perceive any thought tending unto evil, we straightway prevent it and set a bar in the way saying: No not so, Thy God must have the whole dominion of thee so as he possess, not only thy heart, but also all thy senses. And for the second point we must learn to condemn ourselves, that we may glorify God in confessing ourselves, to be all guilty, and that if he call us to a reckoning. we be all undone and cast away, if he use rigor against us. To that point must we come, or else we shall never profit in God's Law as we should do. But here it might bee demanded, seeing that God knows men's frailty, why he does not either strengthen them better, or else make a Law that were less strait and severe? For it should seem that God meant to oppress us, when he forbids wicked lusts and thinks it not enough for us to yield him obedience in our wills, without adding of the other word. And that is the cause why scoffers say that God meant to mock men in his law, and intended (as yee would say) to forbid men to scratch, when he made them to itch. But we must come to the cursedness that is in ourselves: namely that we have neither thought nor affection in us, (as I said before) but the same is disobedient to God's righteousness. Therefore let us not wonder though there be such a battle between God's law and men's lusts. For why? when we have thoroughly searched what is in us: we shall find nothing there but utter corruption and damnable vice: for we cannot conceive so much as one thought which tends not to evil. Forasmuch as it is so: behold God gives us here a perfect rule of all goodness. and righteousness. Needs therefore must there rise up as it were a thundering, and the fire and water must needs show their contrary workings, Now there is less agreement between man's nature and God's righteousness, than is betwixt fire and water. Therefore let us not think it strange, that God does so repress all our lusts. And when we hear the blasphemies which the scoffers that I spoke of, do spew out: let us abhor them as monsters. For instead of glorifying God for his righteousness, they come dashing against him like wild and mad beasts. Thus much concerning this point of the frailty of men.

Now although it be such: yet is it not to be marveled at, that God has condemned it in his law. Why so? For in ordering of our life and in showing us how we should walk, God respects not what we be able to do, nor that measure of our strength: but what duty we owe to him, and what righteousness is, although it be not to be found in us. We be God's creatures: and ought we not then to give ourselves wholly to his service? Yes certainly. That is a peremptory reason. And men may well grunt at it, but yet shall they always find proof in themselves, that forasmuch as they belong to GOD, they ought to dedicate all their senses, all their affections, and all that ever is in them both in body and soul unto him. Howbeit let us mark well herewithall, that we cannot discharge ourselves thereof: and what is the cause thereof but our own naughtiness? And we take that from Adam. That follows not. For although we be held in bondage under sin, and this bondage hinders us from well doing, and drives us to all evil: yet howsoever we fare, the root of it is in ourselves, and every man shall feel himself blame worthy, so as we shall not need to say that we be driven by any other force: but every man is carried and driven to it by his own lust. And so is there no more excuse for us. Whereby it appears, that it is not for us to measure God's Law by our own power and abilities. Why so? As I said before, GOD respects not what we can do, nor what our ability can brouk: but he respects wherein we be bound unto him, and he has an eye to the perfection that is without us. That is the thing which we have to mark. And it is the thing that beguiles the Papists. For they have this principle among them. That God's Law is not impossible to men. It is a wonder that they should be so draught, and that the devil should bewitch them after, that fashion. For it is most evident and apparent doctrine throughout the whole Scripture, that men shall always be condemned by the Law, and that they must be fain to flee for refugee to God's only mercy. When Saint Paul goes about to prove that all men are cursed for as much as all men are sinners, and that there is not so much as one righteous man: what argument uses he? He alleges this text of Moses, Cursed are all they that perform not the whole contents of the Law. Now at the first blush, it should seem that Saint Paul reasons amiss, and that the said allegation is impertinent. Well then, it is said that all such as transgress God's Law are cursed: but yet it follows not therefore that all mankind is accursed. For if a man keeps the law and discharges his duty: in so doing he is exempted from the sentence of condemnation. Some then there are to be found that have performed the law: and therefore all are not accursed. Yes. But Saint Paul presupposes that the law is impossible. And if he should not, presuppose that: he had spoken as a witless and unreasonable man. Therefore we see that the Papists have taken a ground that is clean contrary to God's spirit: and surely he besots them in such wise, as they know not the very Apse of the Christian faith and Religion. So then let us mark well, that when we treat of God's law, we must not measure it by our ability, nor look what we can do. but we must look what we owe unto God. Yea but say they, not so: how shall we do then? For to their seeming all the world should be damned. It is true, and so is it meet that it should be: that is to wit, that we should all be damned, if we will not have salvation in Jesus Christ. For how shall we seek God's grace, unless we think we have need of it? Men will not beg by their good wills. So long as we think ourselves to have any righteousness of our own, we will not pass to seek any else where than in ourselves. Therefore it behooves us to bee utterly rid of it, and to feel God's wrath and death lying heavy upon us: for without that, we will lying never vouchsafe to submit ourselves to God to obtain mercy. But this deserves to be laid forth more at large.

Therefore let us bear well in mind first of all that when we feel any sinful thought in us, and our lusts do tickle us unto evil: we be guilty before God. But here it might bee demanded, how then? If a man do but conceive a thought, so as he not only has no will to abide by it, but also dislikes of it even before he have felt any sting or prick of it: is this sin? Now there are thoughts which touch not our hear at all, neither are we moved with them, neither do we conceive any evil desire. A thought comes upon a man as it were sleeping, and it slitters afore him. What? So as his heart is moved with it, or his desire inclined to it? No. When it happens but even so to us, surely it behooves us to bewail it before GOD, and to consider that if we were not held back by his grace: there were a gap open for Satan, and he would by and by win the advantages of us. Therefore we must still sigh in this case. But yet does not God impute this for sin.

The second point is, when we not only conceive some evil thought in our mind, and some thing presents itself before us: but also we be somewhat moved wit it, so as we feel some sting of Satan pricking us, and then is the sin conceived: that is to say, although there be no consent as they term it, nor any resolute purpose: yet is the sin full shaped before God, and it is damnable. It is expedient to allege examples hereof. It may be that a man beholding another man's house or ground, conceives some light imagination, and yet is no whit moved therewithal in his heart, nor has any desire to say, I would this were mine, but passes it over and sees it but vanity. He can not let the coming of it into his mind, yet (as I said before) although it be not matched with any evil affection, GOD does thereby warn us of the infirmity that is in us, and it behooves us to humble ourselves, and to be sorry, and to consider that it is such a fault already, as we are well worthy to be condemned for. For let us see if this bee to be found in the Angels of heaven. No undoubtedly. And yet the righteousness of the Angels is hardly and scanty answerable to the Law of God. Indeed there is a righteousness of God (as we have seen in the Book of Job) which surmounts the righteousness of the Law. But though the Angels of heaven give themselves never so much to the keeping of God's law: surely the uttermost that they can do, is but to frame themselves to the rule that is given us here. Now then we see how it is fault already, for the which men ought to condemn themselves, though they have not had any wicked thing presented before them, but even a little heart rising, so as a man should say, I would, and yet for all that he does very sodainly beat it back, and yields not thereto, though I say, he so cut it off, yet is he guilty of that coveting or lusting whereof mention is made here, And seeing it is so, let us learn to condemn

Again let us look that we condemn ourselves double, when we have not only had some heart rising to provoke us to evil; but also some settled affection by nourishing the said heart rising, as when a woman breeds child and nourishes the conception till it come to the birth. Now then, when we have given head after that fashion to our evil lusts, so far forth that our will is overcome, and we rest upon the evil to consent unto it: behold (say I) there lies a double condemnation upon us. And then must we bewail our wretchedness yet more because we see a double condemnation hanging over our heads, unless GOD of his infinite goodness do spare us. Thus you see what we have to mark.

But now here withal we must resort to the remedy. For we should fall into utter despair and confusion, if we had not God's grace to succor us withal. Therefore if we acknowledge ourselves blameworthy in all respects: then does GOD call us to him, and show us that although the wicked lusts which are in us, be sin of their own nature: yet he will not impute them to us for sin. Then if it be demanded whether evil lust, be imputed for sin to the faithful: I say no: but they be two divers things. For if you have an eye to the nature of the vice: you shall ever find it to be sin: but yet GOD pardons it. After that manner shall no evil lusts be laid to the charge of the faithful, for as much as they be forgiven through God's free goodness: and we know also that all our spots are wiped out by the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ: and thereof is Baptism a good warrant unto us. For there have we our spiritual washing, to cleans us from all the filth and uncleanness that is in us, that we may appear pure and clean before GOD. So then our wicked lusts shall not come to account. Nay (which more is) even the deadly sins, notwithstanding that they proceed even into the act or deeds doing, shall not be imputed unto us: verily even because (as I said before) God respects not that: and yet notwithstanding he will that we have an eye to it. Howbeit, if any man beguile himself by bearing himself in hand that he has not conceived any wicked lust: it causes GOD to call him to account. And why? For in as much as men soothe themselves, it is meet that they should be condemned. And for the same cause has the Devil brought to pare to blare men's eyes by making them believe that none of all those things is sin: in so much that we see how the Papists imagine, that even the grossest faults that be, are blotted out by the sign of the Crosse, or taken away with the sprinkling of holy water. To their seeming they be matters of no weight, and they dally with God as with a little baby. But on the contrary part let us always bear this in mind. And for as much as we be not only too negligent, but also inclined to sooth ourselves in our own vices: let us take this looking glass to behold ourselves in. Let us not deceive ourselves. A man may be smeared or grimed, and every man shall laugh at him, and yet he himself shall not perceive it a whit. But if he go to a glass, and there spy his face all besotted, he will shrink away and go wash it of. Even so must we do. Surely the whole Law of God is as a glass to show us our foulness, to the intent we should be sorry and ashamed of our lewd doings. And if we will have a true looking glass, we must come to this present commandment as I have said already. For as long as we read no more but Thou shall not steel, Thou shall not murder, Thou shall not commit adultery: all is well, every man will bear himself in hand that he is not guilty. But when we come once to this point, Thou shall not lust: it is a sharp lancing knife wherewith God launches deeper, to fear not only the bottom of our hearts, but also of also our thoughts, imaginations and concepts. There is not that thing in us which comes not then to trial and knowledge. In so much that the things which we took to be no faults at all, must be condemned before God, and he must have the judging of them, unless we play the judges with ourselves beforehand. And here withal we have to magnify the mercy of our God, in that although we be faulty so greatly and so many ways, yet not withstanding he accepts us for righteous. Let us make comparison here between the righteousness which we obtain by faith, and the curse that is upon us. Whereunto be we plunged? Are we faulty but in some one offence, or in some two or three, or in same certain number? Nay we be plunged in such a gulf, that if we begin once to fall to reckoning, we must need be confounded. A hundred Millions of faults is not the hundred part of the offences that we have committed before God. Then are we so guilty, as there is none end nor measure of our sins. Yet notwithstanding God receives us to mercy, so as we be counted as righteous before him, as though there were such full soundness and perfection in us, that nothing were amiss, but that we had performed the whole Law. Seeing then that God forgives us such an infinite number of offences, and clothes us with his own righteousness, through the operation of the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, in as much as we lay hold by faith upon the grace that is purchased for us, and do him the honor to say, Lord, it is in thy mere and free bestowed goodness that our salvation consists: does it not appear therein, how much we be bound unto him? Yes. So then, when God's Law has brought us to our wit's end, not only because of the infinite number of our lusts, but also because we should lie buried under them as under huge mountains, if God should deal rigorously with us: let us call to mind that God's intent is not to leave us in despair, but to lift us up again as soon as we be sunk down. When he sees our feebleness, he reaches us his hand, and calls us to him, and will have us to be comforted, for as much as he of his mercy lays not any of all our sins to our

charge. Thus you see how the faithful cease not to be of good cheer, though they be so condemned in themselves. But yet must we begin at this end of being utterly dismayed in ourselves, that our Lord may deliver us from the dungeon of death, and we acknowledge if our salvation consists in his only grace. Howbeit let us notwithstanding live warely and keep good watch, assuring ourselves that when we have travailed never so much, and taken never so much pain to serve God, so as we have on the one side esshowed all occasions of evil, and on the other side subdued our affections, and also endeavored to repress all wicked thoughts: yet we must not cease to condemn ourselves still, and to stand still in awe. Although we have had victory through the grace of God, and sin has not overmastered us: yet does it dwell continually in us, and there is still some uncleanness and spot in us. Therefore let us sigh, and let us sigh in such sort, as it may sharpen us to do our duty. We see how S. Paul speak of it. After he had profited as much as might be, and was come to an Angelical holiness: yet notwithstanding he faith will, wretch that I am, who shall deliver nice from this body of death? And what is the cause that he considers death in himself, but for that he saw sin there? Nevertheless let us understand that we must not be out of heart. Although we perceive a Million of sins day by day in us: yet must we still pass on further. And therefore when Saint Paul exhorts the faithful to eschew sin: He says not, Let not sin dwell in you: but he says, Let not sin reign in you. Indeed it were to be wished that sin dwelled not in us: but seeing it is in us, yet must we not be too much discomforted. For whereas it is said that sin dwells in us: first it warmth us of our wretched state: and secondly it wills us to consider that we must be occupied continual warfare, and therefore flee the earnestlier to our God for succor, praying him to strengthen us with his power, by the grace of his holy spirit which he has given us for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake.

Now let us fall down in that presence of our good God, with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, and that we may learn to frame our lives to the obeying of him which beholds not only our outward works, intents and affections: but also even all our thoughts and concepts. And for as much as we can nor attain to such perfection out of hand: let [us beseech God] that the same may be an occasion to humble us: and therewithal to stir us up continual to fight lushlier, so as every of us may enforce himself to correct the vices that are in his nature, until our Lord having rid us from this corrupt flesh, do clothe us again with his own righteousness, and fashion us all wholly like to his glorious image. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and all.

On Tuesday, the 16th of July 1555
The forty second Sermon, which is the thirteenth upon the fifth Chapter

22 These are the words which the Lord spoke to your multitude, upon the Mount from the middes of the fire, out of the Cloud and darkness, with a great voice. And he added no more thereunto; but wrote them in two tables of stone, and gave them unto me.

Or as much as we find not a better excuse of our lewdness and disobedience towards God, than to plead ignorance: we could find in our hearts to have always that shrouding sheet, so as we might say we understand not what GOD says, or that he speaks not unto us, or else that his voice is too far off for us to hear. But GOD foreseeing such lewdness, meant to prevent all that men could allege, to the end they might have nothing to defend themselves withal. And therefore in setting forth his Law, it was his will that the doctrine which is contained therein, should be uttered with a loud and shirle voice. Yea and he spoke it not only to three or four, but to all the people; both great and small without exception. Besides this, it was his will that the law should be put in writing, that it might continue, and not serve for one age only, but stand in force and authority to the world's end. And that is the cause why it is said in this place, That God spoke with a loud voice. Hereby Moses shows that the Law is no hidden doctrine, and that men can not allege that they be not of sufficient learning: for not without they cause did God so lift up his voice, when he intended to give a rule for men to live by. It is added expressly That It was done to the whole multitude. As if he should say, It is true that God has chosen men from among you to govern you, and that he has given them his spirit: but yet for all that, he will have his law known even of the rudest and most ignorant, so as it may be a wisdom common to all men. That is one of the points which we have to mark here.

The second is, That God added not anything more, after those ten sentences. Wherein Moses make the people understand, that this briefness which God uses, ought to encourage us to receive the things that he speaks. For if he should lay great volumes before us: we might reply, that all our life would not suffice to study them. God therefore was not overlong in giving us his word. There are but only ten verses of them. Let us count them upon our fingers, and we shall have instruction enough in all things that are requisite for our life. Yea and herewithall

Moses meant to do us to wit also, that seeing God has given us such a sure rule, as he intended not to add any whit at all to that which he had spoken already: it behooves us to hold us to it, and it is not lawful for any creature to add aught unto it. Thus much concerning is the second point.

For the third point he rehearses that again which he had said heretofore: that is to wit, That God in letting forth his law, spoke from out of the cloud, and that the mountains smoked, and that there were flames of fire, and flashes of lightening flew to and fro. Whereto tends all this? That the doctrine might carry the greater Majesty, and that men might be moved to humble themselves reverently before GOD, and to submit themselves wholly to his word, and to obey the same. These are the three notable points which Moses rehearses here, before he proceeds to the rest.

Now as touching that first, let us remember what has been said before, that is to say, That God spoke loud and shirle: and not to a few folk, but generally so all the people: which thing was done to make us understand, that God's word shall be clear and certain to us, so we play not the deaf folks willfully. True it is that our wits are so weak, as we shall never understand one word of the things that God spoke to us, except he enlighten us by his holy spirit: for the sensual man understands not the heavenly things. Those then are too high for us. But whereof comes that fault and vice but of our own blindness? Yet notwithstanding, God's true, as in respect of itself and in it own nature, is easy and open enough: and therefore let us not charge it with darksomeness. Again, what is to be done, if we would have God to make us profit in his word? Let us be lovely and of small reputation: for is not in vain, that he has promised to teach the lovely. Then let us not trust to our own wit, let us not come with overweening and loftiness, as though we thought ourselves of sufficient capacity to judge of the things that shall be said unto us: but let us rather beseech God to open our eyes and to reach us his hand, and let us confess that we have not the aptness to profit in his school, further forth than he gives it us. If we be at that point: let us not doubt but that God's word will be easy to us, and we shall understand what he intends to say. Hereby we see what wretchedness has been in that world, whereby the common people, and welneere all other men have been plucked backs from reading the Holy Scriptures. For it has been an opinion, that it belonged to none but Monks and Priests: yea and in the end there was such beastliness, as it seemed that divinity ought to be locked up in chests or caskets. But yet for all that, this record has endured, and must endure to the worlds end, namely that God has spoken with a loud voice, and not hidden or shrunk himself aside into some little odd nook. Therefore it was too shameful a thanklessness, that men have so left God's word as it were in a wilderness. And we ought to mark this text so much the more, where it is said, that God spoke not to some Doctor only, but to all the people in common, yea even to the very simplest sort of them. In respect whereof we have cause to magnify the goodness of our God, in restoring the benefit unto us, whereof we see the molt part of the world bereft, for their churlishness and ruthlessness sake, so that now a days God's word founds among us, and we may read it, and be partakers of it both openly and secretly, and the treasures thereof are set forth to us, so as we may enjoy them: and that is an inestimable benefit, which we ought to magnify. Again let us be diligent in giving ear to our God, and let no man allege excuses to shift himself from him. For seeing that God spoke to all that company of the faithful, even to as many as are baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ: let every man on his own behalf and in his degree, endeavor to profit thereby, and let all of us in common take God for our schoolmaster, and be ready to hearken to him whensoever it pleases him to speak unto us, which thing he does daily. Thus much concerning the first point, where it is said that-God spoke to the whole multitude.

Now let us come to the second point, that is to wit, That he added not anything: and that is to the end that we should be the willinger to hear what is contained in the Law. It is true that all that ever is set down in writing by Moses, belongs to the Law. Likewise the things that the Prophets have left unto us, and finally that which is added in the Gospel, contain all one substance. And though the Bible be very great: yet notwithstanding GOD has made it all to come at one certain mark, to the intent we should not go wandering at rovers, nor be driven to make too much seeking whither we should go. For why? All is referred to ten verses, as I have said already. Let us reckon upon our fingers, and we shall have God's commandments, we shall have a sum of the things which we ought to bear in minds, that we may be good scholars to Godward. Seeing there is such briefness, must it not needs be that men are re too forward, if they refuse such teaching, and can find no leisure to profit in God's word? Now then, let us forbear all such trifling replies as this, Oh sir, the holy scripture is a deep sea, it is a bottomless pit. If a man would enter into it, how should he get out again? Let us allege no such things. It is true that in the scripture God shows such secrets, as even that Angels do reverence. It is true that we can have but a small taste of the so long as we be in this world. It is enough that we know in part (as says Saint Paul) and darkly and that we see these things now as it were through a glass, which we cannot see as yet face to face. All this is very true. But yet for all that, God hath so abased and applied himself to our slenderness: that the things are become easy unto us, or at leastwise we conceive so much of them, as is available to our salvation. If we meet with things that are doubtful: let us have this modesty with us, that we rush not too far forward, till we have first asked counsel at God's mouth, knowing that we be yet far of from our perfection. Yet notwithstanding, we may always glory, that according to the ability that is given us, our Lord will not leave us in doubt and ignorance, without giving of us such certainty, as we may walk safely out our way, so as we shall know that his calling of us to him is not in vain, and that we be not let loose to run at rovers: but that we have a certain mark set up for us to run at, whereunto if we hold on our way, we ought not to mistrust that we shall miss, forasmuch as we have so good direction. Therefore let us bear in minds that our Lord speaks not here according to his own nature.

For if he should speak in his own language; should it be understood of mortal creatures? Alas no. But how is it that he has spoken to us in the Holy Scripture? As nurses do to their little babes. Saint Paul says that he did as a nurse does with her little children, when he preached the Gospel. And in speaking of himself, no doubt but he shows the goodness of God, who ruled him after that sort by his holy spirit. And Took what was in Paul: the same do we find likewise in Moses, and in all the prophets. Then let us mark, that God made himself nurse like, who talks not to her little babe as she would do to a man, but has a respect of the childes capacity. So then, GOD did as it were stoop, because we should not have understood what he said, unless he had lowlyed himself unto us. That is the cause why that in the Holy Scripture, he shows himself the rather like a nurse, to the intent to conceal his high and infinite majesty, whereunto we could not attain, no nor once come near it. Seeing that GOD has yielded himself so courteously unto us: there hangs the greivouser condemnation over our heads, if we endeavor not to profit in the doctrine, which is (as you would say) thawed to us beforehand, to the intent that we should do no more but swallow it down and digest it. Furthermore let us mark well, that where as Mores says, that God added not anything to these ten sentences it is to the end that this briefness should stir us up, and encourage us, knowing that God's intent is not to make us to wander as in a thing that has neither brim, nor bottom: but to set us down these only ten sentences. True it is that he expounds there ten sentences by Moses, and consequently by all the prophets: and in the end we have had a final exposition of them, made by our Lord Jesus Christ, as it is given us nowadays in the Gospel. But what for that? Yet have we this one mark to aim at, that there are but ten sentences. Since it is so; must it not needs be that men are too forward, when they despise such grace of GOD, and cannot find in their hearts to come to him when he entreats them so gently? Yes. So then this is the effect of that which we have to remember here concerning the easiness which Moses shows to be in God's word.

And by the way let us mark also, that he intended to cut off all occasion of quarrelling, to the end we should learnt to be contented with the simplicity of the Law: that is to say, that we should not fall to controlling of GOD, by adding of collups and morsels of our own to his word. For when he spoke: he spoke once for all. And he will have us to hold ourselves to that which he has spoken, as we shall see hereafter, where he forbids us straightly to swerve to the right hand or to the lest, or to add anything at all to the doctrine thereof, And indeed, seeing that GOD himself has not added aught unto it: what are we, that we should presume to take upon us above him? Think we that when GOD gave his Law, he had lost his remembrance, and wist not what was for our profit? Can a man bethink himself of anything that is unknown to God?

Again moreover, when as our Lord has applied himself so familiarly unto us: think we he meant to teach us by halves, and to leave us in the midst of our way? No. Then let us remember that seeing God added not anything after he had once spoken those ten words: it becomes us to yield ourselves wholly to the simple doctrine that is contained in his Law, without interlacing of anything of our own, assuring ourselves that our perfect wisdom is to obey our God. Had this been well observed: we should not be so greatly cumbered nowadays in correcting these corruptions that reign in the world. For whereof came the corruption of God's religion and service, that is to be seen in the Popedome? The Papists vaunt they serve God, when they use their kyrieleysons, their holy, holy, holy, their ceremonies and other petty trash. And why? Because they took upon them to add to God's word, so as they thought it not enough to serve God asfer his own devising unless men also did forge what they lifted in their own brain. Therefore all that ever is termed by the name of God's service in popery, is but toys of men's invention. And not only so: but also the saying of the prophet is fulfilled in them, namely that they have despised God's commandments, and in the meanwhile given themselves to their own inventions. The world sees what mischief has insued through this devilish malapeartness, that men durst disguise God's word with their own dreams and dotages. So much the more therefore does it stand us in hand to mark this text where it is said, that after GOD had once spoken, he added not anything to that which he had said And indeed, (as I said before) it is an horrible blasphemy, when men take upon them to find some better thing than is contained in God's law. It is all one as if they would reprove him as a liar, or say he was misadvised, or that he had forgotten what he should have commanded. But can men find any better way? No. Then let us learn to submit ourselves in such wise unto God, as we may always bear in mind, that when God had once spoken, he made a final end and conclusion, as if he should have said, Hold you there, these are my bounds and lifts: whosoever goes any further, he shall break his neck: so as there will be nothing but falling, if we keep not the right way which God has made and hedged in after that fashion. And although God speak not presently after a visible manner as he did then: yet ought; we to bethink us oftentimes of this lesson which is contained in his Law. Indeed God spoke not twice: but he spoke once for all, as they say. We on our part ought to hear it often, according to this saying of the threescore and second psalm: the Lord has spoken once, and I have heard him: but my hearing of it was not for once and away, I have heard it twice. Hereby we be warned, that it is not enough for us to bestow one day's hearing upon the things, which our Lord has willed to be set forth in his name: but we must mind them continually. Then let every of us occupy himself in them morning and evening all the time of his life, and let us not cease to record well the things which our Lord has told and declared unto us. For though we should apply ourselves to them all the days of our life: hardly should we attain to the one half of our journey. It is true (as I said before) that our Lord will instruct us so far forth as shall be expedient for our salvation: but yet for all, we shall always find ourselves to have needed to profit more and more in God's word. Therefore let us be diligent, and let us not think our labor lost when we take that way, and apply our whole study daily thereunto, so as we never leave searching and seeking out of the things which our Lord teaches us. Thus you see how we must put this sentence in practice, where it is said, that our Lord added not anything more.

Now let us come to the third point, which is: that he spoke from the midst of fire, clouds, and whirlwind. Indeed this has been expounded already heretofore: Howbeit forasmuch as it is repeated by Moses let us mark that it is not superfluous. And indeed, it cannot be told us too often, that God's words ought to carry a majesty towards us, to make all our wits to stoop and to submit themselves to it. And why? First we see there is such pride in men, as they cannot bow their necks. It is true that they will not say that they intend to resist God or to bid him battle: but whatsoever they say, are they pliable and meek as they ought to be? No: they come far short of it. Again, there is a blockishness in us, so as we dote upon these worldly things. We cannot raise up our wits to apply them to the hearing of God. We cannot attain to that spiritual wisdom, because our wits are occupied beforehand about the affairs and cares of the world, and we need nothing to hold us here beneath. Therefore it is greatly for our benefit, that our Lord should touch us to the quick, to the intent we may yield such reverence to his word, as it may not die, partly through our stubbornness and partly through our blockishness: that is to say because we be partly so dull, gross, and earthly, and partly so fore possessed with vanities, that we mount not upward, but are held down here in these corruptible things. And therefore not without cause did God speak from the midst of fire, clouds, and whirlwind, when he went about to set forth his Law. For it was expedient that the people should be touched with some fear, so as they might say, it is not for us to daly with our God. Seeing he appears to us with so great and terrible majesty: what should we do but tremble under him, and yield him such subjection as he may rule us as sheep, and we all of us bow down our necks and holds down our heads, suffering him to weald us at his will, and giving ourselves in such wise unto him, as we may be abashed when he speaks, and have none other desire, but only to serve and honor him, and to submit ourselves wholly to his guiding? So here the cause why God did so magnify his Law at the setting forth thereof. He could well have spoken without the casting forth of flames of fire without making the hill to smoke, and without having any thick or dark clouds about him: but it was his will to add all these miracles, to the intent that the people should be afraid. And therefore let us mark, that he intended to bring the prophet Esayes saying to pass: namely, that his spirit should not rest upon us, except we tremble at the pretence of his words. For the thing wherein he will try our obedientness towards him, is if we doe love him so well, that as soon as he speaks, we receive his word without gainsaying, so as we think it good and agree thereunto, saying amen, not only with our mouths but also with our hearts, and serving him quietly all our life long. For God's requiring of the service whereby he will be honored at our hands, is to show the obedience which we owe unto his word. Howbeit, forasmuch as we be so hard and heavy that we rather drag back; and cannot abide to bow down our necks to bear his yoke: we have need to be helped by all the means that are mentioned here. And therefore let us mark that these flames of fire appeared not for that time only, to serve no more but them that saw it: but also to the intent that the Law of GOD should bear record still at this day, of how great authority it ought to be, and to the intent the remembrance thereof should be renewed unto us, that by calling to mind what happened at that time, we may be humbled under the majesty of our God, and that whensoever we go about to advance ourselves, or to be tempted with presumption and pride, the burning fire that made the people agaft at that time and the thickness and darkness of the cloud, and the sight of the smoking mountain may come before our eyes and serve to hold us in such awe, as all loftiness my be beaten down in us, and we be so wakened in good earnest, as we may come and yield ourselves to our God to deal with us as he list, and to lead us whither he will, so as we may follow him whithersoever we be called by his mouth. Thus you see whereto we must refer the things that are spoken here concerning the smoking of the mount, the flaming of the fire, and the thickness of the cloud.

Besides this, let us mark further that God's appearing in whirlwinds, and thick clouds after that sort, serves to repress man's foolish curiosity. True it is (as I have said already) that God speaks to the intent to be understood, and therefore uses no doubtful words, nor goes about the bush (as they say): but has uttered his will so plainly, as we cannot but be thoroughly instructed, unless we ourselves be to blame for that we will not hearken to him. But yet for all this, we must not be too curious and inquisitive in seeking whatsoever seems good to ourselves, as we see men commonly be, who are inclined to such a desire of glory, that their ears are ever itching, to hear and know this and that. But behold, here our Lord says the contrary: would you fain know? Behold, here is a cloud to stop you: see what a darkness is here. So then let us learn that if we will be good scholars to Godward, we must not give our own desires the head, to search the things that ought to be hidden from us: but content ourselves to know what GOD tells us, and tarry until the day of full discovery for that knowing of the rest which we cannot yet comprehend. To be short, let us be ignorant in the things that God vouchsafes not to show unto us. For this ignorance of not coveting to know more than our Lord gives us leave to know, excels all the wisdom of the world.

Now let us come to that which Moses adds. He says that the law was written in two tables of stone, and delivered unto him. Whereas he speaks of the two tables: we must call to remembrance what has been treated of heretofore: namely that God could well have written all his Law in one stone: but it was his will to write it in two that the distinction might the better lead us to the understanding of the things contained in the law. For we see that our Lord does as it were chaw the things to us which are set down there, to the intent we should not allege that he speaks to high for us. Because there are two principal points of our life our Lord has divided his Law into two tables, of purpose to make us to know how we should behave ourselves towards him, and also how we ought to live with our neighbors. Is a man, desirous to rule his life aright in all perfection? First he must give himself to the serving of God, so as he be sure what things God require and allow: and secondly he must live so uprightly and evenly with his neighbors, as he may show by his doings that he is the very child of God. The first point then is, to know how God will be honored at our hands: and the second is to yield our neighbors their dewes, and to keep this indifference of nature, of doing nothing to another, which we would not have done to ourselves. So then, in the one table God has shown how he himself will be served, accordingly as I have told you already that he did set himself alone there, to the intent that men should not invent new God's: declaring therewithal that he will not be resembled by any images or puppets: but that forasmuch as he is a spirit, he will have us to serve him spiritually, and not to devise one thing or other on our own heads, but to yield him spiritual service: and moreover that he will have his name sanctified, by our exercising of ourselves in his word and specially by forbearing [our own wits,] and by renouncing our own imaginations and affections, so as we rest from our own doings, to suffer ourselves to be governed of God. There are the things contained in the first table. As touching the second, we have seen how he commanded us there, to honor our father and our mother, and how he forbad us murder, whoredom, theft, evil speech, and all manor of wicked lusting or coveting. That is the cause why God divided his Law into two tables.

Now then, will we lead our life aright? Let us always have regard, first to honor our God and afterward to live uprightly and indifferently with our neighbors. For there are some that forbear to do harm to their neighbors, but in the meanwhile they make no reckoning of God: but they think they shall go quite and clear, so no man complain of them in the world. And I pray you what matter is it though we steal not from men, if we rob God of his honor? Is it not a heinous crime to rob God of his honor, than to rob a man, or to cut his purse, or to rifle his coffer? Yes. Then let us not think we have all done, when men cannot indite us nor complain of us. For that case stands upon yielding unto God that which he demands, that which also is dewe unto him. For we be bound to honor him all our life long. Therefore it stands us so much the more in hand, to apply our minds to those keeping of the first table of the Law, so as we lead not a philosophical life like heathen only to behave ourselves honestly among men: but specially that we have God's honor in estimation and make that the first point which we begin at.

Likewise there are some others which will needs carry a countenance of devotion towards God, and of great zeal to serve and honor him: and yet when they come to be conversant among men, they pill, they poull, they quarrel, and they be full of cruelty, envy, and malice. But let us mark that God has not separated the two tables of his law. Indeed he has put a difference betwixt them: but he has not delivered to some men the first table, and to others the second to keep. He has said this is my Law: and look what I have joined together must not be put asunder. True it is that you must be put in remembrance of the love that you owe to your neighbors, that you may go through with it: But yet notwithstanding, when you have discharged yourselves of that point, you must frame yourselves to the other also. Likewise when you shall have shown great devotion in the worshipping and serving of me: you must not be careless to live lustily and uprightly with your neighbors. Also there are many that be desirous to serve God: but after what sort? Even as the Papists do: after their own fancy. But our Lord's will was to bridle us in his giving forth of the first table, to the end we should learn to serve him as he commands us, and not like well of anything but that which he allows for good. Thus you see whereto this saying is referred, that God wrote the Law in two tables.

And his will was to write it in two tables of stone, purposely to the intent it should continue: For it was not given for any little time, neither is it transitory. True it is that the ceremonies had an end. And in that respect the Law is called temporal: namely because the order that had been established among the people of old time, to continue till the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, was then abolished, and things were made perfect, so as we be no more under the shadows and figures which served for that time. Nevertheless, the substance and truth of the Law served not for that one age only, but is a thing that shall endure for ever, and never fail. Wherefore let us learn, that God's setting forth of his will at the going of his people out of Egypt, and his speaking to them upon Mount Sinai was after such a sort, as he provided and took order therewithal, that his doctrine should stand in force for evermore. And for that cause did he set downs his Law in two tables of stone, and not write it in barks of trees as the manner of writing was in those days, or (as we might say nowadays) in paper or parchment: but his will was to engrave it in stone as an everlasting monument, to confirm us the better in the things that he had said. For he was not satisfied with the speaking of it for that only day: but by engraving it in stone, his intent was that we all our life long, should give attentive care to hear what he told us. Yet notwithstanding, surely God's engraving of his Law in stone after that sort would serve to small purpose, unless it were also engraved in our hearts. What is to be done then? Let us assure ourselves that the doctrine which God set downs unto us, is be hoofeful and necessary for us, and yet it should stand us in no stead, unless he added a second grace, which is, that the thing which he has uttered be forthwith printed in our hearts and bowels. Then like as God wrote his Law at that time in two tables of stone with his finger, that is to say with his power: so now he mist be fain to write it with his holy spirit in our hearts, which are stony and hard as the prophet shows, where he prays God to give us hearts of flesh, that may be soft, lithe, and pliable to receive whatsoever he shall say. Now then seeing that God has shown us visibly, that it belongs to him to write his Law, that it may be well known: let us beseech him to vouchsafe to write it in us nowadays by the power of his holy spirit, to the end we may hold it fast, as the devil may never wipe it out of our remembrances, do what he can.

And here withal Moses concludes, that the Law was delivered unto him to be the preserver and keeper thereof, and to be the minister and dealer forth of it to the people, so as every man might acknowledge him for a Prophet. For otherwise he could not have executed his office, nor have built God's Church, except men had known that that charge had been committed unto him. Likewise nowadays, if we were not persuaded that it is God's will, that his Gospel should be preached by the mouths of men, and that there should be Shepherds in his Church to bear abroad his word: who would vouchsafe to come together? Neither I, nor any other creature is of ability to train men to come to receive the things that are to be uttered by my mouth. When I speak here in the name of God, and men give care to the doctrine, to submit themselves to it and to do him homage: it is more than all the laws and proclamations of kings and Emperors can do. Is the mortal man the doer thereof? No But when we once know it to be God's will, that this order should be in his Church, and that it should be kept inviolably: namely that there should be shepherds to bear abroad his word and to expound the same, which should be as messengers to bring tidings of the forgiveness of sins in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to rebuke, reprove, comfort, and exhort: when we (I say) do understand it to be God's will, that there should be such government in his Church: then are we ashamed to withstand him that has created and fashioned us. So then, you see now why Moses said in this text, that God delivered him his law for himself. Truth it is that God gave it for all the people in general, as I said before. Why then is Moses now the possessor of it? It should seem that God meant to bereave all his people thereof, and that none should be privileged but Moses, so as the Law should be restrained unto him, and the residue we be as it were shut out from it. But it is not so. For although the Law was given for all the people: yet was Moses made the protector of it. And look what God has spoken of him: we must extend it yet further, accordingly as we hear that the prophets were put in the same commission, to be as it were disposers or dealers forth of the treasure of salvation, and of God's covenant, so as their office was to show God's will from time to time, and to bring us word of it in his name. And the general rule which Saint Paul gives us, is that men must esteem us as God's ministers and as dealers forth of the secretes which he sends to the world. Now whereas Saint Paul says we be dealers forth of God's secretes: he shows us thereby, that it is not enough for us to have the Holy Scripture, and to read it every man at home in his house: but it is required that it should be preached unto us, that we should have this order of being taught by the mouths of men, and that there should be shepherds to serve God's turn, to the end by giving care unto them, we might profit more and more in the doctrine of salvation. And for the same cause does Saint Paul say in another place, that the Church is the pillar of truth, and as it were the ground and standard of the truth. The Papists allege this text full doltishly, to claim privilege to themselves to devise new articles of faith, and to load men with laws at their own pleasure. But Saint Paul meant the clean contrary: For he faith that the Church is the pillar or ground of God's truth, because that seeing God has uttered his truth to men by his Law, and by the Prophets and Apostles: his will is that the same ministry should endure continually, namely that there should be men ordained and appointed to the office of expounding his word, and of building up his Church. Then let us understand, that after that manor the Church is the mean of upholding God's truth found and unappayred. For when God raise up men induced with his spirit, to confirm us in the faith, and to enlighten us, and to show us the right way: by that mean God's truth continues in the world, so as it is not quenched nor utterly done away. Let us mark then that Moses meaning here is not to make himself the only possessor or owner of God's law, and to shake off the people and to shut them out of the gate: but to utter his mind plainly to this effect: my friends, Indeed the Law is common to us all, all of us are God's children, I challenge no more to myself in that behalf than to you: but yet will I discharge myself of the commission that God has given me, which is that I should serve you for a faithful expounder of the Law, and be as a keeper thereof, that you might not thrust it under foot, nor forget it for ever, but always be put in mind of it by met. Since it is so: let all ministers of God's word look that they be ready prepared to serve the ignorant: and let all men consider how it is not for us only to read the Holy Scripture, but we must also be diligent to profit therein, and humbly come to those hearing of those whom he has appointed to be his ministers, to give us the exposition and understanding thereof. Thus you see whereto this text is to be referred.

Now let us kneel downs in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, and to draw us daily to such repentance, as our whole desire may be to serve him and to please him, without seeking any whit of our own will. And that forasmuch as we be so greatly given to worldly things, it may please him to draw us from them, and therewithal to grant that we may submit our life to his will, and frame it to his righteousness, and that for the bringing thereof to pass, his word may so overrule us, as we may be governed by it, and all our whole life be framed thereafter, until that being quite rid of all our fleshly affections, we be clothed again with his heavenly glory, at such time as we shall have no more need, neither of writing nor of preaching. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth and all.

On Wednesday, the 17th of July 1555
The forty third Sermon which is the fourteenth upon the fifth Chapter

23 And when you heard the voice from the midst of darkness: because the Hill burned, you came to me, all the heads of your tribes, and your Elders.

24 Then said you, Behold, the Lord our God has shown us his glory and his greatness, and we have heard his voice from the midst of the fire: This day have we seen that GOD has spoken with man, and man is still alive.

25 Now then: why die we? For if we hear the voice of our Lord God again, this great fire will devour us, and we shall die.

26 For what man is he that may hear the voice of the living God speaking from the midst of the fire as we do, and yet live?

27 Go thou and hear whatsoever the Lord our God shall say, and then tell thou us what the Lord our GOD faith to thee: and we will hear it and do it.

W e be of opinion, that where as God causes his word to be preached unto us by that means of men, if he spoke to us in his own majesty, or sent some Angel to appear unto us, we would be the better touched, and all the world would be converted by and by, and every man obey without gainsaying or rebelling: but we know not what is for our own benefit and behoove. For if we look upon our own frailty: it is not possible that God should make us feel his power, but it should be to our utter undoing and destruction. Now therefore when men are desirous that God should come down from heaven, or manifest himself by some visible token: they know not what they be, nor how frail their state is. For did they well consider it, they would be agast at God's infinite glory, knowing well that they were not able to abide it. Besides this, let us assure ourselves that God tenders our welfare and salvation, in sowing us his will by the mouth of men, when he ordains and appoints them to be ministers of his word, to bring us such message as he knows to be for our benefit. Nevertheless, it was his pleasure to avow it by open proof to men's faces, that it is not good for them to hear his voice thunder from heaven. And that is the cause why he thought good to give forth his law, not simply by Moses, but by coming down in his own person, as I have declared already, and as I told you yesterday that the lightning and whirlwinds, and the flaming of the fire, and all that is written in the nineteenth and twentieth chapters of Exodus, was done every whit of it to the end that the people of Israel should learn to yield reverence to God's word. And this lesson belongs to us also. For God's intent was that the remembrance of those things should endure for ever, and that they should be put in use continually. So then, we see here that God has uttered his glorious majesty once for all, to teach us to receive his word with all reverence and loveliness.

But yet furthermore he intended likewise the people should be driven of themselves to say, It is not good that God should speak to us again. Only let us have a man to bring us the doctrine which it shall please him to send us. And this rule serves to condemn us, if we follows not this people which stepped forth to say so. And if any man allege, that the things which were spoken at that time cannot bind us: The answer is easy, namely that if God should do the Like at this day, that is to wit, if he should speak those things with his own mouth, which we hear at the mouths of men: it were impossible for us to abide his glory, we should be utterly undone. And therefore let us learn that this is rehearsed unto us, to the end that in the person of the people of Israel, we might understand that God applies himself to our slenderness and infinity, and that in vouchsafing to fend us his word, to be preached unto us by men like ourselves, whom he makes his messengers: he has respect to our benefit and commodity: and therefore it proceeds of a foolish and inordinate lust in us, to desire that he should appear to us from heaven, or that he should work any visible miracle: for we cannot comprehend his glory and majesty.

Furthermore although the proper nature of the Law be to fray folk: yet notwithstanding, the same may also be verified of the Gospel. For we must take it for a general rule, that as soon as we perceive God's pretence, we must needs be abashed. We see how the very Angels do hide their eyes, because God's glory is too great for them, and they be driven to confess that they be too feeble, as creatures. And what will become of us then? For we be inferior to the Angels, and besides that, we hold not still the incorruptness of our nature. we be not as we were created: that is to say, we be not earthly men as our father Adam was, but we be utterly corrupted, so as there is nothing but sin in us: and therefore God is fain to be as an enemy to us, and we be fain to shun his throne, as offenders shun the feat of the Judge to the uttermost of their power. To be short, we be but wretched worms and carrions. Now then, look how soon God comes near us, we must need be dismayed, yea and utterly stroke down. And therefore (as I have touched already) it is to our benefit that God shows himself after that fashion: that is to wit, by the means of men, so as he appoints men to show us his will as well as if he spoke himself, and he will have us to receive his word with as great reverence, as if we heard him thundering from heaven. But yet it will be good for us to understand more at large, the thing that I have touched in one word: namely that the Law frays us far more in comparison than the Gospel, as is declared also more at length elsewhere. And why is that? Because that in the Law God requires that which is due to him at men's hands. But now let us see if we be able to discharge ourselves of it. No: but contrariwise we be like wretched deters, which have not one dodkin nor dodkins worth.

Now then we be utterly undone. For whatsoever come of it, God discharges us not, but shows us that we deserve to be cursed and damned at his hand. And for the same cause after he has shown how the life of man ought to be ruled: he adds this curse thundering down upon them: That they be all accursed which perform not all the things that are contained there. As if he should say: All men must be fain to yield themselves guilty in this behalf, and from the greatest to the least they must all know that they be in my danger, and that I may sink the down to the bottom of hell.

I do already pronounce this sentence, and there is no man able to reply against it, Behold then you are all lost and condemned: This is the language of the Law, and the speech that God uses there: and now must not all men need quake at it? Yes. So then it is not said for nought that the Law frays us, and that we must need be forlorn, so long as God lists to demand his due at our hands with rigor. But the case stands not so with the Gospel. For there God bears with us, and not only forgives us our sins, but also writes his Law in our hearts. And moreover although we serve him but by halves: yet does he pardon us our defaults, and as it were wink at them. And Like as a father will not press his child too straightly so does God use a fatherly gentleness towards us in the Gospel, to the intent we should not be afraid to come unto him. In respect whereof the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews, says that we be not come to this smoking mountain, we be not come to Mount Sinai to be astonished at the sight of burning fire, and at the sight of the lightning and of all the other things that were done there to abash the people: but that we hear a gracious and pleasant melody, wherein we be accompanied with the Angels of heaven, with the souls of the holy patriarchs and other fathers that lived under the hope of life, notwithstanding that they had as then but darks shadows of it, and so GOD couples us with those that waited in old time for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Seeing it is so: we must not recoil back, but go still on forward with a cheerful courage to hear our God, because he speaks to us so kindly, and with so fatherly (peach, as cloth not scare away his children, but rather (as you would say) allure them. This difference then is to be marked well, that it may make the Gospel amiable to us in comparison of the Law.

But yet for all this we must come back again to the general principle: which is, that it is much better for us that God's word should be preached unto us by the mouth of men, than that God himself should thunder it down from heaven. And why? For let us but here the natural thunder, and by and by we be astonished, and yet is nothing expressed there, God does but (as you would say) braye with a confused noise. What would come of it then if he should speak to us, and show us his glory? We feel suck a weakness in all our senses that we cannot as much as look upon the sunne which is a corruptible creature: and how then can we behold God's majesty, if it show itself to us plainly and in full perfection? And therefore it is said that no man living can see God, and not die and be utterly consumed Truth it is that God showed himself to Moses, and that, not as he did to the prophets, not in dream nor in vision: but with a special privilege, and (as it is said in Exodus) face to face as a man speaks to his friend, and with to great familiarity, that he was after a sort exempted from the company of men, that he might become the more familiar with God.

But yet for all that, the truth is so that GOD showed himself unto him but in portion and measure. For had he showed himself in his infinite being: what grace of the holy ghost forever Moses had received, he must need have been utterly overwhelmed. Indeed once in his life God showed him his glory more fully than ever he did: but yet for all that, he saw but as it were the back part of him. In the which similitude is expressed unto us, that when we see but the back of a man, we see not the chief part of him, (for the chief sight of a man is in his face:) so although Moses had special familiarity with God, insomuch that in that sovereign sight which was showed him in the mountain, he was separated from the state of this mortal and transitory life, and was as an Angell of paradise: yet notwithstanding he saw God but in part, as if we should see a man but on the back. Therefore let us be contented when God uses the Like order with us: (that is to wit, that his word be preached unto us by men:) and let us receive it as if we saw his majesty face to face. And why? For it is good for us that shepherds are ordained to be ministers of his word, because we should be utterly confounded by the glory of God, if it were manifested to us to the full.

And to the end that no man should have cause to complain as though God's doctrine were not sufficiently ratified, but that it were to be doubted whether a man might hold him to it or no: therefore did he show himself in the letting forth of his Law. And we have record of it here, in that the people say, It is the Lord. This day has he made us to see his glory, and his, greatness: and we have seen that it is even he that has spoken unto us: he has not put any other person in his place, but we have heard his voice with our own ears. This was done but once for all. Howbeit let us take the things that are reported here, to be as a record that Moses spoke not on his own head, nor devised the doctrine of his own brain, which we receive of him: but that he was a faithful steward to Godward, who advice him so to be, and not only ratified his doctrine with miracles, but also declared in his own person, how it was he himself that was the author of the doctrine that Moses taught. And forasmuch as it was good reason that the Gospel should be authorized as well as the Law: we have had record likewise from heaven, that the fame is not a doctrine of man, but that it proceeds of God. And this is the thing which Saint Peter touches in his second Epistle, saying that he and his fellows had heard the voice from heaven, whereby the father proclaimed his son the chief master and teacher of all his Church, saying, this is my well beloved son, hear see him.

Seeing then that this voice has thundered from heaven; God has showed that we must not take the Gospel as a doctrine bred here below; but we must always have the said majesty before our eyes. Likewise nowadays if we will be God's true disciples, we must at our resorting to sermons, remember what Moses rehearses, namely that the Law was given forth in such sort, as God was the speaker thereof. Again in the second place we must add the testimony that I am about to allege so as the foresaid saying of God may ever ring in our ears, whereby he proclaims our Lord Jesus Christ to be the only party whom he will have men to hear. Lo here the perfect feel whereby God's word has full and perfect authority among us as it deserves, notwithstanding that it be brought unto us by mortal men.

Furthermore to the intent that men may not think that Jesus Christ is not to be heard, but only in his own person: he says, he that hears you, hears me, and he that refuses or despises you, despise me, and him that sent me. Indeed the Pope and his champions like a sort of traitors to God, usurp that laying to maintain their own tyranny: but it belongs as much to them as to the devil of hell. And why? for first they should bring us the pure doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ. For the son of God has not resigned his office to men to be spoiled thereof, he will not have us governed after the liking of men: but he himself will always have the preeminence and sovereignty over us that were given unto him. Now then, whereas he says that in hearkening to those whom he sends, we hearken to him: his meaning is, that if we obey the doctrine of his Gospel, without despising of it when it is preached to us by men: it is all one as if he himself spoke to us, and we must not in this case rest upon the outward appearance. And that is it that Saint Paul means in saying, that although we be brittle vessels, yea and as broken vessels of no value nor worthiness: yet the inestimable treasure that is committed unto us, is not that worse or of less estimation and value therefore. True it is that we cannot purchase the word of God such reverence as we fain would. And why? For we have not anything in us (I meant of our own) whereby it may be said that, God should be exalted: but yet must we approve our obedience in this behalf, namely that we deliver God his words with such boldness, courage, and power as if he himself spoke in us. And herewithall let all loftiness be corrected in this case, and let every man receive the doctrine of the Gospel in simplicity, and without disputing or scanning why we be bound to submit ourselves to mortal men. For in as much as it were a despising of God's son, yea and of the heavenly father himself who ordained him to be the chief teacher, if we should not hear those whom he sends as his messengers: it stands us in hand to yield in, that behalf. So then let us learn to bow down our necks and to bear the yoke of God's son by receiving that doctrine of Gospel with all humility, though it be preached unto us by men.

And as I said before, let us think well upon the ratification that was given thereof, which ought to be enough to make us to understand, that the Law was brought from God himself, and that the Gospel also was warranted and ratified from heaven, when God pronounced with his own mouth that he would have us to hearken to his son. That is the effect of the things which we have to remember upon this text. And therefore let us follow the example of those which are spoken of here, and let us not covet that God should come down from heaven to feed our humors: but let it suffice us that he vouchsafes to communicate his word unto us.

But it should seem at the first sight, that here were some contrary. For first the people say, This day have seen how God speaks with men, and that they continue alive still: and afterward they say again: we die if God speak to us. For by all likelihood, if we have once found by experience that God speaks to us without destroying of us it ought to embolden us. And why? For seeing we remain alive still after we have heard the voice of God once: why should we not do so still after twice or thrice, as well as after once? And here the people say, we have heard the voice of God: but if he speak to us again, we dye for it, we be undone, we be forlorn. It seems that they trust not to God's goodness, but rather that they be unthankful, in that they acknowledge not the benefit which God did for them in letting them continue in their strength. But we must mark how the people show here, that they will not try God any further, and that it is enough for them to have had that one experience, that the Law was not a thing invented by man, but that God was the author thereof. Therefore it must be taken as if they had said thus: This day have we seen that God has spoke to men, and they remain still alive: that is enough for us: we intend not to abuse God's patience in this case: he has spared us today, but we must not look he should do so ever: he has given us a try all for this once, and that was because of that, lewdness and hardness of our hearts. For were we worthy to have him appear to us in his glory? No: but he knew we would never be fully tamed and subdued to his obedience, except he had come in his visible glory, and made us so afraid as we had been at our wits end. Therefore if he had not won us so by force, he knew well that we would have been always as wild beasts. But seeing it has pleased him to pardon the fault that we have committed, and to bear with us this time: we will not fall to it again: for that were overmuch: it were a scorning of his patience. So then, this one record suffices us, both for our own lives and for the lives four children, and so forth for ever to the worlds end, that they which come after us may know that, it is not for us to draw God out of heaven any more, as though he ought to be but our mate. Thus you see how these two sayings agree very well.

Now hereupon we have to note, that although God's word be of force to bring us to naught, yet he uses such mercy towards us, that whereas it should consume us, it gives us life. And when I say that, God's word can bring us to naught: I mean not that word alone as Moses describes it here: but also that if our Lord lifts to make us feel the power of his word, it would utterly undo us, notwithstanding that it be uttered by men. Nevertheless we see how our Lord quickens us by his word, specially nowadays by the preaching of his Gospel. For that which is spoken in the fifth of Saint John, is daily accomplished: namely that as many as hear the voice of the Son of man, are restored to life. For naturally we be strangers to God, and banished from his kingdom, and so by that means we be as it were in our graves. But here our Lord Jesus Christ offers us the remission of our sins, and God his father adopts us for his children: and so does he show us the light of salvation, and we be quickened again by means of the Gospel. And therefore we have good cause to glorify our GOD in that he makes his word to settle to deliver us from death and to restore us to life, notwithstanding that it be of power to consume us, at leastwise if he turned it not to the contrary use.

But by the way let us mark well, that if our Lord have at one time given us more than we deserve: we must not therefore take leave to tempt him, and to subdue him still to our lusts, as we see the Papists do nowadays, who excuse themselves of their not coming to the Gospel, because they see no miracles wrought in our time. No surely. But whereto serve the miracles that our Lord Jesus Christ wrought, and which he committed to his Apostles to do likewise? Should those serve to no purpose at this day? You see then that God uttered an excellent power at the first coming up of those Gospel: heaven and earth were Shaken at that time: there was no part of the world wherein God printed not some mark of his Majesty, to the intent that those Gospel should be authorized. The Angels came down at the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ to bear witness of him: the Sun was darkened at his death: the Vaile of the temple was rent asunder to show that the sanctuary was opened, and that there was more free access to God till ever there had been: the sea was calmed: the devils themselves did homage to the glory of God which was uttered at that time: and to be Short, GOD showed both from above and beneath, that the Gospel came from him, (as I have told you already,) as well by the healing of diseases, as by all the other miracles that were wrought. And this served not for that time only, but the remembrance thereof continues unto this day, and it behooves us to receive that record to seal up our faith withal, to the end we may not doubt, but that our Lord makes his Gospel of as great force by them at this day, as he did at the same time that they were showed. Yet notwithstanding we see how the faithless do still allege, that is they saw miracles, it would convert them. But it is certain that if they saw never so many miracles, yet would they continue in their stubbornness, and take occasion of greater rancor against God. What is to be Boone then? Let us learn to be contented, as I said before. If God have given us more than he owed us, let us receive it with thanksgiving, and learn not to provoke him to wrath nor to tempt his patience that is the thing which we have to remember in this text, where the people says, let not the Lord speak to us any more, for it suffices us that we have heard his voice once already, and that yet notwithstanding, he has let us live still.

And to the end that the things which I have declared heretofore may be the certain: let us bear in mind how it is said here, Was there ever man that heard the voice of the living God, and continued still alive? Here it is showed us that the people of Israel speak not in their name only: but as it were for all mankind in common; They say not only, who are we, but what is all flesh? And indeed, (as I said at the first,) it must needs be that men are besotted, when they cannot humble themselves. For they need no more but to look to their own state and to say, what are we? There is nothing neither in) our bodies nor in our souls, but all manner of frailty, (I mean not, as we may be considered out nature as we were first created:) But now being fallen as we be, what are we but as water that glides away, and as a smoke that vanishes away? Nay, which worn is, we be enemies to god, and he must needs be against us, because he finds nothing in us but sin and forwardness. And therefore when we be tickled with our fond lusts, so as we would fain that God should work miracles, and that we might hear Angels from heaven: let us repair to that which is told us here, and say, What is all flesh? Let us (say I) enter into consideration to see what we be: and our own inability will teach us sufficiently, to praise God for not making us to feel his presence to consume us and confound us: but to make us feel it in such wise as it may draw us to him with amiable gentleness, by hearing me like ourselves, and our own brethren speaking) as it were in his person,

And whereas the people of Israel say, What people is it that ever heard the voice of the living God, and continues still alive, as we have done: it is to show that this deed of his should not be drawn into a common example, [so as others should look to have him do the like.] And therefore let us not say, why does not GOD speak to us nowadays after a visible manner, as he did upon Mount Sinai? It pleased him so to do: but it is not for us to load him with any law, or to bind him to do still as he has done once heretofore. Therefore (as I said erst) let us not abuse God's grace, neither let us fall to disputing with him, to say seeing that God did so at other times, why should he not do that like nowadays? For when men announce themselves after that fashion, it is a devilish presumption. Wherefore let us yield God so much honor, as to give him leave to manifest himself to us as he himself lifts, and as he knows to be expedient, and let us not bind him to any necessity, under color that he has vouchsafed to show some special favor at some time before. Let not us threape upon him to do the like again, but let us be contented with his single will, for it becomes us to be subject thereunto.

In the end it is said, Go thou to God and Bear what he will say to thee, and bring us word thereof, and we will hear it and do it. Hear we see first, that the people desires Moses to be their Spokesman, and to bring them word what he receives at God's hand. Now this is written for us, that all men should submit themselves to the order that GOD has set in his Church. For (as I have said before) his will is to speak to us by the mouths of men. That is the cause why he would there should be Ministers. It was not devised by men: but our Lord Jesus Christ has told us that he will have that kind of government in his Church. Now then, that there should be shepherds in the Church, to preach godly doctrine, which it behooves us to receive for our own salvation: it is an inviolable ordinance, and such a one as proceeds from GOD. Since it is so let no man strive against it, but let us bear it patiently, and when GOD raises up men to serve him, in bringing us the message of salvation: let us not grudge that every of us has not the same preeminence: for it is his will that his body (that is to say his Church) should be governed after that fashion. You see then that the thing which we have to gather upon this text, is, that seeing God has ordained Ministers of his word, we must hearken to them quietly, and not bear any spite or malice in our hearts, though all of us be not teachers, nor put in that office by GOD: for we must yield ourselves to his will as I have told you before. Let that serve for one point.

But by the way, let us mark also with what condition we must have shepherds. For this text teaches us to discern between the deceivers that abuse God's name falsely, by taking upon them; title of prelates without cause or reason: and the true Prophets, the good servants of God, and the Ministers of the Gospel. The Pope and his entire rabble will surely say that men ought to hearken unto them, and to receive their doctrine out gainsaying. And why so? Because it is God's will there should be prelates in the Church, and that men should hear them and obey them. All this is true. But yet for all that has he set up the title of Prelacy without discretion? No, but he has also declared therewithal, that he himself will continue chief still, so as we must obey him, and not be in bondage unto men. Seeing it is so, we must consider what manner of Prelates and teachers God sends us. And that is, (according to the contents of this text); they must hearken what God (ayes unto them, and afterward report the same faithfully to the people. Therefore they that are desirous to be heard in God's name, and will have their doctrine received reverently: must first hearken unto God, so as they take not upon them to add anything to his word, but yield themselves teachable unto him. And when they have learned at his hand: let them deal forth the things to others, which they have 'Teemed. For no man shall ever be a good Minister of God's word, unless he be a scholar first, so as he take not upon him as a Master over other men, to tell them what he lifts. And a man must not be over wise in this case: for God reserves to himself the office of appointing what things he will have us to know. It is not said here simply, Hearken what the Lord will say to thee, and then come and bring us word: but it is said, Hearken unto all the Lord shall say unto thee, so as there be not one point nor one article omitted. By means whereof Moses is restrained of all liberty here, and not permitted to report anything, but that which God commands him, as we have seen already in other places. And 1 what are now these rascals, that dare announce themselves above Moses? We shall see in the end of this book, that there was never any Prophet raised up with such grace. And indeed, although we see there was a wonderful spirit in Esay, and in all the rest of the Prophets: yet is Moses preferred before them all. Whereas it is said, be mindful of the Law that was given you in Horeb: Malachi which spoke last of all the Prophets, does notwithstanding refer all to Moses, as if he had been the first teacher, and as though the law were the fountain from whence we ought to draw all things. Now seeing that Moses being so greatly preferred, and having so excellent preeminence given him of God, might not for all, take upon him to speak aught of his own head, but was bound to deal forth the things faithfully to the people, as he had heard them of God: is it not too devilish a pride nowadays, that lewd losels should advance themselves so far as to say, that it is in their power to lay laws upon men's consciences, and to bind them under pain of deadly sin? Is it not too barbarous a tyranny? Therefore to the end we fall not into the two extreme vices: let us hold the mean way that is showed us here: which is, that since it is God's will to have his Church governed by the outward preaching of his word: every of us must submit himself thereto, and be diligent in hearing of Sermons, and hold this as a holy and reverent order: to wit: that we should be taught by the mouth of men. And yet in the meanwhile, men must not have authority to bring us what they list, but they must be faithful dealers forth of ' God's word, so as we may ever be able to protest, that our faith is grounded upon God's will, and that we depend not upon the wisdom of men, but that our Lord holds us so in obedience toward him, as we may say that we Hear him from heaven, though he use the mean and travel of men in the doing thereof.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may learn to dislike more and more of ourselves for them. And for as much as the very remedy to rid us from all our diseases and corruptions, is to Hear his holy word: it may please him so to open our ears, as we may receive it with all reverence and humility, and so print it in our hearts, as we may make it avail to the use for which he ordained it, namely to quicken us and to draw us to salvation, that we may desire it with all our hearts, and apply our endeavor thereunto more and more. And therefore let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, and all.

On Thursday, the 18th of July 1555
The forty fourth Sermon which is the fifteenth and last upon the fifth Chapter

28 At the same time the Lord heard the voice of your words when you spoke to me: whereupon the Lord said to me, I have heard the voice of these peoples' words which they have spoken unto you: all that they have said is good.

29 I would they had such heart to fear me, and to keep my commandments always, that it might go well with them and with their children for ever.

30 Go say unto them, Return you into your tents.

31 But as for thee, tarie you here with me, and I will tell you all the commandments, Ordinances and Laws which you shall teach them, that they may do them in the land which I give them to possess.

32 Therefore see that you do as the Lord your God has commanded you. You shall not bow aside to the right hand nor to the left:

33 But walk in all the ways which the Lord your God has commanded you, that you may live, and that it may be well with you, and that your days may be lengthened in the land which you shall possess

According to that which was declared yesterday, God in this text shows that he grants the peoples' request, and gives them the choice of that which should be best for chem. And hereby we see, that he meant to make the people to feel his goodness, of purpose to win them the better. True it is that he might justly subdue us to him by authority, and he could do it: but he had much lever to deal with us by fatherly gentleness. That then is the cause why he showed himself agreeable to the people. Therefore let us mark well, that God has such regard of our well doing and welfare, as if the choice were in our own hands, we could not with better than he does. It seems not so at all times: but yet is it so indeed. Furthermore he adds that he granted not the peoples desire in any other respect, than for that he himself liked of it. For now and then God grants men their requests, howbeit, it is for their importunateness sake, and the thing turns to their condemnation. As for example, when the people were desirous to eat flesh, it is true that they had their fill of it: but they paid right dear for their shot, for they spited God by their willful desiring of the thing that was withheld from them. Nevertheless it is true that God did fully satisfy the murmurers, so as they had wherewith to fill their bellies: but it had been much better for them to have starved for hunger. But it is not so in this request whereof Moses speaks here: for GOD says expressly, That they meant rightly. As if he should say, keep that course still, and you shall see how I will pleasure you. You have desired that you might have a man to speak to you in my name, and I am contented with it. Now then it ought to persuade you the more, to receive the doctrine that shall be preached unto you from me, on my behalf, for as much as I have done it at your desire and choice. But yet you must not think that I meant to please you without reason or cause why. For I assure you, all things shall go well with you, if you keep on this course of profiting in my word, so as whensoever Moses shall come unto you of my sending you give reverent care to the things that he shall tell you for your welfare. And so let us mark well, that when God's word is preached unto us by men, they do it not upon their own head, but because GOD has given us here the doctrine that is for our benefice. And this ought to settle us the better, that we be not moved with any fond affection, to change as our manner is, to delight always too much in Novelties, Let us understand that the thing whereunto we must hold ourselves, is that we must give care to the preaching of God's word, all the time of our life. And why? For it is not only his will that we should do so: but also he shows us that it is for our behoove.

Besides this, GOD wakens the people here, to the end they should think better upon the keeping of the commandments of his Law, than they had done. For the people had said, we will do it. And says God on his side, who will give them the heart to do it, and who will give them such disposition of mind? And by those words he cloth us to wit, that it was an easy matter for them to promise, as men commonly make great protestations with full mouth, but when it comes to the performance they show well that their promising was at adventure, God therefore to make the people perceive how hard a matter it is to keep the Law, says here, I would fain it were so. For the Hebrew word which he uses where he says, who will give the heart, imports as much as when we say, be it so: I would fain it were so. True it is that here God speaks after the manner of men: for he needs no more but wish things done, all things are in his hand. And therefore it might be replied, Lord it belongs to you, and ask thou who shall give them the heart? To whom belongs that to do? Man of himself will never incline to good, but he must be driven to it by some other means, and that can no creature do, but it is your spirit that must do it. Now then seek not thou who shall give them the heart, but let the power of thy spirit utter itself, and then shall they do it.

Likewise we shall see how God will say, I will give you a heart to fear me. If it were in us, why should he say so? But he says that it belongs to him to do it, like as he adds by the Prophet, I will give them a heart to obey me. As much shall we see hereafter, where he says, I will cause them to keep my commandments. God then challenges to himself the instructing of men, and the governing of them by his Holy Ghost, to the intent they should be subject unto him, and submit themselves to his righteousness. And why then both he pretend to wish it in this text? It is because he speaks after the manner of men, as he does in many other places. And (as I said before) it is to the end that when there is any mention made of walking in obedience to God-ward, we should understand that it cannot be done without hardness, and that our wits should be awakened to apply ourselves earnestly to that study. Therefore whereas men promise unadvisedly, that they will work wonders in obeying God and in keeping his Law: let us understand that we must examine our own ability, and then we shall find that there is nothing but all manner of weakness in us. So far off are we from being able to perform all that is commanded us: that we know not at which end to begin. Nay, we have not the skill to conceive one good thought, until God have reformed us, drawn us to him, given us the mind, and thereunto added ability to put our desires in execution, Thus you see what is meant by this saying, And who shall give the heart? or I would it were so.

Hereby we be warned to take heed, that we presume not upon our own strength, to be too bold. For when we bear ourselves in hand that we can do all things, it is the cause of our ruin. And God does justly laugh such overweening to scorn. But let us learn to feel that we can do nothing: and that although we be bound to fulfill all that ever God commands us: yet it follows not therefore that we be able to do it, but rather that we be utterly unable. Neither is it so small and common a matter to love God with all our heart, with all our mind; and with all our power, as if we needed no more but to say, yea, I will go about it out of hand: but it is a thing that passes all that is in man. When we once know that the law contained too high a righteousness for us to attain unto, and that we on our part are so weak as is pity to see: then will we learn to sigh before God, and consider well that we be bound to do whatsoever he appoints, but yet we will crave power at his hand, that it may please him to help us with his holy spirit, and not only supply our frailty, but also be the beginner and performer of all things in us, so as he make us willing, and confirm us in that willingness, and with that constancy match also power to accomplish our desires.

intent to be joined unto us, and that we also should be united unto him: so as he requires nothing but obedience, that we might be his children, and he shows himself to be our father. And so God's intent in causing his word to be preached unto us, is to gather us as it were under his wings, that we may be defended and saved, yea verily so we come unto him quietly, and suffer ourselves to be ruled by his word, and be subject thereunto. But it is true (as I said before) that it is not in our own power to do this, but God must give us that grace, and he gives it not to all men. Nevertheless it is not for us to be inquisitive of God's secrete purpose in that behalf, why he reforms the one sort by his Holy Spirit, and lets the other sort go on still in their corruption, without bringing of them back. We must not enter into that maze: but it must suffice us that God lifts to make men inexcusable, in saying, I would fain it were so. As if he should say that after we have once been taught by his word, we have no more excuse: God is not to blame if we be not saved. Why so? For we shall perceive that to walk as he has commanded us, is the way to attain to all goodness. And therefore let us lay the blame of all our miseries [upon ourselves:] and if God afflict us and punish us with adversity, let us understand that we have no cause to grudge or complain of him, for we be faulty, because we have not followed his law. That is the thing in effect, which we have to mark upon this text. Yet notwithstanding, it is true that we must have recourse to his aid, knowing that we of ourselves are too weak to perform his law, in so much that we be never able to come at it, no nor anything near it. But yet if we live not as becomes us, we must always yield ourselves guilty, knowing that the fault remains in ourselves, so as if God do beat us with his rod, we can not say it is undeserved on our part. For why? Seeing we have God's word, we have matter of record that he is desirous to be atone with us, and to do the duty of a father, and to maintain us in all prosperity, if we bury not his grace, nor withhold the thing that is due on our part. You see then that men are justly convicted and condemned for refusing God's grace, and for shutting oor against him, in that they profited not in his word when they were taught it. And so it is a very profitable warning for us, when we see in this text how God wishes that we should do the things that he commands us, to the intent it might go well with us. Whereby we see that if we receive the doctrine with humility, and desire to obey it, the end there of cannot be but happy, so as we shall be sure of our salvation. Howbeit we must always come back to this point, that we pray to God to give us hearts (for it belongs to him to do that): and yet if we do amiss, we must learn to condemn ourselves, that he may acquit us.

On the other side let us rejoyce inasmuch as we see how he procures our salvation, and intends the furtherance thereof, as oft as his word is preached unto us. And let us remember how it is said in Salmons proverbs, That it is the delight and pleasure of God's wisdom to dwell among men. See here how God vows, that his sending of his word unto us, is to teach us the full perfection of wisdom as if he should send his own wisdom from heaven. Yea, and to what end Wisdom is brought in their saying thus, All my delight is to dwell among men. And that is as much as if God should open his heart and say, Behold, my teaching of men by my word, is of purpose to bind myself to them with a Holy band. And if they on their side be not stubborn, they shall perceive that I will always be among them without departing from them at any time. This ought to inflame us greatly with a reverence to God's word, so as we may seek to profit in it, and never suffer ourselves to be turned from it, forasmuch as it brings inestimable benefit unto us, namely that our Lord unites himself unto us thereby.

Now it follows in Moses' text, that God commands the people to go every man to his tent, and Moses to tarry there still: and then he adds, I will show unto thee all the commandments, statutes, and ordinances which thou must teach to all the people. Here God shows again, that he ceases not to continue his teaching of the people, though he use the fore declared means, that is to wit, though he make Moses as it were the utterer of his will, and the bearer of his message. This is to be marked well: for it serves to make us know, that God intends to hold us always to himself, and will not have our faith grounded upon men, nor to depend upon them: And that is a very requisite thing. Truly as for them that follows their own good intents, or say they hold the things that have been determined by the Church, or by the ancient fathers: they may many times be grossly deceived. And if a man tell them they do but as it were hang in the air, and have no certainty in being so wedded unto men: they be willful in their own opinions, as we see the Papists are, whom the devil has so bewitched, that they content themselves with the resolutions made by men, and boldly despise the word of God.

Insomuch that if man bring record from thence, to reprove their superstitions: they be at a full point, for they be so doted that they regard not to have God against them. Men then may well for a time have this over lustiness of running boldly whithersoever their foolish imagination carries them, and they may harden themselves against God: but when it comes to the very push, they be so dismayed as they were not where to become. And therefore let us note that we shall never have any sure and long lasting stay, unless our faith be grounded upon God's word, and that we be able to say, that look whatsoever we have we hold it of him, and that it is the very truth, so as we wander not in our own imagination, nor take the doctrine of men for our stay. And whereas we hear God say in this text, I will tell the things which thou must teach: Let us mark that we like wise must rest wholly upon him and upon his infallible truth, that our faith may not be wavering and doubtful And the thing which we have to seek when we come to sermons, is to have this point well warranted and sealed in our consciences, namely that we have God's word wherein lies our life.

And herewithall let us mark also, that God meant to hold; the preachers of his word in such awe, as they should not presume to put forth anything of their own, but be contented to be faithful setters forth of the things that he commands, so as they may always protest, that they have served god in executing his commandment, and in delivering it forth from hand to hand. This is a thing which we have to mark, we (I say) whom God has appointed his ministers to preach his word and to whom he has committed the office of teaching namely that we add not aught of our own devising, but deliver the thing simply which we know to be proceeded from God.

And to the end that folk should know that God meant not to teach them by halves: he rehearses the thing again which we have seen heretofore namely his statutes, ordinances, commandments and Ceremonies. As if he should say there wants not anything in his doctrine, neither ought the people to covet anything more. This has been declared more at large already. Notwithstanding, whensoever God uses such diversity of words to us, whereas he might say in one word the Lowe: let us mark, that it serves to restrain men the better from fond curiosity of adding anything to his law, as the thing which we see we be too much given unto by nature forasmuch as our flesh provokes us continually to invent, I know not what new thing. And that is the cause why in popery every man has adventured to cast to his collup, and to make so many laws one upon another. For why? They thought it not enough to live plainly according to God's word, but that it would be good to add still some mingle mangle. But contrariwise God tells us that if we have his law, we have statutes, commandments, ordinances and rites now: as if he should say that, mortal men ought not to stand so much in their own conceits, as to go go about to be wiser than he. For when they have made never so large discourses, yet can they not amend any part [of his doings] nor add anything to them, but whatsoever they put too further of their own, it shall be not only superfluous and unprofitable: but also a marring to all the rest, as if a man should mingle vinegar with good wine.

And now God having spoken after that manner, adds that they should take good heed that they kept the thing, which he commanded them, without bowing to the right hand or to the left. Here our Lord shows us again, that the honoring of his Law which he requires at our hands, must not be an only allowing of it with our mouths, after which manner we would fain discharge ourselves thereof: but he tells us that his giving of it forth, is to hold us in his subjection and service, and that to the same end he will have it preached still at this day. For thereby he intends to try whether he can wield us as quiet people that submit themselves to him. Therefore let us mark, that our resorting unto sermons must not be to commend the doctrine for good and holy: for God shall be much beholden to us for laying that his word is worthy to be received: he will not have us to be his judges. It is true that we owe him that acknowledgement, so as when we have heard his word, every of us ought to confess it to be the pure truth, and that there is none other rightness, righteousness, nor wisdom than is contained there. But yet must we pass further therewithal, and yield ourselves to the serving of our God. That is one point which we have to gather upon this text. Another point is that we must beware that we keep it. Wherein God shows that we must apply all our strength earnestly in that behalf. For men shall never follow God by sleeping. Although they enforce themselves never so, much, yet the infirmity of their nature is such, as they can hardly keep their feet. Therefore let us not think that we can discharge ourselves to Godward without taking of pain. For the thing is too hard considering what we be, namely slow and sluggish to good things, yea even though God have already made us willing, and do govern us by his Holy Spirit. And if he let us alone as we be of ourselves, we shall not only be slow, but also draw clean back from his will. If he call us to him, we shall go from him: yea and we shall be so little able to covet any good at all: that we shall be enforced to do evil. But let us mark what I have touched before, namely that although our Lord have given us some good disposition of mind, and set us in some good forwardness: yet are we slothful still, and when we should step one pace forth, whereas the same should be done in less than a minute of an hour, we must have a whole hour to do it in. Nay we fall to kicking, or else by that time that we have gone one pace, many times we stumble, or retire back, or else take such foul falls as is piteous to see. Therefore it is not for naught that God says here Take heed that you do them. As if he should say, indeed my law is given you to the intent you should put it in execution and obey it: but yet think not you that it is so easy a matter to be done. What is to be done then? Prepare yourselves to walk after my commandments, think upon them, put to your endeavor, be diligent therein, take a taste and favor of them, keep good watch for fear of being turned away, and take very good heed to yourselves. Thus we see in effect, that our Lord exhorts us here to labor earnestly, when the case stands upon walking in obedience towards him. And why? For the things that he requires of us are not so easy to be done. And besides that, we be so ill disposed thereunto, as is pity to see: insomuch that if we be not spurred and driven by force, we cannot go forward. Therefore it stands us in hand to awake, and to take heed, and to stand continually upon our garde, that we may perform those things that our Lord has commanded us. Now afterward he adds, that this must be done without bowing to the right hand or to the left so as men walk throughout in the way that he has showed them. Indeed this text shall be expounded more at length in the twelfth chapter: but yet must we not pass it over without knowing what God meant by it. In forbidding us to bow to the right hand or to the left, he shows us that he will have us to listen to him in all things without exception. And this imports two things: namely that we must neither put anything to his law, nor take anything from it. As concerning putting to, it is as if we would go to the right hand: for they add to God's law, do it upon an imagination that he keeping of the things contained there, is not all that they have to do, and therefore it is good to put somewhat more to it. Lo how men would give place to their own fancies, so as if anything come in their heads, they think that God forget that, and that it were good to be done. And that was the very cause of the great number of ordinances, laws, and ceremonies that are set up in popery. The Jews had the like vice among them, according as they be blamed for despising of God's commandments and statutes for their own tradition's sakes. Now then, let us keep us from walking on the right hand, so as we should turn from the way which God has showed us. And why? For the right hand is when we will need be too wise and too righteous, bearing ourselves in hand that it is good for us to do more than we be commanded. But in so doing we be the devil's servants, for God utterly refuses all that ever we add to his word: he will have no such mingling.

And we decline or bow to the left hand, when we diminish God's word, that is to say, when we be contented to serve him by halves, and therewithal would have him to give us leave to follow our own lusts. Some man peradventure is not subject to some vices: and well could he find in his heart to discharge his duty to Godward in serving him so far forth: but forasmuch as he cannot overmaster himself in some other vices, he would have God to hold himself contented, and to enter into a bargain with him as if he should say, very well, if I fail in this behalf I will recompense it in another. But let us keep ourselves from walking on the left hand, that is to say, from taking anything away from God's word. For as he has forbidden to murder: so has he also forbidden to steal and to commit adultery: and therefore we must submit ourselves to his commandments in all points and all respects without making of any reply there to. For as we must not

And whereas he terms it a way, it is to the end to exhort us to keep us in it, according as we shall see in the end of this book, where Moses will say, This is the way, walk therein. As if he should say, whosoever turns away from the doctrine that I set before you, goes astray, he Both but run gadding over the fields, and yet for all that he comes never the nearer his ways end, but rather is still further and further from it. Therefore in this place, wake in the way is as much to say, as wander not ye wretches willfully, go not affray. Since your God is your guide, you cannot go amiss in following him. But if you follow your own head: in the end God must be fain to show you, that you shall be no better than stray beasts, and that you have not held the right way. Know you therefore that God's doctrine is your way. If this saying were well printed in our minds, we should be held so in awe, as our itching appetites should not be able to make us run astray as we do, but our life should be restrained by it. For God shows us daily which is the way, and yet notwithstanding men dispute and make much questioning with What is to be done? and what is to be done? Verily as who should say it were not told us, that God never opens his mouth, but it is to show us the right way. And seeing he shows it us, do not we offer him wrong and injury if we follow it Do we not blame him as though he had lost his time and travel about us? Now we see what this word way imports that is to wit, that out of God's doctrine there is nothing but error and deceit, and that men beguile themselves when they think they do well, further forth than when they suffer themselves to be ruled by God's word, which shows us the good and right way.

And he says purposely, all the ways. For he intends not to make such a parting of stakes in this behalf, as men would that he should, so as they would fain reserve somewhat always to themselves. Here God says contrariwise, either you must obey me throughout in all pointes, or else I renounce you. So then, are we desirous to make our life allowable to God? We must not be obedient unto him in part, but we must look that all our whole life be framed according to his commandments, so as we may say we have kept all ways. But here it might be demanded, whether it be possible for us to walk throughout in the way of the Lord. For on the contrary part, seeing that men do not the good which they fain would: it is much for us if we shall have endeavored to come to the good way, and to go towards the end, though we be not come at it. S. Paul himself complains that he was not able to do as he would in the discharge of his duty towards God. Here is no speaking of such perfection as is required by the Law:

but we must only understand that God will have men to yield and give over themselves unto him, and enforce themselves to run thitherward though they attain not to the mark. Although then that we do as it were drag our legs after us in our going all our lifelong, and never come fully unto God: yet must we keep on to himward, and that not in part, but in all the things that are contained in the law. Truth it is that we cannot so discharge ourselves, as there may be a full answerableness betwixt God's word and our lives: but if we be desirous to submit ourselves unto God, and to frame ourselves thereafter, not in some one point but in all without exception, endeavoring the same to the uttermost of our power: it is as a keeping of all the ways of God. For he bears with us and takes such willingness in good worth, when he sees us go to it roundly, and that we be not double minded, nor desirous to reserve any piece of our own wills or to take leave to do them, but labor [and strive to the contrary] as much as in us lies, according to the grace that is given us.

Now hereunto he adds also, That they may prosper, and that it may go well with them and with their children. Whereof he shows, (as I have touched already) that all the miseries and grieves which we endure in this world, are chastisements for our sins. And we cannot wite our unhappiness upon anything else than our own faults: True it is that every man covets to live at ease and in prosperity: we need no teaching to desire that: for our own nature leads us thereunto. But in the meanwhile it should seem that we have conspired our own mischief. For those mean of prosperity is to obey our God. And then will he bless us in such sort, as we shall feel the fruits of his grace and favor in all respects. But what? We be loth to yield him his due obedience and therefore must we also be bereft of his blessing, and rejected as unworthy to be of the number of his creatures. And so let us mark that here our Lord went to rebuke men, and to show them that they themselves are to be blamed for all the adversities and miseries which they endure in this world, and that they must wait the same upon their sins. But yet moreover he meant therewith to draw his own to him, by setting the reward before them. As if he should say, Go to, I deserve well to be served at your hand without looking for anything at my hand for it: for seeing you be my creatures, is it not reason that you should be subject to me? Ought not all your life to be given unto me? Yes: but yet intend not I that you shall serve me for naught, I will forbear mine own right, which is that you should be bound to do whatsoever I command you, without looking for anything: and I tell you that I am ready to bless you, and to make you to prosper if you serve me. Our Lord then in saying so, shows that his meaning is to win his servants to him by gentleness and as it were were to break their harts, that they may be the willinger to serve him, seeing he goes not to work with such rigor as he might, but forbears his right, and rather plays the father, telling us that if we behave ourselves like children towards him, he will be gracious and liberal towards us, and although he owe us not anything, yet will he not fail to reward us for the service that we yield unto him.

Hereby we be warned that God's intent is to draw us unto him, but yet must we not inferred thereupon, that men can deserve anything in serving of God, as the Papists do, who when they hear such texts do by and by fall to their merits and bear themselves on hand that God is beholden to them therefore. But contrariwise God's meaning is to show us that he is ready to apply himself to us after the manner of men, so as he seeks nothing else but to induce us to obey him. And that is not for any benefice to himself: for what profit can he receive by us, though we should perform his whole Law? Should that advantage him anything at all? No. You see then where at God ameth, and what we have to mark upon this sentence. Wherefore let us learn, that if we have obeyed our God, and he make us to prosper: it is not for that he owes us anything, or for that we have deserved aught, and can boast that he recompenses our deserts: but because it pleases him to utter his free goodness so far forth unto us, as to term that thing a wages, [hire, or recompense], which he gives us of his owns only free liberality, without being bound anything at all thereunto. Again, when he chastises us, and we be distressed with many miseries: let us allure ourselves that we reap the fruits of our own seed: and because we have lived amiss, our Lord also must be fain to give us some sign of his wrath, to the end that he may be known to be the judge of the world. But yet has he also a regard of our welfare, namely to dislike of our faults and to be sorry for them, and to resort to him by true repentance. Thus you see that God in showing of himself angry with us ceases not to utter his love towards us. For he endeavors to bring us home to himself thereby. He sees that we be false asleep in our sins, and he wakens us, as one knowing it to be expedient for us so to be. That is the thing which we have to mark upon this place.

Now in the end Moses speaks of the land, and faith: That thou must prosper in the land which I will give thee: and afterward he sets down this Laying again, That it may go well with you in the land which you must possess. Now it seems here at the first sight, that God promises none other reward than in this earthly and transitory life. And if it had been so, then had the hope of the children of Israel been quite dashed. But we must note that our Lord used another manner of dealing towards that people, than he does towards us, though they tend both to one end. For the sacrifices that were ordained by the law, served not to draw the people away from the salvation which we have in Jesus Christ: but rather to lead them to it: so as God's mind was to do men to understand, that they were condemned, and that there was none other mean of reconciliation, but by the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. But yet in the meanwhile men ceased not to kill brute beasts, and God said unto them, your sins shall be forgiven you when you shall have offered me a Calf, a Lamb, or a Sheep. It should seem by this, that God meant to set the remission of sins in the sacrificing of brute beasts. But he did not so. That was done to lead the people after that gross manner to the redemption that was at the length purchased for us by our Lord Jesus Christ's own person. In like case is it with the land of Chanaan. For first of all God's will was to set forth the everlasting heritage of salvation to the children of Abraham, in saying to Abraham, I am thy large reward. He promises not Abraham the land as though he would have him to stay himself there, but willed him to put his whole trust in him, and to raise up himself above the worlds, and to look for the heavenly life both for himself and for his offspring. Howbeit forasmuch as our Lord Jesus Christ was not yet come, nor the veil of the temple was not as yet broken, I say it was meet that the Land of Chanaan should be as a pledge of it, because it was fully beghighted him for an inheritance. Then let us mark well, that where as God says, that thou must prosper in the land: is intent is not that his people should set their minds upon this present life, but to guide them higher by that mean, namely to the hope of the immortality which he had promised them. Nevertheless our Lord promises his blessing in such sort to his people, as they shall feel it even in this world and have some taste of it here, in waiting for the discovery of the full enjoyment thereof, at such time as they shall be taken out of the world. And even at this day also we must bethink us of this text of Saint Paul, that if we fear God, we shall have the promises both of the life present and of the life to come. For God will make us to feel his goodness in this world, to the end to draw us up higher, and to teach us so to receive his benefits here, as we may look to have our fill of them when we be come to his kingdom, where we shall have the whole fullness of them.

Now let us fall down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, even till they have draw even to true repentance, and that we acknowledging our wretchedness more and more may lead to strive against all the affections of our flesh, and against all our Wicked and forward lusts, and moreover to withstand the cursed presumptuousness that is in us which also would have us to do that which we ourselves best like of, so as nothing may stay us from following the pure and simple word of our God, assuring ourselves that it is the true and perfect rule whereunto we must submit ourselves, and that we must not attempt to add anything to it, but simply rest upon that which is contained there, and go forward more more and more therein, until that having finished this earthly race, we be come to the heavenly rest whereunto he calls us. And let us pray him to reach us his hand in the meanwhile, whensoever we seek him and call upon him in our need. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, and all.

On Friday, the 19th of July 1555

The forty fifth Sermon, which is the first upon the sixth Chapter

THese are the Commandments, Ordinances and Laws which the Lord your God commanded me to teach you: to the end that you should do them in the Land whereinto you shall enter to possess it.

2 That thou must fear the Lord thy God, in keeping all his ordinances and commandments which I command thee, all the days of thy life, both thou and thy children and thy children's children, that thy days may be prolonged.

3 Hearken therefore O Israel and take heed that thou do them, that it may go well with thee, and that thou must be mightily multiplied in the land that flows with milk and honey, as the Lord God of thy fathers has said unto thee.

4 Hear O Israel, the Lord our God is the only Lord.

E have seen oft heretofore how Moses spoke to the people concerning the contents of the law: yea and even yesterday we saw that he made mention thereof: and here we see the like again. And yet for all that, it is not a needless repetition, considering how soon men forget the things they have learned of God, if they be not put in mind of them: and we know that we need not anything to turn us away from them. For we be so given to vanity, that nothing is harder to us, than to hold ourselves in obedience unto God. As soon as any toy takes us in the heade, it carries us away, and we mind no more what God had said unto us. Again forasmuch as he is very desirous to win us to him: he must be fain to pluck up the false opinions by the root, wherewith we be overgrown beforehand. For when a ground is bushy, it will ask much labor before it can be put to any use: and even so is it with us. And that is the cause why Moses says again, that these are the commandments, statutes and ordinances which the Lord committed to him, to give them forth to the people, that they might be kept. Now by these words he gives an inkling, that God's intent is to hold the people under his obedience. What mean you wretched folks to go astray after that fashion? I give you my Law: and having that doctrine you cannot go amiss: it is the way of salvation, and therefore hold you to it. But yet for all this, men are fickle and fleeting to and fro: and God o reigns them with a strong bit: like as when a horse is hard to be ruled, he is fain to be reigned back more than once, and if he fling out and will not suffer himself to be handled, the rider is fain to rein him straight again and again. After the same manner does God deal with his people? And thereby he shows that man's mind is full of stubbornness, or else of lightness, so as he cannot rest upon God's word, wherein notwithstanding lies our whole salvation and welfare. Since it is so: let us mark that in the person of the people of Israel, we be warned here, that when God sets his word before us, we must not only mind it for one day, but we must exercise us in it all the days of our life, and we must always have this laying before our eyes, these are the Statutes, there are the Ordinances, these are the Commandments, so as it is not for us to frame rules and Laws wherewith to govern our life, forasmuch as that authority belongs only to God.

Besides this we be also put in mind, that God has showed us the right way. Therefore let us follow it, and not stand questioning what we have to do. For there is no more cause of doubt when our Lord has once spoken we must not any more allege, I cannot tell whether it be good, I wote not whether I need to do more or no: butler us be contented with that which God has showed us. For he will always be a good schoolmaster unto us, if we be not evil scholars unto him. And for the same cause speaks he here again of Commandments, Statutes and Ordinances, to the intent we should not think that God meant to teach us by halves.

Then is the perfection of wisdom contained in the Law: and there remains no more for us to do, but to obey it, so as we be not curious in coveting more than God has Showed us, or in fond devotions to draw us one way or other, but persuade ourselves that God has not envied those of whom he took the charge, but has taught them all that is for their benefit. Let us behave ourselves according to his will, and apply all our wits thereunto, and let his Law suffice us. Although all the world reject us, we shall not pass for it, for we have our judge. And therefore although the world wanders away in vain imaginations, and every man devises what he thinks good: Let us always remember that we must appear before the judgment seat of our God so as it is he to whom we must make our account. But he has given us his Law, and according there unto will he judge us. And therefore let us leave all worldly imaginations, assuring ourselves that they are all but vanity and leasing.

Hereunto Moses adds that as concerning his office he had not brought them anything of his own devising, but had fit forth God's Law faithfully according as he had given him in charge. And this protestation is well to be marked. For we must bethink us of the thing that has been treated of heretofore: namely that Moses was the excellent Prophet that ever God raised up: and yet notwithstanding he takes no liberty here to teach what he himself deemed good: for he knew himself to be a mortal man, and subject to the Law as well as other men. That is the cause why he protests that the things which he brings are the same that he received of God, so as he delivers them as it were from hand to hand. Seeing that Moses did so: who dares say that it is lawful for him to pass further? And yet we see what has come to pass. For in the whole Popedome is there any hearkening what God says, that they might put a difference betwixt it and the doctrines of men? No: but they have their holy mother the Church as they term it, they have determinations and decrees of their own, and they think it enough to take covert under the name of the Church: and in the meanwhile they rob God of his authority to bestow it upon men, which are no better but dung. Therefore it is an intolerable traitorousness, that God should not be suffered to be any more the Lawmaker that he might guide his people, and hold them under his yoke but that men should usurp such authority against him. And therefore we have so much the more need to mark what is contained here: namely that although Moses was as an Angel of heaven, and had been exalted above all men by God, and had been forty days and forty nights with him upon the mount without eating or drinking, to show that he was no more of the common array of other men: yet notwithstanding when he came from that heavenly glory and as it were from the company of Angels: he humbled himself still, and showed that he did not put forth aught of his own, nor follow his own fancy in that behalf, but was contented to hearken what God said, and reported the same as a good servant that had neither added anything, nor falsified the commission that was given him. That is another thing which we had to mark again upon this text.

Now follows an exhortation that the people should discharge themselves in doing the Law. As if he should fare, that the giving thereof was not to the end that men should but only confess that all that is contained therein is good, just and rightful: but also that men should thereby show whether they were obedient to God or no. And in that respect he says, to the end that thou should fear the Lord thy God, and keep his commandments and statutes. By this word Fear he does us to wit, that God in giving forth his Law, meant to try what we be, and whether we be willing to serve him or no. For although we could do all his commandments in such sort as no fault could be found in us to the worldward, if in the meanwhile the fear of God be not rooted in our hearts, to yield him such reverence as to be willing to be his: all our life shall be but a fond pomp: for we must: not think that God is satisfied with outward appearances. Howmuchsoever they be commended of men, they be but smoke before him. Then if we mind to keep his Law duly, and to have our life acceptable unto him: we must begin at this point of yeelding him such reverence, as to be desirous to be under his hand and government, and to do him homage as to our sovereign Lord and to give over ourselves to him as to our maker and to honor him as our father. If we be thus minded, it is the beginning of all the Law and of all righteousness. And that is the cause why it is said that the true wisdom is to fear God. And if we will know whether we have profited in God's Law or no: we must always sift and seareh ourselves whether we have such desire and zeal that God should be honored and glorified by us. For if there be that fear in our hearts, that fruits thereof will show themselves both in our feet and in our hands, that is to say in all our members, according to the rule which he has set down in publishing his law. And as for them that boast of the fear of God, and nevertheless behave themselves lewdly in their conversation: they belie themselves wit their own mouths, and beware that they be shameless in bragging so of the fear of God. Now then we see here a text which is well worthy to be marked: wherein Moses declares, that to serve God well, first we must give our hearts unto him, so as it suffices not to have all the virtues that can be imagined to outward show, unless a virtuous mind go before them: and secondly that the fear of God is no secret or idle thing, but although it be enclosed in men's hearts, yet nevertheless it must show itself in their lives: for it is the heart that governs both the hands and the feet and all that ever is besides. Therefore if we fear God, we must learn to show it by our deeds and by proof: even by framing our life according to his will.

Now hereupon we may gather, that God disallows all that ever men can do, when they turn away from his word, As for example, the Papists are always serving of God (as they themselves say): but in the mean season what do they? They take much pain, but they be newer a whit the forwarder because they have nothing among them but men's intentions. Their serving of God, is to bibleable or to kneels down before puppets or idols, to scud from altar to altar, to cause Masses to be chanted, to gad on pilgrimage, to fast such a day in the honor of such a saint, and to eat no flesh upon Fridays and Saturdays. To be short, it is a gulf of all baggage, covered with the name and title of God's service. But shall you find that ever God uttered one word or syllable concerning such things? No. It was every whit of it devised by men. Now let us consider by this text, whether God accepts such service for good and lawful. Nay contrariwise he says, thou shall fear the Lord thy God, and keep all his commandments and statutes. So then, when men turn from that way, and follow their own imaginations and the inventions of men: thereby they show sufficiently that they have no fear of God in them, for else they would offer him the sacrifice which he prefers before all things namely the sacrifice of obedience, as is showed in the first book of Samuel the fifteenth Chapter. Insomuch that if a man hearken not unto God's voice to submit himself thereto, but contrariwise follows the invention of his own brain, or the things that other men have devised: surely it is an idolatry, and as bad as witchcraft, which God abhors. After that manner does God's spirit speak of it, notwithstanding that mortal men do deem the clean contrary. Now then we see how Moses declares here, that if we fear God in good earnest, we will also do him the honor to be ruled by his will, so as we will not take leave at men's hands to do what they think good, but atop all men's mouths when God speaks, and open our ears to hearken what he says and receive the same.

But yet for all this, it is not enough for every of us to employ himself in the serving of God: we must also procure to the uttermost of our power, that he may be worshipped of all men: yea and that his service may continue even after our decease, so as his honor may abide fast settled when we be dead and gone out of the world, and not be abolished with our transitory life. And that is the cause why Moses says. thy children, and they that issue of their race, shall continue in serving God and in keeping his law. Therefore let us mark well, that here Moses not only exhorts every man to serve God by framing his own life according to the Law that he has given us: but also wills fathers to take pain in bringing up their children, and to leave such seed after them (so near as they can), as God may be honored in their offspring, and his name be ever purely called upon, that by that mean such as descend of us may be blessed, and his covenant (which contains our salvation) endure for ever, and not perish though we ourselves be mortal. But we see that fathers are so far of from discharging their duties in this behalf: that they give such examples to their children, as they may seem to have conspired to abolish all fear of God, and all keeping of his Law. And therefore no marvel though God withdraw himself from us, and seem to be minded to cut off the benefits which he has bestowed upon us. For are we worthy of the continuance of them towards us, feeling we be so negligent in causing his service to continue in perfect and unappaired state? But yet for all that this must not be spoken to us in vain. Therefore let us endeavor to teach such as shall succeed us, so as God may ever be worshipped, and known to be the father and Savior of the whole world, and men give themselves wholly unto him.

Immediately hereupon, Moses adds that which he had said before: namely, to the end that their days might be prolonged, and that God might make the people to prosper, according as he had promised to their fathers to give them a land that flowed with milk and honey. I have declared already heretofore, what Moses meant by this saying: that is to wit, that although God might at one word have compelled us to serve him, yet: notwithstanding he uses a more loving kind of dealing towards us: which is, that he promises us reward for serving of him: not that our works deserve aught, or that he is any whit bound unto us: but that his benefiting of us after that sort, is to the end that we should be the better allured to serve him the more earnestly. For is it not too shameful a thanklessness, that when we hear how God binds himself to us after that manner, of his own accord, and vouchsafes to set reward before us, is it not (say I) too great a shame and thanklessness, if we give not ourselves wholly to his service? we be his, and whatsoever we can do, we be beholden to him for it, as our Lord Jesus Christ speaks thereof. How say you, says he? tell me, if a man have a servant, or rather a slave whom he may put to toil like an Ox or a horse, and the same have done him some service: will his master rise from the table to serve him at his turn? No: for whatsoever a man does that is in bondage, he owes it to him that has the superiority over him. So owe you all things to God (says Christ), and God owes you nothing. Yet notwithstanding God binding himself of his own free good will, promises that if we serve him we shall be well recompensed, and not lose our labor. To what purpose does he so? even to break our hearts, for (as I said before) we be too churlish if we be not wholly inflamed to serve God, when we see that he of his own free goodness vouchsafes to bestow upon us reward, whereof we be not worthy.

And herewithall let us mark also, that if God had covenanted a thousand times with us to reward our works: yet could we so little say that he owed us anything; as he might rather curse and abhor us. For which of us performs his Law as we ought to do? If we do one point, we fail in a hundred: and when we think we do the things that God commands us in his Law: we do but drag our legs, and there is always much imperfection in us, so as we can never run as were requisite. Therefore we should be cursed and damned, if God listed to judge us with vigor. Then is it not for men to vaunt themselves in this behalf of the obtaining of any reward for deserts sake, or to boast of their works. But rather they must understand that all the promises which God has given in his Law, import a condition, and therefore that they should not boot us at all, because none of us discharges his duty, if God did not accept us and bestow upon us of his own mere goodness. And hereby we see how mad the papists are to boast of their merits, so as it seems to them that they have to bargain with God, and thereupon enter boldly into account with him through devilish malapertness bearing themselves in hand that God is greatly bound unto them. And for what manor of dealings? They allege their satisfactions, their works, and their merits. And where shall a man find there merits? O (say they) we have done this and that: and therefore we need not stick to enter into account with God. But on the contrary parte, God requires here that we should serve him thoroughly in all respects: which thing we can not do as we have seen heretofore, and as is declared in many, other places. For let all the world examine themselves, and see if ever there were any one that performed the Law. Nay, so far off is that to be found, . that there is none which may protest that he has done the hundredth part of it. Therefore all must needs confess themselves to be accursed. Besides this, even in that little portion which men can bring, how small so ever it be, there is always some default and blot: by reason whereof God might well refuse it and abhor it. Now then let men continue confounded in their shame, and confess themselves to be all faulty before God. And let us note that this promise can not be performed, unless God bear with us, and respect not the great number of infirmities and vices that are in us, but bury them through his mercy. Our works then are received at God's hands, inasmuch as he respects not what they be, but accepts them as good and holy, through the power of the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ. And although there be ever some blemish and blot in them if it were not blotted our by the blood of Jesus Christ: yet does he accept us by that mean, and not otherwise. Wherefore let us learn to glory in God's mere mercy, and not to boast of any deserving. And yet therewithal let us not cease to step up with the better courage to serve him: when we see that he vouchsafes to draw us so unto him and to win us by such gentleness.

Verily Moses shows that all that ever God promises to his people for keeping of his Law, springs from the same fountain, rather than from any bond. And that is it which he means by saying, As God promised to thy Father, As if he should say, my friends, serve God and he will be good master unto you: and think not that you shall have lost your time when you shall have kept his Law: for you shall have the large reward that is behighted you But yet for all that consider from whence the same comes. The fountains thereof (says he) is, that before you were borne into the worlds, God promised your fathers to bring them into a land that flows with mike and honey. Moses by bringing the people. thus back to the promise that had been made to the Patriarehs, shows sufficiently that God promised not anything anew, but only that he performs the thing that he had promised afore. And why so? Was it for that he was bounds to them which were not yet borne into the world No: but because he loved their fathers as is said heretofore. It is true that here Moses shows that the people should be partakers of that promise, so they kept God's Law. But what for that? Yet behooved it them to come back still to this point, that men are utterly undone if they set themselves against God, and that if they allege any worthiness, they shall abide still in their condemnation, and find themselves all accursed. Therefore they must have none other refuge but to God's mercy, and they must understand that when they have enforced themselves never so much to live according to God's Law, yet shall God owe them nothing at all, nevertheless he will not fail to perform his promise to them even of his own mere and free bestowed goodness. And so you see how this text is to be understood. Now forasmuch as here is mention made of the Land that was promised to the Jews: let us mark that we nowadays ought to be much more provoked to serve God, seeing he has dedicated the whole earth to himself, and will have his name to be called upon every where. For the bloodshed of our Lord Jesus Christ, has sanitized the whole world which was then in uncleanness. For we know there were no more lands but this, which God reserved to himself, and wherein he would reign till the coming of his son. But when our Lord Jesus Christ was once come then got he the possession of the whole world, so as his kingdom was extended from the one side thereof to the other, specially at the publishing of the Gospel. Seeing it is so, let us mark that we nowadays are so much the more straightly bound to serve God, because he has sanctified the whole earth by the precious blood of his son, that we might dwell in it and live under his reign, and beware that we addict ourselves unto him, as well as we would that he should have us in his protection and safekeeping.

Howbeit forasmuch as men are always so ticklish, that (as I have said already) they can not be bridled enough to restrain them: Moses confirms the whole doctrine that he had uttered here, saying, Hearken therefore O Israel, the Lord thy God is one God: he had said before, Hearken: he had said, take heed: he had said that it behooved to them to keep the law: but here he confirms the whole matter much better, by setting down expressly that the God of Israel is the one God. And hereby his meaning is to exclude all the Gods which the world forged to itself, and to show that it is not lawful for us to conceive anything in our own imagination, whereof we have not warrant in God's word. Therefore whereas the God of Israel is called the one God, it is all one as if Moses should compare the God that had let forth his law, (who had also manifested himself before to his servant Abraham, and to the Patriarchs,) with all those whom the world weaned to be Gods, and should set him against them all. For indeed God had been called upon in all ages, and that name was common to the heathen. But what for that? The Heathen wandered at rovers, so as every man said I worship God. And yet in the meanwhile, what was it they did? Nothing but dreams and fantasies: for when men take upon them to worship God without knowing him: no doubt but they worship idols. The Turks at this day do say they worship the God that made heaven and earth: but yet is it but an idol which they worship. And how so? They name him the maker of heaven and earth, and they have none images. That is true: but yet for all that, they have but an idol instead of, God, because they admit not our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the lively image of God his father. And we know how S. John says that he who denies the son, denies the father too. Therefore they have not God, but an idol. As much is to be said of the laws. The Jews boast of their having of the law, and of their worshipping of the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. But what for that? They be but backsliders and have renounced God's Law, for as much as they have rejected Jesus Christ who is the soul of the law. It is he in whom God the father intends to manifest himself unto us: It is he, whom he will have to be worshipped. And in that respect he says, Kiss the son whom I send unto you. And again; he that honors not the son, honors not the father that sent him. Let us mark wet then, that here Moses meant to compare the God which uttered himself by his word, with all the God's that are honored through the whole world, and to show that in them all there is nothing but mockery and leasing. And why? For we can never worship God aright, unless we first know him. And we must always have an eye to this saying of Jesus Christ which he spoke to the woman of Samaria; you know not what you worship. Jesus Christ's using of such speech, is as much as if he should spit at all the worshipping which the world had set up in those days. There was not that nation which boasted not themselves to serve God: but Jesus Christ rejects quite and clean the things which men took to be good and holy. You know not what you worship says he. Hereby he shows that it is expedient for us to be told of it. We must not go to it at all adventure, but we must be sure which is the God whom we serve. And seeing it stands us on hand to know God, if we will worship him and serve him aright: let us consider from whence this knowledge comes. Grows it in our own garden as they say: May wed get it by our own travel or policy? Is it lawful for every man to imagine what he lists, and to say, I know God? No no: but God must be fain to utter himself, and to come unto us. And so the only mean to know God aright, is to be taught by his word. And that is the cause why he says, The Lord thy God. For this people had received the Law: and beside, the covenant had been made with their fathers: God had schooled out that flock from the rest of the world. Justly therefore does Moses here bring back the people to the knowledge of God, to the end they should restrain themselves from all the superstitions of the heathen, and live nothing at all to do with the unbelievers, but know, that in as much as God had manifested himself so familiarly unto them: they had the certain and infallible truth.

Now although this was spoken in the time of the Law: yet does it agree better still to us. For although God gave the Jews sufficient warning that they should not have to do with the defiling and idolatries of the heathen: yet have we a much larger light nowadays, since the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. He is the lively image of God his father (as I have said already,) and we may well agree to this saying) in the first of Saint John, that no man ever saw God, but the son who has always been in the bosom of the father has revealed him unto us. The fathers of old time had a knowledge as I said but that knowledge is esteemed as none at all, in comparison of the knowledge which we have nowadays by the Gospel. God shows himself more plainly unto us by the shining forth of the day sun of righteousness. And for the same cause the Prophet Esay treating of the redemption that was to be performed in the person of the son of God, says expressly: Behold, this is he: behold, this is our God. The Prophet cries out, this is he, this is our God. He contents not himself to say, behold our God: but he speaks as if the thing were present, and as though God had appeared unto him. How so? And was not God in the, minds of his people? Yes: for he said, I will dwell among you. And again, This is my rest, Sion is the place where I will dwell. And afterward he protests that he will never depart thence, and that the people is his temple and a royal Priesthood. Why then does the Prophet Esay say, Behold, behold our God: this is he, this is he: when our Lord Jesus Christ was to come into the world? Even because God revealed himself to us in greater perfection. Now then we be the less to be excused, if we run gadding nowadays without holding of ourselves to the pure truth, so as every of us turns away after his own dotages, to say, it seems so to me, this think I good. Let us assure ourselves that all this is nothing worth, but we must repair to the certainty that is brought us by our Lord Jesus Christ.

Nevertheless to far off is the world from knowing this, that it should seem they be all bent to spite God, and have conspired to turn their backs upon him, and to shake off all subjection, that they may have liberty to continue in their disorders, and to scape in the meanwhile unespied with their lewdness. The Jews are inexcusable, according as we see how the Prophets upbraid them with their willful forsaking of God, so as they could not excuse themselves by saying that they had not heard anything, as the poor Paynims might do: for God protests that he spoke not in vain. And nowadays when God speaks to us with open mouth, and we have him perfectly discovered unto us by the Gospel, is it not too great a lewdness that men should run astray after that fashion? Were there ever any superstitions more gross and more outrageous, than are to be seen nowadays in the Popedome? It is true that the Jews meddled with the superstitions of the Heathen, and took much filth and uncleanness of them: but if all be well searched, it will be found that the Papists have far exceeded them. For God's word is as it were, at this day buryd among them. When they create of faith, they fetch the points of it from men's inventions: and the Holy Scripture is in as much reverence among them as if it were dead, and that all things went to havoc. Look at what point they be. And if a man speaks to them of God's service, (as I said) they be busy about their own inventions. Yea verily, mine intent is good say they: and so they bear themselves in hand, that God will suffer himself to be dandled Like a little babe, and will never come to examine any whit of the doctrine of Popery. Again if they speak of faith: exhort they men to resort to God's free promises? No, but they challenge all to themselves. When they take in hand to treat of the office of Jesus Christ, they overthrow the virtue of his death and passion, as much as they can. When they treat of their salvation: then step forth their own freewill, their merits, and their satisfactions. But contrariwise we should resort to the mere grace of the Holy Ghost, acknowledging ourselves to be in bondage to sin, until God delivers us from it through his mercy. And thereupon it comes that the Holy Scripture calls the forgiveness of sins our righteousness. That is the point which we must resort unto, to know that when we have done amiss, we can bring none other amends or payment for it, such as we borrow of the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ. But there is not a word of all this in Popery. When God is to be prayed unto, they make their vagaries to their He-saints and She-saints: and in the meanwhile Christ is not known to be as he is, neither is let alone with the office that is given him by God his father: but they depose him, Like a sort of thieves and traitors that seek nothing else but to bury him again, and to make havoc of All the glory that was given him by God his Father. After the same sort deal they also in all other things. We see how the Sacraments are defiled to the uttermost. Instead at the Supper of our Lord Jesus Christ, they have set up that same hellish abomination of the Masse, wherein they say that Jesus Christ is sacrificed, as though he had done nothing already, nor were appointed to be the only and everlasting Priest by God his father. We see then that the Papists have so dallied with God's word wherein he has revealed himself: as it should seem that they meant of set purpose to wipe away the knowledge that is in the Gospel. And therefore we have so much the more need to mark well this saying. That the Lord if God, yea even the only one God.

Now then, as oft as this word God comes to our mind, let us assure ourselves that it serves to cut off all toys that may come in our heads, and all inventions of men, and all other things whereof we have not warrant in the Holy Scriptures. For God will have us to consider him in such wise, as we snarl not ourselves in the imaginations and errors of idolatry. And of a truth, we cannot have the true God, except we have him alone: that is to say, without adding any companion unto him. For as soon as we fall to bringing in of under goddess, we forsake the lining God. And why? Because his will is to be alone, as he vows in another place by his Prophet Esay saying, I am the lining God (says the Lord) and I will not give my glory to any other. Again we have seen heretofore how he called himself a jealous God. And why was that, but to withdraw us from all corruptions, as S. Paul affirms in the second to the Corinthians? For as soon as we be turned aside from the simplicity of God's word, it is all one as if a wise should hearken to a bawds that came to whisper in the ear. By and by we be corrupted, and so we commit soul whoredom against God, when we falsify the faith that we have plighted him in Baptism. We cast away his law, and stain all religion, when we swerve never so little from the pure Religion. Wherefore let us bear well in mind, that as oft as this word God comes to our remembrance, God must be all alone. And if we accompany him with any creatures: he forsakes us as backsliders, and as folk unworthy to have anything to do with him, because we vouchsafed not to yield him his deserved honor: that is to wit, to take him for our (only) Lord, but have unhallowed that name by imparting the same to creatures, or rather to our own dreams.

And herewithall let us mark, that it is not enough for us to reserve to the living God the title of the only God: but all that ever belongs unto him must also abide unminished and unappaired. As how? His meaning is not only to be called the only God: but also to be acknowledged to be almighty, and to be our father and Savior, which has all authority over us to govern us, in whom we ought to put our whole trust, and whom we ought to call upon. Those are the chief things which we ought to mind when mention is made of the honoring of the only one God. Truth it is that the Papists will well ell enough say, that S. Michael and S. William are not their God's: but yet for all that they worship them, yea even the stocks of them. Although they hope to scape by this shift, that the images are not the Saints themselves whom they pray unto, but only remembrances set up there to represent them: yet is it expressly against God's forbidding. And again, we see that they cannot by any means discern the difference how God will be worshipped, when they entangle themselves after that manner with their idols of stone and timber, whereby they surmise themselves to represent their Saints. True it is they countenance the matter with the terms of Doulia and Latria, which they themselves understand not, saying that they serve their puppets and yield reverence unto God: for that is the thing which they mean by those words. But surely God is much beholden to them, in those they show that they do but honor him, and in the mean season serve their idols. Again, is it not a holy thing to pray unto God? Yes: for it is the very service that he requires, as it is said in the fiftieth Psalm. So then, we see that the world does dally too shamelessly with God, in corrupting his service so lewdly, yea and that it is too detestable a thing, that men should run astray so, after so clear and open revelation or discovery of things, as is contained in the Gospel. And therefore it behooves us so much the more to stand to this doctrine, knowing that our Lord will have us tied wholly to himself alone, so as there may be an inviolable union betwixt him and us. Which thing will come to pass, if we hold ourselves simply within the bounds and lists of his word, so as we give no entrance to men's inventions, nor suffer our minds to wander at rovers, but hearken to the things that are contained in the Holy Scripture, and not only say amen to them readily with our mouths, but also settle our faith thoroughly upon the things that are proceeded out of the mouth of our God.

Now let us kneel down in pretence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, so as we may know more and more wherein we be bound unto him, and not think to discharge ourselves thereof lightly, but bend ourselves wholly to him and to his service, not hating any other intent or desire than to keep his Holy Law. And seeing we be yet very far off from it so that strain we ourselves never so much, we stop in the middle of our way: let us flee for succor to the forgiveness of our sins, praying him to vouchsafe to receive us to mercy, and to bear with us in such sort, as he never cease to guide us with his holy spirit, though we deserve to be utterly shaken off at his hand. And therewithal it may please him so to open our eyes, that we beholding the brightness of our Lord Jesus Christ, may be wholly ravished thereat, to renounce these worldly things and our fleshly affections, which carry us away so as we may have none other desire than to humble ourselves under him, to the end that being stricken done in ourselves, we may be lifted up at his hand by his word, waiting till it please him to transfigure us after his own image at the latter day. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us but also, and all.

On Saturday, the 20th of July 1555

The forty sixth Sermon which is the second upon the sixth Chapter

4 Hearken O Israel and all

5 Therefore thou shall love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy strength.

6 And these words which I command thee this day, shall be in thy heart.

7 Thou shall rehearse them to thy children, and talk of them when thou art at home in thy house, and as thou walk by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou rises up.

8 And thou shall bind them as a sign upon thy hands, and they shall be as frontlets written between your eyes.

7 Also thou shall write them upon the entries of thy house, and upon thy gates.

Began yesterday to tell you wherefore Moses vows that There is but only one God: that is to wit, because men can never give themselves to the settling of the true God, unless they discern him from all things imagined by the world, For every man forges God's at his own pleasure, and the very fountain and wellspring of all superstition and idolatry, is that men cannot be contented with the living God, but give head e to their own fancies, and thereupon build a great sort of fables to beguile themselves. Therefore it is requisite before all other things, to know which is the true God, that we may hold ourselves wholly unto him, and worship him simply ithout adding anything at all to his word. For as soon as anything is mingled thereunto, by and by it is corrupted. And here is express mention made of the God of Israel, because God must needs have manifested himself, or else we could never have known him. For where are the wings wherewith we should fly to so infinity a height, as to comprehend the Majesty of God? But when it pleases him to reveal himself to us by his word: it is as though he came down to acquaint himself with us: and then do we know him. And this certainty of being fully resolved that we worship not a new forged god, or a god that is brought in by men, the same God to whom all praise is due: is the very foundation of all Religion. Herewithall let us bear in mind, that he will be worshipped all alone, not only by reserving to himself the name of God:

but also by having all that is his, that is to wit, all that belongs to his Majesty, and as you would say to his office. I speak after this manner, to express the better, that God has not respect alone to his being. His will is not that men should only call him the everlasting, or confess him to be the maker of the world: but that they should also know him to be almighty, and that it is he to whom the government of us belongs, it is he in whom is all virtue, wisdom, goodness, and righteousness, it is he to whom we must run for succor, it is he in whom we must put all our trust, it is he to whom we owe all glory. You see then how Moses, in showing that there is but only one God, means that men should commit themselves unto him, knowing that they be in his hand, that they be maintained by his only power that it is he at whose hand they must look for salvation and all welfare, and finally that it is he in whom they have their life, moving and being: and therefore that it is he whom we must honor, as well, with prayer and supplications, as also by praise and thanksgiving.

And now to show his meaning the better, Moses adds, Thou shall love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy strength. In these words we see the thing that has been touched already: that is to wit, that God's intent is to hold us wholly to himself and to possess us in such sort, as we serve him not by halves, nor wander in the meanwhile to and fro. Then like as God of his gracious goodness gives himself to us: so does it behooove us to be altogether his possession and inheritance. That is the sum of the things contained in these words of Moses, where he speaks of the loving GOD with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our strength. As if he should say, There is no mean way in this case, deceive not yourselves by imagining to serve God by parcelmeale, and by making any restraint from him: for he will keep his own right throughout in all points. What is to be done then? You must give your hearts wholly unto him, so as you reserve not any piece of it to idols. , For that were a corrupting and a bastarding of his service: either he must have all whole, or else he will have none at all accordingly as we see how he renounces the people in Ezekiel, for mingling of superstitions with his Law. Go your ways (says he) and serve your own idols: I will no more of you. He gives them leave and cast them up to Satan, telling them that he likes not any of all the things which they do: for he will not be matched with idols. What an outrage and blasphemy is that Thus then we see now the meaning of Moses.

Now as concerning these words, Soul, Mind, and Strength: the Jews did misunderstand them. Their Paying is, that Thou shall love God with all thy foul, is as much to say as thou shall not spare thy life for the love of thy God, but thou shall set so much store by his glory, that in comparison thereof thou shall not esteem your own life, so as if need require that thou should die to show the love which thou bear unto God: thou should do it. Again Thou shall love thy God with all thy mind or Heart, betokens with them but as it were a comparison, so as a man should prefer GOD above all other things. And finally Thou shall love God with all thy strength, imports among them, that thou must love him with all thy substance and with all thy goods, so as if the case required that thou should be impoverished, thou should rather give over thy worldly goods, than forsake thy God. But this exposition is too strait laced, and attains not to the very meaning of Moses. For proof whereof there needs now no long discourse. For what better expounder of the Law is there to be found, than our Lord Jesus Christ, by whose spirit it was given? For it was at his hand and by his authority, that Moses received the Law which we hold of him. So then, we must fetch the exposition thereof at his mouth, and we must receive it without gain saying. And for the same cause do the three Evangelists S. Matthew, in the 22, S. Mark in the 12 and S. Luke in the 10 set down this loving of God to be the whole sum of the well keeping of the law. True it is that he adds, Thou shall love thy neighbor as thy self. Howbeit, in answering he says, thou shall love thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind and with all thy strength. Our Lord Jesus Christ adds there one word more: not to make a new sense, but to assure us the better of the same thing that Moses meant by the words Soul and Heart. So then he sets down Soul, Heart and Mind, as if he should say, The man that intends to keep God's Law well, must yield himself wholly and thoroughly to the obeying and loving of God. Now we see that in our souls, first there is the power of thinking, when we conceive things to judge and discern of them. That is the first power of the soul: namely that upon the insight of things, we enter into deliberation and judgment, and conclude one way or other. God's will then is to restrain all there thoughts to himself. Again there is the soul, which is not only the life, but also the mean betwixt the thoughts and the heart. For the Heart betokens the affections, desires and will.

It is one thing to think a thing, and another thing to desire it, and to set a hearty affection upon it. Ye see then that the heart is matched with the thoughts, to show that we must love our God with all our mind. And there is the Soul, which is as it were between both: as if it were said, that whether we debate and take counsel of our own affairs, we must always begin at the love of God, and refer all things thereunto or whether we covet one thing or other in seeking our own profit, God's love must always govern us, so as all our desires be as it were restrained and bridled under it. You see then that the whole soul with all the powers thereof ought to be thoroughly possessed with the love towards God. And the word strength serves to show yet better, that God admits not any exception, neither may we reply in this behalf, and say, is my doing of this or that an impeaching of any part of my love towards God? No no, if thou do never so little a thing, and that all thy thoughts tend not to the loving of God, so as the love of God do guide thee: all is mard, and there is nothing but sin in you and in all thy whole soul. For have you any strength or power there, which is not given you from above? No. Therefore must thou reknowledge it unto God of whom you hold it. Now then, seeing that our Lord Jesus Christ has expounded us this text, we need not to make long discourse of it, as I said before, but only to hold us to the authority of him which is the very Lawgiver.

Now remains the practicing of this doctrine, that is to say, to know how we should put it in effect and execution. And let us mark first of all, how this only one text shows us sufficiently, that God's law passes all our abilities, so as it is not possible for us to fulfill it, and to discharge ourselves of it, or of the hundredth part of it, as long as we live here beneath. For why? do we know God thoroughly as we ought to do? No no, we come far short of it. Then is it impossible for us to love him with all our strength and with all our affections: for knowledge goes before love. If our knowing of God be but in part, so as we be wrapped as yet in much darkness: our loving of God must also be weak likewise. Moreover we see what the fondness of our mind is: for instead of seeking heavenly things, we look always downward. And if we be desirous but so much as to lift up our head: we must be fain to strive and to go to it by main force, and yet we return still to our own nature. How fickle are our desires? and how fight they one against another? So as men are tossed and turmoiled without end or measure, and have no rest at all, but are tormented with unquietness, of ambition on the one side, and of covetousness on the other. Again they would fain live at ease and in pleasure, and they would fain be had in honor and estimation. Finally they be compared with fleshly lusts and such other like things. Hereby then it appeared enough and too much, that we come far short of loving God with all our heart and of giving ourselves wholly over unto him, as we be commanded here. And so let us mark, that the righteousness of the Law respects not what men can do, but what they ought to do. We be bound to love our GOD with all our heart, with all our mind, and with all our soul. Although we have no such perfection in us as to come anything mere it, yet notwithstanding we be bound 'unto it. If any man say, how so? why should God require more of us than we be able to perform? We must consider from whence the mischief springs: namely even from our own fault. The original sin that is in us is the cause thereof, so as we take it by birth. And is it meet that because we be naughty and forward, therefore God should be bereft of his service and lose his right? No. If a man have played the unthrift and wasted away both his own goods and other men's: (hall his creditor be bound to bring him his obligation and to say, take you here your bond, you owes me nothing? The creditor will at leastwise keep still his obligation, and although the unthrift have not wherewith to pay: yet ought he to do homage to his creditor, and to stand bound unto him still, and not to deny him his det. Now God deserves well to be much more privileged than mortal men: Wherefore let us consider that we owe him a hundred thousand fold more than all the debts of gold and silver in the world. So then, God's righteousness is an inviolable thing, so that the order of nature ought rather to be abolished. Now then if men be lewd and forward, does it follow therefore, that they should pluck the sun out of the sky, or make the earth to be confounded? True it is that there happen many confusions by reason of our sins, insomuch that our Lord sends both rain, and thunder, hails, and tempests, and such other like things: but yet for all that, the order of nature continues unappayred after such turmoil. Therefore we must understand that although we be lewd, and there is nothing but unrighteousness and naughtiness in us: Yet must God's Justice and right continue perfect and vnappayred as in respect of the commandments: and we must needs stoop to them, and suffer ourselves to be condemned for not discharging our duties. Do we then hear this sum of the Law, Thou shall love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength? Let it make us conclude that we be all damned and accursed before God, and that there is none other shift for us, but to flee to his mercy: and that we be not condemned for any one sin, or for two or three: but that God finds us guilty in all points and all respects. And for proof thereof, let us examine those best works that we can have done in all our life: and there will be still some fancy or other to turn us away, so as we shall not go on so freely towards God, but that there will be some temptation mingled therewith, or some toy to pluck us back, and the devil shall have endeavored to, cool us. And when it far so with us, it is a plain corruption to onfect the thing should be good and commendable in our works.

Ye see then that we take not any deliberation, any counsel, or any desire in our whole life, but the curse of God is with us and upon our heads. Were this well printed in our hearts: all glorying to the world ward should be beaten down in us, and there would be no more so much meriting, wherewith the Papists are so bewitched, that (to their own seeming) they may enter into account before GOD. Alas, they should then see that they be far off from their account. Howbeit forasmuch as the Devil has blinded them with such pride: let us on our side make our commodity of this text.

And since we hear that God requires that we should love him perfectly with all our heart, with all our mind, and with all our soul: Let us be of opinion that he condemns us utterly, he have acquit us of his own infinite goodness. But yet for all this, we must pluck up our hearts and quicken up our spirits, since we see that our Lord provokes us after that fashion. For what makes us so cold and negligent? It is our bearing of ourselves in hand that we be discharged. The cause therefore why men do flatter themselves, is for that they take themselves to be perfect, when they have brought some petty trifles unto God. When we be at that point, let us bethink us how it is raid here, Thou shall love God with all thy heart. If it happen that we be not very disordered in our life, but that we have prayed unto God at our uprising in the morning, we have done no man wrong all the day long, we have not played the whoremaster, nor the drunkards, we have not hurt any of our neighbors, we have not conspired any evil, we have not blasphemed God, but we have occupied ourselves about some good matters, insomuch as we have endeavored to do good to such as were in necessity, and labored to apply ourselves to the things that God commands, and have done them some service which had need thereof: when night comes, we think ourselves to be little Angels, and that God has no more to demand of us. That is the cause that cools us, and why we serve not GOD so earnestly as were requisite. For we bear ourselves in hand, that we be perfect, and we be contented with ourselves, and we need nothing else to content us withal for we be too much inclined to like well of ourselves. But behold here is wherewith to waken us from such folly, namely, Thou shall love the Lord thy God. And after what manner? after our own measure? No no: but. With all our heart, wit all our soul, and with all our strength. And therefore let us look that we search well our thoughts: and in examining of our lives, let us consider what a number of vain and fond fancies have passed us. And if it be alleged, yea but I yielded not to them: very well, did you not conceive any such thought? Will not thy God possess your whole soul? Shall the devil bear rule over your thoughts, and God in the meanwhile have nothing to do with them? And seeing he has given you those thoughts, if you fall to mingling of them with any corruption, whence proceeds that, but from the affection of our minds? Therefore we were well fraught beforehand with the love of God, should not all the powers of our souls be brought under his obedience? Yes. So then our forging of so many fond imaginations, our letting of our desires and delights loose to follow this and that, and our forgetting of God in the meanwhile, or rather our excluding of him from bearing any sway at all in us, does prove sufficiently that the true love of God is not received into our souls. Alas. does it not appear that we be yet far off from discharging the hundredth part of our duty?

Besides this foresaid condemning of ourselves, we must also quicken up ourselves, and say, what does you wretched creature? Do you give your self to do well since god exhorts you so earnestly? In the meanwhile you sees; you have much adoe even to begin. Thus you see how we ought to bear this text in mind, that it may inflame us with the love of God, seeing we be yet so far off from the perfection which he requires and commands. Again let us mark well, that our Lord's upping of all the abilities of our soul here, is to make us look better to the good turns that he has done us, to yield him homage for the same, and to apply them to his honor. For what a thing is it that we have the gift of consulting, the choice of discerning between good and evil, and the ability to conceive things so as we can say we will do this or that? Lo here an excellent gift wherewith we be endued. Now then seeing we have will to choose, so as we can say, go to, I find this to be good: and again, seeing we have a soul which bears God's image printed in it, and seeing we have so many goodly venues, where through we excel all other creatures: ought not the consideration thereof to provoke us the more to serve God, and to honor him with those so precious gifts which he has put in us? Yes: and therefore let us learn, that when our thoughts are set upon vain and wicked things, and when our desires rune at rovers and rebel against God: we unhallow so holy a treasure, as we deserve well to be utterly up at God's hand, because of our unthankfulness. Now then whereas Moses speaks here of the thoughts and the will: and our Lord Jesus Christ adds one word more, that is to wit, mind, soul, and will: let us understand that hereby we be warned, that if we submit not ourselves wholly unto God, it happens for want of considering the good things that he has bestowed upon us. For if we feel him liberal, as he shows himself towards us: surely it will draw us wholly unto him, So then let us consider, that God's making of us so excellent as to have his image printed in us, was not to any other end, than that we should do him homage for them, and by that mean be the more moved to love him, and to keep ourselves well from defiling so precious gifts, as reason, will, discretion, and all the rest of the powers of our souls which he has give us. Thus you see in effect what we have to remember upon this place.

But yet herewithall we must mark also the thing that I have told you heretofore: that is to to wit, that God will not be served by constraint, but of free love. He could say, You shall honor your God, you shall obey your God, you shall fear your GOD: and so he does in other texts, and it is good reason that it should be so: but he speaks expressly of love. And why? To show that if our sailing of him be by constraint, so as we go to it against our wits: though we honor him never so much, and do all that is possible to glorify his name: yet if the same proceed not of love, so as our heart yield unto him freely and without gainsaying he utterly disallows it, and such service is not acceptable unto him, for he loves him that gives with a free will and pure affection, as says Saint Paul treating of Almesdeedes. Seeing then that God loves him which gives with a cheerful courage: thereby he shows that if a man should spend all his goods, yet should it not boot him at all as to Godward, unless he have a delight in well doing. And why? Because God has commanded it, and we ought above all things to desire that he be glorified, that his righteousness be obeyed, that he be exalted at our hands, that he reign over us, and that we be his people in very deed. Ye see then that the chief joy which we should have to incline us to do well, is a hearty and free affection. And that is the cattle why the word Love was plainly set down in this text.

Notwithstanding, God will not have us to love him as our fellow: but he will have us to love him, honor him, and serve him as our God. And therefore let us mark well, that if we will observe God's Law as we ought to do: we must not consider him alone in the degree of a master, thereby to yield him reverence: but we must also set before us the title of father, and assure ourselves that God's intent is to win us to him by gentleness, that our heart may be as it were tied unto him, according to this saying of his by his prophet, If I be your master, where is my fear? and if I be your father, where is my love? Indeed he sets down honor in that place, to betoken that a servant ought to fear his master: but yet immediately after he sets down the word Love also, of purpose to show what honor the child yields to his father.

And therefore let us remember, that the first point of serving God aright, is to be led unto him, yea and to be led thither upon knowledge of this word Savior, so as we covet above all things to be so knit unto him, as all our joy, contentation and rest be there, that by that mean we may no more be given to the things that are contrary to his righteousness. And that is the cause why we say, that we must first know God's grace and goodness, before we can serve him. For as for such as serve God for fear of being damned, not knowing that he will be their savior: what do they? They seem to enforce themselves greatly forward: but indeed they draw clean back. Though they break both their arms and their legs, yet are they never the forwarder. And for that cause is it said in the hundred and thirtieth psalms Because the Lord has been merciful, and men have found him gentle and gracious: therefore is he feared and dreaded Indeed the world thinks to reserve GOD well enough, without knowing him, and we see that the Papists do this and that upon such opinion But what for that? In the meanwhile they have no trust in God, they never knew his will nor his loving kindness: and therefore are they always in terror and unquietness.

True it is that they yield some outward service unto God: but all that ever they do is not worth a pin, insomuch that God rejects even their keeping of the Law: for we must be led by love and by a frank and free goodwill, as I said afore And how may that be done? Even by knowing God to be our father and Savior, as I alleged out of the text of Malachi, and as is yet better expressed in this verse of the psalm, that we must first know God's mercy, and rest thereupon, or else we can never fear him, and come near him to serve him. That is the true and plain meaning of this text, and so must we apply it.

Moses having spoken after that fashion adds now, that the Law must be so dear unto us, as to take it for our chief treasure. And forasmuch as we be too much subject to the Seeking of the corruptible things of this world, and forget God out of hand, and withdraw ourselves too far from him: he says that men must have God's Law continually in their sight, and make as it were a Head roll thereof, as if a woman were attired after the ancient manner, with borders on her heads bracelets on her arms or as if a man should make borders of them about his house, or engravers upon the doors of his house, so as God's glory might be everywhere. And whereas he speaks here of frontlets and bracelets, and of painting and engraving of God's law upon door posts: it is to show that whereas men give themselves to vain glory in decking and attiring of themselves, and the same turns them away from God: they must make all their decking of God's Law: that must be their Jewels. Like as if a man or a woman have a costly Jewel upon their finger, and take pleasure therein: instead thereof they should have God's Law continually before their eyes, so as a man should no sooner look upon himself, no though it were but upon his nails, but it should come to his mind to think, You have a maker who fashioned you, and whose will it is that you should serve him by yielding yourself wholly to his obedience. Although you be a silly unprofitable creature: yet will your God be glorified in you. Thus you see how we must make all our deckings of God's Law Again, instead of the beautifying of houses, with things of goodly show and furniture, to the end; it may be said, this is the house of some man of estimation: the Laws of God must be written upon it. Now we see what the meaning of Moses was.

But by the way we have here to bewail that corruption of mankind. For it is manifest, that even of the holiest things in the world, men take occasion to mock God, and to mere all; and to turn them to a contrary ends. As how? This saying, Harken O Israel, the Lord thy God it one only God, is a notable saying, and worthy to be had in remembrance above all others. For it serves to magnify the living GOD, that he might be discerned from the idols that have been forged, to the end that our religion might be certain and infallible. Then is it as excellent a lesson, as a man shall read any: and yet what have the Jews which were God's people fared the better for it? They have turned it into a charm and sorcery, imagining that the speaking of those words would make a conjuration, like to the Agnus Dei in Popery, and to such other gewgaws as the papists hang about their necks, in the which Agnus Dei they write that beginning of Saint John's Gospel and I wote not what else, wherewith they bear themselves in hand that they can conjure both God and the devil. As much have the Jews done with this lesson: insomuch that they have abused even the very letters of it. There is one letter (say they) which imports four, betokening that God is Lord of the four parts of the worlds. They have taken other some according to their numbers and ciphers, to signify things which they have devised of their own brain. And in the meanwhile they had no reverence to God, but would that he should have no more power nor authority over them. And that do they show full well, not only by their despising, shunning, and rejecting of Jesus Christ, who ought to have reigned over them: but also by their crucifying of him in despite of God, and by their turning away from the salvation that had been promised them. And even as much have they done with this text. For they have turned to pride and ambition the thing that is said here, as we see how our Lord Jesus Christ in the Gospel upbraids the Scribes and Pharisees with their large grades, insomuch that if the common people had any narrow grade of writing, wherein the commandments were set down, these great Rabies (to the intent to become holier than other men,) had grades of an handbreadth upon their garments, wherein God's Law was written in great letters, that it might be seen a great way off. O, those were holy persons, for they had God's Law written in great letters, whereas the common people had it in small. They knew the laws much better, and therefore was God much magnified in them. Nay, contrariwise, such vain bragging was a lime mocking of God: but yet it was the fashion of all men, as I have declared already. And by this which befell the Jews, let us take understanding and instruction, that the same must serve us to behold that we be so forward, that whereas God labors to draw us familiarly unto him, we despise it, and instead of profiting ourselves by the doctrine that is set before us, we turn it unto laughter, we unhallow it Like Church robbers, and we turns quite and clean contrary to his meaning, so as it had been better for us never to have heard one word of his mouth. Thus you see what we have to mark.

But now herewithall we must come to the meaning of Moses, which I have touched shortly already. Remember these words says he. And how? By talking and conferring of them in your house, and as you go abroad. Here we see well how our Lord's meaning was not to be honored with gardes of garments and such other things, but to have his Law printed in his people's hearts, and to hate it kept always fresh in remembrance. Therefore let us consider that whereas we have so much needless talk our Lord will have his people exercised in talking and conferring upon his laws, whether it be in resting or in journeying, or when they be at home in their houses. If we minded this warning well, surely it would be a bridle to refine us back and to withdraw us from the unprofitable talk whereunto we be so much given. For we can spend, I say not some forenoon, but the whole day continually in light talk: but if we speak but two or three words of God, by and by we be weary and it grieves us. Yet notwithstanding, this talking of him is not the chief point. For we must come to this saying of the psalm, I believe, and therefore will I speak. For oftentimes and most commonly, they that have God's Law in their mouth and at their tongues end, have it not at all in their heart and affection. Therefore we must speak of God's law, much more with our hearts than with our mouths. But yet must we talk of it also, to edify our neighbors, that the father may teach his children and the master his servants, to serve God. That is the cause why our Lord commands men to talk of his Law: not to discharge themselves lightly of it, as though the whole matter lay in speaking of it: but to quicken up and correct our un-lustiness, so as every man help forward his neighbor, and draw him with him, and the fathers and masters in the meanwhile be careful to teach their children and servants, as I said afore. That is Moses' simple meaning when he speaks here of talking either at home or abroad: namely that men's talk must always be of God's Law.

Afterward here infuse, thou shall muse upon it in thy heart. Herein we see how our Lord rebukes us, and shows us how fickle headed we be, insomuch that if we be not held fast by divers means, we forget God his Law out of hand. For what is the cause that he sets as it were frontlets here before our eyes? Wherefore is it that he will have us to weave as it were Tablets, Rings, and Bracelets: but for that whereas we be want to gaze chiefly at such things, and to make a showing of them, he will have his own law to be set in them; Now the excellent part of man is his face and his eyes: and our Lord will have his Law to be there. Again he will have it upon our hands. and we cannot do anything, but our hands must need go foremost still in it. Now our Lord's will is that we we should not be able to stir one finger, but we should be put in mind of his law by it. Hereby he shows us (as I said afore) that if we have not good store of bridles, we shall play the loose colts: and if the Law be not brought to our mind, and the remembrance thereof refreshed by many means: we will soon have forgotten it. We need no more but to close our eye, and the things that we had learned and which had been told us and retold us afore, are straightway out of our thought. Let us understand therefore that our Lord blames and condemns us in this text, for being so customably carried to and fro, and that he must be fain to quicken us up, and to give us so many helps, if he will enjoy us and have us to obey him. That is one thing which we have to mark upon this text.

Besides this let us mark also that our Lord could not better have taught the vanities whereunto men and women are given in all their pretty toys and trifles, in attiring and decking themselves with gardes, embroideries, and borders and such other Like things: God (I say) could not have scorned such vanities better than by telling us that in the meanwhile we forget the chief point of all, which is the minding of his Law which we forget easily, to occupy ourselves about vain and unprofitable things. And this is spoken chiefly to women, because they give themselves over curiously to these nice attires and decking. . For if they considered that they should apply themselves to the minding of God's Law, they would not be so much occupied in decking or rather in disguising of themselves: but they would rather consider which is the true decking of faithful women: that is to wit, to fears God, to live honestly, chastely, and soberly, to govern well their households, and to occupy themselves in bringing up of their children. This is beautiful attire, and such a one as is precious in God's sight, as Saint Peter terms it. So then let us mark, that whereas the worldliness do deck and disguise themselves, and make so many devises to please and allure one another: we must beware that we take the true decking which will make us acceptable before God: that is to wit, that we bears his Law in minds, and can glory that we have a God which guides and governs us accordingly as it has pleased him to receive us for his people, and to give us his word to rule our lives by.

Now let us kneel down in the pretence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may learn to dislike the more and more, and to flee for refuge to his mercy, being utterly void of all trust in any strength of our owns: And yet notwithstanding that we may not leave to enforce ourselves, so as we may be the more given to his service, knowing that we be not yet come to perfection by a great way, no for yet to the mid way thereof: and therefore that these warnings which he gives us may inflame us more and more to yield him praise all our life long, by acknowledging the benefits which he has bestowed upon us, and the nobility and worthiness which he has given us above all creatures, that we may learn thereby to withdraw ourselves from all the vain and transitory things of this world, and to seek the spiritual and heavenly things, to the intent that being knit unto our God, we may not only withstand all worldly temptations, but also draw our neighbors from the same by our example. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us but also to all.

On Wednesday, the 24th of July 1555

The forty seventh Sermon, which is the third upon the sixth Chapter

10 And when the Lord thy God shall have brought thee into the land, which he swear to thy fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give thee great and goodly Cities which thou build not:

11 And houses full of all manner of goods which thou filled not: and wells which thou dig not: and vineyards and Olive gardens which thou planted not and thou shall have eaten and filled thyself:

12 Then beware, least peradventure thou forget the Lord which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage.

13 Thou shall fear the Lord thy GOD, and serve him, and swear by his name.

E have seen how it was God's will that his law should always be before his peoples eyes, and that the remembrance thereof should be renewed by all means. For, this cause he commanded them to set gards upon their garments, and to write the sentences of the Law therein, and to wear them instead of bracelets, and other ornaments, and to have the in their caps and in the rest of their apparel, and to engrave them upon the posts of their houses.

All this rehearsal tended to this vnde, that because men are too forgetful of GOD'S Lowe, they must have certain helps and means to put them in mind: thereof: and specially that whereas the children of this world: are curious in decking themselves, in making themselves brave to the eye, and give themselves to pomp when they be rich: instead thereof GOD would that his faithful ones should deck themselves with holiness of life. For it is not enough for them to bear scrolls of the Law about them unless all of it be referred to the right end.

Now we must also cal to mind what has been touched before: namely that if we were as well inclined to think upon God and upon the doctrine which he sets forth unto us, as were requisite: we should not need any other helps. Therefore it is a token that we be full of vanities, and that our wits wander to and fro, and that it is very horde for us to settle ourselves upon God.

But yet notwithstanding we shall be never the more excused for all that. Seeing then that we be easily led away after our own follies, and there are a great number of temptations in this world to blear our eyes withal, and to wipe God's law out of our hearts and minds: it stands us in hand to take the more pain in the thing that is commanded us here, namely that we make a continual exercise of returning unto God, so as it be our whole study, and that whereas we see the unbelievers carried away in their own follies, we seek unto God, to settle ourselves upon him, and to refer all our thoughts and desires unto him, so that even in making mirth we have him before our eyes, and in our remembrance, to the end he may be glorified in the things that we take pleasure in.

And now Moses adds, that when the people shall be come into: the land that was promised to them, and enjoy the goods that are there: (for we know it was a fruitful and fat land:) they must beware that they forget not him to whom they were beholden for all things, but rather honor and serve him, and show themselves to hold: all things of him who is their God. Now at the first sight it might seem superfluous to warn the people that they should not forget the Lord their God, after they had possessed the land that was given them to inherit. For is it possible that people which has been guided by the hand of God, and seen so many miracles, should turn away, yea and be so blinded, as to be unmindful of him to whom they were so much bound? That were against nature. But what? The un-thankfulness of men is so great, that notwithstanding all the benefits which they have received at God's hand, yet they cease not to defy him, or at least to Show that they have no further care of those things that were told them. True it is that here Moses speaks to the people of Israel. But yet in that people he sets us forth a looking glass wherein to show us our forwardness in that we cannot find in our hearts to do homage to God for all his benefits, but that all that ever he bestows upon us is lost, because it is mis-bestowed, unless we be exhorted and pricked foreword to do our duty better. Therefore let us not think: that this doctrine was written for the Jews only: but let us rather understand that it is directed unto us also.

Howbeit, first of all we must mark what Moses meant: and afterward the doctrine contained therein must be applied to the instructions of ourselves. When thou art come (says he) into the land which the Lord thy God promised to thy fathers Abraham, Isac, and Jacob. Moses speaks expressly of God's promise, to the intent that the people might be thoroughly persuaded, that their going into that land was not by haphazard, nor their winning of so many victories against their enemies was by good fortune (as they term: it) or by their own: strength and policy: but that it was wrought by God's own hand, and all came of his power. True it is that the wonders which were shown at that time, were sufficient enough to have made them believe, so as they needed not to have sought any further.

When the people saw God's scourges upon the Egyptians, was it not a sure record of the divine and heavenly power which showed itself there? Again, whereas they passed the red sea, whereas they were guided with a cloud by day and with a fire by night, whereas they, were fed with manna from heaven, and whereas they saw the cloud upon the tabernacle which was a token of God's presence and majesty: should they not have concluded that God bare rule over them and showed himself to be their guide? yes: and yet for all that, Moses beholding the hardheartedness of the people, thought it not enough to tell them of the things which were seen at that time, but also alleged the promise that had been made four hundred years afore.

Behold (says he,) the Lord your GOD will bring you into the land of Canaan. If you ask what proof you have that it is God's hand: you need no long disputing of the matter, you know what promise was made thereof. This heritage then was assigned unto you beforehand by the free goodness of your God, even before you were borne. If God had given this land simply to the people of Israel without promising of it before: it had been somewhat the darksome

But seeing that GOD made an agreement and as it were a solemn league with Abraham, Saying, this is the sign that I enter into covenant with you and with your offspring this day, namely that you shall inherit this land howbeit, that shall not be presently, but you yourself must live and die there as a stranger, and also they that come of you and their offspring likewise must be sojourners in a strange land, and be there vexed and grieved with continual tyranny: nevertheless they shall return thence at the end of four hundred years, and then will I perform my promise: Does it not appear by these sayings, that God wrote in that behalf? Should any further proof be sought thereof? may not even blind folks feel it with their hands? We see then for what purpose Moses alleges here those promise that had been made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: yea and God's rehearsing of his promise again, was a larger proof thereof, so as the thing became the better known and of more authority. Indeed the people are also put in mind therewithal, that this inheritance befell them not by their own policy, nor for any worthiness that was in themselves, nor was conquered by their own power or strength, but was given them freely of God, so as it behooved them to acknowledge that they had received it, and that their possessing of it was not as though they had obtained it by their own power. The Lord (says he) promised you this land. At what time? When none of them was yet born or bred. Then could they not have earned or deserved aught. And therefore it behooved them to acknowledge that God's only free gift was the cause of it, and that they obtained not anything but through his free bestowed mercy, because it pleased him so to do. For men will never sufficiently perceive themselves bound unto God, until they be utterly bereft of all their merits and that it be showed them that they have not anything of their own to bring, but that it is God which does all, not of duty, but of good will. Men must be fully persuaded of that, or else they will never duly perceive themselves to be bound unto God.

And whereas Moses speaks afterward of the great and goodly Cities, of houses full of goddness, of vineyards, olive gardens, and of all other commodities: it is to make the people to understand the better, that God dealt not niggardly with them, but had powered forth his treasures, to the intent that they should be the more provoked to serve him. And that is another point well worthy to be marked. For so long as God deals with us but after the ordinary manner, we will not perceive that he is willing to be our, father, because we consider but the order of nature and stand musing thereupon. That then was the cause why God vouchsafed to add the full measure of all liberality, by handling his people as is showed here, so as he gave them not a mean land, that was neither barren nor abundant, of which sort some are to be found: but he gave them fair and strong cities, thoroughly furnished, and grounds thoroughly manured. Seeing it is so: the people ought to have been the more provoked to acknowledge, that seeing God had showed himself so bountiful, it became not them to fall asleep, but to know him to whom they were so greatly bound. And it is said expressly here, that the people should possess the things which they had not made, or gotten to themselves. There is not any thing of your own labor, says he. Did you build the houses wherein you dwelled: or shall dwell? (For he speaks here of the time to come.) When you come into the land, you shall find fair houses, and that of other men's building: you shall find all manner of household stuff and necessities ready made: you shall find vineyards and olive gardens thoroughly planted: you shall want nothing: you shall find wells ready dug: for that land had not water at will. We know what pain and distress the holy fathers were driven unto, only to have water for themselves and their cattle, namely how they were driven from place to place, yea and that not for any precious things, but when they dug some poor pit, their neighbors came and drove them from it. Not without cause therefore is here express mention made of pits or wells, to show that the people should find all commodities there, without the putting too of one finger to take any pains for them.

And therefore he adds, take good heed that thou forget not the Lord thy God when thou art full. This is the chief matter which we have to way. For Moses does us to understand, that men are a kin to resty horses: if they be over pampered, they fall to kicking, and will not be handled nor ordered any more: and this similitude is set down more expressly in the second and thirtieth chapter. But in this place he shows plainly, that overmuch case is the cause of willful stubbornness: so that if God. has once pampered us, we forget him, and play the drunkards so as we cannot order ourselves in such wise in the enjoying of the benefits which he bestows upon us, as to yield him thanks for them and to serve him the more effectually, but contrariwise we devour them up with such greediness and excess, as our nature becomes utterly brutish, and God has no more authority, over us, but we be are ourselves in hand that we could well enough forbear him. You see then that men become brutish through pleasures and abundance of wealth. And that is the thing which Moses has noted here, in saying: take good heed that thou forget not the Lord God when thou art full.

Finally he concludes, that we must fear God, and honor him, and take him for our GOD, which thing he betokens by this word Swear. For whereas those people are commanded o swear by te name of God, as we shall see more fully hereafter: it serves to show how it was his will that they should keep the Religion that was given them by te law, and not mingle it with any idolatry, so as they might thoroughly protest that they had not any moe Gods than that one which had showed himself by his law and word. That is the effect of the matter which is contained here. Indeed the land of Canaan which had been promised to the fathers of old time, and given to the people of Israel by so many miracles, had more to be considered in it, than have the countries wherein the faithful dwell at this day. For we be not settled in them by the. mighty and miraculous hand of God, as it showed it self in those days. But yet for all that we must come back to this point, that none of us comes into this world by his own power, and that our dwelling in it is the singular benefit of God. For there should be no earth at all, if God listed not to assign it unto men.

It is for our sakes that the seas and waters withhold themselves: or else they would overflow and drown the whole earth. And therefore although there were no more but the order of nature, it were a miracle great enough to show us that God vouchsafes to nourish us here. We know what is said in another text which we shall see hereafter: that is to wit that God did spread out his meet lines over all the nations of the world, so as he divided the countries and did set the bounds of them. Then let us understand, that we cannot be in any nook or corner of the world, without God's maintaining of us there, nor but airy place to dwell in, which is not given us of his free favor. And as the land of Canaan was dedicated to the service of God at that time: so is the whole world consecrated thereunto at this day. For it is said that our Lord Jesus Christ is a king, and that he has enlarged his dominion from the one end of the world to the other. Wherefore let us understand, that our Lord's setting of us here and his maintaining of us here, is to receive such praise at our hands as he deserves.

Now it is certain that we must live of our labor, and most men shall not have the world at will, but a number have much a do to get bread, and God will handle them very hardly: but yet howsoever they fare one bit of bread is enough to make them beholden to the Lord. Yea and although men labor for their living yet must they be fully resolved of this which we shall see hereafter, namely that it is not their labor that find them, but the blessing of God, whereby the children of Israel were fed in the wilderness. Truth it is that the falling of the Manna from heaven was a more manifest token. But yet howsoever the case stand, God has left a continual president, that by what means so ever we live: it is he that maintains us, and it is at his hand that we receive both sustenance and nourishment and all that ever we have. You see then that no man can exempt himself from serving of his God, and from showing by our deeds that we think ourselves beholden unto him, both for our life and for all things belonging thereunto. Again the more bountifully and liberally that GOD deals with us, the more ought we to be provoked to serve him. Therefore let every of us on his own behalf learn to bear God's benefits well in mind. Let not the poor murmur though they wot not oftentimes which way to turn them: but let them assure themselves that GOD will so bless the little which they have, as it shall well enough sustain them to live therewith. And as for the richer sort which have more abundance; let them understand that God's showing of himself so gracious towards them, is to the end they should the better know him and honor him.

For although the riche sort may now and then allege that they have taken much pain in gathering the things which they possess, or that they have attained to them by some other mean, and that they have them by succession from their fathers and ancestors: Yet will not God lose his right for (as I said afore) it is his blessing that makes men rich. Therefore they that possess most must know that God's being liberal to them after that fashion, is to the end to binds them the strenghtlyer to him, and to allure them the more to settle and honor him as their father, yea and as a kindhearted father which desires nothing but to give his children their full of all good things, so as they may not want any thing.

Thus have we here a general rule: which is, that after as GOD gives us cease and the commodities of this world, so must we be the more disposed to love him: for that gentleness of his draws us unto him. And when we have so tasted of his goodness and found savor in it: needs must there be too great unkindness and churlishness in us, if we be not moved to love him as we ought to do. And that must be not only in our eating and drinking, but also in all things that concerns this present life. As for example, if GOD give us peace and quietness whiles others are in trouble or at wars: if we be un-vexed of plagues and diseases, while we see a number of other folks afflicted: let us understand that our Lord allures us gently unto him, and would fain win us by such kindnesses, and therefore if we vouchsafe not to come unto him, we shall pay right dear for the things that we shall have received at his hand. True it is that God requires not any payment at our hands: for we have not anything to give him: but yet will he have us to be thankful towards him for our duty's sake. If we do not so: it must be laid to our charge, that being not his children, we have treacherously robbed him of his goods.

For what right have we to the enjoying of them, but that he is our father? And if we honor him not dare we say we be of the number and company of his children? And that is the cause why Saint Paul is so hot against such as return not unto GOD when he spurs them. What meant you wretches (says he?) know you not that you abuse the great treasures of God's goodness? For his dealing so gently with you, is as an alluring of you to repentance. True it is that GOD does sometimes chastise us sharply, to waken us and to make us know our faults, that we may be sorry for them: But yet for all that, if he deal mildly with us, it is as much to say as he would fain win us by friendly means, as has been said already. Now if this can bear no sway with us, we show ourselves to be too lewd, and that, we despise God's goodness, yea and that we make but a scorn and mock of it. And therefore must horrible vengeance hang over our heads, according as S. Paul threatens in the foresaid place, to all such as abide hard hearted and stubborn in their vices, when God bears with them. And now let us look to ourselves. For although every man's state be not so wealthy as he would wish: yet are we handled very gently in respect of others. What remains but that our Lord should enter into account with us, if we on our side have no lust to serve him, and that the ease and rest which he gives us, be not applied to show that we take him for our father indeed, forasmuch as he handles us as his children? If we (say I) acknowledge not this: then shall not our un-thankfulness escape unpunished.

Also by the way let us not forget how Moses exhorts here the people of Israel to beware that they forget not the Lord when they were well fed and grown full. But seeing that we be inclined to such forwardness as well as they, let us consider our own disease, that we may seek remedy for it. For though there were no more but this one point: it were enough to occasion men to dislike of themselves, and to be ashamed. For we be as monsters against kind: insomuch that whereas God offers himself to us, and reaches us his hand; so as if we saw him in his own person, we could have no greater assurance of the fatherly love that he bears us, than that he is so liberal! that we may have our fill of his benefits: yet notwithstanding we forget him even when he puts us in minds of him, not only by speaking to us, but also by showing us by experience that he knits himself to us, and has a care of us in watching over us; not only for the saving of our souls, but also for the nourishing of our bodies, feeding us like little babes, and as it were stretching out of his wings over us, as a hen does over her chickens, as comparison is made in the Holy Scripture. Seeing that God gives us such proof of his goodness, and also knits himself unto us, of purpose to gather us together and to take us up to himself were it not a devilish madness to forget him, and to turn our backs upon him, and to shut our eyes against him, yea and to conceive so excessive rage as to say, we will not think upon him that seeks us, is not this a devilish madness? Yes: and yet is there not any of us all, that can excuse himself to be unsubject to such naughtiness. So then, this text ought of right to humble us, and to make us ashamed afore GOD, because we see we be so malicious and spiteful as not to regard God when he is near us, nor to wake and open our eyes that we might see his goodness when it is showed unto us, yea even after so evident and easy a manner. That is the thing which we have to remember. True it is that we make common proverbs of it, but in the meanwhile no man thinks upon it. We say that nothing mares men but ease: we say that overmuch wealth makes men unwieldy: and yet in the meanwhile the same thing befalls us, and none of us finds fault with himself. And although God prevent us and blame us, and do us such shame as to make us hear of it: yet will not we think upon it. Notwithstanding it is not written in vain, When thou hast thy fill of the benefits of thy God, beware that thou forget him not. Wherefore let us mark, that prosperity of it self ought to provoke us to resort to God, because it is all one as if he should reach out his hands and arms unto us. Like as when a father offers his child a thing and says to him, Come hither and hold out his arms: so likewise God's desire in bestowing his benefits upon us, is nothing else but to see us quiet, as it were in his lap or under his wings. Now then, if we have an eye to the order of nature: prosperity should draw us to God, and make us well minded to serve him: and yet notwithstanding, we see how we despise both GOD and nature and all kindness, and become worse than wild beasts: For whereas GOD allures us to him after that gentle manner: we turn our backs upon him; and instead of coming to him, retire from him: nay (which worse is) we kick against him: For it is not enough for men to despise God's goodness, and to stop their eyes and to devour all the, good things which they have, without knowing who gives them: but also they proceed so far as to rush against him and to gnashing their teeth at him, : and to spurning at him. If a man should liken us to swine, we would think he did us great wrong. And yet are swine contented with rooting in the ground, to fill themselves with the Acorns that are fallen down, and they be not so fierce as to fall to rending down of the tree, they leap not up against it, they byte not the boughs, they have their groins hanging always downward. As for us we play indeed the swine, because we have always our groins in the earth: insomuch that When we exam ourselves never so full, there is none of us which lifts up his mind on high to say, it is God's hand that gives us this thing: but either we impute all things to our own policy, or we think that the game comes of ourselves, or we imagine that it happens us by some chance, and to be short we never think of God. But besides this, we fall to spiting of him we cast out our fury and rage against him, we strike at him with our tusks, we withstand him stubbornly to the uttermost of our power, and we could find in our hearts that his justice were utterly abolished. For we tread it under foote, as much as in us lies. We see then that we be worse than swine, and worse than the vilest brute beasts that are, yea we be even unkindly monsters.

But behold, our God calls us to him by this exhortation, wherein we see the patience which he uses towards us. If a father had handled his child as gently as could be, far above the common manner, and the child should thereupon grow proud and despise his father: would not the father bear him such displeasure, as to disdain to open his mouth to him, to tell him of any thing because of his despising of him after that fashion? Yes. Then is it most certain that we be much less to be borne with when it falls out, that we resist GOD who is more worth than all the fathers in the world, without comparison. So then, should he not have just cause to let us alone as we be, when he sees that we have no minds of him, and that even his benefits are an occasion unto us to despise him, so as we turn them the clean contrary way from the lawful use whereunto he had ordained them? Might he not justly leave us in that state as cursed creatures and unworthy that ever he should open his mouth to speak to us? Yes: and yet for all that he comes to seek us. Behold (says he) I know you be inclined to forget me, when I have fed you well and fat, and the more abundance that you have, the more you refuse to come to me, and therefore you deserve to be shaken off, and that I should never remember you any more. Yet notwithstanding, my desire is not that you should perish, but that you should return unto me. What naughtiness or lewdness so ever I espy in you, I am contented to take you still for my children, I will prevent the vices whereto you be given: therefore take heed that you forget me not when you be at your ease. Seeing that our Lord bears with us after that fashion, ought it not to break our hearts though they were harder than stone?

So then, first of all let us mistrust prosperity. Indeed we covet it, and for the love thereof we shun the things that are hard and cumbersome. If we suffer hunger and thirst, it grieves us, and we never leave storming until God have provided for it: but yet for all that it would be more for our profit oftentimes, to endure hunger than to have abundance. Howsoever the ease stands, whensoever God bestows his benefits upon us, let us have prosperity in suspicion, as I said afore. Not that it ought of itself so to deceive us and blindfold our eyes, as we should not know God: but for that it behooves us to perceive our own nature to be so sinful and evil given, as we cannot profit ourselves by any of the benefices which we receive at God's hand. Yea and we see how even Salomon was afraid to be over rich, for fear of advancing himself against God, least he should despise him and forsake him. See here how Salomon who was induced with so excellent gifts of grace, did nevertheless see the frailty of man to be such, that when he had all that his heart could wish, yet he might forget himself, and be oversotted as he should fall to renouncing of God by advancing himself against him. Now then, let us live in fear and awe, and if God give us not such abundance as we would desire, but do cut our morsels very small: let us understand that the fame is for our benefice, in that we have need to be dieted, for fear least fatness stop our eyes, and so make us stark blind. If we think well upon this; it will make us to bear poverty the more patiently. When we want our pleasures and delights, when we want our delicate morsels and when we want abundance to fill ourselves withal: let us know that our Lord has a regard to holds us in awe by that mean: for we should be in danger of forgetting him, if we should grow too fat. And therefore when we have wealth at will, let us bethinks us thus: why was it said to the people of Israel, forget not thy GOD when thou hast thy fill? It was because men can not brook their wealth, in so much that if they have all that they have need of, yea and more too: they overshoot themselves, they play the loose colts, they arms themselves against GOD, and they have no more care of him. Is the wind in that door? Let us learn to have God always before our eyes: so as if he deal graciously with us and give us more than he does to other men, we may have the skill to consider, See how my God comes to me, and to what intent but that I should be as it were brooded under his wings, and live obediently towards him, honoring him and referring my whole life to the glorifying of his holy name, so as it may be as a bond whereby to bind me straight unto him, than others on who he has not bestowed the like benefits as he has done upon me? Thus you see that both poor and rich ought to tend to Godward, each one according to his degree.

Again, the comparing of the people of Israel with ourselves ought to quicken us up yet better, to stand upon our garde. It is said, when the Lord thy GOD shall have given thee thy sill. And of what goods? Of wine which thou shall have gathered of other men's labors, and of all other things to live by which thou haste not earned: when thy God have fed thee so of his owns free goodness, see thou forget him not. If the people of Israel might forget GOD having had most apparent records of the favor that was she wed unto them: what will become of us which are held here under the common order of nature? For we have no miracles to spur us forth to Godward: we have not a land of Canaan as a special elected and chosen dwelling place. And therefore we might easily forget GOD than that people could, if we should not remember this present lesson early and late. And for as much as we see our own coldness, let us learn to match the spiritual benefits as well which God has bestowed upon us heretofore as which we look for hereafter, with the things that pertains to the maintenance of this transitory life. True it is that although we thought upon no more than the things that are given us for this body: yet were we sufficiently bound to God, yea and a hundred fold more than we could discharge ourselves of. Notwithstanding, besides all this, our Lord gives us cause enough to serve him, in that he grants us so many spiritual benefits that belong to the saving of our souls, whereof we have a portion already. For whereof comes says? whereof comes it that we be grafted into the body of our Lord Jesus Christ by being baptized in his name, and that we be taken into God's household to be avowed for his children? Whereof come these things but of his giving of the spirit of adoption unto us, to the intent we should call upon him as our father, be assured of the heavenly heritage, stand in awe of him, and live according to his word? And is not this doing of his a special gift? Yes, and yet besides this, there is a life prepared for us, whereof we have but only a taste as yet. For we have received (as you would say) some first fruits of it: but we shall not have the full fruition of it, until God have taken us quite and clean away to himself: it is enough for us as now, that we follow after it aloof. Now then since we see that besides those things which our Lord gives us for our bodies and for this transitory life, he has also given us benefits far noble and precious, as which do lead us to his everlasting kingdom; must it not need be that we be too lewd, if we be not drawn unto him? And if we take occasion to forget him for all his drawing of us unto him after that sort: what horrible damnation deserve we for such unthankfulness? You see then in effect, that the thing which we have to remember upon this place, is that every of us must bethink him of the great number of benefits which he has received at God's hand, and which we receive still day by day: and that the same must stir us up to put ourselves continually forward in going towards him, and teach us to do him homage for all things and in all respects. For we defile all his benefits, if the end whereunto we refer them be not the honoring and glorifying of him.

Again as touching the goods of this world: let us understand that our Lord cannot devise to do so little for us, or to give us so slender a portion of them, but we shall be exceedingly much beholden to him though he do no more: but if we perceives that he deals gently with us, and that he bears with us: that ought to quicken us up and to provoke us so much the more to come unto him. And therewithal let us beware that our unthankfulness lead us not to forget him, seeing it is not for naught that he warns his people here by the mouth of Moses, to beware that they forget him not when they came to the enjoying of the benefits which he would bestow upon them. For we have examples thereof even among ourselves. I pray you has not GOD wrought after a wonderful fashion here in planting of his Gospel, and moreover uttered his blessings in such sort, as they that perceive them not, must spite of their teeth know that he has showed his mighty arm? nevertheless I shall not need as now to blame men's unthankfulness, it is too apparent and openly known. For have not many been ashamed, yea and are not many ashamed still, to bethink themselves of the miserable state out of which God has delivered them? We hear how Moses says here, Forget not thy GOD which brought thee out of the land of bondage or bondmen. As if he should say, when GOD shall have granted you the grace, to dwell quietly in the land which he will give you in possession: call to mind the state wherein you have been, that you may acknowledge the good which GOD has done you in delivery you from it. Here then are two things done you to understand: The one is, that the present benefits must provoke you to honor him that has showed himself so liberal towards you: [and the other is,] that the remembering of your former miseries, must always humble you and hold you in awe, so as ye mount not up in pride to like well of yourselves and to be puffed up, nor the prosperity that is given that make you to forget what bondage you have been in.

Now although this was spoken to the children of Israel, I pray you does it not fitly agree unto us? Ought not we to consider well to whom we be beholden for this change, that God has vouchsafed to give his children (as you would say) a quiet nest here, so as they which were oppressed and overlaid with bondage and tyranny, are now at full liberty, and enjoy the things which they never hoped nor looked for? Seeing then that our Lord shows himself so gracious, are we on our side to be excused, if we fear him not? Though all the world might be acquit, and all men scape God's hand for unknowing him: yet deserve we to be condemned in that behalf. But ought not the remembrance of all the miseries whereout we be scape, to be so printed in our hearts as we might live continually in awe of our God? And although we have prosperity as now, let it not puff us up nor minister occasion to us to stand too much in our own conceits. And generally, ought not all Citizens, Burgesses, yea and strangers of Geneva to bethink themselves thus? It is not long ago since we were in such bondage and tyranny in this City, as there was no likelihood that ever we should have scaped them. Nay rather we seemed to have been as a people forlorn and past hope of recovery: and yet has our GOD looked mercifully upon our miseries, and provided remedy for them, and that after such sort as men would never have thought, and as surmounted our desire The Citizens and Burgesses that have been privy to the calamities and miseries from the which GOD has delivered them, have they not good cause to magnify such goodness and mercy? And as for the strangers whom God has conveyed hither as it were into his fold, ought they not to consider thus with themselves? Alas, we were as in the gulf of hell in the horrible desolation of the popedom, and God has pitied us, insomuch that he has reached us his hand to take us thence and to bring us hither into his Church, that we might worship him with one common accord:

Now then let us put this text in vre, seeing it was not written only for the people of Israel, but also ought to serve us nowadays more than ever it did. For seeing that the Gospel is preached unto us, should we look for an Angel from heaven, to give us larger certainty, when we see that God has so ratified his doctrine already for our instruction?

Now let us kneel downs in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to mortify us in all our affections and wicked lusts, and to renew us so gain, that being governed by his holy Ghost, we may desire nothing but to submit ourselves unto him, and to profit more and more in his doctrine, that we may be settled in his fear and love, even until he have rid us of all imperfections and vices. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, and c.

e have seen heretofore, that the wellspring of all mischief is the forgetting of our God after he has once showed himself to us, and that we have once known his will. And this is the warning that Moses gave unto the people, that when they had once their sill of God's benefits, they should not forget him to whom, they were so greatly bound. Pursuing still the same matter, he adds, Fear the Everlasting, your God. Wherein he shows what it is to mind God aright: namely that it is not a bare musing or speaking of him only, but a yielding of his due honor unto him. For it is not possible that we should think upon God and not be moved to honor him unless we make an idol of him? For when God's majesty comes to our remembrance, must it not need touch us to humble ourselves under the same? Ought we not to underhand that he has created us with condition to be wholly at this devotion, and to dedicate ourselves to his service? Then let us mark, that the remembering of God imports the reverencing of him. And so, to fear GOD, and not to forget him, are two grounds which are so knit together as they cannot be put asunder. Again, unto Fear Moses adds Service, that is to say, the worshipping of him. For the term Service betokens a dutiful submission and reverence, when men humble themselves before GOD, and yield him the honor that is due to him to serve him withal, and is said of it here. Fear then goes for most; and from the same fear proceeds the dutiful submission that we yield unto him. I told you t hat it is all one as if we should protect, that we hold our life and all our goods of him, and that he is worthy to hold us under his subjection, and that we should glorify him in all respects, by referring all our works to the honoring of him. Thirdly he adds that men should swear by the name of God, which is a kind of confessing of our faith. For we have seen heretofore, that such as swear (I mean as they ought to swear) do take their oath by the name of God, because that only he is the sufficient witness of the truth, and will judge all such as turn his truth into leasing. And so in this text Moses shows again, that when we have worshipped GOD, we must also make a declaration of our faith, so as men may perceive us to be his people, and that he reigns among us, that we be free from all superstition and idolatry, and that we hold none other religion than that which the living GOD has given us. That is the sum of the things contained here.

Now that we may fare the better by this doctrine, we must understand that GOD accepts not any service at our hands, except that first and foremost we have learned to fear him, that is to say, to yield him such reverence, as to be desirous to obey him, and to be ruled by him, and to grant him all superiority over us. Then if men take never to much travelling doing this and that, and in the meanwhile have not the fear of GOD rooted in their hearts: all that ever they do is but vanity and lost labor. And therefore let not our only hands and feet be applied to well doing, neither let our endeavor be so employed upon outward works, as the said root should not go before: But let us conceive such knowledge of GOD, as our whole seeking may be to submit ourselves unto him, so as we may say, Seeing that GOD has shaped us, is it not reason that he should. Now then let us put this text in use, seeing it was not written only for the people of Israel, but also ought to serve us nowadays more than ever it did. For seeing that the Gospel is preached to us, should we look for an Angel from heaven, to give us larger certainty, when we see that God has so ratified his doctrine already for our instruction?

Chapter

13 You shall fear, & c.

14 You shall not walk after other Gods, I mean the Gods of the Nations which are round about you:

15 (For the Lord, you God is a jealous God in the midst of you:) for fear least the wrath of the Lord you God be kindled against you, and he root the you out of the Land.

We have seen heretofore, that we wellspring of all mischief is the forgetting of our God after he has once showed himself to us, and that we have once known his will. And this is the warning that Moses gave to the people, that when they had once their fill of God's benefits, they should not forget him to whom they were so greatly bound. Pursuing still the same matter, he adds, Fear the Everlasting, your God, Wherein he shows what it is to mind God aright: namely that it is not a bare musing or speaking of him only, but a yielding of his due honor to him. For it is not possible that we should think upon God and not be moved to honor him unless we make an idol of him. For when God's majesty comes to our remembrance, must it not needs touch us to humble ourselves under the same? Ought we not to understand that he has created us with condition to be wholly at this devotion, and to dedicate ourselves to his service? Then let us mark, that the remembering of God imports the reverencing of him. And so, To fear GOD, and not to forget him, are two grounds which are so knit together as they cannot be put asunder. Again, to Fear Moses adds Service, that is to say, the worshipping of him. For the term Service betokens a dutiful submission and reverence, when men humble themselves before GOD, and yield him the honor that is due to him to serve him withal, as is said of it here. Fear then goes for most: and from the same fear proceeds the dutiful submission that we yield to him. I told you that it is all one as if we should protest, that we hold our life and all our goods of him, and that he is worthy to hold us under his subjection, and that we should glorify him in all respects, by referring all our works to the honoring of him. Thirdly he adds that men should swear by the name of God, which is a kind of confessing of our faith. For we have seen heretofore, that such as swear (I mean as they ought to swear) do take their oath by the name of God, because that only he is the sufficient witness of the truth, and will judge all such as turn his truth into leasing. And so in this text Moses shows again, that when we have worshipped GOD, we must also make a declaration of our faith, so as men may perceive us to be his people, and that he reigns among us, that we be free from all superstition and idolatry, and that we hold none other religion than that which the living GOD has given us. That is the sum of the things contained here.

Now, that we may far the better by this doctrine, we must understand that GOD accepts not any service at our hands, except that first and foremost we have learned to fear him, that is to say, to yield him such reverence, as to be desirous to obey him, and to be ruled by him, and to grant him all superiority over us. Then if men take never so much travel in doing this and that, and in the meanwhile have not the fear of GOD rooted in their hearts: all that ever they do is but vanity and lost labor. And therefore let not our only hands and feet be applied to well doing, neither let our endeavor be so employed upon outward works, as the said root should not go before: But let us conceive such knowledge of GOD, as our whole seeking may be to submit ourselves to him, so as we may say. Seeing that GOD has shaped us, is it not reason that he should reign over us? Seeing we be his creatures, should we not offer ourselves to him with all humility, that he might enjoy us? Seeing we hold all our goods of hi, is it not reason that we should do him homage for them, and that our life should be dedicated to him? Seeing he has done us the honor to be our father, ought we not to yield him childish obedience? This is the point which we must begin at, if we will keep God's Law, to please him well all our life long. Here withal let us mark what was said before: namely that in thinking upon God, we must not imagine a dead thing, but we must set his glorious majesty before our eyes, that we may be touched with the foresaid fear of him.

Moreover, when we fear our God, let us learn also to worship him. For if a man boast that he fears God, and in the meanwhile despise all his commandments, so as he regards not to do him honor to whom he knows himself to be subject: is it not too gross hypocrisy? Then let us mark that the fear of God brings with it a desirousness to serve him, and to direct our whole life according to his commandments, and specially to yield him the dutiful submission which he requires in our worshipping of him. For the mean whereby he will be separated from idols, is that whereas the hearten and unbelievers worship God's invented of their own brain: we must show ourselves to have none other than the living

God. And why? For by our yielding of that honor to him, we reject all the fancies that have been devised by men. And therefore with our fearing of the Lord, let us learn to show by our deeds, that our whole desire is to serve him.

Now this service is properly inward: that is to say, the chief points thereof are, that we put our whole trust in him, that we acknowledge all our good things to come of him, that we call upon him with the said trust, and that we yield him the praise of all things that he bestows upon us. This consists not in bare Ceremoniousness, but it lies altogether in the heart. And like as we must worship God by acknowledging all our good things to come of him, and that it is his only goodness whereto we be beholden, both for this present life and also for the hope of our salvation: so on the other part, we must make men privy to this our spiritual service which we yield to God, that they may commonly bear record thereof and be edified by our example. And all this respects the swearing that Moses speaks of here, saying, You shall swear by the name of your God.

It should seem at the first blush, that here is no great reason in this case: for we be but too forward and ready of ourselves to swear, without any furtherance thereto at God's hand. Why then does Moses take order that we should swear by the name of GOD? By all likelihood he should rather have commanded us to abstain from all oaths, and have said, You shall not swear in any wise at all. But (as I have touched already) when oaths be made lawfully and according to God's Law, we show that it is he whom we worship, and whose people we covet to be. Now let us consider the right use of oaths. The right use is, that if need require that the truth must be witnessed and warranted: then God must be brought in as a pledge. As how? He named himself the truth: and therefore in things unknown to men, we cannot have a fitter witness than him. When a man swears faithfully in a matter that is not known, saving that men would get the confession thereof at his hand: if he take the name of God [to witness], it is to show that he goes to work unfoundedly: like as in a case of Justice, if the Judge being desirous to find out the certainty at a witnesses hand, do cause him to lift up his hand to GOD: such swearing is as it were a doing of homage to GOD, as though the party should say: I know that GOD is the truth, and the judge of men's hearts, and I protest here that I speak as in his presence, even in truth, knowing well that I shall yield him an account of my saying.

Thus you see that the true use of oaths and swearing, is to warrant and ratify the truth when it is not known to men, in which kind of case God must be set as Judge, and the deponent must protest that he speaks as before him, to the intent there may be no counterfeiting at all. But yet is it not meant that it is Lawful for us to swear [in all cases], though we say the truth. For it may be that the matters are not of such weight and importance, that God's name should be avouched: and then were it an un-hallowing or defiling of it. But if the matter deserve it and require it: then does God lend us his name, as has been declared in the last chapter before. He uses such courtesy towards us, as he is contented that we shall borrow his name to the end that the truth may be warranted by his record.

Thus we see now, after what sort it is lawful for us to swear: that is to know, when there is such a case as deserves it, and again when we cannot otherwise satisfy men, to show them that the thing which we say is certain and true, that they ought to stand to it. After that manner does God give us leave to swear by his name.

Now seeing it is so that he which swears does call God to witness, and also submit himself to punishment if he shall have abused his holy and sacred name: is it not a doing of homage to God? For our swearing by him is because he has sovereign Dominion over us, because it belongs to him to search our hearts, because he must be our judge, and because we must yield account of our whole life before him.

Seeing it is so that all that ever belongs to the one only God, is contained in an oath: must it not needs follow that it is a curled superstition, when we swear by the name of an idol? Yes: for the honor that is due to the only one God, is conveyed away to the creature. All they therefore which swear by any other than by the name of God, do show themselves unworthy to be his people, yes and that it is not long of them that they bereave him not of his due homage. Now we see how it was not for naught that Moses has told us here, that we must swear by the name of God. And indeed when the prophets intend to show that the right Religion shall be set up everywhere, they say that all tongues shall swear by the name of God. The heathen men likewise had the same opinion, that their swearing by their idols was a token of their serving of them. And that was comprehended under the worship which they yielded to them. If they had not imagined that there was some divine majesty in an idol: they would never have sworn by the name of it. True it is that afterward they disguised their oaths, so as they swear likewise by their kings and princes: but that flattery was an un-hallowing of God's name, and they themselves knew full well that they were blameworthy in so doing. For in going about to flatter men, they unjustly snatched to their idols that honor which they pretended to be due to them. Seeing that the Infidels knew that an oath is kind of worshipping, should not they have been rightly taught, have a much more surer rule? Yes: and therefore let us mark well, that Moses in commanding men to swear by none but by the name of God, shows that therein they do him the honor of acknowledging him for only Judge, and attribute to him the office of searching men's hearts and thoughts, and of betraying the things that are secret and hidden, and finally acknowledge him to be the certain and infallible truth, and therefore that he is able to be sufficient witness thereof. That is the effect of that which he meant to say.

Now hereby we see, that such as swear by the names of creatures are idolatries, and rob God of the protestations which he will have men to make to him, inasmuch as he will have none to be so honored but himself. It is a common thing among the Papists to swear by the virgin Mary and by the rest of the saints. True it is, that men have not thought that to be so great evil: but although there were no more but that, yet there appears to be manifest idolatry in so doing. For why? They that swear by the virgin Mary, do set her in God's feat, as though it belonged to her to judge the world: and a man could not devise to do greater wrong to our Lord Jesus Christ, than to attribute that thing to her which is given to him alone, yes and given to him in respect that he is God manifested in the flesh. Again, they attribute to her the searching and knowing of men's secret thoughts, which tide the Holy Scripture reserves peculiarly to God. Then is it horrible treachery to swear by the Virgin Mary, or by any other creature. And would God this superstition were utterly abolished among us, that it might never be had in remembrance any more. But what? There are a number of willful folk, from whom that cursed custom cannot be taken, and say what you will to them, they continue doted in it, insomuch that if a man do so point them to it with his finger, that as blind as they be they may set the mean how to yield God his due honor: yet all is one with them, they will not in any wise be made to believe it. And why? Because the devil has bewitched them. Howsoever the case stand let us note that all such as swear by any other name than by the name of God, are idolatries. And why? I told you the reason before: namely because we cannot swear by the name of God, but we must confess that he is our judge, and that it is only he to whom it belongs to know our secret thoughts, and to punish us for falsifying his truth and for turning of it into a lie, whereas we should bear witness to it. And let us mark that one kind is put for all of that sort. By reason whereof we be commanded, not only to swear by the name of God, but also to yield such confession of him before men, as we may show ourselves to be his people indeed, and that we would fine that he should reign among us, and that his name should be glorified. And so let us extend this lesson generally to the honoring of God, so that if the case concern religion, we given not that thing to creatures, which our Lord tells us is peculiar to himself. And therefore when so ever we speak of the name of God, let us yield him all that belongs to him, let those things be reserved to him, and let us not bereave him of his honor, to give it away by pieces and collapse to men and other creatures. This extends very far. Nevertheless it is enough for us to be admonished in fair words, that when Moses says we must swear by the name of God it is as much as if he should say, my friends, like as you worship the Lord, so must you also maintain his honor before men. Insomuch that if any man will compel you to transform or change your religion, you shall not suffer it in any case whatsoever: but stand still in this incorruptness to say, we have the one God who has called us to him, and both created and redeemed us: and therefore it is good reason that we should be his heritage, and continue wholly his. Thus you see in effect what Moses meant to utter in this text.

But here we see the forwardness that is in men, which is a thing greatly to be lamented. For an oath (as I said) ought to be a record of that honor which we yield to God: and we see how men clean contrariwise will needs spite him in using of oaths. First of all, when men swear unadvisedly, is it not a manifest despising of God's name? It must be rapt out when there is neither why nor wherefore. The talk shall be but of mirth and laughter: and yet notwithstanding God's name must be mingled with it. And is not that too great and too shameful a scorning of him? Nay moreover, a man's patience is no sooner stirred, so as he enters into a little choler: but by and by god's name must answer for it. In so much that it is not enough for them to come out their rage against their neighbors, but they must also step up against God, and show themselves wide and stark mad. And they be no simple oaths which they use: but oaths matched with blasphemy, whereby the majesty of God's name is as good as trampled underfoot. Oaths are referred to nothing less than to the end that I speak of, (that is to wit to the glorifying of God among us) when they be applied to so devilish outrages as the willful defying of God, and the scorning of his name, by tossing it to and fro like a tennis ball, without yielding any reverence to it. And therefore let us learn that it is too detestable advice when trifling oaths are so rise among us, and also that in our cholerick passions of impatience God's name should be so rent and torn, and that men are not contented to have sworn after some simple manner, but also take up kinds of oaths that are matched with blasphemy, so as it appears that their intent is to make war against God, and even to spy him when they cannot be revenged of men. Thus you see what we have to mark upon this text. Therefore to be short, let us understand it is not enough for us, that the spiritual service which we owe to God be yielded incorruptly to him: that is to know, that we put our trust in him, that we call upon him, and that we offer him our souls and bodies in sacrifice: but we must also show openly before men what religion we hold of, and we must make it known that we be separated from all the defilements of the Infidels and unbelievers. The thing which is expressly required here, is that when oaths are to be used, we must use them with such sobriety as God may be glorified, and that when so ever we swear, we must bear in mind that God is to be revered as our judge, and offer ourselves in such wise before him, as he suffer not any falsehood to abide unpunished, and as we yield to him the office of searching even our hearts. If we deal so: then shall our oaths be holy to him, and accepted as a part and portion of the service that he requires and allows. And by that means we shall abhor and loath not only the blasphemies whereby he is spied out of measure: but also all fond and trifling oaths, that are made without cause or reason. Thus we see in few words what we have to note, and how this text is to be put in use.

Now Moses adds immediately, You shall not follow any other Gods, the Gods of the heathen which dwell round about you. When he fails, you shall not follow any other Gods: he shows us that we cannot mingle the true religion with any abuses, or with anything devised by unbelievers, but by and by all is marred, and God disavows it, as soon as we swerve one way or other from the plain truth, and from the rule that he has given us. For it is not said simply, you shall not renounce your GOD: but they be forbidden to follow any other Gods. So then let us mark well, that if we intend to serve the living God, we must hold ourselves to him alone: and worship him with such incorruptness, as all idols be utterly cast down: and all superstitions cut off and cast behind us. And if this were well observed, we should no more be put to such pains, neither should we have so many bickering as we have. For what cause the troubles that are nowadays in the world, and that there is such division between us and the Papists? For both of us confess that there is but one God: that ground is common to us both, both of us name him the maker of heaven and earth, and both of us take Jesus Christ for our redeemer: and yet notwithstanding we be at so great odds, that the Turks and the Jews are not more divided from us than the Papists are. Whereof comes this? Now that the Papists do utterly renounce GOD: but because they will needs make a mingled and confused hotchpotch of all the Religions of the world. They have raked together all abuses, all Satan's trumpery, and all the superstitions that ever have been: and that term they the service of God. It is no part of their meaning to hold themselves to the pureness of the Holy Scripture, and of the Law and the Gospel: but to the things which they have devised of their own brain. They will needs have those things mingled with the pure feed: and that is such a corruption, as God is utterly shaken off by it. Although men think it not, or at leastwise confess is not with their mouth: yet has he no more place where those things are. So then (as I said before), if this saying which forbids us to follow any other God's were well observed: we might easily agree nowadays with the Papists. For the controversy here concerns not the only name.

True it is that the Papists call not their Saints which they have forged, their Gods: but yet they serve them and worship them as Gods. And therewithal they have devised such laws and ordinances as they think good: and yet the thing which they term God's service, is but utter folly of their own invention. Now it is a flat following of the Gods of the Paynims, when men use strange fashions in the serving of God, and instead of praying to him alone, do call upon the creatures, so as they cannot tell whom to choose when all comes to all. And therefore let us bear well in mind the meaning of Moses: which is, that to worship God aright, we must stick simply to his word: we must stop our ears against all things that are brought us from elsewhere: we must not admit anything but that which we have from God only. Let us then submit it ourselves wholly to the obeying of our god, and not receive anything which proceeds not out of his mouth. And if we follow not that rule, but give ear to all Satan's trumpery, and to all manner of superstitions invented by man: then have strange God's their full scope among us. Although we give them not the name of Gods: yet has not our God the thing that belongs to him for the serving of him according to his only will.

And Moses says expressly, namely the Gods of the nations that dwell roundabout you. As if he should say, it will not serve for excuse to allege contrary examples, that such and such do so: none of all those things will pass in account. But if we will needs shield ourselves with men: our Lord will disallow such shifts. That is the cause why Moses speaks here expressly of the nations that were roundabout them. And therefore let us bear well in mind, that to have the true and right religion, we must not inquire what men do, but we must hear God speak, and agree to whatsoever he says to us. And although we see the whole world against us: yet must we not be abashed. For what are men in comparison of our God? Dare we make such comparison, that men should rather be heard than God, and that they should have more authority than him? But so we do when we be not contented with God's pure and simple word, but allege men's doings and devices to the contrary. Wherefore let us bear well in mind, that we must not esteem the true religion by the ways which we see men walk: but although we be hemmed in roundabout with idolatry, and see nothing but stumbling blocks about us, and we meet with store of encounters to tempt us and to seduce us: yet must we not be moved therefore, but rest steadfastly upon the things which our Lord shall have told us. Have we God's words? Let that suffice us: But let us go on: I see that the world does so, I see men behave themselves after that manner. I see great countries use that fashion. Yes, but yet our Lord does well deserve to be obeyed. Though men draw all the clean contrary way: yet must they not bear such sway with us as to make us to check against our God. Mark it for a special point, that we must renounce all that ever men can say or do, if we intend to serve our God duly. And hereby we see how sore the ignorant wretches and beguiled, which wean themselves to be armed with good defense when they can say, Oh, it was not of mine own devising, it was the fashion of our ancestors and forefathers, they do so in France and Italy. But what does Moses say? Though all the world conspire in superstition, and you sees never so many trades of life differing one from another: yet must you not fleet, but stand fast nevertheless in the faith which you holds from God's word, and has learned of him. Content yourself with that, and defy all men: pass not for the whole world, let it bear no sway at all with you, when the case concerns God's truth. When the case concerns God's truth. Seeing it is so then, let us assure ourselves it is a miserable excuse to allege the examples of men to ground ourselves upon, considering that our Lord will have us receive his word in such wise, as all the world may not be able to thrust us from it. And therewithal let us mark also, that for as much as the devil casts temptations in our ways: we have need to be armed and fenced. It is not without cause said here. You shall not follow after the Gods of the Nations that are about you. For God regards the weakness of his people, and sees that they should soon be turned away from the true and pure religion, if they were not restrained with this bridle. Take heed to yourself, for you shall be tempted, because you shall be beset on all sides with stumbling blocks.

Now if this were spoken in old time to the Jews: it points also to us at this day: for we be not stronger than they were. Let us not bear ourselves in hand that there is such a strength and stoutness in us, that we be able to hold our own when we once know God's truth. For come the devil once to imbrue us with the false doctrine, and to draw us to superstition: we be carried away out of hand. Seeing then that we be so weak: let us learn to fence ourselves against corruptions, that we may beat back temptations when they assail us. And we see in what plight we be. For our Lord holds us here as it were under his hand: whereas in the meanwhile if we look about us, we shall see the wretched world corrupted with all abominations. We see how God's service is utterly defaced, and Idolatry reigns everywhere. Now then if we depended upon men, what would become of us? But seeing it is so that we might be overwhelmed by such stumbling blocks, let us look that we arm ourselves with that which is said here: that is to know, that we may boldly walk on in the Religion which we hold by God's word, and laugh them all to scorn which swerve from it. Accordingly also as there are some which think, alas, shall I be wiser than so many nations whom I see live otherwise? Behold, the great kings, behold, the wisest men of the world hold of that religion: and should I not stand too much in mine own conceit, if I should not agree to it as well as they? The question is not here, whether they or we be the wiser: but whether God ought to bear all the sway and to be acknowledged to be only wise, so as there is nothing but foolishness in us, until we have learned to submit ourselves to him. Therefore let us be fully resolved of this, that we must not turn aside neither one way nor other, though they that dwell about us do hold strange religions: but we must stand fast grounded upon God's word, and hold ourselves contented with this, that he allows us though the world dislike us and condemn us. For we know that if we follow God's word, we shall one day judge them which do now condemn us: and that it is a devilish malapropos for them to behave themselves so after their own fancy and liking. Thus much concerning the point where Moses shows that the people must not follow the strange Gods that were worshipped in all the countries about them.

But this extends yet much further: namely that although the world flow out into all naughtiness: yet shall not we be excused, if we be corrupted as all the rest be. And why so? It is not for naught that our Lord has sanctified us to himself. In these days we see blasphemy, we see murder, we see envy, malice, and backbiting, we see whoredom, wantonness and such other things reign almost everywhere, and to have their full scope: now if we should allege this for an excuse to do evil, it would not serve our turn. For although we were hedged in with thorns roundabout: yet ought we to walk in such sort, as we might persist in the serving of our God. Yes and even when we see nothing but naughtiness everywhere: let us understand that our Lord intends to hold us in the straighter awe. And therefore we must always set this saying before our eyes: Take heed to yourself, and beware that you be not corrupted, seeing you cannot open thin eyes, but you shall meet with some evil thing or other to allure you to naughtiness. Thus you see how we have need to live so much the more warily and carefully in these days, forasmuch as the devil has obtained to pervert the whole world. Therefore let us mark well this saying, that we must not follow the trumpery that is roundabout us.

Now Moses adds, The Lord that is in the midst of you, is jealous. Beware therefore that his wrath kindle not, or that his countenance wax not angry (for the Hebrew word that he uses in this place betokens the countenance, and by similitude and translation it betokens wrath or anger,) least you be rooted out of the land which the Lord your God has given you. In this text Moses meant to prove by particular, that if men abuse God's goodness, in the end they shall not be able to shun or escape his hand. God (says he) is in the midst of you: and he is jealous: and therefore beware of his wrath. When as he says, Gods is in the midst of you: it is an upbraiding of the Jews with the grace that was given them, in that God had communicated himself so familiarly to them. And it serves to make us the more blameworthy, if we serve him not in all pureness. We know that the more benefits we receive at God's hand, the more he binds us to him. Now he dwelt in the midst of this people, and kept his residence there: it was meet therefore that they should have considered the more advisedly, that seeing god came so near to them, and had made that to feel his goodness: they should not have turned away from him, nor from the true religion, forasmuch as if they did so, they should be the more to blame. As if it were said, As touching the Paynims and Infidels, it is true that they shall at length yield account: they may well blindfold their own eyes as now by soothing themselves but yet shall they be driven to know that God has not surrendered nor given over his right. And whereas they abuse themselves in their false religion, and yet think not themselves to be beguiled: [the time will come that] they shall know it to their cost. But yet they be excusable in comparison of you. For they be blind wretches walking in darkness, our Lord is a stranger to them, and he has not vouchsafed to draw them to him, nor to gather them as it were into his flock. You see then that they be as it were in utter confusion. But it is not so with you: for a man may justly cast you in your teeth, that you have falsified the faith which you gave to your God. You ought to be well acquainted with him because he fits in the midst of you, and he has chosen you for his people, and you also have perceived him. For you have his power which fails you not: he hears you, and he shows himself favorable in all your requests. Seeing then that your God dwells among you: you ought to understand that there is not any other thing whereby you should be instructed than his law: and you ought to know after what manner he will have your lives ordered. Since it is so, assure yourselves that so much the horrible vengeance will light upon you, if you step aside. You shall not pass the same way that the ignorant wretches and unbelievers do: but you shall be punished a hundredfold more grievously for your unthankfulness, in that you have not offended God, through ignorance, but through spiteful willfulness, so as he could not hold you under his yoke nor wield you, though he gathered you into his flock to be your shepherd and governor.

Although this were spoken a good while ago to the Jews: yet it concerns us likewise. For we see how our Lord sits in the midst of us. First we have this promise concerning the church, This is my resting place, here will I dwell forever. Besides this, experience teaches us, your Lord not only will dwell among us: but also avows our souls and bodies to be his temple and that we be members of our Lord Jesus Christ, in whom dwells the whole fullness of the godhead. Now then ought not every man to dedicate himself to God, as though he were his temple? And again we know how it is said, that God dwells in us by his holy spirit. So then, God is not only familiar with us as he was with the people of old time, whom he said he would hold as it were in his lap: but also he dwells in every of us. Seeing it is so: if we turn away to the superstitions of the heathen, if we will needs resemble the unbelievers in defiling ourselves with them, and if we will needs make a hotchpotch or mingle mangle (as they term it): think we that such unthankfulness shall escape unpunished, considering that our Lord comes so nigh to us? No: and yet for all that, after we have rushed against him, we run gadding away from him like stray beasts. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this saying, where Moses declares that God rests among the people of Israel.

And here withal he says that God is jealous and therefore we must beware that we kindle not his wrath. Whereby he does us to understand, that God's dwelling among us, is not to be despised at our hands. True it is that he will be loving to us, and he tells us that he will bear with our infirmities, and that he is always pitiful. Although we deserve to sink under his hand: yet will he always show mercy towards us. But does it follow therefore, that he will be scorned at our hands, and that we may come prancing against him to despise him? No: but contrariwise, forasmuch as he shows himself gracious and loving towards us, it ought to break and soften our hearts, to make us submit ourselves wholly to him, and at leastwise to apply ourselves altogether to the serving and honoring of him, when he prevents us through his free goodness. Then let us mark well, that when our Lord is near to us, although it be of purpose to make us glad, and also to give us content and rest: yet notwithstanding he ceases not to be zealous in the maintaining of his glory, neither will he suffer it to be trampled underfoot, without sending horrible vengeance for it. Do we then know that our Lord dwells among us? Let us on our side beware that we sanctify ourselves wholly to him, for fear his wrath be kindled, that is say, least he withdraw his goodness which he has once shows towards us, and bereave us of it as we deserve, and therewithal power out his wrath upon us, when he sees that he cannot win us, nor any whit prevail by showing himself pitiful in bearing with us with such loving kindness and gentleness as he does. You see then after what sort we ought to use that goodness and patience of our Lord. That is to know, knowing that we may boldly stay upon him, not doubting but that he will be favorable to us, we nevertheless must endeavor and enforce ourselves to the uttermost of our power to serve and honor him. And forasmuch as we cannot do it of ourselves: we must pray him to hold us in such obedience by his holy spirit, as our whole seeking maybe to show that his coming so to us is not in vain, but that we be truly knit to him, and that he has set such a holy and inviolable bond between him and us, that as he once gave himself to us to be our inheritance, so he also possesses us, and makes us to be thoroughly contented with him, and to proceed in such wise in profiting to his honor and glory, as our whole life may show that we desire nothing else but to be retained under his protection.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to humble us more and more by true repentance, so as we may not only be sorry for our faults, but also amend them and submit ourselves dutifully to him, to the intent we may be more and more rid of all our naughty lusts, and be clothed again with his righteousness, that by the shining of his image in us, we may show ourselves to be his true children and that our desire is to be ruled by his holy spirit, even until he have made us partakers of his heavenly glory. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth, & c.

On Tuesday, the 30th of July 1555
The 49th Sermon which is the fifth upon the sixth
Chapter

15 For the Lord & c.

16 You shall not tempt the Lord your God as you tempted him in Massa.

17 You shall keep the commandments of the Lord your God diligently, and his testimonies and ordinances which he has commanded you.

18 You shall do the thing that is right and good in the sight of the Lord, that it may go well with you, and that you must go into this good land and possess it according as the Lord has sworn to your fathers.

19 And that he may beat back thin enemies before you, as the Lord has said.

We saw yesterday how Moses showed the people, that forasmuch as God vouchsafed to dwell among them, they also ought to live in his fear. And we likewise must think, that his approaching to us after that sort, is not to be despised of us, but rather to the intent that his goodness should provoke us to honor him the more. And there was a threatening added immediately, For fear least you be bereft of the land which your God has now given you. Wherein Moses declared, that when we have received any good already at God's hand, we must not be proud of it, but rather yield him due honor for it, that we may enjoy it still: for after as he showed himself liberal to us, so does he bind us to him. And therefore let us mark, that when we have the possession of his benefits, it is not to the end we should fall asleep in them, but rather have a greater care to serve and honor him. And here withal let us note, that under this term of that land of Canaan, Moses comprehended generally all that belonged to the people's election: for that land was an outward testimony thereof. Therefore in effect he meant to say, Behold, God has chosen you to be of his household and Church: will you continue therein? Then must you be careful to honor him, and walk after his guiding.

Now to apply the same to our use, it is all one as if a man should say to us, seeing that God has promised to be our father and Savior, let us fear him, to the intent he may continue always so. And this imports that he will have a care of us, during this mortal life of ours. And although we pass through many miseries, yet will he deliver us from them. Howbeit that his defending of us in this world is not the chief benefit, nor the thing that we must stay upon, but we must mount up higher to the endless life. And so to be short, when so ever we think upon the benefits that god has given us, let us understand that he can well bereave us of them as soon as we abuse them, and pluck away our feathers that make us so proud. For his bestowing of his benefits upon us, is not to the intent that we should despise him, and take occasion to stand in our own conceits, and so be negligent and call no more upon him: but the blessings which we enjoy tend to this end we should daily and hourly have the better regard of him, and lift up our minds on high to yield him due thanks, and to glorify him in our whole life. Now hereunto Moses adds, You shall not tempt the Lord you God, as you served him in Massa. Hereby he means that the people must not abuse god's patience. As if he should say, look well to it my friends: although god deal gently with you, you must not think but your sins shall come to account, if you serve him not with all humility. If you say, we be God's friends, we need not be afraid that he will be angry with us or work us any displeasure, for we see how well he deals with us: beware how you dally so with him, for you know what befell to your fathers in Massa. Therefore do no more so, but prevent the chastisements of your God, and before he arm himself against you, know him to be your judge, and tarry not till he show forth the tokens of his wrath and vengeance by his deeds, but in that meantime while he uses mildness and gentleness, consider that he allures you to repentance, and so let every man be provoked to amend his faults, that God may be honored by that mean. For if you tempt him again, he will not bear it. He sharply punished your fathers in Massa: but you shall feel much greater and horrible punishment, if you go on still. And let us mark, that here he touches the story which is written more at length in the seventeenth of Exodus. There it is said that the people being in a dry place of the wilderness, did grudge and repine against Moses, because they had no drink, crying out that they were betrayed, because there was no more water in the desert, so as it had been better for them to have tarried still in Egypt, where were graves now to have buried them in God punished the people with the biting of Serpents: but yet howsoever they feared he had pity upon them, and used mercy towards them, sending remedy convenient for the same. And yet notwithstanding his will is to have the name thereof to continue still, for a memorial to upbraid the people with their unthankfulness. It is his pleasure that it should remain still, to the intent that the children might know that their fathers were rebels: for that word Massa betokens as much as temptation. Now for the better understanding the things that are said here, we must consider what it is to tempt God: for that is done diverse ways.

But chiefly it is said that we tempt God, when we be too important in requiring more than is lawful for us, and when we will needs have further trial of his power and ability than pleases him, so as we fall to spiting of him as if we would say, Go to we shall see now whether God be mighty or no: let him do what we will have him to do. When we go to work with such outrage, and have no modesty nor stay of ourselves, so as we consider not what is lawful for us, but will needs have God to please us without awe or measure: then do we tempt him. And why so? This word Tempt betokens properly to assay or try. See now, God is willing to utter his power, howbeit not at our pleasure neither were it reason that he should be subject to us. True it is that he uses this amiable kind of speech, that he will do the will of such as fear him. But this will is meant, not of an inordinate lust when men take leave to crave whatsoever comes in their mind: but of the desire that is subject and conformable to God's ordinance, so far forth as he gives us leave. And by that means God is glorified. It is not meant that he will do whatsoever comes in our head: for that would oftentimes turn to our undoing. As for example, when he gave the people flesh: it had been much better for them to have died for hunger, than to have crammed and glutted themselves after that fashion insatiably in despite in despite of God. But God performs our will, when we be obedient to him, and have respect to goodness in all our requests, according as S. John exhorts us to attempt nothing further than pleases him. If we do so, God will also pleasure us. But if we come malapert with a lofty countenance, to say I will try whether God can do this or no: [we shall come short of our desires.] What? Is it a convenient fashion of dealing, that we should step forth so to try God, and that we will needs have him to give us proof of his power by making himself subject to us? Is it not a devilish malapert that carries us so away? Yes. So then, we see now what is signified by this word Tempt, namely a trying of God, as though we doubted of his power or ability, and a repining at him and a charging of him with infirmity when he does not what so ever we lust, so as we measure him by the things that we perceive with our eyes. That is the temptation which is forbidden here. And indeed our Lord Jesus Christ is a good and faithful expounder of this text. For he alleged it to beat back Satan, as is written in the fourth of S. Mathew. Yes and that devil himself takes the holy scripture to tempt our Lord with all, facing him with this text, It is written that God has given his Angels charge over you, to bear you up in their hands, and not to suffer you to dash your foot against a stone. Well then, here upon we may gather, that God has committed us to the keeping of his Angels, so as we shall be both up by them, and preserved from all evil that may encounter us. We must assure ourselves of that. But yet it is said therewithal, that they shall keep us in all our ways, that is to say, which we have to go in. Now then, let us keep on our ways, that is to say, let us look about us how God has disposed our life, and let us not attempt anything rashly and upon our own head, but let every of us consider his own calling: and then we may be sure that God's hand shall always be reached out over us, and that Angels of heaven shall travel after us: let us not doubt of it. Nevertheless what so ever come of it, let us not pass the bounds and lifts that he has set us, nor play the loss colts to say, I will go try this or that: for that were a tempting of God. Why so? For whomsoever lifts not to take pains, but says: is not God able enough to maintain me? He tries god's power too far. For why? God has promised that his blessing shall be upon the hands of them that take pains. His, will is the land should be tilled, and the men should follow husbandry, and other labors, every one according to his calling. And yet notwithstanding if they will needs refuse all this, and disdain to use those ordinary means: is it not a tempting of him what he can do? It is all one as if I should step up into the pulpit, without vouchsafing to look upon any book, and fondly imagine to say thus in myself: tosh, when I come thither, god will give me enough whereof to speak, and in the meanwhile I hold scorn to read, or to study beforehand what I shall speak, and come hither without minding how to apply that holy scripture to that edifying to the people, by reason whereof I should play that presumptuous fool, and God also would put me to shame for mine over-boldness. In like case is it with all other things. So then we see in effect that to tempt God, is to be unruly, and to omit the means which God given us and sets down to us, and to refuse to put that to their right use, so as we will needs have God served after our own fond liking, and make him as it were subject to us. And forasmuch as our Lord Jesus Christ alleged this same text against Satan: we see which is the true and natural sense thereof.

Now then, whereas it is said, You shall not tempt your God: It is all one as if Moses had said, my friends, beware you play not mock holiday. When God is patient, and powers not out his rigor upon you at the first dash: think not that therefore you shall scope scot free, neither take occasion to fall asleep and to flatter yourselves for it: but live in fear, and prevent the wrath which God has not yet powered out upon you, because he spares you. To be short, we be said to tempt god, when we abuse his benefits which we possess, and which he has put into our hands and in the meanwhile acknowledge not him to be the founder of them. For why? Under pretence that God deals gently with us, we bears ourselves in hand that we may despise him. And that is a turning of his goodness to the clean contrary end that it ought to be applied. Does not god apply himself to us, of purpose to win us, and to the end that we should have his love so printed in our hearts, as we might be wholly knit to him and made one with him?

But if every of us do contrariwise run at rovers, and devour the goods that has bestowed upon us: is it not a tempting of him? Yes. And above all things whereas it has pleased him to impart to us the doctrine of salvation: it is to the intent we should take him for our father, and Jesus Christ for our shepherd, and that we should hearken to his voice. Again he has taken us as it were into his house, to the intent we should be his very household folk, applying ourselves more and more to him, and be utterly separated from the unbelievers, by dedicating our whole life to him. But on the contrary part, if we will needs be unruly, and yet in the meanwhile vaunt ourselves of having the Gospel, insomuch that we feed ourselves with this vain hope to say, Oh, ho, seeing we have God's word, he cannot but love us, for it is his power to the salvation of all that believe: I say if men dally after this sort, and abuse the name of faith to make a shrouding sheet of it, to the end they may give themselves the more boldly to all naughtiness: it is a tempting of God. For inasmuch as he utters not his power at first dash by thundering down upon them: he seems to them to be as a little babe and a weakling, and so they play with him [at their pleasure]. Therefore let us learn to fear God: and although we perceive not that he has drawn his sword, bent his bow, and made ready his arrows, against us: yet let us not tarry till the fire of his vengeance be kindled upon us, but consider that the sentence thereof shall be executed upon all the despisers of his majesty, though they feel nothing of it for a time. Thus you see how we be forbidden to tempt the Lord in the time of prosperity. To be short, let us learn to fear God while he bears with us. For it we say with these mockers, what I pray you? Does not God show himself gracious and favorable towards us, in that he does us so much good? It is all one as if we scorned his power and should say, yes, it is true that men threaten us with God's punishments, but where be they? We perceive no likelihood of them. When we speak after the manner, it is a defying of him, as though we would say, Let us tarry a while and see what he can do. Yes, it is moreover as good as a bereaving of him of his power, and a making of him to be an idol: and is not that (in effect) a denying that he is the judge of the world? Wherefore to that intent we may not tempt God, let us learn to live humbly and warily. Although we be at our ease and rest, and although there be no show or likelihood that God will send and adversity or affliction upon us: let us not measure his power by our perseverance, not after that which we see: but even when his scourges seem to be very far off from us, let us be as much afraid of them, as if we felt the stripes of them already. Thus you see in effect how we ought to put this text in practice.

Now whereas Moses adds, As you tempted him in Massa: It is all one as if he had said, seeing you have escaped for one brunt, come no more there. For whereas your God showed himself merciful at that time: his meaning was that you should not understand, that he lifted not to be tempted. Wherefore seeing he has withdrawn his hand from you, let it not be an occasion to deceive you hereafter, that you should take courage to tempt him anymore: for when men provoke him so often, it is not for them to look for mercy and favor at his hand.

Now we see to what purpose Moses alleges the temptation wherewith the Jews tempted God in Massa. And thereby we be taught, that when we have done any fault, we must bethink us of it, to the intent we may do no more so. And instead of taking occasion to grudge at God through impatience: we must humble ourselves the more under his awe. When we have offended him after that sort, and obtained forgiveness: it is to the end we should take the better heed all our life after, and that the remembrance of our evil doing should abide printed in our hearts, until we have showed that God's goodness has bootied us as well as his scourges and corrections. And therefore, to be short, when God chastises us, let us beware that we receive instruction by it: and when he forgives us, let us look that we take such taste of his goodness, as may inflame our hearts and minds to honor him the more. Whereas the unbelievers do mock God when he spares them, and make no reckoning of it, but bear themselves in hand that they be discharged, if he punish them not out of hand: you see that the faithful must by all means stir up themselves to fear and honor God so much the more carefully and warily. When he chastises the unbelievers, they fret and storm and grind their teeth at him, and their rebelliousness increases more and more, even until it come to stark madness. Now then, whereas the unbelievers are so forward, that howsoever God deal with them they become still worse and worse: let us think well upon this, even to return into the right way, whether it be that God lift up his hand to chastise us, or that he make delay and pity our infirmities as not being willing to punish them at all: To this purpose is Massa spoken of in this place. And so, to be short, when we have committed any grievous offence I mean publicly, so as there is any disorder among us and God is offended: let us bethink ourselves thus: Alas, seeing that God has showed himself a father for all our provoking of him, and yet nevertheless receives us to mercy: let us do so no more, Seeing God has pitied us and reached us his hand, even when we deserved to have been destroyed, which thing he has not suffered to come to pass: let us beware and take heed that we give not too much scope to our lusts, so as they should make us to slip from him, and to overshoot ourselves so far, as to run into the way of damnation. After this manner (say I) must the faithful quicken up themselves, bearing in mind that when they have once overshoot themselves, and forsaken the right way: they must call themselves home again to walk awfully ever after, and betake themselves into Gods hand, that he may guide them and not suffer them to be so overseen anymore. Also we must do the like particularly. When any man shall have been overseen for a time, and not have dealt so warily as he ought to have done, even after he knows God's truth: let him bethink himself thus: Alas, I have been unthankful to my God, and for as much as I have starved away from him, I am worthy to be utterly confounded: but yet has not he suffered that to come to pass. Now then what is to be done on my part? It is not meet that I should forget the faults which I have committed, but that I should think upon them, and bear the bitterness of them still about me in my heart. After that manner must every of us deal, say I: not as distrusting God, or to provoke ourselves to any despair: but to rein ourselves the shorter, and to hold ourselves the more in awe. For as soon as a man does but lift himself up, by and by he overshoots himself if God let him alone. Hat is the thing which we have to note in this text, where Moses says that they just not tempt God, as they tempted him once before in Massa. And for the same cause and to the same purpose also is it spoken of in the Psalm, where it is said, Today if you hear his voice harden not your hearts as your fathers did in the wilderness. This is spoken expressly of the temptation that Moses touches here. See how the Prophet warns the people, yes and that desirously, as if he should say, very well, if you be so teachable as to hearken to your God, seeing he does now exhort you to come to him, refuse it not: for this benefit shall not last always to them that make delay and are never moved to obey him, but drive off from day to day when he calls them. And therefore, if you hear his voice (says he) now when God calls you. He uses there a vehemence as though he could not find words fit to exhort the people and sufficiently to prick them forward. In that he says, Go to my friends, be well advised that you harden not your hearts: he shows what is the cause of all mischief, and why we profit no better by Gods teaching of us. Namely that besides that we be full of naughtiness, and so sinful by nature, that whereas our hearts ought to be sustained to receive that which God says, it may seem that we intend to set purpose to harden them against him: we do moreover fall to stomaching against him with a certain spitefulness, as if we would say, what care I to obey God? Shall I be bridled of my will like a beast? Beware of that says he: for you know what happened to your Fathers. The Prophet casts them in the teeth with the things that had been done by their forefathers in old time, to the intent they should not boast off their descending from the holy Patriarchs. Behold says he, your forefathers were rebels: and then have you continued to this day? Is it not through God's mercy? Yes: for you should have perished utterly. Again, seeing your God has pitied you being Abraham his race: think not that he will have you to run back again, so as you should be always new to begin. For when he has born with you a while, he must be fine to make you pay your arrearages all at once. Thus you see that the way for us to put this sentence in practice, is to understand that when God shall have pardoned our faults oftentimes, he shall have just cause to punish us the more grievously, if we cease not to provoke us the more grievously, if we cease not to provoke him still, but will needs be the boulder to do evil, under pretence that he has not used extremity towards us. If God see that in us: he can well call us to account for all the things that he had pardoned before. For his pardoning of us is with condition, that we should humble ourselves, and consider all our life after, how much we be beholden to him. If an offender have obtained favor, and thereupon he fall to spiting of him to whom he is beholden for his life, within a day or twice after: does he not deserve to have his former lewdness brought to remembrance again, and to be reckoned withal from point to point, and to have his unthankfulness laid before him, for his abusing of the favor that had been showed him? Yes: and think we that our Lord will have less right than mortal men? Think we then that his showing of favor to us, is to the intent to make us bolder to do evil? No, but rather his doing of it is to the intent we should all our life after bear our offence in mind and be sorry for it: accordingly also as we see how the good king Ezekias speaks of the bitterness of his heart, when he says, that he will be mindful of the offence that he had committed. Not but that he rejoiced in God's goodness, but that yet nevertheless he would bear it in remembrance, to the intent he might not let himself slip anymore, nor be anymore surprised by the wiliness of Satan.

Now after that Moses has spoken so, he adds: You shall diligently keep the commandments, Statutes, and Laws of your God which I set before you this day, that you may enter into the land which he promised to your fathers with an oath, and he drive out all your enemies before you. Here we be put in mind of the thing that he has been told us before: that is to know, that whereas Moses uses many words to express the Law, it is no superstitious speech, but serves to induce folk the better, to profit in the doctrine that is given them. As if he should say, Give good ear: for behold, your God takes pains with you. Like as a schoolmaster takes pains to teach the children that are committed to his charge: so does God apply himself to you, giving you his Law orderly and distinctly, to the end you should not to be greatly cumbered to understand what he says concerning his will. Here there are his Statutes, Ordinances, and Judgments. As if he should say, the doctrine is set forth to you in good order, so that if you can find in your hearts to hearken to your God, and to receive that which he shall say, you need not doubt but you shall be taught faithfully by his word, and have knowledge of all things that are good and convenient for you. The first thing then which Moses meant to express by these words Judgments, Statutes, and Ordinances, is that our Lord takes pain to teach us whatsoever is good for us, and that he uses such order, as we cannot say that his word is too high and confused for us. And therewithal his intent is also to hold men wholly to the pure obedience of the Law, and to the simplicity therein contained, as if he should say: My friends, God's meaning is, not only that you should be attentive in hearing what he says to you, but also that your only wisdom should be to obey him, and not to invent any novelties, so as you should think to serve him after your own fancy, according to the common fashion of men, who have always some foolish desire to change God's word. No, says he. If you can bear in mind the lessons of the Law, you shall have statutes, Judgments and ordinances, so as you shall not want anything whereby you may be taught in all perfection. This has been expounded already heretofore: and therefore I stand not long upon it. Nevertheless the repeating of it here again by the holy Ghost, is not without cause: and therefore I must needs put you briefly in remembrance thereof, as of as those words are set down.

Now Moses says expressly, That these Commandments, Ordinances and Laws must be done by kept. As if he should say, that God will not have his word to fall to the ground. His setting forth of it, is to the end that we on our side should be attentive to hearken what he says to us. And so let us mark well that it is not enough for us to allow God's word in speech, by saying it is true: but we must also be diligent in keeping it all our life long. And for further proof of that which he had said, he adds, You shall do that which is right and good in the sight of God. Herein he shows us, that we must not do whatsoever seems good to ourselves, nor follow our own good intents, as they term them. And he will set out his matter yet better in another place which we shall see hereafter. For there he will forbid men expressly to do the things that seem right in their own eyes: for whatsoever seems excellent to us, shall be condemned for abominable at God's hand, as is said in S. Luke. Therefore let us take good heed that we overshoot not ourselves in our conceits to say, How so? Why should not God allow this for good, seeing we do it to such a purpose? Seeing we be desirous to obey him? Yes, but how will he be obeyed? Not that men should be Judges and Umbers of the things that they do, to say this is good, or that is evil: he reserves that authority to himself alone. Now then, will we order our life aright? Let us not open our eyes to be wise in our own conceits, for we see that that has cost us dear. We see (I say) that our father Adam saw too much, when he could not content himself with the measure that was given him. And therefore let us not be too sharp-sighted to say, I find that this is good, and therefore it must be done. Cursed be such wisdom: for it is a devilish pride. Will we then be allowed of our God? Let us take good heed to that which he speaks: for whatsoever is right in his eyes, must needs be allowed in the end: and the things which we shall have imagined to have been best, shall be condemned when we bring them before him. For why? He sees more clearly than we do: he knows things which we know not. And therefore he dislikes all our imaginations, and will have us to follow the things which we utters with his mouth, simply without mingling anything of our own. For the very sacrifice that he requires at our hands, is that we should serve him obediently, and therewithal learn to distrust all our own strength, know, and reason, and not to presume upon anything that we ourselves have invented: (for all that ever our minds can conceive, is but folly, vanity, and leasing:) but to be well advised that we do the things which are good and right in the eyes of Lord, that is to say, that we frame our whole life according to his commandments.

But now let us come to the promise. That you must go into the land (says he) which the Lord has sworn to your fathers, to possess it. Here we see how God is desirous to win the hearts of his people by gentleness, in setting the possession of the land of Canaan before them, for a reward and inheritance. As if he should say, Truth it is that you be bound to serve me: but yet will I not have you to serve me for naught: behold, the recompense that is prepared for you, is that you shall possess the land of Canaan. But yet we must always mark with what condition. It was not that the people should live there at rest like swine in a sty: but so as the land might be as a pledge of the endless life, and that they might consider thus: God has adopted us to be his heirs: and therefore let us mount up higher to the everlasting life. See here how GOD tells us, that if we serve him, he will keep touch with us, so as we shall possess the land that he has promised us. Now here we see first the thing that I have touched already: that is to know, that God stops to men's rudeness and infirmity, in promising them recompense though he be not bound thereto. Mark that for one point. But by the way we have to mark also, that God binds not himself as though we could deserve aught. For he says not, I will give you the land for the service you have done to me, as a thing that you have earned: but, you shall go into the land which I promised to your fathers. Here are two things uttered covertly. The one is that God promised the land of his own mere goodness, and not as a due debt that had been deserved at his hand. For the promise thereof had been made before the people was born: four hundred and thirty years before their departure out of Egypt, God had said to

Abraham, this land shall be thine and your seed. Let us note then that this people had not deserved aught at God's hand, and that the reward which is mentioned here, befell them not in respect of their works. Mark that for a special point. And God tells us also, that he terms the thing by the name of Hire, [Recompense, and Wages,] which he gives us only of his own free liberality, without being bound thereto by any kind of means, and without any desert at all at our hands. And why? To the intent that men should be provoked to serve him, and not that they should become proud, or father anything upon themselves which God should accept for payment or admit for any recompense. And this we see even in Abraham himself. For before he had done anything at all God said to him, I am thine abundant recompense: Abraham, I have given you this land: I will be your God, and the God of you seed after you. I will be your defender. You see then that all the promises which are possible to be wished, were given of God to Abraham before he had showed any sign of faith or of the fear of God. But when he was willing to have sacrificed his son Isaac: our Lord said I will bless my servant Abraham, because he has feared me, and seeing he has not spared his own son for the love of me, I will multiply my blessings upon him. And that was said before. But God gives so much the greater beauty to his goodness, of purpose to strengthen Abraham's heart, not that he intended to exalt Abraham's heart, not that he intended to exalt Abraham's deserts that he might presume of himself: but to make him know, my God has of his own mere mercy given me the thing that he promised me, I had the promise of it long ago, and now he showed that he accepts my service, inasmuch as he performs the promise that he made to me of his own free goodness. Thus we see how we ought to take the texts of Holy Scripture, where God bestows recompense. We must not conclude thereupon that we deserve aught, or that our works are of any value, or that God is anything bound to us: but that he does it to quicken us up and to hearten us the better to serve him, inasmuch as our labors are not lost before him, but are made account of and redound to our benefit. Now then we see that is the meaning of these words where Moses shows the people that the land had been promised to their forefathers by oath, before they whom he speaks to were born.

Now for a conclusion let us come to this saying, That you must drive out of all thine enemies before you. Herein Moses does the people to know, that no let can hinder them from possessing the land, so they serve their God. True it is that the land of Canaan had people in it at that time to keep possession of it, and we perceive how the spies brought word that they were Giants, and such as would have swallowed up the people of God. It should seem therefore to have been impossible for them to have set foot within the land. But God told them that although his people were barred from all entrance to man's understanding: yet would he open them the way by his infinite power, so they inclined to serve him. Now remains that we apply this to our own use. First of all let us mark, that when so ever God calls us to his service, his promising of reward to us, (not only in this transitory life, but also in the kingdom of heaven) is not to puff up with self weaning, or to make us to believe that we have deserved aught: but only to quicken up our slothfulness: and because we be so lazy in serving him, his intent is to spur us forward by that means. Therefore let us take courage: and seeing we lose not our labor in employing ourselves in God's service, let us go to it diligently and justly. And whereas he be heights us reward: let us assure ourselves it is not because our works deserve it, but because that eh of his own infinity goodness takes them in good worth, and gives that title to them. Let that serve for one point.

And let us mark here withal that whereas God calls us to his inheritance, although he do it freely: yet is it with condition that we behave ourselves as true children towards him, and consider that he calls us to holiness. And indeed the very end why he calls us to be his people and of his flock, is not that he will have us to be entangled and held back still in this world: but to sanctify ourselves to him that we may live holily under his obedience, forasmuch as he has washed and cleansed us by the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. And God's calling of us thereto, is not for our works sakes, but for his own mercy. Now if under color hereof, we will needs stand facing with him: I have told you already what will come of it. Therefore let us have regard to match the things together which are inseparable: that is to know, the free goodness of our God, and the condition thereto annexed, which is that he be served and honored at our hands. And besides this, although we see never so great lets, which may seem to bar us from al entrance into the kingdom of heaven, and that we be cast up here for a pray to Satan, and we have so many enemies that our life is as it were in hazard every minute of an hour: yet let us not cease to hope, and to believe that our Lord will keep us safe and sure, if we walk in his fear. Then let us not pass for all the world. Although it seem that all things should be turned upside-down: yet let not all the troubles and encumbrance which we see in the world, stop us from going through to the end: but let us reason thus with ourselves, who is he that has taken us into his keeping? Is it not our God? Is it not he which has promised us the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven? Yes. Then is it his office to hold us by strong hand. True it is that we on our part are feeble: but yet his only power will be enough to strengthen us. True it is that we be environed with many enemies:

but yet our God is a good shield, he will be an invincible fortress for us, so we put our trust in him. We have his promise that he will never fail us. Thus you see that God having once begun the work of our salvation, will go through with it in such sort, as we may glory that his calling of us to him is not in vain, not to disappoint us of our hope, wherein he will have us to continue to the end.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him that whereas heretofore we have abused his power and might too much, we may henceforth be more diligent in practicing his judgments and corrections, and so make our commodity of them, as the warnings which he has given us may never out of our remembrance: and that as long as it shall please him to maintain us in prosperity and quiet, we may be watchful and stand upon our guard, so as we turn not from the right way, nor tarry till he pour out his vengeance upon us, but endeavor to prevent it, as we be warned to do: and also that in a low life we may continually to repent us of our sins, as we may still travel the better towards him, until he have gathered us fully to himself, to frame us to the perfection of the righteousness whereto we tend as now. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth, & c.

The 50th Sermon, which is the sixth upon the sixth Chapter

20 When your child asks you in time to come, saying: What are these testimonies, Ordinances, and laws which the Lord our God has commanded you?

21 Then shall you say to your child, We were Pharaohs bond folk in Egypt: but the Lord brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand.

22 And the Lord wrought signs and miracles great and evil, upon Egypt, and upon Pharaoh and all his house before our eyes.

23 And brought us out thence, to bring us in [hither,] and to give us the land which he had sworn to our fathers.

24 And the Lord commanded us to keep all these ordinances, and to fear the Lord our God, that we might always prosper and live as we do this day.

25. And it shall be counted to us for righteousness, if we keep and do all these commandments before the Lord our God, as he has commanded us.

Here we have two reasons to mark why Moses commanded, that such as were to come after that time, should be told why God gave his Law to the Jews, and why he would have them governed after that manner. The one is, that it is good reason that God's name should be magnified in all ages, and that we should endeavor to the uttermost of our power, that it decay not with us, but continue still disappeared, and flourish and reign, even after we be dead. The other reason is, that he intended to quicken up the Jews to serve God with the better courage, by putting them in mind of the deliverance which God had wrought for them: for needs must they have been too unthankful, if that had not provoked them to serve God. Now then the intent of Moses, is that those to whom he had declared the Law, should not only endeavor themselves to serve GOD during their own lives: but also find the means that their children and successors should follow them in the same trace. And this lesson belongs to us as well as to them. For we know that God calls us with the same condition, not only that we ourselves should serve and honor him to our lives end: but also that we should have a care to cause them that come after us to do the like. Verily there are very few that discharge themselves in that behalf: but yet are we bound to it, and there will be no excuse for us, if we do not our endeavor. Therefore let every man have an eye to himself, and let us not think it enough to have served God so long as we ourselves live: but [that we must also find the means] that his name may continue forever, and that his truth may [always] be known, so although we be taken out of the world, yet they that come after us being taught by our means, may link in with us into the same faith, and so fashion themselves thereto, as God may always be glorified and honored to the worlds end. And specially that that have children ought to think that it is they to whom his warning is given. True it is that every one of us is bound thereto for himself, yes and we must teach even the most strangers: so as the man needs not to be my son, or my nephew, or my kinsman, whom I should endeavor to cause to serve God and to be of the same faith and religion that I am of: but yet they which have children ought to consider that they shall yield account for it, if they do not what they can to hold them in the fear of God, and to see them so instructed and established in the pure doctrine, as they may continue in it, and as the knowledge of God's truth may still be conveyed over from hand to hand. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this place where Moses says, If your child ask hereafter what these commandments, statutes, and ordinances mean.

Now there is also a second point: which is, that Moses intends to stir up the people to honor God and to obey him, because they had been delivered by his mighty hand. Therefore it is all one as if he should say, Bethink yourselves well of the good which your GOD has done for you: for he has showed himself to be your redeemer: he has smitten the realm of Egypt, a people that did set greatly by themselves, yes and which was rich and wealthy, and where was nothing but all manner of pomp and glory to the world ward: and yet notwithstanding, your God has loved you so dearly, that he has not spared the Egyptians for your sakes, but he has smitten them with plagues, and powered out such vengeance upon them, as is horrible to think of: He has stretched out his strong arm to bring you to his land which he promised to your fathers. Seeing then that God has showed himself so gracious and liberal towards you, and prevented you of purpose to be your father: is it not reason that you should give yourselves to him all your life long, and endeavor to serve him, and at least wise show that you have not forgotten his so great and inestimable benefits? Yes. And so we see that forasmuch as the Jews might be negligent in keeping God's law: Moses renewed the remembrance thereof, and set their deliverance before them, that they might be the better minded, and consider that they were bound, at least wise to serve GOD in such wise, as they might acknowledge themselves to be the same people whom he had once delivered after a marvelous fashion, and with wonderful power. Like as at this day, if a man should speak to us of the Christian religion and say, Behold, our God has vouchsafed to make us partakers of the redemption which he wrought in the person of his Son: and therefore it is good reason that we should be gathered here together under his word, to take him for our father and Savior, because he has chosen us to be his people.

And whereas Moses declares that the Jews were delivered out of Egypt: he means to do us to wit, that God intended to show them out from all other nations, especially by assigning them the inheritance of the Land which he had promised to their fathers. You see then how they should have sanctified themselves to the service of God, and have held themselves in obedience to his law, because he suffered them not to be intermingled with the infidels, but made a several nation of them alone by themselves. And hereupon we have to note, that such as seek counsel at God's law, do always find instruction, and our Lord procures them aid and help to bring them to the knowledge of the truth. It is said, If your son ask you, what mean these statutes? He presupposes that the children are not so brutish, as at least wise not to be willing and desirous to know why they use such manner of serving God. And we see it is God's ordinance, that the fathers should help their children. True it is that the fathers ought not to tarry for that, but if they see their children to be despisers of God, or unruly, and careless both of the salvation of their own souls and of all Christianity and faith: they ought to correct such vices. But the matter which we treat of as now, is that if children be willing to learn and to profit, God here assigns them their fathers to their teachers and schoolmasters, to show them why the law was given. Herein then we see, that if we have any good will to know the truth, our Lord will not suffer us to be disappointed, but will find the means that we shall know whatsoever he thinks profitable for our salvation. And although he appoint not mortal creatures to teach us: yet will he work in such wise by his own power, as we shall not be destitute of knowledge. But our own slothfulness is the cause that GOD shuts the gate against us, and that we be abide still in darkness like blind wretches. For what is he that vouchsafes, to seek after the will of his GOD? We be given to worldly things to our own pleasures, to our own vanities, and to all manner of worldly business: and in the meanwhile God is let alone, and his law is forgotten. And therefore it is not to be wondered at, that he hardens us in such brutishness, and that there is so gross ignorance in the world, as few folks have the true taste and favor of the doctrine of salvation, but rather we see that all men despise it, and are so far off from having any affection and zeal to the knowing of it, that they do rather thrust it from them when it is offered them, and when

GOD seeks them, they run from him. Since we see such unthankfulness everywhere, is it any marvel that our Lord reveals not his truth as he would do, if men were well minded towards it? It is true that God tarries not till we come to him, but rather performs that which he says by his prophet Esau, namely that he appears to them that ask not after him, and that he is found of them that seek him not, insomuch that he says to them that are far off from him, Lo, here I am. Yet notwithstanding, men must nor under this color that God reaches them his hand, and draws them out of the dungeons of ignorance before they ever thought upon him, men (I say) must not flatter and sod themselves in their carelessness: but rather we must learn according to this text, that whereas we be ignorant of the truth, we must at least wise do our endeavor to get knowledge of it, and resort to such as we think that God has revealed more to, than to ourselves. If we do so, and with all humility seek to know the things that are available to our salvation. God will show himself to us, and give us such means and helps as he knows to be expedient for us. And although mortal men fail us: yet will he so supply our want by the power of his Holy Spirit, as we shall not continue still in darkness, if we seek that light: for he will not shut that door against us if we knock, and do our endeavor to enter. Thus you see in effect what we have to remember upon the text.

Furthermore it behooves us to mark, that here God shows not the end of his commandments, what is meant by them and to what use he has appointed them. He does not only show, that the people were justly bound to keep the law that was given them, seeing that God had bought them so dearly. Here are two things. The one is that inasmuch as God has given us his word, he do well deserve that we should yield him obedience. Why so? Because we be his creatures, and he has vouchsafed to him, to be his people and to fight under his standard, and has made us to be of his stock and of his Church. Mark that for one point.

The other is, that we should know to what end he has given us his Sacraments, so as we have the precepts of his whole Law, which pertain to the exercising of us in his fear and in the hope of our salvation: and to what end he has set such order among us as we now have. We must know what is meant by all this. Nevertheless, this briefness will be darksome, if it be not declared better. When we consider now God has created and shaped us, and moreover made us after his own image, and give us wit and reason, and therewithal the hope of a better life, and finally has vouchsafed to take us as his household folk: it shows us that we be bound to submit ourselves to him. For seeing he is our maker: do we not owe him all obedience? Nor there is yet more: namely that in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ his son, he has redeemed us and made us partakers of his Gospel, to the end that we should be guided by his hand. Now then, the first point is that when we have knowledge, it must stir us up to serve God, and to stick to the pure religion that is comprehended in his word. Albeit this is not enough: but when we be asked yet nearer, wherefore that promises of the forgiveness of sins are given us: [we must answer,] Alas, it is because we be wretched sinners, and we should be continually in anguish and sorrow of mind, if we knew not that God is contented to be merciful to us of his own mere grace. For he cannot love us except we be righteous: and we shall never find any holiness in our life, or perfection in our virtues: but it is through God's mercy, which it pleases him to extend towards us. And so now you see where to the promises tend.

Again, if it be demanded of us why he has appointed the order of prayer, as well public as private: it is for that every of us ought to ensure himself to seek all his succor at his hand. For we have not any good thing, we be destitute both of wisdom, strength, and righteousness, we be worse than empty, until our good God do succor our needs: and the mean thereof, is to flee to him for refuge. To that end has he ordained private prayer. And public or common prayer is ordained to the intent to assure us the better, that he will hear the common accord that is among us, when we be come together as we make confession of our faith and exercise our charity. By this means then we learn, why and to what end our Lord has set order in his Church, that is to say, what he meant to betoken thereby, and to what purpose it is to be referred.

If a man ask us what is meant by Baptism, and wherefore it was ordained: it is to the intent we should know, that even from our mother's womb we bring nothing but all manner of uncleanness with us, and that we be full of infection and filth before the Lord, so as we must be faine to be washed, or else he will not vouchsafe to avow us for his. And wherewithal must we be washed? With the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. That then is the way to make us clean. For as long as we live in Adam and in our own nature, we can do nothing but evil. We be so marred, as there is nothing in us but utter rebelliousness against GOD. Therefore we must enter as it were into death, and into the grave, to be renewed, and our Lord must be faine to give us a new understanding, and a new heart, and he must so shape us new again, as we may no more be the same we were before, but be (as you would say) cast in a new mould, and be made new creatures, as the scripture uses to speak of it. Thus you see how we may learn what Baptism is, what it betokens, and to what end it was ordained.

As touching the Lord's supper: if it be inquired of us why we come together to receive a bit of bread: and a draught of wine: it is in way of acknowledgement that our souls have need of food, no less than our bodies, and that as there is such frailty in this present life, as it cannot continue without the help of meat and drink, so must our souls also be maintained after like sort, by reason of the infirmity that is in them. Nevertheless our souls are not nourished with the corruptible meats of this world, but it is the son of God that is our food. We then have Jesus Christ, who is our life, it is he of whom we have sustenance and nourishment, forasmuch as he was offered in sacrifice for us, and the blood that he did shed for our salvation is our drink. Thus you see how we nowadays may learn where to that ordinances to tend which God has established in his Church, and to what end they be to be referred.

In like case was it under the law. For God ordained not the ceremonies without further consideration of some reason in them. It is true that he meant to separate his people from all the heathen and unbelievers of the earth: but yet in the meanwhile, the washings which they used were done, to show that they were full of naughtiness as well as we, and that it stood them in hand to seek the means to be made clean. The sacrifices were a witness that they were worthy to be condemned to everlasting death, and that there was none other shift for them, but to flee to the sacrifice whereby they should be reconciled to God. The Sanctuary betokened that no man but only Jesus Christ might enter into God's kingdom, nor come near it: and that by his means all nations have access thither, and that all such as are unworthy in respect of their own persons, are brought in thither by that mediator. To be short, all the ceremonies of the Law had some certain use, and served to train the people to put their trust in the redeemer that was promised them. And that was the cause why Moses was commanded to make all things according to the spiritual pattern which he had seen on the mount. For Moses built not the Tabernacle, otherwise than GOD had given him the pattern of it. And all was to show, that there was a conformable resemblance between the outward things, and the truth which was to be manifested in our Lord Jesus Christ. But in the text Moses speaks but of the first, and that is the cause why I said, that it behooved us to have an eye to his meaning. For it was enough for him to say, go to my friends, you which have seen the redemption that GOD has wrought, you (say I) ought to consider how much you be bound to him. Therefore make account of the doctrine of the Law, and frame your whole life thereafter, that it may be as an acknowledgement o the deliverance which you have received at his hand. And when you shall have walked thereafter all the time of your life: look well to it that you teach your children also, so as God's service may continue among you, and never decay nor be abolished. That is the

Furthermore let us understand that we must consider, that the Law was not invented at the pleasure of men, neither was it founded by them: but God was the giver thereof, who holds us under his government, and it is his truth which we follow, so as we hold not any whit of things invented by men. That is the thing whereon we must rest, that we may not be always wavering and doubtful. And hereby we know how wretched the state of the papists is: for they be stubborn and willful in their own imaginations. If a man ask then of whom they hold their superstitions: they allege their fathers, the^{4y} allege long antiquity, they allege that common fashion of the whole world: but in the meanwhile they have no certainty that their doings please God, or that he allows then, whereas in very deed the thing that God leads us to is that we should be sure that we have not hold not anything that is brought us at all adventure: but that the doctrine of our faith is the pure truth. Seeing then that God commands us so to do: let us assure ourselves that live as becomes us, we must have this certainty that we be governed by God's word, and that the same is the rule of our faith, and that the religion which we stick to the true religion. Now therefore we may profit ourselves by this text, since we see that the meaning of Moses was, that the people should know, that the Law was not devised by men, but that God was the author of it. And even at this day the Law must bear this sway with us, that we must know to what purpose it was given. Besides this, although there be nothing set down here concerning the end where to God's ordinances do tend: yet must we look there at. For all things are not spoken in one place: we must take things in such order as God has set them down. In other places he will teach us what marked it behooved the people to shoot at in keeping the law: but he had the case concerns the continual serving of God with reverence, saw us that people may not themselves to be wholly at this devotion, and that therewithal he reserves to himself the authority of governing his people and of holding them in subjection. Those are the things which we have to bear in mind.

Now let us come to that which he adds in the conclusion: that is to know, that God having delivered his people, and brought them into the land that he had given them, appointed them all his commandments. Hereby we see, that when God shows us this grace, to gather us into this Church, he calls us not to be an idle, but at the least to the envy should glorify him, asked the thing whereof the whole Scripture speaks. And these sayings, Behold, I have planted a vine and I will be glorified thereby, and such other, are so often beaten into the people's heads by the Prophets, as it ought to be a doctrine well enough known among them. Now therefore God's speaking after the manner is to show that is intent in choosing that people, was to be honored at their hands. And this belongs much more to us, for as much as God has uttered a far greater power in delivering us from the dungeons of hell in the person of the son. Let us understand then, that we be baptized with this condition, it took leave ourselves wholly to our God: like as when Saint Paul treats thereof, chiefly in the first to the Ephesians: he says that God having chosen as before the creation of the world to be his children, has also made as partakers of the salvation that was purchased for us by our Lord Jesus Christ, to the end that we should glorify him he has showed himself so bountiful towards us, and used such mercy. As often then as we remember God's benefits, and especially his vouchsafing to call us the knowledge of his truth: Let us add this, namely that it is to the end that our life should be wholly dedicated to his honor and service, or else we do what we can to overthrow God's adoption, and we labor to disable it utterly: like as on the contrary part it is said that our calling is warranted by our walking in holiness of life: for after that manner thus Saint Peter speak of it.

Finally Moses adds, It shall be imputed to you for righteousness before God, if you keep his commandments as he has appointed you. In these words he does men to know, that if they beat the side is to be allowed of God, and that he should accept their service: they must not bring any of their own inventions, but be contented to do simply whatsoever God's word affords, and whatsoever is contained there. That is the meaning of Moses. And whereas he says that the keeping of the commandments which God has ordained, shall be imputed to men for righteousness before God: it is all one as if he should say, my friends, tell your children that if they swerve from God's word contained in his law, and turn away after their own fancies, to do what seems good to themselves: God will reject it every whit, and it shall be but as dung before him. For why? He allows obedience above all things. He intends not to give me leave to devise and invent new laws: but he will have them to be contented with that pure rule [of his law] in such sort as he has given it. Therefore looking not that God should accept you, or allow any of all your doings for righteousness, unless it be comfortable to his doctrine: For all though men would fain have things to pass in account which they themselves like of: yet will God cross them out everyone. For why? Their traveling is in vain, unless they can say, Lord we have followed the way where in you did set us. For so says he by his Prophet Esau. Who has required these things at your hand, says he? When the hypocrites make their brags, and think themselves well discharged in being willing to serve God after their own fancy: there needs no more but this answer to disprove all their doings, who required these things at your hands? As if he should say, let him that did set you a work, pay you: for as for me I will none of you, I disclaim you, you have nothing to do with me, seeing you have not served me obediently, which is the principal service that I require. And that is the cause also why St Paul speaking of men's inventions, adds no more but this, that they be men's doctrines. True 80s, that they shall have some fair color, and some likelihood of religion, yes and there will seem to be in them in a perfection of all holiness: but what for that? Seeing they proceed from men, they be no better than flat mockery.

And it is purposely said, Your righteousness before God. Why so? To the intent that men should no more beguile themselves in their own opinion, as they be wont to do by a hardening their hearts when other men zoos them, or by standing in their own conceits. For then they bear themselves on hand, that God has no more authority to condemn them, but the fond opinion which they have conceived shall as a block to cast in his way. To the intent therefore that men should not yield to their own imaginations and to the things which they surmise to be good: Moses says here, my friends, what shall you win, the redeeming it to be a righteousness to do as the heathen do, and to entangle yourselves in their superstitions? For though the world like well of you for so doing: yet must you come (to be short) you had need to look about you how God will accept your doings. And he tells you so pliable as to say: shall this be accounted good? Then must I agree to it. No, he will continue always like himself. Therefore hold you to that which he commands, for is word must be your whole wisdom, while the world so adds itself with its own inventions. Thus you see what it meant by these words where Moses says, it shall be counted to you for righteousness before God, if you keep the commandments which he has appointed.

But yet by the way he might be made a question. For it should seem that God sends men to their own deserving to be justified by them. And on the other side St Paul avouches that we be justified by faith: that is to say, that we be accepted for righteousness before GOD, through his only free goodness, for as much as he accepts us in our Lord Jesus Christ. For it is returned that Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him for righteousness. But here Moses says, that the keeping of the law is imputed for righteousness. It seems then that men are able to purchase salvation by their own works, and so by that means are not endangered to God. But we have two things do note here. The first is that whereas it is said that the keeping of the law is righteousness before GOD, it is not meant thereby that men can become righteous by their own works: for then must they fulfill the law throughout in all points. But now was there ever any creature found that discharged himself to God ward? No. You see then that we be all damned, and so be quite bereft of a righteousness that was given by the law. Wherefore let us learn that the law could well justify us before God, if we could keep it from point to point without any failing. For it is written, he that does these things shall live in them. If a man (say I) could so order his life, as he might make his boast that he had fully performed all that GOD had commanded him: he should righteous. And why? For God which cannot lie has made us a promise, that he will accept our works for righteousness, so we fail not in the performance of any point of this law. But now is there not any man that discharges himself so much as of any one point. Therefore we all transgressors of the law, and consequently we be all accused. And we must not imagined that it deserves to be allowed, when we have done but some piece of that which God commands. No: for he that misses in any one point, is guilty before God, and there remains nothing for him but cursedness. For it is written, that whomsoever perform is not all the things that are contained in this book, shall be accused. Now then let us learn, that whereas the keeping of the law might be imputed to us for righteousness, if it could be found in us: we be utterly deprived and bereft thereof. And why? For there is not that man which transgresses not the law in some point or other: nor, not only in some one point, but in all points throughout, when we have cast up our account. For we never serve God with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our strength as has been said heretofore. And even when we do any good works to outward appearance, there is always some coldness, some slothfulness, or some one thing or other mingled with them, to hinder us. And therefore the work is still faulty. Thus we cease not to break God's Law in all points, saw us we must needs yield ourselves guilty, confessing that if God lifted to judge us rigorously, he should needs reject us. Now we see that although the law contain the true rule of righteousness: it can it not make us righteous, because of the weakness of our flesh, as says Saint Paul in the seventh to the Romans. It remains now to know, in what sense that this spoken: For it seems to be to no purpose, that God should promise to accept then for righteous which keep his law: and yet notwithstanding that all of us should be bereft thereof.

Albeit we must mark, that there is a refuge given us which is to resort to the forgiveness of our sins, which is granted us in our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore when we have acknowledged ourselves to be utterly forlorn and damned in our own nature, and thereupon repair to our Lord Jesus Christ, sewing to be partakers of his righteousness, and to be justified by virtue of the obedience which he yielded to God his father: then God not only receives us to mercy, and covers us with the perfection that is in our Lord Jesus Christ, as with a cloak, with the intent we should obtain salvation: what also takes our works in good worth. And although we perform not the law, but come loitering aloof after it, so as there is great store of vices in us, where with our works are blemished: yet notwithstanding God accepts them, and promises that we shall not lose our labor, insomuch that our works shall be taken for righteous before him. Albeit that they be worthy to be taken for stark filth, because there is always somewhat in them that God may condemn: yet this keeping of the law which we perform (imperfect as it is) shall not fail to be taken for righteousness. The reason is because Jesus Christ supplies our default. The and does not were righteousness consist in the worthiness of our own works: but in as much as they be sanctified in the name of God's son, and forasmuch as we be his members. [both they and] we be admitted for righteous, because of the obedience which he yielded to God, and that obedience is communicated to us, as if it are our own. Thus you see how the promises that are made to us, and to assure us that God will accept the teams for righteousness, which we do in endeavoring to serve him. For such promises are not vain nor fruitless, so our Lord Jesus Christ be our mediator, and perform that which wants on our behalf. For without that all the law will serve us to none other purpose but to condemn us, as has been shown before. Moreover let us mark for the second point, that although the people had kept the law of God: yet even the very performance thereof was a record to them, that it stood them in hand to be justified by mercy and grace, and not by their own merits. For their sacrificing was a kind of protesting that they were worthy of death. There was never any beast slain under the law, but the same was an authentically record that men deserve to be damned at God's hand. And thereby it behooved the faithful to be put in mind to resort to God, and that with such humility, as they sought their life elsewhere than in themselves: in like case was it with their washings, and with all the rest of their ceremonies. The having of light in the temple, was to show that men are stark blind in themselves: and their having of the holy Lamps, and the oil that God had ordained for the same, and their annoying, and such other things ought to have made the people to consider thus with themselves: there is neither understanding, grace, virtue, nor anything else in our wit, but we must be fine to borrow all things of the redeemer that was promised to our fathers, and of God's spirit who is the fountain and fullness of all good things. So then the keeping of the law sent the people back to the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and served for nothing less than to hold them still to those shadows to put their trust in them. Likewise at this day, since we understand well which is the right keeping of God's law, we see well enough that it is not for us to presume upon our own deserving, as these mad papists do, who uphold that they become righteous by keeping of the law. They be so carried away with that opinion, that they'd think not any more of God's grace, made the do they perceive that the law was given to hold men convicted and to drive them to come before their judge, as wretched offenders to sew for grace. They think not of that. Again, they have the term Merit of Desert, which they use like a drunken man that can discern nothing because he is overstated and has his eyes bleared: even so play these wretched unbelievers. But we for our part know that we have to thank or God for his infinite goodness, in making us to understand that the true keeping of the law, these for men to condemn themselves by it, and to take knowledge that they have nothing in them but utter forwardness, and that they must be fine to resort to God, and to be taken themselves wholly to his mercy. And for as much as there is none other mean but Jesus Christ: they must get them thither, and now that God will be neither father nor Savior to them, but by accepting them in the person of him in whom he avows all his delight to be. Thus the things which we have to remember upon this text, are, first that if we will have God to allow of our life, we must not do what we think good of ourselves, but simply fall of that which is commanded us in his law. Albeit for as much as it is promised us, that we shall be taken for righteous before him, if we keep his law: and yet notwithstanding, all of us are transgressors of the law, saw as our whole life condemns us, and there is none of us but he may judge by that heart biting of his own conscience, that we be full of sins and offences: we must flee to that before mentioned refuge which is, to beseech God to justify us of his own free mercy. And besides this, when we be once grassed into the body of our lord Jesus Christ, let us not doubt but he will make us partakers of the fruit of his death and passion, so that although our works be sinful, yet God will admit them for righteous. But yet, that proceeds of his free goodness, and not of any desert of ours. Finally forasmuch as we know that the best works which we can do, are worthy to be condemned: let us look well to it that we presume not of ourselves, not for our own virtues: but let us go and submit ourselves with all humility to our God, praying him to work so in us by his holy spirit, as he make the direct and passion of his son available, whereby the everlasting salvation is purchased for us.

And now let us kneel down in the presence of a good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to print his law in such wise in our hearts, as we may be able to keep it, not to offer our own power and motion, but by the guiding of his holy spirit: and that therewithal it may please him to bear with us in our infirmities, until have rid us quite and clean of all our sins, and taken us up into the everlasting kingdom which he has promised us.

And so let us all say, Almighty God & c.

On Thursday, the first of August 1555

The 51st Sermon which is the first upon the seventh Chapter

When the Lord your God shall have brought you into the Land whither you goes to possess it, and shall have cast our many Nations before you, namely the Hittites, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Pherezites, the Hevites, and the Jebusites, seven Nations more in number and strong than yourself:

2 And when the Lord your God shall have delivered them before you: though shall smite them, and root them out, and you shall make no covenant with them nor show them any favor.

3 You shall not ally yourself with them by marriage, you shall not give your daughter to their sons, nor take their daughter for your son.

4 For you should make your son to go away from me, to serve other Gods: and the Lords wrath would kindle against you, and destroy you suddenly.

It should be seen at the first sight, that the commandment which is given here to the Jews was very strange. For they be charged to dispatch all their enemies, and to put them to death everyone, yes even the young children and all, without sparing any of them: and it is God that speaks it. But we know that when he intends to exhort us to mildness and mercy, he alleges his own example. You shall resemble your heavenly father (says our Lord Jesus Christ) who causes his day sun to rise both upon good and bad: and therefore do good to such as are not worthy of it. Seeing that GOD has not a better reason to persuade us to show mercy, than by showing us what he himself does: it seems not in any wise convenient, that he should provoke us to cruelty. For when he says, you shall kill all, you shall leave nothing, even the young babes shall pass under the edge of the sword: what is to be said to it, but that GOD had not pity nor kindhearted in that behalf? But although it seem so to us: yet let us learn to glorify him, knowing that the greatest rigor which is in him is rightful and faultiness, yes even although the reason thereof be not manifest to us. And here by let us learn to beware, that we be not so bold as to the judge of God or of his doings after our own wit and imagination. For as soon as a thing seems good to us, we take it to be so indeed: and on the contrary part, if we fall to judging of God's ordinances at adventure, and deem to be evil because we perceive not the reason of them: where is our obedience? Wherefore let us learn to humble ourselves in such wise that if the things which God says do not fitly agree with our understanding: yet nevertheless we received them with all submission and reverence, acknowledging that as there is nothing but all wisdom and righteousness in him, so it becomes us to yield to his good pressure, and to confess that whatsoever he ordains is the sovereign righteousness.

Again, to the end that the thing which is set down here may not seem strange: we must mark what manner of people they were of whom mention is made here. It is said, You shall destroy the people whom I will deliver into your hand. Now if it be demanded thereof it came that God would have none of them reserved: Let us have an eye to that which had been spoken four hundred years before: namely, the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet come to his full ripeness. In the time of Abraham these people were so malicious and spiteful in vexing that holy patriarch, asked their refused even to let him have water. Not that he went about to borrow any out of their ponds and fountains: but that they would not suffer him to enjoy the wells that he himself had dug in the desert places. He did not wrong to any man, and yet they were so cruel, that they would not suffer him to drink of the water which he had gotten by his found skill and travel. He was hunted from place to place, and yet he had not done any man wrong. Again all the country was full of contempt of God, all was full of wickedness, robbery, whoredom, and all manner of uncleanness. To be short, God seemed to be asleep in that he punished not those nations which were so given over to all ungodliness and outrage. And if they that threads at this text had lived in those days: they would have said, how now? God promises to do justice, and to take vengeance upon all the despises of his Majesty: but there appears no such thing. If he ruled the world, and that his providence beat above all: how is it that he suffers so along the wickedness that is in this people? After that manner do the wicked always take occasion to repine at GOD, and to complain of him, and to find fault with his doings. For if he be patient, they say he is careless to punishments of men's offences and sins. And if he use rigor: they say he exceeded measure, and that there is no reason in his doings and that the same hastiness of his, betrays well that there is no mercy nor pity in him. Lo how the wicked folk do blaspheme God every way. But let us on our side got to work with another manner of modesty.

And first of all we must mark well this sentence, as I said before. Behold, God tells us that although the Amorites and their neighbors were given to all evil, and were past amendment, saw as there was no more hope to bring them to any good: yet notwithstanding he bare with them and made as though he saw them not. He saw that they despised him, and were given to all idolatry, and therewithal made no conscience to steal and rob and to commit all manner of wickedness: and yet for all that, he said he would not destroy them, [but bear with them further]. How long? Not for half a score years, or for twenty years, or for a whole hundred: but even until four hundred years were past and run out. Was not that a tarriance long enough? Now in the end of the term, when God had shocked that not only he himself knew, but also it appeared openly by experience to the whole world, that those nations were utterly past hope of recovery, and grew worse and worse under pretence that God and delete them not according to their deserts: was it not meet that at length horrible vengeance should light upon them?

They had of all that long time heaped up the treasure of God's wrath upon their heads by abusing his patience: and therefore ought the rigor that he used against them, to seem too excessive? Can we say that he was moved with over sudden choler? Not. Then let us learn to restrain ourselves in that case, and to keep our mouth shut, that we utter not a word against God, but so bridle our minds as we imagine not anything of him but all justice and uprightness, confessing that whatsoever he appoints to be done, cannot be but rightful, and that it becomes us to be contented with his only will.

And let us marked by the way, that when men take upon them to repine against God, it is always to their own confusion. It is true that at the first sight their cost may seem very favorable: for a weekend so good skill to harp upon God's mercy, that the rigor of his Justice is always odious to us. But yet for all that, when men have pleaded their discourse to the full: he is not God able to answer them in a word, as I have declared already? What is that? They will have these people utterly rooted out: for they have scorned me. I had given then a good fruitful land to dwell in, and they have devoured my benefits without any acknowledging from whence they came. They have spied with me to the uttermost. I sent then some chastisements to cut them, but have they amended for all that? I have set looking glasses of my wrath before them: but they stopped their eyes, they hardened their hearts more and more, and yet for all that. I have been contented to delay the punishment of that to the end of four hundred years. Behold, four ages are come and gone: and ought they not to have amended in so a long time? Yes: but they be still at one stay. But yet must not this land be always infected with such filthiness. I have dedicated it to mine own service, I will have my name called upon there, and I intend to plant my people there, that there may be a pure and holy religion: and should they leave such riffraff among them? If there were none other reason but that ought not God's service to be more dear than the lives of all the men in the world? If we spare men's blood, and say it is no small thing that the whole nation should be so rooted out: I grant that. But shall we make so a little account of God's honor, and of the religion whereby we leave everlastingly? Shall we (say I) have it in so small estimation, asked to prefer men's lives before it? What a dealing were that? Do we not betray that there is no love of God in us? Under color of gentleness and mercy, we would pluck God out of his seat, and that men should play mock holiday with him, saw us there should be no more reverence nor humility yielded to his service: and what a confusion were that? Therefore the way for us to put this text in use, is that when we see that God is patient, and falls not upon the wicked at the first dash, not powers out his rigor upon them to confound them, we must not think that he has forgotten his duty, and sits still in heaven: but we must rather consider that he accomplishes to say which I alleges out of genesis, namely that the wickedness of the parties is not yet come to full ripeness. Truly never judgment it where time that he should work, as soon as the wicked do pass their bounds. For we see how impatient we be, and how we break out into heats when things go amiss: in our own opinion we would think it's good that God should thunder upon them out of hand, and to our seeming he is overflow. Not rather let us look upon God, who tarries patiently as he has done at all times, and is loath to execute his rigor, until he have showed that the wicked are utterly past amendment. True it is that something he makes no such tarriance, for it is not for him to deal always after one sort, and neither is it for us to bind him to any certain law, he has liberty to hasten his judgments when it places him. But yet for all that, he does commonly delayed them and put them off, and for the same cause is he said to be long-suffering.

And we must not think that God will not call them to account whom he bears with all: but after as he winks at them, so he doubled his vengeance upon them, if they be not touched with hearty repentance, when he has given them respect. But on the contrary part, when he has waited for the wicked a long time, if he show greater rigor than we thought he would have done, and punish them with more extremity because they have so dallied with him, and despised his goodness, yes, and even turned it into an occasion of greater agelessness. I say if he be more wrathful and sharp than we thought he would have been: let us not think him to be too excessive, but let us assure ourselves he has just reason so to do, although he make not as privy to it. Therefore when we shall have marked the examples that talent of holy Scripture: they will make this conclusion: that is not to be wondered at though GOD use the greater rigor towards those whom he has spared so long time together. For his goodness is too precious a jewel, to be made a jesting stock of the wicked.

Furthermore let us mark generally, that God will not be subject to our surmising, but he will have us to receive his sayings and doings without scanning them, and to take all things as good and rightful which come off him, yes we went to our reason again say it. For we be too fickle headed to judge, and therewithal we be so foolish and rash, that to our own seeming it is lawful for us to allege our opinion, not only to judge of men's doings, but also to give sentence upon the determinations of our God, and upon such execution of that as he does ordinarily. But contrariwise it is showed us, in both in this place and in all others that it is not for us to duns ourselves so high, asked to say whatsoever comes at our tongues end: but we must receive whatsoever comes from God, without any replying. Does God then seem cruel? Yet nevertheless let us confess that he is righteous, and that he does not anything but his perfect righteousness and equity. Besides this, let us learn also 20 by him in all points, by doing the things that he commences, even though they go against our stomachs. Sometimes men may (to their seeming) have honest excuse, not to do the thing that is commanded them. But what for that? It will not discharge them before God for God will be wise for us, and good reason it is that he should be so. For what a thing were it if men might allege, yes Lord, but what will become of such a thing? Such an inconvenience might follow of it. If we fall to scanning after that fashion: is it not as much as if we should say that God was misadvised, and foresaw not all, and that we have a deeper and better settled forecast than his is? And were not that too devilish in blasphemy? Yes. And therefore let us mark, that to rule out life aright, we must not enter into so many counter sayings and disputations: but we must understand that our wisdom is to obey God simply. When S Paul spared the king whom he had overcome, and the Cattle that was fallen into his hands: it seemed to him that he had colored good enough to do it. For his intent was to have led the king in triumph, and that had been as a spectacle to show God's goodness towards his people. Indeed so was it to St Paul's weaning. And as for the cattle, he reserved them to have made sacrifices with all: and that was a godly thing to make men understand, that God had given so noble and wonderful a victory to his people. All this went well then. Yes, if a man might have believed St Paul in his own imagination. But yet in the meanwhile he is approved at God's hand. And both he and his mercy be condemned together, and the king is fine to be fine by another before his face.

For he himself was not worth it to be God's minister, he was bereft of that office, and Samuel was put in his room. And afterwards it was told him, that the king term which he processed should not descend to his children and posterity, but should be conveyed to a stranger. We would think this gear very strange, but that it is showed us that Saul was of went in taking upon him to be wiser than he had leave to be: and in that as soon as a foolish toy took him in the head, he followed that rather than the commandment of God. And was not that they are taking upon him to be wiser than God? And was not that a cursed pride? Yes: and therefore the condemnation which Samuel pronounced upon him was just. For it is mere that God should be glorified and that we should confess that there is nothing to be amended in him but that all mouths ought to be opened, and to say: Lord, wisdom, Justice, equity, and virtue, are not to be sought for elsewhere than in you. And therefore let us practice this doctrine in such wise, as we be not more merciful than God will have us to be, or than the rule which he has given us will bear. For there are that would fine use mercy in mingling white and black together, and in making a hodgepodge of all things, under the pretence that wicked persons should go quiet and scot-free. And what remains more, but that the righteous and good men should be condemned, if the wicked should be so maintained? And that is the cause why Solomon says, that he which quiets the offender when he sees him guilty, is as much to blame before God, as he that oppresses the innocent. For our Lord has ordained, not only that God cases should be maintained: but also that evil dealings should be corrected when they be found. And for the same purpose has he put his sword into the hands of princes, magistrates, and all other officers of justice, to the intend that lewdness should not be maintained in the world. Then is there no replying against this. And yet notwithstanding you shall have some that will complain of men as bloodsuckers, and as soon as any mention is made of the execution of justice, it is no better [with them] but cruelty. Let such folk get them to God, and go plead against him, to see if they can get the upper hand. And it is not only the gallon scalpers that say so, I mean those whose faults and crimes are a manifest: but these Tavern hunters or Alehouse Knights which counterfeit the preachers. O h, they have great skill to allege gentleness and mercy: and it seems to them that I do no more spare blood than they do the wine, which they gusset and quaff up without measure or reason. But such blasphemies or railings do touch God, and not men. For I hear what is spoken. Let those Majesty dogs bark and gnarl us much as they lift: yet if this doctrine which proceeded out of God's mouth sufficient to make them ashamed.

pity of such as are going to destruction. Let that serve for one point. So as if it lay in us, we should be mindful out to draw them out of the ditch. And when we see them utterly willful, so as there is no hope nor mean to bring them back again: we must be sorry for them, for as much as we see they be wretched damned creatures. Mark that for another point, again, let us bear with such as fall to repentance. But when we see folks hardhearted and desperate, so as they have conspired to fight against God to the uttermost: what mercy where it to maintain that? Lo here another blasphemy, which is when men will needs be more pitiful than God. He is the wellspring of all goodness. And he says that we be evil, and that although we have the greatest show of goodness that is possible to be had: yet is it but the spark of the great and infinite perfection that is in him. But now, behold, there are new divines which will needs have men to be merciful. And how? Although a man be wicked, and the world sees that he is full of venom against God, and ceases not to do evil, but the more he is born withal the more he is still inflamed with malice: Yet [say they] why should he not be born withal still? Let them ask that of God, and he will tell them that there is no place for his mercy, but whether this repentance. True it is, that it is in him to give repentance. But howsoever the world go, when his release to utter his goodness towards any man, he touches his heart that he may return to him. Now then, shall we look upon such as are fully bent to blaspheme God to the uttermost, and yet in the meanwhile talk to them to mercy still? Ought we not rather to spit in the faces of such villains, which mock God and his word to the full? Yes: and therefore let us beat simply in mind, that we must follow the things which God commands, and that it is not for us to allege anything at all in that behalf.

And on the other side let us mark also, that God meant not to resign his vengeance to men, and to give them leave to hurt their enemies when they shall have offended them. Then if we do the worst we can to men when they have grieved us or done us any wrong, under color that God has told us that he would have the ungodly rooted out: it is taking a false convert from the word of God. Therefore let us note that we must not be led with any affection, neither must we pass whether any wrong or hindrance have been wrought to us or not: for as long as men's minds run upon their private grieves, they shall never serve God: but we must have this consideration with us, of doing that which God commands us, without being moved by any fleshy mood. Mark that for a special point.

Again, let us not deal further than God bids us, but let us be faithful executors of his words, and not stir one finger further than he says, do thus or thus. To be short, he that gives his enemy but a fill up, a guilty of murder before god. But he has put a wicked man to death, not being led thereto by any wicked affection, but because his office requires it: is just and allowed of God, and his executing of such punishment is a sacrifice to him. According as we see that Moses speaks thereof, especially when the idolatry that the people had committed was to be punished, in which case he says, Sanctify your hands to the Lord. And how? What manner of holiness was it whereof Moses spoke there? It was that they should kill all the idolaters that had defiled to themselves, and put the corrupters of the true religion to death. And whom commended he to do it? Even the Levites, even those which ought to have been that murderers of all pity and loving kindness. Even the priests whom God had dedicated to himself where nevertheless a pointed to be the executors of that rigor. And upon whom? Even upon their own kind folk, as they might not bear with them. Seeing then that we see this: let us learn that such as do justice, (conditionally that they intermingled not their own affections and ruins us, but endeavor to serve the God and to execute the charge that is committed to them) do sanctify their hands in so doing, and the rigor which they use is commendable. That is to say, if they have compassion upon the poor creatures that perish, then that rigor of players being so qualified is an acceptable sacrifice to God. And on the contrary part, if we do but to secure one finger upon displeasure for any wrong that is done to us, he is, all B. but provoked to grant to add them that shall misused us: by and by it is murder before god. And so let us learn, not to seek fond excuses to revenge ourselves, under pretence that God has told us that the week it must be destroyed and rooted out, but let us have a good and well stayed zeal, so as we overshoot not ourselves to say that men may step forth to do this or that on their own heads, but they must tarry till God have given sentence, and then execute the same, as we see is said of it in this text. The sleazy in effect to what we have to remember, concerning the rooting out of those whom God nor into the past amendment, would not suffer the welter any longer in their own dung, because he had gone with them enough and too much already.

And it is said expressly, God has delivered them into your hand to put them to death. This is the watchword which he keys to his people, to the intent they should willingly obey this commandment. As if he should say, he that will give you the victory, wills you to deal so. And is it not the reason [then that you should do it?] Yes, for how should we use God's gifts but according to his will? So then, Moses confirms that the doctrine that he sets for the people as if he should say, look about new, you must not dispose after your own pleasure, of them home you shall overcome. For if you spare them under color that you has subdued them, and that they be in your hand, and that you has conquered that: it will cost your right dear. For comes the victory of yourself? No, but it is your God which has delivered them into your hand. And for proof thereof, these nations are stronger and mightier than you, yes and more in number. How then could you discomfit them, if your God over mastered them not, and were not your Captain, and fought not for you? If the victory were not given you from heaven: how could you obtain it? Now then, come not here to make your vaunts, and to say, we may now dispose of the victory as we list ourselves. For it comes of God, and therefore he must bear all the sway, and you must use such humility, as he may be obeyed, and honored for the thing which you know to come of him. Thus we see now the intent of Moses.

And hereby we be warned, that in all things which GOD puts into our hands, we must beware that we take not too great liberty, to use his benefits at our own pleasure. For it is good reason that he should always have so much credit with us, as to show us the lawful use of his benefits. As how? Let us take that common example of eating and drinking. When God has given a man abundance of worldly goods, he must not forget him to whom he is behold for them. For if he saw this is mine, I will do with it as I list: it is a defrauding of God of the right that he reserves to himself. It is true that we may well term the things ours which he has given us: albeit that is with condition that they must always remain at his devotion and we use them soberly and modestly as I have said before, so as he may still be acknowledged to be the Lord and master of them.

Now where is this well observed, we would not un-hallow God's benefits after such sort as we see most men do. For there is no questioning whether GOD have permitted or forbidden such a thing: but as soon as men have power over it, by and by they think it is lawful to do with it what they list. And who shall let us, say they? If you find none upon earth to set himself against you and to let you: GOD can well enough skill to call you to account for your stateliness, in that you submit not yourself to him, nor resurrect of him the things that he has given you, to say that he shall always overrule you. So then let us mark well this doctrine, namely that for as much as GOD shows himself liberal towards us, and bestows his benefits upon us: we be tied and bound with so much the straighter bond, to do him homage for the things that he has put into our hands, that is to say, to use them accordingly as his word will bear. That is another point.

Now Moses adds immediately, You shall not make any Alliance with them. You shall not give them your children in marriage, For if you give your son in marriage to a daughter of the enemy, or to any of your enemies: she will turn away his heart, and draw him to superstition and idolatry: and then will the wrath of your God be kindled upon you, and you shall be rooted out. Here out Lord adds another commandment, which is that the Amorites should not have any league or alliance with his people. he had said before, You shall destroy all. And why? Because he had told them how it was his will (as I said before) that that Land should be reserved to himself. And surely we see what befell his people, when they became negligent in executing this commandment. For notwithstanding anything that God had spoken to them, yet they forbear to conquer the Land which he had promised them. This is enough (quotes they) let us hold ourselves quiet, and let us not spend all our life in war. And so by that means they left a great number of that people alive. But what came of it? They became as thorns in their sides, yes and as pricks in their eyes. Now then the reward which the Israelites had for not doing the thing which God had commanded them: was, that by leaving those idolatrous people alive, and by intermingling themselves with them, they felt them to be as thorns to prick them and to prick out their eyes. For the enemies of God did bring the wretched Jews into such captivity, that they were overloaded with the yoke of bondage, and there was no man that succored them, until they had languished long time therein. And it is good reason that GOD should pay us in such coin, when we will needs be more loving and friendly than he. We see what was said to Ahab concerning Benhadad King of Syria, that because he had not punished the party whom GOD had commanded to be punished, he should receive the punishment upon his own head. You would not punish him (says the Prophet) and therefore must you answer for him in his stead, and be his borrow. And indeed, it is not for naught that men do commonly use this proverb, Save a thief from the gallows, and he will help to hang you. This proverb serves not only to condemn the unthankfulness of such as have received good at men's hands: but also to verify the just punishment of GOD: that is to know, that if a man have saved an offender by some wicked practices either for favor, or for fond pity, or for vainglory, and so hindered justice: he himself must answer in his stead, and the party that was saved from the gibbet, must help to lead him thither from whence himself was discharged. And when it falls out so: we must understand: that is it of God's working. So then you see how GOD has showed by effect, that it was no small offence, that the land which he had dedicated to his own service should be still defiled with such abominations, and that idolaters should be mingled with the people which ought to have been holy.

Albeit although the doctrine that has been set down already, might suffice: yet notwithstanding here GOD shows moreover, that his commanding that those Nations should not be reserved nor suffered to live, was not for naught. Why so?

For if they live with you (says he) you may acquaint yourselves with them, and if we make any alliance with them, behold it is a plague, behold it is a contagious disease that will come upon you and your offspring, so as you shall be corrupted and grow out of kind: and in the end that will cause you to be rooted out, and God's vengeance which lay upon that people will light upon you, because you have not executed his judgment as he commanded you. That is in effect is the thing that is contained there. And we have a good lesson to gather upon this text: that is to know, not to have to do with the wicked sort, and with the despisers of God, according to this saying of Saint Paul's that we must not draw the yoke with the unbelievers. For he uses the similitude of Oxen coupled together. The yoke holds them so together, that look which way the one draws, the other must needs follow. In like case is it with men: They that fall into familiarity with the wicked, Do couple themselves with them, so as they be led out of the way and married by them, insomuch that whereas they were as little Gods before, now they become stark Devils. Therefore let us beware we mingle not ourselves with the despisers of God and with the wicked, unless we intend to become like them. Yet notwithstanding there are some to be seen which are so find headed, that they will make God earlier.

For they bear men in hand that they may haunt the company of wicked men, and yet keep themselves sound from all corruption. Yes, but it is a token that they do ill know themselves, when they bear themselves in hand that they be far other than God has reported them to be. Behold, God warns us of our frailty, and tells us that if we keep company with the wicked, they shall rather draw us to evil, than we shall bring them back to good: and therefore it behooves us to keep us out of their company. And if we think the contrary: what will come of it? In the end we shall find that all our weaning was but fondles and folly and therefore let us rather learn to obey God.

But here it might be demanded whether it be not lawful for the faithful to have any company with the wicked. I told you already that we must not go beyond the bonds that God has set. God gives us leave to endeavor as much as is possible for us, to bring them back again which are out of the way of salvation. For as for the things that were spoken concerning the Amorites and the people that were their neighbors: they take not place so rigorously nowadays as though God gave us the sword in our hand, to flea all that were against us: but every of us must have an eye to his own state, and to the charge which God has committed to him. Magistrates are armed with the sword, to punish those whom God brings to their hands, and to put this doctrine in use. Let us look among us what the Holy

Scripture tells us: namely that we should be fine to get us out of the world, if we should not in any wise be conversant with the wicked. For why? The whole earth is full of them, and therefore we must needs dwell with them. But after what manner? In such sort as we have neither acquaintance nor familiarity with them. For those are the yokes that couple us together. When men fall to eating and drinking with the wicked, and creep into acquaintance with them, and become friends to them. It is not possible but that they must be corrupted, and God offended with it. That is a thing which we have to mark concerning this text. Nevertheless, if we be in company with the wicked: let it be for necessities sake, and so soberly as they may not be able to infect us with their naughtiness, nor by any means turn us aside from the right way, or from the fear of God and honest behavior of life. Lo how far forth we may be conversant with the wicked. But to entangle ourselves with them, and to have familiar acquaintance with them, is a manifest tempting of God. And if we say there is such strength and steadfastness in us as they cannot win us: we deceive ourselves. Verily as who should say that God knows us not better than we ourselves do. Is it not a devilish over weaning when we go to work after that fashion? And specially when we fall to contracting of marriages with them, is it not as it were a plunging of ourselves into naughtiness? If a man see a despiser of God which has a daughter like her father and he goes and matches himself with her: is it not as good as an utter renouncing of God? I go and give my daughter and to whom? To a wicked man, to a naughtiness that has not one spark of honesty in him, whose life is wholly out of order. I make the silly sheep a pray, and cast it into the wolves' throat: and what a cruelty is that? Is it not all one, as if I sacrificed my daughter into Moloch? Yes: for he draws her away from obedience to God, to put her into the hand of the devil, and to turn her into all naughtiness. Again, if a man match his son with a young woman that is evil conditioned and an idolatress, in whom he sees no religion nor virtue: is it not as good as if he should go poison his son? True it is that the wise (to means seeming) has no authority over her husband: But yet it is a deadly plague for a man to be matched with a wicked wife. For surely one woman of naughty behavior, shall rather marry ten men, than ten good husbands shall win one lewd woman that is set upon wickedness. And that does experience show. The wife shall sooner marry her husband by her allurements and temptations I know not how than the husband shall reclaim his wife, and bring her back again to good. And therefore let us not think it strange, that God should tell the Jews here, that if they give their sons and daughters to the Amorites, Hethites, Canaanites, Hevites, Jebusites, and such like people: they should be and by be turned away to idolatry.

And hereto he adds a threat, That they shall be rooted out: and that is according to that which I have said already. For it does them to understand, that God will be continually among them. Indeed it was a word of singularity, that God would dwell among them, for they might call upon him at their need, and when they were distressed they might feel that he was at hand with them, and therefore that they needed not to fear their enemies. But yet for all that, it behooved them to know, that God being so near to them, would not suffer himself to be despised. And therefore let us bear away this lesson, that now specially seeing God has vouchsafed to give us his word, whereby he assures us that he will be near at hand to us, yes and that he will have us to be his temples to dwell in by his holy spirit: let us learn I say, to give ourselves in such wise to him, that whereas there are sins and infirmities in us, (as indeed there are more than requisite) it may please him to correct them, and rid us of them from day to day. And forasmuch as he has taken us under his protection, yes and made his dwelling place among us: let us be stirred up by means thereof, to live insomuch the greater awe, seeing he is become so neighborly and familiar to us.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may learn to dislike of ourselves for them, and as this cursed over weaning may no more bear sway in us to make us live after our own liking, but that we may forsake our own fleshly reason and wisdom, and covet nothing but to please him in all points and all respects and that seeing he has vouchsafed to should us out from the wicked, and to deliver us from their corruptions, we may learn to sanctify ourselves wholly to him, and to profit more and more in his fear, to the end that his glory may shine forth in us, and we be more and more confirmed in his free adoption, where through he has chosen us to be his children and heirs for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth & c.

On Friday, the second day of August 1555

The 52nd Sermon which is the second upon the seventh Chapter

5. But thus shall you do to them. You shall beat down their altars, and break their pillars: you shall heave down their groves, and burn their Images with fire.

6. For you are a holy people to the Lord your God. The Lord your God has chosen you to be his peculiar people above all the nations of the earth.

7. The Lord has not set his love upon you, nor chosen you because you were more in number than all other nations, seeing you be the lease of all nations.

8. But for the love which the Lord bears you to keep the oath which he swore to your fathers, the Lord has brought you forth with a strong hand, and delivered you from the house of bondage, even from the land of Pharaoh, King of Egypt.

Yesterday we saw how God forbad his people to ally themselves in any wise with the Infidels, and specially with the people that dealt in the land of Canaan. Forasmuch as it was said that God had chosen that land to the intent that his name should be worshipped there it was his will to have it purged from all the filthiness and infections, which had reigned there too long time before. And after he has spoken to the folk, he adds also that he will have all the tokens and marks of idolatry that were in the country put quite away. For like as it behoooved the Jews to worship God purely, without intermeddling any of the superstitions of the heathen: so did it also behooove them to keep the order in such wise as God had set it down, and to put away all things that were contrary to the true religion and service of God, so as there might be no mingling nor corruption. We see now in effect, that the doctrine which is contained here, is that forasmuch as God had given his people the land of Canaan: he would have it clear from all abominations, and his service to be so set up, as all the ceremonies of the heathen and unbelievers might be taken away, and nothing be mingled with it besides his own Law. And that is the cause why he speaks expressly of Altars and Groves. For as we see that men have no end nor measure in devising of fashions to serve God withal: there was not that Grove but they made some devotion in it. And like as men built Abets, Priories, and Chapels in the Popedom, so went the world among the paymins, and the Jews followed the same trade, as we see. But that was not for want of warning, for God had provided sufficiently for them, that they might not set their minds upon such paltry. But what? Hereby it appears how hard it is to hold men in the pre simplicity of God's service. Nevertheless, howsoever men fate, it is told us here, that such as will serve God incorruptly, must abstain from the things that are devised and forged by idolaters, and stick to the pure doctrine which God has ordained, and not add anything to it of their own, or which they find here and there, or which that would has foolishly brought in: All those things must be laid down, if we will serve God purely. But yet let us mark that there were two reasons why God commanded the Jews to break down the heathen men's altars, and to destroy their idols. The one was to the end that his people should not be provoked and tempted to wickedness and superstition by looking upon them, for we be so frail, that we be carried away as soon as we spy any mark of superstition. I said even now that it is a hard thing to hold men fast in pure obedience to god as in respect of his service. Why so? For their ears do always itch to hear some new doctrine: and although none be brought them from elsewhere, yet their minds are so roving, that they ever covet some new thing or other. Now then if we have any occasion to tempt us to evil, or to any corruption of God's service, we be overtaken by and by. God therefore perceiving that his people might be inclined to idolatry, and that they would yield to it out of hand as soon as they spied any occasion, will them to wipe away all such things. Beware (says he) that you suffer not any of the marks of the idolatries that have reigned heretofore, for if any of them come in your sight, you shall be as it were ravished, and you will be following of them. So then, suffer not anything that may make you to stumble, or that may comber you, so as the way should not be level before you. Have you none other signs than those which I have appointed you, and let them serve to confirm you in my word. Let the things which I have taught you be as a burning Lamp to give you light: and if you have need of helps, let the Sacraments and Ceremonies contained in my Law suffice you: but take heed to yourselves that you have no stumbling block. For though you have nothing to hinder your going on in the right way: yet may you even of your own nature turn aside from it, and what will you then do, if any occasion of evil be offered you? That is one point.

Another is, That God's will was to have that land as it were dedicated to himself, and that his people should show how much they abhorred idols, by suffering none of the things to remain which the heathen men had kept before. God then meant to try the zeal of the Jews, when he commanded them to make clean riddance of the idols: and by that means he intended to ensure them to abhor idols, and all things that belonged to them, so as they might show not only that they purposed to worship the only one God, but also that they could not abide his glory to be any whit abated. Now we see the two reasons that God had an eye to in this place. And now must we apply them to our own benefit. For although some would restrain this to the Jews, as though it belongs not to us in these days: yet was it not God's intent to speak for any one time only. And indeed, (as has been declared in the fifth chapter,) let us look into our own hearts, and every man examine himself, whether he find himself more steadfast and strong to withstand idolatry, than the Jews and other Nations were. For surely that cursed seed is so rooted in all men, as there is none of us all but he may keep a school of superstition, without having any school master to teach him. We be so forward, that although no body seduce us, yet we rather tend still to some corruption, than hold ourselves in the pureness of God's service. What is to be done then, seeing that idolatry is so rooted in our nature? If occasions be offered to draw us away, is it not like as when nets are spared before birds? And we be so inconstant that we tumble into them immediately. And therefore as for them that think themselves to have such constancy and strength, that although they have images, chapel and such other things, yet they shall not hurt them at all: they tempt God, and experience shows it to be so. Therefore there is no better way, than to know our infirmity, and upon the knowledge thereof, to use the remedy that God has given us. If a man perceive himself to have weak hand, so as he is not able to bear three glasses of wine he shall be overtaken: if he drink without discretion is he not as bad as a swine? Does he not tempt God? Ought he not to think upon the default that is in him, and to prevent it? Yes. Now it is certain that in this behalf we have so weak brains, that we shall by and by be made drunk with superstition, yes and as good as bewitched with superstition, so as there will be no discretion in us, but we shall go on still to seek further occasions and means of it: and is not that a manifest spiting of God? It is a point therefore which ought to be well marked, that GOD knowing the weakness which is in us, is not willing that we should have images, altars, and such other things to seduce us, but that all such things should be wiped out from among us to the intent there may not be anything to hinder us from giving ourselves simply to God.

But now let us come to the second reason. It is not enough for the faithful to refrain from all idolatry: but they must also show that they abhor and hate all things that are against God's service: And to the uttermost of their power they must endeavor to have them all wiped away, so as the remembrance of them may be rooted out, that they may never be spoken of anymore. For else what zeal have we to the honor of God, when we see idols set up instead of him, and look upon things that serve to corrupt and deface the true and pure religion? If we do but laugh at them, and take them as small trifles, or as children games, is it not a token that we esteem the honor of our God no more than a thing of nothing? For if our desire to have God glorified, were as earnest as I thought to be: surely it would wound our hearts to see idols so set up in his place, and to see men bereave him of his majesty to attribute the same to dead creatures, and that so precious and holy a thing as religion is should be so marred corrupted and turned upside down. When these marks come before our eyes, surely if we have anyone drop of good zeal, it must needs vex us and grieve us, and we must to the uttermost of our power deface all those signs and marks of idolatry, and cause God's honor to be maintained unpaired. And indeed, when he requires that we should make confession of our faith to him: this also is comprehended therein. For as the mouth ought to utter what is in our heart, that is to know, that we have but the only one God which has redeemed us, if we yield him such record with our mouth, our outward doing must also be answerable thereto, so as both feet and hands tend that way. [If we were at that point,] we would not wittingly and willingly suffer any superstitions, if it lay in us to abolish them. But yet there is a thing in it, which is that Moses commands the people expressly to do it when they be come into the Land which God had appointed them to enjoy for their inheritance. For if we be in a strange country where we have no authority, it is not in our power to put down idols, neither does this commandment stretch thereto. It is true that in passing through places there idolatry is used, we must sigh and mourn, and think our eyes to be as it were defiled with the sight of such wickedness contrary to the honor of god, so as it must grieve us and vex us at the heart that we be driven to see such sights. And forasmuch as our hands be tied, and we have not any sovereignty or authority in the place or Country where such superstitions reign, we have no more to do, but to pray God to put to his mighty hand, and to destroy it every whit, and in the meanwhile to hold ourselves quiet. But if we have authority, then behold, God's voice cries out, up, up, such abominations must not reign any longer. When you be come to the country which your God gives you to possess, then let all such gear be put down.

Now then, out of this text we must draw a rule: which is that according as God gives ability, we must endeavor to have all idolatry and all the tokens thereof utterly abolished both publicly and privately As how? When a country is at liberty, and our Lord has planted his word there, such as bear sway and have authority, must find that means that all such things as have corrupted the true religion, maybe abolished and brought to naught. If they do it now, it is a negligence which God condemns. And if a man will put down idolatry: it is not enough to say, no man shall worship idols anymore: but all things which based the pureness of the Religion, must be quite and clean wiped away. As for example, if men should keep still the Altars that were in the time of the devilish Mass: what a thing were it? Where to served they? But to commit abominable treachery against God, so as there should remain neither faith nor fear towards him, so long as such abominations endured? The Altars served to sing their Masses on. By means whereof the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ was utterly defaced, in spite of the redemption that he had wrought. Insomuch that if it be admitted that Jesus Christ was sacrificed daily, it is all one as to reject the benefit that was purchased us by his death and passion.

Now then if the Altars were suffered to stand still, were it not a retaining still of some memorial of the lewdness which ought to dislike us? Yes: for otherwise what were our zeal? When we call to remembrance that we have heard Mass in times past, and had cast ourselves into that dungeon, we ought to be sorry and to crave pardon for it, and to be abashed at the blindness whereunto we were fallen, where through we became so beastly, as to go seek our salvation by renouncing the redemption that was purchased for us long ago by our Lord Jesus Christ, and to make ourselves partakers of so devilish a thing: I say we ought to be afraid in ourselves to think of it. And if the Altars should have stood still, had it not been as it were a spiting of God to play mock holiday with him after that fashion, that whereas we had shrunk away from Christianity, we be neither a whit sorry for it, no nor grieved at all to see the badges thereof? And in very deed the Jews were cast in the teeth with their retaining still of those things, as who should say they weltered still in their own filthiness. And if a lewd woman that had given her body to dishonesty for a time, should afterward rejoice to see still the marks of her whoredom, were it not a sign that she repented not at all? Yes: and even that is the cause why this exception is purposely added, that when the kings went about to serve God, and had beaten down the idols, yet they held still some likes of them, and this blemish sticks expressly upon them, that God disliked them: as if he should say, they were not worthy to be allowed without exception, but be driven to bear this mark of reproach always in their faces, that they had not thoroughly cleansed the land from the former superstitions, when they left the grooves standing still. If a man say, why, and was that so evil a thing? Are not trees the creatures of God? Yes, but when shall have misused them and put them to such heathenish uncleanness as to spite God with them, then must they be wiped quite and clean away. Men must not take overmuch liberty in that case: for our nature is too much given to evil of itself, (as I said before) without any enticing of it thereunto. Thus you see how we ought generally to endeavor to

And likewise particularly, let every man look well to his own house, that he retain not anything which may cover any wickedness, or which is not fully agreeable and conformable to the simplicity of God's word. For as many as dispense with themselves in that case, shall feel it turn to their ruin in their end. We see how it befell to Gideon who was chosen of God, and by whom so many noble deeds were done. Only because he made an Ephod and caused a certain devotion to be set up, there ensued great destruction after his death. And after the same manner we see how a great number do keep still their chapels. If they have any Castle or great house, there must be a chapel for a memorial of their ancestors, in remembrance that there was such a thing, and such an antiquity. They then which will needs have some remnant after that fashion for vainglory, must feel at length that they covered a fire, which shall consume themselves and their children, as the deed of Gideon was the cause of the undoing and destruction of his image, as I said before. And therefore let us bear in mind, that where so ever God gives us power, we must so hate all the marks of superstition, as we must do what we can to wipe them out, that they may no more be had in remembrance. And let us always bethink us of the two reasons which I alleged before.

Now for confirmation hereof, Moses adds that the people of the Jews are holy, and that they ought to dedicate themselves wholly to God: even because they had been chosen (says he) to be a peculiar people in the whole world. Whereas he says that the Jews are a holy people, he means that they ought to be separated from the Heathen and Infidels. For if we take example at those to whom God has not granted such grace as he has done to us, is it not as good as a thrusting of the privilege under foot which he has given us? Behold, God shows us his will, and he vouchsafes to have his word preached to us: and is that to no purpose? Is it for naught? Whereas God comes down to us, and communicates himself so familiarly to us: does that honor which he does us, and that grace which he vouchsafes to use towards us, serve to no use nor profit? Surely it ought at leastwise to sanctify us to him, that is to say, to make us ready to say, Alas Lord, we were miserable creatures, and you vouchsafes to retain us to yourself: therefore behold, we be here, govern you us, and let us be your flock. But now if we fall to defiling of ourselves with the superstitions of the heathen: is it not a renouncing of the privilege that God had given us? Is it not a forsaking of the covenant whereby he had knit and united himself to us? Yes. That then is the cause why Moses adds here, that the Jews are a holy people. As if he should say,

Look to yourselves, for God has shoaled you out from all Nations, and he has called you, even by showing you shall be his heritage, accordingly also as he has given himself to you. Now then if you go and take example at these blind wretches, so as you allege, Our neighbors do so and so: what a thing is that? Your neighbors are strangers to God, they be as wild beasts, God has not vouchsafed to behold them with pity and mercy, to deliver them from the brutish ignorance wherein they be. To be short, you have them as mirrors of God's wrath and rigor. All they that perish do show you what you were, and what you should be still, if god had not reached you his hand. Now therefore acknowledge that benefit, and take no more example at those whom God has forsaken, and to whom he has not granted the like favor as he has done to you. Thus much concerning the Jews. Now remains that we apply this doctrine to our own use.

What is it that makes us a holy people to our God? Even his word. For it is said, you be clean because of the word which I have preached to you, you see then that the mean whereby God sanctifies us to himself, that is to say, draw us out of the common perdition of all the children of Adam, and takes us to be of his own household, is his uttering of his will to us. And so be short, it is (as you would say) a solemn consecration or hallowing of a people by God, when he vouchsafes to have his word preached to them. We need not go seek the gewgaws of popery to make dedication or hallowing: for the mean whereby God dedicates his temples, is by sending his ministers to preach his doctrine faithfully: and it is also the mean whereby we be hallowed to him. Now he has granted us this grace: we see how the wretched Papists are gone astray, and run gadding over the fields without keeping of any way. They hop, they trip, they stumble, and all to their own ruin. They have no light, but are as blind wretches in the midst of darkness: and in the meanwhile behold the Lord our God makes his day sun of the righteousness to shine upon us, for Jesus Christ shows himself to be our redeemer. Since it is so: what ought we to do? Ought we not at least wise to consider, to what end and purpose God's word is preached to us, and every of us to gather under his hand to say, Lord, rule you us? Yes, but what? There are very few which think upon that. For we would be more afraid to define ourselves with the filthiness of papist than we be, if this doctrine were well printed in us, that seeing God has separated us from them, if we intermeddle ourselves with them new gain, it is all one as if we mingled heaven and earth together, of purpose to turn the whole order of nature upside down, and to make a hotchpotch of all things, that there might be a horrible confusion. For surely there ought to be a greater difference between God's children and the unbelievers, than there is distance between heaven and earth.

True it is that we must be faine to be mingled together one with another as long as we live in this world: but yet is it not said for naught, that God's children are citizens of heaven and pilgrims in the world. Although they be conversant here beneath, yet must they not be tied to it, but they must go on still as in a strange country, knowing that their abiding place is above, and that God has chosen then with condition that they should go thither. Therefore when such as have known God's truth, do fall to mingling themselves with idolaters, and will not be separated from them: it is all one as if they went about to pervert the whole order of nature. But this doctrine has more need to be thoroughly well minded, than to be preached with long speech. The thing which Moses meant by these words, is this: You be a people that is hallowed to the Lord: that is to say, Although we were of Adam's cursed race, although we came of wretched Infidels, yet notwithstanding our Lord has vouchsafed to draw us to him, and to choose us to be of his household: and therefore it is good reason that we should be his temples. So then let us look well to it, that we continue in this state, and that we do not willfully disannul God's adopting of us, nor consent to anything that may put us out of his house. For when we forsake God's Gospel through falsehood, we do what we can to cut ourselves off from the body of Jesus Christ and to inherit ourselves of the heavenly kingdom, and to banish ourselves from it, when we make no conscience nor remorse of intermingling ourselves with idolaters and with their defiling.

Whatsoever he is that gives himself the bridle to go to the superstitions of the Papists, and to communicate with them: it is all one as if he cancelled the deed of the inheritance which God has given him. And that deed is not written in paper nor in parchment, but it is sealed by God in our hearts, and it is his will that seals and marks thereof should also be in our bodies. Then [in so doing] we blot out the writing whereby God adopted us for his children and heirs, and (as I said) we banish ourselves out of his kingdom, and cut off ourselves from the body of our Lord Jesus Christ. For if we be members of God's son, we must not go and do homage to idols, nor defile our bodies (which are the temples of the holy ghost) with such filthiness and abomination. But as often as we come to hear God's word, we must think thus with ourselves: Behold, my God has made me holy, that is to say, he has separated me from such as are overwhelmed in their own uncleanness, and shall I now work him spite? What a condemnation will it be to me, that my God has so hallowed me, and I on the other side do unhallowed and defile myself with all lewdness, rejecting that privilege that he has given me? Is it not a making of war against him, when I will needs after that sort disappoint the good, which he had offered me of his own infinite mercy?

Yes.

And Moses adds expressly yet further, That it was to the intent that this people should be separated from all the rest of the world. If God granted his grace commonly and without exception to all people,, to have his word preached everywhere: yet ought we to be sanctified to him, because he takes us out of the corruption of Adam, and from the ruin wherein all of us are by nature. But when as he chose one Nation, and allies himself to the same, and in the meanwhile lets all the rest go. It serves to give the greater beauty to his goodness, like as nowadays, our having of the pure doctrine of the Gospel, is a cord whereby God draws us to him, and whereby he vouchsafes to be made one with us, as I said before. The world sees how he lets the wretched papists run at rovers, so as their eyes be stopped and they see not one whit, nor rather they turn quite and clean away from the way of salvation. We see it. And what is to be done, but that inasmuch as god sets such beauty upon his mercy, such comparison should make us the will to serve him, and to live the more warily, for feat of turning away from him, seeing he has vouchsafed to prefer us before others, though we have not deserved it? but what? So far are we unable to profit ourselves by such goodness of God: that we rather make it an occasion to take leave and liberty to do evil. For when we have the examples of the unbelievers before our eyes, we think we may do the same things that they do. But that is far off from thinking upon that which Moses says here. Your God (says he) has sanctified you above all other nations of the earth. As if he should say, Who be you? For you be no better than other Nations: and yet nevertheless, your God has vouchsafed to sanctify you. Now therefore, be you the more careful to bridle yourselves, and to keep you undefiled, and meddle no more with the wretched unbelievers that are wholly give over to their own uncleanness, because your God never drew them to him. Thus you see why Moses compares there the Jews expressly with the heathen. Likewise in these days, forasmuch as God has preferred us before the wretched papists, we must beware that we walk the more circumspectly under his obedience, assuring ourselves that he will not have such a benefit despised, as is his vouchsafing to take us into this house, and to communicate himself to familiarity to us as he does. But yet to express this grace that better, Moses adds that this people was chosen. As if he should say, indeed it is an inestimable dignity and nobleness for you to be chosen to be the people of God, so as no Nation of the earth can boast themselves to have been exalted to such degree of honor: but yet beware that you be not proud of it. For your sanctifying at God's hand, came not of your own purchase, but of God's choosing of you: it came of him. Therefore let the praise thereof be yielded to him: and assure yourselves, you be the more beholden to him, in that he has showed such mercy towards you. We see then that the word choose which Moses sets down here, serves to magnify God's grace that was spoken of before, to the intent that the people should be the more provoked and (as it were) ravished to serve God. And for the same purpose he sets down a long discourse. Wherefore is it (says he) that your God has loved you, and knit himself to you? For this manner of speech, (namely that God knits himself to men) imports very much. And why do he so, says he? What has moved him thereto? Was it for your own sakes? Or did you put yourselves forward to it? Was it because you were a greater nation than any other? Was it in respect of that, that God was moved to choose you rather than any of the others? Had you deserved it on your part? No, no: but it was (says he) because he loved you. Now this word Love imports here, first that God respected not anything in men why he should choose them, but that his own free love sufficed him in that behalf. He loved you, that is to say, seek not any cause or worthiness in yourselves, be contented that our Lord has chosen you of his own free goodness before all others, though you were no better than they. Now we see all Moses' meaning.

And although this matter cannot be discoursed throughout, yet must we note, that Moses spoke here of God's election, to the intent that the people should be the more humbled, and that the same humbling of them should engender an affection and zeal to serve God according as he was known to them. Therefore when there is any talk of the grace that God has showed us in enlightening us, and it is told us that he has adopted us to be his children and of his Church: we must needs match this with it, that our having of all these things is not by our own purchase, nor for putting of ourselves forth by any virtue of good mind that was in us: but though God's seeking of us at such time as we turned our backs upon him. Now by this means we be humbled, and we have need of it. For as soon as men have any inkling of any goodness that is in themselves: they like well of it and stand gazing at their own feathers like Peacocks, but in the meanwhile they consider not, that they rob and bereave God of the praise that is due to him. Therefore whensoever there is any speaking of God's grace, it is requisite for us to be put in mind of this matter, to the end we may not imagine ourselves to have deserved aught on our own side, or that God respected any good disposition that was in us: but assure ourselves that nothing but his free love moved him to do it. When we be so humbled: then must we needs be spoiled of our own reason, or else become stark beasts, if we take not courage to serve God and to dedicate ourselves wholly to him, to say, How happens it that whereas we were cursed and damned creatures, our God has sought us out, yes even from the dungeons of death, and has opened us the gate of the kingdom of heaven, calling and drawing us daily thither: and yet in the meanwhile we be slothful in serving him? And specially since we see that whereas the most part of the world goes to destruction, and the wretched Infidels are so blinded that they be let alone in the darkness of their ignorance, God in the meanwhile watches early and late over us: what ought we to do, when he uses such special love towards us? You see then that this humility must lead us to a care and awareness to serve God, and to gather ourselves wholly under his wings, acknowledging that the more we be bound to him, the more we must show by our deeds that we impute all to his mere goodness, and are willing to yield him and praise thereof as he deserves. Thus you see whereunto the things are to be referred which Moses speaks here.

And here withal let us mark, that whereas it is said, that the people [of Israel] we are not the greatest of other Nations: under one kind, he comprehended all the rest. As if he should say, there was neither dignity nor worthiness in you, why God should choose you rather than any other Nation. For it must be utterly rooted out of our hearts, to imagine that God finds anything in us, which may move him to love us. For until such time as men be quite rid of self weaning, they shall never be able to glorify God as they ought to do. And although we blasé it not with open mouth, that there is some desert or excellence in us: yet notwithstanding we fall asleep in such false soothing, as we imagine that there is still some value in ourselves. And therefore it behooves us to enter purposely into our consciences, and to clean them in such wise as we leave not any one drop of pride and presumption there: to the intent that when we have thoroughly searched and sifted all that is in us of our nature, we may know there is not anything that may purchase us grace and favor at God's hand, nor that can be acceptable to him, but that we be naked and unperceived of all goodness and glory, and finally that we have nothing in use but utter filth and uncleanness. When examination is made after that manner: then shall men be disposed to receive God's grace, and to glorify him for it when they shall have received it. Then let us learn to understand well, that the searching of all that ever is in us to the hard bottom, (so as we softer not any imagination of self worthiness, but perceive that God finds us utterly unhappy and accursed, so as we might be utterly forlorn and damned, and we have not anything of our own but such as provokes God's wrath and vengeance against us) comes of the grace that God has granted to us. When we become to that point: then must we come also to the love that Moses speaks of here.

And to the intent to show the better, that the said love is freely bestowed: he shows out of what fountain it springs. Even of this (says he) that is in God's will to perform the oath which he made to your fathers. And hereafter he will say, that their fathers also were chosen freely. But let it suffice us that in this place God puts the people in mind of the covenant that was made with Abraham, before the people, to whom he speaks, were born. Hereby he shows that the cause of our election, came not of our own deserving. For what is it that we did before we were born? If it be said that God foresaw what manner a ones we would be: yet did none of all that move God to choose him people: for they were so hardhearted and stubborn people, as he could never weald them. What manner of one's did they show themselves to be at their going out of Egypt? How did they acknowledge God's grace in that deliverance that he had wrought for them? The scripture yields us record good enough of it. And yet notwithstanding God ceased not to take them still for his people. Wherein he meant to show us, that his uttering of his goodness towards us, is not in any respect of our deserving. And indeed, the Holy Ghost was not so ill minded, as to have concealed such a thing from us, but that if our Lord had foreseen any goodness in us, and that the same had caused him to choose us: he would surely have told us of it. But what? As for such as babble that God chose us according to his foreknowledge, and that he knew we should have some good disposition in us: they show themselves to be worse than beasts, forasmuch as they consider not that all men are alike, saving that God puts his grace more into one than into another, and that we must not imagine that we have some thing I know not what of our own. Who is her (says S. Paul) which puts the difference, to make you excellent than other men? It comes not of ourselves then must we needs have that making of God. And so it is not for naught, that Moses tells that people, that the cause why they were chosen was for that God loved them, which love made him to utter the same love, even before such time as they to whom he speak, were born or bred, so as he swore beforehand to their fathers, that he would take them for his people. Seeing it is so then, let us know that when we be beaten down in ourselves, we must consider that the wellspring and fountain of our salvation is the infinite goodness of our God, and that he meant not to regard our deserts, but to use his own free goodness as we call it, that is to say not to sell anything to us. Nevertheless it was his will to love us. And wherefore? Because it pleased him. Now let men go and surmise I know not what causes in this case, for they shall confound all by it: but let us take hold of the only goodwill of God, in that it pleased him to choose us and to leave others.

And now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them more and more, and to endeavor daily to know them, that we may be sorry for them and amend them: and that therewithal we may have an eye to the covenant which he has made with us, to the end to answer to his call, that we wander not hear and there like stray beasts, but that seeing he is willing to hold us under his obedience, and to gather us into his flock, we may be satisfied to him by means of his word, which benefit it may please him to make to prevail in such wise in us, as it may be a furtherance to his glory, and we be brought more and more to forsake the lusts of our flesh and of the world, and to offer ourselves to him in sacrifice both alive and dead: Alive, that the power of his Holy Spirit may utter itself in us [by making us] to follow his commandments cheerfully: and dead, that we may be ready to go out of this world, whensoever it shall please him to call us hence. That is may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth, & c.

The 53rd Sermon, which is the third upon the seventh Chapter

7. and 8. The Lord & c.

9. Know you therefore that the Lord your God is the God, [even] the faithful God which keeps covenant and mercy with a thousand generations, to such as love him and keep his commandments.

10. And yield payment to such as hate him before his face, to make them perish. And he will not for slow to recompense him that hates him [even] to his face.

We saw yesterday, that the cause why Moses says here expressly, that God chose one certain people, and made not that grace common to all the world: was to humble those to whom God uttered himself, to the end they should know that it befell them not for their deserts, nor through their own purchase: but through the only goodness of God. and that is the cause also why David speaking of this people, says, the son of Abraham, God's beloved, the seed of Jacob his chosen. Those two words are matched together, to show that the people was shoaled out from all other Nations, not for any worthiness that was in them: but by reason of free election, and to express God's goodness and love towards us the better: and therefore does he send us wholly thither. Truth it is that in this place he speaks of the general election of the whole people, in that God had adopted them. And that is well worth the marking. For in calling Abraham, God extended the promise of salvation to his whole lineage. He said to Abraham, I will be the God of your lineage after you. Here then is a general election (as they term it) of the whole people, inasmuch as God separated them from the rest of the world, telling them that he took them for his inheritance and Church. And in very deed, the sign of circumcision was as a seal, to warrant all the offspring of that race, that God was their savior: and so, that was such a grace as was common to all the children of Abraham. Albeit, there is another second election or choosing, which is (as you would say) straighter: namely, that out of that same lineage God chooses whom he thinks good. And herein there is no contrary. For we must consider the degrees which the Holy Scripture sets down, when it speaks of all mankind. It shows that they be alienated or estranged from God, and consequently from the hope of salvation: by means whereof all men even from the greatest to the least, are damned. Now God draws out of them whom he lifts. And to the intent his grace should be the better known, he chose one lineage. And whose lineage? Even the lineage of one man in whom there was no hope of issue. For when God said to Abraham, I will be the God of your feed after you: how many children and children's children had he? He had not one, neither son nor daughter. He lived a long time after ere he begat Isaac. He was old and drooping, and his wife was barren, so as there was no more hope of issue. And for that same cause, when the prophet Esau intended to upbraid the Israelites with their unthankfulness, and with their pride and lustiness which they were in, by reason that they were be grown to so great a multitude: and contrariwise with their unbelief when they were few in number. Look back (says he) to the stone which you were heaven out of, look back to your well head. What people had Abraham? He was all alone. And was your mother Sara fruitful? Nor contrariwise God was fine to give her a child by miracle which she never looked for, insomuch that it seems incredible to her when she was told it. Seeing it is so: assure yourselves (says the prophet) you have no cause to make any brags, forasmuch as God has shoaled you out after that fashion. And for the same cause also does Moses say in this text, If a man compare your state with the state of other nations, he shall find that the other Nations are multiplied by the order of nature: but your father Abraham was all alone by himself. Yes and an old man and drooping, and ready to creep into his grave. You see then that god chose a people which was not, of purpose to magnify his free savor and to make it the more manifest. Verily he accomplished the thing which S. Paul speaks of in treating of the same Abraham: that is to know, God chose the things which were not, and called them forth to give them their being. S. Paul tells us that we have (as you would say) a lively picture in the person of Abraham, to show us how it is that God makes us anything, and exalts us to honor. For (says he) what was Abraham? A poor creature half dead. Was his lineage in any state? Did it flourish at that time? No, but it was more likely that he should never have had any issue at all. Then let us learn that God guides the things which are not, and brings them forth to give them being and so the hope of the faithful concerning their salvations, lies not in themselves, but they look for it at God's hand. As touching ourselves, truly we be nothing: but God utters his power to give us being. And so you see, that through his goodness we begin to hope for life everlastingly in his kingdom. Thus then that first degree of election, is that God chose the lineage of Abraham, notwithstanding that it was forlorn as well as all the rest of the world. And having done so, he stayed not with that grace: but forasmuch as a great number were estranged and as it were cut off from the line of Abraham: he pulled back also whom it pleased him. And that is the cause why S. Paul says, that all they which come of Abraham according to the flesh, are not reckoned for his lawful children, I mean to God ward, in respect of the spiritual inheritance that was promised to the true lineage. And for that same cause S. Paul alleges that saying that is written in the 25th of Genesis, namely that the elder shall serve the younger, accordingly also as it is said by the prophet Malachi, Jacob, and Esau were both of them the children of Abraham: and what is the cause why Jacob was received, and Esau were both of them the children of Abraham: and what is the cause why Jacob was received, and Esau refused so as god disinherited him, and vouchsafed not to establish any Church in his offspring, but that as many as came of the line were mingled with the heathen, and belonged not at all to the body of Christ? Whereof came this? To whom shall a man impute it? It is to be understood, that (as says S. Paul) God had given sentence of them before they were born. For Jacob and Esau were twins, and their Mother Rebecca bare them both at one burthen: and at that time what could the one deserve more than the other? God refused the elder to whom belonged the honor of first born, yes and by order of nature: but God showed that his grace was above nature. So then, Jacob was chosen, and Esau refused. To whom shall a man impute all this? Brought they any strength and virtue of their own (as says the Prophet Michaels) for the which God esteemed the one more than the other? Should the Jews (which came of Jacob) set up their bristles against God, to say that they were nobler than other men? No, but they ought to yield the honor to God's free favor, acknowledging that to be the only cause of their salvation, and that they have not anything of their own wherefore they should be preferred before other men. Herein we see that God having chosen a people in general, does notwithstanding reserve liberty to himself, to choose out of that people whomsoever he lifts, and to refuse the rest. And so as I have declared already, there is one election which God makes generally: and another [particularly] of those whom he vouchsafes to take for his children and heirs. Now then, it is of God's free election, that we have his word purely preached to us, and that we have his Gospel and Sacraments. And even therein we have cause to confess that he has showed himself liberal to us. For by what title is the Gospel given to us, rather than to such as make greater account of themselves than we do, and which are not inferior to us as in respect of the world? Why does God leave great kingdoms and principalities, and nations of renown: and choose a little nook, and a small number of people, to say that his word shall be preached there? When it rains so upon us, and all the rest of the world abides still in drought: is it not to be concluded that God has liberty to do good to whom he lifts? And is it not his only love, whereto we be beholden for it? Yes, so then, when the Gospel is preached in a place, and it has the warrants that God gives men salvation: (as when we have baptism and the Lord's holy supper ministered incorruptly) we may say it is an election that God makes. But yet for all that, in the meantime he retains to himself whom he thinks good, to the end that men should not trust to the outward signs without faith and obedience, knowing that although we have been chosen to be of the body of the Church, yet if we make not our profit of that election, God can well enough cut us off again, and reserve a small number to himself. And although there be some great multitude of us which confess all with one mouth that God has chosen us: yet can we not therefore say that he avows us for his children, except we live in pureness of faith, and have ratified the covenant which God has made with us. And so let us understand that God's liberality shows itself after all sorts to us, and that therefore we have the luster cause to love him more and more, and to yield him all praise. For have we his word? It is a free gift beforehand, whereby he has bound us to him. Have we his Sacraments? They be the badges of his fatherly election: we have not deserved any of all these things. But above all, when it pleases him to imprint the certainty of his promises in our hearts by his Holy Spirit: then is it a special adoption, then does he show us that we be of the little number whom he has reserved to himself. And so (as I said before) we see that in all respects we must keep our mouths shut from bragging of anything: and on the other side have it open to magnify God's goodness which he utters towards us.

Now hereupon Moses adds, That God will keep covenant to a thousand generations of them that love him: yes, through his mercy, says he. For as much as he treats of the general election: therefore he exhorts the people to bethink themselves advisedly. Note you (says he) that for as much as God has promised your father Abraham to be the God of his seed after him: he will not fail you. But yet for all that, look that you walk warily, for the covenant is made with condition, that you must be sound and have a right meaning heart. Therefore think not but that your God can drive you out of his house and out of his Church, if he find you unworthy of the benefit which he has offered to you. With the meaning does Moses speak, when he puts here a difference between them that love him and keep his commandments, and them that hate him. Now by these words we be taught, that when God offers us his word, it is already an allying of himself to us, and a giving of us a record of our salvation: but yet does it not follow that we may therefore be careless. Nor rather we must be quickened up to embrace that promises which he sends us, so as we may rest wholly upon them, and be steadfastly settled in them all our life long. That is a thing whereupon it behooves us to think. True it is that God lays open his heart to us when his word is preached to us: there we be put in mind of his love, and also have full assurance of our salvation. But yet must that word enter in to our heart, and prevail with us: which thing is not done but through faith. And so let us understand that God's election is as it were defeated by us, unless we be constant and continue steadfastly in it to the end.

But yet Moses notes here again, that this covenant which God makes with them that believe him and obey him, is of his own Mercy, at least we should imagine that God respects our deserving, as we see that men are commonly given to think: insomuch that if they meet but with a syllable which seems to tell them that they may deserve I know not what: they be puffed up with pride, and believe wonders of themselves. That is the cause why Moses says expressly that God will perform his covenant consists. It is not that we on our side do bring him anything why he should love us: but that he is merciful to us, as we see is said in the hundred and third Psalm. True it is that even there God requires that we should fear him, and endeavor to keep his commandments. But yet howsoever the world go, he shows us always that the thing which we must understand of him, is that he uses pity in handling us gently through his grace, and not according to our deserving. Therefore let us bear this saying well in mind and weigh it thoroughly, where Moses tells us that the covenant which God makes with us, lies wholly in his goodness and nowhere else: and that it is not for us to puff up ourselves with foolish presumption, as though we were worthy of such a benefit, or as though God did but recompense us: but that we must always look up to his goodness, so as when we come to him, we do nothing else but say, Alas Lord, we be sure that you receives us to mercy as wretched creatures, and therefore vouchsafe to have regard of our miseries, by shedding out your mercy upon us. That is the thing whereof we be put in mind in this text.

Now furthermore Moses shows how we may keep God's commandments: that is to know, by having that things which have been treated of heretofore. And they be manner of speeches with import so profitable doctrine, that it is good to renew that remembrance of them, when the text offers occasion thereof. Moses therefore meant to do us to understand, that to abstain from doing of evil, and to keep the things contained in the law to outward show, is not all that we have to do. As for example, if a man have not blasphemed the name of God, if he have not led a disordered life, if he have not been an adulterer, a thief, a quarreler, or a pervert person, but have lived honestly: all this will not suffice him. For why? Such service may be by constraint, so as the party shall not obey of his own free will, nor delight in submitting himself to God's righteousness to frame his life thereafter. That is the cause why Moses begins of good obedience to God ward, and of living according to his Law: is to determine with ourselves to delight in nothing more, that to yield ourselves to him with all obedience, and to make that our whole pleasure, accordingly as we see how David protests, that God's law was more sweet and please to him than honey: and not only that he did set more store by it, than by gold and silver: but also that he embraced it with such love, as he gave not himself to the pleasures of the world, nor was carried away with wicked affections to do evil: but gave himself wholly to well doing, and to walk according to God's will. So then, to offer willing sacrifices to God, let us remember what is said in this text, and what has been treated of already heretofore: namely that before there is any speech of the keeping of God's commandments, Love is set down in the first place, because we have need to give ourselves first to GOD, and to have our hearts (as you would say) fast tied and knit to him, here we can endeavor to behave ourselves according to his law and righteousness.

But now let us return to the matter that was touched before. Moses says That GOD will keep Covenant, yes even with a thousand generations of them that love him. As if he should say, When God has once planted his word: he continues that grace, not only till the decease of those to whom he speaks, but also to their children and their offspring. Now then let us look about us, and whereas we perceive God's grace in that he has vouchsafed to reserve to us his word which was in manner abolished, and will have the same now preached to us: if we (I say) perceive his goodness in that behalf: let us also hope that he will continue the same towards our children which he has begun towards us, if we serve him by doing the things that he commands us. You see then that the goodness which God shows us in his word, must not make us slothful and careless: but rather be as a spur to prick us forward to him, that his holy covenant be not broken on our part and through our default.

Furthermore whereas he says, Know you that your God is God, yes and as strong God: thereby he meant to separate the living God from all the idols which the world has forged in all ages. And it is a text well worth the noting. For we shall never serve God with all our heart, neither shall we be able to trust in him and to rest upon him, unless we be sure that he is almighty, and that he only is God. No doubt but the unbelievers may well bear themselves in hand for a time that their religion is good, and the world sees how willful they be in that behalf: but yet all is but stubbornness whatsoever they make of it. And therefore it behooves us to be fully resolved and persuaded of this, that we must not have a flying faith, so as our hoping to be saved is but all adventure. For we must always bear in mind, how S. Paul says that we must know whom we believe, and that God is a faithful keeper of that which we have committed to him. Then if we know not that our God is one, and that he is alone, and that he is the very true God: we shall be always wavering and our faith shall have no steadiness. That is the cause why Moses says expressly, Know you that the God is the God. As if he should say, Consider in what state the wretched heathen men and such as give over themselves to superstition are. It is true that they will talk enough of God: albeit, that is but ragingly, they know not who he is. But it is not so with you. For seeing that your God has taught you, and discovered himself to you: he has certified you of his will and showed you that you need not doubt but your religion is such as you ought to stick to. Now then, swerve neither one way nor other, neither halt you, but go on right forth, seeing you be sure of your religion. Mark that for one point.

Albeit, for as much as we see men given to follow their own fancies, which notwithstanding do but tend to their own destruction: we must remember by this text of Moses, that until such time as we be sure that the God whom we worship is the true God: we shall ever be entangled some one thing at other. And albeit that we do our endeavor to serve him, at leastwise to our seeming: yet is it nothing, it is but fining, and that hope or trust is but a besotting of ourselves. Well may we have some opinion: but as for to have a settled faith, so as we may glory that our salvation is laid up in God, and that he will keep it safely because he has taken us to himself: it is possible that we should have any such certainty unless we can say with Saint Paul, I know whom I have believed, and he will be a faithful keeper of that which I have committed to him. So then, let u put such difference between the living God, and all the idols which men have forged of their own brain: as he may be known alone above all others. And that w may so do, let us learn to devise nothing of our own head. For as soon as we father anything upon God which is not in his own word: it is all one as if we did set up an idol: for by that mean we disguise him. Therefore we must so stick to the living God, to the end we may be his people, and hearken quietly to so much of his will as he shows us by his word: as it may suffice us to have so much knowledge of him as he has revealed by his word, without seeking any further. For as for those that are so bold as to take leave to say, I wean this is good, and why should not God take this or that in good worth? And in the mean while have no warrant of the Holy Scripture: I say they forsake the living GOD, and turn away after idols. For what else are the imaginations of men, but very idols to deface the true Majesty of the only God? Thus much concerning this place.

Moreover Moses terms God faithful, to show that like as before, he attributed strength to him, (for the Hebrew word that he uses comes thereof:) so must we also have his truth before our eyes and in our remembrance, to the end to lean to him and to refer ourselves wholly to him, knowing that God's strength serves not to abash us, but that whensoever it is spoken of, it is matched immediately with mercy, to the intent we should be drawn to him, and come to him with a cheer fuller courage. Then is it not without cause that Moses has set down God's truth here, of purpose to hold the people in obedience to him. And hereby we be taught, not to preach into God's privies, and to dispute of things that are too high for us, yes and utterly incomprehensible: but rather that we must rest upon his word and truth, which he has revealed to us. True it is that we must be fully persuaded of this point, that GOD chose us in his everlasting purpose, not because we were worthy of it, but because it pleased him so to do: and that there is none other cause thereof but only his good pleasure, as the Holy Scripture shows us. And so let us understand, that although we have God's word: yet will God have pity on whom he will have pity, according to Saint Paul's alleging of the same text, to show that albeit the multitude of people to whom the Gospel is preached be never so great, yet God reserves whom he lifts to himself, and it is meet he should so do, and yet notwithstanding we have cause to glorify him howsoever things go, without attempting in any wise to grudge at it. But have known that? Would we be assured of our salvation? We must resort not only to God's grace, but also chiefly to that promises whereby he utters his love towards us, as is said already. You see then that the cause why Moses does in this place attribute the title of Faithful to God, is to the end that when folk will be sure of their salvation, they should not enter into foolish imaginations, but look to God's word which is before their eyes, whereupon they may be bold to rest. So then let it content us that our Lord allures us to him, and that the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ together with his righteousness is set before us, so as we know that by that means we may be reconciled to God, to the end that our sins be not imputed to us, but that we may be acceptable to him. Seeing that this is set down to us: let us take hold of God's faithfulness which Moses speaks of here, and let us not think that God offers us such a benefit to deceive us, but that he does it to the end that we should glorify him in the midst of our miseries, and that although we be silly frail creatures: yet we may say that he life of Jesus Christ belongs to us, and that we be already lifted up to sit with him in the kingdom of heaven. Thus you see what we have to bear in mind concerning the word Faithful.

Now for a conclusion Moses adds a threat, saying: that God also will require like for like to such as hate him, yes even to their faces and that he will not foreshow.

In this place there is some darksome in the words of Moses: for the interchanges the number. God (says he) will yield recompense to such as hate him to his face, or before his face. Then does he shift the number, and it seems that whereas he says they hate him to his face, he meant to say that we spite God or hate God to his face when we fall out into disorder and are so rebellious, as it should seem that we would run against him, and defy him to be at open war with him. But forasmuch as that word is repeated twice, and in the end it appears that Moses spoke of the faces of the transgressors: no doubt but it is a changing of the number, as the Holy Scripture is commonly wont to do. Therefore the very meaning of it, is that God will require them to their faces, by making the hatred to turn back upon themselves. Other some take it as though it were spoken of their lifetime, that God will not only punish the wicked and the despisers of his Law, after this present life: but also execute his vengeance upon them beforehand to the sight of men's eyes, so as we shall be provoked to fear him, by the sight of the punishments which he will so execute upon the disobedient. Other some take it that God will require it to his face, as though it were said that whereas he spares the wicked in his world, it is to the end to overthrow them and destroy them utterly afterward, according as it is said by the prophet, that God pampers those whom he punishes not out of hand, like as men do fat an Ox or a swine when they intend to kill him. And the prophet uses that similitude, to the intent we should not envy the wicked when we see them prosper. For is an Ox or a swine to be envied, which is fated but to slaughter? And which shall have his throat cut when he is once fat? Now then, God handles the wicked and the despisers of his majesty after such a sort, as he may seem to love them: but it is to hasten them the sooner to their destruction. And truly this is a good and profitable lesson: but as touching the present place, if we read all the words of Moses throughout, there is no darkness at all in them. For why? He adds, God will not overflow to require them that base him, every man in his face. And to Moses meant in effect to show, that men may be past shame in rebelling against God: but yet in the end they shall find that they have too rough an adversary: and therefore God must be fine to pull them by the beards to make them the more ashamed. It is true that as now they utter great brags, and it should seem that they would make God ashamed, and put him to the foil: but he can well skill to overmatch them in such wise, as they shall be fine to receive their payment in their own persons, yes and even in their faces, according as it is said in the fifteenth psalm, I will reprove you to your face. And in that place God pleads expressly against hypocrites. How now, says he? Becomes it you to take my name in your mouth? You boasts yourself to be mine: and you will needs play the preacher, and defile my holy law with you stinking mouth. Now when you does me such injury as to take upon your to be a prophet, and to speak in my name, and in the meanwhile does match and accompany yourself with whoremongers, quarrelers, and rails: what will come of it in the end? When I have born with you a while, I will reprove you to your teeth, says he. He uses there the word Face as he does here in this text: but it is a common speech in our language, to say that it is spoken to a man's teeth, face or head. That then is the natural sense of Moses.

And here we be warned to humble ourselves before God, and to stoop in such wise as we provoke him not to wrath through our hardness and shamelessness, so as he found show himself to be over adversary, to require us to our face, that is to say in our own persons, by being driven to come before him to be punished according to our deserts. Then let us not harden our hearts against our God, but let us learn to cast down our eyes when he speaks to us. It is true indeed that we ought to lift up our heads when we hear the promises of his goodness, so as faith must make us to stay above the clouds. But yet does not this let us that we should not still be ashamed in ourselves, and have an eye to our own wretchedness, and learn to be sorry for it, and thereupon labor to live in the fear of God, bowing down our necks continually to receive his yoke, and to bear it patiently. Thus you see what we have to mark as in respect of this word face, where it is said that God will recompense them all to their faces, which do hate him.

But here by the way a man might make a question, concerning this saying of Moses, that God will not for slow to pay them to their fancies, which hate him. For it is commonly seen that the wicked do spend all their days and all their whole life in prosperity, so as it should seem that God is willing to please them in all things, insomuch that it is said of them in the psalm, that they go on in continual prosperity to their death, and pine not away as the children of God do. How then is it said that God will not for slow, seeing he is long suffering? And men may see it with their eyes, though it were not told them in words. These two things agree very well. For although God wink at things for a time, and punish not the wicked out of hand: when all is well reckoned, the respite that he gives them will not be so long, but that it shall ever be true, that sudden destruction shall overwhelm them. And for proof thereof, when the wicked say, Peace, all is safe, then shall the sudden storm fall upon their heads. When they think themselves to have made a composition with death: then shall they be overtaken as a woman that falls in labor of child ere she be aware, because she mistrusted not that the hour or instant of her travel had been so near at hand. Even after the same manner does God overwhelm all such as shall have abused his patience, when he has born with them for a time. now then although God show not himself a judge to them so soon as we would: yet does he not fail to destroy them without fore slowing. Therefore let us have an eye to the shortness of our life, least we fall asleep: and let us understand, that although God make not hast after our opinion: yet notwithstanding he fore slows not , because he forgets not the offences which he winks at, and which he punishes not out of hand. Let that serve for one point.

And let us mark further, that God has not intended with us so as we may say he ought to let us alone unpunished until death. For although he execute not his judgment all after one rate: yet does he often punish the wicked even here, and show us examples before our eyes, to teach us to stand in awe of him, as the prophet speaks of it. Seeing then that God will always show himself to be our Judge, both during this mortal life, and after our death: Let us not delay our returning to him from day to day, but let every man quicken up himself, and walk carefully, forasmuch as if any man fall asleep, if he will be well wakened again, he must be fine to set this saying of Moses before his face That God will pay them all home which do hate him. Truly the wickedest creatures that he will not say they hate God: but yet it is so indeed. And for proof thereof, all such as are desirous to have liberty to live naughtily, to give themselves to all equity, could find in their hearts that there were no God in heaven to judge them. To be short, if we love God, we take pleasure in goodness. But we cannot love him without his Justice: for they be things which cannot go asunder. Therefore let us conclude, that as long as we do evil we hate God. And why? For inasmuch as we be loath there should be any order or government in the world: we would not that he should be acknowledged with his righteousness and goodness. Now then, when the wicked do give themselves the bridle to despise God and to transgress his commandments: they could find in their hearts to have him plucked out of heaven if it were possible. Wherefore let us mark well, that God does not without cause avow, that all such as break his commandments are his deadly enemies, inasmuch as they be against his Justice, without the which he cannot be God. And therefore let us bear in mind the thing that has been declared already, namely that if we purpose to obey God, we must honor him in such sort, as we may like well of his Justice and dislike of evil dealing: and that although we fall into it through infirmity, yet we may pray God to lift us out again, and so to hold us up by his power, as our whole seeking may be to submit ourselves to him, and to forsake all our own affections and evil lusts in such wise, as we may be reformed according to his righteousness, and consequently obey his holy Law.

Now let us cast ourselves down in the presence of our good God in with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him so to bear with us in then, as he use not the rigor towards us which we have deserved: but that of his infinite goodness he reach us his hand, and print his word after such sort in our hearts, as it may take root there, and we never swerve any way from it, nor he suffer such blessing to become unprofitable through our fault and unthankfulness: but that we may make it available, by receiving the promises of our salvation, to continue steadfastly in them to the end, and by showing ourselves willing to bring to pass that God may be honored and served, not only as long as we live, but also after our decease, so as they that come after us may continue in exalting and magnifying his glory, that he maybe worshipped on all hands with one common accord, until he have rid us quite and clean from all the vanities and corruption of this world, and made us partakers of the glorious immortality which we possess not as yet but by hope. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also, & c.

The 54th Sermon which is the forth upon the Seventh Chapter

11. Therefore keep the commandments, and Ordinances, and Laws which I command this day to do them.

12. And it will come to pass, that because you have heard these Laws and kept them and done them, the Lord your God will also perform the covenant and mercy to you, which he swore to your Fathers.

13. And he will love you, and bless you, and multiply you: and he will bless the fruit of your womb, and the fruit of your land: your corn and your wine, and thin oil, and the increase of your kind and the flocks of your sheep, in the Land which he swear to your Fathers to give you.

14. You shall be blessed above all nations, and there shall not be either male or female barren among you, or among your Cattle.

15. The Lord will take from you all diseases, and all the evil plagues of Egypt which you has known. He will not lay them upon you, but upon those that hate you.

We see here again the thing that has been treated of already heretofore: namely that God endeavors to draw us to him by gentleness. It were enough for him to show us his will: albeit forasmuch as our nature draws the clean contrary way, he sets his promises before us to win us withal, and to provoke us to serve him the better. Therefore whensoever God promises to bless us, and to make us to prosper so we serve him: thereby we be put in mind of that singular goodness and love which he bears towards us. For is he bound to do it? Nor, ought not every of us to strain ourselves, (yes even above our power) to serve him? Are we not bound thereto by nature? Yes: and therefore let us mark well, that whereas God vouchsafes to tell us that if we serve him he will be favorable and merciful to us: his so doing proceeds of his own mere free goodness. And if that move us not: the world may see what our unthankfulness is. But yet by the way let us mark well, that his promises should stand us in no stead, if our Lord supplied not our defaults, I mean even when we be best minded to serve him, for else should we come far short of the perfection that is required of us. All his promises then should nothing boot us, if he did not bear with us: and so is he fine to use double grace towards us. Albeit to the intent that things maybe the better understood: let us see first of all how it may agree, that God should bless us of his own free goodness, and make us to prosper: and yet notwithstanding match it with this condition, that we serve and honor him. For at the first sight there seems to be some disagreement in it. If God love us without respect of our deserving: there ought to be no ifs nor conditions in the matter.

But he puts them to it, as we see in this text: yes and all the whole scripture is full of the same doctrine, namely that God recompenses every man as they shall have served him. How can it then be, that God should both have respect of our life: and also love us of his own free mercy? Let us mark well the words that Moses uses here. For he says that God will perform his covenants and mercy according as he has promised, if he be honored and served. In saying that God will perform his covenant and mercy, he shows us well that we must not begin at our service, as though we would bring anything to God to move him to love us: For whereupon is his covenant grounded? Even upon his mercy. Now then let us see what his mercy is, and where to it ought to be referred. First of all, it is his choosing of us. Although we be utterly forward, and deserve to be shaken off at his hand: yet does he take us into his favor. Thus is it already a great and inestimable mercy, that although God find us lost and damned creatures: yet he vouchsafes to take us for his people, advancing us to such dignity as to be of his household and Church. Now when he has so begin, he must be fine to hold out still: that is to say, he must be fine to like well of us continually by reason of the same free favors which he bears us and all for our Lord Jesus Christ sake. So then, God maintains his mercy towards us because he be peace out wretchedness and misery. And although we be not worthy to be received, yet does he accepts us. And wherefore? Because he loves us in the person of his only son. But there is yet more, that is to know that he uses mercy towards us in bearing with our imperfections and by that means accepts our service, so that although it be faulty and have always some blemish in it, yet notwithstanding he had made seat of his own goodness. Now we see what the covenant imports, which Moses speaks of here, namely that first and foremost God receives us to mercy, even without finding anything but utter cursedness in us. And secondly that he continues his favor towards us for a law his only son, notwithstanding that he might find just cause in us, to shake us off and to hate us. And thirdly, that he accepts our works and takes them for good so as although they be (as you would say) but half an, and always some old wrinkled with them, and yet notwithstanding he ceases not to admit them as if they were righteous and sound, and all by virtue of the said covenant, as I said before. Now then we see it is not inconvenience, that God should bless us and make us to prosper when we have served him: and yet notwithstanding that his loving of us should be, not for any worthiness or deserts of ours.

But for his own free goodness sake, without any other reason that we can allege, than that he has chosen us and made us partakers of the righteousness that is in our Lord Jesus Christ, that thereby all our filthiness may be covered and hidden.

By soon as the ignorant sort to yield of the word condition, they bear themselves in hand that God makes some payment and that when he shows us any favor, he does it in recompense of our deserts. And by that means the wretched Papists do blind themselves with vain presumption, and quite overthrow themselves by perking up after that fashion against God, and therefore they must be at length cast down in their over lustiness. For where to do they lean? Behold, God tells us that he will bless us if we serve you therefore it follows that all the promises which he makes condition and. Yes, but they have ill steadied the holy Scripture when they cannot discern between the promises us they be set down in the law, and the things that God adds to that to supply our default. For if we take the promises saw roughly, that is to know that God will bless none but them that serve him. We shall all of us be shut out from hope for which of us serves God with all his heart and with all his soul as God has expressly commanded us? Nor contrariwise we dragged that world and by nature we be deadly enemies to him because all the thoughts and affections that are in us to fight against his will. Then me so far off from being able to serve him as we should do that we make war against him and cease not to provoke him in his wrath against us. Not verily, even when God has reformed us by his holy spirit, so as he has given us some good disposition where through we be inclined to serve him and to be short we sure that his spirit reigns in us by some doing of our vices and of the wicked lusts which are in us by nature. Yet come a still far short of the Mark which we should tent. It is true that we will travel thither ward, as all the faithful to, whose chief regard and principle desire is to serve God but yet do they find themselves so encumbered us makes them to shudder at it. When they be about to steer one finger forward the rest of their body draws backward. It is much if they can be trained themselves: that is to say the they can get forwarded little and coldly. And therefore they be driven so high and ground, and to condemn themselves beseeching God towards safe to heartened them better and to take a all the lets that talent themselves. For he that is perfect, condemns himself most in so much that the true perfection that is in man do ring this mortal life is to know the evil

On the contrary part, asked for those that make themselves idols, bearing themselves on hand that they become already to the highest top of perfection. They burst themselves with pride and do but shut their secret filthiness a thing whereby they betray that they know not yet what it is to love God and to serve him. For otherwise they should never be so blinded with mad self trust us to bear themselves in hand that they be thoroughly righteous. Seeing then that although we endeavor never so much to serve God, we shall go limping and at our legs after us, let us be sure that God shall never be in danger order to any of us, but rather we shall be condemned in all our works. We may well allege, I was willing and I did mind endeavor but that is not at all that we have to do. For there will shall always be found very weak so as if we have one could affection, there shall be a dozen evil ones for it. And so by that means all of us should be disappointed of the hope that God gives us by his promises, if they should be taken so roughly and according to the naked letter where it is said, if you serve me, I will do you good. But now let men strained themselves as much as they lift when they come to their audits, there will be some abatements, as will show that all God's promises can stand them in no stead. And therefore they must come to the second remedy which is that God supplies the faults and that although all our works deserve naught else but condemnation, yet notwithstanding God accepts them and takes them for good, or fleece on fatherly goodness and not of any duty that he is bound to. Then let us not be so blind us the wretched Papists, who when they hear that God adds any condition to his promises, do by and by step up with their egos, and fall to be scanting of their own free will and deceiving. But contrariwise, let us assure ourselves that when God speaks to us in such order of speech as he is showed us here, although he come to us with gentleness, yet does it nothing avail us, until he use his own mere mercy to say worst throughout, not for any desert of ours but because it pleases him so to do. Mark that for a special point.

And therewithal let us Mark also that if the good which God does to men in the things that concern this transitory life to proceed of his mercy much more reason is it than the immortal heritage that cannot be gotten by our own strength. But that God must be fine to believe it is of his own mere liberality or free gift. And whereof speaks Moses in this place? He says, God will bless the cattle, God will bless the corn, or wine and oil. All these are transitory things and how is it that God prospers us in them? By his mercy, says he. And he shows expressly that God's covenant proceeds not from any other bring, nor has any other group then that ought not even in cases concerning this flight full life and these transitory things. Now if in promising to prosper us in our cattle, in our lands and in the bread which he, God have not an eye to any worthiness of ours, but only vouchsafes to show himself a liberal and kindhearted father towards us. What will he do in cases concerning the making of us, partakers of the heavenly glory? I beseech you, can be alleged any deserts in that behalf? No, for then should Oxen and kind be of more estimation with him than men's souls.

Therefore let us mark well the things that I have touched: namely that we may well understand beforehand how greatly God loves us, by his promising of reward and recompense for our works. For he does it not of any duty, but to win us by gentleness and loveliness. Yet notwithstanding let us understand moreover, that the same shall never boot us a whit, unless our Lord proceed yet further in showing himself liberal towards us: namely that after he has received us to mercy, even us which were utterly lost and damned, he do also love us for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and thereupon bear with all the imperfections that are in us without intending to impute then to us, so as works may please him, although they deserve it not. For that is verified even in these base things beneath. When we take our repast of the bread wherewith we be sustained: we must acknowledge that the same comes of the mere goodness of our God. And likewise when we have done our endeavor to serve him, [we must acknowledge] that he is not any whit beholden to us for it, but (which more is) that the good affection which we always have, is given of him, and yet that all this is nothing because there is some faultiness in it. Therefore it must needs be, that Gods receiving of us into favor, is not for that he owes us anything, but for that he loves us. Now seeing that God will have his mercy known in these corruptible things what will he have done in the everlasting salvation of our souls?

But here might a question be moved, that seeing God respects not our merits when he does us good: why he uses he this manner of speech which we read here in Moses? There are two reasons. The one knees, that he intends to make us be his grace the better, by driving us to grant that none of all the things which he be highs us could take effect, if works should be respected and therefore that he must be fine to bury all our sins, and to accept us of his own free goodness. This would be somewhat with the darkest, if it should not be laid forth more at length. His saying (in effect) is that whereas God tells us, that if we serve him, he will bless us and prosper us: it is the intent is that every of us should examine himself, and consider what point we be with him. And when we once know that instead of serving him, we do provoke him against us and grieve him, as though we had conspired to do so to willful malice: and when we once know that we be so greatly in his danger even by nature: then will all vain self trust be beaten down in us, and we will have none other mind, than to resort to him that mercy that promised us, and to flee thither for refuge, so as we shall be quite and clean bereft of that fond opinion which we had conceived of our own works, and not think that any more to be meritorious. And thus you see what we have to note for the first reason.

The second is that for as much as God has pitied us, he bears with our works, and intends not to sift them with rigor, but that means that for good and available, though there be many infirmities and vices in that. But yet for all that, we must understand that he will not so bear with our infirmities, that we should take leave to abuse his mercy: for then should be deal too lewdly. And yet nevertheless it appears by experience, that soon as men hear that God forgives then their sins, and saves them of his own goodness: they dispense with themselves, and take leave to do evil: and under color and that they be freed from the bondage and cursedness wherein they were by nature, they overshoot themselves into all disorder. But God will not be so mocked, he will not have the goodness which he uses towards us, to be made an occasion of sinning. For our Lord Jesus Christ is come to destroy that kingdom of Satan, as it is showed us. So then although God will have us to impute all the good which he does us, to his free mercy: yet the sea put this condition to it is that he will have us to serve him. Although the inheritance which is promised us depend not upon our own works: yet will he have us to be his children for it, seeing he shows himself to be our father. Although it become us not to look for anything in respect of all that service that we do him, forasmuch as we be well assured that they be not of such value as we can rest upon then: yet notwithstanding inasmuch as God has called us to him into that way of salvation: he will not have us up fall to kicking against him. His church must not be a Hogg scot, but the temple dedicated to his honor. So then, seeing God has adopted us, we must leave us his children so as we may show that he has not called and invited us to the inheritance of that heavenly life in vain. For if we can find no favor of it be not worthy to be banished and shut out of it? Yes. Again, if we go thitherward, ought we not to despise this transitory things, and to pass through this world strangers and not to be wedded to this earthly trash? That is then the second reason why our Lord that is the condition that he will be served and honored at our hands. And therefore let us learn in few words that when we have done home age to our God for our everlasting salvation and for all the temporal and transitory goods that he bestows upon us in this world: it behooves us to understand that his adopting of us to be his children least to the intent to be honored by us and his calling of us into his church is to the end we should be as his household flock. For he will have such sheep as shall hearken to his voice. And that is the cause why it is said expressly in this text, you shall keep all the statutes, commandments and laws which I set before you to do them. As if he should say, and on the other case of God, we have his word which is an excellent treasure. And it is not given us only to the end we should but here it and allow it in our words: but to the end we should frame our lives thereafter. Seeing then that God vouchsafes to teach us, and stoops so low us to do that office of a schoolmaster and teacher towards us: are not we too unthankful if we hearken not to him? And let us mark well, that we be none of his disciples unless we obey his doctrine and make it available to us. For otherwise it is but as if we heard a song that delighted our ears as is said of it in Ezekiel. And surely it is a goodly worshipping of God, for us to say that he has sung well.

Not his will is that we should utter another melody correspondent to his voice which is that we should show by our whole life, that he has not taken pains with us in vain not lost his time in declaring his will to us.

And now furthermore Moses adds, keep them: yes (says he) and God will bless you: and afterward he adds again, that he will love us. Surely by these words it may be deemed at the first sight that God looks whether men will do their duty or not, ere he love them. But I have told you already how the promises of the law do serve first of all to bring men to write humility that they may know themselves to be as they be and quite rid and discharge themselves of all self trust. When that is done, then no they that gods calling of them is with condition that they should serve him and that if they enforce themselves so to do, they please him so that although their doings be unperfected yet will he not fail to accept them because he imputes not the vices to them wherewith they be interlaced. And moreover we may gather upon those words of Moses that the surveys whereof he speaks here because not before God's blessing and the favor that he promises us: for do we love him before he loved us? We cannot make the Holy Ghost a liar speaks by the mouth of St John. It is not (says he) for that we loved God first: but God vouchsafed to receive us into his favor at such time as we were enemies. And all the Scripture is full of this. Now then, seeing it is told us here that God will allow his people if they have a care to keep his commandments, let us not that it is not meant that men can prevent God and draw him to them first of all, but that (as is declared to us here) it is all one as if he should say, I loved you freely, and I will love you still and you shall feel my love in such wise as you may enjoy it and possess it forever. But yet for all that let us beware that we deceive not ourselves as they do which confess that God allows us of his own free goodness but yet we must secondly be worthy of it. For we must always come back again to that which I have touched already, namely that unless God bear with us and score away all the spots that are in our works, the thing that is spoken of here shall never be accomplished in us: but contrariwise it shall always turn us to some greater shame to show us, Go to, behold, your God has abased himself so much as to tell you that if you serve him, he will be favorable and merciful to you. For of whom is it long now, that you be unhappy, that he curses you, that he refuses you, and that he persecutes you? Comes it not of your own fault? Yes: You yourselves then, are to be blamed for this, that you be not beloved of your God. It should (say I) be laid to our reproach, if God pardoned and not the faults that are in our works. Albeit that he will not be mocked, nor have his goodness abused, nor abide that men should take liberty to do evil when they see him so gentle and free hearted towards them, but contrariwise will have us to be answerable again on our side, so as we keep not deaf ear to him when he speaks to us: but that when he has been so gracious to us as to declare his will to us, we also should show that his so doing is not in vain and that he is not disappointed of his purpose. But what? We see how stir burn men are for all that, and whatsoever God tells them or show them although they have there is beaten daily with such warnings, I yet notwithstanding they continue still like themselves in their willfulness. Behold, God promises to bless us, so we serve him. Now there is no man but he would fine prosper. We could well find in our hearts that God should stead all our necessities, and that he should give us meat and drink: we could find in our hearts to be clothed at his cost. But in the meanwhile, who is he that the things himself thus: this is that means whereby I must enjoy God's blessing? Not we drove clean back and it should seem that our whole seeking is to bereave ourselves thereof, and to cut off God by the way or rather so to stop the entries and issues of his grace as it may never come at us. Behold, God will have us first of all to live uprightly, faithfully and in his fear: and thereupon he promises to bless us. On the contrary part, men gave themselves to filching, stealing, a robbing and cruelty, seeking by all means to pick out one another's eyes. There is no mention of the fear of God: to be short, there would that all might go to havoc. In so doing we renounce God's will is in, so far us in us lies, and it seems to us that we cannot take a better way to prosper than by selling the devil. Wherein it appears in how cursed plight we be. And whence springs it, but of that we give no credit to God's promises? For if we believed God to be sooth fast in good earnest: surely we would be ravished at this saying of his, I will make you prosper. But forasmuch as are vanities to carry us head long the contrary way, it makes us to imagine that we wean more by doing evil than by serving God. Nevertheless this unbelief of ours shall be right dearly paid for specially when it is matched with such blaspheme, and we to our God so much wrong us not to believe his word: and moreover, when as instead of his grace, we do nothing else but make ourselves strangers to him. Seeing then that we fall to provoking of him so by all means: what remains for us, but to be bereft of his blessings, yes, and that he as though he were power in any perceive us even to the uttermost? Were but truly a man may still perceive an inestimable goodness, in that he ceases not to do us good when he is so provoked by us and that we cease not to kindle that fire of his wrath: but yet in the end we shall find that this doctrine was not in vain. It is true that a man shall not always perceive the thing that Moses says here: and that is to know, that God prospers them that serve him.

For you shall see that such as are desirous to do the best, and employ themselves in the truth, our miserable folks, afflicted divers ways God's hand, and have not half their sill wherewith to sustain them. They gained, they shall be tormented with the ceases or else they shall have many reproaches and injuries wrought them in this world, and (to be short) there shall be in continual languishing. On the contrary part, you shall see the wicked prosper: you shall see them in credit and estimation: they shall cram themselves with all excess and they shall have such abundance us may make even their heirs to burst. These things are to be seen. Albeit we must note, that when the good so afflicted, it is first because they have not yet served God as they ought to do. But why does God scourge them, more than the wicked which rush out into all naughtiness? It is because he intends to chastise then fatherly. To the end that their salts may be saved, his chastises them in their bodies. Again, in sending afflictions, God's intent is not always to punish men according to their misdeeds: but also to try their patience, and to withdraw them from the world to the intent they should not be too much entangled in it: and his will is to humble them, that they may know themselves as they be, and be sorry for it. So then for as much as God has many courses to afflict the faithful, he will not have us to make one legal rule of it and to say that he punishes them according to their misdeeds. But where for so ever heed to it, let us not that if God should utterly destroyed them he had just cause so to do, and he should do them no more. Nevertheless we must have an eye to that which is St. Paul says in the eight to the Romans, and be contented with it: namely that all things turn to the welfare of them that allow what so as their self not was turned them aside ought to pluck them away from their salvation, but rather be as helps to further it. Mark that one point. And yet notwithstanding it is evidently seen that God's grace fails them not in the afflictions and miseries they endure. True it is that they find themselves in the and the things are hard and grievous for them to bear: but yet there is always somewhat to street in them, they have still some comfort at God's hand, which serves to make them understand that he bless us and prospers them. If he should give them no more but one bit of bread, yet have they such an inward joy, asked they can better thank God for it, than the wicked can do [for great abundance] who fret themselves inwardly, insomuch that although they labor to bring themselves a sleep that they might not have any remorse of conscience to trouble them and strive even against nature, that they might be as it were senseless. Yet does not God let them so rest and that they can be so merry at the heart even with their abundance as the silly faithful ones with their for the hold themselves contented from tomorrow to tomorrow, waiting to be fed at gods hand and preferring themselves wholly into him, and calling upon him. And again, although they have not all that they would wish, yet think you thus with themselves, well, yet does not my God cease to watch over me, and therefore I betake me to his Providence, and trust myself upon him. Thus you see how the faithful ceased not to be blessed of God though the world see not God's benefits so apparently in them.

But let us come now to the unbelievers. It is true that God shuts out his temporal benefits upon them so as they be in the end have abundance of goods, and so forth: but yet shall all these things be turned into a curse to them. If a man be manned whether the having of bodily health and also wherewith to find a man's self, be not the blessings of God: yes, verily be they. But yet must we note that us in respect of the faithless and of the despisers of God turned to their harm because they be foul and unclean, and do the file God's benefits with their handling of them. Needs must it be then that the order of nature is turned upside down in this behalf. For inasmuch as the wicked and of the unbelievers full of filth and uncleanness: they cannot that is any of god's benefits, but they must needs betray them and mar them. And therefore all must needs turn to their condemnation. Again, we see how the world goes. Have thieves (I mean such as are given to deceit and fleecing) have they gathered much together? They have tormented themselves all the time of the life: And what joy have they had of them? God takes in jeans on them for they be inflamed with such greediness of them as they be never in quiet and besides that they cannot do good with their evil gotten goods. But in the end do they once die? Then goes all to havoc again. For the world sees how the devil has liberty to overthrow, even such as a man would have God to have been well grounded, and that they should never have decayed to the worlds end. A man would wonder to see how they be destroyed in that turning of a hand. Yes and moreover the goods which they have raked together for their children become us halts to hang them withal, so as they become miserable even in despite of the world and men behold the signs of gods wrapped and when James in that whereby it is well-known that he never leaves men unpunished for the contempt and wrong which they do in his Majesty, in crushing forth into all disorder. Insomuch that if he punished not the fathers themselves he lays the execution of it upon their children, how long so ever he make-believe. So then let us Mark that it is not without cause that God tells us he will bless such as serve him, yes, even to the world ward. And that is the cause why Saint Paul says, that the fear of God has promises, not only of the everlasting life, but also of this earthly life: so as if we live in the fear of God, we shall not only be sure of the inheritance which he has prepared for us and bow, but also that even as long as we leave in this world he will guide us and keep us under his protection and not suffer us to want anything whereof he knows us to have need. True it is that God will always be our carver, because he knows we be too much given to the earthly things, from weeds he intends to pull us anyway, to the end we should have the better skill to lift up our heads to heaven, and to seek after the goods that are prepared for us there.

Therefore when God reaches his benefits to us we see he does, that is to say, when he gives us them in small and slender portion it is to the intent we should not be hindered to keep it on our way still in going right forth to him. Thus you see what we have to Mark in this text. And therefore if we serve our God, let us not doubt but he will bless us even to the world ward, and make us to prosper better than the wicked, yes, and although we see them puffed up with pride, although we see the triumph in pomp and bravery, and although we see them swimming in their pleasures: let us tarry patiently a little while, and we shall find that God dallied not with us, when he promised his blessing to such as are willing to serve and love him.

And specially let us mark well how he tells us here expressly, that he will bless us in our issue and in the increase of your castle. I pray you, if the favor which God shows us do extend even to the brute beasts, so was the Mark of his fatherly goodwill towards us shall be printed in them. What will he do to ourselves and to our children and to the things that touch us much nearer? For indeed we must take this comparison of our bodies with our souls to stop if God have a care to feed peace wretched carcasses here: what will he do for us when we be restored into his glory? If he have a care of our mortal bodies: what will he have for our souls, which are fashioned after his own image? But let us return to the per cent matter. If God vouchsafed we have a care of our cattle, us of our oxen, our assess, and our sheep for our sakes: what care will he have of our persons? What care will he have of our children, which else of the promised of salvation and adopted to belonged to his covenant, seeing it pleases him to choose and adopt us to be his people? For he does not only saying, come to me, but also I will be the God of your children after you to be a thousand generations. But what? We be were we to be left destitute of all gods promises, and the 12 much to, if we could by that mean be brought to write repentance. Let us see if God's blessing be, to be found among us nowadays as it is promised. Indeed it is to be Mark well (as I have declared already) that God is so patient towards us. For our we were the to be maintained here one minute of an hour, considering the outrages offences which they commit daily against him? No, and yet notwithstanding, although his spare us, although he tarry for us, and although he scourge us not as we have deserved: yet nevertheless, we see how we do partly languish. Some decay and consume themselves by little and little, some perish utterly out of hand and other some and other some pine away as if they were almost death of called, as men term it. And what is the cause here of but our driving away of God's grace and blessing? They gained we need not to go to our oxen, our forces and the sheep to meet whether God withdraw his hand and grace from us or not. Let us look upon our children in what plight they be. God is receiving of their fathers into his favor ought to be as a looking glass of his goodness towards them, but yet ought it to be much better known in these children, so was it might be said, Lo, here a blessed seed. For God's vouchsafing to take the fathers to him was of purpose to utter his mercy yet more in their children. But contrariwise let them man look upon their children and he shall be driven to conclude that we be as good as banished from God's blessing and from all the prosperity which he promised to his people. And no marvel though it be so, for that world sees where it is that fathers in. Their intent is not to edify then in the fear of God, for it should seem that they be locked that their children should shame them by becoming honest man than they. And to say that truth, they bring them up in all lewdness: and is it not meat then that God should show himself a judge? Where are the fathers nowadays, that make the fear of God their mark to aim at in teaching their children? Indeed they be willing enough to have their children are advanced to the world ward, and to lay for them that they may want no well, but in the meanwhile as for to have an eye to God to say, I will dedicate my children to him, I will have them so brought up see may be rightly honored by them: it is the furthest end of all their thought. Needs therefore must be bereft of the benefits that are promised here, and banished from them.

Furthermore, whensoever it is told us that our Lord provokes us to return to him, let us understand that seeing he allowed us freely when we were yet his enemies, it must needs be that he will rather love us now that he is reconciled to us. Yes, but yet must that be in respect of our Lord Jesus Christ and for his sake. We must not seek anywhere in us out of the person of him that is called God's well-tailored son, for it is only he that has satisfied the payment of all our debts, which thing it laid not in any creature to do. Yet notwithstanding, let us assure ourselves that it behooves us to endeavor to do well, knowing that God will not have us to abuse his mercy. For seeing he has adopted us to be his children, let us yield him the honor that is due to our father. And besides that although our works be unperfected, and we do but offer him things which are not worth that accepting at his hand: yet does not he see still like well of us in that things that we do to serve and honor him well and we shall not be disappointed of the benefits that he has promised us. But yet must we impute all to his mercy and we must leave in such sort in this world as we may be out of doubt that he will have regard to maintain us even in this present life and to give us whatsoever he knows to be meet for us. Therefore let that serve to make toll us on still further and further so as we may be able to go through with a cheerful heart to the spiritual blessedness that tarries for us above, whereof we have but only a taste as now by faith and hope.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may learn to be so reformed, them better than we have been, and to turn wholly to him, and to reform our whole life after such a sort, as we may seek nothing but to give over ourselves all wholly to him, and to frame ourselves to his holy will, see he has declared it in his word. And so let us all say, Almighty God, heavenly father, et cetera.

On Monday the 12th of August 1555

The 55th Sermon, which is the fifth upon the seventh Chapter

16. You shall consume all the nations which the Lord your God gives you. Thin eye shall not pardon them: neither shall you serve their God's: for that will be your decay.

17. If you say in thin heart these nations are more in number than I how may drive them out?

18. Be not afraid of them: but remember what the Lord your God did to Pharaoh, and to all the Egyptians.

19. That is to know, the great trials which thin eyes have seen, and the signs and wonders, and the strong hand and stretched out arm, wherewith the Lord your God brought you out. So will the Lord your God do to all the nations of whose face you are afraid.

For as much as we be exhorted to become like God and gentleness and mildness, and that he will have his children known thereby in this world: it should seem that the thing which Moses says here, is not agreeable thereto. For even the heathen could well skill to say, that there is nothing wherein land resemble God more that is in gentleness and loving kindness, when they give themselves to do good. But in this place here is nothing but to rigor. God will have them to yield all without sparing of anything, it seems then that there is some contrary in this matter. No, but (say have declared heretofore) although God execute his judgment is and appoints men to be the doers thereof. Yet is that no let, but that we may in the meanwhile be kindhearted in ourselves and have pity and compassion even upon them back perish. Now on the one side if God enjoying anything to be done, it must be done without gainsaying. And yet in the meanwhile we must follow the rule that is given us generally, namely to love our neighbors though they be not worthy of it, yes, even such us haters, and to endeavor to do them good and to overcome them by doing good for evil. But this will be the better understood, if we take the matter by parts.

First we must call to mind hear what has been declared upon the sixth chapter, that is to know, that it is not for us to measure God's judgments after our fancy, for we must needs grant that sometimes they be as the bottomless pit, but yet for all that, they cease not to be rightful still. Then shall we not always see the reason of God's doings: but yet must we like well of them without gainsaying. For it is good reason that all creates as should stoop to him, and that he should not be bound to yield any account. And therefore when the thing that God commands us seems strange, let us hold our minds in awe and subjection, and yield God so much honor as to confess that he is righteous and just though we perceive it not. Let that serve for one point.

The gain when we see him to have such regard towards others us to us may seem excessive, there in let us acknowledge his goodness and mercy towards us: for he might do the like to us. Of what more of whom is it long that we perish not as well as the upon whom God powers out the extremity of his rigor? It is certain that our sins have well deserved that us which should befall us: but God bears with us of his infinite goodness. Therefore let us stand in awe. For though God use goodness and patience towards us now, yet has not be forgotten our faults, except be ourselves to bear them in mind. And therefore let us understand that God might justly destroy us, and thereupon let us call ourselves home to him and prevent the thing that is to be feared that is to know least he should stretch forth his arm to compound us. So then, the executions of God's judgments ought to be asked warnings to us, to enter into the knowledge of our sins that when we have given God thanks for bearing with us, we may learn to return home to him again.

But yet notwithstanding, when we have well considered all things: [we shall find that] it was not without cause that God commanded his people to vote out all the folk that dwelt in the land of Canaan. For he that already born with them a longtime asked has been declared. Shall we think it strange, that after God had tarried foreign today's of men that were despises of his Majesty and given to all naughtiness: he should in the end have no more pity upon them, but will them to be utterly wiped out of the world? But such swear all those nations. For although they were malicious and forward already in the time of Abraham and it was apparent that the land was infected with their filthiness: yet did God avow, that their wickedness was not yet come to the full growth.

And therefore he delayed his wrath, not for the space of half a score years only, but full 400 years together. He let them alone in ease and rest, and they waxed still worse and worse, and hard and more and more. It seems that God's goodness gave the more to liberty to evil. Therefore it was high time for God to put forth his mighty hand then ought never to destroy them, seeing he found them so far past grace. And indeed, we can well skill to desire God to punish the wicked, and it grieves us that he should bear with them and if he make delay bethink these two patients. Again, if he use rigor after his long tarriance: then we cry out that he is to see the and we ask if he could not deal otherwise that they be playing, there is no measure in us. For if God satisfied not our desires, we fall to complaining, one while of his over great gentleness and other while of his over great civility. And if he execute not such vengeance that the first dash as we would wish, we think he is asleep, and that he dissembles too much. And daily we hear that is murmurings us these, what means he by this? Why does he forbear so long? Again on the other side, if God come with his power to punish men according to their deserving, then alas how comes it to pass the God (who reports himself to be so patient and pitiful) does now shows himself so rigorous against us? Yes, but we consider not what why our sins provoke his wrath, and while we stack up wood to kindle the fire of it, he allures us to repentance by gentleness. For he uses leisure to return to him, to the end we should ask him forgiveness. And if we do not so, must he not then shows himself to be our judge? In like taking were the people of home Moses makes mention here. For God's intent was not to punish them without just cause, sentence was given upon them beforehand in that time of Abraham. And now there are 400 days do run out sins, and is not that a term long enough? Did these nations amend of all that time? Not, contrariwise they ceased not to give themselves over to all naughtiness and because they were not corrupted they became the worse and the more stubborn, and their malapert increased more and more. Now then God executes the sentence which he had given upon them for a hundred days before, for he knows that they be past remedy. And therefore let us learn to glorify him in his judgments and whereas we see that reason of them here. Let us not ceased to conclude without disputing (yes, even when we perceive not the reason of them) that he is just and righteous, and that he weighs his woks in such balance, as there is no fault to be found in them, and that if we chance to check against them, we shall be confounded in our blasphemy. And so you see what we have to remember.

Again, when God lifts to execute his rigor: let us not I allege his mercy to him. True it is that in resorting to him we must always beseech him to vouchsafe to receive us to Morrissey and all our bravest must begin and end to this confession, that if God used not his goodness we should be under and, and there would be no more hope of salvation for us: and therefore it stands us in hand flee for refuge to God's mere mercy. But the thing that I speak of us now, is that we must not to play against God when he lifts to deal rigorously with us, for there is none of us all, but he could find in his heart to make God to stoop to his lure. Let us beware of such presumptuousness, and rather do him the honor to say that his justice is un-blamable in all points and all respects. And forasmuch as it is so, we have to note, that when so ever God punishes the wit could, it is not enough for us to confess that he does it justly: but also a peak a man does to execute his judgment is, we must do it and we must shut our eyes at all things. For us for him that will be more pitiful than God, although he be commended of men and that is doing have some show of virtue: yet the does he most lewdly blaspheme came which is that fountain of all goodness. The man that pretends to be more merciful than God is worse than the devil. For why? What are we? Let us make comparison between God and us. Behold, God will have us to execute rigor: and we will needs call him back to mercy: now is not that spiting of him, as though we would spit in his face if we could? Yes: for there is nothing more peculiar to him than his goodness. Let us take away this goodness from him, and he is no longer God. Shall we imagine God to be but some dead thing? Not, when we speak of God, we must understand that all goodness is in him, and that we have none at all in us, but by small pieces, such as it pleases him to bestow upon us. Now then if a man will needs say, I will use mercy, when God forbids him., what the presumptuousness is that? So then, let us Mark well in this text, that it is not enough for us to confess that God does justly punished whom he lifts, but also that if he lifted to give us the chance and commission to execute his judgments, we must go through without scanning or gainsaying. And therefore in matters of justice, men must forbear their own opinions and wills, and not be so over weaning, asked to take leave to do what they think good or to turn aside one way or other: but had a regard to follow the rules that our Lord gives them, assuring themselves that the authority of justice is tarried to the thing which he shows and that his putting of them in that commission is to the intent they should repress and punish evil doors, and maintain and defend good folk. Seeing it is so, it is mere that they used thereof should be thereafter.

Moreover us concerning these nations whom Moses speaks of, let us Mark that besides the other crimes and the enormities which they had committed, there was also a contempt of God which was utterly intolerable. Indeed we will make no great reckoning of that, but yet does God make reckoning of it and he passes not what we have imagined for all our imaginations are corrupted. When God has once set up his judgment seat: we may well put forth our opinion, but the thing which God has ordained must stand, and not be repeated. Now then let us note, that when so ever God's honor is lightly esteemed, then must rigor be used to another than Morrissey in that behalf. And we must call to mind the examples that is reversed in the first book of things, namely the Achab who would needs

And there is expressly this saying, that when Benhadad came to him to sue for mercy, all that ever he said to him was no more but this that the kings of Israel were merciful and kindhearted. And behold that goodly virtue of elements overcame his heart by means whereof whereas God commanded him to execute rigor, he showed mercy. But it happened to him as he have deserved. And why? For the Syrians had committed horrible blaspheme against God and scorned in, saying, he is the God of the mountains but if we come into the plain grounds, we shall have victory, he can do nothing there. Thus where idols set up in God's place. And therefore it was said to Achab, that the king of Syria should be vanquished and rooted out. Now it came to pass that his array of us put to flight, but yet they found a shift by and by to make peace. And why? For this goodly commendation like Achab's ears well, when they called him a merciful Prince. By means whereof he was dandled asleep, so see made sale of the blaspheme that was committed against God, cities are common matter with us to be pitiful in cases where God is offended. For this cause let Prophet was sent to him he bringing his bad is it again, that is to know that he had been wounded by the commandment of God, and the first man (who had refused to do it) was devoured of a Lion out of hand. Yet notwithstanding the prospect came to Achab wounded and disfigured and said to him, I took a man to keep and he that delivered in to me bad me I should not let him go upon pain of my life. Nevertheless violated turned me to and fro he escaped from me. And you must and set him up on your life, quotes Achab. Then answered the prophet to Achab: it is yourself that this that is us. This message is sent to you of God, to show you that forasmuch as you has spared the King of Syria, whom God had put into your hand to be revenged of him for the outrage done to his Majesty: you must and serve for him life for a life and your people with you. So then we see that if God's honor be impeached, it is not for us to in the things slipped, but we must understand that if we make light of such a crime, God will surely make their engines to light upon ourselves. To be short, let us Mark well, that if such as have commissioned to punish offenders do it not, there will be no excuse for them. For that which is returned will not be repealed for men's pleasures: that is to know that he weeps justifies or acquies the guilty person is as abominable before God as he has condemned the innocent. If a poor innocent be oppressed man can skill to say, there is no reason in it and that the matter must come to account before God. And here God adds the second part that is to know, that if an offender be quit, and justice and equity so turned upside down, it must come to account as well as the other. You see then how it is a lesson which all those ought to bear in mind whom God has commanded to punish men's offences: and that there must be well aware to use one rule and one measure. For if a man punish one of enter and pardon another, and think to go half quit for it before God: it is clean contrary. And for proof thereof, let us consider the examples that is set down in Hoseas concerning King Jehu. God commanded the to destroy all idolaters: he did it partly but not altogether for he destroyed those whom he stood in fear of and he did it for his on vainglory and surety. God did him the honor to make him king and he considered it not. But when he came once to the kingdom, oh, he must maintain himself in it. And what did he? He executed rigor enough upon those whom he lifted, and specially upon such as he wish might do him harm: but when he had so begun, he let the rest go unpunished, he cared not what came of it, so he might reign peaceably. Now at the first sight a man might well say it is a virtue will be of commendation that he punished those whom God had commanded him. They really and so was it, if he had held on that trade still. But forasmuch as he destroyed one sort and spared the other sort, it is said that God will punish the manslaughter that Jehu had committed. And how may that be? Is it manslaughter to have executed the commandment of God? Yes, after the manner that he went to work. He is said to be a manlier, because he had not an eye to the thing that God commanded him. For he should have gone through as he began. But he stayed in the midst of the survey. For as for those whom he punished, he punished them in respect of his own peculiar profit. He had no regard of God's honor so the crown of the kingdom continued with him. Therefore is he justly accounted for a manlier and not a judge. And therefore let us beware that we take not more liberty than God gives us. For he can well skill to moderate his own doings, though we take not upon us to be more beautiful than he. And if we make our hand of his honor, we must a dearly for it when we come to our reckoning before him. But if they seem strange to us, let us go a little by degrees and see if nature might not be a schoolmistress good enough for us, if we were not blinded by our wicked affection. IF a man have children, he knows well enough that it is his duty to teach them, and to chastise them when they do amiss. For if he bear with his children, and dare not touch them, but cockers them, and in the meanwhile they be of evil nature: may it not be said that he is worthy that his children should pick out his eyes, and pluck his nose from his face? And on the contrary part, if children were teachable and meek of themselves: it were not meet that they should be touched. But when a father perceive his children to be curst and unruly: if he spare them then, men will say that he mars them, and that he sends them to the gallows, and that he is the cause of their undoing. Now let us compare a father with a judge. Whereas a father ought to chastise his children with rods: a judge has an office that passes yet further. Therefore he must have an eye thereunto: and if he do not, he is worthy to have his eyes put out with the mischief, as Moses speaks here of these people, saying: They shall be as thorns to prick you on all sides and to put out thin eyes: they shall be as wasps to sting you in such sort as you shall not know which way to turn you.

Lo what reward that Israelites had for the restlessness in that there were not stout in putting this sentence in execution, which God had uttered with his own mouth. But howsoever the case stood with them, let us learn still to be pitiful. For the rigor that is spoken of here, must not make us to forget how God commands us to allow even our enemies, and them that the secure us and to endeavor to do them good to the uttermost of our power that we may bring them into the right way of salvation. Then must we needs and that is the yes and even when a judge uses rigor, his heart must mourn and lament, to see a creature that is made after the image of God so dealt with all: but yet must he go on still and execute the office which God has committed to him. These two things then are not unmatchable, that is to know that gentleness should be used in the executing of justice so serve wicked moat should not carry us the way but that we should always hold us still to this point of loving even those that shall have done us the worst they could. Thus you see how we ought to put this doctrine in use God's intent is not stir up his people to cruelty his meaning is not to be raved them utterly of all compassion, and yet notwithstanding he will have misdeeds to be punished.

And furthermore as touching the land of Canaan which he had purposely appointed to his honor: he would not have it any longer so defiled with such infections. For the nations that had dwelled there in before, and as it were be filed the land. Now God's intent is to establish his kingdom their, he will be worshipped incorruptly there: and therefore all of those nations must be read away. For seeing that God will have his righteousness put in use through the whole world, when so ever he is not in any place so us his truth is there preached and he has set his church in some good order and state. Man must look well about them that no fences all defiling may reign there. For where so ever God is worshipped and served that places as a temple dedicated to his Majesty and God's temple must be kept holy as it ought to be. Then is it the greatest and intolerable treachery to God Ward that can be, when evil doings and crimes are soft and in his church. Therefore it is not said without cause, been highly shall not pardon any of all the nations they must be consumed utterly. And why? First the wickedness that was among them was over great, they were despises of God and therefore he was fine to be revenged of them in the end. Again, he has an eye to the benefit and welfare of his church, so as he would not have his children entangled with such as might draw them to evil and consequently to their ruin and destruction. God then will have his people rid of all stumbling blocks. Mark that for the second point. Moreover for the third point, it was convenient that God should show himself a judge, to the intent that why be holding such vengeance, they might take one into think thus with themselves seeing that God has done as the honor to punish such as have offended us, did he was an example by them. Let us beware that we fall not into the same offences, for then shall we be double to blame. Thus you see how gods committing of his vengeance to his own people, to punish such as had been given over to all naughtiness, ought to serve all folks for an example.

After he has said so, he adds now, you shall not serve their gods for that would turn to your weekly. Although this saying have been set down by Moses already heretofore, yet it is not without cause that he sets it down here again. For we soon forget what God can man is us if we be not quickened up to put in execution. We cry out daily to have justice executed, but how do men discharge themselves thereof? Let their hears be never so much beaten, it is to no purpose they pass not much for it, but they be the more forget-full from day-to-day. Therefore does Moses put them in mind of the things that he had told them before, to the intent that the people should in anywise restrained from serving the idols of the heathen. And he adds separate, it would turn to your weekly. Indeed the Hebrew word which he uses is commonly taken for cords or lines, but here by a similitude it is taken for snares or nets and for ruin, decay, downfall, or stumbling. Then if you fall into idolatry: it will be at deadly fall to you says he. He you from that. Thus we see that when God punishes the wicked, we must always learn at their cost to leave in his fear. For our condemning of other folks will not justice ourselves, if we follow the or become like them, but rather they shall be witnesses against us to bereaves of all excuse. Therefore let us think upon that which is added here, that when God had commanded his people to destroy the idolaters: he adds, beware you, meddle not with their superstitions, for then shall you be overthrown out of hand, yes and we see also that God did not bear with the people of Israel any long time and after they had offended. For the heathen might yet have some excuse, because they had not had any teaching: but the Israelites sinned willfully and their doing us a manifest rebellion a cursed they had been sufficiently warned thereof before, specially for as much as God had done them so great honor, as to put the sport into their hand as if he should say you shall punish them is misdoings of others. Seeing then that God had so honored the people was it not an increasing of their evil much more, when they happened to become like those whom they punished? Yes, further punishment which they had executed upon others, serve to bereave them of all color of ignorance, and to double their own fault. For after as God honors man, they ought to take the more heed to leave in all to yours before him. That is the cause then why those two things that match together.

And hereupon we may gather, that all such as have the executing of justice, must lay a Bay thereon fleshy passions and look that they be quiet and clear from all desire of revenge, hatred and rancor.

And this must be regarded of us, not only in punishing of evildoers, but also in the abominations and warnings that we give. For if we be too sharp it is an hour shooting of ourselves which proceeds of sinfulness, by reason whereof although the corruption which the minister be out of God's word, yet is it already stained, and God allows it not. Sometimes bethink ourselves to be excused, if we tell a man the truth. Yes, but we would not tell it him, if our over vehement affection drove us not to it. For nowadays vices are softer among men, and every man is content to bear with his neighbor in his evil doing: but if there happen any variance or choral, than out flies that which was concealed before. Therefore and rebuking men, it is not enough for us that we can allege that we have told them the truth. Unless we can also therewithal protest, that the way of not lead with the said prevents or otherwise. Let us mark then, that if it be but in warnings by word of mouth, we must not be passionate nor desirous of revenge, but simply do it of zeal to God Ward. Now then it is much more reason that when a judge holds the sword in his hand and these to proceed further to the executing of justice with rigor, he should then lay aside all evil affections. That is the cause why God has expressly showed his people in the end of the law which he had given them to the intent they should be the better taught to walk in your religion and not follow the superstitions which they should punish in the Heathen. That is the thing which we have note in effect.

Now Moses adds immediately, if you say in being heart, alas these nations are more in number than I, and how is it possible than I should discomfit them? Remember what your God did in the land of Egypt, how he handled Pharaohs and all his people, and what proof of his power he give you there. For even so will he do more to all the nations whom you are afraid of. Here Moses intends to hearten people, to the intent they should be daunted with fearfulness. For the thing that is commonly in their man in doing their duty, is a certain fearfulness which they conceive. O (say they) this is hard to be done: and again, if I do it, I shall stir up many men's displeasure against me, and such a harm may come to me by it. Thus instead of walking as God commands us, we bow with every blast, and in the end turn quite away. We be but over bold and hardy in following our own passions, and we be so blinded with them, that although there be danger in them, yet we think not upon it: and although it come to our mind, yet do our affections so over master us, that we cease not to go on still. We see that if a man be in a rage, although death be before his eyes, yet he goes through with it like a mad man, or like a beast that is carried away with furiousness. After that manner to we deal. And that is the cause why I said that we be but too bold in executing our own wicked and excessive mood. But if God command us anything, we make such niceness at it, as is pitiful to see. And then come all these doubts in our head: How is it possible that I should hold out, if I should follow my vocation faithfully? For behold, there is such a block in my way, I shall have such a man mine enemy, such a thing may befall me, such a man will be against me. All these forecasts (say I) will come to our mind. And therefore let us mark, that God does not without cause say thus to his people here, do these things, not respecting thin own power and ability, but respecting and knowing my strength: for that is invincible. If you have me on that side, fear not but I will make you overcome all thin encumbrances, and all the evil encounters that you can meet with. Thus you see in effect what we have to mark upon this text.

Albeit forasmuch as the vice that is spoken of here, is common among us, and all of us are (as you would say) attained with it: we have so much the more need to be earnest in putting this lesson in use. We see that if men be against us, by and by we overshoot ourselves, and we cannot serve God. And how so? If I should do all that God commands me, all the world would hate me: I shall be pointed at with men's fingers, I shall have as many enemies as I have neighbors about me. Hereupon we shrink in our horns by and by, and we bear ourselves in hand that we be excused before God. And this happens in manner continually. Yes, verily, and forasmuch as the world is for a word we have good cause to be afraid when we intend to leave in such uprightness and soundness as God commands. Since we see it is so, let us return to that which is said here: namely that to obey God, we must not pass what we ourselves are not what our own credit and power is: but we must arm ourselves with this promise. It is God that commands me to do it and he sees well enough what dangers and distresses in it. He will stand by me and reach me his mighty hand. It behooves me to rest upon that and to conceive a stead fast trust, to overcome all things that may turn me away from the doing of my duty. That is the thing which we have to remember upon this lesson of Moses. And indeed out should be to without that? For we see how vises have their full scope nowadays, and he that intends to serve God purely may well say he is as a sheep among wolves. But what for that? We have a good Shepherd who has promised to defend us. Let us put our trust in him and in the mean season walk on in the way that he has showed us to stop else, I beseech you what would become of the poor Christians that are be tamed among the enemies of the faith? If they should pass for the dangers were when they be, how durst they open their mouths to honor God? Should they not need either give themselves over to all evil, or else at leastwise be faine to strike fail? Yes surely. But when they consider thus our God is the keeper of our souls and seeing we be under his protection let us wait till he reach us his hand at our need.

Then that the conceiving of such thoughts, they take new courage and enabled to serve God or at leastwise the said fearfulness overmasters them not. True it is that we cannot but be afraid, and feel our flesh continually shrinking away, when we be disposed to walk according to god's ordinance and we shall conceive many cross biting. But yet must we not boast of such wise to faine ourselves in it. I say we must come to that which Moses tells us here: Your God will work for you.

It though all other, they that are in authority must arm themselves with this promise or else there will be neither constancy nor stoutness in them. For we see what threatening, and spiting are wrought everywhere. Insomuch that when even the greatest kings and Princes our minded to do right there needs but some courtier to inveigle them, and he shall so alter their mind as (do what they can) they must needs yield to all naughtiness. No doubt but that even the greatest Princes, (although they themselves intend no such thing) do become stark naught for other men's pleasures, so as they be oftentimes enforced to say, I would faine do the thing that I know to be good, but I dare not for displeasing of such as are about me, because they may stir me up great troubles and un-quietness and therefore I must be faine to yield to them. Again there had a great number of people that will set themselves against me if I should do my duty. Lo in what taking a Prince shall divers times be. Insomuch that if he perceive some officers of his to have committed outrageous, pilling, polling, and extortions, O [says he] I shall lose my servants hearts if we be too rigorous, therefore must say let such things slip and though my people be oppressed by it, yet must not I make any countenance that I see it. You see then that the greatest princes are the cause of all mischief by their inclining to the worse part, when they think they cannot maintain their state, but by favoring wicked persons, and by laying the bridle in their neck. And how then shall they do which have not the like authority? Surely, a very little blast of wind and every leaf that falls from the tree must needs astonished them out of hand so asked for fear they shall allege thus and thus: alas, I shall get such a man's displeasure, such an inconvenience may befall me for it: therefore I must do such a thing or such a thing to save myself: I see my life would be in danger and I am but one man alone, I should be made a pray for others. You see then how these forecasts are a cause of the overthrow of all right and justice, so as men keep not one continual train, nor hold themselves at one good stay, but that soon as they have done anyone could be that is worthy of praise, by and by they undo it again and marred it all. And therefore it stands us so much the more in hand to be of this doctrine well printed in our minds that if we intend to serve God we must not have an eye to our own power, but trust to him that sets us a work to stop for he will not suffer us to be disappointed, so we to him the honor to call upon him, and to fly to him for refuge, not mistrusting but that his power is able enough to maintain us. Yes and although we have none enemies to the world ward, yet must that be our foundation, that we may keep the right way of all our life long. For let every of us look into himself, and he shall see that we have a common enemy of Satan, and we see what wiles he has to surprise us: and what strength have we to withstand him? Again the holy Scripture tells us that we must forsake ourselves, mortify all our affections and hold them in prison, and renounce all worldly things if we will come to God. And moreover our life must show them that fruits thereof. Now we know our frailty, we see infinite temptations to inveigle us, we know that the devil is the Prince that reigns in the air above us. And alas what can we do? This might get the first to make us and abashed. But what? We must not hear have an eye to our own freewill has these blind wretches do, which presume upon their own strength and rest upon their own abilities, but we must say, O Lord, perform you the things which you commands us and then command us what you will. Let us go and put ourselves after that fashion into the hand of our God and suffer him to rule us by his holy spirit: and then need not doubt but we shall have the upper hand of all evils that encounter us and that although we be troubled never so much yet in the end he will he was a happy issue, so as we shall feel that our trust in him has not been in vain. To be short, we see how profitable this doctrine is for us. For it were impossible for us to overcome the least assault that we could be put into, unless God reached out his hand to succor us at our need. Therefore let us call upon him, and that not for once and away but forasmuch as it is right heart for us to hold out to the end and to have a continual is stead fastness, let us pray God that when he has once set us in the book trade he continued the same, and suffer not as to turn head again it in two or three days after, but that when we have walked rightly for a certain time we may go forward more and more and show that we have walked under his guidance and not be foolish hardy to range abroad at adventure, but that we have put our trust in him and embraced his promises whereby he tells us that he will never fail such as are his, but that like as they submit themselves to him so he also will utter his power towards them, to maintain them and defend them against all the temptations of Satan, and against all the wrongs of the world.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us to feel them as we may learn to dislike of them and the yourselves more and more to serve him. And that sees we be so sore tempted with our own wicked lusts, and so assailed by them every minute of an hour, as we be not able to overmaster them: we may take the armor which he gives us from heaven, that is to know, the grace of his holy spirit, wherewith to repulse all Satan's assaults, that by that means our God may be glorified in us and his kingdom had danced more and more so us his righteousness, goodness, and wisdom may shine forth everywhere, and especially be so printed in our hearts as we also may bear the badges of them in all our members. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and Nations of the earth, et cetera.

On Tuesday the 13th of August, 1555

The 56th Sermon which is the sixth upon the Seventh Chapter

19. That is to know & c.

20. And also the Lord your God will send Wasps among them, until he have destroyed the remnant of them and those that shall have hidden themselves from your presence.

21. You shall not be afraid before them. For the Lord your God is in the midst of you, a great and terrible God.

22. And the Lord your God will cast down those nations before you, by little and little. You must not rid them away out of hand for fear least the beasts of the field do multiply against you.

23. But the Lord your God will give you them before you, and astonish them with a great astonishment, until they be utterly destroyed.

24. And he will give you their kings into your hands, and you shall wipe out their name from under heaven. And none of them all shall be able to stand before you, until you have rooted them out.

We saw yesterday what courage we ought to have to do our duty, and whereupon we ought to ground ourselves: namely upon the promise which God makes us that we shall be maintained by his hand and power. For if we have an eye to our own power and ability, we shall have no cause to conceive any trust: but if we be acquainted with God's power, and have his promise that he will aid us: then have we no cause to be afraid. Then if we see any dangerous that may make us afraid or astonished us: let us learn to have recourse to this lesson that when so ever God commands us to do anything, he will not fail us at our need. But rather than we shall feel his presence in such wise as we ought to do to him the honor to rest upon him. And to the end this doctrine might be the better known, Moses has there with all set down the experience thereof which God had given the people of Israel at their going out of Egypt. You have seen the signs and wonders which God wrought: and he will do us much in his behalf. It ought to suffice us the God binds himself to us by his promise. Howbeit forasmuch as he perceives our infirmity: he gives us this help more, of making us to have experience of the things that we knew before. Now if this well us not, we be not only unfaithful but also unthankful. For when God does us good it is not for an hour or twice, but he will have it to stand us instead of all our lifelong and to conclude boldly, that see has begun well, so will he also continue. Then let us beware that we be not guilty of so great unthankfulness, as to have thrust God's benefits underfoot, ought to be so well known to us. And that is to the end we may go through with our course without stop. And because we be us weak as is possible, or rather lazy and unprofitable, when we should do any good. Let us take courage as it is given us here even by in recourse to God, praying him to hold out his hand continually to help us. And therewithal let us do whatsoever he commands us and what so ever we know to be our duty not doubting but the end of it will be good. Although the devil practice to turn all upside down, and although men is trained themselves and make never so great assaults to find that the same, yet will God get the upper hand. And if he succor us, let us not doubt but we shall overcome all the assaults which we shall be driven in endure.

And furthermore Moses adds that God will send wasps to destroy the rest of those nations and those that he themselves out of the way. As if he should say that although the children of Israel were not able to destroy their enemies, yet would God provide for it as one that has all means in his hand. You shall not need (says he) to have the sword always in thin hand: for God has other men of war, he will arm the Wasps against them. Now surely this may seem strange at the first sight. For seeing that God intends to show his power against the enemies of his people: why does he not rather dart his thunder at then from heaven?

Why Makes he not the earth to open and to follow them up? Why works he not after some other fashion than by sending of Hornets? Now, hereby he meant to show, first that he had all creatures in his hand, and can his turn with them as he lifts. And it is a great advantage for us to know that, if God be on our side, there is not anything, no not even so much as fly, but it shall make with us and against our enemies. Likewise on the counter part, if we have provoked Gods wars and he be minded to make us feel his vengeance, although the whole world had linked themselves together to help us, yet notwithstanding, all things (yea even to the very shall be armed to execute his wars against us. This therefore is a thing that ought to make us afraid when we live not as we ought to do and contrariwise which ought to give us singular hope and comfort, so we be under the protection of our God. Mark it then for a special point that, whereas God avowed that he will send Wasps his meaning is to show that he has incomprehensible means in his hand, and that he will cause all things to imply themselves in his service, to destroy his enemies and to help his people. But yet he shows his mighty power much better thereby, than if he used miracles: I mean I punishing the pride of such as trust and bear themselves in hand that nothing can hurt them. The despisers of God do make themselves believe that, they can exempt themselves from all inconveniences, either by their police, or by their power and cunning. Hereupon (for we know that men are ready to burst for pride, until Gods spirit reign in them) God, to humble them and to make them meek, subdues them and overmastered as they deserve.

True it is that God could confound them at the first blow, and make them to feel such a heavenly force as, were able to the whole world, but he will not deal so with them. How then? He undermines them by such means as they never thought of, and that is to scorn their fond overweening the more, which made them worse than mad, and wherewith they had been besotted before. And that is the cause why he sent flies and other vermin upon Egypt, rather than raised his Angels to destroy the Egyptians. It is true that God wrought all manner of ways to make them feel his power. He sent darkness, he turned the waters into blood, and in the end an Angel came and flew all the first born of their houses. This was well done. But yet Gods meaning was to pull down the pride of Egypt, by sending vermin to consume them. So what men of war God chooses to battle for him, when he lifts laugh men lushness to scorn, and to spite them that they may come to know themselves, whereas rest they forget themselves, and bare themselves in hand that their own power was wonderful. And indeed when we read that Herod was so confused of worms, it ought to put us in mind that, God sent him a punishment for him, because he had suffered men to call him a God. He was not contented with the degree of a moral man, but he would needs imagine that he could transform himself. Therefore it was meet that he should be abased beneath all men, and that the rest of his body should make him drop in pieces, so as he should seek to murder himself with his own hand. Now then Gods handling of him after that fashion is, to humble him the better. And when we read this present text, let us look that we live in the fear of our God, and then we may be sure of his help, so as we may live not only among Wasps and Hornets and other such vermin, but also even among Dragons and wild beasts, according as it is said in the fourscore and eleventh Psalm that, when we be in Gods keeping, he will maintain our life in such sort as the things whereof we be most afraid, shall not be able to annoy us. But on the contraire part, if we become his enemies and despise, he needs not to make any great in arming of himself to confound us. For flies will be able enough to execute his vengeance. Thus we see what have to gather upon this place.

Now again Moses confirms the which we have heard, namely that the children of Israel should not be afraid of their enemies. For God is among you, yes, even the strong and terrible God. First of their enemies, and afterward he adds the reason, For God (faith be) is among you. And thirdly he shows what manner a God the same is, to the intent that the people should not doubt but he is might enough, and by comparing him to his creatures, resolve themselves that it ought to fulfill them, if they had him on their side. This is the sum of the things that are said here. Now it seems at the first sight that here is some contrariety. For he had said afore, God will destroy all the enemies whom though fear, and here he forbids them to be afraid. How hang their two together? Whereas he speaks of fear, we have to note that when any danger is apparent and threatens us, we feel the grief thereof, and we must needs be afraid of it, and it cannot be other wise.

Now then in saying that God will destroy all those whom his people were afraid of, Moses means that although the enemies be dreadful of themselves, yet shall not God be hindered destroy them. And again, we have to note also, that God has always born with the faintheartedness of those that are his.

Indeed it was a fault in the people of Israel that, they were afraid of their enemies, for seeing they knew themselves to be in the tuition of their God, they should have defiled all things that might have abashed them. Yet notwithstanding, God berth with that default. And although the people was unwarily to be succored, because of the fearfulness that proceeded of the said infirmity yet did not God cease to hold them still by the hand. Nevertheless if God bear with us, his meaning is not to feed our vice, or to fade us in it, when we have not such stoutness and constancy as is requisite. It is true that God ceases not to have mercy upon us for all that, but however the world go, yet is that fearfulness always worth to be condemned. For let us see from what spring it issues. If we had a persist trust in our God, it would put away fear, and we might define all that ever is against us, accordingly as Saint Paul says, of God be on our side, who stable against us? And David says, If a Million of men of war had besieged me, yet would I not be afraid. Though I were in the darkness of death, yet if I may see God my shepherd, and he show me his sheep hook, I will rest myself upon that and be in quite.

Therefore let us make well, that our Lord shows himself pitiful, when it pleases him to succor us in such infirmity. For he needed to do no more but say in on word, prepare yourselves to receive my grace, and by and by thereupon we ought to embrace his promises and to rest upon them, and to take all our contention in them. But we do not so, and yet notwithstanding he ceases not to bear with us therein. Nevertheless, although he use such gentleness and patience towards us, yet does it not follow that therefore there is no fault in our fearfulness, neither ought we to conclude that we may fall asleep in it, but rather we must quicken up ourselves to say how now wretched creature? Thou distrusts since God. Thou have been as greatly affected as might be and he has succored thee. What means thou by reflecting his goodness after the manner? Thinks though that his benefits have always been lost towards thee, that thou different them through the own leadenness, in that thou does not acknowledge them? For if we acknowledged not Gods benefits as they deserve, surely we should be confirmed by the as I have said already. Then is it not without cause God adds here, that his people should not be afraid of their enemies. True it is that he had said, Thou shall be afraid of them, but there he spoke of the infirmity that he knew to be in his people, which was faulty, for he condemns it as it deserved. And thereupon he adds, Thou shall not be afraid of them. As if he should say, true it is indeed your nature will always be fearful, but yet we must not be afraid, we must withstand such fearfulness. And when we see the multitude of your enemies, it cannot be but that we must be somewhat moved, but yet we must have the buckler of faith to repulse all such fear, and we must think that seeing I have promised to succor you, I will not fail you.

True it is that do what we can, we shall never be so well heartened, but that there will be some as we have heretofore seen. For we ought to hold our selves unto Gods promises, and to assure ourselves of his succor. Surely if we seem never so stout, and there be but one spark of fear in us, we notwithstanding, so we be not overwhelmed with fear, nor quail not, but take courage, and after tossing to and fro, do hold still our own, and enter into the battle, our Lord is contented with us.

Now then, what is to be done? When we perceive any danger, it cannot be but we must have some feeling of it, for otherwise we should be as blocks, and not to be afraid of anything, is no virtue. A drunkard will run upon the sword's point, he will leap out at a window; he will be afraid of nothing and why is that? Because he is out of his right wits. Likewise a mad man will throw himself into the fire or kill himself. Therefore we see that it is no virtue to be without feeling of grief. Nevertheless when we feel the dangers, we must resort to the remind that God gives us.

True is that our life hangs as by a thread, and that there needs not anything to destroy us. But yet how weak focus we be, our Lord has promised to hold us shrouded under his wings, and therefore let us run into him. And seeing he has a care of our life, let us trust thereto, and call upon him as of as we see any ganger like to insure. And for as much as he has promised never to shrink away from us let us approach boldly unto him, and put our trust in him, and then shall we be sensed well enough. For the name of God is an invincible fortress, the righteous will see there to for refuge, and he shall never perish. To the intent therefore, that we may have a steadfast assurance in the middies of danger, let us learn to have recourse immediately to our God, by receiving the promises which he gives us, and they will be a sure and static leaning stock to rest upon. And by that means also God shall be glorified in us.

True it is that we may see some such conceit shall abash us, but yet that fear of ours which we do so conceive, shall be but as an exercise of our faith, and the overcoming thereof shall be the more commendable. Howbeit if we find any difficulty, so as we cannot resolve ourselves at the first then let us assure ourselves there is yet still some infirmity in us, and we would not God his due honor, for as much as we be slow to believe his promises, and stick not to them with a cheerful courage. And therefore let us blame ourselves in that behalf, yea and even be some for it. Notwithstanding, we must not quail though there be infirmity in us, for God will bring all to pass by his own power as shall be declared yet more plainly upon this text, where Moses faith why we must not in any wise fear our enemies.

Now let us come to the reason which he adds, The God (says he) is in the minds of thee. This is the same promise that was given at the beginning, for we must always call to mind what has been treated of heretofore, namely that God tells us not of our own strength, when he wills us to be well sensed with constancy, but calls us back to himself. The end then which we must always begin at, is that we must not think ourselves to have any power, nor be besotted any vain opinion as we see men commonly be in esteeming and flattering themselves, in so much why although they be less than nothing, yet they always imagine this and why of themselves. And yet notwithstanding that imagination is nothing else than an overweening. Also to encourage us with all God uses none other mean but only to say, have an eye to me. If it were in our own selves to truth in him, surely God would not report us any whit at all, for he is not why there should be any virtue in us. But when as he says, have an eye to me, it is a token why we be destitute of all goodness, and that if we fetch and sits our ability thoroughly what it is, we cannot but be abashed at it. True it is that me may well enough flatter themselves for a time, but yet in the end they shall find themselves deceived in their own opinion, and as we see here and have sense heretofore, our lord shows us why we shall never find firm ground to stand upon, until we become into him. And that is why cause why it is said, The God is in the minds of thee. Surely is in an excellent promise that God will be in the minds of us. And for same cause also does he call us his temple, which thing was figured in old time by the Sanctuary. For it was Gods will to have it seated in the middies of all the people, and he kept his residence in such wise in it, as men might perceive his power to be there. Not that he was enclosed in that Ark or in the Tabernacle, but it was his will that the people should have a visible warrant, that they might not doubt at all of him. For such is our rawness, that always to our seeming God turns his back to us, and thinks not upon us, or else that he is too far off from us to succor us with his hand. Therefore it was Gods will that his Sanctuary should be in the minds of his people, as a warrant of his presence and power. True it is that as now we have not that, but we have other helps as convenient for us. And first of all, the things that were figured by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. For seeing that the fullness of the God headed dwells in him, we must not doubt any more but that we have God with us. And for the same cause is he called Emanuel, that is to say God with us. Now then if this promise were made to the people of old time, much more ought we to assure ourselves of it at this day, in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ. And the cause also why he took our nature upon him, was to the end it should be a holy and indissoluble bond of the union wherein it behoves us to put the whole trust of ourselves. And herewith all, we have his promises, and the seals of them in his Sacraments, so when we be thankful of our baptism, thereby the son of God does witness unto us, that we were once clothed with him as says Paul. And when we receive the supper, he shows us that he is our food. And that the bread which we eat, does not nourish us better, than we be nourished by his substance, in so much that we live in him and by him. Again we here how he faith, that where ever two or three be gathered together in his name, he will be in the middies of them. Seeing it is so, let us not think that this was sad along to the children of Israel, but let us understand that the use thereof belongs unto us also at this day. According where unto we see how the Church is called Gods resting place, as is said thereof in the Psalm, and in the eighth Chapter of Esau, where it said that God will do well in the middies of his holy City.

Let us apply all these texts to our use, and let us not doubt God is with us nowadays, yea and that he will not only dwell among us [generally] as in his temple, but also abide in every one of us surely. And that not only to make us feel his power, and to understand that we have our life and moving in him, as S.

Paul says in the Acts, but also to make us perceive that presence of hi, which he has promised to all faithful. Now then he dwells in us, when we feel that he yields us record of his adoption by his holy spirit, so as we can call upon him as our father. And therein does our lord Jesus Christ show that we be members of his body, and that several to himself, no withholds anything from us, but communicates all his graces unto us. Now then let us mark no man can call himself a believer, unless he be thoroughly persuaded God is with him. And all of us in general ought to embrace this promise, that God in the minds of us, especially when we have the preaching of his word, and the order of calling upon him in common, established among us. If we have that once, let us not think that ever we shall be disappointed of the thing that is contained here that is to with that God will do well among us, so as we shall never need to make long journeys to seek him, but we shall find him still ready at hand to succor us. Mark that for one point. Nevertheless it is true that this presence is not perceive by our mother with for it will seem of times that God is very far off from us, or that he has forgot us and cast us up, but it is his will to try our faith and patience by that mean. Howsoever the case stand if we worship him, and have a care to call us on him and to resort unto him to rest upon his goodness, it is a sign that he is near at hand to us. Then if we have a desirousness to resort unto him, and do learn to mount in our adversities, beseeching him to have pity upon us, it is a token that he has not given us over, but that he holds us up with him might hand, so as we do rest upon his power.

We see then how God even in hiding of himself away, ceases not to show himself nor at hand unto us, and that he dwells continually in us. And now we see whereupon we ought to ground ourselves to conceive assured trust : that is to with upon this, that we have God on our side. And that is a good token that we have not anything in ourselves, but that it behaves us to be utterly destitute of all trust and hope, until our Lord have showed himself unto us.

Now although this promise ought to fulfill us: yet notwithstanding, Moses ads one point more, which is not spirituous: namely that God is mighty and terrible. Truly it should see me at the first blush, that this is not spoken to any purpose. For the case concerns the strengthening of the faithful, to as they should pluck up a good heart, and not doubt but they shall discomfort all their foes: now then hereupon to call him a terrible God, should rather serve to scare them out of their wits. For although God mean not to put them in fear: yet do his only majesty so amaze us, as we would fain hide us from his presence if it were possible. In as much then as he terms himself terrible, it should see me that instead of giving us matter of comfort, he intended to drive us away from him. But we must make that Gods terming of himself mightie and terrible, is to end to put us out of doubt that he is strong and mighty young to discomfort all our enemies. For we must always come back to this point, that his showing of himself favorable, merciful and patient towards us, is altogether of his own proper nature: for we know he is our God and favor. For as much then as God is called our God: he will have us to show ourselves to be his people: that is to say, that his receiving of us is with condition, to govern us with his goodness, as shepherded that is careful for his flock, so as his esteeming of us as his children, is because he has adopted us of his own free goodness, and is willing to show himself always father like towards us, by bearing with us in our infirmities. So then, whereas he is termed here a terrible and mighty God, it is not in respect of his own people: but in respect of the unbelievers and infidels. And that is the cause of the often repeating of this word, The everlasting, the God. Moses speaks of it here a four or five times within a little space. Wherefore says he so of the God? To the intent that the people should resort to their covenant. Indeed it were not lawful to praise unto him, unless he called us: but seeing that he of his own good will has covenanted with us to receive us to mercy, and has told us that he will take us for his flock and keep us under his protection: we ought not to be afraid anymore. Then let us learn that we cannot put any trust in God, until we know that he is willing to admit us to him, and that he has already chose us to be his household, and to be under his government. When we have once this promise that he will be our God: then may we well trust in him. For we have taken hold of his courtesy, and that is to the intent we should know, that he will use the same towards us even to the end. How about when we once know the goodness that God utters unto us: we must also on the contraire part consider his power against all our enemies. For why we see we need not anything to scare us or to make us afraid. Indeed if we hear of the promises of Gods goodness, we feel some sweetness in them: but yet if the devil stares up any trouble against us, by and by we be dismayed. As long as it is preached unto us that our life is in Gods hand, and that we be safe when we be under his protection: all is well, we receive that doctrine, and to our own seeming, it has taken good rooting in our hearts: but as soon as the lease is turned, or any danger show itself, where are we then? But had we been well solved and confirmed in the thing that we heard: we should be safe enough, and we would keep on still forward: but we never think more upon that, neither is there any means at all to comfort us. Thus is it a sign that if there happen never so little danger, we doubt of Gods power, and we do him not honor to say, he has promised it, therefore will he perform it, for he is able. And for the same cause S. Paul speaking of Abrahams faith, that he believed even against hope, knowing that he which had made the promise, was also able to perform it. It seems to have been a small matter to say that Abraham believed that God was mighty. For who denies that? And therefore Abraham's faith is not so greatly to be commended in that respect: for there is no man but he confesses it. Yes, yes: but yet for all that, as small a thing as it seems to be, it is a very rare and difficult thing: and that does experience show. For (as I said) if we meet with any crabbed encumbrance, we think there is no God in heaven to succor us any more: and all that ever can be alleged unto us, will be so cold, as we shall find no relief in it. Therefore it is not without cause that Moses here magnifies Gods mighty power, and faith that he is terrible, to the end that the people might thereby assure themselves and say, very well, it is true that we be nothing in comparison of our enemies, but what for that? What manner a one is God? Seeing he faith that he will be our captain, and that we shall be under his protection: what can all the men in the world, or all creatures do? Is there anything that can withstand the power of God? Again, what is his majesty? If he lift to show it they that nowadays are overstated in their own pride, shall out of hand be put to utter confusion. For if God make the mountains and rocks to melt, and the earth to wash away at his presence: what shall become of me with their frailty? Thus we see to what purpose and end we ought to apply this saying, That God is mighty and terrible. It serves not to dismay us: for we know when so ever we resort unto him, we be always received to mercy, his thorn of grace and goodness. Wherefore if we see that our enemies make us afraid, and that (to our seeming) they be as Wolves to swallow us up, and we as sheep in comparison of them: very well, let us resort to our God, and what manner a one is he?

Oh, we must not only conceive his world God: but we must also attribute him his qualities therewithal, namely that he is mighty and terrible: and then let us not be afraid. For all the rage that our enemies do cast and some out, is but a smoke, and God will make it to fade all away, as soon as it pleases him to show his majesty: and we be sure he will do it, because he has promised it. Therefore let us so benefit ourselves by this promise, that whenever we be astonished, or in any doubt or grief of mind, we always have recourse thither and say, Our God is mighty. And why? Wherein will he utter his mightiness? Alas, it is true that he might well utter it in confounding and destroying us: but he is patient, gentle, and meek, and he will not have us to feel his force to our harm: but rather he will have us to feel his passing fatherly goodness. All his desire is to gather us under his wings as a hen that broods her little chickens. And it is a singular comfort unto us, when we know why he will be so loving and favorable towards us, and yet nevertheless will be known to be mighty and terrible in the overthrowing of our enemies, and in overcoming all things that are against us. Therefore let us put our trust therein. But yet therewithal let us beware that we abuse not his promises. For if we will have him to show himself unto us: we under the court of his wings, and not play the wild beasts in running away from him. For the hypocrites will brag well enough that they have God on their side: but yet for all that, they think away from him, and let him alone. Now then let us learn to go in such wise to our God, as we may trust in him and repose ourselves upon him. And in so doing, let us bear in mind what he commands and examine ourselves according to his word: and then shall we find by experience, that he meant not to be guile us, when he told us why he would be in the minds of us mighty and terrible to discomfort our enemies.

Now by the way Moses adds an exception saying: that God will not destroy all the enemies of his people out of hand. And why? Lest the beast of his field (faith he) should let themselves against the: but should we need them out by little and little. Though shall dispatch even their kings: and so be shores, show that not leave anything at all of those nations. Here Moses gives the people a very necessary warning, in telling them after what manner they should proceed. For otherwise they might have taken some evil conceit at their coming into the land of Canaan: and if they had not rooted out their enemies immediately all at once: they might have imagined with themselves, what is become of Gods promises? It should seem that he has mocked us. Therefore does Moses hold them in away, saying: It is true that your God will discomfort all your enemies but yet shall not that be done so soon as you would wish, howbeit assure yourselves there is good reason that he should so deal with you, and therefore put no distrust in your God. For he see that the land would be replenished with wild beasts, and they would be for many enemies to make war upon you. God then does this to your benefit, in that he will not have the whole land to be utterly ride of all enemies. For if your enemies should be all destroyed immediately upon you coming into the land: you could not replenish it again upon the sudden, to defend yourselves from the wild beasts. Now we have to note here, first that God intended to correct the people overreact has, by showing them that they should hold themselves in peace and quiet, until God had put them in full possession of the whole land. For it is the proper nature of faith to pray Gods leisure, as the Apostle assumes in the Epistle to the Hebrews, alleging this text of Abacus, that if God delay the performance of his promises, we must try his leisure, and not be overhasty: for they shall come to pass time enough, that is to say, Then let us mark that faith cannot be in us without patience, that is to wise, without tarrying of Gods leisure till it please him to execute the thing that he has spoken and said, and without assigning or setting of any term as men commonly do, who are so bold as to take upon the to make God subject to their will. Let us beware of such over stateliness, and let us rather learn to bridle ourselves, till God dispose of things accordingly as he gave sentence of them assure by his own mouth. And that accords with this saying of the Prophet Esau: Our power shall be in silence and rest. Then must we be still and quiet. If we intend to do God honor to trust in him, and to show why we do it unfoundedly. And here our Lord had a regard to bridle his people. Forasmuch (faith he) as much affections are overhasty and heady: let's not give you though your enemies be not destroyed all out of hand. Let us make also, that here God meant to show the reason why he disserves and delays the performance of the things that determines, and brings them not to pass out of hand. Truly he is not bound to it. Should God give us an account of his doings? If he work not after our liking, is he bound to tell us why? Ought not we rather to stop to him, and to say, Yeah Lord, we be ignorant, yeah and even stark blind, and it belongs to the only to be wise? Forasmuch as there is nothing vanity in us: rule though us according to the providence. It were meet that we should deal after the fashion: but we see how God yields to our rawness. For inasmuch as we be tickles, and cannot find in our hearers to be contented with his pleasure, and to rest wholly upon it: here he shows us a reason for it. So then let us mark well inestimable goodness of our God. In abasing himself so far, as to show us the reason why he does things. According as Moses tells why people of Israel here.

For he has an eye to your benefit, least why wild beasts should devour you: for they would multiply and there be not folk now of you to manure why whole land but there would be drivers places which should uninhibited. Know why therefore that whereas your God destroys not all your enemies out of hand, it is for your benefit, and it were not expedient for you that it should be otherwise. And so in effect Moses tells the people here, that Gods delaying to give them full victory, was to their benefit and welfare. Therefore let us mark well, that if God make not such hast as we would have him, he has an eye to our welfare, so as he procures the thing that is best for us, though we perceive it not at the first. True is that we win ourselves to be wise and well advised and thereupon we take upon us to judge that God overflow, and we would say trust him forward straight ways by the shoulders to cause him to make more haste. But (as I said) that is because we know not what is good for us. But we imagine that we be beguiled every turning of a hand. God therefore must be wise for us, and see more clearly than we do, and dispose things, not after our liking but after as he himself knows to be good. And in the meanwhile we must trust our eyes, and do nothing but glorify him in his providence. And if we pursue no at the first why he works after that faith on: well, let us try patiently till he show us why he made delay and would not satisfy our desires. This doctrine cannot be fully declared as now, but yet must we make an abridgement of it to conclude withal. Likewise nowadays we may happen to languish all our life long. Now if we should hasten God to deliver us: what a thing was it? We would be in a paradise here a forehand: and that were the next way to rock us asleep in the world. God therefore is trying to wake us by keeping us occupied with store of troubles and vexations: and that makes us to long continually for the heavenly life. We forget this at the first: but GOD makes us to perceive how frail we be, by waiting with all patience and humiliate, to be governed by him as he thinks good. Finally he shows how greatly it is for our benefit to be beaten with his rods. And therefore does he makes us to pass through many troubles and to be greatly vexed and tormented. And if there were none other enemies to withstand us than do well enough with them, for they be men. But we be daily assaulted by the devil: and we would then overcome them at the first push, and obtain victory against Satan, and against all the temptations of the world. But what a thing were that? Our pride would be intolerable, we would not pass to call anymore upon God, nor to sigh and mourn for our own weakness, we should not tell what it were to dislike of ourselves, nor to understand that there is none which has all power in him but only God. So then although God have assured us that we shall have the upper hand of all our enemies yet shall not be performed at first burnt. And why? Because it were not good for us. True it is that wild beasts would not come and devour us: but we have pride and vainglory, and we be with self-winding. And that over lustiness would carry us away, so as we should fall asleep in our vanities and delights, and that would be worse to us than all the wild beasts in the world. And therefore let us assure ourselves, that Gods leisurely working, as it were by degrees and by line and by level: is to our benefit. For could he belated to accomplish all his work in one minute of an hour? No: but he lifts not to do it so soon. And therefore let us learn to keep the spiritual rest or Sab. Both as it is spoken of in the fifth chapter, that is to say, to imprison our wish, reason and will, and is to say, all that ever we have besides, and to hold them in such away, as none but only God may have the rule of us, and dispose of all things at his will. And moreover, let us go on when he leads us the way. For that is no breaking of the Sabot. To occupy ourselves service man in the charge that God calls him unto , and to do our duties faithfully every man in his vocation, according to the measure of grace that GOD has given him, are the works of God, and we must understand that it is God which works them in us. But yet for all that we must not be too hasty. As who should say that God were at our commandment or that we would have him do what we list and when we list: but all our wisdom must be to submit ourselves to his will. The thing then which we have to remember upon this text that we may fare the better by it: is that we must learn to be obedient to our God all the time of this our mortal and transitory life, not doubting but that at length he will vanquish Satan and all that is against us, and turn even those things to our benefit and salvation. Which we think as now to be harmful and harmful to us. Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of ourselves, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, for as we may be drawn to a right repentance, and learn more and more to distrust ourselves and to settle trust in him: and that when we have embraced his promises, we may fare the better by them by applying ourselves to his service, so as we may not be unprofitable in the world, but that as soon as his spirit dwells in us, it may forthwith avail us, and show by the effect that he had not adopted us in our Lord Jesus Christ, so as we may grow in the same knowledge more and more till he have thoroughly accomplished it in us, and that we have the full measure of it, whereof we have but a very small portion as now. That is ay please him to grant this grace not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth and et cetera.

seventh Chapter

22. 23. 24. And the Lord & c.

25. You shall burn the images of their Gods with fire. And neither count me take those to the gold or silver that is upon them, for fear least it turn to the decay. For such things are abominations to the Lord your God.

26. Therefore those shall not bring any abomination into thin house, least that thyself become accursed as well as it. But those shall abhor it and it utterly: for it is a cursed thing.

Yesterday I began to show that we must be constant unto the end in trusting unto God, and in holding of ourselves to his promises, though the thing that he speaks be not performed out of hand, nor his determination put in execution by and by: for he has always good reason to make delay thereof. True it is that we perceive it not far. We see even among men, that such as have had long time, and have had most experience of things, have most stay of themselves, and are not so hasty to do and attempt things, as younger folks are, which cast no perils but run all on head. A young man having a whole brain, will needs dispatch all things out of hand in one day. But he has some stay of himself by reason of much experience, will look about him how to dispose his matters, and to do his things in good order. Now there is no comparison between God and men. It is not to be said that he is and old expert artificer (as men term it): for all things are ever present unto him, and ever have been since the creation of the world: and again, his will is the rule of all wisdom and right. Since it is so, let us forbear to be overhasty, and if it please him to let us linger for a time, let us bear it patiently. Moreover have to not the thing that was declare yesterday in a word or twice that is to wit, the if GOD deliver us not from all troubles and vexations out of hand: it is through our fault. For as soon as one mischief is part, we procure another to come in the neck of it. This is not to be waited upon God nor upon the state of the life wherein we be. But we ourselves are so fruitful in bringing force of evil, that although God purge us of never so gain, and yield manifold increase by and by after. That (say I) proceeds of our sinfulness. And therefore let us mark well, that if God let us not in quiet at the fist dash, but suffer us to have enemies to grieve us and vex us: it is because it is not for our benefit, nor for our salvation, that he should maintain us in too great ease. And for proof thereof (as I said) we could well find in our hearts to amend the evil in other folks, but we think not upon it in ourselves and yet is that end which we ought to begin at. If we will be good to condemn other men's faults: we must first look to our own: and we must not only be think us of those which are known to us: but we must also pass yet further, to crave pardon of God for the selves. And besides that, let us be well advised. That we proceed sober in that behalf. For it may come to pass, that he which shall have showed some good zeal in chastising the fault of his neighbor, shall not only fall into the like then that we be so involved unto evil, let us understand that it is good for us that God should exercise us after the manner that Noses speaks of here. For the wild beasts need not to come to work us displeasure, or to pick out our eyes: we have annoyances and deceits in ourselves. Why then is it that our Lord suffers us to be so for vexed and troubled outwardly by me: but because we have as it were an host within us, ranged in array against God and his law. Therefore is he fain to stop us and to keep us occupied by other men: and that is our benefit.

Furthermore, God is fain to leave us still in our infirmities, because that if he should give us the full perfection, there is none of us all but he would advance himself too much and be too proud. It is certain that we have victory already against Satan, as it was purchased for us in person of our Lord Jesus Christ: but yet must we be fain to endure many encounters, and many rough assaults, yea and to be brought to so great perplexities as we shall not vote which way to turn us, but we shall have over much adore to withstand our own vices, and the great number of imperfections that are in us. And why is that? Even to humble us. Indeed we have a promise that God will vanquish our feet, as S. Paul speaks of it in the sixteenth of the Romans: But yet shall not that be done at the first day: to the intent we may have cause to praise God, in that we see ourselves so frail, and yet he gives us strength to hold on our way still continually.

You see then that we must keep still our way in walking through this world: for it is a journey as the scripture terms it. Now the, let us fully determine with ourselves to suffer it patiently, if God delay to give us full victory of our enemies, even of our ghostly enemies, assuring ourselves that he does it not without any cause. But yet must we be fully persuaded of another point also, namely that although we linger a long time, and thing be out of order as in respect of the world, and God enlighten us not, but let us alone in great distress: yet he will give us the upper hand in the end. We must be fully resolved of that:

for without such certainty we could not have any courage one minute of an hour, but we should quail out of hand, and it would seem to us that the devil should overwhelm us. And especially when we were to fight against our own lusts, how might we get the upper hand of them? And if we find ourselves so cumbered today: what shall we find tomorrow? The mischief will increase continually: and the great number of our own experiences do show us that we need none other thing to overthrow us. Then could we not hold out, unless we were fully and thoroughly out of doubt that the promise of God should be wholly accomplished unto us, and in the end our enemies shall not be able to stand before our faces. Therefore let us fight boldly against Satan, and against all the lusts of our own flesh: and we shall overcome them, so we have Jesus Christ for our Captain. For we must be hopeless as in respect ourselves and not imagine that our own strength can suffice: but we must learn to call upon him that is able to help us at our need. That is the thing which we have to bear in mind yeah and even in respect of this present life. Let us not doubt but that although e be fain to pass through many miseries, yet notwithstanding all shall turn to our benefit and welfare in the end. Let us bear this saying well in mind, so as we may fare the better by it, yeah even in such sort as we yield not to murmur against God, though he grunt not our desires at the first. And in so doing we shall have invincible constancy to keep on our way full though it seem never so hard unto us. And although we see never so many perils: yet shall we have such constancy, as to hold on still till we become to our ways end. For why? Gods promising of us to give us full victory, is not to disappoint us: he is faithful in his sayings. Nevertheless, if it please him to make as though he regarded not things, we must not take up on us to set him any term, but let him dispose matters according to his own infinite wisdom.

Yeah and Moses says that even Kings shall be delivered into the people of Israel's hands. As if he should say, that there is not any power or strength so great that ought to dismay us. And this saying is not added without cause. For everything of nothing will dazzle our eyes., and make us to forget the mightiness of Gods promises. For if we perceive any greatness in men and that our enemies are of ability to trouble us: we bear ourselves on hand that all is and by we behalf straight at it. True is that our presumptuousness blinds us overmuch, so as we perceive not the dangers when we be once minded to follow our own foolish rashness. But when we should obey God, and do our duty: the whisking of a fly over thwart our faces will turn us away by and by. For this cause does Moses say expressly, that we must not be dismayed for any greatness of the world. In so much that although our enemies shine as the Sun, although they perk up never so high, means wherewith to overwhelm us at the first brunt: yet must we not be discouraged for all that. And why? Let us consider what Gods hand is, and then will all things vanish away which we fear as in respect of the world, so as we shall see that it is but vanity. For who is he that can withstand him that made all things still by his power? Cannot our Lord as well bring all things to naught, as he made the world of nothing? Yes: and when so ever he lifts to do it, it is enough for him to speak the word, that is to say to utter his will. Now then, seeing that the creatures have not any state or being furthermost than God to maintain them, can they stop the bringing to pass of his good purpose? No: and therefore let us learn to yield God so much honor, as to make none account of all worldly greatness, strength, and power, in comparison of him, and to know that he can cast them all down when he thinks good. Look what we have to mark. And thereby we may see what a happiness it is to be able to rest upon God. For when men stay upon their own strength, although they vaunt themselves, flatter themselves, and besot themselves never so much in their own presumption: yet is it a wonder to see how they be toppled down in the turning of a hand: and God also laughs their pride to scorn. But when we have the ground of Gods promises to rest upon, which assure us that we can never quail: then may we be bound to define the world and all the creatures therein. And although we be nothing of ourselves: yet shall we have enough whereof to glory, and we may well triumph a forehand, for as much God is on our side. But what? We see that men are so wedded to themselves, as they cannot by any means be rid of this devils overweening wherewith they be as it were bewitched, but that they will ever be drawing of somewhat to themselves, insomuch that it is impossible to pluck them back unto God, and to make them to ground and settle themselves upon him. But yet is not this doctrine written in vain. And therefore let us understand thereby, and we linger in a number of torments in this world: it is to exercise us withal. And why?

To the end that every of us should examine himself to amend his faults, and not stick so much another men's faults [as to forget our own,] but to think upon ourselves first, and consider that we have need to be handled roughly, so as we shall no sooner have escaped one trouble, but we shall by and by meet with another, unless we turn again to him that is able to defend us. Therefore, we must shape ourselves to it all our life long, and behave ourselves after such a sort, as we have our eyes continually fastened upon our God, assuring ourselves that his executing of his judgments in our sight, is to the end to hold us in awe, and to make us beware that we entangle not ourselves in our lewd lusts to abide in them: for they be too dangerous enemies. Let us beware we resemble not those whom we see that God could not able, and let us conclude thereupon, that the same matter concerns us, that is to with, that we must profit ourselves by such instruction. Thus we see in effect what we have to mark upon this text of Moses.

Now he adds immediately, that the Israelis must bear all the Images of thief Gods in the fire, and not so much as causes the gold and silver of them: for fear (faith he) least those best snared by it, or that is none to the decay. For the Hebrew word that Moses uses here, signifies sometimes to be snared, and sometimes to stumble by meeting with some wicked job or stop. And he used a word derived of the same verb therefore when he said, keep themselves from their idols, for that will be the decay, or that will matter all: which two sayings come both to one end. And therefore why see we must not stand upon terms, it is enough for us that we know the true meaning of them. Here God warns his people, that if they cast any liking to the idols of the heathen or to the thins that served their super fictions: it will turn to their overthrow like a snare, so as they shall be caught and snarled in it, and to be short, it will be as a pit for them to fall headlong into. That is the effect of the matter which is told us there. And now again he adds a second threat, GOD will immediately come in with it. This is the piece of the things which we have to mark here. The matter in question, is that the people should not commit idolatry: but GOD adds a farther commandment of greater rigor: which is, that they should burn all that ever had served about the idols, though there were no superstition in them. As how? If the people should have taken to themselves the Gold, Silver, Precious stones, or other jewels that were about the idols: it had been as a filthiness that is loathsome in Gods sight. And if they should have alleged, we do it not for any devotions sake, for we know it was a heinous matter to have abused God's creatures after that fashion: but we take them to our own use, yeah and even to serve GOD withal [that allegation would not have gone for payment] For God on the contraire part will have them to be all burned. And so we see how greatly he is displaced with idolatry, in that folk are so fairly forbidden here to apply any of all the things to their own use, which shall have been aforesaid with superstition, and there upon must we also note, that he is most chare of above all other things. We will then direct our life after such a sort as God may allow of it? Let us look that we honor him, yeah and that we honor him after such manner, as we seek not to have some fair show of virtue only to the world ward: but to follow simply whatever God ordains. For we may seem to be as Angels of Paradise and yet in the meanwhile God shall esteem us as devils. Though awe live never so honestly and un- blamably among me: yet does it not follow therefore we be discharged be in stealing away my neighbor's gold and silver: to what purpose shall that serve me, if I rob God of his honor? Though I be no thief to me, yet am I a false traitor of God. If I speak not of any mortal man and yet fall to blaspheming of the living God: what a dealing is why? Now then let us mark the faults which are committed against Gods Majesty. And it is a lesson which we ought to mark well: for we see that men make small account of it nowadays. If any wrong be done to a man, the party must be condemned for it. But if Gods glory be deseed, and himself all the ways that can be: what for that Men do but wring their mouths aside at it, with who finds any fault with me for it? And In the meanwhile God has no man to take his part, but there are now we will take part against him. If any blaspheme, and outrage, any lewdness, or any wickedness be committed, therein Gods word is openly trodden under foot. Hardly shall a man find one among a hundred, we will put forth himself to maintain Gods quarrel and yet his doing of it shall be but coldly neither. But why wicked shall always find champions now, to fight against God and his righteousness. And yet for all why we consider not in so doing against God and that is too hard a match for us, so as we shall be driven to feel that he is so hard a stone, why whosoever rushes against him, does but go about to burse and break himself in pieces: and finally if it fall, it will quash them all to fitters set themselves against him. Then let us mark that it is not enough for us to have lived with our neighbors without doing any wrong or harm: for God makes more account of his honor than he does of all the things in the world. Therefore the offences that are committed against his Majesty, are why of all other. And why? There is not a more precious and dear thing that his service. And that does he show us here, in that we see he will have the pureness of his service maintained, undefiled of any superstition. And he can so ill away with idolaters, that he cannot abide the things which had been dedicated to idolatry before times, should be suffered to remain in the world, but will have them rid away quite and clean. And hereupon we may gather what vengeance is prepared for such as have perverted and the pure religion. Although they allege never so fair excuses, and pretend to have done it upon good intent as they term it: yet will not GOD receive those things for payment. And why? For he will have obedience above all things: and he knows which is the true rule of serving him well and duly: he has showed us it, and therefore we must hold us to it. Otherwise we may well protest that our intent is to serve GOD: howbeit our service is not done to him but unto idols, when we invent what we ourselves think good. As for example, whereas the Papists protest, that their meaning is to serve GOD with their Masse, and with all other their baggage and Ceremonies: it is true that they may well rest thereupon confusedly: but in the meanwhile God disclaims and dislikes every with of it: for it is the devil whom they serve indeed. And why? For there is not anything there, which is not manifestly found to be against Gods word and his truth, therefore it is not enough to pretend Gods name: (for we see that the world has not ceased to abuse that fair color at all times:). But we must hold us to Gods commandment: for without that, there is nothing but utter corruption.

And now let us mark well the reason that Moses adds: that is to with that it shall be as a snare to catch the people, or that it shall be overthrow. Here we have to mark, first of all what our frailty is. For although we mind not to do evil at the first dash: yet will it amaze us to see how the devil will have entrapped us out of hand, by his wills which we perceived not. Most commonly, if a man be told of his fault when he has done amiss: he thinks not (to his own feeling) that his doings are evil, and why? Because he perceived it not. Surely if we were well advised, we should espy Satan's guiles a far off: and it is a point of wisdom which Saint Paul attributes to the faithful. You (faith he) do know his wills, so as we can beware of ourselves to be governed by Gods spirit, which gives them good discretion and audiences: but as for us, we felt our eyes willfully, and bear ourselves on hand that it is enough for us so we know not the evil. But we be not competent Judges in our own case. And again our own affections blind us, and areas towels to keep us from seeing three fingers broth before our noses. Yet notwithstanding we need not to be hampered in Satan's snares, so as he holds us as his pray, by cause we be not watchful enough in taking good heed to ourselves, accordingly as Moses shows us here, in telling the people that if they took to them the riches of the heathen, and the gold and silver of their idols: all would turn to their decay. And this is not said without cause. For when we meet with the furtherance of idolatry, for as much as we be given there to already by nature: it is a wonder to see how soon we be snarled in it. For the devil shows us not his snares at the first, until we be fallen into them. But GOD who foresees all things, warns us of them a forehand, to the end we should wake and keep good watch, and not give Satan any entrance to win us to him or entrap us. So then let us mark generally, that to keep ourselves from all offence against GOD, we must prevent the occasions of evil. For he that castes himself headlong into any hazard, tempts GOD. We be not so strong as to be able to outstand evil, when we fall to jostling against it. For we see how we be daunted at every shadow of it: and what will become of us when we shall be put to the pinch? Seeing then that men do feel such frailty in themselves: they ought not to seek occasions. For if a man sling himself willfully into the fire, does he not make open war against God? Yes: as even so do we, when we take occasions to do evil. If a man yield to a thing seems not to be any great vice at the first he perceives not, howbeit he proceeds from the lesser to the greater, and from evil to worse, until at last he fall into the ditch. Men shall not perceive at the first, that daunting is a bear of whoredom and a trick of bawdry to mare all. Men perceive not all the first, that wanton songs serve to impact and corrupt good manners, as the scripture speaks of them: and therefore they think not of it. Men perceive not playing and gaming are dangerous, or rather mischievous, yeah and that they serve to destroy men's houses and to make havoc of all: they be as a seed or root when all ungodliness grows to spite GOD with all: that they breed all of naughtiness: that they be a mean to impoverish such as otherwise might bear and honest port and countenance: and to be short, that they be means to make Christians to become bruit beasts. Men perceive not all these things, neither make they account to keep themselves from them, but yet for all that, the devil is the founder of them, who increases the mischief continually, and God also does give him the bridle: because we vouchsafe not receive the warning that he gives us, we be worthy to perish and to tumble into the pit to break our necks. Now to God ward, that may lead us to destruction, we must also shun the occasions of them a far off. Mark that for one point.

And above all things, forasmuch as we have such a cursed inclination of nature, that idolatry is as it were rooted in us, so as every of us is able to keep a school of it, and to be doctors of it without any further teaching. Therefore does it stand us on hand to shun all furtherance thereof. Now then whereas some nowadays will needs row between two strains, and bear folk in hand that men may bear with the time, grounding that men may well cut off the things that are utterly intolerable and manifestly against God, but yet [avouching] that the things may well be born with, which are either in different ought not utterly evil. I say that they which speak after that fashion, to show full well that they have no right meaning in them nor indeed is said that there should be any such a formation as where meet to be had. And yet notwithstanding, the world is full of such disguisers which would find have it party-colored fashion of serving God, and their religion that were neither fish nor flesh (as men say) but half of one suite and half of another, as is said in the proverb. But for our part, let us understand, that inasmuch as we be given to our idolatry, it stands us on hand to flee the further from it, that we meet not with any of the things that may lead us to it. For if there be anything that may draw us the way, by and by we be seduced, yes, and we be infected with it inwardly, like a man that has a sacred disease within he which he receives not and yet is nevertheless but rather that the more in danger because the mischief is unexpired, even so is it with us, if we retain still the furtherance and patience of idolatry and superstition, we shall be overtaken unawares by Satan's subtler which we marked not. Thus you see what we have to remember, considering the snares and traps that draw us to destruction as Moses speaks of here.

Now let us come to the second threat which he adds. He says, it is an abomination [or loathsomeness] before God: and therefore that every man must be whereof the bringing in of such an abomination for fear of being accused. It should seem hear that God's rigor was too great in forbidding the use of gold and silver. For they not God's good creates is and such as they may be put to good use? And although some men have abused the things which God did put into their hands, does it follow that they have the power to defile his creatures, and to corrupt and mar them? No, for we hear how Saint Paul says, that all things are pure and clean to such as have clean consciences before God: and there is no uncleanness, but that which proceeds of ourselves. How is it then that he forbids folk to covet that gold or silver? Let us mark that this law is a part of the ancient order where to God meant to bind the Jews: and I have told you already that the ten verses have one everlasting rule, which God has given to continue to the world's end. If we mind to have a doctrine that shall please and like God, our life must be comfortable to the law that is contained in the ten commandments: albeit, this present commandment served but for an order: like as when Christian magistrates make laws nowadays, are they against God's word? No, but they do it in way of government and civil order, that their people maybe held the better in the fear of God and in the right religion. Now then this law whereby God forbad the coveting of gold and silver, served but for a time. For God trained up that people like little babies. And Saint Paul alleges the same similitude, which may be as a solution to the doubt that might be moved upon this present place. When little children under tutors and governors, they be held in the straighter awe, and they enjoyed it not their goods and liberty at their own will, insomuch that the state seems to be a bondage and yet notwithstanding they be free, yes and their heirs to, but they be not of age to have the guiding and governing of themselves. Even so the people of old time wherein straighter subjection under the law, than we be nowadays [under the Gospel] by reason whereof it is lawful for us to use the things which we may put to a good use. For otherwise the Papists might starve us. They would fall to making of their conjuring upon corn and wine: now if we might not be so bold as to eat of the con that were so charmed, or to drink of the wine that where so conjured: if we might not touching the thing which they had defiled with their pelting trash: we should be fine to starve for hunger. But they have not any power or the creatures of God, insomuch that they continue pure of themselves, spite of all their abominations. Nevertheless it was God's will to hold the people of old time in awe, after the manner of young children as I said before. But he has given us greater liberty at this day. And what manner of liberty? Not a licentious liberty to do what we list: For S. Paul adds that exception, that although we have greater liberty nowadays than the Jews had, yet must we not therefore lay the bridle on our necks: but we must have a special care to behave ourselves honestly and to be constantly in serving God purely. For as I said, we shall always be weak and may easily swerve aside to idolatry: and therefore we must cut off locations thereof. And yet notwithstanding, we may use the things that are good of themselves: yes, so we do it without giving any cause of opens, and beware that the white every of all that may induce us that he will and to the corrupting of God's service. That is the thing which we have to remember upon this place. For it behooves us to mark well assemble is that is between us and the Jews and the diversity that is between [the liberty of] the law, and the liberty that God gives us nowadays. But yet must we moderate this liberty in such sort, as it turned not into looseness to give over ourselves to evil knowing that we be but too much inclined there to, and we should be yet much more provoked to it, if we would needs have furtherance and seek occasions thereof. And in this respect was Achab stoned to death for stealing of the baggage that was about the puppets [of the Canaanites].

Surely his intent was not to build any altar with them: but he was led to it by his covetousness, [which made him believe] that if he could filch and convey them away cleanly he should save so much by it. But all the people were fine to be accursed for it, until it was betrayed. Lots were cast: and when Joshua had made him to hold up his hand to put him to his oath, saying, My son give glory to God: immediately upon his confessing of the crime whereof he was accused, he was stoned to death, only for stealing of certain of the things that had been forbidden. Let that he had not robbed any person, he might well have said can complain of me? But he had done against God's commandments. Therefore let us all mark well, that whereas God deals more freely with us nowadays, so as we may use the things that were cast defiled by the unbelievers, and which have been applied before times to superstition: we nevertheless must cast away all that ever may draw us to evil. For if we should keep still images and such other like things: it the next way to pull us still some evil inconvenience, so as men might conceive some hope of returning against us superstitions of the time fast. And therefore let us beware of all such things.

Now whereas it is said, Beware you bring not cursedness into your house: hereby we be put in mind that instead of going forward and of profiting ourselves we not only go back, but also what: overthrow, when we use and lawful means and such as displease God. And that is a very notable rule. True it is that the matter which Moses speaks of here, is idolatry and his face that whomsoever they be which to take to themselves the gold and the silver that has served to that purpose: they shall be failed the houses and provoke God's wrath, and instead of gathering treasure to their profit, they shall but rake up a fire to consume all that they have in the end. That is Moses' meaning. But we both may and ought to gather a general doctrine upon this matter: namely that whereas it is said, that it is bringing of our cursedness into our house is, it serves to show us that when men the managing to benefit themselves by the they do but provoke God's wrath against themselves and throw themselves head long into destruction. As how? There that heap up goods by hook and by crook, they that pill and poll, they that eat up and devour, they that filch all that comes in their way, they that use craft and subtlety to take other men's goods to them: do bear themselves in hand that they work wonders, and that they shall build the houses and make immortal monuments not only of wood and stone, but also of everlasting renown, so as their children shall have whereof to triumph after their decease. But yet for all their gathering and heaping up of goods, what do they? They do but pile up a stack of wood and coal, where underlies God's wrath as a fire hidden within it. Indeed it shall not kindle at the first day: but in the end the flame will burst out, so as all shall be consumed anon after. Now if we did mark this well, surely we would not bring God's curse into our houses as we do, and as most men do. What is to be done then?

First and foremost let us mark, that all such as defile themselves with Church theft, cannot escape the punishment which Moses denounces in this place. I say that all they be Church robbers, which have taken to them the goods of the Church, of which sort are the priests, the Monks, and the rest of the stinking rabble of the popish clergy, who have devoured and still do devour all that was dedicated to God. Now then, if we also do the like: shall it not be next way to bring God's curse into our houses? Yes surely. Therefore let us not us offend in the same things which we have condemned in then that lived amiss: but let us keep ourselves from them. And if we intend to prosper, let us assure ourselves there is none other means thereof that the blessing of God. But we know that God has not promised his blessing to any other, than such as travel faithfully for their living, and earth their bread with rightful Labor: which offering of and wrong, but content themselves with their mean state, so as if they be reached they commit not more and more all they be poor, they be contented with their estate. To such folk has God promised his blessing. Now if I do otherwise, so as they beguile my neighbor, so as they be crookedly, so as I labor to enrich myself by violence and robbery: what do I then? Should I look for the blessing that God has promised? We must not think to bind him, when we fall to spiting of him so willfully: not to have his blessing light upon us when we fall to straying out the right way, shaking off his yoke and bridle from our neck: but we must contrariwise look that he should curse us and that his wrath should light upon us and not only upon ourselves but also upon our children. And so we see that instruction we ought to gather upon this place. Namely that every of us ought to look to himself and that if we purpose to have God to keep us through his favor and goodness: our houses must not be defiled with robbery and the seat, neither must our hands be imbrued stealing and filching: but to be short, we must be clean from all spots. Yes, and we must beware that we keep that the order which our Lord has commanded us, which is that he which is desirous to be blessed in his own person and in his household, must look well to it that God be served and honored in his house, that there be no filthiness lurking anywhere, that there be no whoredom, no swearing, nor no other disorder, that there be not anything against God, nor any evil bolstered or born out. If we do so, then shall we prosper better than we do: and although things fall not out as we would wish to the world ward: yet will God grant us the grace to be contented with his only blessing, which will satisfy us more than if we had all the heaps of gold and silver that were possible to be imagined. But on the contrary part, if a man have not a care to keep his house pure and clean as a temple of God: the thing that Moses speaks here must needs be performed, that is to know, God's curse must come into it, accordingly as it is said in the prophet Zachary, that this same curse possessed all the houses of that time, because equity reigned in then and departed not from them.

Will we then have God to shed out his blessing upon us? Let us be sure that we cleanse both ourselves and our houses from all filthiness: and then will the curse depart from thence out of hand. But if we cease not to provoke God's wrath by abusing his patience too long, he will kindle a fire that shall never be quenched. And if we shall still asleep, he will wake us to our cost and when we think ourselves to be escaped, then shall we be new to begin. And therefore let us be circumspect to present the mischief, especially we be warned, yes and warned by our God himself. Where in he showed us what a care he has both of our worldly welfare and of our salutation.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to yourself to make us feel the better than we have done, so as it may make us to resort unto him and to be sorry for our sins and to
