condemn them and that we be not so forward as to spite him and to harden ourselves but that we may have a meek and playable heart to receive all his warnings and corrections in such wise, as we may have the skill too far the better by them. And so let us say, Almighty God heavenly father et cetera.

On Thursday the fifteenth of August 1555

The 58th sermon which is the first upon the eight Chapter

1. Keep all the commandments which I have commanded you this day to do them: that you may live and increase, and go in and possess the land by right of inheritance, which the Lord swore to your fathers.
2. And be mindful of all the way where through the Lord my God had made me to walk these forty years in the wilderness: to the intent to afflict and try me, that he might know what is in your heart, and see whether you would keep his commandments or no.
3. He afflicted you, and made you to endure hunger, and fed you with manna which neither you, nor your fathers knew, to make me to know that man lives not only by bread, but that man lives by all that ever comes out of the mouth of the Lord.
4. The raiment has not won upon me, neither had your food been swollen all these forty years.

Here again Moses showed people, God gave not his law in vain, but that his will is to have it kept and that is the way for us also to share better by it. True it is that whensoever any man speaks to us in God's name, we must have our ears open to hear what is told us: for by that mean does faith come. But yet must we bring our hands and feet with us also, to offer them obediently unto God and to employ all the power that he had given us in his service. Therefore let us not come hither only to have our ears beaten with the things that are preached unto us: but let us also apply them to ourselves. Instruction must be matched with practice: or else we shall never know what had been showed to bear in mind. Moreover let us mark, that Moses think it is not enough to have said these things at once and away: but he repeat them again for a larger confirmation. Look, said, he, that you keep the commandments which I given you not to the end you must know them at your fingers end or be able to utter them with your mouth: that is not enough. But you must put them in execution. And to confirm this matter the better, he added a promise saying that you must live and increase and go into the land which the Lord your God did swear unto your fathers. This has been expounded already here to for and there remain no more to do but only to renew the remembrance thereof according also as we see that was the intent of Moses or rather of Holy Ghost. Now the, our Lord allures us to him by promises, of purpose to give us better courage to serve him and he do it of his own free goodness without being bound there to. For he needed no more but to say the word: he had authority to command us what he lived and it is our part to obey him. Why then does he had his promises, but to win us by lovingness like a father, who though he have all sovereignty over his child, does the nevertheless gentleness in promising, to intent his child should serve him with the cheerful heart? True it is that the child is bound thereto beforehand by nature: but yet when he sees his father so right towards him, as to offer him more than his duty: it moves him the more, if he be not too unkind and lewdly disposed.

Therefore let us learn that in this case God stoops to us, as if he were a moral man. Yet is not that any derogation to his majestic, but rather a record of his infinite goodness in that he said not his right with rigor, but forbidden it and apply himself after that fashion unto us, does the things which he knows to be meet for our rudeness. And therefore whenever we hear that God promised to prosper us, if we honor and serve him. Let us understand his so doing is of free goodness, to win us the better and because he is love to rigor towards us as he might do. But yet for all this, we must not imagine that he is bound to yield as any recommence or reward for our service. For it is not for us to enter into account in this behalf, as though we could win anything by it, but we must receive whatsoever he offered us as of his free gift, knowing ourselves to be so much the more bound unto him.

Moreover let us mark what had been told us therefore, namely that the land which Moses promised here unto the people had been promised already four hundred years before, when none of them all was yet borne and therefore God had not an eye to any of their desirers. But now he said that they should enjoy the promise which God had made them of his own mere goodness. And so we have together in effect, that all you ever we receive at Gods hand, springs out of none other fountain than only his mere mercy because he is good, because he had pity upon us because he had not any respect to our worthiness but only to himself and because it pleased him to be dutiful towards us. Mark for a special point but yet for all you if we will well enjoy his benefits, if we will have them audible to our solution and if we will have the continual possession of them, we on our side must look to answer to grace by God that with us. And how shall we answer it? Merely not by thinking away from him, nor by refusing things he offers us to draw us to him. But by knowing the right and lawful use of the benefits which he bestowed upon us so as we love him and glorify him for them and every of us spend himself in his service. Therefore whoever our Lord shall have done us any good, let us understand that fame comes not for aught on our behalf, but rather we be so much more behold unto him. And to the end we may possess and enjoy the same benefits and they may profit us to our souls health, let us be well advised there with all we be more provoked thereby to serve God, for as much as he shows himself so liberal towards us. That is the thing in effect which we have together upon that text.

Now Moses adds that the people must bethink them of all the journey whereby the Lord their God led them. This bethinking of themselves was very needed. And if we were wise and well advised, we would think us better than we do of things which our Lord showed us throughout all our life. For both the adversaries and also the promises which he send us are instructions which we ought to mark well and this present life is as a school wherein we ought to call mind that lesson both evening and morning. But what? Although God do the offer of a good school master and never leave teaching of us, yet there is none of us that taken seed of it, but by time is love, we by like children that are hardened or become true so as do master what he can, the child does but laugh him to, he guides not his mind at all to learning, but his wits are wandering abroad and either he gives himself to solace and loudness, or else runs joy up and down the trees when he should have his book in his hand. At the same point are we, for we have the book open before us and as long as we be in this world, God teaches us by all manner of means to love him and to fear him and to put our trust in him and submit ourselves to his good will. If he send us blessings, it is to this end that we should learn to give ourselves wholly over unto him, if he afflict us, it is to waken us, that we should live in his fear. If he send us any need or hold us in any distress, it is as a quickening of us up to call upon him and to see flee to him for refuge. If he give us any taste of his favor, it is to the end we should be the better confirmed, not only that he will help us during this mortal life but also that he will bring us to the kingdom of heaven, and thereof must we be full resolved. Thus you see how God never sees to rehearse our lesson to us. And yet does none of us give head to it, but we wander away in our own imaginations, the pleasures of this world do carry us away, and every of us is so consumed with the vanities that we have no life at all to think upon our God, or upon the things that he showed us.

Yet notwithstanding, it is not for taught that Moses says there. Bethink you of the way where through the Lord you God had led you. True it is that the people of Israel had particular instructions so as a number of things be fell them in their traveling through the wilderness which belong not unto us in these days. But yet was that a figure of man's life. The wilderness wherein the people were by the space of forty years was a mirror of their earthly way sharing of our, where through we must pause until God take us hence into his rest, likewise the resting place of the land of Cannon (accordingly as it is named in the fourteenth and fifteenth psalm) was a warrant of the candle life that is prepared for us, and wherein we shall no more be tossed and turmoil as we be in this world. Now seeing it is so let us not that as the Jews were exhorted to remember the journey wherein God had led them through the wilderness. So now the chief point of our duties is to consider that in as much as God governs us, we live through his fatherly care so as he guide all our steps which we have to God o or come. And it behold us to be think us well of all the time of our life, and to consider slowly what we have had experience of in this world.

True it is that we think often times both upon the good and upon t he evil which we have received, but that is clean contrary to the intent of our God. For our thinking upon our adversities is not to know them to be as rods wherewith God beat us for our chastisement. No, it is but to free and chase against him and together mattes to grudge at, saying what will become of this? Shall I always be new to begin? It should seem that God indeed to confirm me presently for my affliction was great enough before, and was it me that he should increase it yet more? After man do we gather a sum of the miseries which we have felt from our childhood to our old age. Howe about that is but to shape ourselves against God, whereas we should rather think thus, go to my God had not cased to chastise me even from my childhood upward. And if I had returned unto him, surely he would have spared me, but he was fine to double his stripes and to hold on still because I have always waxed harder and harder and rebelled against him. And ought not to have fulfilled me if I had not been quite pass grace? But yet for all this, I hold on still mine accustomed trade, nevertheless he ceased not to waken me up with afflictions. He is that I should shelter in my own dung and yet do I continue still in stubbornness and what will come of it in the end? After this manner must we quicken ourselves and call to remembrance the whole time of our life or else we shall never be think us of the advisories that we have endured but with murmuring and grudging against God. In like case is it with prosperity. If God make us to prosper and afterward cast some affliction upon us, we be the more greed at it, in so much instead of saying with Job, we have received good at the lords hand and why should we not receive evil also. For when he does us good he is not unwilling to continue it and his ceasing of it is not for that he is become regard or unable to do us good any more but because he knows it to be expedient for us to be so exercised, that he may try to our patience and so ought we to think. But what we on the contrary part say thus, it comes to my mind that I was well at mine ease, and I had this and that. To be short, we could find in our heart to serve Satan, so we might have prosperity and we see to make ourselves merry bearing ourselves on hand in by meanwhile, that it is but lost labor to serve God. Thus we see how men turn to the clean contrary, both the prosperity and the adversity of God send them. But when we should we learn anything, our remembrance is very short, for if God have afflicted us for a time, we never think of it after. Indeed as long as the cross indeed, we can still to sigh and to play the hypocrites and so pretend that if God would out state to abate his rigor, we will become little angles. but as soon as he withdraws his hand from us, our nature falls by and by to his old bias, we do but shake our ears a little and we never think more upon his corrections to do ourselves any good by them. If God send us any prosperity we have forgotten them out of hand. In so much that when we have once crammed ourselves full, instead of yielding him thanks, we fall to kicking against him like our pampered as shall be declared in the two or thirteenth chapter, you see that our wits are very short in remembering the way where through God had led us. As touching good, they serve us not to stir us up to love our God, and to put our trust in him and to call upon him. As touching adversaries, it serves not to humble us, not to make us renounce world, nor to cause us to be think us of our sins that we might be sorry for them and crave forgiveness but rather to the clean contrary. Now then seeing we be so salute, we have the more need to mark well this text and the exhortation on that Moses make to us here that we may remember the way whereby God lead us. So then let us daily have an eye to the things whereof we shall have had experience during this transitory life. How had God deal with me ever fine I was born? I have waded through ten hundred thousand miseries and he had delivered me from them all and ought not this to make me think him to be my father and to put myself wholly into his protection? Again I have been cumbered a number of ways and God had always had an eye to me, and brought me home again to himself. Now often times have I tempted him, casting myself up to the spoil and running into the snares of Satan? And yet my God would not let me perish. Now ought not I to perceive his goodness therein? Ought I not to be take myself to his keeping with the future trust. Moreover my God has gifted me with a great sort of afflictions and should I still rebel against him? Shall I not be tamed for all the stripes that I have received at these rides? Shall God have lost his labor in chastising me? After this manner must we be think us both in our prosperity and in adversity and that not for once and away, but with such imprinting of it in our hearts as we may have it so intrigued there it may never be blotted out. That is the thing which we have to remember upon this text of Moses.

Now he speak expressly of the afflictions which the people had endured in the wilderness as if he should say that these afflictions here are profitable for men, so they can use them well, and refer them to their right end. It is not without cause that Moses utter this thing here in as much as it seemed at the first, that we cannot think upon our adversity without grief and grudging so as they should provoke us to repay against God and consequently to shrink away from him. For we know there is nothing more against our nature, than to be poor, sick, diseased or afflicted with any misery. There be things we hate. And therefore when God smitten us, it seemed to be the next way to withdraw us from him. But Moses tell us that if we were so wise and well disposed as wisely to apply to ourselves the affliction that God send us, you should rather teach us to return home to him.

The Lord your God (says he) has scourged you. And to what end, to know what was in my heart, and whether you would left keep his commandments or no. Here Moses show first that Gods instruction of us in an examination to try what we be and how we be minded. Indeed, prosperity also is a good trail to beware what is in men hearts, for if a man be anything at ease, he over shoots himself, and pleasures corrupt us and utterly dull us. If a man be rich, whereas he was taken to have been slowly and meek, he will beware his pride and cruelties. If a man be in authority, he becomes intolerable. And for you see that God may try what is in us and take experience of it, even by making us to proper. But yet is poor set down here of set purpose, because it is the mean whereby God try whether we be subject to him or no, and why? For patience is a singular virtue, but how may it be known that we be patient but by the adversity. Therefore when God send us adversities that are hard and troublesome to us, then does he as it were lay open our hates. For if we abide quietly under his hand and suffer him to deal with us according to his good will, so as we pray his name though he handle us roughly, it is a token that we love him indeed. And that hypocrite taken no place at all in us. And therefore it is not without cause that Moses intending to show how God try us and proceed us speak here expressly of afflictions.

Now we have together upon this text, that it is no wonder though God afflict us diverse ways, and why so? For it is expedient for us to be fit and to have it known what is in us. There is not a more needful and profitable thing for us, and that is done by afflictions. Therefore must we submit ourselves to them and understand that they never be spirituous or more than need. Mark that for one point. Yes and unto the same end must we apply this saying of the apostle, that it is the very mean whereby to try our obedience. For he said the same word, and utter down Jesus Christ for an example. For although he be the mirror and pattern of all righteousness, yet was he sin to pass under Gods courage. And why? Even to the end that his obedience might be known. And that which is showed us in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, good reason would that the same should be accomplished in us that are his members. Now is there anything more requisite than to know whether we be obedient to God or no? And that is not known but by adversity. When things fall our contrary to our desire, and God handless us in such sort as ourselves and nature strive against it. when we be in the case, if we can hold ourselves in subjection to God, to say, indeed Lord this is hard for me to bear, it goes against my stomach it is clean contrary to my nature, but yet however I say I renounce mine own will. I would sin how health, but sit in pleased you to have me sick, your name be blessed for it, I could find in my heart to be rich, and to have mine own case and pleasure, but you will have me to be poor and needy. I would be in honor and credit and you will have me to live in reproach and shame and good reason it is, O, Lord that we should have the humilities to submit ourselves to whatsoever it pleased you to send us, and not that we should follow our own knowledge.

When we be come to such a sacrifice of renouncing all our afflictions and all our own will then is our obedience rightly known. For what matters are it to say amen, when God followed our desires, and hand let us according to the liking of our own filth? How is there any virtue in us? And therefore let us remember will this text, where Moses tells us that God afflicting of us, is to try to what we be. For we might set a fair face upon things, and pretend to love and honor God and yet notwithstanding all should be but counterfeiting and leaving. But when we be handled roughly and God shows himself as our enemy, so as we be provoked to rebellion and would same virtue against him if it were lawful. And yet notwithstanding we continue still as lambs so as we bow down our necks under his yoke, and forsake all our own affections to obey him that is a due try all of us. And that is the cause why the holy scripture like adversity to a furnace. Like as gold and silver are tried by fire, for not God be same to try and examine us by afflictions.

But here it might be determined whether God do not know what we be without trial? Let us mark that it is not to be furnished that God is ignorant of anything or that he need to try us after the manner of men but it is the common speech of the Holy Scripture to attribute the things to God which are particular to men. For if it should speak to us master according to the worthiness thereof, we should be utterly punished and yet know never them what we said to us. God therefore to utter himself is same to descend from his own highness and to transform himself to the end we may know so much of him as is for our behold. To be short, let us understand that God know what is in men's heart though he should let them alone as they be. For it is said in the Psalms, shall not he that made the heart know it? Yes, but yet for all that, it behold us to be brought to the touchstone. Not that God has any need of it on his behalf, but it is done for our own sakes. Now then, whereas it is said in this text, that Gods will was to try the people of Israel, let us mark the meaning thereof is that God intended to show indeed, and to beware in truth what that people was of whom it was his will to have open record and proof to the end they might not use any oddities to keep their naughtiness from discoursing. Now then God afflicting of us is not for that he has any need to sit us narrowly, but because we on our side have need to be sorted. For we be how man because wonderfully we of their own strength, so long as God let them alone in rest, they think there is nothing but substantial stoutness in them.

But if God do but prick them, by and by the commandment which was hidden within before. Such as made fair whether before and were very skillful in preaching of Gods goodness and in teaching men how they ought to rest thereupon, fall to gnarling of their teeth when they themselves are afflicted, and can no more tell what penalties is, or how to glorify God. Therefore is God same to draw us for into this light. For as long as he handled us get, we dwell as it were in court, and we lie hidden in darkness. But as soon as adversity comes we learn to perceive what we be. Whereas before there seemed to be nothing but perfect obedience in us, then we perceive how our self is full of stubbornness and we could find in our heart to withstand God. That then is the trial which Moses speaks of.

Therefore to be short, this text must be referred to ourselves and we must take need to apply it well to our own benefits and consider that we be utterly ignorant and that the love of ourselves due to blind us, and quire stop our eyes, that we be besotted with, until God have cleansed us of it indeed and showed us our own shame by open proof. Again it is a good trial also when God to give us power to bear out afflictions patiently. For we have cause to glorify him for his upholding of us by his hand, and we must always believe we could not endure anything, unless we were strengthened by the Holy Ghost. Therefore we have overcome any temptation and passed through any adversity meekly. Let us assure ourselves that God invade us, and for you see it is a good trail that come to us by afflictions and that it is the way for us together instructions by this text, where it is said that God afflicting of his people, was to end to search what was in their hearts.

And here is express mention made of the heart. For it is not enough to have a fair show to the world ward. Those whom God let alone in quiet and pleasure, may well have many goodly virtues worth of commandment. But in the meanwhile their heart is hidden and wrapped up within, so as it is not known what they be until God discourage them. For prosperity is a cloak that hidden much uncleanness. If a man delight in his riches, in his credit, in his quietness, or his ease, men see not what he is but rather do stay upon the outward appearance, which do even dim and dazzle their eyes. But in the meanwhile they look not upon that which is within. And like as a fair agreement may hide many foul deformities. For does prosperity hide a man that he cannot be known what he is. But if God afflict him, he lays him bare by and by, in as much that if he have any wise in him, then it appeared both to himself and to others so as we be drive to humble ourselves whereas before we had nothing but vanity in us to deceive ourselves with all. And whereas we stood too much in our own conceits, now we see there was no cause why we should do so thus you see what Moses mean in saying God intended to try what was in his people hearts, by afflicting the after fashion in the wilderness.

Now hereby we see yet better the thing that I have touched before namely the afflictions are more than necessary and profitable for us. And therefore let us learn to bear them more patiently than we have been want to do, seeing our Lord has laid that condition upon us and that they be furtherance of our solution and there is not anything wrong and deadlier to men than to be so blinded as not to know what is in themselves. Seeing that man is transitory, wherein can he glory but only in God, who is his power and strength. Now then if he be so proud, as he not only despise him of who he hold all the things but also fallen to push with his horns against his majestic in despite of him. Is there anything more perilous? No and yet cannot this be amended otherwise than by affliction. Ought we to take sickness in evil part, seeing that God do thereby make us to renounce our own nature, to draw us to himself? No, and therefore let us learn to obey our God and let us be think us of this lesson whomsoever we e so sorrowful in our afflictions and when we be tempted to grudge against God, let us think thus, very but yet is this to our benefit. Indeed it is hard and troublesome but God played the purification and purge us of our disease which else would be deadly and is incurable by an other means. That is the thing which we have to note, that we may fare well by the warning that Moses gives us here.

Now he added immediately that God had suffered his people to endure hunger and shift and had fed them with manna which was a food that they were not acquainted with nor yet their fathers and that this is doing was to the end that they might know, show man lives not only by bread but by the every word that comes out the mouth of God does man live. Here Moses mean to give a particular lesson which is that God teach his people to seek their substance in him. And it is a very good lesson. Truly, when we say that God gives us our daily or ordinary bread, it seemed at the first blessing to be but a children thing. And smoothly men teach little children to pray unto God, when they would have their breakfasts. Yet and in every deed there are a sort of overseeing fools who nevertheless do take themselves to be very wise, and are affected to be great doctors which have held opinion that it is no need for Christians to pray to God for bodily sustenance but that they must tend to a higher and more exquisite perfection. Yet but in the meanwhile is it not a tending to great perfection when we can pray God to be our forefather, and when we can know how his goodness toward, yes ? Yes, and for proof thereof, wherein do the belief or unbelief of men show itself most? Surely even in the maintenance of this transitory life. Indeed that is not the chief point of our faith.

For we must look up to the everlasting inheritance that is promised us. But yet is the thing true which I say now, that is to with that our belief and also our unbelief show themselves more in that behalf, than in any other. For if a man can trust in God that he will maintain him in this moral life. Surely he will also hope for all the rest. And on the contrary part, when we want food, our have not helps at our own wishing by and by we be out of heart and vexed with uniqueness. And for our unbelief beware itself in the earthly life. Now therefore let us mark well that we have greatly profited not only for one day but also for all our life long when we have once learned thoroughly to commit ourselves to God providence to be fed by his hand and to receive sustain by his grace. When we become to that point, then are we mounted very high, and thereby we shall learn to trust in him for the heavenly life and for all things belongings thereunto. And so is Moses meaning in this text, namely that the people should be thoroughly pervaded that God will nourish them and that they should not trust either in bread or wine or in any other food, but consider that it is Gods particular office to maintain them by his power. Let that serve for one point.

And Moses alleges the seeding of the people with manna in the wilderness. The lord did let them endure hunger, and send them manna from heaven as a warrant to assure them that he will always be their father. And although he make the earth to yield the fruit in bringing forth both corn and wine and although you have both flesh and fish, and white meat to nourish you with all, yet do not they God cease to maintain you by his power. Therefore you must look that way, and not have you mind tried to the dead creatures as though they gave you life, or as though you received your strength of them. Assured yourself it is you God that nourishes and fulfills you. And truly manna continued not always with the people of Israel. But if God work a thing for time, we must profit ourselves by it ever after although the thing continues not to still. If we should remember the things that God showed us, no longer than we see them with our eyes, we should be too brut. Therefore when we have once seen any instruction, we must bear it in mind all the days of our life. In like case is it concerning the Manna. God fed his people with it by the space of forty years. Now must we learn thereby to the wordless end, that we be fed by the same power whereby that people was. Indeed the means are fare other, of we nowadays do eat of the bread which the earth yields and we have other kinds of food to sustain us with all but is that any derogation to the heavenly power? Is it not God that breathed life into us, so as we be sustained by him? Yes, and therefore whatsoever we eat bread, let us learn not to stay upon that but to cal to mind that God nourished his people without bread, without mine, and without any other water. And to what end? He brought not that miracle to have it buried. Was it but only to the end that people of that time should be taught by it that God was their father? No, no, but we must apply the same theory to our instruction in these days too, that is to wait, that although God send us bread and wine, yet he ceased not feed us still for all that. So then let us mark well that the miracles which God had brought nevertheless must serve for our instruction, although we behold them not presently at this day. And specifically whereas here is mention made of the manna, let it be an everlasting present to us, to teach us that God has a care of his creatures and t hat we have our substance and purification at this hand, so that although he make the sun to the shine yet does he light come from himself, and although he give strength to the earth, so as we take substance and nourishment from out of the bowels of it, yet is at he himself that work after that fashion. And let us always hold this for a rule, that our life with all the opportunities thereof depend upon the only hand of God sand that we must have our whole recourse unto him. That is the meaning of Moses.

Howbeit to the end we know is yet better, we have to mark first of all, that whereas he said that man is nourished by every word that comes out of the mouth of God, he speak not but of this present life. There are which take into to be spoken of the spiritual life of our souls. Indeed it is a good doctrine of itself, we live not only in this life as Oxen and asses but we have also a better and excellent life in as much as God quicken our souls by this words, and knitted us to himself so as he uphold us by the power of his holy spirit which is the fountain of life. All this is true, and it behold us to acknowledge it so to be as I said before. But yet as concerning the understanding of this text, Moses goes no further but to show us that we have by every word which proceed out of the mouth of God that is to say we live by the blessing which God gives us,. For the doctrine that he treated of here, is not that our souls are quickened to salutation because we be taught by the Holy Scripture. Moses meant not that thing, but rather he showed us that bread has not any power of itself, for as much as it is but as dead thing. And can a creature have power to give us moving? No, can a dead thing have power to give us life? No, surely that can it not. How then can bread and wine which have no life of themselves be able to give life into men? How can they make us to live? If seemed that we gather strength of bread. For what a man is brought low with overlong sustain and pined hunger whereas he was a good ass half dead before, it he eat meat, by and by he is as it were renewed and set up against. Indeed bread is manna and to refresh men and God served his own turn by it but yet for all that, shall we tie our life to bread and wine?

No, but we must consider that although God have set that order in nature: yet notwithstanding it serves not to bereave him of his praise, nor to rob him of his right, but rather his uttering of his power by his breeches, serves to show that he has them all in his hand and can dispose of them after his own good pleasure. That is the thing which we have to remember concerning these words, where Moses says that man lives by the word which proceeds out of the mouth of God. And indeed we cannot have a better expounder of this text, than our Lord Jesus Christ, for he applying this text himself shows that he should be sustained by thrusting in God, although he wanted bread. Indeed I cannot dispatch this matter at this present, but yet must leave their somewhat of it in any to the end that the rest may be the better set forth tomorrow. See then how our Lord Jesus Christ expounded the words of Moses. He was tempted by Satan to turn stones into bread. And it what the intent was to not be really as though he could not have lived without bread, but he shows us that although he wanted bread, yet he should not fail to be sustained by the power of God, his father. For why? It is not by great that man to lead, that is to say, God is not bound by any necessity to use bread, when he will sustain us. If an earthly father will sustain his children, he must needs have great and if he have none, he will be and say, alas my children I cannot but be in great grief of mine, to see you in this necessity. If I could see the you with mine own blood I would do it. So then, a father shall not always have where with to maintain his children, but it is not so with God, for he is not bound to any necessity. Now then does but failed through the whole world? Is there such drought asked the earth can be yielded no substance customer yet does not God fail to be Almighty still and to have wherewith to maintain those that are his. Thus you see how Jesus Christ did bear back the Devils temptation by telling him that we must not imagine God's power to be shut up within his creatures but that we must learn to trust in him not doubting but that he can find means well enough to maintain us, yes even though all things fail us. If he give us bread; let us eat of it, for we must not tempt him. Bu if all means help fail, let us betake ourselves to him that is almighty, and to his only power, which shall always have his course, though there be no mean help at all. You see then how Moses meaning is that even in respect of this transitory life we must not be so beastly us to hang our groins upon the bread and meat, as though our life hidden there. But when we have wherewith to feed ourselves, let us lift our rise up word to acknowledge that it is God which has set that order of nature to stop and again, if we have literals let us be contented with it and pray God to make it an effectual as though it were manna from heaven, so as one more cellmate lead us and make us justice, sits be and all the abundance of the world. And if we be driven to poverty, let us proceed yet further and pray God to supply our want and let us put this sentence in practice, that man lives not only by bright, that is to say, he is not sustained lonely by the sword in remains, but although he were but utter necessity and wanted all things yet would not God fail to succor you. And therefore let us resort unto him and to the secret power whereby we be sustained that we may be so maintained by the same as we may have leave in him and by him and all through his only mere goodness.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to pity us and that seeing we be so wretched creatures that although he have a care to bring us back again to him, and yet notwithstanding we would find strive against him, it may please him to purchase us from all stubbornness as our whole seeking may be to submit ourselves to his will. And that he suffer us not to be given still to our own wicked affections and to the lusts of our flesh, but rather that he correct them, yes, and that in such sort as we may seek to mount up old and to pass in such wise through this world, as we may always remember that it is but a way faring, to the intent we may keep on still to the Mark where our Lord calls us. That it may please him to grand this grace not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, & c.

The 59th Sermon which is the second upon the eight Chapter

3. 4. He afflicted you & c.

5. Know you therefore in your heart, that the Lord your God nurtured you as a man nurtures his own child.

6. Therefore keep you the commandments of the Lord your God, by walking in his ways, and by fearing him.

7. For the Lord your God brings you into a good hand, a land wherein are rivers of water, fountains and springs which come out of the valleys and hills.

8. A land of wheat, and barley, of vines, fig trees, and pone garnets. a land wherein are Olive trees, oil and honey.

9. A land wherein you shall eat bread without scarcity, so as though shall not want anything in it: a Land whose stones are iron, and out of the whose hills you shall dig brass.

Yesterday we saw first of all, how the miracle that God wrought in feeding his people with Manna by the space of forty years together in the wilderness, ought to serve forever. And therewithal was showed the end thereof: that is to know, that the Jews ought to have considered, that it is not the bread that maintains a man, neither is the power of our life shut up within it: but rather it is God that breaths liveliness into us, and which gives the bread that nature whereby it is able to sustain us. And so we see the matter here concerns not the life of our souls, but that God shows us how this frightful and transitory life is maintain by his only power: so that, whether we have meat and drink, or whether we suffer hunger we must always have recourse to God's goodness, assuring ourselves that he is our foster father, and that our life is in his hand, and that it is his office to preserve it in good plight. That is the sum of the things which we have to remember here. And you have seen also how our Lord Jesus used the same text, as was declared in few words: but yet must we lay forth the residue of the things a little more at length.

Now then we have to mark, that if God give us abundance, our minds must not be wedded to it: for can the bread quicken us, seeing it is a dead thing? Although God use it as an instrument, it is not to deface his own commendation, no more than when he gives us light by the Sun. For we know that in the creation of the world, light was made before the sun was created. And why? To the intent we should not convey the honor of God to creatures. Therefore let us so use the light of the Sun, as we acknowledge therewithal, that there is but only one God, to whom the glory of that benefit ought to be yielded. And when we have bread to eat. It is not the bread that sustains us, but it is God, who powers out his goodness continually upon us. Although he apply those means to our use: yet is it he himself that works, it is he that is the author of them. And in that respect is it that he says he will break the staff of bread. True it is that he threatens to shut up the heaven as if it were iron, and to make the earth to be of brass, so that when the earth cries out to the heaven, the heaven shall not hear it. God then when he intends to send bareness upon a land, uses such means as he thinks good: by reason whereof we have not wherewith to sustain ourselves: insomuch that when the ground has born a harvest good and great enough, yet will God well enough diminish it and make it to molder away, yes and when the corn is carried to the mill, it shall consume in the grinding: and when it is brought from the mill to the oven, if it be measured or weighed again, it shall not hold full weight and measure. Albeit, we must come to this point, that the strength which bread has, is not of the bread itself, but of God's breathing of this world into it whereof Moses speaks here: that is to know, that when God will have us to be nourished and sustained by the bread, he utters his goodness towards us, by making us to feel his blessing which sheds itself into it after a secret fashion. Albeit that we behold it not with our eyesight, yet must we be thoroughly persuaded of it by faith. Then let us mark well, that when we have whereof to feed, we must not be so doltish as to think that the power is enclosed in the bread or in any other vittles or drinks: but that therein God utters his goodness towards us, and sheds it into us, as we see the rain come from heaven which moistens the earth and gives it strength: On the other side if we have want: let us understand that God can sustain us by turning bread into Manna, that is to say: if all ordinary means fail us, God will provide for us after another fashion, as we see he remedied the necessity of his people, when they were in the wilderness. And for the same cause did our Lord Jesus Christ answer Satan, it is written that man lives not by bread only, but by every word that comes out of the mouth of God. For Satan tempts him to distrust, under color that in the wilderness God sent him not the things that were expedient to live withal. He had not any food there, and yet in the meanwhile he was pinched, with hunger as a mortal man: for he vouchsafed to become subject to our passions or sufferings. Now here upon, Satan takes occasion to enter upon him, saying: Seeing you are the son of God, should you want anything? Is it not reason that all creatures should serve you? Yes: for you are the heir of the world. You have no bread: and therefore you must be faine to try the power of God, that these stones may be turned into bread, or else you see how your God forsakes you, for if he had a care of you, you should perceive his blessing and favor, so as you should have here wherewith to sustain you. Now the feeling you want such helps, it is a sign that God has no regard of you. But Jesus Christ answers hereto: I shall be sustained well enough though bread fail me. And why? For the life of man depends not upon these means. And surely God were of very small and weak force, if he could not help a man but by bread: he should be no better than an earthly man. A rich man can do well enough, if he have wherewith: but if he fall into poverty, he must be faine to beg himself.

And so should it be [by your saying] with God. But although there were never a whit of bread in the world: yet has he always his word in his mouth, that is to know, he needs no more but to say the word. Like as he created the world of nothing, by uttering his will that it pleased him to have it so: and all things were made and they are maintained still at this day in their state, by his only commandment: so can he maintain those that are his, as he thinks good. He needs no more but to breathe forth his secret power: and all shall be as well satisfied, as if they had their fill of meat and drink. According to this lesson, if God at any time withdraw our food and make us to feel necessity: let us learn to wait upon him, and to rest upon his providence, praying him to supply our wants: and we shall find that this is not written in vain.

Now then we see the original double using this doctrine, and that he must apply it as well to the time of abundance, as to the time of scarcity. When we have great store of things, let not that stop our eyes to make us trust too much to them: and assuring ourselves that our eating of the bread cannot sustain us, except God give it force. For if he once break the staff of it: there will be no more leaning to it, it will rather be but a grief to us. For we must always mark this similitude, that as a weak man stays himself upon a staff: so God strengthen our powers again by bread and drink. But if the staff be broken: to what purpose will it serve, but to break his neck that shall trust to it? Then let us learn to trust to God and to lean to him in our abundance, and to give him thanks for vouchsafing to make these creatures to serve our turn after that fashion: and let us beware that we convey not over his power and praise to any other thing. For that were to make an idol of the bread. God has ordained it to do us service, and he has put it in subjection to us: and shall be notwithstanding go and worship it? If the bread [of itself] do sustain us, has ignored the office of God, so as God must sit still like an idle and dead thing? Let us beware that we make not idols of the benefits which God bestows upon us: for that were an intolerable unthankfulness. And thus much concerning abundance. And therefore let not rich man think they can forbear God's help because they have their garners well stuffed and stored: for if God do but blow upon them, all vanishes away. When they have the morsels in their mouths: they shall stick fast in their throats: and when they have their bellies crammed never so full, yet shall they receive no nourishment by it, except God gave with them by his secret working. By this means shall all of us live in humility, and such as are well stored shall not cease to make this prayer without hypocrisy: give us this day our daily bread. For otherwise, were it not a mocking of God, if a man should think himself to be well enough provided, because he has great store of corn and wine, or because he has money in his purse and rents coming in, or because he perceives himself to be thoroughly furnished and stored of all things? How shall he crave his daily bread of God's hand, unless he now that the things which he has nothing, and that God must be fine to work, yes, and to continue his secret operation always? If that were not: a man might defy God and hold scorn of him, as in very deed he might well enough forbear him. But if we be fully resolved of this lesson in our hearts, that nothing sustains us but only God: it will put us in mind to pray him, to continue his sustaining of us tomorrow as well as he has fed us today, notwithstanding that we have a whole years provision beforehand. For we must always consider, that all that ever we have without him is nothing.

Again, in time of poverty, it is a great comfort to us that we may resort to our God, and beseech him to have pity upon us, and [be sure] that although there were no bread in the world, yet he will not fail to sustain us by his power. Seeing then that we have this promise, it ought to be an encouragement to us to pray boldly, and to rejoice and not to torment ourselves out of measure, they that think there is no God at all in heaven, when they see not the helps wherewith they be acquainted. And why is that? Because we tie all God's power to our eyesight and outward senses. Therefore let us beware of such fondness, and let us put this lesson in use. And truly God shows us the experience thereof even still at this day. If we had our eyes open: we should perceive that this is not written in vain. For you see that even they which are the best fed nor well clad, do nevertheless both fat and lusty, and thrive well to see too. What eat they? For want of good sustenance, they eat things that may hurt them: and yet notwithstanding God makes them to grow and increase by attending the things into good juice, which might engender evil nourishment. We be sure that we see this. So then, let us mark well that our Lord has left still in the world some remnant of the thing that Moses witnesses here. And let us Mark moreover, that the world which is spoken of here, betokens that power or operation, like as when the Apostle says in the first to the Hebrews, that Christ has the full us of the whole godhead in him, and that he bears up the whole world with his word: according whereto also it is said in the Psalm, that the heavens were created by the word, and the same word showed itself there: so God showed us by stabilizing of the order of nature, that it is he in whom all things have their being. You see then how he works towards us, and that he needs not to travel with great labor and painstaking: it is enough if he do but say that word, that is to say if he do but utter his good pleasure, for that performance will follow by and by therewithal.

But by the way we have here a resemblance to gather: That is our bodies be nourished and sustained by God's word, that is to know, by the secret power which he breaths into bread, wine, and all other vittles: much rather our souls nourished by his doctrine that is daily preached to us. Indeed, that is not the meaning of this text, as it shows us before: but yet for all that, when God has once taught us what this temporal life is, and showed us that it depends wholly upon his power and grace: he will have the same to convey us yet higher. For when we know that God shows himself a father to us in giving us meat and drink: we must also pass on to the heavenly heritage. [We must consider] that his adopting of us to be his children, is not to feed us in this world like brute beasts: but to draw us to the everlasting life. And therefore when we perceive the operation and power of this secret word of God in the nourishing of our bodies: we must mount up higher, and consider that our souls are not fed neither with bread nor with wine, but that they have a precious food, namely that God gives them life by nourishing them to the salvation that is prepared for us. Therefore when we have sought our food at God's hand, and given him thanks for our meat and drink, staying ourselves altogether upon the trust of his goodness, in hope that he will always be our forefather, yes even in the time of extreme dearth: let us assure ourselves that he will never fail us anymore, especially in respect of our souls, forasmuch as that is the thing above all other, whereby he intends to certify us that he takes us for his children. Thus you see how we ought to put this text in use.

And here withal let us mark that it was meat that the people of Israel should acknowledge the benefit that is spoken of in the Psalm where it is said that man was fed with Angel's food. For the prophet, to magnify God's grace the more in that he had fed his people with Manna, says that when they were a hundred, God sends them bread from heaven, so as mortal and earthly man did eat the bread of Angels. Not that the Angels are fed with Manna: (for they be spirits, which have no need of meat and drink:) but that the prophet meant to show that it was an excellent thing, and that whereas the earth yielded food to us, the heavens opened to them, and mortal men did after a sort to communicate with the inhabitants of heaven. This saw great benefit and prerogative ought to be acknowledged of the Jews: but yet the instruction that comes of the things that God showed us at that time, ought to endure forever. And therefore although we never saw the Manna, and to be kept in the Tabernacle with the Ark of his Covenant: that although the people [which were to come] saw not the wonders that had been wrought in the wilderness: yet notwithstanding they might have a memorial thereof, to put them always in mind of it, that they might profit themselves by it. Then let us understand that although God send us not Manna from heaven nowadays: yet he will not have us to doubt, but that he had such a care to sustain us, as we shall perceive he does not tell us for naught in this text, that the word which proceeds out of his mouth is that thing whereby we leave and whence we talk all of our sustenance.

Now Moses adds immediately, That their garments were not worn, nor the people's feet swollen in the wilderness by the space of forty years. And thereupon he concludes thus, Know you with thin heart, for so is it word for word: but the meaning thereof is, Assure yourself in thin heart, that as a man nurtures his own child, so has God nurtured you. Now then like as God did feed that people with heavenly food so did he cloth them miraculously: for otherwise their apparel would soon have been worn out. But God provided for it that all those forty years together they were shod and clad with the same raiment and shoes, which they brought to come out of Egypt. And it is a president which must assure us that although we be clothed with the wool of sheep, and have linen to wear: and notwithstanding it is God that gives us continually wherewith to feed and clothe us: and so long as he lifts to make the helps available which he gives us, he will so blessed with us as one coat shall last us out to three coats, yea and a whole dozen that shall not do so much as one alone when God lifts to curse them. Likewise when he breaths his blessing and favor into bread, 1 ounce of it shall do more than a whole pound otherwise: and when he lifts to break the staff of bread, a pound shall not do so much service as half an ounce. This is the meaning of Moses in this text. And therefore let us mark, that if God lift to prosper as we must have such content as we be not too eager and careful for it as we commonly be, bearing ourselves on hand that the earth should fail us, if we made not the better provision to have all things beforehand. And what a thing is that? It is true that we ought to think upon our needs. But how? First by calling upon God, saying: Alas Lord, we be much poorer and wretched creatures than any beasts in the world: for dogs, asses and all other beasts are coated with their own skins, and they be enough for them: but if a man be naked, he starves out of hand. So lord, we be the poorest and miserable of all other creatures. All beasts can find their food in the fields: but as for us, if we be not nourished, we decay by and by. God then does well vouchsafe that we should have a care to provide for our necessities. Albeit, that is to the end we should resort to him referring ourselves to his fatherly goodness. Again, we must travel according to the skill that he gives us, we must not spare ourselves, we must follow that means that he appoints us, we must follow that means that he appoints us, we must not be lazy and slothful: for he will not have us to be idle, nor to be as blocks. But yet must this carefulness be bridled, that it vex us not too much, and we must always pluck up a good heart to call upon God, and commit ourselves to him, assuring ourselves that he will never fail us.

That is the care which God wills us to have. Nevertheless we must also put the thing in practice that is spoken of here: that is to know, that God will give a sufficient to serve our turned, so us if we want coat our shoes, he will provide us of them, or else make one pair of soles to do us more service than a dozen, when it pleases him. And we may see this with our eyes. For they that are warm clad, fail not for all that to be as it is where half dead throw cold: and on the other side, whereas it seems that poor folk should starve and be frozen with you a hundred times [are the year go about] God warms them, yes and they be so preserved, as though he kept them in a stove, or as though some Physician were always at hand with them, ministering good remedies to them to save them from the cold. After that is the cause why that in the time of the Law, God commanded that all new things should be blessed, to the end that men should think upon him, and consider thus with themselves: Go to, I have a new garment, and I must look that I thank him for it which gave it me. For seeing it pleases my God to cloth me thus, and to give me this apparel to use it as mine own: it becomes me to acknowledge that it is of his goodness and mercy that I am so provided for. You see then, that the intent why he caused all thing to be dedicated to him which men should occupy: was that they should acknowledge the giver of them, and that if he blessed not the helps which he had given them, all was nothing and noteworthy. And as for nowadays, although we have not the like Ceremony: yet must we hold still the truth thereof.

Now for a conclusion Moses adds, Know you in your heart, that as a father murders his own child, so has your God nurtured you. Indeed the Hebrew word that Moses uses in this place, signifies sometimes to Chastise: and therefore it might be taken as if he said thus: Know you that the intent of your God in all the afflictions which you has endured, has been to correct your faults, that like us a man intending to reform his child when he us and enemies takes the wrought by and by in his hand, so likewise that gold has chastised you, not suffering you to become and unruly and forward child, but holding you always under him. And this doctrine were very good, but the same word that us by a similitude the talk and likewise all instruction and good government. No doubt but the intent of Moses in this place was to make yet another conclusion of the matter is that he had treated off. For he had spoken of afflictions and he had spoken likewise of gods benefits and of his leading of the people, all the time that they were in the wilderness. Now therefore, to all those matters he applies this final sentence saying, know you that your God has nurtured you after a gentle and loving fashion, so see we need is not to wander far ought to make long vagaries to know whether your God has been with you or not, he has supplied himself to you pass familiarity maybe. Is not the instruction that has given you, so familiar us no man can shows himself more familiar? That's therefore is the meaning of Moses.

And whereas he says, know you in your hearts. It is to the end that men should be the diligent in applying the things to their instruction, which God reaches them. For it is pity to see how dulled we be of ourselves. Although God utter himself familiarity to us, yet do not be seeking any whit. And what is the cause thereof? And man that is dull sighted and has sore eyes, and discern is not things well though they be laid before him. Now, we be not only dim sighted, but also stark blind in god's works. True it is that he must be fine to enlighten us, but yet must we also to our endeavor and apply our minds to judge well office works, when it pleases him to show them to us. And so it is not a needless speech of Moses, you know you in your heart. As if he should say, every man must enter into himself and endeavor earnestly do not the grace and goodness of God. We must not slumber in that case but every of us must do this diligence to the uttermost. To be short, these sayings, let men enforce themselves, and let men strained themselves, is well worth the noting. For when God reaches us, by and by every of us must enter into his own heart.

does his children. It is to cut off all occasion of starting holes, that men might not pretend any ignorance. For in Smiths us thinks us declared here according to our rudeness, we cannot excuse ourselves by saying that our knowledge is too dull and that we be unable to mount so high. For this doctrine is given us familiarity enough. To the end therefore that no man might take occasion of excuse, Moses says that they word, what? Has taught your God taught you after a common fashion and a men do? When a father intends to teach his child will he do more than your God has done to you? Now since it is so, these things were not spoken for at that time only, but our Lord works after the same manner yet still at this day so as we may perceive the things that Moses tells them here. Indeed gods works out like and to you bottomless pit, and it is not lawful for us to be so inquisitive of his doings, asked to seek to know all the reasons of them. For we be not able to conceive them and therefore (as we have seen in Job) we must be consented to see the outlets of his works. And this similitude imports much where it is said that VC but the outlets, that is to say the outermost parts of gods works. As for to attain to the midst of them, or to search all that which lies done within, that is utterly impossible. Rushing so far for God will surely punish our rashness.

But yet must we look upon the outlets and let us all bonds of gods works and take such taste of them as we may learn so much of them as may be for our welfare and salvation. If we do so, we shall perceive that God applies himself to our rudeness, and that he deals with us after the manner of men, that teach little children, instructing us in such wise as we cannot say to him, yes, but I am not as an angel of heaven to comprehend God's doings. For (as I said) God vouchsafes to stoop is and to the intent we should understand his works, he becomes familiar with us. Of whom these it long then that we profit not by we be instructions that he gives us? For we cannot say but that he manifests in to is so many ways, that there is no more excuse for us if we know him not. Vaguely even by the order of nature, we may know him summarily us by the seasons of the year, by the growing of roads upon the and by the shining of the son, the more than the stars. Even by these things may we see that our Lord has supplied himself wholly to us, and to the feebleness of our understanding, and that he has (as it were) transfigured himself, by taking upon him the person of a man, to the end that we might know him. Again, when he scourges us, do we not see that he handles us as a father handles his own children? If he see a man wax over lust and malapert: after he has bond a wily in, he takes the wrought in his hand. For on the one side he wants us by his word. And afterward if he smites us it his hand, does he not use the greater kindness towards us, to the intent we should receive his corrections to our benefit? Again, when he sends us of his benefits, it is all one as if a father being desirous to win his child by gentleness, should say to him, my son, what will you do? Who shall maintain you when you are gone away from me? Here you has always whereon to leave, you sees how I take pains for you, get you to a stranger and see he will be better with you. Now then like as a father will speak after that manner of his child, so does our Lord show himself to us, and he marks his word with his deeds, that is to say whereas he sends us prosperity and quietness, he tells us also that it is to allure us to him that his gentleness might win us to him. And make us to return familiarity to him and to depart from our sins. Since it is so, let us learn that there will be no excuse for us if you take not instruction by all the order which God keeps to teach us with all in this world. For why? He be use himself like a mortal man towards us and works not after the manner of his own incomprehensible Majesty because it would confound us. We be too weak to mount so highly, and therefore he stoops to us. Seeing then that he deal so friendly on his behalf, let not us be so slothful us not to enter into our own hearts, and to consider things accordingly, and to enforce ourselves to bear God's benefits well in mind, so as we take instruction by them as we ought to do. Thus you see what we have to mark upon the place.

Now Moses shows to what end he exhorted the people to being well of gods works, namely to the end they might keep all his commandments, to Kinney space and to fear him. Keep the commandment of the Lord your God (says he) that you must walk in his place and fear him. First we have to Mark here, that more suspense the people to the law, asked to the perfect and chief doctrine of our whole life. And it is a point well worth the to be marked. For thereupon we have to gather, that when God has taught us never so many ways yet shall they never boot us, unless we have recourse to this word. Behold, the infidels can well enough search the secrets of nature, they can well not only alleged reasons, but also saying which is done after this fashion. He has, and they have deemed God to be good, righteous, and wise, and we see that the heathen philosopher's new gods works so far as they could talk of his Majesty. But what? It was all confusedly and in the end they managed their way in their own imaginations, so as they never attained to the point where they should have come. Then let us understand that all this is to no purpose, until we have god's doctrine for all perfection. True it is that the things which we behold in the world and all the instructions which God gives us thereby, good and profitable helps: but yet for all that the mark that we must shoot at is the doctrine [of his word] so as we set all our wits upon that, to the end we want not out of the way. For if a man shoot and have no marked to shoot at, what does he else but is always shot? Even so is it with us, we may well shoot, that is to say, we may take pain to know God's works, but what shall we gain by it, if we have not they said mark to shoot at? It shall but lost labor. And this mark is not to be chosen at our own discretion, but God must set us up our white: and that white is the Law, the Prophets, and the Gospel. And so you see that that is the cause why Moses having spoken of the wonders which the people had seen, and having told them that the same ought to serve to their instruction, and having exhorted the faithful to profit well in that school: sends them back again to word. Keep the commandments of the Lord your God, says he: and afterward he adds that you must walk in his ways.

Here we have to note, that whensoever we swerve from God's word, we shall but wander, as has been showed heretofore, and we may well go up and down but we shall be never the further forward. Let men break their shanks as much as they lift, and yet shall they a to go back or else find themselves all in one place still, unless they know that they which they ought to keep. For let us mark well that our own ways are crooked, and there is nothing but straying and wandering in vain to stop and therefore God will have us to walk in his face, which are straight and level. In saying so Moses sets down a comparison of things contrary. As if he should say wretched folk, you think to further that yourselves when you walk in your own ways but by the rising every man a sundry way that his own pleasure. But what?

You do but martyr yourselves in vain: for God will have men to walk in these days, that is to say, in the least that he shows them and he will have them to be fall out. Therefore let us learn to submit ourselves to God's word knowing well that our life shall never be well ordered except we obey him. Yes, and whereas he says the ways of the Lord in the approval number, we must apply it to that which has been said heretofore, that is to know, that God has given us so full doctrine as we cannot allege that it is not enough, or that more may be wedded to it. Let us Mark that our Lord will not fail us in anything. Therefore let us not be wise in our own conceit, but let us ask counsel of him. And if we doubt that we go astray, or if we be afraid of wandering up and down, let us keep this way and we cannot go amiss if we follow the direction that he sets before us. Now he adds here too, to the end that we should fear the Lord. Herein he shows to what end God gave us his law. Why Willie have men to keep it? To do him homage above all things. For we know that he receives neither harm our benefit by ears. What can we do to him? Our serving of him is not to advantage in any whit, for he has no need of anything. Again what riches have we to increase him with all? Why then has he given us his law, but to the end that we should dedicate our whole life to him, and by keeping his commandments show ourselves willing to be subject to him and that he has all sovereign dominion over us? That is the thing which is meant by the fear that Moses speaks of here. And let us not that he means not as lavish fearfulness, that is to say, that men should submit themselves to him as enforced, but that we should stand in reverent awe of him, not only as of our master but also us of our father. That feared which God requires is matched with hearty Love, so as we be glad and fine to serve him. And why? Because it is good reason that we should be his, and that he should have the governing of us and that we should frame our lives according to his will. And so you see what is the chief point in the keeping of the law.

Furthermore let us mark, that it is not enough for men to leave uprightly, so as they abstain from all evil and wise, and deal in such sort is nothing but a virtual can be found in them. For a man may well be chaste, and abstain from all wrong, annoyance, deceit, blaspheme, and lewd talk, and yet shall all this be nothing worth, except he refer all to the said end of offering up of himself in sacrifice to God. Virtues therefore our not of estimation in themselves, so as it may be said, oh, this is an excellent fellow in virtue, he has done this and that, he has abstain from all the world, but we must go on further to be virtue of all virtues, and found then and well spring of all holiness, righteousness, and the upright dealing, namely that we tend to our God, seeking to honor and glorify him, and to be wholly his and under his government. When we be at that point then is our life well ordered. But we may make the fairest show in the world and yet if we have not respect ought to our God, to submit ourselves to him that his name maybe exalted and magnified, and that he may have his due right at our hands. All is but leasing, but be never so highly esteemed. You see then in effect that the thing which we have to remember is that when God has shortened us his works, then does he call us to this world telling us that that is the thing where we must hold ourselves without wandering here and there, and thirdly that if we will have our life well ordered we must always have our eye upon the thing that he commands. And how is that? Even to honor him in such sort, as we come to him with a free and cleared heart, to serve him and to dedicate ourselves to him and also leaves among our neighbors without working any deceits or wrong to any man and without overshooting of ourselves into any outrage. But yet the chief point is that God have his you, that is to know, that he governs us and be glorified by all our life because it is good reason that he should have at his devotion, and that we should be subject to him, for so much as we be beholden to him for all good things. And we must not only do so because he is our maker and has sovereign dominion over us, but we must also love him because he is our father. And again, seeing he bestows so many benefits upon us, we ought that at least wise to yield him his due reverence.

And that is the cause why Moses adds in the end, God will bring you into the land which he has promised you, a rich and wealthy land, and land that is full of all good things, wherein there is plenty of wheat, barley, wine, honey, and oil, and of all other things. And this is to provoke the people the more, to the fear that are spoken of before. For truly if we feel nothing but rigor at gods hand, we may well yield to him but it will be but the force, it will not be with a free will, there will be nothing but hyper crazy in all our life. Indeed they will not fail to pretend a fair countenance of serving our God. But our doing of it will be by constraint like as they which have done evil may well go on still, howbeit that is but for fear of stripes and in the meanwhile they have no lift nor goodwill to do it. But when we have once Mark well the good turns that God does us, then are we the more moved and provoked to honor him, knowing that we ought to yield him a willing and three hearted reverence so is our whole seeking be to make an offering of ourselves to him and to sack advise even our lives to him. To that end then does Moses alleged the good turns which God was about to his people. And he not only speaks of the former benefits which they ought to have born well in mind, but he says also when your God shall have brought you into the land, than put forth yourself to serve him with the better courage accordingly as he goes through with his benefits towards you.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to touch us in such wise as we may be drawn to true repentance and that for as much as we be wretched creatures that have need to be sustained by him every minute of an hour, we may resort to his bountifulness, assuring ourselves that although he had all the abundance of the world, yet could we not be sustained and nourished by it, except his hand were stretched out over us to bless us and therefore that we may depend wholly upon his blessing and upon his grace, and row out of that Fountain of his which can never dry up, and that when we once filled therewith, we may learn to thank him for his gracious goodness, saucy speeding of us here beneath, may not the years to this transitory life like brute beasts, but rather make us to know that we must always travelled towards the heavenly life where it may please him to guide us and to bring us ever nearer and nearer to it until he have brought us fully thither, for the sake and by the means of his well beloved son our Lord Jesus Christ. That it may please him to grand this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and nations et cetera.

On Wednesday, the 21st of August 1555
The three score Sermon, which is the third upon the eight Chapter

10. You shall eat and be filled, and bless the Lord your God for the good land which he shall have given you.

11. Take heed that you forgot not the Lord your God, in not keeping his commandment, Laws, and ordinances, which I command you this day:

12. To the end that when you shall have eaten and been satisfied, and have built fair houses and dwelt in them:

13. And that thin Oxen and sheep are multiplexed, and your silver and gold are increased, and all that you has is multiplied:

14. Your heart do not then swell, and you forget the Lord your God which has brought you out of the land of Egypt from the house of bondage.

If God command us to be patient in adversity, we think it is a hard thing and yet it is good reason that we should past that way, seeing we have a better and inmates thereof in our Lord Jesus Christ to whom we must be like fashioned if we will be God's children, not only in suffering quietly the afflictions which he sends us in distrust life, but also in being ready and obedient to him even to the. You see then that it is a most rightful condition and yet we on our side do find it cumber some. And why? Because we be too nice and our self-love does so carry us a way that we cannot abide to suffer anything. Now if we be a pray great unthankfulness and fault in this, much more do we be pray the same when we cannot so conceived of gods benefits us to be thankful to him for them. Here in (say I) be sure ourselves to be too lewd. For if God revealed gently with us and show himself a father like towards us, must it not needs be that we are worse than in brute beasts, if we vouchsafe not to lift up our eyes towards heaven, to yield him some acknowledgement of his goodness. Now although this be detestable wise: yet is it, and to common among men. And if every man look into himself, a man all shall find themselves guilty of it. If there were no further than that out word ceremony of thanksgiving, yet is it apparent that men make none account of it. Do all men bear in mind to call upon God's name when they sit down to the table? Or when they have taken their repast, do they remember to acknowledge that they be beholden to him for their life and for all things else that requisite for their sustenance? Not rather, they chopped down to the table likes wine and start-up like dogs so as there is no tidings nor remembrance of God's name among them, but to their seeming it is despised of mawkish hypocrisy or pope holiness to thank God. Lo how far of the world is out of Square. Howbeit when we have traced God forth at the beginning and that the ending of our repast, yet is not that enough to discharge us. Therefore if we failing that, we be double and happy. For what will we do in the greater things, if we cannot perform the lesser? For this manner of calling upon God is as good as nothing, I mean in comparison of the knowledge that lies hid in under it, and which has a lively root which shall be treated of more largely anon. For if a man cannot find in their hearts to discharge their duty in their lesser things, is in the lifting of off their hands and in yielding some praise to God by some outward signs, I pray you how will they do that which is commanded them there, that it to know, how will they bless God in all their whole life which is harder thing to do?

Therefore let us Mark, that this unthankfulness of forgetting God, and of yielding no sign of acknowledgement of his benefits he is an ordinary vice. But although it be so, yet failed they not be blameworthy for it, and made their let us think to justify our excuse ourselves by the could custom as a number do, which would fine make a buckler of it against God, bearing themselves on hand that forasmuch us [the over slipping of thanksgiving to God] is so common a thing among man, therefore it is lawful for them to do so also. But that will be no excuse for us, as I said before. For although there be not to, nor been than this lewdness of forgetting God which is daily been a man men, does it follow that therefore the fault should be imputed to them? No, but the more that one of them have hardened and other and all of them are become brutish and have conspired against God, so much the more horrible must their vengeance be.

And therefore let us Mark first of all, that the warning which Moses gives us here (that is to know that when we be full fed we should then think upon God, that is to say, yield him his duty place) is not more than needed. For if we did it of our own accord so as every man came his mind to it, we should not need to be put in mind of it by others. But for as much as we be negligent, the Holy Ghost is fine to prick us for what and to quicken up us as he does in this text. And since we see that the thing which God requires of us is so reasonable and such as we ought to have learnt beforehand by nature, let us be double and ashamed to continue still injustice, and at least wise not to be touched with such warning. It ought to shame us beforehand that God should be fine to tell us of the thing which even little children ought to know. For seeing he is so liberal us to feed us and to nourish us let us at least call he our father and show that we think ourselves beholden to him for that benefit. You see then how we piece to our great shame, that God must be fine to stir up to that thing which even nature ought to have taught us. But if we continue weltering still in that brutishness, what excuse will there remain for us? None at all. And therefore let us practice this lesson, that when God steals us be at leastwise yield him thanks and show that we have not for about and the order of all welfare.

Here a man might demand, why God says now more, but that men should be praised him and blessing in the time of prosperity? For that (as I said) is not all that a Christian man has to do. He must proceed yet for other, that is to know when it pleases God to send us trouble, anguish, poverty, sickness, injury, reproach, we must be obedient to him and bow down our necks in all cases to receive his yoke and to bear it without gainsaying or striving. Therein (say I) lies the perfect true virtue [of obedience] namely when God shall rule us after his good pleasure, and we like well of all his doings towards us and ever ready to bow and to stoop to his hand, whether it be to leave or to die. And so all this is that we can do to God, is nothing without patience. For one of the chief sacrifices that he requires, is that we should quietly endeavor all the adversity that he sends us. And why then makes he no mention of it here? The reason is, first because is desire is to be and generally with us. And if we on our side could suffer it, surely we should be privileged from all the adversity is that trouble is. For had I man know you would justice in him, were he not wedded to the world, where he for word to submit himself to gods will in all things, and he note sealed of vanity or pride in him, nor where he is sorted in his own delights: God would maintain him here as in an earthly paradise. For his scourging of us is of necessity, because he sees that we have need of such medicines. To be short if we were found in our souls, God would deal with us as with strong folk, to whom man minister neither medicines, nor pills, nor pulsations, nor any such other things. But for as much as he sees that we be diseased, he is fine to let us cut our morsels, and to bind us to such diet as he knows to be good for us. He is fine to let us blood, and to give us bitter drinks, pills and such like things. Yes and moreover he is fine now and then to fear us, when he perceives our diseases to be otherwise incurable. Let us mark therefore that in this place God has spoken according to his own nature, because he is inclined of himself to deal gently with men, and is desirous to give us our fill of his benefits, and to hold us as it were in his lap, as a mother does her own child. After that manner would God deal with us, if we could bear it.

And that is the cause why he says, when your God shall have brought you into the good land, and there have killed with his benefits, looking in any wise and to bless his name. Wherefore let us Mark the order which God keeps in the exporting us to serve him. The first point is that for as much as he is desirous to show himself a father towards us, his showing of himself to be such a one, should move us and Marcus be willing to honor him and to love him so much the more, and that seeing he handles us so gently, we also should acknowledge it and glorified him for it all our lifelong. And that our see is a father towards us, so we should be us the children towards him. That say I is the end that we must begin with. But on the contrary part for as much as we be wild headed children, of nature forward, unruly and lewd, God is fine discovers us and to chastise us and they must with the thing. Since it is so, let us learn that if God shows us and angry look and drawn upon us all least to deal roughly with us because he sees as abuse his benefits and that we have not honoring as we ought to do. We must not harden our hearts against him, not take occasion to withdraw ourselves from his obedience, neither must we play these unthrift is that forsake their fathers house is, and run gadding abroad at random, as though they liked better of the gallows than of their inheritance.

Let us refrain from misbehaving ourselves after that fashion against our God, and let us learn to submit ourselves mildly under his hand, assuring ourselves that if he afflict us he has good reason to do it. And although we perceive not the cause why he does it let us do him the honor to submit ourselves to him, and to shut our own eyes, that he may dispose of us according to his own wisdom which is unknown to us. After this manner must we come from the acknowledgement of God's benefits, to the subjection which we ought to yield to him, to humble ourselves under his mighty hand, whensoever he lifts to chastise us or to tame us for our stubbornness, and to cleanse us of our vices and wicked lusts, and of the infirmities which he knows to be in us.

And now proceeding with that which I have touched already: let us mark that it is not enough for us to pray to God with our mouths only: but it must be as a help to convey us further, namely to the dedicating of our whole life to him, accordingly as Moses shows here, adding: You shall not forget the Lord your God, to despise his commandments, statutes, and Laws, which I join you this day. Hereby he shows us that to yield thanks to God is a good and holy exercise, but yet it is not all that we have to do: our life must be answerable to our tongue, and as we have protected ourselves to be beholden to God, so must we show it by our deeds. That is the cause why it is expressly said, beware you forget not your God by fore slowing to keep all his commandments and Laws. Now first of all Moses shows here, whence this unthankfulness of men springs, that they acknowledge not the party which has done them so much good, but forget him utterly. And may that excuse us? Nor it rather makes our fault the heinous, when we think not upon God, seeing he sets his goodness before our eyes, so as we may behold him therein, and we have as fair presidents of him there as if he were lively painted before us in a table, and yet we look not upon him. If God withheld himself from us, so as we found no favor at his hand, and he suffered us to linger in all manner of misery, without giving us any succor when we called upon him: yet were that no sufficient excuse, that we should not seek him. For it is the mean whereby he quickens us up to call upon him the more earnestly. Nevertheless, we might have some color to say, Alas I know not what to do, for God seems to be gone quiet and clean from me, and it is no marvel though I set not my mind upon him, for I have no mean to allure me thereto. But now contrariwise, seeing he offers himself to us, and makes us to perceive his goodness, so as we might even feel him by groping through we were blind: must it not needs be that we be worse than forward, if we think not upon him? Yes, and yet we see this naughtiness to be ordinary among men. For why? When we be once pulled, we bear ourselves on hand that we have no more need of God's help. If necessity pinch us, then we come running to him. But if he sent us the world at will, we become as it were drunken in our delights, all our seeking is to wade deeper and deeper, and to be short, we never come to God but by constraint. Wherein we see that all the prayers which we make to him when he afflicts us, are but fined and untrue. For then we will confess well enough, that we be miserable creature as if he pitied us not. But what? As soon as he has withdrawn his hand we never think upon him anymore. Therefore it is a token that all was but hypocrisy in us before and that we were not rightly and sincerely minded. Now then we shall not fail to be that grievous condemned, if we forget our God when he draws near to us to stop for the more good turns that he does us the more signs and records have been that he is willing to be our father, and to take us for his children, and that he shows himself in such sort to us, as we cannot but know him. If this will not move us, our cursedness is double. And therefore let us learn that when our Lord has made us wealthy, we must not play the beastly folk which despise God when they have the world at will, as who should say they had enough of their own to content themselves with all: but we must bethink us of do things. First (as I said) that if our Lord be liberal towards, is coming to us and his showing to himself so familiar and friendly towards us, is to the end we should know him the better. That is for the first point. And again for the second, let us understand that if we have abundance today, we may be bereft of it in a minute of an hour, so us that man that himself well stored, shall find himself naked, bare and poor, in less than the turning of a hand. Why so? Because God avengers himself of this said unthankfulness. And it is good reason also that he should not suffer a man to forget him when he has showed himself after that fashion to them. Wherefore let us understand that when we be in prosperity we have the just cause to call upon God, not only to show that we be bound to him for the good that he has done us already, but also to show that the goods which we possess were nothing, if he should not continue them and maintain us in them. These are the things which we must bear in mind.

And therefore let us mark, that the more God powers out his benefits upon us, the more ought we to be quickened up by them to think the better upon him. But what? We be far wild from the having of any such discretion with us, and therefore have we so much the more need to bethink us of this lesson that is showed us here, considering what has happened in all ages. Is for the unbelievers, they are often enough upbraided, that when God sends them the world most at will, then do they most kick against him and show themselves most stubborn and rebellious.

But as touching them that call themselves believers: even in them also is the same vice blamed by the Holy Scripture. And not without cause: for we see that even the children of God have been subject to it. What is written of Ezekias? Although he was a peerless pearl and mirror of all holiness: yet we see that as soon as God gave him ease, he was no more mindful to think upon him. Yes, and at what point was even David himself? Seeing then that this misleading fell even upon them that were as half Angels in this world: let us be the watch fuller, and let every of us labor to redress himself both early and late. And seeing there is such slowness in us, let the same spur us forward to bethink us of God's grace, that his name may be blessed and magnified by us. Yeah, and Moses does expressly make a comparison here between God's former guiding of his people, and in his leading of them through the wilderness with his afflicting of them there, after he had brought them out of the thralldom of Egypt, to the end that the same might provoke them the more to be thankful to God. For when we have once felt many miseries and God has delivered us from them, if it move us not the more to yield him his due praise, it is to fouler and heinous fault. And that is the cause why Moses speaks of it. But what? We see how the people of old time behaved themselves. After this deliverance, God delivered his people another time from the captivity of Babylon, wherein he reached out his arm after so noble a fashion, as the Prophets could never think themselves to have spoken enough of his power which he showed therein. Nevertheless, they were no sooner returned home, but every man was busy about the building of his own house, and God's temple was left alone, no man made account of it. It lay open to rain and snow, so as the sacrifices and all the order of the Church lay dead. And what was the cause thereof? Even private profit, which possessed all such as had received that benefit at God's hand. And how far we nowadays I pray you? For if our Lord give us rest and ease, then instead of knowing our shepherd like good sheep, we play the wild beasts with him, and fall to kicking at him. And what are we the better by remembering our former miseries? Without going any further, in what plight have they been, which at this present are well at their ease and rest? And yet are they so far off from faring the better by it, that it grieves them at the heart that any man should tell them of it. They would have all the things buried which they have endured before times, and also the benefits which they have received since, and in the meanwhile become brutish like swine. They could find in their hearts (say I) to advance themselves against God, without being known that they be beholden to him for anything. They never pass for the procuring of God's honor, neither regard they how much they be bound to him. But every man in the mean season follows his own likings. One burns in covetousness, and another in vainglory, seeking to advanced to authority and honor, and to be taken to be I know not what. Thus you see at what point they be, which will needs be taken to be greatest and zealous Christians. Now then seeing it is not only among the Jews that this foul unthankfulness has reigned, but that we also are stained, yes and immeasurable attained with it a this day: Let us be sure that the Holy Ghost warns us also, and that this doctrine of Moses' points at us too. Now therefore let us follow his saying, that is to know, that our life must be answerable to our speech, so as we may show that we play not the hypocrites in praising God. Indeed the mouth must do his office, and every man must inure himself to praise God: and if we do it not, our lewdness is apparent even to little children. For they that set down to the table and when they have filled their bellies rise up again without showing any sign of fear of reverence to God ward, deserve to have little children to spite in their faces, or else to have dung cast upon them, as they that defy nature. For the very Asses and Oxen to observe a natural order in their feeding. Such folk do spite God through their intemperance and excess, and finally would have his name abolished, as they show well enough. Therefore are they very monsters, whom men ought even to abhor. But yet must we not stay there. For here is a rule given us to pray in such sort to God with our mouth, as our life may bear witness therewithal, that our praying to him is done truly and unfriendly. For if when we have protested with our mouth, that God is our father and showed himself liberal to us, and that we live by his grace, and that he gives us all things which he knows to be for our welfare: we after we have said so, do give ourselves to all naughtiness, and take leave to excellent ourselves from all subjections where to shall our Thanksgiving serve which we have yielded within our tongues, but to be as a bond to hold our noses to that grindstone, so as we may have known shift to help ourselves? Then let us learn to sing to God with such melody as Moses speaks of here, that is to know, serve all live agree with our mouth and does God be ordered truly and effectively.

Now here withal let us mark well how he adds, the good heed, that when you has eaten and drunk your will, and built your fair houses and increased you cattle: your heart do not well, and you forget the Lord your God. Here Moses brings to the very well head of the naughtiness that I have touched already. When unthankful and for that God though he shows himself friendly to them, and there praying to him with their tongues is but fine. And whereof comes that? Moses says that it comes of the loftiness of the heart. But let us mark well, that in so saying the tints men's self weaning in challenging that things to themselves which belong lonely to God, as he will express yet better in the end: but all cannot be spoken at once. Then if God have done us any good, no doubt but Italy enforces to grant in words that it is so indeed: but yet for all that, we will not fail to father all things either upon our wisdom, or upon our good fortune, or upon one thing or other.

And therefore no marvel through we be so besotted therewithal, that we think no more upon God. For why? Is there any greater or horrible blindness, than for men to be so proud as to set up their bristles and to know themselves no more, but contrariwise to imagine themselves no more, but contrariwise to imagine themselves to be that which they be not? Now then, when men are carried away with this false opinion of self estimation, they be so over blinded as they have neither reason nor knowledge, insomuch that tell them what a man can, they pass not for it, but continue still in their willfulness. Therefore let us beware of this high-mindedness which Moses speaks of here. And that we may be the wearer to keep ourselves from it, let us assure ourselves that everyone of us have as it were Root of it in us. Until God have rid us of it. Indeed there are some to be seen which are modest, so as if God advance them to honor or wealth, you shall not perceive any pride of change at all in them. If they become great whereas they were little before, you shall see them hold and even hand, and continue still gentle. But where so ever we see that, let us note that God had wrought there, or else it were impossible. For not without cause loveliness and meekness fathered upon his Holy Spirit. When the Holy Scripture speaks of those virtues, exhorting meant to be mild, and not to grow proud, but rather to live quietly with their inferiors: it says that they be singular gifts of that Holy Ghost. Again, we see they be very rare gives. For how do most men behave themselves when they be advanced? [Mildly] Nor contrariwise we see they be intolerable as who should say they came out of the clouds. But let them beware that their tumble not down: for there is no loftiness so high, which God cannot cast down, if men stand in their own conceits and forget themselves. Nevertheless, the world sees that this is too common and there is a double unthankfulness in it. For first they consider not that their wealth which they have, comes from above. But their hearts are hard and in that behalf. And secondly they fall not to consider with themselves after words that they be not worthy of it, to the end they might humble themselves and thank God for it. But contrariwise they be so malicious as they could find in their hearts that all the grace of God in the world were suppressed. We see this apparently in those which cannot abide to for God this at the face of grace that Moses speaks of here, that is to know, to give over themselves to him with all humility and not to challenge any virtue at all to themselves.

Now that we may do so, let us at that which has been touched, that is to know that as God chastised his people in the wilderness, so see also their guide and leader. So then, let us mark well, that after he has rebuked the pride that is in us and told us that if God reach out his hand to advance us, our hearts must not be of the therefore, but we must walk on still in mildness and awfulness [towards God] yes and be gentle and loving and courteous towards our neighbors: he brings us back to consider what beware when God vouchsafed to advance us to worship, riches, and such other like things. Now if we could take hold of this, surely whereas we set up our bristles, we would all of us cast down our eyes continually. True it is that when God has delivered us from our miseries, we must put them quite out of mind, even of purpose to be no more disquieted with the grief that we have endured, after that God has once assuaged it after that fashion, but yet it is not meant that we should never think upon it more. For why? It must always be as a looking glass for us to hold us in awe, that we play not the loose colts. Then if a man be rich, and caught have increased in let him bethink himself from whence comes this to me? Indeed if a man be rich by inheritance, his the more bound to God so as he ought to acknowledge thus, behold what a number of goods God has provided for me even before I was born, so as I have wherewith to content me, and although I be not one penny increased, yet have I already more than I need. Such acknowledgement ought they to yield (say I) which wealthy by succession or inheritance. And when a man's goods of his honor gathering, let him always have this regard, I was once poor and how am I come to the state wherein I see myself us now? It is not meet I should cast a scale is before mine eyes in this case to forget God, but it behooves me to acknowledge his liberality towards me, and that I am beholden to this free mercy for all that ever I have. After this manner ought he that is grown rich, to bethink him of his former poverty. For it will serve to bridle in that he shall not be so misadvised as to wax stout against God, ought to deal cruelly with his neighbors by oppressing or rejecting the end that seemed to be his inferiors: but rather practice this warning of S. Paul, of applying ourselves to the meanest sort, that is to say that although there seemed to be some cause that we should exalt ourselves, yet we must yield to them and stoop to our God. Let them that is advanced in degree think thus, alas, am I worthy of it? Has God brought me to this for my fair eyes sakes? No, but forasmuch as it has pleased him to exult me, it becomes meet to acknowledge what I was before. For had not God look mercifully upon me, it should not only have discontinued in my former state, but also gone to decay, yes, and utterly come to naught. Now if a man bethink himself after this fashion surely he will behave himself mildly and not be so justice us to hold scorn of others. And we have the more need to mark well this doctrine, forasmuch as we see that the halt in us of heart which Moses speaks of here is not a single or double mischief, but such a one us gross a long tail of many inconveniences after it. What is this advancing of ourselves whereas we should to humble ourselves? Is it not (as you would say) a defying of God, and a proclaiming of open war against him? Yes: but alas he is too strong an adversary.

It is said that God will cast down the eyelids of the proud. Behold, God proclaims war not for a day or for a year, but forever, against all such as exalt themselves: and yet in the meanwhile we cease not to wax proud continually more and more. And what think we to win by so doing? On the other side, if unthankfulness be so intolerable towards men: how much more heinous will it be towards God? If a poor man have his dinner sent him: he can well enough tell that he had it not before. Some man has had pity of him, and sends him Corn, bread, or wine. Now if he devour it and cram himself full, and in the meanwhile consider not who did him that good turn: will not men say he is a hoggish villain? He is not worthy to have any good done to him. And yet this unthankfulness touches but a mortal man. Behold, God reaches us his hand from heaven, and whereas the earth brings forth fruits for us: it is the hand of God that bestows those benefits upon us. Now if we vouchsafe not to lift up our eyes to him when he comes so to us, but mussel with our groins in the earth, or else think those things to be of our own getting and deserving: I pray you is not such unthankfulness to too detestable? Yes: and yet moreover it is matched with scornfulness towards our neighbors. For if we cannot find in our hearts to discharge our duty towards God, what will we do towards our neighbors? So then, pride does ever carry cruelty with it: that is to say, they that feed themselves so in their own naughtiness, are always churlish towards their neighbors, and their churlishness is always matched with spite and envy. Insomuch that if we be not persuaded that God gives us all things of his own free goodness, and that it belongs to him to maintain us in the possession of our goods: when so ever we see any man in whom God's gifts shine forth, we shall fall to oppressing of him, and we shall be loath that he should be preferred. And that is yet another over outrages lewdness. Now therefore seen that this over lustiness of mind carries so many vices with it, and makes us guilty so many ways before God, yes, and that even the world itself perceives that shamefulness thereof, and may well abhor it: Let us learn to submit ourselves to that which Moses says here, that is to know, let not our hearts be puffed up when our Lord has increased and multiplied us.

He does not simply condemn that men should grow wealthy: for God's blessing is of such force, that such as are no great wishers, do nevertheless attain to the things which they never looked for, and God out goes their desires, so that whereas they were contented with their slender state, he sends them much more. Well then, this of itself is not to be condemned. Notwithstanding, let us learn to keep our hearts from swelling, and to be always poor in spirit. Although we have riches, yet let us be ready to forego them whensoever it shall please God: let us not be wedded to them: let us not delight to seed ourselves with the immeasurable, made their let us make them an occasion to trouble and to oppress our neighbors. That is the thing which we have to remember upon this text.

Wherefore let us mark that it is no wonder to see small continuance of things in this world and so many alterations from day-to-day. For why? Those to whom God has showed himself most liberal, do give over themselves to all naughtiness and most forget him: and therefore is he faine to withdraw his favor and goodness from them, and to send them scarcity as they be worthy. We see what caused Jeroboam to turn away from the true religion. God had reached him his hand and advance him to the kingdom, yes even when he never thought of it. The Prophet came to him with this message: God will give you the 11 tribes of Israel, so as there shall remain but one and half in the house of David. Now as soon as he was thus with himself: Seeing I am in possession of the kingdom, it stands me on hand to look about me how I may maintain myself in it. And the best way is to provide that the people go no more to the temple of Jerusalem to worship there. For that would be a mean to turn them away from my obedience, and to make them to fall away from me: which thing they cannot do if they have temples here at home, that they may worship the God that is within the country of mine jurisdiction. And thus you see how Jeroboam corrupted the whole service of God, in hope to maintain his own kingdom by it. And what was the cause thereof? Even that he remembered no more of whom he held his royal crown, and that it came to him of God's mere free goodness: but blinded himself in such sort, that he thought to maintain himself even as if it were in despite of God. But we see it was the cause of horrible destruction: so that the people was utterly consumed, and God's vengeance never departed from then. Since it is so, let us learn that the more our Lord shows himself to us, the more must be on our side leave in such modesty as we always do in home age for the good turns that he has done us, and asked the remembrance of that miseries which we have felt, and of the slender and wretched state wherein we have been, may quicken us up and provoke us the more to love our God for showing himself so friendly to us, and to honor him for giving us such occasion thereof by his bestowing of benefits upon us which we never looked for. That is the effect of the things which we have to mark upon this text. And we see nowadays what need we have to bethink ourselves of the good that God has done us. For what a one has he showed himself towards us? I mean if it were but even in respect of the goods of this world. Let us not speak of every one severally, but generally of this place where we be. Alas, it was in oppression and bondage, and it seemed to have been a place appointed to utter ruin, so as there was no hope of recovery as in respect of the world. And yet has God not only planted his word here, but also added freedom moreover and also given us quietness, as we see.

All other countries are troubled, vexed and as good as delivered up to the spoil: and in the meanwhile God gives us respect here. And is not that to the end that we should have the more leisure to serve and honor him? Yes: and yet contrariwise the world sees what lewdness and looseness reigns now more than ever before: so that the more rest we have, the more do we strive against God, and we have no mind to bethink us how bountiful he has showed himself towards us. Therefore let us see that we live in fear, and whereas we have been in some misery, and God has had pity upon us to rid us of it: let us understand that his so doing, was because he was loath that we should perish. He has reached out his hand and overcome our malice, he has fought with this goodness against our naughtiness: and ought not that patience of his, to break our hearts the more [though they were never so hard?] Ought we not to think upon those things otherwise than we do? Is not necessity still present before us? Yes. Then let us mark that Moses speak not alone to the people of old time: but that this exhortation belongs to us also at this day.

And generally let us understand further, that every of us ought to consider well with himself, in what case and in what plight God found him, when he vouchsafed to chose us and to call us to his Gospel. Alas in what taking were we? We were born the heirs of everlasting death, under the tyranny of Satan: and God adopted us to be his children. In what wretchedness are we born even in respect of the world? And God shows himself a father to us even from our mother's womb, as is said of it in the two and twentieth Psalm. Again, let every of us bethink himself how many perils and dangers he has passed through: and how God has delivered us from them all. Seeing then that we do live in this world, have we not good cause to mind God's benefits continually without ceasing, yes and to live meekly therewithal? Yes: for when we have cast up our account, I pray you what cause have to be proud? I mean even of those that are of greatest ability, and bear a goodly port of virtue and wisdom, and of all things else that can be named. Alas, if all be well examined, have we not good cause everyone of us to cast down our eyes? And seeing that God does us good even while we be asleep, and while we think not upon it: are we not double bound to him? Yes verily. Therefore let us know these things, and let us profit ourselves by the things that Moses tells us here, so as every of us in his state and calling, both great and small, may all serve God, and for the performing thereof humble ourselves and not stand in our own conceits, but always have a care to call upon him on whom we depend. And let us know also, that the way to praise God aright, is both to magnify his name, and also to make our life correspondent thereto, so as we show by our deeds, that we be willing to give over our deeds, that we be willing to give over ourselves wholly to him.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, that being cast down in ourselves, we may seek none other means than to resort to him, and to pray him to hold us up with his hand, and specially to strengthen us with the power of his Holy Spirit, so as we may fight in his service, and overcome all the assaults of Satan, the world, and sin, even until he have gathered us into his kingdom. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly & c.

The 61st Sermon, which is the fourth upon the eight Chapter

14. Your heart do not then swell, and you forget the Lord your God which brought you out of the land of Egypt from the house of bondage.

15. And led you through the great and terrible wilderness, full of Serpents that spouted fire, and Scorpions, and of dried without water. But he brought you water from out of the hard rock.

16. And fed you in the wilderness, with Manna, which your fathers knew not: of purpose to afflict you, and to try you, that he might do you good afterwards.

17. That you might not say in your heart, mine own power, and the strength of mine own hand have gotten me these goods:

18. But that you might remember the Lord your God. For it is he that gave you this power to get these goods, to the intent to make good the covenant which he had sworn to your fathers, as appears this day.

19. But if you forget the Lord your God, and walk after strange Gods and serve them, and bow down before them: I protest to you this day that you shall surely perish.

20. As the Lord destroys the Nations before you: so shall you perish, because you have not obeyed the voice of the Lord your God.

Here we must go forward still with the matter which Moses had touched before, and which I have partly expounded already: which is that he tells the people what favor had been showed them in God's delivering o them from the bondage of Egypt, and in his leading of them through the wilderness, which things were not done but of God's wonderful goodness. For when we have been in adversity, and God has delivered us from it, and done us good: his mercy has the greater beauty, and becomes the better known to us, if the adversity be set before us again, and that we be put in mind of it. That then is the meaning of Moses. To the intent that the people should not fall asleep in their pleasures, he says to them, consider in what plight and taking you were, when God reached you his hand to succor you. Consider by what means he brought you into this land where he gives you rest at this time. Be mindful of those things, and you shall have cause to say that you have found so great mercy, as there is no excuse for you if you forget it. And he speaks purposely of the Manna, not to the same end that he spoke to it a while ago: but to do the people to understand, that they had been fed after such a strange fashion, as had not been commonly seen. Behold (says he) you have lived this forty years together without bread or vittles. God has fed you with Manna, which was a thing unknown: and he gave you a new kind of drink: for he made fresh water to come out of the dry and hard rock for you. Thus changed he the order of nature, that you might then better perceive the presence of his Majesty. True it is (as has been declared heretofore) that when the earth brings forth corn, it is through God's blessing of it, and through his breathing of that power into it, albeit we perceive it not. For we despise the things that are common among us, and when we speak of the course of nature, we persuade ourselves that God should be excluded, and that he should bear no sway at all. Now because we be so dull: it was God's will to alter the things that are ordinary among men, and to appoint his people to be fed with Manna, and to drink of the water which he had made to come out of the hard rock. Then that served to show his people his heavenly power the better, that they might be driven to think, we be not nourished after the manner of men. Behold, God utters himself in this behalf, and withdraw us from the world, as though we were going to him, or as though the heavens were set open to us, that we might the better behold his goodness and power, and perceive that it is he that has delivered us, and maintained us.

Finally Moses declares how it was God's will to afflict and try his people, to the end they should not say, It is mine own power and mine own strength that has gotten me this abundance. And here we have to note, first the order which God keeps in teaching his people: which is, to begin with afflictions as Moses expresses here. And so must it be: or else we shall never be well taught, except our Lord have made us to feel hunger and thirst, and to endure poverty and adversity. We know what pride is in men by nature: they be wedded to themselves and stand in their own conceits, and until God have subdued them by force, they be besotted with vain self soothing. Moreover when they be full fed, they fall to kicking against God and acknowledge him not for their master. Therefore to bring us to loveliness and obedience, God is faine to afflict us. Mark that for one point. And God makes this trial that Moses speaks of, not for that he needs to search us, as I have declared heretofore: (for mortal men are faine to make some trial, because they know not what is in folks hearts: but God has no need thereof:

all things are known to him:) but he speaks after the manner of men when he lays things open, and discovers them whether there be any fining or hypocrisy in them, or whether their heart be right, so as they walk roundly and soundly. When God discovers and betrays these things he is said to search, examine, and try men. Albeit his so doing is not for himself, but for us. Or we see how men stand in their own conceits bearing themselves on hand that there is nothing in them but perfect virtue and holiness: but if God nip them a little, by and by the bile bursts, and out comes the poison. Thus you see why it is said that God tries us.

And here we have to bear in mind, that if God afflict us oftentimes, we must not think it strange, considering the needfulness thereof. For if he should let us alone in our delights, and handle every of us according to our own liking: what a thing were that? We would never submit ourselves under his yoke, we should not know what it is to fear him, we should not skill what it is to humble ourselves under his hand, we should not know what it is to call upon him, and to seek all our welfare in him. Seeing then that afflictions are so beneficial: let us learn to bear them patiently, and to submit ourselves to them willingly, though they go against our stomachs. Here is express mention made of humility and obedience. For first of all, if men continue in their loftiness: they cannot bow to obey God and to serve him, but they will needs have the bridle laid aloof upon their neck, and be let alone to follow their own wicked affections and lusts. You see then what stubbornness is rooted in us, until God correct it by main force.

And so there is no obedience, unless men be beat down with main strokes, neither is there any loveliness in them, till then. And why? Because they soothe themselves, and take marvelously upon them, bearing themselves on hand that they want nothing, but that they be very able men, until God have proved the contrary upon them. And that is the thing which Moses expresses in this text when he says, It was God's will so to afflict you. And to what end? To the end you should not say, it is mine own strength and mine own power that have gotten me this abundance. We see that when God suffers the order of nature to proceed, he that is rich thinks not that his wealth comes from heaven, or that God did set any hand to it: but he says that all came to him by inheritance, or by succession, or that he has gotten it by his own travel and policy. Thus do men ever advance themselves, until our Lord show them that they be nothing, nor nothing can do, and make them to feel it spite of their hearts. Therefore were the people of Israel fed after a wonderful fashion by the space of forty years together in the wilderness, to the intent that when they were come into the land that had been promised them and did eat meat, they should think thus: True it is that as now

God gives me meat, but it was not always so: the time has been that he fed me with Manna: therefore must I needs conclude that mine own power has not purchased me the things that I possess: I cannot say that I myself am the founder of them: I must do homage to my God for them, and hold them all of him: I must accept them as of his free gift, that he may let me enjoy them still: for I am worthy to be bereft of them, if I acknowledge not that they come off him. Now albeit that this instruction served for the people of old times: yet belongs it also to us, to the end that such as possess goods may understand, that they have none other interest in them, than because God has blessed them, and powered out his favor and bounty upon them. True it is that God respects not the worthiness or men in this case: for oftentimes he gives riches to the wicked, to the intent it should turn to their sorer condemnation. For as much as he has showed himself so liberal towards them: they must come to account and be punished double, if they benefit not themselves by the favor that was showed them. Yet notwithstanding we must take this for a general rule, that men attain not to riches by their own power, wisdom, or travel, but only by God's blessing, whereof it has pleased him to give a continual president, which serves not only for the Jews but also for us, so as it behooves us to understand, that although some seem to be enriched by their great diligence, yet is it God's blessing, which works with them after that fashion: and that whereas other some are rich before the be born, so as their ancestors have purchased them great possessions, yet do none of these things happen to them by chance, but God's providence overrules all. We must (say I) refer all these things to that which is told us in the Psalm: namely that a man may well rise early and go late to bed, drink water and eat brown bread not half his fill: and yet shall he nothing avail by it, unless God reach out his hand and goodness. On that contrary part, sometimes he will cause goods to light upon his children as they lie asleep. And that shows us that men beguile themselves, if they think to enrich themselves by their own power: and that they be stark mad I they become proud, as though their goods came to them by their own means. For in so doing they blaspheme God, and rob him of his peculiar honor: and therefore is it good reason that they also should be bereft of the things that he has given them. As for example, if a Vassal should step up against his lord to whom he has promised fealty and homage, and refuse all the duties that he is bound to: his good should be ceased, and he be turned out of all that ever he has, and well worthy. Now behold here, God deals his benefits to us as to his Vassals reserving that royalties still to himself, so as he will be known to be chief Lord of that fee: and it is good reason that he should be so, specially seeing he does it not for his own benefit but for ours. Now if we be so malicious and forward as to defraud him, and to set him besides his right: should he not bereave us of the goods that he had given us and make us poor again, that he may drive us of force to sue to him? Yes: and so you see whence the changes come which we behold in the world, that whereas a house is rich and wealthy and never like to decay: a man shall be at his known ends to see it consume and ebb away. I speak not only of houses of mean Citizens: but also of the houses of great Lords, which have so many thousand pounds of yearly Rent: it is a wonder to see how they waste away, first to the half, then to a third part, and finally to nothing. And how may this come to pass? It should seem that God makes pastime, and takes pleasure in turning of wordily things upside down: albeit, that is because of our unthankfulness. For as much as men hold not the things with good conscience, which he has put into their hands: it is merely they should be dispatched of them. Therefore it stands us so much the more on hand, to mark well this doctrine that is contained in these words, You God afflicted you, yes even of purpose that you should not now say, It is mine own hand that has gotten me this abundance. That if love and goodwill cannot persuade us to come so much reason, as to glorify God by acknowledging ourselves to hold all things of him: at least wise his scourging of us may make us to think it, and drive us by some means to be mindful of his grace, so as we may far the better by the examples that he has given us at all times, and not only have an eye to the things that we have seen in our own life, but also to the things which are reported to us in the Holy Scripture, to have been done long ago: I say let us call them to remembrance, because God will have them to serve for our instruction. Now if we be unthankful to our God in these small things: what will we be in the greater things? [much more unthankful] as the world sees.

And if we have need to be tamed by afflictions, least we should be puffed up with pride for our meat and drink: surely we ought much more to be taught by such means, in spiritual matters. For God's honor is more grievously impeached in these cases: and yet we see that men are most inclined that way. Truly it is too great and intolerable lewdness already, when mortal men surmise themselves to be fed and sustained by their own power and labor: their yielding of commendation to their own policy for their meat and drink, is already too shameful a presumption. But if they not only imagine themselves to be sustained by their own pains taking and travel, but also persuade themselves, that they get the kingdom of heaven, and become the children of God, and live in holiness, and all through their own free will: is not God thereby robbed of the praise that is due to him alone? Yes: for he is not only bereft of his right in these frightful and transitory things of the world: but also the chief part of his honor is taken from him, that is to know, that he corrects the naughtiness which is in us, that he quickens us through his goodness, that he calls us to salvation, and that all the goodness which we have, should be acknowledged to come off him. And yet notwithstanding, we see how freewill has been magnified, and even at this day one of the greatest controversies which we have with papists, is that they cannot be made to believe, that men are utterly corrupted and marred, and that they be not only weak, but also utterly unable to do any good. Indeed they will well enough grant that there is some feebleness and faulty infirmity in men: but yet to their seeming there is still some power in them, and hat if God do but help us and supply our weakness, it is enough. But when men overshoot themselves so far, and will needs challenge a divine power to themselves: is it not meat that they should be beaten back, and that God should subdue them by force, and make them to stoop, yes and beat down and break asunder the devilish pride that is in them? Yes. And indeed that is the very cause why he handles us in this transitory life, as he handled his people in the desert. For the life that we lead here beneath, is answerable to the journey which the people of Israel made those forty years in the wilderness. We be fed here with bread and wine: but yet nevertheless we crave our ordinary food at God's hand as if he sent us Manna from heaven. And verily we be in this world, as in a wilderness: we see what dangers hem us in on all sides: God is fine to guide us, and to make us perceive his presence so many ways, as we may well think that the wilderness was a true figure of our state such as it is at this day. For as yet God lets us alone in our infirmities, we feel ourselves in pitiful plight, we be so weak as we need not anything to cast us down, the devil does draw us into his nets, we be destitute of all grace, we see what troubles do stop our eyes, and we know not what to say, neither on which side to turn us. And why does God handle us so? Why be we not here as in an earthly paradise? Because we have need to be nurtured after that fashion: for otherwise what would become of our pride? We would not think ourselves beholden to God for anything: but every of us would make an idol of himself, and worship himself in his own conceit. Therefore it is our Lord fain to afflict us, and to show us that we be, to the end to make us stoop, and thereby to teach us to glorify him. Thus you see what we have to mark upon this text of Moses: where he says, Your God afflicted you in the wilderness.

And so let us know that God's chastising of us all our life long, is not only to subdue us to his will, to the intent we should be obedient: but also and chiefly to humble us, that we might not presume anything of ourselves, but utterly distrust our own strength and ability, and resort to him: and moreover that when he gives us prosperity, we should consider whence it comes, for it is not in our own power to compass it: and finally that we should not do as a number of hypocrisies, do, who will well enough confess themselves to be in rueful case, and that they be wretched creatures: but as soon as God has relieved them and delivered them from their bondage, they fall to scouting against him, and think no more upon the misery that is past. Now then it is not enough for us to condemn ourselves when we be pinched by God's hand, and to say, indeed it is true that if God succored me not I should be destitute of all that might do me good: but also when God shall have given us all that we can wish, and we feel his blessing abundantly, even then must we beware than ever we were that we forget him not, and we must not compare the time present, with the time that we have over past, as thus: what had become of me, if God had not reached me his hand? I had been undone a hundred thousand times. And has not his manner of succoring me been wonderful? Should I now challenge anything to myself? Thus you see how that even in the time of our abundance, that is to say, even when God gives us our hearts desire, we must always be mindful of our former adversity, and that in such sort, as the honor may redound lonely to God, as meet is it should. That is the thing which we have to bear away in effect upon those words of Moses.

Now he adds, You shall remember the Lord your God, that it is he which has given you the ability to get all the goods which you have. Here Moses intends to prevent all that ever men can allege on their own behalf. For they be but too much given continually to seek some color and show that their wealth comes of themselves. When men take pains for their living, they have an eye to their own policy, whether they be of sufficient ability and skill or not: that is the thing which they look at. It seems then, that when a man has travelled for his living, he had at least wise a good and forward wit, he was vigilant, he took good opportunities, he shunned the things that might do him displeasure, and therefore men should do him wrong to say he did nothing to it, and that it was the free gift of God: for experience is against it.

But Moses answers to all this, saying that although men take never so much pains, and strained themselves, and have never so good forecast to shift for themselves, and be never so well advised and discreet: yet must not God be bereft of his honor. For why? Who is that gives men discretion, aptness of body, strength to endure pains, furtherance, and helps? Is it not God that puts all things into their hands? And yet is not this all. For God must also bless all the benefits that he gives us: or else though a man be never so highly advanced, and God needs no more but to give him a tickle with his little finger, or to blow up on him, and by and by all is quite swept away: all is but as an herb that is green in the morning, which withers and dries away as soon as the sun shines upon it, as is said in the Psalm, Then let us mark well, that Moses adds not this saying without cause, namely that we must think ourselves beholden to God for all things, and acknowledge that it is he which gives us the power to get goods. And under the word Power his intent is to comprehend all that ever we can attribute to ourselves, whether it be of natural ability and handsomeness to do things, or of helps and means that we have to further us withal. For unless God govern and guide us with his hand: surely all that we can do is to no purpose, but all shall go clean contrary to our intent. And indeed we see how that ablest men that are, do deceive themselves, and men need not teach them any deceits (as they say) in respect of the world. God laughs at their fondness in making their discourses and at their reckoning without their host, and in the end overthrows all. And so, by the word Power or Strength, Moses meant not only that health and disposition of body to travel, and the wit and discretion of mind which we ought to have: but also the having of things in our hands, and God's blessing of them, that he make our labor come to good pass, so as it fall out to our benefit. If we bear this lesson well in mind, it will do us good all our life long, so as prosperity shall not blind us, neither shall we fall asleep to forget our God: but we shall understand that when he gives us wealth, we must think ourselves beholden to him for it, and by what means so ever it came to us, that glory thereof must not therefore renowned to us, but be reserved to him, as to the party that bestows his benefits upon us, distributing them as he himself things good, and giving to every man such portion of them as he lifts, not for any desert of ours, but to make us feel his goodness. Be we once thoroughly persuaded of this, we will thereby take warning not to abuse our abundance, as they do which overshoot themselves into all unruliness, which mount up into pride, and which are given to pomp and vanity to make a show of themselves. I say we shall be restrained from all these vices. For it not for any desert of ours that God gives us riches. Where is it then? To draw us to him, that we might have him to be our Savior, and find him beneficial and kind towards us. Therefore we must use his benefits soberly and measurably: and besides that, we must not be given no lustiness and bravery in wanting ourselves to that world ward. Finally we must not think to have a state of perpetuity in our goods, as though they might not be taken from us: but we must always put them into God's hand, so as if he give us abundance today, we in yielding him thanks for the same, should be ready to bear poverty with patience tomorrow. By that means you see that neither riches nor any other like thing shall dazzle our eyes to make us stand too much in our own conceit, and to glory in ourselves. For we will always think thus: what am I, but that it pleases my God to give me more goods than he does to my neighbors? He may take that away again whensoever it pleases him. Then must I not imagine that I have deserved aught: but I am the more bound to my God, in that he has vouchsafed to make me thus to feel his favor. And I must not be proud of it: for that were a kicking against my master that feeds me. Therefore must I abate the farness which would provoke me to pride, and in the end make me to forget God.

Again, when we be thus humbled as touching the transitory things of this world: let us repair to the principal point, which is, that when our Lord shall have strengthened us with his Holy Spirit, so as we shall have sought manfully against all the temptations of the world, and have served him in such wise as it may be said of us, that we have given good example to others: yet we be not carried away with foolish vainglory: but consider thus with ourselves, it is my God that has given me this power. Why am not I as bad as the worst naught pack in that world? Why am I not carried away with blind and beastly lusts to give myself to all lewdness, but because my God preserves me? I have had encounters that were hard to bear: and how happens it that I have gotten the upper hand of them? It is my God that gave it me. They therefore to whom God gives the power of his Holy Ghost must acknowledge themselves so much that more bound to him, and that they have not that power by natural inheritance, but by God's gift, to that end that he only should be glorified with all humility, and that we should not play that lying hypocrites as they do which confess with their mouths that it is God which has granted them that grace, and yet cease not to persuade themselves that it comes of their own freewill. But let us utterly empty and quite rid ourselves of such over weaning: and let us confess truly that we know ourselves to have all things of God. And if this be to be acknowledged in bread and wine: what ought to be done concerning the heavenly life, and in the things that belong peculiarly to God, and are above the reach of men? It should seem that men are able even of nature to get themselves meat and drink: but when it comes to that making of themselves, God's children, and companions of the Angels and that they should lead a holy life: in that case they have nothing of their own.

And therefore when we think upon the corruption wherein we be by the sin of Adam, and consider that God has cleansed us from it: let us assure ourselves it is God's free gift, as well as is his continual maintaining of us, and his strengthening of us at our need.

After that Moses has spoken so: he adds, That if the people turn away from GOD and serve strange goods: God will be angry with them, and they shall perish as the people did whom he was above to cast down before them. You shall perish after the same manner says he. Moses' adding of this threat, is to waken them up the better, which cannot think upon God when they be too full fed with the good that he has done them. And it happens well near continually to all men, that if God warn them gently, and deal friendly with them, and let them sit at rest as it were in his lap: then it is no speaking to them: for they give him the deaf ear, and abuse his favor by tempting his patience, and the more that he spares them, the less do they seem to regard his love and favor. Therefore does it behooove men to be wakened and quickened up with threatening. It is true, that God endeavors as much as is possible to win us by gentleness and not by constraint. But when he sees us so hardhearted, that if he speak gently to us, we make but a mock of his doctrine, and vouchsafe not to think upon it: then does he add threatening. After the same manner deals Moses both here and I many other places, and it is the common order of speech of the Holy Ghost throughout all the Holy Scripture. Then let us mark well, that God for his part is loath to speak otherwise than gently to us, and would fain so waken us as we should come to him willingly. But our naughtiness and lewdness betrays itself, in that instead of coming to him, we retire from him. Seeing he allures us gently, speaking to us as a father, or rather as a mother to her little children: must it not needs be that we be too forward, when we turn our backs upon him, and despise him for showing himself so loving to us? Yes: and yet is it an ordinary vice among us. And therefore let us not think it strange, though we hear threatening oftentimes in that Holy Scripture, and that God sets his wrath before us: and that we be so rebuked when we come at Sermons. For why? Let every man look into himself: and if God should always set his promises before us and say, come my children, come: let us see that if that would suffice. Nor contrariwise we see how every man abuses such goodness. And therefore whensoever there is any sharpness or vehemence in the doctrine that is set forth to us in the name of God: let us understand that our naughtiness requires it, and that without it we should continue still in our filthiness and rot in our own doing, so as there would be no means to pluck us out of it, because every man delights in his own destruction. And if we were not afraid of God's judgment, never would any of us all play the judge towards himself, but we would think ourselves to be escaped out of God's hand, and every of us would wink at his own faults. For although God cite us to his judgment seat, and endue us there to make us ashamed: yet cease we not to sleep still in our sins. And what would we then do if we were not threatened? So then it is not without cause, that the Holy Ghost having used gentleness, falls to roughness. For it is meet that men should be so dealt withal, and that God should not only wring them by ears, but also strike them hard, to the intent to bow them, that they may yield themselves reachable and be disposed to come to him, which thing they would never do with their goodwill.

And now Moses says expressly, If you forget the Lord your God, and go after strange God's: Whereby he does us to understand, that inasmuch as the Israelites had been trained in the sound doctrine, and in the right religion: they could not turn away to superstition and idolatry, but through unthankfulness in forgetting God. For why? If God have once taught us his truth, and manifested himself to us: it ought to suffice us, because it is so great a light as we cannot go amiss, but of willfulness. If a man that walks at noon days do run against a stone or tumble into a ditch, can he say I see it not? He sees plainly, and besides that, he has the Sun to guide him: and how can he then excuse himself? Even so is it with us: When God has enlightened us by giving us his word, we can no more walk in darkness, insomuch that if we rush against anything, it is through our own willfulness: and if we fall into the ditch, we ourselves are too blame for it. that is the thing which Moses meant in saying, If you go after strange Gods, you forget the Lord your God. The poor Paynims that were in those days, had more to excuse themselves with all than the Jews had, because God showed not himself to them. But forasmuch as the people of Israel had received God's law, so as he had set them in the way of salvation: they could not say. We know him not, according to the solemn protestation which we shall see that Moses makes in the two and thirtieth Chapter. I call heaven and earth to witness this day (says he) that I have set you in the way of salvation, so s you cannot henceforth allege that you have not heard anything, or that if you had been taught, you would have done your endeavor to live according to God's will. I have showed it you sufficiently, therefore follow it.

Now must we benefit ourselves by this doctrine, and apply it to our use nowadays. For the Papists, Turks, and Paynims live in ignorance, and no marvel at all. True it is that yet for all that they shall not fail to be condemned before God. But yet are we much more blameworthy than they, if we stick not to our God. And why? For he has sent us the pure doctrine of his Gospel, he has vouchsafed to give us the understanding of his truth, so as we may now discern between good and evil. Now if we turn again to our old superstitions, can we say we were deceived through ignorance? No: but God will always hold us at this bay, that we have forsaken him like backsliders, and broken our faith like pervert, disloyal caitiffs.

You see then that the thing which we have to mark upon this place, is that when God has manifested himself to us by his word, so as we know the way of salvation: it behooves us to be the more circumspect, and to hold ourselves the father to the pureness of his doctrine. For if we swerve from it, it is because we have forgotten our God, that is to say, we have willfully turned our back upon him, and forsaken him after our knowing of him. Indeed this is laid to the charge of all men in general, I mean even of the ignorance: for God manifests himself to all men, even by heaven and earth though he do no more. But here the case concerns God's word, which is the familiar manner of showing himself to us. And had we this lesson well printed in our hearts so as we could bethink us to benefit ourselves by the things that are showed us nowadays in the Gospel: we would never forget our God, to step aside after superstitions.

Notwithstanding, let us mark by the way, that if other sins be intolerable before God: he abhors idolatry and the corruption of his service above all other crimes. Indeed if a man that knows the Gospel do give himself to deceit and extortion, and be full of pride, cruelty and malice, or cast himself into whoredom and other filthiness and infection: God will surely punish him: for it is too great a provoking of him, when we defile ourselves so, after he has sanctified us. But if we decline to idolatry: that is not a private offence, springing only of infirmity that carries us away: but it is an utter renouncing of God, it is a giving of him over, as though we intended to have no more to do with him. And we must mark moreover, that although an upright, honest, chaste and sober conversation be a part of God's service: yet the chief serving of him, is to put our trust in him, to honor him, to call upon him, and to protest him to be our only God. But when we fall to making of Idols, and set them up in his place: is it not a robbing of him of his Godhead? Can we make any more open war against him? Is it not all one as if we would pluck him down from heaven, and put him from the government of the world? Yes. Seeing then that the corrupting of God's service brings so horrible confusion: let us not think it strange that Moses should tell the Israelites here, that if they gave themselves lewdly to idolatry, God would consume them: Yes and that not by gentle and favorable means as in way of chastisement: but by rooting of them out quite and clean, as the people should be rooted out which had dwell before them in the land that he had promised them. The thing was not yet done: but yet Moses speaks of it as of a thing that was most certain to them.

And surely God's promise ought to bear great sway with us, when he be highest us any good: and so ought his threatening to be taken to be as sure, when he cannot draw us to him by gentleness. And that is the cause why Moses says, I protest to you this day. Now by this saying we be warned that God takes as it were a solemn recognizance of us, when he sends us his word: and that the faithful preaching thereof is as an open proclamation to summon us and to cite us. Like as when a man refuses to do his duty, then to the intent he may answer to the law, he is cited, and his adversary commences suite against him: even so does God deal with us. For (as I said before) he desires no more but that we should come to him by gentleness and friendly dealing. But yet if we be slow and negligent, so as he cannot allure us to him: then does he enter his suite and make protestation against us after this manner: well then, I have done what I could to win you, and yet notwithstanding you have been stubborn still towards me, and therefore I protest against you. He sends his ministers as his proctors, yes and he sends them with solemn commission, as if some Notary whereby to make a public instrument, [as if he should say] I protest against you that it was not long of me that you were not rid out of the destruction wherein you are: if you perish, the fault is in yourselves. Wherefore let us mark this well, to the end that when we come to a Sermon, or read the Holy Scriptures, if we find any soreness or vehemence that grieves us: we do not therefore forbear to receive the things that are told us in God's name, assuring ourselves it is the greatest benefit that can befall us, to suffer ourselves to be so rebuked by God's word, forasmuch as it brings us to him by repentance. And therefore let us see that we be not bereft of such a benefit by our own lewdness.

Not let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, so as we may be brought to true repentance, to mortify all our wicked lusts, that we may be wholly subject to him, desiring nothing but to please him in all respects, and to lead our lives according to his holy commandments: and that although we be weak, yet we may not cease to go forward still towards our way's end through his power, assuring ourselves that he will have his hand continually stretched out over us to strengthen us, until he have given us full victory over all assaults, and finally taken us up into the glory which he has promised us in the kingdom of heaven. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth, & c.

On Tuesday the 27th of August 1555

The 62nd Sermon, which is the first upon the ninth Chapter

Hearken O Israel, This day shall you go over Jordan, to enter possession upon Nations greater and mightier than yourself, and upon cities that are huge and walled up to heaven.

2. A people great and tall, even the children of the Enakims whom you has known, and of whom you has heard say, who is he that can stand against the children of Enact?

3. Know you therefore this day, that the Lord you God goes before you as a burning fire: he will destroy them and subdue them before your face, he will drive them out and rid them away, as the Lord has said to you.

4. And when the Lord you God shall have cast them out before your face: say not you in your heart, The Lord has brought me into this land to possess it, for my righteousness sake: for the Lord has driven out these Nations before you face for their wickedness.

5. It is not through thin own righteousness or for the rightness of your heart, that you are come to the possession of their Land. But for the wickedness of those nations, has the Lord your God driven them out before your face: and to perform the word which the Lord your God swear to your fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob

6. Know you therefore that it is not for thin own righteousness that the Lord your God has given you this good land to possess: for you are stiff necked people.

We have two extreme vices in us. The one is that God promise us anything, and we find it hard: we be utterly dismayed, and to our see is no way for God to perform the thing that he has spoken: wherein we deface his power, and yield him not his due honor. For as soon as God has said the word: although the thing seem utterly impossible: yet ought we to conclude, that he will find means well enough to bring it to pass. And why? For his power is infinite and ought not to be measured after our imagination. Therefore we must glorify the Lord, saying: Alas my God: indeed I am at my wits end in this case: but I leave that matter in your hand, you cannot work after such a fashion as I cannot now comprehend. But instead of honoring the Lord after that manner, we be full of doubting and unbelief, and fall to scanning whether God will be as good as his word or no. And if any let come in our way, we think we be disappointed of our hope.

Also there is another extremity on the contrary part: which is, that when God has brought things to pass, and matters are dispatched, we father the doing of them upon ourselves, as though God were nobody, and forgetting the perplexity wherein we were before, we besot ourselves with fond over weaning, to set out our own praise. Thus is God robbed of his honor two ways: and it is our manner of dealing in all cases.

For as I said, if we think the thing to be hard: we persuade ourselves that it shall never come to pass: And when it is done, we deface his working, and endeavor to take the praise of it to ourselves, and we be so unthankful to him, that we would have him plucked out of his seat. For this cause Moses makes such an exhortation here, as wherein he reproves both parts. For on the one side he enter into the land that was promised you. Now I am sure you will be afraid: for you must fight against great and strong Nations, which do far surmount you every way. It may be therefore that you will be dismayed and out of heart, and thereupon turn head, so as you shall be disappointed of the heritage that God has promised you. But pluck you up a good courage in him and assure yourselves that it is through his power that you must conquer the land of Canaan, your God will be your guide: and you must understand that he is devouring fire, to consume all your enemies.

Therefore be not afraid for anything that you shall see, but assure yourselves that the power of God passes all capacity of man. Now then, if you find yourselves abashed: stay, and let God go through with his work, and he will show that he can (without help of man) consume all those against whom he has armed himself in his wrath. Be mindful therefore of the power of your God, and trust thereunto, and be bold to rest upon it. That is the first point which Moses touches here, and it serves to correct the said distrust with all, namely, that men look no further but whether a thing be easy or not, and thereupon conclude so fondly, that they make not such account of God as they ought to do. Beware (says Moses) that you embrace not the power of your God, through any imagination of unbelief.

And afterward he comes to the second part, and tells them that when God shall have given them the upper hand of their enemies, they must not boast themselves of it, as though it proceeds of their own worthiness, desert, ability, power, or skill. And why? For God (says he) God had tarried patiently for them, to see if there were any amendment and conversion. But when they continued hardhearted still, and that the mischief increased more and more: was it not reason that God should execute his judgment? Yes verily. So then the Jews are warned that they should not be puffed up with any vain self weaning, as though they had been worthy to be placed in the land of Canaan: but rather consider that God executed his vengeance upon those nations for their evil life, and therefore that they which should succeed them, ought to humble themselves the more. And moreover, that if they compared themselves with their enemies, there was no cause why they should think themselves to have the better case, or that they ought to be preferred before them: I say, there was no cause why they should have any such conceit. For Moses tells them, that the covenant which God had made with their fathers, was concluded long before any of them were born: whereupon it follows, that God had no respect to their deserts. I have told you moreover that the same covenant was free bestowed: for it was not grounded upon any service of men, but God's intent therein was to set forth his own goodness and mercy. You see then that the Israelites are bereft of all power and glory, and that all wordily lustiness is here beaten down, so as only God must be known to be good and righteous, and men are bound to him in all cases, insomuch that they must keep their mouths shut, and not boast of their own power and virtue, as though they were folk of good ability. That in effect is the thing that is treated off in the text which I have rehearsed.

And these two vices which Moses rebukes, reigns not only at some onetime: but they reign still at this day, and we have them rooted in our nature. Therefore let us mark well that this doctrine is directed to us at this day, and that it behooves us to benefit ourselves by it. So then, as touching the first point, let us call to mind the lesson that is showed us by the example of our father Abraham, when it is said, that he believed beyond hope, giving glory to him that had made the promise, in believing him to be able to bring the same to pass. Lo here a general rule for all the faithful: which is, that if they purpose to lean to God's promises, they must not deem of them after their own wit and imagination: (for what a thing were that?) but they must assure themselves that God has means in his hand, which are unknown to them, and which they conceive not, and that it is enough for them to have his word, which is the infallible truth. This reaches very far: but it shall suffice for this present, to gather a short sum of it. For then God calls us to him, if we consider but what we ourselves are: surely we shall be utterly dismayed. As for example, when God promised issue to Abraham, he was a man already decayed and sore broken, as well with age as with travel that he had endured. His wife also was past the age of childbearing, and moreover she had been barren all the time of her life: it might seem then that God had mocked him in promising him issue. But what? He had not an eye to his own body which was for worn and broken with age, (as says Saint Paul:) neither had he an eye whether his wife were able to conceive or not: but seeing that God had spoken the word, he rested upon thereupon, assuring himself that forasmuch as God is faithful, he should not be disappointed in trusting to him. And after the same manner must we deal, seeing we have so fair looking glass. For (as I said) if we have an eye to our own frailty: in respect of our bodies we be but carrions and rottenness: and yet does God promise us the glory of his everlasting kingdom. Does the thing seem possible to us? Yet then we fail of our duty every minute of an hour: and yet does God promise us such strength as shall get the upper hand of the whole world. Let Satan do the worst he can, and let all the powers of hell embattle themselves against us: and yet shall we never be overcome. Where now shall we find this strength? So then it may seem that GOD dallies with us, when he promises us the things which we cannot conceive, nor reach to by our own understanding. But what? We must mount up higher, and we must submit ourselves to him with such humility and subjection, as to acknowledge that he is able to perform his promise towards us in all things whatsoever he has spoken. And how? We know not that: that passes our capacity: but let us have our eye upon God.

For the chief honor that he requires at our hands, and the very sacrifice that he requires, is that we should acknowledge his word to be the very undoubted truth, notwithstanding that our wit and imagination tell us the clean contrary. And that is the cause why the Prophet Abacus says that he will go up into his tower to keep watch. When the case concerns faith, we must not stay here beneath upon the earth, neither must we look but before our noses as they say: but we must learn to go up into our tower, that is to say, to discharge ourselves of all worldly encumbrances, and to consider, that if we have not pitched our anchor in heaven as the Apostle says, we shall be tossed with such storms and whirl winds, as will swallow us up. Look me upon them that sail on the sea. If they spy a storm, they cast. Anchor, for that is their trust. Though there come never so great waves, and although their vessel be weather beaten and driven to and from, yet does their Anchor preserve them. And he uses this similitude, to show us that our anchor hold must reach up to heaven, and that we must conclude boldly, that God's saying of the word is enough. For he is not variable as mortal men are. Again, he is not lavish in promising fondly, without knowing whether he be able to perform or not. But if he speak a thing and perform it not out of hand: let us assure ourselves that his meaning is to humble us thereby, though we conceive not his dealing. And therefore let us remember at one word, that we must take God for our good and leader all our lifelong. If we be weak, let us lean to his strength. If we have strong and mighty enemies: let us hope that being under the keeping and protection of our God, we shall be preserved from all danger, and our enemies shall not be able to do anything against us.

And now let us apply this doctrine to our own use two manner of ways. For we be assailed on all sides in this world, both in body and in soul. We see what the Church of God is nowadays: we be but a small handful of folk, and our enemies are a huge multitude: they seem able enough to eat us up at one bit: we be like sheep without any strength, and they be like ravening wolves full of cruelty, they have all the might and power of the world on their side. Thus you see in what plight and taking the faithful at this day. Nevertheless since we hear that our Lord broods us under his wings, and will be the preserver of our life, assuring us that he will be both a wall a vampire and dies to us: let us trust thereunto, and not doubt but he will preserve us. Although the world practice what it can against us, yet shall we be always safe, so we flee for refuge to our God, and ground ourselves upon the promise that he has made us, which is, that both our life and our death are precious in his sight. And that is the cause why Moses uses this preface: Harken of Israel. It is not a needless speech: but forasmuch as we be tempted to unbelief, and cannot hold ourselves to God and stick to his promises, because the cumbrances of this world have gotten the upper hand of us already: therefore does God exhort us to hearken to his word, and he wakens us up, to the end we should not lie still asleep, but understand, that he is able to overcome all the dangers wherewith we be besotted and assailed in this world. Now then, as concerning our worldly enemies, which practice the destruction of our bodies: let us not doubt but God is able to withstand them. Again, there is the devil, there are infinite temptations, and we have war every man within himself, so as sin dwells in us which is the worst and deadliest enemy that we have. But yet let us not doubt but we shall well enough wade out, seeing it is said that God will be our leader. For although our strength be weak or rather none at all: yet will God reach us his hand, so as we shall be unvanquishable. And when it seems that we should be utterly overthrown: we shall be held up by the power of our God. Therefore let us put our trust in him: let us rest upon his promise: and let us not be afraid that we shall be deceived.

On the contrary part we cannot rust to ourselves (be it never so little): but God will laugh such over weaning to scorn: insomuch that if we put our trust in creatures, we must needs be deceived and beguiled. But if he case concern the yielding of glory to God: let us not be afraid, that our boldness shall turn us to shame, as the Scripture says in a number of places.

And Moses plainly says here, that God will be their leader, yes, and even as a consuming fire to destroy all things that shall be against them. This is not added without cause. For when we be disposed to further our own fearfulness, we exalt the power of our enemies above measure, and of little dwarfs we make Giants. And what will we do then, when our enemies be tall and strong indeed? We will be much more astonished at them. But yet does Moses tell us here, that we must not seed such doubts and distrusters. And for the same cause he uses this similitude, that God's fighting for us shall not be after the common fashion: but that he will be as a fire to devour all. Albeit then that we have neither sword, spear, gun, nor other artillery: yet let us suffice us to know, that God has means enough to help us withal, which we know not of. And because this cannot be so well expressed as were requisite: he says that if we see a fire, we know it is able to burn up a forest, a city, or a whole country: and therefore we ought not to doubt, but that God is strong enough for our enemies, seeing he is a consuming fire. So likewise, when David intends to comfort himself in the midst of his greatest troubles, so as he seems to be hemmed in on all sides, and ready to be swallowed up into the gulfs of hell, we hear how he often times says that God is a consuming fire, and assures himself that all they which set themselves after that fashion against him, shall be consumed thereof, and that they conspire his death shall be devoured of that fire which consumes all things.

After this manner must we put this saying of Moses in practice. And from hence that David drawn his said doctrine, as from the fountain that served all the other Prophets to gather right comfort of, wherewith to resist and overcome all the troubles that could be fall them: and the same also is the cause why Moses declares that God is a consuming fire to dispatch all the enemies of his people. Also David flees thereunto for refuge, when so ever he sees great armies embattled against him, so as he is as a man past hope [of Victory] and is as good as banished out of his own country, yes and moreover there are so many that practice his destruction, that he is vexed out of all measure. You see then that he is as a wretched man in utter extremity, and as a silly creature past hope of recovery: and yet for all that, he ceases not to make his boast, that he will never be afraid as long as he has God on his side. And after the same manner does Saint Paul conclude: If God be on our side, who shall be against us? Not that we shall not have store of enemies: but that they shall not be able to prevail against us.

They shall make their triumphs beforehand, but the victory go with us, if we have God for our defense. Now we see the reason of this similitude. In the fourth Chapter of this book Moses used the like saying, but it was to another purpose. For there his meaning was to stir up the people to fear and wariness.

And indeed we have need to know that God is a consuming fire two ways. The one is the same that we have seen in the fourth chapter, which is also alleged by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews, who expounded this text faithfully, saying: My friends, it is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God: let us beware how we dally with such a Lord, and let us receive his word with all reverence, or else we shall find therein that God is a fire to consume us. Indeed when God comes to us and calls us to him, he allures us graciously, and he shows us all manner of gentleness and fatherly loving kindness. But yet however he deal, his meaning is not that men should abuse his goodness, as we see these scorners do, of whom there is ever too great store. We see a number of scorners in these days which scoff at God's word, bearing themselves on hand, that he which reigns in heaven, has no authority over them. They overshoot themselves with desperate malapert, and betray themselves to have no more religion than dogs, and yet they persuade themselves that they may mock with God after that fashion in all matters, and yet notwithstanding that they shall escape unpunished. Now forasmuch as men are so thankless, and do set up their hellish bristles against God to despise his goodness, it is said, that they shall feel him to be a consuming fire. Although he show himself a father, avow us to be as his children, so as he will hold us and nourish us in his lap, of purpose that we should behave ourselves mildly towards him, and yield him his due honor and love: yet if we abuse his gracious favor, so as we yield him no reverence nor subjection: then instead of feeling his fatherly loving kindness, we shall find him a consuming fire to devour us. Thus you see how we must first of all take hold of that which Moses says here, to the intent we may live in awe, fear, and humility, and always hold ourselves under the yoke and obedience of him that has adopted us; and be true children towards him as he is a father towards us.

Albeit let us mark here withal, that he is a consuming fire to devour our enemies. When we see our enemies threaten us, and that they become proud and stately against us, so as it may seem that they should destroy us with their only looks: let us take hold of God's power to comfort us in all our afflictions, and let us consider that it is enough for us that God is a consuming fire. Thus you see how we must apply this doctrine to double use: first, that it may be as a bridle to hold us in awe and subjection under our God: and secondly that it maybe as a bulwark to outstand all temptations. When we be struck in fear, because we hear that our enemies do practice, all that every they can against us: and that it is in their hand to overthrow us and destroy us: yet let us come still back to this point and say, Well then, and what shall our God do? Think we that he sits idle in heaven? Indeed it may well be that for a time he will suffer us to be vexed, and to have our necks under the sword; and to be as silly sheep led to the slaughter: but yet for all that, our life is precious in his sight, because he has chosen us to be his heritage. And although he suffer us to be troubled for a time: yet in the end he will make us perceive that he was always at hand with us, so as we shall have continual cause to glorify him, especially when we shall see that he shall have overthrown all those which now have their own swings against us, in comparison of whom we be nothing at all. Thus much concerning the saying wherein God is called a consuming fire.

Now Moses comes to the second matter which we have touched, which ought to be well marked: namely, that when God has helped and succored us, and done more for us than we looked for, or than our wit could conceive: we must yield him his deserved glory, so as we be not so with pride and over weaning, to challenge that to ourselves which belongs lonely to God: let us beware of such unthankfulness. Again, let us not imagine that God serves his turn by us, in respect of any worthiness of ours: but let us understand that his choosing of us is only in respect of his own good will. We shall not find any deserving at all in ourselves in this behalf: but it is of his only free mercy, which he will have us to magnify above all things.

True it is, that Moses speaks here of the land of Canaan. But if men cannot deserve anything in this world in respect of transitory things: how shall they deserve everlasting life? If I cannot win a little piece of ground: how shall I win a whole realm? So then, let us mark that of the things that are said here, we must gather a general doctrine, which is, that if the children of Israel were put in possession of the land that had been promised them, not for their own righteousness sake, but through God's free goodness: it is much more reason that when we speak of the heavenly life, and of the inheritance of the heavenly glory, we should not dream upon any power of our own, but acknowledge that God has uttered his righteousness and showed his goodness in his vouchsafing to choose us. And let us mark well the arguments and reasons which Moses alleges here, to pull down all pride withal, that men might not take occasion to vaunt themselves. God (says he) has driven out these people before you. That is one point. So then, will we be rid of all vainglory? Let us behold ourselves advisedly in those whom God punishes, and against whom he uses his extreme rigor. Are we any better than they? Indeed a number of us can well flatter ourselves: but yet we reckon without our host, we come all of Adam's corrupt race, we be all forlorn and damned by nature. What is to be done then? Surely if we consider well what we be: it will suffice to beat down all our presumption. It is said in the proverb, that he which knows himself best, sets least by himself: but it is ill put in use. And we must not say, he sets little by himself: but we must pass yet farther: namely, that he which knows himself well, may set nothing at all by himself, but rather utterly abase himself, and be utterly ashamed of himself. And here you see what the true knowledge of a man's self is. Humility or loveliness is not a counterfeiting to do little before God, or to use some nice ceremonies: but a through examining and sifting of a man's self, so as he acknowledge that there is neither wisdom, power, righteousness, nor ought else in him, whereof he may boast: but rather consider on the contrary part, that we be full of vanity, leasing, and unfaithfulness, that we be unruly and rebellious against God, that we be fraught full of wicked lusts, that there is a sea of all naughtiness in us, and that the fairest show of virtue which we have, is but filth and dung before God. Lo how the Scripture speaks of us: lo how it blazes our arms. Now therefore, when men have well considered themselves: they must make this comparison. Alas, I see God's wrath lie upon such a man or such a woman, yes and upon such great and excellent nations. We see a great number nowadays which are far off from the light of life, whereas in the meanwhile the Gospel is preached to us, and the way into God's kingdom is set upon to us.

And yet for all this, are we better worthy of it than they? Wherein? Let us look a little upon our own deserving, and let us allege all that is possible to be devised. Why then does God prefer us before them? Because it pleases him so to do. So then, look how many wretched castaways we see straying away from God, and look how many silly souls we see punished at God's hand: and let them all be as looking glasses for us to behold ourselves in, and to make us conclude, that if God lifted to show himself a judge in handling us after our deserts, we should be no more spared than they be, and that our standing is through his free goodness, inasmuch as he bears with us, and vouchsafes to show himself favorable. Lo what light we ought to take at God's mercy towards us, when we see his vengeance upon the unbelievers and rebels, accordingly also as Saint Paul tells us in the Epistle to the Romans, that we should be utterly damned with the wicked, if God spared us not of his own free goodness. And that is said to us to the intent we should not take any fond conceit in ourselves, that might puff us up and make us drunken. For if we give not God the glory, acknowledging his goodness to be the thing that we rest upon: surely he must need make us feel to our cost, that we be nor worthy to find such mercy and favor at his hand. Thus you see why Moses told the Jews, that the Canaanites and their neighbors should be destroyed at God's hand for their sin's sake. Well then, the Jews might have replied at the first blush, If God punish them because of their sins: his putting of us in their place, is a token that he finds us to be better and right over than them. It is not so. For Moses declares, that God's choosing of the Jews (as shall be showed more fully hereafter) was not for that they were worthier: for they were much more incorrigible than those nations: and yet did God choose them. Now then, let us learn to profit ourselves by all the chastisements which we see, and which God shows us in this world. And forasmuch as the blows light not upon ourselves, let us not forbear to come to his school and to humble ourselves to him. For we have deserved to be touched as roughly by God, as they have done which are damned. But what? As I said before, he bears with us. That is the first argument.

The second is this: When the Lord shall have driven out the people before you. Here Moses cuts off all the fond braggers wherewith men deceive themselves. As how? IF we had not played the tall fellows in fighting manfully against our enemies, what had become of us? We had strong enemies, they were mighty and puissant, they had huge fortresses and munitions, they were tall of stature like Giants, and we were but dwarfs in comparison of them: and therefore it stood us on band to pluck up a stout courage. Moses wipes away all this, saying: You silly souls, it is your God that fought for you, it was not yourselves.

So then, let us learn that although God use our service, and we seem to do somewhat: yet the work is not ours, it is always his that works it by us, and which breaths his secret power into us. We have nothing of our own, whereof we may boast, but God must always be acknowledged to be the author of his own. This is the second reason which Moses alleges here, to teach the people that they should not be proud, nor believe marvelously of their own power, so as they should say, I have done this or that, I have brought this or that to pass. No (says he) you God is he that drives out nations, and roots them out.

Now if this were said of temporal enemies: what is to be said of Satan, and of the enemies of our souls? Are we able to overcome them? Will the bringing of our own free will, our merits, and our good works be able to overcome the devil, the world, death itself, and hell? No, but the blind wretches are well paid that they may be deceived in bearing themselves in hand that they can do much, and that they be very able folk. Yet notwithstanding, they be disgraced here by the holy Ghost, and it is told us that nothing we be, nor nothing can do of ourselves: but that all that good which we do comes of God, and it is he that does it in us. For if a man cannot stir one finger towards the saving of this transitory life: can he save his soul to the kingdom of heaven? If a man cannot do anything against his adversary which is a mortal and frail creature as well as himself: how shall he overcome the world, and all the devils in hell? So then, let us learn to deceive ourselves no more with these fond imaginations, in thinking ourselves to have free will to do this and that: but let us know that if God reach us his hand, then shall we be able to stand through him and not through ourselves. Saint Paul glorifies sufficiently: but how is that? I can do all things (says he) through Jesus Christ which strengthens me. He says he can do all things: and by that mean he defies the devil, (which manner of boldness we see he uses chiefly in the Epistle to the Philippians:) but yet he reserves nothing to himself. He says that he is strengthened by Jesus Christ. Then if we be strengthened from above: we shall get the upper hand: But yet (as I said) we must always acknowledge how it is God that strengthened us, and that it is in him and by him that we stand out and get the victory.

The third reason that Moses alleges is this: that God in setting his people in possessions of the promised land, had an eye to the promise which he had made and sworn to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Hereby the Jews are put in mind, that God chose them not as more worthy, more noble, and more excellent than other men, as has been showed already: but because he had made promise to their forefathers. But now let us see what cause moved and led God to give this land to Abraham and to his feed. If he had had an eye to man's worthiness: Abraham deserved much more than any other, to have been set in possession of that land. And yet contrariwise, his dwelling there was but as a stranger, he was driven out of it, and he was so far off from having of it at his commandment, that he was kept even from water, not only when we would have borrowed it at other men's pities, but also when he had dug pits by his own labor: both he and his successors were driven from them. Lo how the holy Patriarchs were tossed to and fro, and how men mocked them and did them many outrages and wrongs, and of all that while they had not one foot of ground more than a burying place. Insomuch that at length, Jacob was driven to pay for the ground where he lodged and pitched his tents: and finally constrained and go into the land of Egypt, by reason of dearth which drove him out of the land of Canaan. Now seeing that the holy fathers were not put in possession of it during their lives: shall we say that their posterity were worthier that they? No: it follows then that God's covenant was merely of free gift, and that he had no respect to any deserts of men. And why? Because he loved that people. We must not ask whether he found any virtue in them or not: but it must suffice us that he lifted to magnify his mercy. As if he should say, I seek no cause in men to do them good. But I find it in myself. For of men that are worthy to be utterly rejected, I choose out some and take them to be my children, to the intent they should give me all the praise thereof. That is the thing which Moses had an eye to, in alleging the covenant which God had made with their fathers. Now we know (as I said before) that this covenant was made before these people were born. They could not say that God regarded what they were, as some fantastical persons do, which say that God foresaw what men would be. If he do but foresee: surely he shall find us all devils, that is to say unhappy and cursed creatures, full of all wickedness, and such as have nothing but utter abomination in us. Those are the things that God shall find in us, if he do but foresee. Nor, if he will have us good: he himself must frame us thereto: for we be his workmanship as says Saint Paul in the second to the Ephesians. And the same is also expressed plainly in the fourscore and fifteenth Psalm, where it is said that it is he that made us. And David in that place speaks not of God's first creating of us, when we were set into the world as his creatures: but he means it of his reforming of us by his grace. Now then, if God did but foresee things: then saw he nothing in us but utter rebellion and wickedness. To be short we be damnable in all respects, and heirs of endless death. And therefore if he chose us before we had done either good or evil: it was to magnify his own grace, as Saint Paul declares in the ninth to the Romans. And so you may see what Moses tell us here.

But now must we come back again to the said comparison that I touched before: which is, that if God would have the said covenant which he made concerning the land of Canaan and temporal succession, to be known to be of his free goodness: it is much more reason, that when he calls us to be heirs of his kingdom, and shows himself to be our God and Savior, his goodness should have the highest degree, and all respects of deserving be laid always, so as men should not imagine themselves to have I know not what power of their own to prevent God's goodness. Then let us mark well, that God's calling of us, and his vouchsafing to enlighten us in the belief of his Gospel: is because he had chosen us, not only from our mother's wombs, but also before the world was created, yes, and because it pleased him to have us and to take us for his own, even before all eternity. And so we have no cause to allege anything at all in our own behalf, but rather to be ashamed of ourselves, that God may only be exalted, and have all praise given to him. Furthermore let us consider well, that we know not why God has preferred us before others: for it is only he that puts a difference betwixt us, as says Saint Paul to the Corinthians. Who is he (says Paul) that makes you to excel? And indeed God shows us matter enough why he should altogether cast us down, insomuch that when the faithful have thoroughly examined what is in themselves: they see nothing there but utter wretchedness, and those are that they know themselves best. What is the cause that a number become so proud? It is for that they keep aloof from God, and are so full of hypocrisy that they take vice to be virtue, and (which worse is) due sooth themselves in their vices, filth, and wretchedness. But the faithful being well wakened, do consider what God's justice is. After they have well examined themselves, they have an eye to their faults, and without flattering of themselves, they take God's word to them to discover all the naughtiness in them, whereby they know how to condemn themselves in good earnest, and they hinder not themselves through any hypocrisy. Therefore when God comes to faithful, they acknowledge their own misdeeds and hate them in their hearts. And when God has reformed them, so as they feel that he has wrought in them by his holy Ghost: they father all upon his free goodness, knowing well that there is nothing in them worthy to be made account of.

And let us mark here withal, that since our Lord vouchsafed to keep the covenant which he swear to the holy Patriarchs: we need not to doubt but that he will keep and perform the promise at this day, whereby he has willingly bound himself to us. The word swear is set down, because God considering men's frailty, thinks is not enough to make them a single promise, as I have told you heretofore: but also has vouchsafed to swear, that they might have the better warrant to rest upon him and upon his saying. Indeed God ought to be heard and obeyed, though he give but his bare word: but yet he condescends to our infirmity, and so has he vouchsafed to do even from the beginning, so as he has not thought it enough to give us his bare word, but he has also warranted it with a solemn oath. Wherefore, if in these days there rise any doubt concerning our salvation, yes, or but even concerning this transitory life: if we doubt what shall become of us: let us have an eye to his promises, assuring ourselves that they be warranted to the uttermost, to the intent we should have no cause to cast any doubt of them at all. Behold our God swears, and yet we charge him with unfaithfulness: yes, and we accuse him, not only of untruth, but also of treachery, yes, and even of purvey: and what a devilish blasphemy is that? So then, let us learn to stick to the promises that are so well warranted to us, unless we will be blamed for blaspheming God after that fashion.

And let us mark moreover, that if he have kept the promise which he made to Abraham, who was but a poor mortal man, and confirmed the same to Isaac and Jacob, who were but weak creatures though they had received never so excellent gifts of grace: we may much better trust that he will not fail us in the covenant which he has made with us, by the hand of our Lord Jesus Christ the king of glory and head of Angels, which is the fountain of all righteousness and holiness.

So then, we see how this doctrine belongs to us, at least wise, if we stop not our ears, and for sake not the things that are offered us through the great bountifulness of our God, as we see the most part of the world does nowadays, seeking altogether to blind their own eyes, that they might not know any whit at all of the things that are told them to the Gospel, let him show them the way of salvation, and they know not what it means, they take no taste of it. And why? Because some of them be traitors and hypocrites, some be open despisers of God's majesty, and other some be so fore-possessed of their own wicked affections, as they will not give any ear to God, no suffer him to have any entrance into them. But as for us, let us look that we submit ourselves willingly to his saying, and receive his word with awe and reverence, and be ready to fight under the Ensign of our Captain Jesus Christ, in resisting all the temptation of this world stoutly, and I ridding away of all our wicked lusts.

And in so doing, let us not doubt but that as GOD adopted us before we were born, and chose us of his own mercy, and has called us to his Gospel, and receives us presently into this possession: so in the end he will bring us to his everlasting inheritance, to enjoy the endless glory which he has promised us.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe so to clean us of them, as we may be led to true repentance, and learn to dislike more of ourselves than we have done, that we may hate the sins whereby we provoke him to displeasure, and he so arm us with his strength as we quail not: and again that forasmuch as this life is a continual battle, we may not be slothful nor fall asleep, but every man endeavor to make the strength of the holy Ghost available to him, so as it may make us to get the upper hand of all our ghostly enemies, even until GOD have taken us hence into his rest. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, & c.

Chapter

7. Remember and forget not that you did anger the Lord your God in the wilderness. Even from the day that you came out of the land of Egypt, unto the time that you came to this place, you have rebelled against the Lord.

We have seen already yesterday, how Moses warned the people that they should not boast of themselves when they were come into the Land of promise: and how he told them that they had not obtained that benefit for their own deserts, but through God's mere grace and goodness. We have seen the three reasons that he alleged for the same. Albeit for as much as it is hard to bring men to humility, so as they may know themselves as they be indeed, and be utterly ashamed of themselves, not attributing anything to their own power, but depending altogether upon God's free mercy: Moses adds a plain demonstration and says: if you allege your own worthiness and deserts: You be stiff-necked people, even such a one as can not bow under the yoke and obedience of your God. Whereby it appears that you be not worthy to be chosen of your GOD, or to have such an heritage allotted you, or to be preferred before other nations, forasmuch as you have not be any better than they. And he rehearsed the things that were yet fresh in remembrance and the rebellions which they had committed in the wilderness, concluding thereupon that they were the less to be executed, because they had forgotten the miracles which GOD had wrought in delivering them from the bondage of Egypt: for that made their sin the harnesser. Remember therefore (says he) how you provoked God to wrath, while you were in the wilderness. And he adds that the people did it not for once only: but that they went on still from evil to worse, and never ceased their hardening of themselves in their willfulness: and therefore they deserved full well to be utterly cut off. And so we must needs conclude, that GOD used exceeding great mercy, in that he reserved that people to himself, and brought them into their promised heritage, and that he gave them the enjoying and possession thereof of his own mere goodness. That is the effect of the thing that is contained here.

Now we have to note first of all, that men will never come to confess their faults and to humble themselves, until they be convicted, to their faces. I say till they be convicted, as an offender that is arraigned at the bar. For as we see that offenders do shamelessly deny the faults that they have committed, as far as they can: even so do all men deal when they be cited before GOD: they do always shrink back, and use fond excuses, rather than openly stand to the denial of it. The knitting up of the matter is, that they never serve him but by constraint. That is the cause why GOD discovers our lewdness to make us ashamed of it. For if he should not use us after that for, he should never compass us to make us to stoop. For first we be compared with pride, and secondly we be blinded with hypocrisy. And therefore forasmuch as men as so high minded, that they cannot find in their hearts to be unknown of their own wretchedness: and therewithal to besotted, that they flatter themselves in their won sins: it is requisite that GOD should bring them to it after such manner as we see here, so as he should arrange them and lay their faults before them.

For men do not only endeavor to justice themselves, but also proceed so far, as even to accuse God. And that is the cause why he says by this prophet Esau, well then, let us go to law together, and let there be some umber betwixt us, to see who shall have the better hand. True it is that God cannot be subject to any judge or umber, for his majesty cannot bear it. But he laugh men's cursed stateliness to scorn, in that they repine so against him, and would bring him down (as it were to the bar) against them, to who had the better case. God therefore in respect of such presumptuousness, says, I am contented to have the matter debated and discussed, I will allege my reasons and you shall allege yours, and men shall discern who has the right and who has the wrong. Now, he speaks not after the same fashion here: but he tells the people in one word, that if they pretend any righteousness of their own, he can well disprove them. And for certainty thereof, know you (says Moses) that you be a stiff necked people.

We see that this doctrine is more than needful nowadays. For if ever man were puffed up with pride: if ever they were settled in hypocrisy: we see it is now in these days. GOD is mocked with open mouth, and yet the wickedest sort will need be highest exalted, and that no man should be so bold as to open his lips against them. So much the more therefore has this doctrine need to be set forth, that all loftiness may be beaten down, and no man presume any more to exalt himself: to that point must we come.

We see that even among the Papists, they that hold this opinion most, namely that men are justified by their works, are lewdest losels in all their conversation. Look me upon these hypocrites, and upon all the doctors of popery: when they intend to maintain their own merits, and that men are not justified by faith: they cry out with full throat and open mouth, What? Ought not Christians to be a holy people sanctified to God? And ought not the holy Ghost to govern us? Ought we not to lead an Angelical life? And yet for all this, you shall see them to be whoremongers, drunkards, perverts, traitors, full of unfaithfulness, guile and extortion, so as there shall not be one spark of fear towards GOD, or of honesty towards man in them. And yet notwithstanding, they pretend to be the earnest defenders of merits, and the devotes persons that can be: insomuch that to hear them, you would think there were nothing but holiness in them, when as in the meanwhile their life is most detestable, and shameful, as all the world may plainly see. But yet do men deceive themselves after that fashion. And for that cause has Moses set down this text, not only for his own time, but also as a rule for us to practice to the world's end.

Therefore when we be tempted with over weaning, so as our flesh provokes us to presume I know not how to magnify ourselves: let us remember what is said here, [and let us think thus with ourselves:] How now? Consider what you are, and how you has lived. If you should come to account before GOD, could you go through with it? Consider you not that are one of the miserable ketoses in the world? And when you goes about to advance yourself: is it not a robbing of GOD of his righteousness, that he might not be known to be as he is indeed? Yes: For God's righteousness cannot otherwise shine forth, unless we be utterly confounded, so as we be condemned and he only justified, and that we acknowledge the same willingly. He then that will have any righteousness of his own, does certainly defy GOD, and make war against him. And therefore must we have an eye to this warning: How now? What is your life? Are you able to make answer when you shall be cited to the judgment seat of your maker? And therewithal let us consider how it is said, that for every point which we be able to allege for ourselves, GOD is able to allege a thousand against us, so as we must needs be confounded. Thus you see how men should be led to the considering o their lives, when they be puffed up with any pride, and be desirous to justify themselves, that is to say, to challenge any desert or worthiness before God. And to make the Jews utterly condemned, Moses tells them expressly that they were a stiff-necked people. This similitude is taken of beasts that should bear the yoke: they can do a man no service, they be unprofitable: nor rather they do much harm in striking with their horns, they break all things asunder, and instead of going forward, they draw back. In this respect Moses declares in one word, that stiff-necked folk can by no means be taken for righteous.

And for the better understanding hereof, let us mark how it is said, that obedience is better than all the sacrifices in the world. Then let us bear in mind, that if men will needs challenge righteousness to themselves, they must examine well whether they bow down their necks to submit themselves wholly to God. For if they have not that: all the rest is nothing. They may well vaunt themselves before men: but yet all their virtues are no better than dung, until they become so far as to bear God's yoke, that is to say, to behave themselves according to his will, and to offer their life to him that he may have the over ruling of them, as he lists, so as they be contented to obey him simply and without exception.

Thus you see that our true righteousness is obedience: yes and such an obedience, as seeks not to please mortal men, but the living God. And it is a point which we ought to mark well: for hereby the doctrine that I declared before, is the better confirmed. Men do always surmise some meriting or deserving in themselves at their own pleasure. When they will be taken for holy and righteous, they have their private devotions, but in the meanwhile they make non account of being disobedient to GOD. Contrariwise it is told us here, that God requires nothing more than obedience. For all that ever we can bring him of our own, is nothing: but he tries whether we love him and honor him or not, by telling us his will, and by laying as it were a bridle or a yoke upon our necks, as if he should say: be pliable under me, come not perking up with your heads against me, set not up your crests, nor play not the wild colts: but dispose yourselves to order your lives according to my Laws and commandments. That is the thing where to GOD has an eye. Not that he reaps any commodity by us, neither that we can do him any harm: but because it is a true proof that we be willing to honor him, when we suffer him to govern us, and run not every man upon his own head, but leave to him his dew sovereignty and dominion, saying: Lord we be your poor cattle, direct you us according to thin own will. For we have neither known nor reason in us, our lusts are utterly forward. Now therefore reign you over us O lord, and let your law be as a yoke and a bridle to us. And it is the same thing also which he means by the sentence that I alleged out of the first of Samuel, namely that obedience is better than all the Sacrifices in the world. Also the same thing is confirmed by Jeremy, saying: When your fathers came out of Egypt, did I require sacrifices or such other things at their hands? Indeed God commanded sacrifices: but yet the chief thing that he required, was that they should obey his voice. The thing that God aimed at, the thing wherein all our righteousness consists, is to hearken to his speech, that his authority may way with us, so as we fall not to replying to be wise of ourselves, nor to do what we think good: but that he only may have the majesty, and we no more but open our ears and be needful to receive his doctrine, yes and to receive it in such wise as it may be as a yoke or bridle as I said before, and over rule us without any gainsaying. And hereby it appears, that if men be not mild in submitting themselves wholly to God's will: farewell all their honesty, their life is but lewd. For why? Whereas is nothing but disobedience, there is not any righteousness and of all good behavior, is to be reformed according to the goodwill of GOD. We must no bring our own meet yard nor our own measure in this behalf: but only GOD himself must speak and be the judge to discern between good and bad: for it is he to whom it belongs to acquit or condemn. And he allows or disallows what he himself think good: and there remains nothing for us but to say Amen, by allowing whatsoever he thinks good, and by condemning whatsoever he dislikes.

And Moses thinks it is not enough to have said in one word, You are a stiff-necked people: but he adds therewithal, Remember and forget not that your dearest anger the Lord your God in the wilderness, and how many times you have disobeyed him, from the day that he brought you out of the land of Egypt, even to this present time of his bringing of you to this place. Now whereas he says, Remember and forgive not: it serves to quicken them up the better, because men do still cover their misdeeds, and as soon as they find never so little a shadow, or piece of color to overlay their offences withal: they do but wring their mouths aware, and by and by they think themselves very righteous. We see how it happened to our father Adam: it was no long time he went to seek fig leaves to cover himself withal. But as soon as he had offended, and GOD rebuked him, and that he felt his own rebellion and disobedience, what did he? Whereas he should have come to GOD, and confessed his fault, that he might have obtained mercy and forgiveness: he runs among the leaves and bears himself in hand that he was well covered; and that GOD should see him no more, so he had some little shadow to hide himself withal. We put the same still in use daily: we have no sooner committed any fault, but by and by we fall to shifting, and we beat our brains and knows to find out some lurking hole that God might not espy us. To be short, there is none of us but he makes a den of thieves of his own heart, until our Lord do touch him to the quick, to bring us to the simplicity of acknowledging our faults. Now if we be so much inclined to disguise ourselves [out of hand,] by seeking shifts and coverts to withstand God's vengeance: what will we do in length of time? Will we not utterly forego the remembrance of our sins altogether? Yes: and that is the cause why Moses said, Remember yourself and forget not. It had been enough for him to have said, Remember yourself. But forasmuch as men do what they can to rock themselves asleep, and seek means to sooth themselves: Moses does as it were twitch them by the ear here, saying: Go to sirs, it is not for you to fall asleep in this manner: although your nature be inclined thereto, yet must you not bury your sins, but you must bear them still in mind and set them before your eyes, and then shall you have cause enough to humble yourselves. Thus are we warned here, to bethink us oftentimes of the faults that we have committed, and to beware that we seek not vain colors nor think not that we have sped well, when we have found some trifling shift to justice ourselves withal: but to learn to cast ourselves utterly down, and to dislike of ourselves, and to be as men condemned, so as there remain none other shift for us, than for flee for refuge to the infinite mercy of our GOD.

That is the greatest benefit that we can devise to work to ourselves, all our life long. But how shall we be brought to it? By the knowing of our faults. Now then, instead of shunning it as a matter of grief, and whereas we be loath to think upon the offences that have provoked God's wrath: let every of us bethink himself of them early and late, and let us enter into the examination of ourselves, to say, Alas, how have I lived in this world? Again, let us not think upon other folks faults, to make a buckler of them as we be wont to do: but let us call all our own life to mind, now one sin, and now another, and let us cast forth our sighs and sobs before GOD as witnesses that we be not willing to be set ourselves, nor to ourselves in our own dung by weltering in it: but rather that we would fine attain to his righteousness, as whose endeavor is to hate and abhor our sins, and to magnify God's grace towards us. Which thing cannot be done, unless our sins dislike us, and we think thus with ourselves: Well then, needs must GOD have used great goodness towards me, seeing he has called me at such time as I was forlorn. Again, since his calling of me, how often have I deserved to be shaken off, and to be quite cut off from his Church? And yet for all that, he bears with me to this house, and continues his goodness towards me still. Thus you see how we must bethink us of our sins, to the end that God's goodness may be known, and that we may not only taste of it, but also be fully satisfied with it.

And furthermore, according to Saint Paul's exhortation, which is, that every man should quicken and spur up himself, when he sees his flesh willing to draw him to forgetfulness: Let us not think it strange, though it be some grief to us at the first to think upon our sins. For why? We be inclined to the said hypocrisy: but yet must we fight against it, and beware that we seed it not. And so let us practice the thing that Moses tells us here: which is, not to forget. As how? Not that we can always mind it, as reason would we should: but that the deceiver fade us not in our own vain flatteries, so that although he stop our eyes for a time, yet God do take away the towel, and make us to see our own dishonesty in open light, so as we be ashamed of it. And therefore, when we bethink us of our sins and offences, let us look into ourselves, and quicken ourselves up: for we must play the judges towards ourselves, if we will obtain mercy before GOD. Yes, and if we will yield him the dew praise of his grace: we must come to the acknowledgment of our sins. And that must not be done for once only, but every of us must give himself to examination both evening and morning, and upon the knowledge of one fault, we must go to the shifting out of another. True it is that in this case there is no measure, neither can we be too circumspect. But yet must men dislike of themselves so far, as to learn to glory GOD accordingly: that is to say, to reserve no praise, at all to themselves, no not one grains weight, but to yield all goodness to him alone, and to acknowledge that there is nothing but evil in themselves. Thus you see where to the knowledge of our sins ought to lead us. And we must never cease, until we become thither: and when we become thither, we must continue in it still. For at every turn we shall stumble into this blindness again, so as we shall be prouder than we were before, according as we see that such as have lived in humility, do in the end become greatest trusts to their own know, when they have once forgotten themselves. So then let us always bear this lesson in mind to our lives end, for humility is to perfect a virtue, as we shall never find it so substantially in us as we would wish. And therefore must we continue in the said endeavor, until we be quite rid of all the presumptuousness of our flesh. For pride is the sin that will be last corrected, and it is the root of all other offences. Thus you see we have to remember upon this text where Moses says, Remember yourself, and forget not the faults which you has committed.

Now he adds, How you dearest anger you God in the wilderness. I have told you briefly already, that the people were so much the less to be executed, for that they having known the wonders which GOD had wrought at their coming out of Egypt, ceased not to be so malicious and forward, as to spit out their poison against GOD. If they had done it before, truly yet they had been worthy of blame: but yet had their sin been more tolerable. But now had God uttered his mighty arm in delivering those wretches out of the cruel bondage wherein they were: and yet notwithstanding, ever after God's working in that wise, and after they had seen the apparent sings of his majesty, they cease not to strive against him still: and must it not needs be that the devil possesses them, and that they be as good as bewitched with their own malice? So then it is not without cause that Moses notes here the place of the wilderness, to the end that the people might be the more humbled, and feel the greatness and hugeness of the offences which they had committed, forasmuch as they were all at one point as if God had not uttered himself to them at all. For it may fall out that silly souls which never tasted of God's truth nor of his works, shall overshoot themselves and be carried away. But seeing that God came so near to the Jews and told them, I am your Savior, I take you into my protection, I will make you to feel my power as though I came down from heaven in mine own person, and dwelt visibly among you: I say when God speaks after that fashion, and binds himself by his deeds, and yet for all that there is nothing in them but rebellion: must it not needs be a desperate forwardness? Yes verily. And it is as a warning to make us look to ourselves. For seeing that GOD shows himself familiarity to us for our welfare: he binds us so much the more to him, as has been cleared heretofore. Therefore let us look that we provoke him not when he has made us to feel his goodness: but let us be the more obedient to him, knowing that his intent in vouchsafing to succor us, is that we should be moved thereby to honor him and serve him the better. And on the other side we shall be the more blameworthy, when God shall have visited us by his grace. As for example, when he gives us his word, he shows thereby that he has a care of our salvation: so that if we benefit not ourselves thereby in serving him, surely we deserve the grievous vengeance.

And Moses alleges not here the sins of one day: but he tells the people that they went on still from evil to worse, even since their coming out of Egypt, known you (says he) that you have ever been disobedient to your God, even to this day. There had passed at that time the space of forty years, and that was long enough, as is said in the fourscore and fifteenth Psalm. For their GOD shows his inestimable patience, which he used in bearing with the willful and intolerable maliciousness of that people, by the space of forty years together. But Moses reckons not the years here: for that was a thing well enough known to those whom he speak to. It was enough for him to say, reckon you how long it is ago since your GOD brought you out of the bondage of Egypt: he has led you through the wilderness, he has showed himself always present with you: and yet have you not known him of all the while. Had you missed but once only, yet had you well deserved to be chastised. But what? Seeing you have had so many warnings, so many threatening, so many rebukes, and so many punishments, yes and so many benefits also at God's hand: and yet notwithstanding you hold on still, and grow worse and worse instead of amending: must it not needs be said that you be utterly past recovery? Yes: for our Lord has not left anything undone, that might bring you back into the right way: and yet for all that, you have continued stubborn still, and with stood him to the utter most. Now therefore let us mark well this text where our Lord upbraids men, not with someone fault but with a continual stubbornness against him, in holding on still in their willfulness, insomuch that though he correct them both by deeds and words, yet are they still embraced with their sins, and delight and welter themselves in them. For we see what is in us. True it is that we would at the first sight condemn the things that are reported here of the Jews: but we must also apply all those things to our instruction, according as it is said that that people must serve us as a looking glass to behold ourselves in. Therefore let us bear in mind the things that Moses notes here. For whereas he says, ever since the day: he comprehends all their rebellions that are rehearsed as well in the book of Exodus, as in the book of Numbers. There it is showed, that as soon as the people were passed the wilderness, by and by they fell to murmuring. How now, said they? Was there not room enough to bury us in Egypt? So that whereas they should have said, Alas Lord, indeed you has been singularly gracious to us in delivering us from so painful and miserable a life as we were in: for we were taken but as wretched beasts, we were utterly oppressed under the cruelty of the wicked and of thin enemies: and sooth Lord this goodness of thin deserves well to be magnified: but yet you bestows yourself upon us after another fashion: for in the wilderness, we were destitute of all food, so as we should have been fine to die for hunger, if you had not pitied us: and not only so, but you has held on still in succoring us as we resorted to you: therefore let it please you to bear with our weakness, and to feed us as if we were silly birds: for it is you that feed the Ravens and other souls, and we be creatures formed after thin own imagine: nor moreover we be the people whom you has chosen: now therefore seeing you has vouchsafed to adopt us for your children, show us at least wise as much favor as you does to other nations that are not so near you as we are: whereas the people should have come with all loveliness to acknowledge the former good turns that GOD had done them, and thereby have assured themselves with certainty of faith, that he would hold on still for the time to come: instead of doing so, they said: Was there not room enough in Egypt to bury us in? They did quite and clean forget the favor which they had received at God's hand. And again, when they were in necessity, they came not to him with interest, but with murmuring, railing and accusing. Likewise when Manna had been given them from heaven, and they had eaten of it: yet they demanded drink after another fashion. They ask their alms with the sword in their fist. Like as the thief that would cut the throat of a traveler: so these lead Jostles fell to spiting of GOD the second time saying: yes, indeed we have Manna to feed on, but we must have drink too. Yes and when GOD had given them drink, and made a stream to gush out of the rock: that would not suffice them neither. For the Manna was too unsavory a food for them, they would needs have variety. They had still Manna and Manna, and they were glugged with it: and yet notwithstanding it was a good and savory

Besides this, they were not driven to till the ground, they were not fain to trouble themselves much with the earning of their living: for God gave them both meat and drink: and yet notwithstanding they cried out upon him. Give, give: Their lusts were so inordinate, that they provoked Gods vengeance against themselves, by murmuring against him for want of flesh. Look hear a marvelous thanklessness. Well then, they had flesh: but that was to choke them even with their delicate morsels, insomuch that while the meat was yet in their throats, Gods wrath was so kindled upon them, that they paid very deer for their shot , because they were not contented with the inestimable good that God had done them. For the Manna was a heavenly food, yea and a food of Angels as it is said in the Psalm. But although they felt Gods punishments, and both saw and felt the vengeance that overwhelmed them: yet notwithstanding they ceased not to provoke him to angernew again, after other fashions, sometimes by committing whoredom, sometimes by banding against Moses and Aaron, sometime by murmuring, and sometime by railing . To be short, there was neither end nor measure of their doings. And therefore not without cause does Moses say unto them here, Bethink you of she great number of faults which you hate committed ever since the day that you came out of the land of Egypt, even unto this present time that God has brought you into this Land.

Whereas he says, God has brought you: it serves to quicken them up the better. As if he should say, Who has been your leader? Lewd folk as you be, your GOD has well maintained, guided, and led you: he has upheld you and helped you in all your necessities: and yet will you needs come and set up your bristles thus against him? Now since we hear this of the Jews: let it not make us to blame them: but let it make us behold ourselves in their persons, and consider how near this example touches us, that every of us may look into himself, and all of us acknowledge generally that we be no better than they. And for proof thereof, we be not in a wilderness, neither is there a time of forty years set a forehand unto us: but let every of us take his whole life, even from the time that GOD did put us into this world, unto our burying day. How live we? God for his part pours out so many benefits upon us, as we have good cause to serve and honor him, yea though there were no more than that which he has done already. But seeing he continues in doing us good still: is it not enough to soften our hearts, though they were of iron or steel? Yes verily: and yet wee cease not to spite him by going on still from evil to worse. Now then like as Moses upbraided the Jews with their continuance in evil doing: so let every of us consider, that our provoking of our

GOD has not been for once only: but that whereas we should have been drawn unto him, we have shrunk away from him and rebelled against him. And whereas we should have offered ourselves readily to beam his yoke: we have been so stubborn as he could not weald us: and one naughtiness has so drawn on another, that our sins are come to a horrible confused heap. Thus then must we compare ourselves with those to whom Moses speaks here.

Here it might be demanded how Moses can say that they which lived at that time, had rebelled against GOD ever since the time that they came out of Egypt. For at that time the most part of them were babes, or at leastwise not of full years of discretion. For we have seen expressly in the first Chapter, that GOD was minded to have destroyed all that company, even young children and all. For they that were come to mans estate, had made themselves unworthy to enjoy the inheritance that was promised them, and they were banished and shut out from it. How then does Moses upbraid them that they had not ceased to provoke Gods wrath continually? For they might have replied: How so Though our fathers misbehaved themselves, so as they were unthankful, disobedient, rebellious, and full of murmuring and wicked lusts: should those things be laid upon us? No: for we could not do withal. But let us mark that here the whole body of the people is so blamed, that the children are rightly condemned in the persons of their fathers. For it was still one body: and whereas the fathers behaved themselves naughtily and wickedly: the children amended not, but continued in the same evil, as is to be seen. And therefore forasmuch as the children linked in with their fathers: it is meete that they should be knit up as it were all in one bundle, and that GOD should condemn them all in general. And after the same manner are they spoken of in the fourscore & ninth, and also in the threescore and eighteenth Psalms. For there our Lord says, Remember yourselves how you were disobedient to me in the wilderness. And afterward the prophet rehearses their fault again, how often times they had misbehaved themselves: and thereupon concludes, that they had always persisted in evil, even from their first entering into the land of Chanaan. Insomuch that if the fathers lived naughtily in the wilderness, their children followed the same trade, yea and became much worse. For when they were once in possession of the heritage which was Gods resting place: they should have given themselves to the serving and honoring of him to the uttermost of their power. But all their endeavor was to defile the land which God had hallowed to himself, by filling it full of superstition and idolatry. God gave them the inheritance freely, as if he should have said, I ask no more of you but that you serve me, acknowledging that I have been a good loving father to you, and that I have always maintained and kept you. But instead of doing homage to God for these things, the people fell to setting up of idols, borrowing all the corruptions of the heathen, and bringing in false and counterfeit Religions. You see then that they deserved well to be estranged and quite cut of from God. Also we see that the prophets did continually upbraid the children of Israel with their unthankfulness, yea even generally, according also as every man was guilty thereof. And S. Steven has declared my said reasons yet better. For he says, you have ever resisted the holy Ghost, like as your fathers did afore you. If the Jews of that time had quietly submitted themselves to the Gospel, and received Jesus Christ as their savior, so as they had honored and embraced him with faith and repentance: S. Steven would not have gone about to rip up the shame of their forefathers. For that was hidden. But for as much as they turned all things upside down, and believed not the Gospel, but forsook the grace of God, and trampled it under their feet, advancing themselves with devilish pride and fury, to abolish the name of our Lord Jesus Christ and to deface the goodness that GOD had showed them: it was requisite that the sins of their fathers should be put into their account, and that God should set himself against them, to condemn the malicious willfulness of that people, and the faults that had been committed by the space of two or three thousand years before. And therefore let us learn, that although God pardon the offences of our fathers that have doone amiss: yet shall they not fail to remain still of record in his registers, if we hold on and continue like unto them. Will we then have the sins of our forefathers buried, and God should forget the and not call us to account for them? Let us look that we be the carefuller to keep ourselves from being like to them. And so you see how it is expedient for us to think upon the sins that have been committed before we were born. Let us consider thus: Alas I was yet unborn at that time: but how shall I do, if my forefathers have done amiss, and that I for my part be put in among them? For it is said that God gathers together the sins of the fathers unto the third & fourth generation, to let them fall upon their children. Then do we deserve to be destroyed and to perish, if God listed to use rigor towards us. For the said threat of the law is rightful, and might justly be executed upon our heads: and if he spare us, it is of his own mere goodness. For to what purpose should we put over the fault to our fathers, of provoking Gods wrath both against themselves and us: when we ourselves continue in their wickedness? Ought not the vengeance to be double, when we on our part have cleaned to their sins as well as they? Thus you see what we have to remember upon this place, where Moses does not only blame them that lived in his time for the things then presently committed: but also moreover charge them with all the transgressions that their fathers had committed, from their coming out of Egypt, unto that day. Now then the thing that we have to mark here in effect, is that men do not only mar themselves by bearing themselves on hand that they be righteous, for want of considering their sins thoroughly: but also that they puff up themselves with pride, so as they will needs make God believe that black is white. And therefore let it provoke us to condemn ourselves willingly according to this doctrine of Moses. So then, let us acknowledge our sins truly and unsaintly, that we may so make of them, as there may not one drop of fond presumptuousness remain in us, but that we may be utterly cast down, and acknowledge that there is nothing but utter wretchedness in us, and that we be beholden to God for all goodness, so as we have it of his free gift, and not as in recompense of any reward for any merit or desert of ours, but only of his own free mercy which he has used towards us. So far then must we come of necessity. And for performance hereof, let us evening & morning enforce and endeavor ourselves to call to mind the faults that we have committed. And that we may enter into this trial and examination of ourselves: let us bethink us both of our own sins and of the sins of our forefathers, and let us assure ourselves that if God would play the Judge with us, we should not only be utterly rooted out, for our own faults which are yet fresh in our remembrance, but also all the evil that has been committed before we were born, might justly be called back again upon our heads, seeing we be wrapped in the same offences that our ancestors were. Therefore let us think well upon there things: that we may magnify the goodness of our God in bearing with us. And to the intent we play not the hypocrites: let us mark well how it is said, that it is enough to have provoke GOD already. For when they have sought against God and his word, and have behaved themselves lewdly all the time of their life: yet at their death they make no conscience to say, I thought I did as well in fighting against God, as if I had fought against the Pope and the Mass. [What a thing is it] to use such speech? Is it not apparent that such folk are utterly past recovery, as have their consciences so dulled, and that the devil carries them away, so as they can no more be sorry for their sins, (which, as says S. Paul, is the full measure of all confusion) when such graceless creatures will needs justify themselves after that sort with so vain covertures? Let us mark well then, that we must not allege, I thought so: but it is enough that we have provoked our God. And if moreover our own conscience accuse us thereof: what will become of us? Will God in the meanwhile become as a dead idol which sees not our offences at all? A man thinks his own ways to be good, says Solomon: but our Lord holds the balance in his hand and weighs our works. And Saint John tells us, that if we feel any heart biting in our conscience: the same judges us already: and what will become of us then, when we come before God? Does not he see clearer than our own consciences? Yes: and therefore let us mark well that we shall win nothing by flattering of ourselves: but God must be fain to work so in us, as we may be overmastered and utterly down to say, Alas if GOD should not spare us we were undone. And moreover let us know, that our true righteousness, (I meant not to glory of it, but to recite it to our benefit): is to bear Gods yoke, so as we live not after our own lusts and likings, but that if it please GOD to exercise us with afflictions, we show by all manner of patience, that we have a neck pliable under him. Finally for as much as his law ought to serve us for a bridle: let us suffer ourselves to be ruled and governed by his hand, so as we be not given to our own foolish devotions, ne come replying to him with this and that, but be contented to let our GOD try our obedience, seeing he has given us his law. Then let us see that our life be framed according to his will, which is the only rule of well doing: and let us submit ourselves wholly thereunto, as we see we be warned here by Moses.

Now let us kneel down before the majesty of our good GOD with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to touch us with them to the quick, and to take from us all blind folding of hypocrisy, that nothing may keep us from being ashamed and cast down in ourselves, until you be raised again by faith and hope of his goodness and mercy: praying him also that when he has once made us to feel our diseases, it may please him to fill us with the grace of his holy spirit, so as we may live according to his good will . And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, &c.

On Thursday the 29th of August 1555

The 64th Sermon which is the third upon the ninth Chapter:

Also you provoked the Lord to anger in Horeb for the which, the Lord was wroth with you to destroy you.

9 When I went up into the Mount to fetch the two tables of stone, even the tables of the Covenant which the Lord had made with you, and had tarried in the Mount forty days and forty nights, without eating of bread or drinking of water:

10 Then the Lord gave me the two tables of stone, written with the finger of God, wherein were contents according to all the words which the Lord had spoken to you on the Mountain, from the midst of the fire, in the day of your assembling together.

11 And it came to pass that in the end, of forty days and forty nights, the Lord gave me the two tables of stone, even the tables of the Covenant.

12 Then said the Lord unto me, up and get you down quickly from hence: for your people whom you broughtest out of Egypt have marred all. They be suddenly turned aside from the way that I commanded them, and have made them a molten image.

We saw yesterday how Moses did call the people in the teeth with their malicious stubbornness, in that they had not ceased from doing of evil, even since GOD had delivered them from the thralldom of Egypt. And surely it was an ill acknowledging of such a benefit, to spite him so willfully, which had been their Redeemer and Father. But now he alleges a greater faults of theirs, and far more outrageous: that the remembrance thereof might lead them yet further, namely to bethink themselves of all their former offences, and to confess that they had been a froward and in manner desperate people in all respects. And he puts them in mind, that even while Gods law was a giving to them in Mount Horeb or Sinai, they provoked Gods vengeance by making of a molten image: This is not set down without cause. For is ever God showed himself to hold men in his obedience: it was then. For the law was not given after an ordinary manner: but Gods majesty appeared so visibly in the doing thereof, that the people was fore abashed at it. Behold, the Mountain was full of fire, lightning, and smoke: the air was heard to roar: the Trumpets sounded: and to be short, there were such a number of tokens of Gods presence, that the people was constrained to say, Let not the Lord speak unto us, for then are we but dead. After this, Moses was on the Mount as one separated from the company of men, and as an Angel of God, exempted from mortal state, so as he needed neither meat nor drink, which was such a miracle as ought well to have ravished, people to the serving of God. And yet for all this, they rejected all that had been taught them, and not tarrying so much as the end of one year, but even before forty days were expired, they said they will not what was become of Moses, terming him scornfully the fellow that had brought them out of Egypt. What can we tell what is become of this fellow, said they? And therefore let us have some God to go before us. Yet had they been taught familiarly enough: For God showed himself to them both evening and morning, he led them a nights by a sign of fire, and a days he stretched out a cloud over them: and yet would they needs have a God that should be present with them. And what manner of God? forsooth a puppet. Behold, God had showed the people his wonderful power, he had made them to feel it, they knew themselves to be safe enough under his protection, and yet all this was nothing with them: they will needs have a calf, a dead thing, a corruptible thing, to make it their God. Was it not a hellish furiousness when they became so brutish? Seeing they had so lately even within fresh remembrance heard the law uttered unto them, and that Moses was but gone aside: it was as if God had separated them all from this earthly life in the person of that one man. He meant to communicate himself familiarly unto them, as it were by taking them up into heaven and in the meanwhile they become so unthankful and rebellious, that when he manifested himself to them, they stopped their eyes and would not see, but defaced his majesty and infinite power. Whereby? Even by a dead thing which was an idol. Surely such contempt, such unthankfulness, such beastliness should have made the Jews ashamed. And that is the cause why Moses speaks expressly of that horrible crime which they had committed, in that they would needs have an idol to go before them, that is to say, some visible sign whereby it might be laid that God was among them. Thus see we now the meaning of this text.

But we must mark diligently all the circumstances which are set down here. Remember (says he) how you provoked Gods wrath in Mount Horeb. That mountain ought to have been sanctified, because God had chosen it to give his Law there, in respect whereof it is a place that is ennobled to the worlds end. For since it pleased God to utter his will there, which is the rule of all righteousness, and there to make his covenant with the children of Abraham: ought not that place to have been acknowledged as holy? Not upon any superstition: but by putting the people the better in mind to honor their God as often as they speak of Mount Sinai. It is a mountain in the wilderness, which aforesaid bare no renown:& now it became as an earthly Paradise, so as God showed his Majesty there. Seeing that God had said unto Moses, The Place where you stands is holy, put off your shoes: so as he required a special reverence because he was minded to show himself there: and ought not the self same reason to prevail in respect of Mount Sinai? But so far off were the people from being assured to honor God a hundred or a thousand years after, by acknowledging the singular benefit which he had bestowed upon them there: that they started away from him and fell to spiting of him, even while the law was a giving,& while Moses was yet upon the Mount. So then Moses meant here to make their sin more heavy by showing them that it was like as if a man should come and as it were despitefully rush into a Church, where folk were assembled together to pray unto God and to hear his word and to receive his sacraments: and there commit some villainy of lewdness that might breed offence. And were not such a sin so much the heinous? Yes: and so was it with them. Therefore when we made it, the very hair ought to stand up upon our heads. Nevertheless we must understand, that this is let down as a looking glass for us, to see that we should be no better than they if we were not withheld by the holy Ghost. Let us consider what men are. These were a people whom God had chosen from among all others: he had given them his doctrine: he had showed them his law: and yet for all that, they give over themselves to so cursed a thing. Although then that God come unto us, yet is it certain that we may start way, if he hold us not back, not only by his teaching of us, but also by the power of his holy spirit. Now the law had been published to this people, so as they sinned not through ignorance, neither could they say, We ought not how to serve God, we are to be born withal though we devise ways on our own head: for behold, GOD had uttered his will plainly unto them, and therefore they should have stayed thereupon, and obeyed it simply without adding anything unto it. But notwithstanding all this teaching, they call away his whole doctrine, and cease not to overshoot themselves, as much as if they had never known anything. Seeing it is so : let us learn that men may well preach unto us : but when we have had our ears never so much beat with Gods truth, yet shall we not fail to turn the clean contrary way, except he print the things in our hearts, which men shall have uttered unto us with their mouths: I say, imprinted them in our hearts, & made us to understand that that is the thing which you must stick unto. That is the thing which we have to remember upon that text.

days and forty nights together without eating or drinking: let us note that that was done for the better authorizing of the law, that it might be received with the greater reverence, and that men might know it was not a worldly thing. And hereby we see that the communicating of Gods word unto us is a matter of great importance, so as we need not to doubt but it comes of him, and that we ought to submit ourselves unto it. If we have not that: there will be no religion among us. Indeed we may well enough surmise ourselves to have it: but the chief groundwork of religion, that is to say of faith and of the service of God, is to be sure of our doctrine. For if we go but by weaning: as the Paynim, Turks, & all Idolaters do: and as the Papists do in dreaming upon their good intents: it is but a toy, it is but a building in the air and upon imagination. Therefore let us mark well, that the first entrance to serve God, and to be allowed of him, is to be thoroughly sure of our rule, so as we say not I thought this had been good, it seemed so to me, it was told me so: but that you have Gods word for our guide, and then let us go on hardly, we cannot go amiss as long as we follow that way: for our leader will never deceive us, we shall not be beguiled in obeying him. That then is the thing which you have to bear in mind, for as much as we see that God has so owed and authorized his word, as he shows plainly that men ought no more to call it in question or to doubt of it. But although we see that this is very needful for us: yet do we see that the world makes none account of it. Whereof comes it that the Papists are so willful at this day: but because they shut their eyes at the thing is that I have now touched? For if a man examine thoroughly all that ever they have, surely he shall find that they can allege none other reason than their own imagination. They cannot maintain the things which they term Gods service and the articles of their faith, otherwise that by their own reason, only because other men have said it, and they believe it without further inquiry. Therefore are they always in a manner, without any stay or steadiness: And yet you see they be so willful, that they rail against God & his word, & work it all the spite they can, & if a man go about to show them their faults & oversights, they be so stubborn as he can nothing prevail with them. Wherefore let us be the circumspecter in marking the things that are let here before our eyes: which is we know not what Religion or Christianity is, or whether our faith be substantial or no: unless we be sure that we have the rule of Gods service from God himself, & that our religion is grounded upon the same. Mark that for one point.

But wo worth us if we despise the law and make no account of it seeing it has been published with such warranties as Moses reports in this text. Behold, the law is owed by God himself: and what surer warrant should men require than that? Could God devise to warrant his law more than he has done? no: and yet notwithstanding, after the hearing of the doctrine & contents thereof, we do but nod our heads at it, or rather we be not moved nor touched at all if it: nay we see there is nothing but coldness in us, & a great number of us do even spite it and gnash our teeth at it. Now then if we rebel against God after he has so warranted the truth of his law: what excuse shall we have? Is it not a fighting against the majesty of GOD? Yes verily. And therefore all the despisers of GOD, may well pretend what excuse they list: but yet are they convicted of open war making against GOD, and against his eternal majesty, and against his divine and heavenly power. Why so? For God in publishing his law, came as near men as he could, and as near as they could away with. Indeed God showed not himself as he is: for we be not of capacity to receive such knowledge of him: but it is certain that he showed himself according to the small ability and slenderness of men, specially at the publishing of his law. And I mean not only the Law, but also the prophets, which were added as an appurtenance thereunto, because they be the expounders thereof. Again what proof is there of the Gospel? God did not only shake the earth at that time: but also (as said the prophet Aggeus, and as is alleged by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews) he did shake both heaven and earth, so as there was a greater majesty uttered at the preaching of the Gospel, than at the publishing of the law. Now then, since it is so (says the Apostle) that the Law which brings nothing but terror unto men, was so magnified: what ought the Gospel to be? For the law was but a shadow & figure of the things which we have now showed us perfectly in the Gospel. In the Gospel God shows himself face to face, to the intent that we should be transformed to his glory. Since it is so, what a curse pul we upon our heads, in that we do not hark unto God with all reverence, & show that it is he whom we worship, & to whom we be willing to dedicate all our senses, all our affections, & all our thoughts? If we be not brought so low as to hear and receive the doctrine of the law and the Gospel with all humility and reverence: we fight openly against the whole power and glory of God.

And here withal we have to mark also, after what manner it is that God warrants his law, to the intent it may be of authority among men, and that they may submit themselves to it. It is by fathering of it upon himself and that is one point more, well worth the marking. For God shows us thereby, that he will not have us to lean unto men, but to look singly unto him, that we may have a true and assured faith. So long then as our minds run upon creatures: we shall always be in a mamering. Albeit that we may conceive some willful opinion in our head: yet shall it vanish quite away at length, until we become to this point, that we be sure it is GOD that has taught us it, and that it is he of whom we hold all that we have. When we be so assured: then have a right faith: but we see how the world forgets that. For is there any question of the hearing of GOD in the Popedom? Nay verily, they work all the abominations that are against Gods word, and their doing thereof is matched with soul shamelessness, as it were even in utter despite of God. For they will need have the Gospel set aside, and that men should be the sticklers in that behalf, to intermingle whatsoever they themselves think good. We see then that this has been ill put in ure. And therefore let us for our part remember, that when God meant to magnify his Law, he said not, Here is a wise man that shall tell you good things: but he took up Moses to him, and he gave tokens from heaven as if he should have protested thus: It is I myself, I will have you to take all things that shall be uttered by Moses, as things that come from me. For I am not hidden in this case. Although I speak to you by the mouth of a mortal man: yet you see he has all of me, and he has not devised anything of himself or of his own brain. And to what end was Moses so exempted from the state of all other men? It is not possible that a man which is accustomed to eat & drink, should fast by the space of forty days and forty nights together. Then must it needs be concluded, that God intended to show in effect, how he himself was the author of the Law, and the giver thereof by Moses. And although Moses was so excellent a person: yet was he but a servant, he was not the master of the house, neither did he challenge anything to himself, but delivered the things faithfully from hand to hand, which he had received.

Now seeing that GOD reserved to himself the governing of his Church, and the giving of the rule whereunto he would have all men to hold themselves, so as even Moses should not pass the bounties thereof: what shall other men do nowadays? We shall see at length that God never railed up a greater Prophet, no nor the like among his people. There was never any [that matched him or went beyond him,] but only Jesus Christ the head of all Prophets. And good reason it is that he should be above Moses, which has the sovereignty of all, considering that he is above the Angels, and even the everlasting GOD manifested in the flesh, and our Mediator, exalted to the right hand of God his father, to fit as his Lieutenant, of purpose that all knees should bow before him. So then, we see how shameless the Pope and all his rabble have been, in usurping such liberty to forge articles of faith, to make laws for nuns souls, and to bring the Church such bondage, as to bury all pure doctrine, that their own dreams and dotages which they had devised contrary to Gods word, might be followed. And therefore let us bear well in mind, that when we study to honor men, we rob God of his honor and when you add anything at all to his word, we become backsliders. That is a point which we must be fully resolved of, or else we shall have no certainty in our Religion and faith. Indeed the Papists have some show of humility, in that they say, and why should not men observe the commandments of our holy mother the Church? For although it be more than needs, yet notwithstanding, will not GOD accepts it? There is nothing more commendable than humility: but yet for all their humbling of themselves before men, they rush with their horns against God. But if they meant to do GOD his due honor: they should not give men the thing, which belongs lonely unto him. For if they fall to mingling of the leaven and corruption of their own imaginations, with the pureness of Gods word: it is more than if they meddled heaven and earth together. For it is easy to discern Gods creatures one from another: and although there be never so much odds betwixt them, yet is there more agreement between them, than there is between men's inventions and Gods word. And therefore when they fall to mingling of their own fancies with it, and take leave to make Laws at their own pleasure: all is out of fashion, all is out of order, there is not any more pureness. Now then, whereas the Papists allege their humbleness in observing the commandments of their Church, or rather hellish synagogue: it is but a devilish overweening, where through they advance themselves openly against GOD, in commending their own folly and beastliness as highly, as though their own inventions were far greater and exquisite perfection, than the wisdom of God. Thus you see what we have to remember concerning this point, where Moses reports that he neither ate bread nor drank water, of all the while that he was upon the mount.

We see here to what end he forbear meat and drink. It was not to let up some fast, neither indeed was there any ever ordained, he did it not to make a rule of it: but rather it was Gods intent to work such a miracle as might not be drawn to a common example, of purpose to authorize his Law, as has been said before. And herein it appears what a fondness it was to make the Lenten fast, and to bind men to fast forty days after the example of Jesus Christ, under colour that he had forborne meat and drink so long together. Surely the fasting of our Lord Jesus Christ, was to show them that the Gospel ought not to be less esteemed than the Law: and we see that the like befell to Elias, who was between them both. Wherefore did Moses and Elias appear at the transfiguring of Jesus Christ upon the Mount, but to show the agreement that was between the Law and the Gospel? And we see hereby, that Elias was as it were between both, that is to say, between Moses and Christ. For he restored the Law and the pure Religion that had been corrupted before. And so you see that Moses and Elias agree in such fort with Jesus Christ, that they not only come to humble themselves to him, but also declare that he only is the end and perfection of the Law, and that he is the party to whom all must be referred. Again, when our Lord Jesus Christ failed, that is to say, when he abstained from meat and drink by the space of forty days together: he did it not yearly, but only once in all his life, at such time as he was to enter upon the execution of his office, which was committed unto him by GOD his father: yea and he did it by way of miracle. Now then is it not a turning of all things topsy-turvy, when men will draw it to an ordinary, and make a common rule of it? Is it not an open mocking of Jesus Christ? Is it not a defacing of Gods miracle, as though they would spite at his power? Yes Purely. We see then what a blindness it was. And although this superstition be very ancient, in so much that Satan had brought in that devilish error, even before there was any Pope: yet ought we to mislike it and abhor it. For it is not a simple abuse, it is not a fond devotion, such as men are wont to have: but it is a blasphemy against Jesus Christ, it is a policy of Satan to deface the honor of the Gospel, and to make us forget the thing the holy ghost aimed at, which is that we might know how the law & the Gospel are no earthly doctrines, nor of mans invention, but altogether heavenly and of God, to the end that we should stoop unto them.

Yet for all this, is not meant that fasting is not good and holy. For though we make no Lent fast, yet are there other fasts which are commanded us in the holy Scripture: that is to wit, first of all staidness and sobriety all our life long, so as we glut not ourselves one day to forbear another for it, but use the benefits measurably which God has bestowed upon us: that they which have abundance abuse it not in superfluity. And our fasting must be to restrain and bridle ourselves willingly as well from meat and drink, as from all other things wherein we may commit excess or disorder, so as we forbear them willingly, as I said before. As for them that have not very well wherewith to find themselves, let them be contented with their poverve, and take it patiently with thanksgiving unto God. Again if our Lord afflict us, or that we be in any distress: let us resort to fasting, of purpose to dispose ourselves to prayer and supplication, and to lift up our hearts the better unto GOD, humbling ourselves and acknowledging our faults unto him. Let our fasting be as spurs to drive us to god, to present ourselves before him as wretched offenders, to crave mercy and forgiveness at his hand. These are the fasting which the holy scripture allows, notwithstanding the said superstition invented by the devil to deface Gods word, & the divine power that was showed in Moses, but more fully in our Lord Jesus Christ. For he fasted not as compelled by others: but of his own free will, to show that although he was like us in all things saving only sin: yet could he well have been exempted from fasting, as indeed he was not a hungry nor a thirst of all the while he fasted. And why? For he had laid aside the state that he wore upon him. Although he was under the shape of a servant: yet notwithstanding, that servanthood bore no sway in him by the space of those forty days. Now let us proceed further.

Moses adds that at the same time he received two tables, even two tables of Stone, the two tables that were written with the finger of God the tables of the covenant which God had made with us said he. This served to make the Jews the more ashamed, of their exceeding great unfaithfulness towards GOD. For if I and another were to make a bargain, and in the meantime while the party were causing the covenant and conveyance to be engrossed, I on the other side should practice some device to betray him while he trusted me: what a villainy were that? Should I not be a double false knave? Yes: for if a man conclude a bargain, and afterward break it or tear the writings in pieces, he shall be punished. But if the one party go through with good and faithful meaning, and the other party mar all with craft and treachery, under pretence of quietness and friendly dealing: what is to be said of that? Even after the same manner dealt the Jews. For God takes Moses aside. And to what purpose, but to work the welfare of his people, and to assure them that their religion was a true warrant of their salvation, and that they walked not at all adventure as all other nations of the earth did? Thereupon he makes an authentical instrument of the law that he had given them, that the remembrance thereof might continue forever, and not be such a doctrine as should be forgotten. Now while God was thus working the welfare of his people: they recompensed him so evil, that they fell to utter defying of him, and would needs have a new God. We see then how Moses meant to enhance their evil dealing, that they might be the more ashamed, by knowing the horribleness of the crime which they had committed. And the same belongs to us also at this day. For we see that God ceases not to renew the remembrance of his covenant. True it is that he published his law once for all, and likewise his Gospel. But yet for all that, we have both his law and his Gospel in writing also, and moreover it is daily preached unto us. Now then, if we provoke Gods wrath and anger, by falsifying our faith which we gave and promised in baptism: does it not make us the more inexcusable? Yes surely. And therefore to hold ourselves the better in awe & fear of God: let us understand that Gods ordaining of the ministers of his word, and his gracious dealing with us in causing the same to be preached and expounded unto us afterward, is to put us in mind of his covenant, that we should put it in practice: [and therefore] let us pray him that nothing may turn us from it. Let us understand that: and then shall we have the more constancy and steadfastness to obey him. Thus you see what we have to remember upon that text.

Furthermore, let us mark that God thought it not enough to proclaim his Law, but he did also put it in writing. And why? because men are short witted in bearing away the truth. Therefore is our Lord fain to provide for it, & to warn us to look well to all things, because we be so feeble. Had the Jews done their duty, Gods speaking to them had been enough: for he had given his law in so small room, as every man might count it upon his fingers ends, These are the ten commandments, in these has God comprehended his whole will, which is the rule of good life, All this doctrine (say I) is comprehended in ten verses. You see then that the people had been taught familiarly enough. Now if they that heard Gods voice upon the mount had done their duty: they should have taught their children, so as the doctrine might have been kept in mind from the father to the child. For God had taught them familiarly enough, as I said before. Insomuch that he had willed them to make their ornaments of the sentences of the laws, so as instead of bracelets and other pretty toys, which folks do we are to make themselves gay: all the decking of his people should be to have the sentences of the law written & engraved about them, that which way so ever they turned their eyes, they might still have some mark to put them in mind of Gods law. Howbeit, to the end they should have a more certain remembrance thereof: like as men have been wont to engrave their leages in some tables of brass or stone: so God took stone to write and engrave his law in. It was not his pleasure to use paper or parchment: but to have his law written in stone, [and that was done] not by handicraft, (for he borrowed no workmanship of man in that behalf,) but with his own singer. Not that God has any hands: but that the holy scripture speaks so by a resemblance as is it were said, the law was not written or engraved by mans hand: but God approved and ratified it by way of miracle. Now then since it is so: let us learn that God has provided well for the assuring of our faith, to the intent we should not be put to any great pain or hardness to know what we ought to follow. True it is that the world will run into all lewdness, as we see it does, and the examples thereof are too rise. It is pity to see how often the Jews swerved aside unto idolatry: it seemed that gods name should have been abolished among them: all was out of order: they had so gross superstitions, as a man could not discern between them and the heathen: they had so embraced themselves, as there remained not any more certainty among them. But yet for all that such as were disposed to serve God held always this point that they stick to the certain doctrine. And why? For Gods will was set down in writing. When superstitions were to be corrected: the mean to do it was not hard. For why? The law was written. That is the thing which we must stick unto is we will obey our

God: and if we forsake that doctrine, God will also forsake us. We see then that God has provided sufficiently for the surety of his people, that their faith might not be doubtful, but firm and constant. As for us nowadays, we have more than the fathers had in the time of the law. For we have both the law and the prophets, and also the gospel. What is to be done then? They that allege in there days, I ought not which way to turn me, I see disputing, debates, and contrariety of opinions, & therefore I will let all alone in suspense: [must consider also with themselves,] Yea? has God lost his labor in letting down his law in writing, and in adding the exposition thereof by his prophets, to the end that we might the better know that the gospel is the true and full accomplishment thereof? Shall we accuse God as though he had left us at random, so as we should not know what we have to do, when he has given us his infallible truth, and told us that we can never be deceived in obeying the things that proceed out of his mouth? So then let us understand, that whereas the world goes astray, and is ill instructed: the only cause thereof is men's own unthankfulness. For why? there is enough provided to make us walk in the broad daylight, so as we may defile the superstitions of the faithless, and not suffer things to hang any longer in suspense, if we have God reigning over us. Whereby we see that Gods speaking was not for one day only: but of purpose that the same should continue still even to the worlds end. Therefore let us go on boldly, seeing we have the doctrine of the holy scripture: and let us assure ourselves that that is the thing which we must hold us to, so as we must not any more say, whither should we go? That is the way, let us walk therein, as Moses protests hereafter. Truth it is that in those two tables are not contained all the things that are written in Exodus, Leviticus, and the book which we do now expound: those tables are but an abridgement of them, and they contain but ten verses. Nevertheless, our Lord meant to show by those two tables, that all the things which Moses left in writing, were of him.

So then, here are two things: That is to wit, that Gods will was there should be scripture, like as when covenants are let down in writing, or leagues are engraved in tables of brass, & even so was it his will that there should be a perpetual memorial of his law, that men might take no occasion to turn away from it. And he made those two tables, not to show any cunning of man therein: but to engrave his law in them without mans hand, that it might be known that the same came of him. As touching Gods writing twice in the two stones: we will create thereof hereafter: For it is meete that things should be let down in order, and therefore I will not meddle with them now.

him, Up and get you down apace: for this people have soon marred themselves, by forgetting me, and the savor that I have showed them. Here Moses goes on still with his matter, chewing the people that their revolting and starting away so soon from GOD was too too shameful and detestable. True it is that although they had held out four hundred year or a thousand years, yet had they not been to be excused. But now when as they tell to making of an idol, and did set up a Puppet within forty days space, even while God was about the furtherance of their benefit and welfare, (as I said before) when Moses was taken up as it were into the company of Angels, by reason whereof they should rather have thought thus, Go too, in the person of that one man we be after a sort separated from the rest of mankind and God sanctify us to himself, and therewithal brings us into his kingdom, to the intent we should not have any earthliness in our religion: What a lewd dealing was that? For this cause Moses faith, that God commanded him to get him down in hast, because the people were marred out of hand, so as they were salne to making of a new God, even while the law was a writing, and while God was confirming of his covenant with them. And it is plainly said that they were marred: Behold (said God) they have marred. For the word which he uses, betokens no more, but they have marred, without other addition. And indeed it was a right marring of them, that is to say of the Jews, who became lewd backsliders and perjured kaytises, utterly turning away from the truth and rule of God, and finally from all order both heavenly and earthly. For wherein consists our pureness, but in obeying GOD? According to this similitude of Saint Paul's, that like as a woman is a lawful and faithful wife as long as she keeps herself chaste to her husband: so all the chastity which God requires of us, is that we should stick lonely to his word. Then if wee fall to making of idols: it is a villainous marring of ourselves, we become like common harlots that give over their bodies to all comers, leaving their own husbands, and yielding themselves to every whore master and ruffian. Even so is it with us. And after the same manner was this people marred out of hand. Yea and we mar the majesty of God also, as much as in us lies, when we follow our own foolish inventions. True it is that we cannot touch his majesty to do it any harm: but yet are we guilty thereof (as said Saint Paul,) because we turn the truth into a lie, and make all things false: and moreover turn the order of nature upside down, by forsaking Gods pure doctrine, to as we bereave him of his sovereign, right that he cannot reign over us, when we fall to letting up of idols and dead things in his room, and do the things which we ourselves have invented. So then it is not for nought that our Lord said not in plain words, This people have made them an Idol: but he said, This people have marred, that is to say, they have turned all upside down.

Wherefore let us mark well, that when so ever we step aside from the pureness of Gods word, we make a shameful marring, we practice our own destruction, we leave nothing whole and found, and to be short, we be guilty of mingling heaven and earth together, and of the utter defacing of Gods majesty. So much the more therefore does it stand us on hand to submit ourselves to Gods pure word, and to see that we invent nothing of our owns heads, nor bring up any new religion: but hold ourselves to the things which our Lord has told us, forasmuch as he allows not anything but that. Afterwards he adds the residue, which I cannot expound as now: but it shall suffice (as I have said already) that we have this bond of our God, that we stray not so far as to reject his truth: but that we abide in obedience to his words, as he has given it us in writing, and as it is his will to have it daily preached unto us.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, that we may be drawn to such repentance, as our whole desire may be to be quite rid of our fleshly affections and lusts, to give ourselves unto him, and to hold us so under his awe, as we may bring nothing of our own devising, but that when our own conscience finds fault with us, we may so much the more yield ourselves guilty, and not turn away from his obedience: and that forasmuch as you cannot fully satisfy and perform his Law in this world, it may please him of his infinite goodness to bear with us, until have thoroughly corrected the evil which he knows to be yet still remaining in us. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us, but also to all people & nations of the earth, &c,

The 65th Sermon which is the fourth upon the ninth Chapter

13 Wherefore the Lord spake unto me, saying: I have seen this people, and behold, it is a stiff-necked people.

14 Let me alone, I will destroy them, and put out the name of them from under heaven, and I will make you to grow into a mightier and greater Nation than they be.

Began to show you yesterday, how soul and cursed the fault was which Moses upbraids the people withal in this place: and that the cause why he did set it before them, was to the end they should be the better humbled thereby. And here he adds a record of the greatness of that fault, in that it provoked Gods wrath so fore, that he would have destroyed and rooted out that people, and put out the remembrance of them forever. Now if God do measure his anger, and can skill to punish men's offences according to the greatness of them: it must needs be concluded that this offence was very horrible, seeing that God having delivered his people, and having wrought so many miracles for them, would nevertheless so wipe them out as they should never be spoken of more. That then was the meaning of Moses: verily as if he should say, you wretched folk, consider what you be and what you have been. For whereas you were redeemed by the hand of GOD, you by revolting from him after you had received such favor, deserved to have been so rooted out, as no remembrance of you might have remained in the world, and sentence thereof was given also. Had not I entreated for you, GOD had determined to have destroyed you. Now go make your brags, imagine I ought not what of yourselves, impute your obtaining of this land to your own righteousness, to your own power, or to some other thing else. Nay contrariwise, you see what you have done: you have (to the uttermost of your power) undone the deliverance of yourselves which GOD had wrought, you have forsaken the salvation that was promised you, and the inheritance that was prepared for you: and to be short it was meet that God should have poured out his horrible vengeance upon you. Therefore learn to magnify his mercy, considering that you have provoked him so fore. Thus yet see in effect whereto this saying of Moses is to be referred.

But by the way we must mark the words that he uses. I have seen this people (said he) and it is a stiff-necked people. Here GOD shows that he has just cause to make clean riddance of this people, forasmuch as they were past amendment. True it is that GOD might well thunder down upon all men, without filming them why or wherefore, and all mouths ought to be shut. For we win nothing by replying against him, and in murmuring at his chastisements. For he shall ever be found to be righteous as is said in the one and fiftieth Psalm, and whosoever blasphemes him shall be put to shame. Yet notwithstanding, here God shows why he had determined to punish the Jews so roughly, to the intent that Moses should be the better contented. I have seen (said he) that this people is a stiff-necked people. Hereby he does us to understand, that when we once fall to malicious willfulness, it is all one, as if we were rotten in our sins, and that there is none other remedy, but that GOD must put to his hand to destroy us utterly.

Indeed the least fault that we commit does well deserve that GOD should use extreme rigor: but yet does he moderate himself, according to this saying of the holy Scripture, that he is slow to wrath and long suffering GOD then spares us, and uses not rigor against us at the first dash. But when he sees us so hard hearted that he cannot win us by patience, and that we be so stubborn as he cannot amend us, nor make us stoop under his hand: then is he fain to work after another fashion, and to strive no longer with them, according to this saying in the sixth Chapter of Genesis, Why should my spirit strive any longer with men? For I see there is nothing but corruption in them: and therefore I will no more go to law with them: I must be fain to condemn them and to execute my judgment upon them: for it is to no purpose to indite them any more, they be too much convicted already. Since it is so, let us be well ware, that although we be frail, yet at leastwise we be not willful in persisting in our sins, to delight in them, and to feel them: but let us return again unto God out of hand, being sorry that we have offended him. And if he threaten us, or show us any sign of his wrath: let us by and by stoop and not suffer any stubbornness to take place in us. For if we deal stubbornly & willfully with him, we shall be driven to abide the condemnation that is set down here, spite of our teeth: [namely] I have seen this people, it is a stiff-necked people, and therefore I must needs root them out. Mark this for one point, that here men are warned to examine themselves, and upon acknowledgement of their faults, to humble themselves before God, and to lay down all pride and sturdiness, so as God may not find them stiff-necked, but pliable. And that is it which Saint Peter means where he says, Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of your God, that you be not handled roughly in the day of your visitation. In speaking of the mighty hand of GOD, he shows us that if we fight against it, we shall find it too hard for us. True it is that at the first men think they win much by chasing upon the bit, and by standing stubbornly against God: but in the end they shall find that Saint Peter did not without cause term his hand as a mighty hand, to confound all such as set themselves against it. Then is there none other shift, but to stoop under it, and to receive the strokes obediently, when it strikes us, assuring us that it strikes us justly. And is if it touch us not, let us not tarry till God show himself our enemy, but rather let us prevent his wrath: Thus you see what we have to remember upon this text.

Also there is one other point. I have seen this people (said God,) and it is a stiff-necked people. Hereby he means that he knew well enough by experience, that the lewdness of that people was utterly unrecoverable. True it is that God needs not to make long inquisition after the manner of men: for all things are present unto him, and length of time can tell him no more than he knows already. But the scripture uses such speech, to do us to understand that God goes not to work at all adventure as men commonly do, who fall to punishing often times before they know the truth or have inquired of it. God then shows here, that he never lifts up his hand to chastise us, but upon good deliberation, knowing what is in us, and having well considered whether there be any mean to reclaim us or no. Seeing he takes so great pain, needs must we come to our last condemnation, if we be willful stubborn. Thus you see what Moses meant by there words, See and Behold. And it is all one as is God would prove his saying by such experience thereof as were throughly known, and show as it were with his finger, that that people was not to be dealt withal, and that the very creatures might well judge of their naughtiness, that it was utterly inexcusable. Indeed we do not always perceive that God has made inquisition of our sins: but yet shall we find it to in the end, And for the same cause, when he minded to destroy Sodom and Gomorra, he said expressly, that he came down to weete how things went: and that although the cry came up to his ears into heaven, and that their sin was so great, that even the very heavens roong of it: yet vouchsafed he to examine their doings near her: not that he needed so to do, as in respect of himself: but to show us that his justice was rightfull and blameless. As oft therefore as God punishes us, let us learn to know that we have lain too long asleep, and that he in the meanwhile watched, and that we must now pay the arrearages because we amended not in due time. And is GOD seem overhasty in punishing us: let us consider that we took not the time when it was offered us, and when he gave us space of repentance to turn unto him, but rather were blinded without own hypocrisy, and that is the cause why God lays his hand so roughly upon us.

Now let us come to that which Moses adds. He said that God being in mind to destroy the people, said unto him: Let me alone that I may destroy this people, & that their name may be put out from under heaven, so as it may never be spoken of more. It should seem that God was letted here by Moses, when he said: Let me alone. Now it were unbecoming his power that he could not execute the thing that he had determined with himself, but that a man should withstand him and restrain his liberty in doing the thing that he had purposed. How may this be understood? True it is that Moses was not of authority to restrain Gods judgment: but here we see the infinite goodness of him, who though he owe not anything to men, vouchsafes notwithstanding to do it for their sakes. And let us mark especially, that God does so binds himself to our prayers and supplications, that they be as it were restraints of his wrath: so that whereas diverse times he would destroy all. He is as it were changed, if we come and humble ourselves before him. Not that he alters his purpose: we must not surmise any repentance in God, that he should turn back again and be better advised, or bethink himself better what he had to do, as we do, who be subject to diverse passions, and also to alteration: there is no such thing in God, there is no altering of the thing which he has once determined. But this is taken after the manner of men, insomuch that to make us understand what is for our profit, God is fain to bow down from his high majesty whereunto we be not able to attain, and to use similitude meet for our rawness and infirmity. Therefore he says that when we pray, it is all one as if we did cast a bar in his way, to stop his wrath that it should not utterly consume us. And why? Because that he of his own accord has willingly and without constraint made covenant with us, that when so ever we pray unto him, he will perform all our requests, so as we shall not be disappointed in calling upon him, but shall always perceive that he was willing to grant our will and desire, according as it is said in the hundred and five and fortieth psalm, The Lord performs the wills of them that fear him. Surely it is a word that ought to pierce our hearts, when it is said that GOD does the will of men. Now who is he? and what are we? We be wretched creatures, such as ought to be ashamed to show themselves before GOD. And as for to bring either will or desire of our own thither: it ought to dismay us, and to make us say, Alas Lord, do what pleases you, for it is not meet for us to put forth any desire or affection of ours: for what are we but wretched creatures? But surely Gods will is that we should crave of him so it be obediently, for according to Saint Johns laying in his Canonical Epistle, we must not pray to him at all adventure, nor allege our own fancies to restrain GOD to our desires, we must not use such boldness but when we have submitted our hearts obediently to our God: then if we pray to him for anything that is to our welfare, he likes well of it, and he will pleasure us in granting it, as though there were such a covenant and league between him and us, as might not be broken. Seeing that God stoops so low as to grant us our requests: what would we more? But he does it, and that does he well show in this text. Let me alone say he to Moses. He seems here to speak as it were to some companion or fellow of his. And why does he not destroy Moses too, as he might well do if he lifted. Is Moses then able to stay him, or to abridge him of his liberty? No: but as I said before, GOD do so bind himself, that the prayers which are made unto him, do stay the execution of his vengeance. And that is the cause why that in the rehearsing of this story in the Psalm, it is said there expressly, that if Moses had not set himself in the breach, all had been mard. There the Prophet uses a similitude: like as when a Town is battered with the Cannon, there is such a breach made as the enemies may enter, to sack the town and to put all to the sword. Even so is it in this case: when Gods wrath was once kindled against his people, he had battered them by & by with his said threat, and had made a breach upon them so as there remained no more but to enter. But behold, Moses sets himself in the breach, that is to say he stands up against God and makes intercession to him for the people, so as he stops the breach again, and stays Gods wrath from going any further. And this is not reported for Moses only: But our Lord declares thereby what strength our prayers & supplications have, when they be well ordered, so as we come to him with such zeal as becomes us, and with such faith and humility as he requires. And we must remember what Saint James said of Helias: namely that he made it to rain, and also did shut up the heavens and caused drought, lonely by his prayers. Look here an incredible thing, that when the Prophet opens his mouth to pray unto God, he has power to shut up the heavens, and to bring a general famine everywhere, to punish the Idolatrous king & all those that took part with him in his wickedness: and that afterward when he came to God again, & desired rain, he opened the heavens again and all the streams thereof, so as the earth was then plentifully watered. Nevertheless the intent of S. James is not, that our knowing hereof should be to magnify the power of Helias, or to say that he had that granted unto him as a special privilege, but to give us a rule whereby to perceive how available the prayer of a righteous man is, and so to encourage us to pray unto God. For seeing that the Prophet Helias could both shut the heavens and open them again by his prayers: let us not doubt but that we shall be heard, when we call upon the name of God: And that when the bottomless gulfs are opened, we shall shut them again: insomuch that even when the wicked shall seem to have the world at will, then will GOD root them out at our request. Therefore let us pray boldly, upon trust of the promises that God has given us, and our prayers shall be of such force, that they shall even change the order of nature if need be. As for example we see that at the saying of Joshua, the sun stayed, and stood still a day and a night together, without any night betwixt the one day and the other. Since we see these things: let us not say: That was but for once, or such a holy man or Saint had such power; but let us understand that it was our Lords intent to show us that although heaven and earth were mingled together, and all things as confused as might be: yet if we resort to him, pitting our whole trust in him, he can well remedy the things that seem to us to be furthest out of order, and then shall we see the fruit which our prayers yield us. Thus you see what we have to mark upon this text where GOD wills Moses to let him alone.

Yet notwithstanding we must mark here withal that it is a thing to be wished, to have such folk among us as may make intercession and supplications to GOD: For we see what coldness is in most of us. Some times in a whole nation and in every great multitude of people, you shall not find twenty or ten persons that have a right zeal to pray unto God and are disposed thereto as is requisite. And how should we do if they stood not in the breach?

Surely we should be left bare, accordingly also as the same similitude is alleged in Exodus, that the people had made themselves bare of his protection, by making the golden calf. For they had no more any God to maintain them. And even so would it befall us also that we should make ourselves bare every day, by putting ourselves out of the protection of our God: were it not that some do set themselves in the breach. And therefore let us learn that often times God spares us, because there are some that make intercession for us, even whom we know not of. And let us think upon it the more, for as much as every of us feels himself cold in praying, and that we go not to it with such courage and earnestness as God commands. [Let every of us bethink ourselves thus;] Alas, if I were alone, and all the world were like me: what would become of it? We might perish for we are not worthy that GOD should regard us. But we must understand, that it is not our Lords will that we should perish, when he ordains men to come before him after that manner. And therefore howsoever we fare, after we have rebuked ourselves, let us proceed to this zeal of praying both for ourselves and for other men, and let us not doubt but God will have pity upon us, yea and even forgive our neighbors also at our request. Truth it is that in this case we must not bring any overweening with us, to advance ourselves as though we could further the salvation of other men: but we must take it as God shows it. Behold I am not worthy that God should hear me myself: and yet notwithstanding he vouchsafes to hear me, not only for myself, or for three or four more, but also for a whole nation. Let every of us do this, and let us consider how merciful our God is to us, seeing he not only vouchsafes to re guard us ourselves, us wretched sinners, us that have turned our backs upon him, us that have not ceased to provoke his wrath against us: but also vouchsafes for our sakes, to accept our prayers and supplications not only for our private friends, but also for his whole Church. For it behoves us to pray generally for all the faithful, yea and for them who we know not, yea and moreover even for the unbelievers if there be any mean to convert them. Seeing that God hears us after that fashion, even for the furthest strangers in the world, for those that are unknown to us, yea and even for such as are not yet of his house, nor of his flock, but are as stray sheep: is it not a mean to make us to trust in him, and to pray unto him with such certainty, as we come not to him like wavering reeds, (as said Saint James) but with assuredness that he will hear us, and that our prayers shall not be unavailable, because we resort unto him and have recourse unto him upon trust of his promise?

And hereby we see how greatly the wretched world has been abused by making intercession to Sainds. When men read that Moses was heard, and likewise Helias: they concluded thereupon, then must we resort to the He-saints and She-saints, and they must be our advocates and Patrons to God. Yea but the meaning of the holy scripture is clean contrary, as I have declared already, according to the saying of Saint James. For when God says so: it is not to make us to run unto Moses: but it is to the end that by his example we should not doubt to pray also: for the promises belong to us as well as to him. Like as Moses trusted not in his own goodness, ne preased before God as more worthy than the rest of the people: but only as knowing that God called & assured him thereunto: so also let us now ground ourselves upon the promises where by God encourages us to come unto him, yea and to come without doubting that he will reach us his hand, men without regarding whether there be any worthiness in us or no. For we shall find none in us: but it is enough for us that our Lord bids us come, and our obeying of him likes him better than all the virtues that we could bring with us, if there were any in us. Therefore it is too gross an oversight, that whereas God encourages us to come unto him with prayer and supplication after the example of the holy Prophets: we thereupon should contrariwise make them our Patrons and Advocates to shift ourselves from repairing unto him. Again on the other side, although Moses prayed for the people while he was in this world: Does it follow that the same charge is committed to him now still in heaven? Does the scripture tell us that Moses makes intercession for us still? So then, it is as it were a dragging of the holy scripture by the hair of the head, (as men say,) and a racking of it to falsehood, when the things that are spoken of men alive, are wrested to them dead. Therefore let us hold us contented with this common doctrine, that is to wit that every of us must take heart to pray unto God, because his promises are made to all men without exception. For our petitions are not grounded upon our own worthiness: but upon Gods goodness, in that he shows himself so free hearted as to reach out his hand to receive us. Here withal let us pray one for another, and let us not doubt but we shall be heard. And although we be cold, and slothful: yet let us understand that GOD hears his Church, so that although we come not to him so freely, and with so earnest and well disposed mind as we should do: yet do he pity us, because he not only has an eye to our several requests: but also accepts the general prayers that are made by the whole Church, in our behalf and favor: and therefore let us occupy ourselves therein as long as we live. As for those whom God has taken out of this world, for as much as the holy scripture tells us not anything of them: let not us fall to thrusting in our own imaginations and dotages in that behalf: for either we must pray in faith, or else we shall never be heard. And what is meant by faith?

That we should be taught by Gods word. Saint Paul sets it down for an unchangeable order, that we cannot call upon God, unless we know his truth, and that the Gospel have been preached unto us, as is said in the tenth to the Romans. And let us assure ourselves, that as many as step aside from this rule, are as stray beasts and their prayers shall never boot them, for they do but unhallowed the name of GOD, because they have not the warranty of his promises in their hearts.

Now let us pass further: It is said, I will make of you a mightier and greater people than this. Here GOD shows Moses, that there is no cause why he should be afraid, that the good will which he had showed towards that people should be lost, or that he was raised up in vain to be a worker of their redemption; and of this welfare that was promised them. I will make of you another people, said he. But Moses is not contented with that: for he makes intercession unto GOD. And this is not added without cause: but rather to make us to know that Moses regarded not himself, but that forgetting himself he sought the welfare of those that were committed to his charge. That is the thing in effect which we have to hear in mind upon this place.

Nevertheless it might be demanded here, whether it were enough for GOD to raise up a new people or no, seeing the promise was made to Abraham and his offspring, How then? Could he destroy this people, without unsaying his own word, and without calling back of his own promise? No, but hereby we be done to understand, that we must not be over inquisitive of Gods judgments, but deal soberly, and modestly with them. For if we enter into too deep ransacking of them, we shall find them such a bottomless pit, as we shall never get out of them. Therefore let it suffice us that if GOD had listed to have dispatched that people, he could have found means to have performed his promise, so as it should not have been in vain. For (as it is said) had he not been able to have raised up children to Abraham even out of stones? Then must not we bind GOD to our means, nor to the common order of nature, seeing he is to us incomprehensible: but we must consider that he is able to work after such a sort, as will utterly abash us, and we shall not know which way he went to work.

Thus you see that the thing which you have to mark in this text, is that when Gods judgments pass our capacity, we must not fall to ransacking of them by piecemeal out of measure: for (as said Solomon in the five and twentieth Chapter of the Proverbs) it is his glory to keep things hidden, so that although he show us not why he does this or that, yet is not his glory thereby diminished, but rather increased. For it shows men their own weakness, to the end they should learn to live in lowliness, and not think too well of their own wisdom. Mark that for a special point.

But here are yet other things which deserve to be looked unto more merely. And first of all; whereas it is said that Moses ceased not to make intercession; that may seem strange. For I have told you already that our prayers are faulty, if they be not directed by faith: & faith imports that we be sure of Gods will, according to Saint Johns exhortation, where he said that if we intend to pray aright, we must follow Gods ordinance, and not our own likings. Since it is so: how durst Moses in this text sue unto God contrary to his express forbidding, so as although GOD say, Let me alone, I will not hear you speak of it any more, this people must needs perish: yet do Moses make intreatance still? Wherein he may peradventure seem unfortunate, yea and that he is minded even to spite him, or at least wise to show some kind of disobedience? Nay we must note, that Moses never showed himself more obedient than in this, forasmuch as the trust of the promise that God had made could not be wrested from him by so forcible a temptation, needs must it be that he was thoroughly settled in faith, when God speaks to him after such a sort, and tells him, I am determined to destroy this people: and yet Moses makes intercession still, as though he would let him of his purpose. And why? Is it for that he discredits God, or for that he believes not his threatening as the unbelievers do, who commonly make but a mock of it when God speaks to them of his wrath? No: Moses deals not so: but this is his leaning stock: behold, God has made his covenant with Abraham, and that covenant must needs be unchangeable. For it depends not upon the deserts of men, but is grounded upon Gods own free goodness. Moses knew this: and therefore when he heard GOD speak of the destroying of that people: he felt as it were to letting of himself against it, upon assurance of the promise that had been made. True it is that he said nothing of it: but yet was it a thing throughly known to the people, that at the end of four hundred years, they should be put in possession of the inheritance which God had promised them. Moses then held himself to Gods covenant, which was unchangeable and to stand in force for ever. Though men be never so wicked yet, will God of his goodness surmount all their sins, so as his word must needs come to effect. But now had GOD ransomed his people, and the term was fully come wherein they should enjoy his promise: therefore was it of necessity that all there things should be done, and Moses does God the honor, to keep him to that which he had said. Now that he is assaulted with grievous temptation, even as though it were cannon shot, he persists nevertheless in the same faith, and it is not a faith that flickers as a shadow, but a faith conceived of the word and covenant of God, a faith that should stand fast settled and unmovable. We see how that Moses never obeyed GOD better, than when he withstood the threatening which God made. But yet does not this resolve the whole question. For a man might reply: How so? Behold, God speaks continually: why then does Moses believe one of his saying is more than other? Again there is an other doubt. Seeing that God is invariable and has but one single will: why speaks he otherwise than he had determined in himself? For in so doing he should deal double, which thing we know can in no wise agree with his nature. As touching the first question, let us mark that forasmuch as Moses was governed by the holy Ghost, and was fully persuaded that it behooved him to stick to the promise which was made to Abraham, and therefore gave credit to the same: he considered also therewithal, that Gods threatening was just, and that he might justly execute it, for else his praying had been but a mockery. He saw the danger that hung over the people, and was ready to fall upon them. But forasmuch as he thought there was a remedy, though GOD had said, Let me alone: he falls to intreatance again. And that serves to show the heinousness of the offence, and of the fault that had been committed. For such an enormity as that was, deserved well that utter destruction of the people. Moses then is so governed by the holy Ghost, that although his will seem contrary to Gods will: yet nevertheless he knows what we ought to follow. But it seems that Abraham did the clean contrary. For God had promised him to bless Isaac, and to raise up a people of his seed, whom he would take to himself. And yet notwithstanding he commands Abraham to flea Isaac with his own hands. Now it seems that after the example which set us down here, he should rather have said, Lord you has promised me that my son Isaac shall beget a seed whereby salvation shall be sent unto the world: therefore he must needs live. But Abraham is governed by the holy Ghost, and knows that he ought to obey GOD simply without gainsaying: for he could well have stirred up seed from out of ashes of Isaac when he had been dead. So then let us mark that when such temptations as these do encounter the faithful, so as God seems to be contrary to himself: he say let not to govern them by his holy spirit, and to give them such wisdom and discretion, as they hold themselves always to the thing that is good and belonging to their duty, and never doubt at all of Gods word. And therefore let us beseech God to teach us his will, and let us do our endeavor in seeking his word: and surely he will never suffer us to go astray, nor to do amiss, but forasmuch as he knows us to be unskillful and easy to be led away to and fro, he will hold us back by his holy spirit, and give us discretion to discern what he commands. For like as he failed neither Moses, for Abraham, no more also will he fail us.

As touching the second question, where it was demanded how it may be that GOD should say one thing and meant an other: (for that is contrary to his nature, in so much as he names himself the truth, and therefore must needs show himself to be so indeed:) we must mark that in saying so, he speaks not peremptorily, but with condition, though the condition he not expressed. Therefore we must have an eye to the end whereunto these words are referred: and then shall we find that there is no contrariety in them. God had said to Abraham, your seed shall be held in bondage: but about a four hundred years hence I will perform the promise that I have made you.

Needs now must this free promise of God be performed: for it depends not upon men: it is not said, conditionally that your offspring behave themselves well: but Gods intent is to be unchangeable in his determination; And therefore whereas he said here to Moses, Let me alone, I will make clean riddance of this people: it is as if he should say, This people has deserved to be utterly destroyed: for seeing they be past amendment, what shall I do more? I have tried them a number of ways, I have experience of them, I have born gentle with them, I have chastised them, and yet will they not be reclaimed, neither by fair means nor by soul. Seeing then that they be past recovery, they must needs be utterly rooted out and perish. Yea, but yet is there this, Let me alone. His using of that speech includes a condition: as if he should say, Here am I ready to do the office of a judge: what remains now to do, but to thunder down upon this people, and to make clean dispatch of them? Only make you no intercession for them.

Now we see yet better the thing which touched before: that is to wit, that God was so far off from cutting off of Moses, or from shutting him out that he should not pray: that he did rather sharpen him thereunto. As if he should say: But for you this people should be destroyed. For if I should handle them according to their deserts: I should confound them. And forasmuch as they be so willful that they be past amendment. It is time now or more to execute my sentence. It is too much: I will make no more words: But I will grant thus much at your request, that if you make intercession to me, I will be restrained by it. Now then we let there two questions well resolved: and the profit that redounds of this text. Namely first that the force of our prayers is showed us here, when we pray unto God faithfully.

And secondly we see that dangers ought to provoke us the more. The more that Gods wrath is uttered unto us, the more ought we to be moved to pray unto God: because it is as if he drain us thereto by force. And we must not pray all only for ourselves, nor have a care of our salvation only, nor only fear the dangers that hang over our heads: but we must also take care for our neighbors, and when we hear Gods threatening, they must waken us, and make us to come before him, saying, Alas Lord, here is a sort of wretched creatures which must needs perish, if you be so disposed. Therefore let us be provoked to fear, the more for Gods showing of his wrath unto us, and for the hearing of his threats: For he utters his judgments unto us to the end that we should prevent them. For when GOD gives sentence upon our sins, it is always with this condition, that he does it not without giving of us some respite to remedy the mischief. So we seek the remedy by such means as he commands in his word. And so you see what we have to remember upon the example of Moses.

To be short, we see that it is not lawful for men to put forth themselves to make prayer and supplication: except they have the promise and be sure that it is Gods good will that they should do so. But GOD will give them such a zeal, as the temptations which shall cross them shall not stay them from going on forward, though it seem to themselves that GOD is not minded to hear them, but rather to put them back and to shake them quite off. Therefore let us not cease to resort unto him as it were importunately. For the importunateness whereof our Lord Jesus Christ speaks, in reporting the similitude concerning a widow that had to do with a wicked judge: made that judge ashamed though he were a naughty and froward man. But surely when we come to GOD, we need not to be importunate: for Jesus Christ tells us, that if we find mercy in men that are lewd and ill-minded towards us: we shall much more obtain favor at Gods hand, who tarry not till we come unto him, but calls and allures us to him. Seeing then that he is so friendly, let us not be afraid that we shall not obtain our requests. But yet for all that, let us not give over with once praying unto him as it were for fashions sake: but let us hold out to the end, yea and even be importunate upon him. Although he seem unwilling to hear us, and let us alone in our distresses, yea and that to our seeming our misery does still increase: yet notwithstanding let not us fail to hold on still, resting upon his promise which he had given us, which is certain and infallible: that is to wit, that he will never fail those which come unto and call upon him in truth.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good GOD with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done heretofore, and that forasmuch as we know what need we have to pray, (insomuch that every minute of an hour we run in danger of endless death and are like to perish both body and soul:) it may please him to inflame us so by his holy spirit, as we may call upon him unfriendly, and be more careful to do it and to exercise ourselves in it at all times, as provoked thereto by the great need which we have thereof, considering the miseries where through we should perish, if we were not succored by him and by his grace : and that in the meanwhile it may please him to bear with us in our infirmities, and not suffer us to be rent off from that body of his Church, but make us to perceive by experience, that the prayers which are made through the whole world are available to his chosen, and that their prayers also do avail us , so as the same may establish us continually more & more, in the holy union which he had made with us in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth, reducing all poor ignorant people, into the right way of salvation, out of the bondage of error and darkness: and that for this purpose it would please him, to raise up true and faithful ministers of his word, Which may not seek their own profit and ambition, but the glorifying of his holy name, and the salvation of his poor flock. On the other side, & c.

On Saturday the 31st of August 1555

The 66th Sermon which is the fifth upon the ninth Chapter

15 Then turned I me, and went down the Hill, and the hill burned with fire, and I had the two tables of the Covenant in my two hands.

16 Then looked I, and behold you had sinned against the Lord your God: and had made a molten Calf, and were turned out of hand from the way which the Lord your God had commanded you.

17 Then took I the two tables and cast them out of my two hands, and break them before your eyes:

18 And I fell down flat before the Lord forty days and forty nights as afore, without eating bread or drinking water, for all your sins which you had committed in doing evil in the sight of the Lord, by provoking him to wrath.

19 For I was afraid of the anger and wrath wherewith the Lord was displeased against you to destroy you. And the Lord heard me that time also.

20 Likewise the Lord was fore angry with Aaron to destroy him: but I prayed also for Aaron the same time.

21 Then took I your sin which you had made, that is to wit the Calf, and burnt it with fire, and stomped it and ground it thoroughly even until it was small as dust, and cast the dust thereof in the brook that came down from the hill.

Here Moses declared the great good zeal that he had, at such time as he saw God so sore offended with the Jews for making the golden calf, and for their forsaking of their Redeemer to give themselves over to a dead thing, rather than to him of whose power they had had experience so many ways. Now he said that he had the two tables in his hand, and that when he saw the people so fallen away to Idolatry, he broke them in pieces. Here it might be asked, whether Moses were not carried with overhasty mood. For we have seen that those two tables were written with Gods own hand, so as there was not any workmanship of man in them, but that the engraving of the ten commandments in them, was of Gods own doing. Now then, that Moses threw down Gods handiwork after that fashion, notwithstanding that the people had sinned: it seems not to proceed of any modesty, but rather of too unadvised zeal and over violent headiness. We must not presume to judge such odd things: for we see that God governed his servants by his holy spirit, and we know that sometimes he stirred up his faithful ones to do his pleasure by extraordinary means. And although we may not make a certain rule of it: yet is not the deed itself to be blamed. We see what happened unto Phinees. For although he was not ordained to be a judge, but only to be a priest: yet did he execute Justice upon the adulterer, & the adulteress which had defiled the Sanctuary. God allowed his doing, and there is record of it in the holy scripture, and yet notwithstanding it was a peculiar deed which we may not follow, without a special moving of the holy Ghost. As much is to be said of the thing which we read of in this text, where Moses break the two tables, which thing he did not through hasty mood, but as led thereto by a zeal to God ward, and GOD showed himself therein, of purpose to do the people to understand, how heinous their transgression was. It is said that Moses was sent of God to bring down his covenant, and to be as in his stead, whom he served. And therefore his deed was as it were a declaring to the people, that his covenant was broken and torn in pieces. Behold (said God) It is true I have chosen you, I have covenanted with you, I have showed myself to be your God, and the covenants were engraved in two stones, that they might remain in perpetual remembrance. But now have you broken your faith to me, and therefore must I for my part forsake you, and disannul the covenant that was made betwixt us. Thus we see that Moses did not anything at all adventure, nor was driven by fleshly affection: but that God showed the people by him, that he gave them over and took them not for his, but utterly disclaimed them. For the very bond of the union, was the obedience of the people in submitting themselves unto his law, and their acknowledging of him to be their god, and their worshipping of him, notwithstanding that there were infirmities in them. But they make them a calf of gold, and utterly forsake the religion that was appointed them. And forasmuch as they did so: it was good reason that God should shake them off, and make as it were an utter divorce between himself & them for ever. Mark that for one point.

But now by the way, this seems to disagree with that which Moses added: that is to wit, that he should break the two tables with his own hands, as it were of purpose to separate God and the people asunder: & yet notwithstanding make intercession for them, yea & that after such a sort (as it is said in Exodus) as he was not contented to entreat God only with prayer & supplications: but also was inflamed with such zeal as as he besought God (if it were possible) to take him out of this life, yea and even to wipe him out of the book of life, so as he might be accursed, conditionally that the people might escape. Here are two things which seem very disagreeable at the first sight: namely, that he should be so angry, and that he should on Gods behalf break and disannul the covenant, as who should say he meant to banish the people from the kingdom of heaven, and from all hope of salvation, yea and even from the inheritance that was promised them : and that yet notwithstanding, he should go and offer himself to GOD, to be punished for the peoples sakes, and to bear their curse both in his body and in his soul. But herein we see, that Gods servants may well have a burning zeal to execute their charge: and yet for all that, not cease to have pity & compassion on such as perish, and whom they be enforced to hate, and against whom they be driven to be sharp and rough. And Moseses zeal showed it self, not only in breaking both the Tables, but also in his doing of the execution that we read of in Exodus. For he did not only rebuke the people sharply: but also commanded the Levites to hallow their hands. And how? By killing all that ever they met with. Dedicate yourselves this day unto the Lord said he. So was that tribe chosen to do that execution. And although they were ordained to the service of the sanctuary: yet is it told them that they must consecrate their hands unto GOD. And after what manner? By fleeing their brethren, so as they spared not any man for kindred's sake. Indeed you be all of Abraham's house (said he): but yet must you execute vengeance this day, for the offence that had been committed against GOD, in making the calf. Loe here another token, that Moses was so out of patience with the people, as he had no kindness in him, he meant to forgive the transgression that had been committed against GOD: and yet for all this, he is contented to yield his own person to answer for them, not only by sustaining some bodily punishment: but also by being even, damned for them, if it were possible. But we must always come back to that which I have touched already: that is to wit , that Gods servants have always such a care of the welfare of them that are committed to their charge: that they had leaver to perish themselves, than to see those go to destruction, of whose salvation there was some hope. And yet notwithstanding they cease not for all that, to be sharp and rough when God commands them to do their duty, not upon cruelty, that they have not compassion still upon the wretched sinners: but because it is not in their own liberty and choice to show mercy, but they must have respect to their office, and unto Gods will, that they follow the same. Both these things are showed us here in Moses: and we see that all the Prophets have used the like manner of dealing. It may well seem that they have no regard to spare the people. For they threaten Gods wrath, they curse, they condemn, and to be short, they seem to bring nothing with them but thunder claps: and yet notwithstanding we see they were led with such pity and carefulness, that they besought God to show favor to such as were unworthy of it. Who will give tears unto mine eyes, said the Prophet Jeremy: I could well find in mine heart to melt into water, to bewail the sins of my country folk. And yet in the mean season how speaks he? Used he mild tearmes to rebuke the people with gentleness? Nay, he cried out against them as though he had forgotten all natural affection. So then we see that these two things agree very well: that is to wit, that those whom GOD chooses to set forth his word, may well regard the welfare and benefit of the wretched sinners that are committed to their charge, and be even sorry and exceedingly grieved at the heart to see them go to destruction: and yet for all that, not forbear to show signs of rigor, so far forth as their office required, and as they needs must for the serving of God.

Furthermore as touching the request of Moses: it is a strange case that he should desire to be wiped out of the book that God had written: for he knew well it was impossible. He was not so ignorant but that he knew Gods determination to be unchangeable, and that his choosing of those that are his can not by any means be altered. And therefore this request seems to be inordinate, yea and utterly disagreeing to faith. But we must mark that in this zeal Moses respected not precisely what was possible to be done: but only meant to pray God that he being but one man might perish rather than the whole people should perish, so as he himself might answer for all the evil that had been done if it were possible. And besides that, we have to mark here, that Moses matched Gods glory with the welfare of the people to whom the promises were given. For he persuaded himself that it was not possible that that people should be utterly rooted out, but that Gods truth must be abolished therewithal, because God had bound himself to the offspring of Abraham: and therefore that if that people had been cut off, God should have seemed to be variable. He could well have found out some mean incomprehensible to man: but Moses could judge no further than he was able to conceive. Now then forasmuch as he was at his wits end in this case, and God was to be found faithful and soothfast by performing of his covenant: therefore does he forget himself, and is carried away rather to offer himself as it were in a sacrifice of cursing, than that Gods name should be blasphemed, or that it might be said that he had not kept promise, or that he had changed his purpose. Hereby we see that Moses might pray faithfully: and yet notwithstanding not look simply & lonely to the right of the case. How mighty that be done? He was moved thereto by a passion, how be it not by a cholerick and fleshly passion, but by such a zealous passion to God ward, as carried him above all state of man. Never the later (as I have said afore), these things must not be drawn to a general rule, (for we have not the spirit of Moses): but yet must we go so far with him, as we had leaver that the whole world should go to destruction, than Gods glory should be defaced, or that he should not be worshipped, or that the honor of his justice, wisdom, goodness, and power should not be reserved unto him. To be short, we ought to prefer Gods glory, not only before all bodily goods, but also even before the salvation of our souls. And although that that be hard for us to do: yet must we enforce ourselves unto it. We see how Saint Paul did the like for the Jews, and he was lead by the same reason which led Moses. I could find in my heart (said he) to be accursed for my kinfolks sake. It was not human pity that moved him thereunto: but his eye was always upon the promise that had been made to the offspring of Abraham, in respect whereof it behooved God to keep still some remnant of that peoples seed, or else the infidels and unbelievers would have reported him to have been a liar, and they would have scorned the law & all the promises. Wherefore to the end that Gods name should not come to such reproach: Saint Paul offers himself to be accursed, if need be, and yet was he well assured, that God would never suffer him to escape out of the hand of his Leader, who had taken him into his keeping. But it is not for us to enter into such disputations. For as I said, Moses is contented to be ravished with such zeal, as he had leaver that both himself and all the world beside should perish, than to see Gods name scorned, or that the unbelievers should have their mouths opened to blaspheme him. That is the thing which we have to mark upon the prayer of Moses.

But yet therewithal let us come back again to that which is rehearsed here, concerning his breaking of the two tables. Herein we see that how pitiful so ever Gods servants are towards the wretched creatures which perish, yet must they not use any such mercy as may nourish the evil, but be careful to do the thing that God commands them, without swerving one way or other. Sometimes men are so moved with foolish pity, that they offend God: and upon opinion to do good to those whom they bear with, they increase the evil still in them, and are a cause of their greater decay. To be short, men stand so much in their own conceits, that they will needs exceed and go beyond God in mercy. And this is seen in all cases. Howbeit, if a man examine their affections narrowly: he shall find that their so doing proceeds not of loving kindness: for one while they be sharp & rough, and there is nothing with them but destroying: and anon after in that turning of a hand, you shall see them in another mood, so as they will needs be very pitiful. But after what manner? In going beyond their duty, without regard what God had ordained: and (which worse is) they will needs be always showing of mercy where there is no repentance, whereby they cast wood into the fire, to make gods wrath burn that hotter against them. And therefore when they whom God had put in office do see offences committed: they must not in any wise leave them unpunished. For why? If they suffer the mischief to settle & to fester: it will grow worse and worse till it become curable. For you see how diseases become incurable, when the parties be not purged in due time and place. We must remember how the Apostle said, that we must beware we suffer not evil weds to grow, but we must pluck them up betimes, for if we do not, they will so ever grow us as we shall not be able to destroy them when we would, but they will stop our eyes, and so keep down that good seed, as it can never thrive. After that manner will God punish our negligence, when we be not diligent in doing our duty to rid away evil from among us. Thus you see what we have to mark. But let us also apply this lesson to our instruction.

Let such as have the charge of teaching, look nearly to themselves and think well upon it, and bear in mind what God commands them that they may discharge themselves thereof: or else they may well make coverings, but God will ask them an account of that things that he had enjoined them. Again on the other side, when we hear our vices and sins sharply rebuked by Gods word, and rough threatening against us, so as it may seem that our teachers intend to deliver us into Gods hands to be punished by him according to our deserts: let us not think it strange, as a number do, who would have us but only to grease and anoint their scabs, in stead of handling them as they should be, & cannot abide to be rebuked roughly. But what? They would be flattered to the end they might perish without feeling of it. Contrariwise we see that to be taught aright, we must be rebuked and threatened, yea and that with such sharpness and vehemence, as we may be driven to bethink us of our offences, and to humble ourselves before God as becomes us. That is the thing which we have to remember in that we see that Moses was so chafed at the peoples transgression, that he brake the two Tables immediately, and afterwards drew out the sword, to punish such as had so violated Gods service, and encouraged his tribe to do the like. Let us not think but that Moses was wounded to the quick with grief and compassion, when he was fain to do execution with his own hands. For we know he was a meek and kind hearted man, and inclined to good and holy pity above all others. But yet does it behoove him to discharge his duty, or else he had been unfaithful towards God.

Moreover whereas he said, I looked, & behold you offended your God, by making yourselves a calf of metal, and you were turned out of the way which he had appointed you: this looking of his was because God had certified him thereof: but yet behooved it him to bear witness of their deed [with his own eyes]. And whereas Joshua said it seemed to be some battle: Moses answered that it was not so, for as much as some of them made not signs of mirth, and other some signs of fear and sorrow: but all the whole multitude was merry and joyful: and therefore (quote he) there must needs be some other matter in it. At his coming down he saw them dancing as it were upon fond devotion, according to the manner of Idolaters, who think themselves to serve their Gods very well by such foolish and wanton toys. And so that Israelites took this dancing of theirs to be a piece of Gods service: wherefore Moses executed the punishment afore mentioned. But as touching this text, the only thing that we have to mark, is the thing which we spoke of even now, and which we have spoken of afore: namely that he upbraids the Jews with their sudden starting aside from the way which GOD had showed them. For the wellspring of the mischief was, that they held not themselves to the rule that is contained in the Law. We see then that the cause of all ruin and destruction, is our ficklenesses in turning away from Gods word. For as soon as we pass those bounds and swerve never so little aside: by and by we run astray into utter destruction. And therefore it stands us so much the more on hand to hold ourselves warily in obedience to our GOD, especially when he had been so gracious unto us, as to set us in the right way. For he vouchsafed not so to guide all men. Truth it is that all men, yea even those which never heard one word of teaching, have enough to make them inexcusable. But as for us, we ought to make singular account of this privilege, that GOD calls us to him, that he take us into his government, and that he showed us the way of salvation. Since we have that, we cannot go astray, so we hearken to the doctrine that is set forth to us in Gods name. But if we despise such a benefit: then are we worthy of too too much blame. And therefore let us learn to submit ourselves simply to Gods word, or else we shall open the gate to all wickedness, accordingly as it is said that men mare all and turn all upside down, when they start aside from the said way. Then is there but one way to walk well and rightly in: which is to obey our GOD, and not to give any credit to our own wit and imagination, nor to give head to our own inventions: but to abide as it were fast linked to the things that GOD commands and appoints us. Those are the things which we must stick by: and if we do not, we be unhappy and forlorn creatures. For we shall go on from evil to evil, and there will be no end nor measure of our disordered, as we see it be fell to this people, who having once let go Gods word, fell into so gross and beastly superstition, as to worship a Calf of their own making: and they became so made that they spared not any thing so foully to defile themselves in offending GOD after that fashion. For when Aaron willed them to bring him all their ornaments and Jewels: it was to the end to have made them loath to have had an Idol of that price. But there was neither man nor woman which brought not their ornaments and all the costly Jewels which they had. Those graceless wretches were so carried away, and the devil possessed them with such fury, that they passed not to spoil themselves of all their substance, nor cared what cost they were at, so they might have an idol. And by this example are we warned to rain ourselves short and not to let ourselves loose, least we happen to start never so little aside from Gods pure doctrine, & from the Religion which he shows us in his word.

There is yet another thing to be noted in that breaking of these Tables: which is, that GOD intended to show by way of a figure, that his once writing of his Law was not enough for us, but that it behooved us to have it double engrossed. Truth it is that Moseses rehearsing of it in this text, is to another end: but yet is there no inconvenience in this also. Likewise when Moses took a veil or scarf to put before his face, because the people could not abide the glory and great brightness that shone therein, it was to magnify the Law, according as Saint Paul declared: and the very story itself shows sufficiently, that it behooved Moses to be known thereby to be as an Angel, and not to be taken any more to be within the common state of a mortal man, in so much that his countenance shone as bright as the sun, which the people could not abide, & that was to put them in mind of their own weakness and frailty. That was the chief cause why Moses wore a veil to hide his face withal. But yet herewith all Saint Paul sticks not to say, that God showed even then a forehand by way of figure, that there should befall such a dimness and blindness upon the Jews, that when so ever they read the Law or heard it preached, they should have as it were a veil before their eyes, so as they should not see a white. And Saint Paul said that this thing was accomplished even in his time among the Jews. For they read Moses continually in their Synagogues: and yet they continued as stark beasts as the heathen, so as they became brutish through their own foolish fancies, and could not perceive Gods truth at all. For Saint Paul tells them, that all the Law is nothing without Jesus Christ: it is but as a dead thing, because Jesus Christ is as the soul and perfection thereof. So then, as touching the breaking of the Tables: it was the foresaid cause that moved Moses to do it: that is to wit, to show the people that God disclaimed them, as if he had said, your God gives you over, and had divorced himself from you. For in as much as your wickedness had separated you from him: it is good reason that he also should stand discharged of his promise, and be no more bound to so malicious & froward a people as you be, who have used such unfaithfulness towards him. That then is the first reason.

But there is also another cause: which is, that we have as it were a figure or image, that Gods once writing of his Law is not enough for us: but that we have need of a second writing of it, to the intent it may avail us, and the doctrine thereof benefit us by showing itself to be lively and of effectual force and power. And that is the thing which the Prophets mean in saying, that GOD will make a new Covenant with his faithful ones, not as he did with their fathers in Egypt, but by writing his Law in their hearts, and by engraving it in their bowels. And therefore let us mark well that GOD meant to do us to understand, that his writing of his Law in the two tables of stone, was by and by void and of none effect. And why? Because that, if God do but write his Law, or cause it to be preached to us only by word of mouth: there will never be any hold or tack in it: and he shows that the blame thereof is in ourselves, because we be not steadfast in keeping the promise that we have made unto GOD, but become variable, and start aside out of hand. God for his part, Both well perform whatsoever he promised us: but we break off all acquaintance and union with him, so as we be cut off and banished from him, and we bereave ourselves of all the promises that he offered us: and therefore after he had once written his law, he must be fain to turn again and write it the second time. As how? For figures do not always represent the full truth, but there is oftentimes some difference. Then let us mark that the figure varied from the truth which God shows us and make us to perceive. For he writes not his Law the second time in stones: but rather whereas our hearts were hard before, he changed them and make them soft: and in stead of stony hearts (as said Ezekiel,) he gives us hearts of flesh: that is to say, he softens our hearts and make them pliable, to the intent we should receive his Law, and have it engraved in us, and be able to do and to follow whatsoever he commands us. Therefore let us bear this figure well in mind, for as much as it is for our benefit. In deed as concerning the first reason, it behooved us to bethink ourselves well when GOD had called us. For if we corrupt his service, or alter religion at our own pleasure: although there be no Moses to break the tables of stone: yet had God showed once for all, that he is alienated from us, and that he will have us to be as strangers to his house. Truth it is that his election is without repentance: yet notwithstanding (as it is said in Exodus,) he will save whom he lifts. Howbeit, if we stick not purely to his word: it is all one as if we fell out with him, and plaid the fugitive and unruly children: and he will not suffer us to despise his covenant after that manner, without avenging of himself of such unthankful ness. And he had showed us at that time in the person of Moses, that he gives over and forsakes all those, which turn away from the truth and hold not themselves to it, so that for his part he will have no more to do with them, nor any more acquaintance with them. Wherefore let us beware that this horrible sentence be not cast upon us, and when so ever our Lord shall have called us, let it serve to hold us in awe and fear. But yet let us know also, that it is not enough for us to have our ears beaten with Gods commandments, and to have them set before us, and to be encouraged to keep them: for God must be fain to work within our hearts, or else all the teaching in the world will stand us in no stead: it will be but a sound ringing in the air, whereof no profit will redound. Now then, come we to hear Gods word? In deed we ought to make account of the favor that he shows us in causing it to be preached unto us: but yet let us assure ourselves that that would but turn to our greater condemnation, if he engraved it not in our hearts. What is to be done then? We must discharge ourselves of all self trust, assuring ourselves that we shall be but evil scholars, until GOD have taught us by his holy spirit. Notwithstanding that he shall have used men as his instruments, to bring us to the knowledge of his truth: yet must he himself bore our ears, that we may hearken to him, and her must touch our hearts and soften them, that we may receive that doctrine which is uttered unto us. Wherefore let us learn to mislike ourselves, by acknowledging our own sin and wretchedness: and therewithal let us pray him to work in such sort, as the things which we shall have heard and understood, be not a witness against us of our rebelliousness, and that we have been foolke past amendment. And so, as often as we come to any sermon, or read the holy Scripture: let us pray God to touch us inwardly, and to make the doctrine available which we shall have heard, so as it may not be spoken to the stones, but to such as have been fore taught by his holy spirit. Thus you see what we have to mark upon that place.

Now for the attainment of this second writing, we must not go to Moses, but to our Lord Jesus Christ. For it is he that had brought us the holy Ghost, and the renewment whereby our hearts are reformed to the obeying of GOD, and whereby they be circumcised that they may be dedicated to his service. Then if Moses be compared to our Lord Jesus Christ, he is but a minister of the letter. And why? Because he could go no further than he had commission, which was, to set forth Gods doctrine. But it belonged to Jesus Christ to give light to that which Moses had uttered, and to give strength thereunto. And how was that? By his holy spirit. True it is that Saint Paul termed himself a minister of the spirit. Howbeit, that is not to deface his Master: it is not to draw to himself the thing that belongs to the son of GOD: but it is to show that our Lord Jesus Christ uttered his grace now a days by the preaching of his Gospel. As how? Let us mark first of all, that the renewing of us and the writing of Gods Law in our hearts, thereby to fashion us according to the righteousness contained in that same: is reserved a lonely to the son of God, and that it is he which gives us the will to follow God his Father and to obey him. For he had the spirit of the fear of God, he had the spirit of all righteousness, he had the spirit of truth, as is said in the eleventh Chapter of the Prophet Esay. So then let us mark, that we must resort to our Lord Jesus Christ when we be put in mind of our duty. When it is told us what GOD required of us, we must think thus: Alas Lord Jesus, it is true in deed that here we have knowledge of the thing that is good and rightful: but what? We have another Law clean contrary to it in ourselves: which is, that we do but chase and fret at GOD when we be taught: and when his Law is alleged unto us, we do the clean contrary to that which is contained there: and-therefore you must be fain to change us, and to make us new creatures: for to that end is the spirit given us, which you communicates unto us, by bearing us record that we be members of thy body. And again, had Jesus Christ once given us this will? He gives us also ability to perform the same desire, and strengthens us to against all temptations, as we shall never be overcome by them. You see then that we must hie us to our Lord Jesus Christ, assuring ourselves that that prerogative and honor belongs to none but only him. Yet notwithstanding this saying of St. Paul is true also, that all such as preach the Gospel are spiritual ministers, [that is to say] they set not forth a dead letter and unprofitable doctrine, but withal they bring Gods spirit. And how is that? Is it by their own breathing? No: For our Lord Jesus Christ did well show by his breathing upon his disciples, that the holy Ghost proceeds from none but himself alone. But Saint Paul meaning is, that Jesus Christ works continually, to the end we should believe in him. True it is that we shall not see him here personally present: how then shall we be sure, that he writes Gods Law in our hearts? Let us not allege any of those things. For seeing that Jesus Christ is the end and perfection of the law, yea and the very life of it (as I said afore:) let us not think but that he prints Gods Law in our hearts by the preaching of the Gospel. So then let us not doubt but GOD will perform that grace in us. And although the party that preaches unto us be but a mortal man, and the words which he uttered unto us with his mouth, do vanish anon after away in the air: yet let not us doubt but Jesus Christ will for all that do his duty, as Saint Paul declared in the same place. And in deed, the faithful have experience thereof. For we should never have so much as any thought at all of coming unto GOD, or of doing any good: unless we were fully resolved of this ground, namely that it behooved us to be thoroughly settled and constant: all the which proceeds of our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore when so ever we feel that GOD draws us unto him, let us understand that he shows us how we be members of the body of his son, because we have the holy Ghost by whom we be altered and reformed, and by whom also his Law is written new again in our hearts. Thus you see what we have to bear in mind.

Moreover, let us mark that whereas Moses tells the people that God heard him for that time: it is to the end they should not abuse Gods goodness, but understand their offence to have been so horrible, that if they did so any more and tempted GOD again afterward: they should find no mercy. The intent then of Moses in this place, was to hold the people in awe. Truly we ought to be fully persuaded of this, that if GOD find us repentant for our sins, he will ever be ready to forgive all that we have committed. Let us but only make towards him, and he will reach us his hand. Yet is it not meant that we should take leave to do evil under colour that GOD is so merciful to wretched sinners, that as soon as they return unto him, he prevents them and is ready to receive them and embrace them a forehand. This (say I) must not make us the more inclined to do evil: but we must understand that when God had forgiven us once, we must no more fall back again. For then do we tempt him and abuse his patience, which is the next way to shut us out of the gate of salvation, and to disappoint ourselves utterly of all the mercy which he was minded to have used towards us. True it is that although we shall have offended twenty or thirty times, yet does God tell us that he will have pity upon us. But I speak as now of those that take liberty to offend, and say, seeing I have found God so gentle and pitiful, I shall surely be received of him at all times. Surely when men stand so upon Gods mercy, and under pretence thereof, do either become negligent, or else give over themselves to all naughtiness: it is all one as if they renounced all the promises of their salvation. Therefore let us mark well the saying that is set down here. God (said Moses) heard me. And how? for that time: to the end that the people should think thus with themselves, Alas, it is a wonder that ever we obtained pardon, and it must needs astonish us still, that God would rid us out of such danger as we were fallen into, considering how deadly and over deadly the fall was. Now then seeing that God had showed himself so friendly towards us: let us beware that we provoke not his wrath any more. For if we fall back again, we cannot tell what may befall us. After that manner must wretched sinners, (when they be tempted to do amiss,) bridle and restrain themselves by setting Gods promises before their eyes, howbeit in such sort as they become not the boulder to doe evil, but as they may have recourse to Gods mercy when they have done amiss, and live in the greater awe ever after. Thus you see whereof we be put in mind in this text.

Now let us fall down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may learn to sigh and groan for them all our life time, and find mercy at his hand when we seek it with faith: and to reform us in such wise, as we may not pervert his word and the pureness of his service: but that seeing he had showed us the way of salvation, it may please him to grant us the grace to persevere therein all the time of our life, so as we forsaking all our wicked lusts and affections, may walk on in his obedience: and moreover to bear with us in all our infirmities, until he have ride us quite and clean of them all, and clothed us again with his own righteousness, that we may be partakers of his glory, which he had promised us for our Lord Jesus Christ sake. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth & sea.

The 67th Sermon, which is the sixth upon the ninth Chapter

20 Likewise the Lord was sore angry with Aaron, to have destroyed him: but at the same time I prayed also for Aaron.

21 Then took I the sin which you had made, that is to wit the Calf and burnt it in the fire, and brake it and brayed it thoroughly, until it was as small as dust: and I cast the dust thereof in the broke that came down from the hill.

22 Also you provoked him to wrath in Taberah, and in Massah, and in Kibroth-Hattaavah.

23 When the Lord sent you from Cades barn, saying, go up and possess the Land which I have given you: Then rebelled you against the commandment of the Lord your GOD, and believed him not, neither obeyed you his voice.

24 You have been disobedient to the Lord, ever since the time that I have known you.

After that Moses had spoken of the fault which the people had committed in making the golden Calf to worship it: now he shows that Aaron was to be blamed for that crime, for as much as he being then the governor of the people, had not endeavored to withstand them with such stoutness as he ought to have done. For such as be magistrates shall have a harder account to make, than such as are private persons. Now then, Aaron ought to have taught the people, and to have withstood their evil dealings even to the death. True it is that when Aaron saw that the people would needs have an Idol to worship, he told them that it was wickedness so to do: and when he could by no means way with them, he devised another shift, and labored to drive them from their desire, by requiring their Jewels and ornaments and the things which they did set most store by. For he thought that by that means, that fancy would be put out of their head. You see then that Aaron contented not to their evil, but would fain have letted it, howbeit, that was not with such stoutness as he ought to have done. For he should rather have hazarded his life, than to have consented to Idolatry, whereby GODS honor and true service was corrupted, by conveying of it over so loudly to a puppet that was but a dead and senseless thing. Ought not Aaron to have been so zealous, as rather to have hazarded his own person for it? Specially seeing that GOD had put him in so honorable a charge? For he was the high priest. And although he was not yet consecrated into his office: yet knew he well enough whereunto he was ordained. And therefore there was no excuse at all for him.

Now upon this text we have to gather, that those to whom GOD had given charge to govern his people, are not discharged by not consenting unto evil, or by not being the authors thereof: but they must withstand it to the uttermost, and be of such invincible stoutness, as not to swerve aside for any importunateness. Although they see great troubles and hurly-burles yet must not their courage be abated therefore, but they must still stand in the maintenance of that which is good. And although they see themselves in danger, so as there is none other remedy but only by praying GOD to take them into his protection: yet must they not swerve aside from their office to eschew the danger. And therefore had not Aaron escaped unpunished at Gods hand, if his brother Moses had not in treated for him. Let not us think nowadays that God had altered his mind: but let us mark, than as many as have not withstood evil to the uttermost, shall be wrapped all in one condemnation with the offenders, and Gods vengeance must consume them all together. For he that lets evil slip, or prevents it not if he can, does give liberty to do evil. It is a saying even of the heathen, who to rebuke the negligence and coldness of magistrates and officers of justice, have alleged this proverb, That if he which ought to hinder evil do wink at it, it is all one as if he proclaimed leave and liberty to do evil by the sound of a trumpet, and he shall bear the blame of it before God. And indeed that proverb was commonly used, to do us to understand that God will not hold them excused, which have been so cold in executing their office. Now if the world condemns them: what will become of them, when they come before the heavenly judge? So then, Magistrates are here warned of their duty, namely that when they see any evil, they must withstand it. Although they be not armed with worldly force: yet must they rather forgo their lives, than yield in such sort as the mischief may get the mastery and the upper hand through their cowardliness. Let Lords of estate look well to themselves: for although men acquit them: yet shall they not be quite before GOD if they play the blinkered, and let naughtiness slip when they see God offended. If they see the right perverted, and do not manfully withstand it: they must yield account for it. And moreover, God will bring them to shame before the world, that they may feel the condemnation a forehand, which is prepared for them before him: and therefore let every man look nearly to himself.

And let us mark generally, that as many as withdraw not themselves from the company of the wicked, are taken as accessories before God, though they considerate not themselves with them, if they make no countenance to withstand them when they see them go about any evil. We hear how St. Paul says to all the faithful both great and small, Have no fellowship with wicked works, but rebuke them. Then does it stand us on hand to beware that we be not partakers in evil, and to protest openly that we like not of it. But yet is not that enough: for we must show ourselves to be enemies of the wicked, and take part against them. And they that do not so, are too cowardly: and that dissimulation of theirs shall be esteemed as treason before God. But what? Men see how the world goes. For nowadays there can no friendship be maintained, except men bolster their neighbors in their evil doings. Folk do mock GOD openly to his face, and yet are they ready to be at open defiance, is men reach them not their hands to take part with them in all offences against GOD. But yet shall not this rule be changed for all that: we may well in harden ourselves in our wicked customs: but yet will not GOD fail to judge us, yea even according to this rule. And therefore let us not think that he should transform himself, when we take inordinate leave to do evil. And when we be come into possession, and have taken covert under pretence that others did so as well as we: let us not think that we shall escape for all that, but let us forbear that we be not wrapped in the vengeance which God pronounces against sinners, for want of withstanding them to the uttermost of our power. All men without exception ought to do so, as I said afore: but yet they that are in authority ought to take good heed that they show the way unto others.

After that Moses had spoken of this offence: he added yet other examples, to show that the people could not boast of any righteousness of their own, nor allege that GOD had chosen them for their virtues sakes, or for my worthiness or desert that was in them. Therefore he said, Remember what you did in Taberah, that is to say, in the Burning. It was a place so named, because that there, GOD sent down fire from heaven to consume a part of the Camp. And afterward in Massah, which signified temptation, and was another place, so named because the people tempted GOD there. And again in Meribah, that is to say Strife or Contention. Remember also what you did at Kibroth-Hattaavah, that is to say, at the graves of lust. For GOD sent as it were a plague upon all the people, so as a great multitude of them died for their wicked lust in that they longed for flesh, and would not be contented with the Manna. This food is too loathsome (quote they,) we can not away with it, it goes against our stomachs, for we see nothing else but always Manna Manna, we will have some flesh meat. You see then that the wicked lust of that people was that cause of their ruin & destruction. Finally Moses rehearsed here that thing that he had said afore, concerning the rebellion which the people committed when they should have entered into that land. For they distrusted gods promise, & would needs send spies to learn how things went. They trusted more to their own policy & eyesight, than to Gods word. By reason whereof Gods wrath was so kindled against them that he gave flat sentence that none of them should enter into the promised heritage, save only Josua, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, because those two had behaved themselves faithfully. But as for the people, they should be led about by the space of forty years, until their carcasses were rooted in the wilderness, according to the threat which God had uttered with his own mouth. That is the content of this part of the text.

Now let us mark first of all, that to make the Jews understand the meaning of Moses, or rather of the holy ghost: it behoved them to be warned to let their former faults before their eyes, that they might not be so fond as to presume anything at all upon their own worthiness or upon their own power: but to abase themselves utterly, acknowledging that GOD found not anything in them why he should chose them, but that all came of his own free goodness. Now if Moses were fain to use such exhortation to the Jews: let us understand that we also have as much need of it nowadays as they. The end therefore which we must begin at, is this: that we must call down ourselves, and not be lifted up with any presumption, nor vaunt ourselves through any foolish overweening: but acknowledge ourselves to be void of all deserving, and that there is not any grace or righteousness in us, for the which we might obtain love at Gods hand. And therefore must he needs prevent us with his free goodness. Mark that for a special point. But how may men abase themselves after that fashion? We will never do it of our own accord. Indeed if every of us look well upon himself, it must needs be that we be as it were bewitched, if we be not induced to mislike of ourselves, and to be ashamed and utterly at our wits end. For what is man? Let him search thoroughly what is in him, both in body and in soul: and surely we shall find even from the most to the least of us, that there is nothing in us but utter shame and confusion, as I said before. Nevertheless, every of us abuses himself through this folly, so as we bear ourselves on hand that our vices are virtues. And although our life be as lewd as may be, and our sins most outrageous and horrible: Yet to our own seeming there is nothing in us but perfect righteousness and soundness. You see then that men beguile themselves. And therefore it is requisite that we should be held short, and have our faults laid afore us, not only some one or two faults, but also all the faults of our whole life: so as we may know that we have offended our GOD so grievously, that it behoves us to be overwhelmed with shame and reproach: and that if we should go about to lift up our heads, it were meete that we should be thrust back, and that GOD should knock us hard: upon the pates with a cudgel, to show us that our pride is devilish against him. Then let us mark that Moses spake not only to the Jews: but that the same lesson is told unto us at this day: in so much that if we will yield glory unto GOD, we must be bereft of all praise, and not presume any whit at all of our own virtues, but assure ourselves that there is not aught in us but utter vanity.

Furthermore for as much as we come not to such mildness of our one accord: let us have an eye to our sins, and not tarry till God open his books of account as he will do at the day, for then it will be too late for us to yield ourselves. But let us bethink us of our sins now while he summons us by his word, and while he warns us beforehand. Let every of us submit himself as a wretched offender before his Judge, and let us acknowledge ourselves to be justly accused, yea even of infinite faults, before God. And when we have bethought us of one offence, let the same minister occasion to us to bethink us of another. And to be short, let us both generally and particularly practice this lesson of considering what we be, yea even without flattering of ourselves, that all the good which we receive at Gods hand may be fathered upon him, and the honor which he reserves to himself remain whole and unfinished unto him. Let us not covet to enrich ourselves with the things which we have borrowed of him: let us not seek to attire and deck ourselves with his feathers: but let us acknowledge that it is of his own free goodness that he vouchsafes to show himself so liberal, though he be not bound thereto. And for our parts, seeing we cannot bring any desert unto him, but we be guilty in all cases and all respects: he of his inestimable mercy must be fain to bear with us, or else we would be deadly enemies to him still, & he should be driven to thunder down upon us. Thus you see what we have to make generally upon this text.

But now let us come to the stories which Moses touches here. He speaks first of Taberah , which betokens Burning, as I said before. For there the people were chastised with burning, because they murmured at their traveling through the wilderness. O (quote they,) shall we never come to an end? We do but run up and down here, we be fain to remove our tents from place to place, you be driven to carry our stuff upon our shoulders, and why be we not rather in some place of rest, discharged of such travel? But alas, those wretches considered not that GODS displeasure was to be accomplished, according to his oath, which was that none of them should enter into the promised land. They should have thought, Alas, we deserve to be drowned in the bottom of hell, and GOD is contented to send us a temporal correction. Although he be not minded to bring us into his earthly testing place: yet notwithstanding he gives us respect to bethink us of our sins, and to sue to him for pardon. For albeit that he make us to feel some rigor, and it behoves us to bear the marks of his displeasure all our life long by being deprived of the inheritance which he had promised us: yet notwithstanding we ought therewithal to acknowledge his goodness, in that he will not have us to perish everlastingly as we well deserve. But they considered none of all this, neither considered they that they were in as happy plight as they could with. They had the Manna down from heaven, they took no pain to make provision for themselves, they needed no more but to gather it up & to take every man his measure of it, they were all fed, yea and that with a good & savory food. Yet considered they none of all this, but grudged at their overlong journey. And what cause had they so to do? First they were privileged from the curse that was laid upon all mankind. We be set in this world to lead a painful life: & man was ordained to labor even before he had sinned: for it is unkindly that we should be idle & unprofitable. Moreover the travel that God enjoins us now, serves not only to keep us occupied, but also to load us, so as we may be enforced to shrink under our burden, & to groan for our sins sake. Now then this people had good cause to submit themselves quietly, when God led them so through the wilderness. And therefore it is no marvel though fire came from heaven to burn up part of their tents, and though Gods wrath appeared after that fashion to make them abashed. Yet notwithstanding, so little did this amend them, that they fell to murmuring by and by again, because they had none other food but Manna. God had warned the enough that they should no more provoke him, & they should at leastwise have learned it by experience, seeing they felt the blows. But they hardened themselves again against God: and although he had made them to feel his hand so roughly: yet say they, what shall become of us? our soul withers, and we pine away to the death. For here is nothing for us but Manna, we would fain have some flesh meat. Well: They have their desire: but that is to their cost. For while the meat was yet in their mouths, Gods wrath fell upon them, so as they were driven at length to know that they ought to have been contented with so good and happy a state as God had given them. In remembrance whereof the same place was named the Graves of Lust. Also there was another murmuring for water, insomuch that whereas they should have craved water of God, they fell to storming against Moses, & would have stoned him. For these causes it was Gods will that the marks of their disobedience should be printed upon them that they might remember their naughtiness as long as they lived upon the earth, & therefore he named those two places, the one

Massah, and the other Meribah. As if he should say, you have strived with me, and are entered into contention against me, as though yet would bid me battle. You have tempted me because you know not yet my power, which has showed itself so many ways unto you. Thus much concerning the stories which Moses rehearses here. Indeed they deserve to be laid forth more at length. Howbeit forasmuch as we have here but a rehearsal of them as it were at a glance: we must deal so as we may profit by them, and take so much of them as may serve for our instruction.

Now then, seeing that God was so fore grieved with the murmuring of that people; in that they abode not the travel patiently which he had laid upon them: let us note that there will be never the more excuse for us nowadays is we bow not down our shoulders to bear the burden meekly, without striving against God. First there is this earthly wayfaring, whereunto God has made us subject in this world. Although God gave many men rest, so as they never go from home nor (as you would say) out of their nests: yet are we misadvised if we pass not through this world as birds upon a bough, & be not as strangers in it. For else God disclaims us & gives us over. Since it is so: they that settle themselves in this world as though they should never go out of it, do banish themselves from Gods kingdom: and show that the kingdom of heaven belongs not unto them. And let them not beguile themselves by protesting that their intent is not so: for God has vowed it to be so, and the Apostle said expressly, that forasmuch as the fathers were as poor strangers here beneath: therefore did God also vouchsafe to call them his children. Now then as for them that are ashamed to be called strangers in this world: they must go seek their inheritance with the devil: for they have neither part nor portion with God. And now must we apply the things to our benefit which it pleases God to send us. We see what miseries do commonly hem us in, insomuch that even the tenderest sort & such as seem to have the world at will, are most feeble & weak, and are troubled with a number of grieves & vexations. Howbeit let every man look upon himself, and according as God deals with us, so let us patiently receive afflictions that he sends us. If our state be hard and cumbersome, let us not think that if we murmur at it, our murmuring shall vanish away into the air, but that we must come to a reckoning for it before God. For if God send not down fire from heaven after the same manner that he did visibly punish the Jews for their murmuring: it is so much the worse for us. For if he wink at it, & punish us not out of hand: his vengeance must needs be that forer & more terrible. And therefore let us learn to live under obedience to our God. Although we be not handled as we would be in this earthly and frightful life, but are same robe trotting up and down: so as when we would live in rest, God drives us from place to place, and when we would fain be discharged of care then are we most vexed: let us receive all that ever God sends us, and let us make our reckoning to pass through this world, after the same manner that this people were conveyed through the wilderness. And let us learn to practice this saying of our Lord Jesus Christ, that we must bear our cross after him. Like as when a man goes into the country, he takes up his upon his neck, and carries such things with him as he shall have need of: so must we be loden with such sardell as God lists to lay upon us. And let us not look one at another: for God intends not to handle us all alike. Let such as have most vexation of all, understand that God does it not without cause. And let such as have less, thank God for his bearing with their frailty. But yet for all that, howsoever we fare, let us beware that we stand not in contention with God, by grudging that he lets us not alone in such quietness as our flesh would wish and desire: for we wore not what is for our own profit. Mark that for a special point.

But on the contrary part, we see how men are given, not only to their case and commodity: but also to superfluity and wantonness so as it should seem that they will needs be merry & drive away all care whether God will or no. Whereas by the adversities which God sends us, he puts us in mind of our sins, and bores to withdraw us from this world, as though: he spured us forward to make the more hast unto him: we not only cannot abide it, but also seek means to rush forth into all inordinate pleasure, even with open rebellion against him. If God spare us: then are we the more unruly, whereas we should call ourselves home unto goodness, and live in the greater awe. And therefore let us be advised to benefit ourselves by the example that is contained here.

As concerning the Temptation or Strife: let us understand that if necessity pinch us, so as we be driven to any straight and know not where to become: we must resort to our God with all lowliness, beseeching him to provide a remedy for our need: but yet in the meanwhile we must be contented with his good will. If it please him to have us to languish: let us hold down our necks, and let us not have the stiffneckedness which Moses condemned heretofore in the people of old time. Also let us understand that it is Gods own working, when he vouchsafes to uphold us in such sort as we do not utterly quail. For although you do hardly drag our limbs after us, & we seem even to be at the last cast: yet do we still feel some taste of the goodness of our God. Howsoever the world go with us, let us learn that we must not tempt him, that is to say, you must not give ourselves the bridle to ask this or that, but refer ourselves wholly to his good will, and be so governed by him, as we may always yield him his due obedience, and not range after our own lusts like wild beasts, as though we would push at him with our homes, but that if we wish the thing which seems expedient for us, we do it always with this condition that God shall have the mastery of us, and overrule all our passions and desires. If our mind move us to wish or to say, I would fain have this or that: Let us look that God have the overruling of us, and that we submit ourselves so unto him, as all our thoughts affections and likings be framed unto his will, though it seem never so hard unto us. Thus you see what we have to note concerning the temptation that Moses speaks of here, and concerning the strife at such time as the people were in a chase and murmured against GOD.

And let us know moreover that we be no competent judges in own case, least we seek fond excuses as we be wont to do. We will not be acknown that we accuse God, though it be so in deed: We will say we intend not to advance ourselves against him to defy him: but yet is it so indeed. Yea and whereas the people were driven to name the places of Meriba & Masa: they did it not of their own good will, but it was Gods will that those names should remain as presidents of their rebelliousness. Therefore let us learn, that is we be not wholly obedient unto God, so as we do not anything but by his good will and leave: our tempting of him is a provoking of his wrath, as though we made a kind of defiance to him. Afterward followed the offence which the people committed in requiring flesh to eat. They held not themselves contented with Manna, but they would needs have such vittles as they themselves liked and they were not contented simply with flesh neither, but they would needs have sauce, yea and dainty save to it. For they longed for the Garlic and Onions and other like things which they had had in Egypt, and they would needs have GOD to feed them with the same geere in the wilderness. But it was a devilish longing, which made them to refuse the sustenance that God had given them. Besides, what more? They had Manna daily from heaven, to feed upon as much as they would: so as they might well perceive that God maintained them by his power, but that seemed unsavory to them. And why? Because it came of God. They would needs have whatsoever they themselves liked, as it were in spite of him: insomuch that they fretted and chafed at his bringing of them out of Egypt, as who should say they held scorn of the deliverance which he had wrought for them. Since we see this, let us look to ourselves, and let us know that this fault is set forth unto us, to make us beware that we be not guilty of the like.

For we must understand that GOD makes us Judges of the people of old time, to the end that every of us should condemn ourselves in our own cases. For why? If we be Judges of such as have done amiss: think we that GOD sees not much clearly than we? Now he is so gracious as to put over his office unto us, to the end that every of us should have an eye to himself, and having pleaded guilty, be cast down and humbled before him. Therefore let us mark that the rehearsal of this story, ought to lead us to the condemning of our own wicked affections, and make us to consider what our lusts are, where through we cease not to provoke the wrath of our God. And let us mark first of all, that look how many lusts are in our flesh: so many armed folks have we, which advance themselves against God. And for the same cause does Saint Paul say, that all the imaginations, conceits, and affections of our nature, serve to provoke us to fight against the righteousness of our God. And therefore when so ever we chance to lust after anything let not our flesh over master us. And why? So all our senses are so corrupted: that although (to our seeming) the end of our wishes be good yet notwithstanding, some excess will ever be mingled with them, and God shall have some what in them wherewith to find fault. And how fair and beautiful so ever our desires are to the outward show, there is always some vice in them: and what shall we then say of the sinful lusts, which we be driven to condemn ever by our own natural judgment? When a man desires to have wherewith to find his household and travels to get it: truly that desire is good of itself. But yet the same is matched with impatience or with unsteadiness, or with over great care, or with unbelief: and to be short God shall always find somewhat amiss in our desires, which of their own nature are not evil. Howbeit, if a man rush out into pilling, and polling, and scratching, to beguile and deceive neighbor: is it not much worse than to have a desire that might seem good of itself? Though a man purpose to live never so quietly with his wife, yet shall it always be mingled with some worldly affections, so as our corruption will needs bewray itself still, even in the best things: and what will become of us then, if we give ourselves the bridle to whoredom? As much is to be said of all other things. And therefore let us bear in mind, that although our desires appear not to be evil: yet are they ever matched with some vice & unrighteousness before God. But [besides this] we have also our fleshly lusts which make us to shake off Gods yoke, so as we eat ourselves at all adventure, some into blasphemy into gluttony, some into unruliness, some into wantonness, some into lechery, some into extortion, some into cruelty, some into robbery, and other some into all manner of wickedness. Now then, deserve not our lusts that God should rise up to destroy us for them, when we become to that point? Yes: for is the people of Israel had graves of lust: what shall become of us? And therefore let us learn that when we read there stories, God gives us warning to enter into the examination of our faults, that upon the knowing of them, we should crave forgiveness of them, and fall to such repentance, as may wholly tame us and make us flee unto him, and not be given any more to our vices. But that is impossible for us to do, until you have so overmastered ourselves, as to mislike our own affections with full purpose to renounce them. Until a man be subdued after that fashion, it is impossible for him to yield obedience unto God, how fair appearance of virtue so ever he have. But what? So far off are we from minding there things, that by all likelihood we do nothing else but blindfold our eyes; that we might not see our sins to seek convenience remedy for them. See here how the Jews were condemned for requiring of water, and yet were they ready to die for thirst: Yea, but the cause why they were not to be excused, was for that they required it with murmuring. Whereas they should have said, Lord you knows what is expedient for us better than we ourselves does and therefore we refer to ourselves to you provide you for us: instead of using such humility, they fall to repining and storming. Now we must not do so: but we must patiently tarry Gods leisure, when he gives us not things so soon as we asks them: for he can well skill to provide for all our needs. Indeed if it pleased him, he could well content us and give us all our wishes: but his will is not to maintain us here in such abundance, as we might take occasion to hold scorn of the good that he does us, and to despise it by treading it under our feet. He will have us to be meek and lowly, that we may learn to resort unto him. When a man is in poor estate, he bears himself on hand that if God would give him wherewith to maintain himself plenteously, he would be wholly given to be thankful towards him for his pitying of him. But let him once come to wealth, and let God deal bountifully with him: and what will he do? He will list up himself against God, and forget him in such sort, as if he were not the same man that he was before. And this vice is too too common: insomuch that the more our Lord increases his benefits towards us, the more do we seem willful in despising him, and his so doing sharpens our unthankfulness and malice. And therefore let us consider, that the things which are told us concerning the Jews belong unto us, forasmuch as we have the like or greater vices in us, than were in them: & we must understand that Gods intent is to teach us by them.

And specially whereas mention is made of their willful stubbornness at Cades Barn, where they refused to go forward to enter into the inheritance that was promised them: let us understand that we be no less worthy of blame at this day before God, for that he cannot hold us in, to make us go through with our course. To what purpose has GOD called us into his Church? It is (as I said before) to the end that in passing through this world, we should not be wedded to it, but use it altogether as a way faring, and as a strange country, traveling still through it towards heaven. For behold, our Lord cries to us both early and late, that we should go on still to come unto him. But we on the contrary part, vouchsafe not to remove one foot to go to him: but instead of setting forward we retire back, or else sit snogging still in our own slothfulness. We see it is so. Now then, forasmuch as our Lord finds us so lazy and stubborn, that instead of plucking up a cheerful courage to go forward, and to hold on our course until we become to the end of it, we resist him and are loth to pass any further Let us understand that this story is told us, to call us utterly down in ourselves, so as we should not seek any worthiness in our own persons (as indeed there is none in us:) But yield God the whole praise of his benefits, knowing that he is not bound at all on his side, but that he does all things of his own mere free goodness and infinite mercy: and therefore that we on our side ought to sigh, beseeching him to correct us and reform us according to his will. And for the better perceiving hereof, I pray you after what sort go we forward when God calls us? We partly limp, and purely make many a false step. Let every man examine himself, and see how forward he has been since the time that God has reached him his hand. True it is that even before we knew the Gospel we were already without excuse of our rebelling against our God: but now seeing he has enlightened us by his word, and showed us the way of salvation, and sets his will before us, saying, come, and reaches us his hand to guide us: if of all this while we have not vouchsafed to come unto him, how shall we excuse ourselves? Let every of us consider how he discharges himself: and afterward let us have an eye to the common state. We can well speak of Gospel like reformation, and it is a marvel to hear how we will talk: but yet for all that, our filthiness is so stinking, as is loathsome to behold: and GOD needs not to go up into his judgment seat to give sentence of it, for the very infidels and ignorant sort can be our judges. And of a truth they may be a great alarm to us, seeing our life is so lewd and wicked, that even the silly blind sort of Papists may laugh us to scorn. And surely if utter confusion should fall upon our heads: we have well deserved it. For by our means Gods name is blasphemed: and yet, notwithstanding we regards it not. Howbeit, the more that we besot ourselves after that fashion in our vane self flattery: the more will GOD make us feel in the end, that he will not suffer his chastisements to be lost.

To be short, let us remember how Moses said here, Ever since the time that I have known you, you have always been rebellious against God. And this Rebelliousness whereof he speaks is expressed likewise in this saying that they resisted the mouth of God, distrusting him and in counting his will. Now then, if we will know what it is to be rebellious: let us first of all look what God has spoken. For the thing wherein he intends to try us, is whether we be willing to submit ourselves simply in all respects to his word, after he has been so gracious unto us as to teach us. What else is the holy scripture, but an uttering or declaring of Gods will? And therefore all that ever is contained there, is as though GOD opened his holy mouth, to tell us what he requires at our hand. Then if our life be not fully correspondent to Gods word, whereof we make profession: behold, God complains of us, and accuses us of rebelling against his mouth. And there are two parts of this rebelliousness. The one is when we distrust Gods promises, and the other is when we disobey his commandment: & those two be the sum of all that is to be learned in Gods word. When we have tossed and turned over the leaves of all the holy scripture never so much, there are but these two points contained in it: that is to wit, that for as much as God bring desirous to be our father and Savior, opens us the infinite treasures of his mercy calling us to him, and setting his free goodness and free love before us: we should believe his promises and rest wholly upon them, saying, Lord seeing you are so freehearted as to offer yourself thus unto us: behold, we call all our care upon you, and hope for all welfare through your bountifulness. The first thing then which we have to do, is to settle ourselves upon Gods promises, when he offers them unto us. Secondly there is the obedience which God requires, as if he should say unto us: Go to, I will have you to live in such wise, as you obey me and yield me such service, as your coming to me be of your own accord. And here Moses said that the people were always rebellious against Gods mouth, forasmuch as they obeyed not his commandments, nor trusted to his promises. Now let us look into ourselves: where is the faith that we boast of? Indeed we can well enough say that we believe the Gospel, but if gods promises touched us effectually, there would be another manner of steadfastness in us, and we would not bow with every wind like wavering reeds, as we do. Our unbelief bewrays itself & we be too much convicted of it: insomuch that we cannot trust God even in worldly things. And if we cannot trust to him for small things, how is it possible that we should trust to him, for the everlasting life? We have daily experience of his succor and help: & yet do we doubt thereof still. And how shall we then trust in him who the case concerns invisible things, as the life which is hidden from us till God discover it unto us? Again, does not this rebelliousness of ours in resisting him, show itself in all our whole life? Indeed we will make signs of willingness to serve God: but yet is all but counterfeiting. For let us see if any of us do live so faithfully and uprightly as we ought to do? Where is the loving kindness and charity that ought to be among the faithful, and among Gods children? Nay, we be rather like Cats and dogs. And when the case requires that we should agree together in well doing, the world sees how we go to work. It may seem that we have conspired to go the clean contrary way to that which

God wills and ordains. And this is not to be greatly wondered at. For if in things that are small and light, we show ourselves to have no great Christianity in us we will show no less lewdness, when we come to the things that are greater and more excellent. I call them small things in comparison of the fear of God and the love of his word which men may say they see not in us. For as concerning those small things, if we intend to make any countenance of devotion to God ward: we can well abide that men should condemn both extortion, deceit, cruelty, perjury, and such other vices. When we come to Sermons, we can well enough pretend that there is some agreement among us, and specially when we receive the Lords supper: & yet notwithstanding even in that behalf there appears such contempt of God, as we ought to be ashamed of it. For I know that upon the last Lords day while we were ministering of the communion and while we should have assembled altogether, to make a general protestation of our faith, and to offer up our prayers unto God: about two hundred people were occupied in gaming. In their going by before the Sermon began, a man would have thought they had been prepared to the Communion: but their minds are so upon their playing, that they spend every Sabbath day in such unthriftiness. And it is meete that this should be told them openly, seeing it is apparent, & that even little children perceive the shamefulnes of it. Now then, let us mark in few words, that Moses spake not for his owne time only, but for us also in these days, who be warned in the person of the Jews to be ashamed of ourselves, and therewithal to seek the means that our God may receive us to pity and mercy; which is, that after we have acknowledged how guilty we be before God: every of us may learn, not only to condemn ourselves, but also to bow down our necks to crave forgiveness of our former faults at Gods hand, to the end that being acquit by him, we may also be guided and governed by his holy spirit: & that whereas we have been stubborn against him heretofore; so as he could by no means yield us, wee may learn to yield ourselves so obediently to him, that instead of being as wild beasts, we may become meek and mild unto him as sheep and lambs; and give ear unto his voice, giving it such superiority over us, as we may utterly forsake all things that may hinder our honoring and serving of him.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, so as we may yield ourselves to him with true repentance, & continue therein not for one day only, but all our life long: and that therewithal it may please him to bear with us in all our infirmities, even until he have rid us quite and clean of them. And so let us all say, Almighty GOD heavenly Father, &c.

The 68th Sermon which is the seventh upon the ninth Chapter

25 Then humbled I myself before the Lord forty days and forty nights, for I humbled myself because the Lord had said that he would destroy you.

26 And I prayed to the Lord & said: Lord God, destroy not you people and you heritage, which you has gotten by your mighty power, and whom you has brought out of Egypt by strong hand.

27 Bethink you of you servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Have not an eye to the stubbornness of this people, nor to their misbelieve, nor to their sin:

28 Least the inhibitors of the land from whence you has brought us, do say: because the Lord could not bring them into the land whereof he had spoken to them, or because he hated them: therefore has he brought them forth to kill them in the wilderness.

29 Moreover, they be your people, and your heritage, whom you has brought out with your great power, and with your arm stretched out.

Moses goes forward here with the matter that he had begun before: which was, to make the people understand how great the fault was which they had committed. For whereas he boasts of God hearing of him, he does not to the intent the people should think themselves so much the more beholden to him therefore: that is not the thing which he looks at: but that the people should thenceforth live in awe and humility, and bear in mind the fault that they had committed, and consider how they had well deserved to have been utterly rooted out if God had not showed them mercy. And he said that after he had lain upon the ground forty days and forty nights, he was heard: and this is to the end that by such circumstance, the people may the better learn, that if GOD had not hearkened to that vehement and earnest prayer of his they had been utterly undone. It is an extraordinary thing, that a man should continue sighing and weeping before God, forty days and forty nights together: and no doubt but this power was given to Moses by miracle, like as was his falling of forty days and forty nights before. And to what purpose? To the end that the Law might be the better authorized thereby. For it might well seem that the covenant which God had made with the people, was quite broken and utterly disannulled: and therefore it was expedient that Moses should once again be separated from the company of men forty days and forty nights, that by that means, new authority might be purchased. But yet for all that, we must mark well, that whereas Moses forbear meat and drink forty days and forty nights together, it was not done by human power, neither was it (to speak properly) a fast of sobriety: (for he was exempted from hunger and thirst:) but it was done to the end that the Law should be received with the greater reverence, forasmuch as it came not of men, but Moses came down from the mountain as if an Angel had come down from heaven. And his praying was for the sins of the people, that God would not look upon the idolatry that had been committed, but hold on hill in his own purpose. For although Moses had broken the tables, and that he had done it through the impulsion of Gods spirit: yet notwithstanding, (as has been said already,) he ceased not to have compassion upon the people which was worthy to have been rooted out. That is the effect of the matter which we must look unto here.

And thereby we be put in mind, that if God forgive us any fall or offence, we must not so forget it, but we must bethink ourselves to live in the greater awe, and consider all our life long how greatly we be bound unto God for uttering so great goodness unto us. There are a number to be seen, which do but wring their mouths when they would have their faults forgiven them, and they never pass to think anymore upon them, to yield God his deserved praise. Contrariwise it is showed us here by the example of the Jews, that although God be merciful to us, and list not to call our faults to account: yet must not we therefore thrust them under foot, but rather call them to mind every day, that it may first of all provoke us to repentance, during ourselves that we may fall soon, if God preserve us not: and secondly [make us to consider] that we stand not but through his free mercy: and finally encourage us to magnify his name for drawing us out of the dungeon wherein: we were fallen. Seeing then that we be so much bound unto him, let us be the willinger to serve and honor him. Thus you see in effect what we have to remember upon this place.

Besides this, let us mark well by the example of Moses, that it is not enough to pray unto God in two or three words and as it were in post: but that we must continue in praying without being weary. And that is a point right necessary to be marked. For whereas there are many faults in us, this is one of the greatest, that we cannot settle ourselves unto prayer, but we be fleeting, so as our mouths are no sooner opened, but our wits are by and by wandering elsewhere. And besides that, if we have prayed unto God once, we think it enough and too much.

Contrariwise we see that Moses was forty days together, in continual mourning for the offence of the people . Therefore in our praying unto God, let us learn to have the perseverance whereunto our Lord Jesus exhorts us, saying that we must be importunate, and that it is not enough for us to have uttered our grief unto GOD lightly and once for all: but that we must resort to him still, until he have heard our requests. Now then, here is a second lesson which we have to gather upon this place: which is, that in praying unto God, we must have a settledness of holding out to the end.

Also this praying of Moseses, shows us what their duty is, which have the charge of other folk: namely, to pray to God to pity such as shall have offended. For it is not enough for such as have public charge to discharge their duty to the worldward: but they must also turn unto God. We see how the Apostles say that they must not only preach the Gospel, but also give themselves to prayer and supplication. Now, this belongs to all the faithful. For to pray unto God is the chief duty of our faith. And forasmuch as the Apostles had the chief charge of the Church: it behoved this calling upon God, to belong chiefly unto them. And that is the cause why Saint Paul said, that he humbles himself for the Corinthians: as who should say he ought to bear the chastisement of their sins in own person. For inasmuch as God had set him over that Church, it behooved him to bear the chief burden upon his shoulders. Therefore such as have the charge of preaching Gods word and of teaching in the Church, must not only employ themselves that way, but also to prayer. And chiefly when they see things go amiss, and disorders among the people: then ought they most specially to resort unto GOD, that he may provide a remedy for it. This is the thing that is showed us by the example of Moses, in that it is said that he tarried not till the people resorted to God for mercy, but showed them the way, as he whom God had appointed to bear the burden of the people; and to procure their welfare.

Now let us come to the form of the prayer that Moses makes Lord God (said he) destroy not the people of your heritage who you has re deemed by your mighty power & strong hand, out of the land of Egypt. Bethink yourself of your servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: and have not an eye to she stubbornness of this people, nor to their wickedness, nor to their offence. Here we see what it is that Moses alleges unto God: namely, his gracious favor where through he had chosen the offspring of Abraham. And so we see here a good rule for us to keep in praying unto God: which is, that if we intend to obtain our requests at his hand, we must not presume upon anything that is in ourselves, but rather allege his own goodness which he has made us to feel. As if we should say, Lord, go forward with your work; you has begun to call us to you, we be as much beholden to your goodness as is possible: therefore hold you on still, finish the thing that you has begun, and let not your work slay unperfected, as it is said in the hundred and eight and thirtieth Psalm. And it is such a doctrine as we may gather, upon all the prayers that are contained in the holy scripture.

Now whereas Moses said your people, and your inheritance: he means not that the people had purchased that dignity themselves. It was a great honor that any one people of all mankind should be called Gods inheritance. Deserved they to be in that estimation? Moses adds immediately, that there was nothing but stubbornness, wickedness, and sin in them. It follows then that all is to be referred to the free adoption, where through God had chosen that people, as if he should say, I will have the house of Abraham to reign over it, there will I dwell, that shall be my Church, there will I rest. God so saying, had not respect whether the people were worthy of it or no: and it appeared by the effect, that they were a spiteful people: but whatsoever they were, God had made the said promise, which was not grounded upon any deserts of man. The thing then that Moses sets us down here, is this: Lord have mercy upon your people, and upon your heritage. And so, when we resort to God to crave forgiveness of our sins, let us learn to make none other entrance to find favor and to be heard; than by alleging the benefits that we have erst received at his hand: That (say I) is the gate that we must enter at in praying unto God. Albeit we have offended him and be never so wretched sinners: yet notwithstanding inasmuch as he has chosen us for his flock, and vouchsafed to utter himself to us, and to give us assurance that he is our father and savior: we may press familiarly unto him, having so sure a pledge of his goodness. But yet let us beware of presumption, that we seek not any thing in ourselves wherewith to bind God unto us, for we be utterly voids of any such thing: but let us be contented to offer unto him the things which we hold of him: and in doing him homage for his benefits, let us take courage to call upon him, assuring ourselves that he will continue them still, & that as he has showed himself liberal towards us heretofore, so he will give us assurance that he will not fail us hereafter. This in effect is the thing which we have to remember in this saying of Moses, where he calls the Jews Gods people and heritage.

Now he adds, that God had brought them out of the land of Egypt by his mighty power and with a strong hand, even to make it known that they were his inheritance, by a visible token, and by the apparent effect of it. True it is that the people should have grounded themselves upon the promise: and Moses has followed the same order here. For he said not first, Lord you has brought us out of Egypt, and afterward upheld us by your power when you made us to pass through the wilderness: but he said expressly, we by your people and your inheritance. And whereupon rested he? Upon the promise, because God had spoken the word, saying, I will be the Savior of your lineage. But yet therewithal he lets not to allege the said deliverance also, to prove that God counted that people for his heritage. For to when God delivered the Jews out of Egypt, & reached them his hand to bring them out: where of came it? It was as a sealing of the covenant that had been made by word of mouth; God (say (say I) did show as then that the former promising unto Abraham, that he would be the God of his lineage, was not in vain. And for the same cause does Moses let down both twain of them here. He begins with the promise and afterward adds what ensued thereof: that is to wit the deliverance, which was a sure warrant that he meant not to beguile his servant Abraham, when he told him as I have told you before. Wherefore let us briefly bear in mind that if we intend to have access unto god to rest upon his goodness, we must begin at his word: and afterward we must also acknowledge the benefits that we have felt at his hand. And if we have found that he has not beguiled us by his promises, it is as a former warrant whereby he intends to confirm and assure us the better. Look here a goodly matching, namely that we yield such honor unto Gods word, as to trust assuredly thereunto: and therewithal, that we be not thankless for the goodness which he has showed us indeed, but make the same to settle us at a president to ratify faith, to the end that his words have the greater show and power in us, and we be the more provoked to call upon him, not doubting at all but that we shall find him the same that he has showed himself to be, even to the end. Thus you see how it behoves us to put the order in ure which Moses keeps here, first in setting down Gods promise he had adopted the people of Israel, & afterward in adding that he had delivered them out of the land of Egypt, thereby ratifying the thing that he had spoken to his servant Abraham.

Now he adds that God should not have an eye to the peoples stubbornness, wickedness, or offence. This is not added without cause. For when we come to pray God to perform his promise, and to bring the grace of his adoption to his end: in the meanwhile our own consciences upbraid us, so as we see well that we be guilty before him: it is enough to foreclose the way to our prayers. For when we offend God, we break his covenant as much as in us lies, and we stop him from performing of his promise. To be short, we deserve to be given over of the Lord; when we keep not faith and troth towards him. For this cause does Moses say here, Lord have not an eye to the stubbornness of this people. So then, it is not enough for us to pray God to go through with the thing that he shall have begun in us, and to bring his grace to perfection: but we must expressly pray him, that although he find faults and offences in us, (as indeed the number of them is infinite): yet that he forbear not to take us still for his people: and that although we deserve to be forsaken of him for our sins inasmuch as we have broken his covenant, yet notwithstanding he cease not to keep promise with us still, and to make us feel fruit thereof, and to forgive our sins in such wise, as we may never cease to continue in his adoption: & that although our straying away was enough to bereave us of the inheriting of our salvation, yet notwithstanding he cease not to take us for his children still. To be short, when so ever we resort unto God, we must acknowledge our sins with all humility . For it will be to no purpose for us to say, Lord you has promised us, you has told us that you of your goodness will be merciful to us, you has declared that you will be our father, we have your promise: it will not boot us to say all these things: for all shall be overthrown with one word, because we have done amiss, and have not kept the course whereunto God called us, but have drawn clean back. Therefore we be warned, that when so ever we pray unto God, we must acknowledge our faults, and confess them freely, that God may not cease to have pines upon us, specially when we shall have committed any gross fault, as this people had done in committing abominable idolatry. The greater then that our sins be, the more let us cast down and humble ourselves, to crave pardon of our God by confessing wherein we have offended him. After that manner must we deal. And it is certain, that if every of us consider well his own life without flattery, he shall find himself exceedingly endangered unto God, and we shall always have good cause to be ashamed of ourselves. And therefore when we pray, let us bear these two things in remembrance: namely, that although we be never so wretched, yet notwithstanding forasmuch as God has chosen us for his people, we must come to him familiarly and without doubting, for he guides us thither and opens us the gate by his promise, & that must be our ground to stand upon, Again, we must bethink us of our sins, so as we may feel them & be deadly wounded by them, to the end we may be sorry for them before God, & beseech him (notwithstanding our unworthiness) to apply his promises to our salvation, when it shall have pleased him to bury our sins & to receive us to mercy. Yea & let us mark well the words that are set down here, the stubbornness of the people, their wickedness, and their sin. For Moses here makes not a ceremonious confession as you shameless fort does: that is to say, in manner the greater part, when they have done amiss, do bear themselves in hand, that it is enough to have said in one word, I grant it is a fault: but you must consider I am a man, I am not as a timber log. It is enough for them (say I) that they excuse not themselves altogether. But we must come after another fashion, as we see by example here.

For first of all Moses sets down Stubbornness; showing thereby that there was a horrible rebelliousness in that people. Next he adds wickedness: when he betokens that the people were stark naught: for that word that he uses, imports such a lewdness, that they which are so termed are disordered in their whole life: And lastly he adds Sin, that is to say that particular fault which they had committed, namely their offence in making themselves an idol. And so we see that he acknowledges the peoples offences in good earnest, to condemn them.

Now like as Moses speaks here of the people: so do we see that Daniel speaks of himself, for in his report how he confessed his own sins and the sins of the people, he said, Lord we have sinned, we have offended you, we have done wickedly, we be transgressors, our sins are outrageous, and our iniquities are exceeding great. Daniel goes not to work by halves, in confessing that himself and the rest of the people had done amiss and deserved to be chastised at Gods hand: but he said flatly, we be wicked and we have behaved ourselves lewdly, we have been disobedient and untrue to our God, we have provoked his wrath too much, and we be curled and damned, unless God power out the infinite treasures of his mercy upon us. You see then how the true confession which God requires at our hands, is not to come to him and to say in one word, I have done amiss: but to be so abashed as to acknowledge ourselves blameworthy in all respects, and to be dismayed at the remembrance of our offences, like wretched offender not looking to have our indictments read unto us, not to have articles alleged against us, but accusing ourselves beforehand in such sort, as God may accept our submission when we shall have examined our faults throughly, not only in general but also in particular. And in very deed, after that Moses had spoken of Stubbornness and wickedness: he adds the Offence that people had committed. Whereby he means that it is not enough to say, we were conceived its sin, it is horrible to see how all things are out of order in our whole life: but when we have offended God any manner of way, we must utter it, as we see how David confesses generally that there was nothing in him but utter corruption, and that he brought nothing with him from his mothers womb but the inheriting of death, & therewithal fails not to confess the sin particularly which he had committed, not wrapping it up among the other to make as though he wist not of it: but setting down both twain of them, as we see that Moses do in this text. Wherefore when we shall have committed any offence, let us learn to feel it, & to confess it freely before God. And let the same lead us yet further that is to wit, to have an eye to the offences of our whole life, and to acknowledge ourselves altogether endangered unto God, except he receive us to mercy. And above all things, let us acknowledge the hardness of our hearts, in that we cannot submit ourselves to God because we be stubborn against him, and all the affections of our flesh are at enmity with him. After that manner (say I) must we confess our faults, if we mind to obtain forgiveness of them. For as for them that come to God ceremoniously, confessing themselves to have done amiss, and not being touched to the quick with their lewdness, nor minding to acknowledge it in their hearts: they do but play mock holy day, and they shall feel with whom they have to do, and that God is not an earthly judge that can be deceived when men crave pardon saintly. And therefore when we pray unto God, let every of us quicken up himself in acknowledging our faults better than we have been want to do: & let the same so pull us down, as we may not wote what to say, but thus, Alas Lord what should become of us if it were not for your inestimable mercy? For behold, we be even as it were utterly overwhelmed: and though we knew but the hundredth part of the offences that we have committed, surely it were enough to sink us down to the bottomless pit, unless you remedy it. And as for you that judges after a far other fashion: how should we be able to amid in your pretence, if you would use your rigor towards us? Look here the right lowliness which God commands: which is, that when we be so ashamed of our sins as we wote not what to say, we flee for refuge to Gods mercy hoping that howsoever the case stand, he of his great goodness will not refuse to take us to mercy.

Now to the end that Moses may obtain his request, he beseeches God expressly to be mindful of his servant Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: and that was by reason of the covenant that he had made with them, for in the same covenant there was this article, I will be your God and the God of your seed after you. You see here how God took the children of Abraham before they were born, adopting them to be his Church, and to be inheritors not only of the Land of Chanaan, but also of the kingdom of heaven. But how do the children of Abraham behave themselves? Lewdly. They falsify their faith unto God and become backsliders, so as they deserve to be cut off from his house. Lord (said Moses) have not an eye to their faults and offences, but be mindful of your covenant which you made with your servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Now we see to what purpose Moses alleges here the holy Patriarchs. It is not to make them Advocates and Patrons before God as the Papists do, who allege these texts to prove their own forgeries of having the saints to see their intercessors. What, say they? Is it not written that God should be mindful of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and yet they were dead long before? Seeing that the fathers used such speech, why should not the saints already deceased be made patrons and advocates, to make intercession for them that are alive? Surely this comes of too gross beastliness. For they consider not in what manner Moses alleges these persons. I have told you it before for God had promised them that he would be the savior of their lineage, and had given them his promise as a pledge, not only on their own behalf, but also for all their successors. And that is the cause why Jacob at his death or a little before, said, let my name be called upon over Ephraim and Manassas, for his meaning was to make two tribes of them, not withstanding that they had both but one head, that is to wit Joseph first of all, & he intended that he should have a double portion. Why so? Jacob was in Egypt, not only as a poor stranger like to have starved for hunger if he had not come there: but also as a man shaken off in scorn & disdain. It is manifest that the Egyptians shunned the Jews, and accounted them as unclean people. Nevertheless although Jacob had not any house of his own, but was there as a slave & banished there as into an odd nook of the realm: yet notwithstanding he assigns a double portion to Ephraim and Manassas. But [in so doing] he had an eye to the promise that God had made to him. That is the cause why he said, Let my name be called upon over them, and let them be taken and esteemed as two of mine own children. According hereunto it is said, that God should remember Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as we see in Exodus, where God intending to acquaint himself with his people, alleges the same for a preface: as if he should say, I have bound myself in the hand of Abraham. And thereby he sends them back to the promise as it was made and set down in Genesis, where God said, that in the end of four hundred years, after they had been oppressed with grievous tyranny, he would deliver them. Now then, it is not to be doubted, but that Moseses alleging of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is to the end that God should perform his covenant indeed, and not cease to be constant in his purpose and in discharging of his promise, notwithstanding the wickedness of me. And so we see how the Papists have falsely abused the holy scripture, yea & showed themselves so shameless and fond, that even little children may perceive their beastliness. Wherefore we ought so little to be moved with these texts: that they do rather make wholly against them. And so you see why Moses alleges Abraham, Isaac, & Jacob. He grounds himself upon Gods word.

Likewise when we pray, before we open our mouth we must be taught of God, he must direct us by his word, for we cannot call upon him rightly, except he have first prevented us and called us to him, so as we be sure that he will hear us. For as for the man that doubts and floats like the waves of the sea (said Saint James), let him not look to obtain anything. So then our prayers boot us not at all, without certainty of faith. Now let us see whence we may get such certainty of faith. Surely even by Gods word, and that is it that Moses had followed. He knew the promise that had proceeded out of Gods mouth, whereupon he rests, &

thereupon makes mention of Abraham Isaac & Jacob. And why? For it was they that had received the promise, as well in their own behalf, as in the behalf of their successors. But now do we see that we have a Mediator to ratify the new covenant that God had made with us. Before Jesus Christ came into the world, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were as mediators after a sort, because they received the promise in the name of the whole Church. But now God sends us back to his only son, in whose person it is his will to ratify all that ever he had promised. How then shall we have any certainty, except we repair to our Lord Jesus Christ, and pray to God his father to remember him, & not to look at us, as in very deed the ancient fathers have showed us the good way already in the time of the shadows, although they had not the truth so fully as we have it in the Gospel? For since the time that the kingdom was settled in the house of David, and this promise made, He shall be my son: we see that that fathers prayed after this manner: Lord look upon the countenance of yours Christ or thine anointed. But they spoke of David's successors. It is true: Howbeit forasmuch as that temporal kingdom was a figure of the kingdom that is prepared for us in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ: the ancient fathers looked thereat as it were to behold Jesus Christ in a glass. Now then seeing that the son of God is come, & had told us that it is he to whom we must repair: what excuse will there be for us, if we rove here and there, and seek other mediators to resort unto? Is it not a bereaving of Gods son of his office? Yes: for he is not as was Abraham, or as was David and all his lineage: but he is the true high priest which had appeased Gods wrath towards us. And he had not only received the covenant, so as he may say that God had told him that he will accept all such as submit themselves unto him: but he had also ratified the same covenant with his own blood: that is the seal which he had set unto it. Then if men will not be contented with such confirmation of Gods promises as is made in the person of his son: is it not a treading of his blood underfoot to the uttermost of their power, and a striving to make it of none effect? Yes: and so we see that this text is so little able to arm the Papists, that it does rather condemn them of unthankful ness before God, in that they have (to the uttermost of their power) disabled the grace that was brought them by the son of God, and not considered that Gods adopting of us was in his hand and by his means, who had accomplished Gods promises in such wise by his blood as we may assure ourselves of them without any doubting. Therefore let us mark well that when so ever we seek any patrons and advocates, it is an abolishing of the death & passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, and therewithal an utter disannulling of all Gods promises, which ought to be sprinkled with his blood, according as we see how it was commanded in the Law, that the book should be besprinkled with the blood of the solemn sacrifice that was to be offered. When a sacrifice was to be offered, the blood of it was to be reserved, & sprinkled upon the tabernacle, upon the altar, and upon the book of the Law: to do us to wit, that there is none other mean to assure us of Gods promises, than by the besprinkling of them with the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. For as for such as run gadding after their own imaginations, saying we must have such a patron and such an advocate: they(as much as in them lies) so drain and dry up the blood of Gods son, as it may give no more force to the promises to assure us of our salvation.

Furthermore let us mark that the Papists have in all respects defaced the office of our Lord Jesus Christ. For by their making of the saints to be their patrons & advocates, they have also made them as good as mediators, so as we should obtain favour at Gods hand by their means. They say not only Lord hear the prayer of such a one or such a one: but also, for his prayers sake or for his deserts sake. But both these things belong peculiarly to our Lord Jesus Christ. For to seek to the merits or deserts of men, is to stay upon a cracked or broken reed, and that is the next way to make us tumble down, yea and it is as the slivers of a reed that will also wound us besides our falling . Wherefore let us understand, that in so doing we forsake the son of God and bereave him of his office.

Again, as touching prayer and supplication, it is true that we ought to pray one for another as long as we live upon the earth: and we have seen the example thereof in Moses: yea and we have seen it in such wise, as suffices to show us that our prayers are not vain nor unprofitable, but that God makes them available and hears them, when we pray one for another: Howbeit, that is but while we be alive. Moreover, if we fall to seeking of patrons and advocates upon our own heads, without any warrant of holy scripture: it is too great a despising of God. For we follow not the manner of praying which God had ordained, and therefore it is a devilish malapert ness for men to presume to enter into the kingdom of heaven, there to appoint officers, as though God had made them Lord great masters there. Now then let us learn that we must let our Lord Jesus Christ alone with the office of advocate, that he may be our spokesman for us, & give us access & means to be accepted at Gods hand. Moreover, we must not imagine any meriting or deserving in any mortal creature, no not even in the Angels of heaven, but we receive the meriting of Jesus Christ, which thing was not in that holy Patriarchs, nor in David, nor in any of his successors, for God adopted them freely. But it was his will that in Jesus Christ our sins should be wiped out, and our debts discharged, and that by his obedience righteousness should be purchased unto us. That there fore is the thing that we must resort unto.

Wherefore let us learn, that if the fathers of old time, when they minded to obtain favour at Gods hand, alleged Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and consequently David in his order, because he was ordained to be a figure of our Lord Jesus Christ: if this were used in the time that things were yet dark: we ought to take good heed that we swerve not to the right hand nor to the left, now that God had revealed himself fully unto us: but that we direct our faith to Jesus Christ, assuring ourselves that for his sake God his father had adopted us, and likes well of us by his means, and grants us our requests. Besides this, forasmuch as the scripture said that he is given us to be our advocate, that he makes intercession for us, and that for his sake we may rest upon Gods mercy: Let us not doubt but he will show himself favourable unto us, Seeing that the scripture fathers these things upon Jesus Christ, let us beware that we rob him not of them, and that we play not the Papists, who by their praying to their He-saints & She-saints, do well show that Jesus Christ suffices them not, and that because they pretend the name of God, they provoke his vengeance more and more against them. We see also how God had blinded them & given them up to a hellish rage, so as they think it not enough to say, these are our patrons and advocates: but also they make no difference between God, and a saint that they have forged of their own brain. For they say, our father which art in heaven, as well kneeling before a puppet, as if they spoke to GOD himself. But yet how make they their prayers? I shall not need to speak here, neither of the Apostles nor of the Prophets: for they have saints which never were in the world. And although they take the prophets and Apostles, yet they pray to them as to God, and with the same speech and stile. We see then that they are utterly brutish, and that God had given them up to a reprobate sense. And it is good reason, because they have robbed Christ of his dignity wherein God his father had set him, and are not contented with him as with their only advocate and intercessor, but are run astray here & there. Therefore it is meant that God should withdraw himself from them and forsake them, that they might fall into such extremity as we see they be fallen into. Wherefore let us for our part beware that we hold fast the simplicity which the scripture shows us: that is to wit, that in calling upon God, we have our eye upon our Lord Jesus Christ: and again that in as much as God had established his covenant for ever in his name, we doubt not but that we be heard as of as we come unto God by him, and that he is merciful unto us.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make us feel them the better, that we may acknowledge them rightly both with heart & mouth, and be brought to true amendment, & be so humbled, that by glorifying him as he is worthy, and by acknowledging what goodness he used towards us, we may be provoked to serve him with the better courage: and he bear with us in our infirmities as long as we be in this world, until we be come to him into his heavenly kingdom, & he have made us partakers of his endless glory. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, & c.

On Tuesday the 10th of September I 555

The 69th Sermon, which is the first upon the tenth Chapter

The same time the Lord said, cut you two tables of stone like the first, and come up to me into the mountains, and make you an Ark of wood.

2 And I will write in those Tables, the words that were written in the former tables, which you had broken: and you shall put them in the Ark.

3 So I made an Ark of Satinwood, and hewed two tables like the first, and went up into the mountain, having the two tables in my hand:

4 Then wrote he in the Tables as he had written afore, even the ten sayings which the Lord had spoken upon the mountain, from the midst of the fire in the day of your coming together. And afterward the Lord gave them to me.

5 And I turned me, and went down from the hill, and put them into the Ark which I had made: and they were there as the Lord had commanded me.

6 And the children of Israel departed from Beroth of the children of Jaakan towards Moserah, where Aaron died, and was buried there. And Eleazar his son executed the office of high priest in his stead.

7 From thence they went toward Gudgodah, and from Gudgodah towards Jotbath, in the Country where running rivers are.

8 The same time the Lord sorted out the tribe of Levi, to bear the Ark of the Lords covenant, and to stand in the Lords presence, to minister unto him, and to bless in his name, even to this day.

We have seen already heretofore the thing that Moses rehearsed here, that is to wit, the God wrote new again that ten commandments of his law in two Tables of stone: & that was done to the end that the people should the better consider, that the covenant which God had made with them, was of his own only mercy. For we see how God had given over that people and it was all one as if he had thrust them into the common ray of other men, which are utterly accursed and estranged from God. Truly Gods former choosing of that people, was of his own free goodness. For (as we have seen) none of them was yet born, when he made his promise with his servant Abraham: & therefore needs must they acknowledge that his choosing of them, was not in respect of any desert of their own. Howbeit forasmuch as men labour all that they can, to darken Gods free favour, & seek pretty fond devises to challenge to themselves some peace of their own salvation: it was expedient to have it fully showed, that God received that people to mercy again the second time, without any respect whether they were worthy of it or no, but only of his own mere goodness. Men are of opinion, that when God chose them, he foresaw what manner of ones they should be, accordingly as we see how this devilish error had always reigned, and that there are yet still some fantastical persons, which will needs have Gods election to be grounded upon his foreknowledge, that is to say, when God chose whom he listed before the making of the world, they fall to glossing thereupon, that he foreknew who should be worthy of it, & therefore marked them out for the same purpose, and in the same respect preferred them before those whom he knew would become wicked. But that is clean contrary to that teaching of the holy scripture. For that teaches us, that the cause of Gods choosing of us is taken from out of himself, that is to say, of his own only free goodness: for he shall never find any thing in us, why he should be inclined to love us. Howbeit to the end that this may be the better perceived in the things which God had showed us in the people of Israel: he chose the offspring of Abraham. And wherefore? Abraham was a silly soul, he had neither nobility nor worship in him, he was not of any great reputation to the world ward: & yet notwithstanding God marked him out, & chose him alone & his household from all others. And what manner of household was it? Was there yet any likelihood in it? Nay. Abraham was yet childish, he was barren, he was utterly past hope of ever having any issue. Now then Gods choosing of Abraham, was when he was as a block already dead beforehand: and therefore St. Paul said, that in the person of Abraham, God showed that he chose the things which are not, of purpose to give them being. And for the same cause it is said in the first Chapter of that first Epistle to the Corinthians, that we be of God, that is to say, that he gives us being unto salvation, because he had vouchsafed to choose us: for we be nothing at all in ourselves. Yet notwithstanding, this people made great account of themselves, & bare themselves in hand that they were better than all the world. For the which cause, the covenant & adoption that god had made with that lineage was broken off: & so you see that the people of Israel were rejected at God hands. Yea & well worthy were they to be abhorred, insomuch that this sentence of condemnation was already given upon them, that they should be rooted out of that world, & the remembrance of them be utterly destroyed. So little cause then had the children of Israel to make any boast of themselves, or to take upon them above the heathen that they were thrust beneath them, and utterly disclaimed and condemned at Gods hand, as whom he showed to have nothing else but cussedness in them. Now therefore it behoved them to know: that whereas God gives them his Law, & teaches them, & performed his promise towards them: all this is done of so high & infinite favour. as ought in manner to make them astonished. For what a thing was it, that God after the breaking of the tables of his covenant, did yet still vouchsafe to have pity upon that wretched people? Behold, the two tables were not written by mans hand, but by gods hand, that is to say by his power: & that was a miracle. And what shall a man say to it, that Gods own workmanship should be defaced? Was it not meant that the people which were the cause thereof, should have perished utterly? If we make comparison between Gods word, & men's salvation: surely Gods word is far the preciouser. But behold, the word of God that is written, I mean that writing that was set down in that two tables of stone, came as it were from heaven, & was not the workmanship of man: God himself wrought it of his own power. What punishment then ought they to receive, which committed so great and heinous a fault, as that the thing which God had engraved with his own hand, was fain to be broken & brought to naught for it? We see then that God magnified his inestimable goodness towards this people, in that he vouchsafed that the two tables should be made new again, and that his law should be registered in them new again, as a perpetual monument that he was the protector of Abraham's lineage, & intended to keep them to himself for his own flock. Therefore it is not without cause, that Moses makes mention here of his making of the two tables new again, & of his offering of them unto God, & of the writing of the ten commandments in them. Surely, it was a thing worthy of remembrance, & wherein me ought to exercise themselves day & night, to know that God having entered freely in league with that one house, was not contented with that alone, but although their successors became a froward and crabbed nation, utterly rebellious & as full of shameful churlishness as might be: yet he ceased not to continue his covenant, yea, & moreover to renew it again with them, & to set it in the former state.

And herein we see that he had not an eye to men, nor to their worthiness, but will have them to think themselves beholden to him for all things: insomuch that he overcomes all the lewdness & forwardness of men by his goodness, adopting even those to be of his house & to be his heirs, which show themselves unworthy of the good that he had done for them. That is the thing which we have to bear in mind. And we must mark that Moses spoke not for his own time only; but that the same doctrine touches us as much or more at this day, than ever it did them:

especially if we, can consider the likeness that is between us & the people of old time. In deed we have not nowadays the law written in tables of stone; but we have Gods grace much largely towards us, & which deserves to be much more highly esteemed, because we be sure that he takes us for his church, & will have us to be ruled by him. Now let us see whence this proceeds, & what is that cause thereof. True it is that if we have an eye to that things that were given us in our father Adam, we be creatures shaped after the image of God. But we (to the uttermost of our power) have defaced Gods image in us,& we be so marred & corrupted by original sin, that God disclaimed us,& we be not worthy to be counted his creatures:& yet for all that, he vouchsafed to gather us to himself. For in baptism we have gods covenant engrave as it were in our bodies; whereby he does us to understand, that he vouchsafed to take us for his people & inheritance. Now have we any worthiness whereby to attain to so great a benefit? Alas, no: for we be guilty beforehand of the defacing of gods image. True it is that comes of the root of that first man: but yet are not we ourselves faults. Again, how have we withdrawn ourselves from God, even after baptism? for we have not only committed small faults, as befalls to the faithful to do: but also in the time of our idolatry & superstition, we have brought to nothing all the grace that was promised us in baptism, we have renounced the salvation that was purchased us by our Lord Jesus Christ, we have forsaken our god, & we have broken the spiritual wedlock which he had contracted with us, so as there had been nothing in us but corruption, by gadding away so after our own superstitions: & yet for all this, he had not failed to return unto us, & to bring us back again into the way of salvation. Since we see this, ought is not to be a sufficient proof of Gods infinite goodness towards us, to make us lay away all fond imagination of deserving, & to acknowledge ourselves beholden to God for all things? Yes: & it is the same thing that I alleged even now out of St. Paul sayings, where God shows us, that we be of him, not in respect that we be men, but in respect that we be his workmanship, according as it is showed in the second to the Ephesians, that he had shaped us: for otherwise there is nothing but wickedness in us, because our nature will always be found to be utterly froward & accursed. Thus you see the comparison which we ought to make between ourselves & the people of old time, to bring ourselves low & to make ourselves perceive that we be the more bound unto God for the free mercy which he had bestowed upon us, in vouchsafing to take us to be of his Church, in which respect we be (say I) more bound unto him than were the Jews.

Now it is true that gods writing of his law in two tables of stone (as I have declared already heretofore specially in the first place) was to that intent that his doctrine should abide sure. For he had an eye to the common trade among men, who upon the making of leagues & alliances, are wont to have them engraved in stone or brass. After the same manner it was Gods will that his law should, for the better continuance thereof, be graven in two stones. You see then how God does as it were pass a solemn covenant. Nevertheless we must therewithal also come to the figure: namely, that the writing of the law after that fashion in a couple of stones, served to show that it was not enough for folk to have that law given them, & to understand it: unless it were engraved in their hearts. For we must come to the similitude that is made by the prophets. For although God showed his law to be sufficiently authorized by vouchsafing to engrave it so in these stones: yet did he give an inclining that that would nothing boot, verily because the true tables wherein it behoved us to write the doctrine of God, are our hearts; howbeit not as they be by nature. For what manner of ones are they? Even of stone as it is said of them in Ezekiel. So then, let us mark that the letter of the law is nothing worth, until god work in us by his holy spirit. And that is the cause why he had promised to make a new covenant, not after the manner that he made it with the fathers: for, that continued not, said he. And why? He showed that the blame & fault thereof is in men, because they turn away & run at rovers as soon as God had called them, & never follow him at all. Although they pretend to make great account of his grace: yet is there no steadiness in them, but rather utter lightness; for by and by they fling away after their own wicked affections. The covenant of God then, yea though it were written in stones, could not hold them in. And why so? Not for that God abode not faithful on his part, or that he persisted not to show that his choosing of Abraham's lineage was not in vain: but for that they were bereft & disappointed that great benefit, & dispossessed of Gods free bestowed blessing, through their own unfaithfulness. And therefore it is requisite that God should speak to us after another fashion: that is to wit, that he should not only write his law with his own hand in stones, but also write it in our hearts, by correcting the hardness that is in them of nature, and also by making them fleshy hearts, so as they may be loft & supple to receive the engraving which he shall put into them. You see then that the thing which we have to bear in mind, if we intend to fare the better by this present story, is that like as Moses acknowledged himself exceedingly bound unto his God for the favour which he had showed to his people: so ought we also to bethink us, how abundantly God had uttered the treasures of his goodness towards us. For not only we be accursed by nature: but also we have forsaken him after his adopting of us, & we have not made account of him as of our father. And yet for all this, he had reached us his hand, & set us in our former state again; & he had not only taken us into his favour again, & given us his word to teach us thereby, nor only delivered us his law written in the two stones: but he had also reformed & softened our hearts, so that whereas erst there was nothing but hardness in them, he had now drawn them to obedience, to receive quietly the things that are told us in his name, at leastwise if we be his. For all they to whom the Gospel is preached, are not of that number. But let every of us examine himself, & we shall perceive that God in sending his Gospel to be preached unto us, is ready & forward to give us his grace, if we ourselves be not the let. True it is that his Election does always bear sway: but yet do not men fail to be in the fault, if the Gospel profit them not, accordingly as St. Paul declared, that the devil must needs have blinded our eyes, if we see not the light that shines there, seeing that the image of God shows it self there so evidently. Wherefore let us mark, that if Moses upbraided the Jews, (& that justly) with the unthankful ness whereof they were guilty: much more ought we now to cast down our eyes, & to stand in awe, & to be utterly abashed before God. And in the same respect, we have more cause to magnify the grace of our God, than had the ancient fathers, which were in the time that the law was written but only in two tables of stone.

Furthermore we have to mark the figure that is comprehended under the words, Make the two tables smooth & bring them to me. For thereby god shows the order & right manner of proceeding to be well taught at his hand: namely that we must bring that tables polished or made smooth for him to write his law in, & that afterward he must write in them. True it is, that we cannot do this of our own self moving, but he must direct us thereto by his holy spirit. Notwithstanding, it is to be noted, that God bestows two distinct graces upon us. The one is in preventing us, to the intent we should be ready and forward to yield him obedience: and the other is in enlightening us, and in giving us a present affection to serve him as soon as we know his will. This would be dark, if it were not opened more at large: but I hope that anon it shall be very easy to us.

Before men are brought to the faith, and before they be acquainted with the doctrine of the Gospel to be ride of all ignorance: they may have some good preparative beforehand to say, Alas I would fain give ear to my God, let him but only show me his good pleasure, and so I am ready to embrace it, so as he shall lead me whither he will. Let him but lay the bridle on my neck, or rain me one way or other, & I will follow him and submit my self to him with all obedience. Such disposition is to be seen in silly ignorant souls, before God have thoroughly instructed them. They have not faith, but an entrance unto faith, in as much as they are prepared to submit themselves to whatsoever God shall command them. Now comes this in moving, of men, or of their own nature? No, it is of Gods working in their hearts, who makes that preparation thereby the grace of his holy spirit. For by nature we can no skill but to go clean contrary to Gods will. And although men have some devotion, & make pretence there of: yet is all but hypocrisy, there is no truth nor soundness in them. Therefore when so ever we feel any good forwardness to serve God: it is of his own working in us, & it is he that gives us that grace. In deed it is said here, Bring me the two tables & let them be hewn smooth with your hand. This charge was given to Moses. And what then? Can he do it of himself? No, but because God had taught him beforehand, and prepared him to the doing thereof. You see then that that is one grace which God bestows: and yet nevertheless, God shows us that it is our duty to do it, though we cannot do it of our own ability, that is to say, though we be not given to do it of our own self moving, or power. For look what is our duty to do, it is good right that God should require it. Therefore let us learn, that to profit well in Gods doctrine, we must bring smooth or plain tables. For why? We see that most men have rough and rugged minds, so as nothing can be written upon them.

True it is, that they will resort to Sermons. But what for that? They be fore possessed with their own lewd lusts: they be so bemired in them, as is horrible to see: and again, they be full of thorns, there is nothing but vice and uncleanness in them: all is so out of order, that a man cannot tell how to write one letter in them. You shall see other some which have had their ears sufficiently beaten, and the Gospel had been preached to them all their life long: and yet are they nothing the better for it, because they bring not smooth tables with them, that is to say, they be not disposed to receive Gods word. Thus you see what we have to gather, upon Gods commanding of Moses to make the two tables smooth.

Now if we intend to profit well in Gods doctrine, we must not have our hearts like rough-hewn stones, where no writing can be discerned, but all shall be blurred do the writer what he can: but we must have our hearts smoothed, that is to say, quite & clean rid from all impediments that may hinder our obedience towards God. And for as much as we have not that of nature: we must pray God to be so gracious unto us, as to make us able to smooth our hearts so well, as we may rid them of all vices & corruptions, and meaken the sturdiness that is in us, when we see ourselves drag clean back from the will of our God; so as We may have a desire to overcome & subdue the same. The hammers & chisels which we must use to polish our hearts withal, are these: namely, to mislike of our sins & to be grieved at them,& thereupon to condemn ourselves, & to exercise ourselves in so doing: for every of us must enforce & compel himself by violence to stoop unto God, & we must hold on in so doing, what hardness & gain striving so ever we meant withal, so as all the loftiness of our hearts must be pulled down, that nothing may hinder gods engraving of his doctrine in them afterward. And when our Lord has once begun after that manner, he will go through with it, so as he will teach us his will, & we shall profit in it daily more & more. And so we see that the beginning of our faith; is the said obedient ness where through men offer and yield up themselves in sacrifice, as is they should say, Alas Lord, it is true that I am a silly ignorant soul, yea & a very beast, for I know no reason nor wisdom, but I flee unto you, that you must direct & govern me by your holy spirit. Look here (say I) the sign that we be well disposed beforehand, & this disposedness is as a white unwritten paper. For if a man bring a black & foul sullied paper, or which is be bedaubed & besloubered with mire, & say, I would fain be taught, I pray you write me a sample upon this paper: it is a flat mockery: for the paper is brayed, & a man cannot write any thing upon it that can be discerned. But if a man bring clean paper, & say, I submit myself to you, I beseech you show me what I have to do: that is a good forwardness. Or rather to come nearer the similitude which we have now presently in hand, (that is to wit, the covenant which God had made with us) if a man intending to bargain with another man, should say, Go to, to the intent you may understand that I am willing to yield to all reason; Io, here is a blank, write what you will & I agree to it. If a man say so & speak truly, he shows that his intent is to deal dutifully with the party with whom he had to do. But if another bring a peace of paper imbrued with mire & say, write what you list, I admit it for good: does he not give to understand that he intends to break the whole bargain, & that he is unworthy to once open his lips, as one that purposed not to stand to any reason at all? So then let us bring white paper to God, that is to say, obedient ness to submit ourselves unto him. Although we understand not his will: yet is that the entrance of our faith. For then dose God train us forward to write his word in our hearts, so as we be thoroughly instructed afterward. You see them that God vouchsafed a double grace upon us: first, in that he prepared our hearts to come unto him to receive his doctrine: & secondly in that he teaches & enlightens our hearts by his holy spirit, framing our hearts & affections aright, to the end we should be fashioned like unto his glory, & that his speaking, should not be to our ears only, but much rather to our hearts. So have we thereupon to conclude, (as I have said already) that we shall never attain to faith, except we have the said obedientness beforehand. And that is the cause why so few believe nowadays, for they be full of pride, they thrust God away from them, so as he can by no means come at them: they take pritch against his word, & resist his truth, holding scorn of their own profit & welfare. Therefore we must understand, that to be true scholars unto God, the end that we must begin at, must be teachable ness. And when we be once in that mind, we must suffer him to teach us, so as he may engrave his learning in our hearts.

By the way we have to mark also, that it is not for us to make or frame laws to serve God withal, but that we must simply bring our tables & let him write in them what he thinks good. Moses was a great & excellent Prophet and yet did not God give him leave or liberty to write any thing in his tables, or to put any thing unto them, but restrained him altogether to the things that were written there. And that appeared well in this, in that both the tables were written, not on the one side only, but on both, even to the full, to the intent that no man living should add anything to them. Seeing then that God wrote his commandments in those two tables himself, & committed not that charge unto Moses: is it lawful for any mortal creature to ad any invention of his own to Gods law? You see then that the way for us to put this doctrine in vre, is to bear in mind that if Moses being so excellent a man, and as an Angel of God, might not write or ad anything to Gods law: much less may we. Wherefore to serve God aright, let us learn that we must not take upon us to invent any thing at all, nor to presume upon our own devotions, as we term them: for all such geere will be misliked, but that we must bring our tables, that is to say, our own selves in sacrifice, so as there be not any thing written in us, until God speak, & that we receive simply without any gainsaying, whatsoever proceeds out of his mouth.

But now that we have so much, let us mark that which is added: namely how God commanded Moses & told him, How his will was that the coffer or chest which he had made, (that is to say, the Ark, commonly called the Ark of the covenant) should be born or carried by the children of Levi. And that is the cause why he told the people, that the children of Israel should fleet from place to place, until they came to Beroth where Aaron died, and that then God would shole out the Levites by themselves. Surely at the first blush the story seems disordered. for he said, the children of Israel departed from Beroth belonging to the children of Jaakan in Moserah, that is to say in that place of mount Hor where Aaron died. And it seems here that Moses meant to say, that Aaron died by and by after that God had caused the two tables to be made new again: But there were forty years between the one and the other. For Aaron died at such time as the people had outworn their term of forty years, during which time god had for fended them the land of promise. Now in the end of that term, Aaron was deprived of the dignity of the priesthood, and Eleazer his son was made high priest in his stead. But here Moses comprehends all that had been done by the space of forty years, from the publishing of the law, unto the very same day that he exhorted the people to put themselves in better readiness to enter into their inheritance, than they had been in at the beginning. He tells them that although there had happened many changes in the mean time, yet had God in effect provided, that his law was to be had always in estimation, & to be honoured, and that the world might perceive that his majesty was therein, & that all men ought to submit themselves thereunto. And for that cause does Moses say, that he had chosen the children of Levi, notwithstanding that Aaron had sinned. For to what end does Moses speak here of his brothers death? Even to make it known, that God had showed favour towards the tribe of Levi, as well as towards all the rest of the people. The tribe of Levi was chosen to offer sacrifice: it was a prerogative which God had given them. And were they worthy of it? Could they boast themselves to have been more worthy than their brethren? It is true that they executed vengeance upon the idolaters, but yet was Moses fain to call them to him, and to command them to sanctify their hands. You must hallow your hands to the Lord, said he: & how? In slaying those that have so grievously offended, and been an occasion of turning all things upside down. This day therefore it behoved you to utter what zeal you have towards the maintenance of gods honour, and to sanctify his name without sparing of your own brethren, or your nearest neighbours, forasmuch as they have so defaced Gods glory to the uttermost of their power, & therefore they must be utterly rooted out. The Levites did well execute the thing that Moses commanded them: but yet did the high priest Aaron make the golden calf. True it is that he withstood it, or at leastwise consented not to it: but yet did he swerve at length by granting the peoples importunate request, and therefore was he fain to bear the punishment which GOD told him of, saying, you shall not come within the land which I will give unto my people. Albeit that he represented the person of our Lord, Jesus Christ, and was a figure of him: although he was a mediator between God and men, so as he made intercession for the sins of the people, & offered sacrifices for the reconciling of them to the majesty of God: yet was he banished out of that land to his shame, he died, he was stripped out of his robes before his death, he was as a man degraded, and God left him as a dishonoured person, and as a man defaced with perpetual reproach. Now if God extended such punishment upon the person of Aaron: what had they deserved which were inferiors to him? So then, Moses tells them, that Gods choosing of the tribe of Levi to carry the Ark, and to be occupied about his service, was not for that they were worthy of it, but because he was minded to show the same thing to the successors of Levi, which he had spoken of the rest of the whole body of Abraham's offspring; namely that they had all things of his only free goodness. That is the cause why the death of Aaron is rehearsed here.

But by the way, we see that Moses spared not his own brother. For here he repeats the sentence that God had given & also executed against him, & that was not for the honour of his own house. But what? His meaning was that God should be glorified, & men condemned. Yea & we see that his intent was not to conceal his own fault, but to show that God had punished him for it, though there were great cause of excuse in him, & all the blame was to have been laid upon the people, because his overshooting of himself, was but in that one case, & that not through malice, but only through grief of mind. Yet notwithstanding he accused himself thereof, he acknowledged it openly, & makes a chronicle of it to continue of record to the worlds end. Since we see this, let us learn, not to be ashamed to confess our sins, & to show that God is righteous in punishing of us. Let us not go about to bury the chastisements that God shall have sent upon us, as we see a number do, who when God sends never so notable punishments, could find in their hearts that they should never be spoken of. And why? Forsooth because it is not for their honour, worship, or honesty. Verily, as who should say, you will needs be honourable in spite of God and his righteousness. Is it meant that you should be regarded than the glory of his name? Now then, let us understand that if we have committed any fault, and God have reached out his hand to punish us: the same must be rehearsed among us, and we must think upon it, and we must always confess that God is righteous, and that we have well deserved that he should use correction towards us, since we see that Moses bears not with his own brother. That is the thing which we have to bear in mind.

Howbeit on the other side, let us understand, that if Aaron was fain to pass through Gods hand, because he did but consent unto evil, & was punished although he clave not to it: (for to speak properly, his consenting was no consent at all: for he said unto them, what mean you wretched people? and in scorn of their idolatry: Look here your Gods O Israel (quote he) which brought you out of the land of Egypt: as if he should say, is a calf become your redeemer? Aaron then did after a sort withstand them, and yet notwithstanding I call it a consenting, inasmuch as he served and suffered himself to be carried away with their importunateness:) Now if God (say I) did punish his high priest Aaron after he had advanced him to so great & so high dignity: what will he do to us? Therefore let us learn to withhold ourselves from evil, & by no means to consent thereto: unless we intend to wrap ourselves in condemnation with the wicked, as we see did partly befall unto Aaron. I say but partly, for God used mercy towards him, because the punishment was but temporal, because it was upon his body only, and concerned only this present life. And surely God is exceeding gracious & favourable to us when he punishes us in our bodies, at such time as we deserve to be utterly rooted out, and when he vouchsafed to be contented with some chastisement of this transitory life, he showed therein that he is minded to use great gentleness towards us. And yet for all that though we deserve to perish with the wicked, when we resist them not, he forsake their companies and confederacies: yet it pleased God to spare us, and to show himself merciful towards us, though at the left, we do in our own bodies suffer somewhat in respect of this present life.

Now remained the reason that I have touched afore: namely, that here is express mention made of the Tribe of Levi, which was forced out to carry the Ark of the Covenant. And Moses plainly rehearsed that point, to do us to understand, that God authorised his law by that means, in that it was his will to have it carried after that fashion, that it might be as a standard for the people to resort unto. We have seen in the fourth Chapter how God said, you shall not make to yourself any likeness or resemblance: for you hear deft the voice of your God in Horeb, but you sawest not any shape of man, or of beast, or of any other creature. The only image of your God, are these things that he had written with his own hand, that is to say the ten commandments: Those (say I) are the lively image wherein he will be seen. And therefore I said it was a standard carried aloft for the people to resort unto, as soldiers resort to a standard in a field, to fight the better. So then, it behoved the people to have their eyes upon the Ark of the Covenant. And especially forasmuch as men are not very forward of themselves to obey God: it was meant that the, Ark of the covenant should be handled with reverence, & for the same purpose had God ordained the priests & Levites. For all of them were of priests: Howbeit, they that carried the Ark were of inferior degree in the dignity of priesthood. Nevertheless god had appointed the Levites to bear the Ark, to the intent it might thereby the better be known, that it was a matter of excellent prerogative, & that it was no dallying in the case: For we see that God would not suffer the Ark to be so much as touched, by any other than by the Levites: insomuch that when David removed the ark, the party that did but touch it of good zeal, died out of hand for so doing. When he saw the Ark at the point to tumble down, he did but put forth his hand even of goodwill to stay it up from falling, & yet notwithstanding he was punished grievously for his labour. This may seem to have been over rigorous. But it served to show, that it is not in any wise lawful to break the order that God had set. The end is the thing which he had an eye at. For if we look no further than to the thing itself; why might not the Ark have been handled & carried of all the people? They were all sanctified to God, they were all circumcised, they did all care about them the mark of the covenant. And why then should that one man die out of hand for only touching the Ark upon good will? Verily God had an eye to the end of the law: which was that men should wholly obey his word. For if his word be despised there will be nothing but rebelliousness against him. In deed men will pretend a willingness to honour & serve him, but yet is it but counterfeiting for all that. Will we then do true service unto God, & such as he accepts? All of us both great & small must submit ourselves to his word, & follow the singleness thereof, & therewithal bear in mind that it is so precious a thing, as men must not mingle aught of their own with it: for that were nothing else but a corrupting of it. Now forasmuch as men are not easy to be taught this: it was Gods will to show by a visible sign, how highly he esteems his own word. That is the cause why he sorted out that tribe from the rest, to bear the Ark of the covenant. It was Gods will that the Priests which were specially appointed to offer sacrifice, & to make atonement between God & men, & to represent the person of our Lord Jesus Christ should bear abroad his word, & that they should praise unto him to be as mediators between him & men. You see then how it was Gods will, to teach his people humility by visible signs and outward ceremonies, to the end that his word should be embraced with all reverence, & continue evermore in good state: But as for us, we have not nowadays the ceremony any more, but we have the truth, which ought to continue to the worlds end. Therefore when so ever Gods word is preached unto us, let us learnt to stoop to it, & to know that it is a heavenly doctrine, whereunto it becomes us to incline, & that it is not for us to bring our own fond imaginations in that case, for then wo be unto us. Nevertheless God grants us a special favour, in that he enabled us to bear abroad his word, & makes it to dwell in us, whereby he shows that he had performed the thing which he promised by his Prophets, that is to wit, that he had chosen us for his Levites, as shall be declared more at length to morrow.

Now let us fall down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, yea, even in such wise as it may lead us to such repentance, that we may be sorry for them all our life long, & be ashamed that we have been so wretched sinners: And that therewithal we may be quickened up to glorify him the more for the great goodness which he had showed upon us, & proceed continually more & more in obeying him, to the intent that his law may be the better engraved in us by his writing of it in our hearts, & we become the readier to follow the things that he shall have showed us, so as we may be forward to obey him all our life long, & our life be wholly dedicated unto him. That it may please him to grant this grace, & c.

The 70th Sermon which is the second upon the tenth Chapter

8 The same time the Lord & c.

9 Therefore Levi had no portion nor inheritance with his brethren: but the Lord is his inheritance, as the Lord your God said unto him.

10 And I tarried on the mountain as I had done afore, forty days and forty nights. And the Lord heard me that time also, so as the Lord would not destroy you.

11 But the Lord said unto me, up, get you hence, and go before the people, that they may go and possess the Land which I swear to their fathers to give them.

We saw yesterday, how Moses in this text did magnify Gods mercy, as well towards the Levites, as towards the whole people. For in showing that Aaron was punished for his fault, it appeared plainly that all his whole lineage deserved to have been degraded. Yet notwithstanding, God of his goodness vouchsafed that there should bee a certain number of men appointed to his service: and them he chose, not for any worthiness that was in them, but only for his own mercies sake. For if we be not worthy of so much, as that God should crowd us into a little corner of his house: how should he advance us to fare higher degree? That then is the meaning of Moses. Nevertheless we must mark herewith all the three charges which he sets down here, & which he reports to have been assigned to the Levites. The first is, To bear the Ark of Gods covenant, & the vessels of the sanctuary: The second is, To be as hand to serve God: & the third is, To bless in the name of God. These are the three things that were incident to the priesthood of old time. For as concerning the Sanctuary with all the appurtenances thereof, it was but a figure, which we must refer to the spiritual temple, that is to wit to Gods church, & to the sacrifices which are offered unto him by the faithful, when they dedicate themselves to him both in body & soul, by yielding up their own selves, that he may be glorified in them. Mark that for one point. The second is the service whereof he speaks: which consists likewise in figure: but the truth thereof is performed toward us, when such as nowadays are called to the governing of Gods church, do their duty in offering up men's souls in sacrifice unto God, by preaching the gospel, & in maintaining the order & state of the church, in such wise as God be glorified, and the church be cleansed from all stumbling blocks. The third is to bless in Gods name: & that is to yield a testimony of Gods goodness and grace to his people.

Now must we apply these things to the truth of them, that we may be edified by them. Let us (say I) have a regard to apply these three things to their truth & substance, which our Lord Jesus Christ had brought us by his coming. It is said here, that the Levites must bear the vessels of God. And this belongs, not only to the ministers of the word, or to such as bear public office in the church: but also to all the faithful in general. And that is the cause why it is said by the prophet Malachi, that the Levites were made priests, which thing I say was accomplished at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, at which time the church was advanced to greater perfection than it was under the law. Likewise Esay tells us that all men shall be Levites unto the Lord. All the children of Israel (said he) shall execute the office of priesthood unto God. And in the same respect dose St. Peter say, that we be a royal priesthood. St. Peter speaks not there of any peculiar sort of people after the manner of the Pope, who had villainously corrupted the said sentence of his, in attributing it to his own clergy as he terms them, that is to wit to the stinking rabble of his powlhorn greaslings: but he attributes that honorable title to all the faithful, & to as many as are of the church of God. Moses could well say even in his time, You be a priestly kingdom, that is to say a nation holy above all others. But St. Peter turning the same words faith, that now we be become a royal priesthood, inasmuch as our Lord Jesus Christ having showed himself to the world, is ordained priest after the order of Melchizedek, to communicate the same grace to the whole church. Therefore let us mark well, that this gift of becoming Priests & Levites, is not a privilege or prerogative granted to three or four: but inasmuch as all the things which our Lord Jesus Christ had received of God his father, are common to us all, & we be made partakers of them by his means: we be of the order & number of the Levites, that is to say, of them that are dedicated unto god. Not as the people [of Israel] were, which held themselves aloof in the body of the temple, & worshipped God afar of: but we have a mean to please near him, we have familiar access, we have his own son entered afore us into the Sanctuary which is not made with mans hand, to bring us in thither, in whose name all the faithfull have liberty to come thither. Thus you see that the thing which we have to mark in the first place, is that God shooled out one tribe of the children of Israel to serve him in the Sanctuary: but Now a days he had shed out the same grace upon all believers, and there is no exception, but we be all made holy to offer sacrifice to God, and not only to bear the vessels of the temple, but also to be the very vessels themselves. For although our bodies be but wretched carcasses: yet fail they not to be the temples of the holy Ghost, and Gods will is to be worshipped in them. Had there been said no more, but that our souls are the temples of God: it had been a very excellent honor. But seeing it is said of our earthly and corruptible bodies, we see what goodness God utters towards us. And therefore let us learn that this doctrine belongs to us, and that this figure which was under the law concerns us at this day, to the end that we should advantage ourselves thereby. And after what manner?

The first is that we should magnify the goodness of our God, in that he had showed himself so gracious unto us, as to chose us to be his servants, not only to bear the vessels of his temple, but also to be the very temples themselves and the altars whereat he will be worshipped, both in our bodies and our souls, to the intent we should yield him, not only the bodily service which consists in shadows and figures, but also the true spiritual service by dedicating ourselves all wholly unto him. You see then how the end whereat we must begin, is to know how greatly we be bound unto God for using such gracious goodness towards us. Moreover according (as Saint Paul shows us in the second to the Corinthians,) we must take warning to separate ourselves from all uncleanness, as the prophet cried out unto us, saying: Separate yourselves from all uncleanness, you that carry the Lords vessels. And Saint Paul alleging the same text of Esay, said that according to the same promise, it is good reason that we should give ourselves to cleanness both of body and soul. For in very deed, the prophet Esay, in saying: Be ye clean ye that bear the Lords vessels, had not an eye to the time of the figures: but extends his doctrine to the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. Now then this text must needs be performed in us. But there are not nowadays any more material vessels as there were in the time of the Law: and therefore it follows that the doctrine thereof must be performed in higher matters: that is to say, that inasmuch as God had called us to be members of his son, and by that mean to come so near him as he may dwell in us & we be his temples: the same should provoke us to give ourselves to all cleanness, which thing we can not do but by separating of ourselves from the corruptions of the world. For we dwell here among such filthiness, as it is not possible for us to escape uninfected, unless we labor to withdraw ourselves from it. Yea and there needs no evil to come upon us from elsewhere, for every of us shall find enough in himself. Wherefore let us beware that we turn away from all wicked lusts, and that we cut off whatsoever is defiled in us, and generally all that ever is of the world, so as we may praise unto our God, and having given over the world we may be so united unto him, as he may avow us to be his priests. For if we do otherwise, we shall be double accursed, and we shall not be able to excuse ourselves but that God had advanced us high enough. But what excuse will there be for us now when our Lord had brought us so near unto him, and vouchsafed to make us priests to offer up our own selves unto him, and to make us his temples, so as we should have a spiritual altar erected unto him in ourselves? Seeing that God had brought us to that point, is it not a horrible treachery (say I) if we fall to unhallow his temple? Now then, let us understand, that when so ever this world turns us away unto evil, we offer God great wrong, in making his temple a swine sty, and in unhallowing the thing that he had hallowed, by causing all the corruptions of Satan and of this world to come into his temple. Surely it ought to hold us in awe and to make us walk in all soundness, so as we give not over our bodies and souls to any dishonesty, seeing that God had sanctified them to himself. This is the thing which we have to bear away upon the first part of this text.

Nevertheless let us mark that although God have extended the said grace of making, us all Levites or Priests, to all the members of his Church: yet had he not utterly abolished the order of his Church, but his will is to have some certain men appointed to the preaching of his word. And that is the thing which is meant here in the second place, where he said, that they shall stand before the Lord to serve him, and finally that they shall bless in the Lords name. The same must be put in ure at this day by the ministers of the word. For although God have called us all in common, to be served and honored at our hands: yet does he require a special service at their hands whom he sets over his Church to be the shepherds thereof, that is to wit, that they should show the way, and always be in a readiness to serve God. And this service imports that the Levites should maintain the religion pure and uncorrupted among the people, and show the Jews that they ought not to deal with the superstitions of the heathen, and what God it was which had delivered them, and to be short, that they should always hold the people in obedience to the true faith . And for the same cause GOD allotted them not any one certain country or shire to dwell in, but dispersed them throughout the whole land. We know there was not any one tribe which had not Levites among them. And why was that? For God could well enough have gathered them together, so as they might have been all together in Jerusalem where the temple was, and in the places nearabouts, and have had some portion assigned them as well as the rest of the tribes had. But he did not so: but his will was that in every country, city, shire, and region, there should always be some Levites, that the people might everywhere be taught, and the seed of faith be everywhere spread abroad. For had there been any certain country assigned to the Levites: it had been enough to have abolished the remembrance of God, and to have laid all teaching under foot. But forasmuch as God had appointed the tribe of Levi to preach his word, and to bear abroad the message of salvation: he gave them no certain portion to dwell in, but his will was to have them dispersed abroad everywhere. And for proof thereof, we know how the prophet said that GOD made his covenant with the tribe of Levi. And what manner of one was it? Even the covenant of peace, insomuch as he said that the priests are Gods Angels & messengers: men shall seek the understanding of the law at their mouth, & they shall teach them knowledge. We see then that the service that is spoken of here, comprehended instruction: insomuch that they whom God had so chosen, had charge to preach the Law, and to expound it to the people, that religion might continue unpaired. And the same is to be observed nowadays among us. For although all of us from the most to the least be priests: yet notwithstanding it is the duty of the ministers of the word, to teach and to show men the way to GOD, and to bring back the wretched souls that were in the way to destruction . And that is the cause why Saint Paul said that he is a priest, not after the ancient manner that had been under the Law, but to flea men with the sword of the Gospel, as sacrifices ought to be slain flayne: after the which manner Saint Paul said also, that he had the spiritual sword wherewith to offer up men's souls unto GOD. Thus you see what we have to remember. And therefore let such as are called to the charge of the preaching of Gods word, understand that they must strain themselves to the uttermost, that God may be served and honored. And the manner is showed us in the text which I alleged out of the fifteenth to the Romans: namely that we must endeavor to sanctify all that ever is corrupted in this world, and that men must become teachable and meek, that God may renew them & accept them for his children . And if we do so, then is Gods service accomplished in us, after the same manner as it was commanded to the Levites in old time.

Now let us come to the third point that is set down here. It is said, That the Levites must bless the people in the name of God. True it is that in the Hebrew tongue, the word Bless betokened to pray and magnify God. Howbeit forasmuch as the matter here, concerned those whom God did specially ordain to bless in his name: we must fetch the meaning of this text, out of the sixth Chapter of the book of Numbers, notwithstanding that this manner of speech be very rife in Moses. But in that place there is more expressed: and for that cause have I coated the text. It is said there, that the priests of the house of Levi shall bless in the name of God and say: The Lord bless you and keep you: the Lord make his countenance to shine upon you, and grant you his mercy. The Lord turns his favorable face towards you, & bless you. Now hereby we perceive, that it behooved the Levites not only to pray GOD, as their duty was to do: but also to bless the people in his name: For they were two diverse things. So that To bless the name of God, is as it were a doing of homage unto him for all the benefits which he bestowed upon us, by protesting ourselves to hold all things of his only mere goodness, and that he is the author of them, so as without him we be miserable, and have not one drop of goodness in us, further forth than he alone makes us partakers of it. And so you see that to bless God and CO magnify his name, is to acknowledge him to be the fountain of all goodness, and that all that ever we have comes of him, and of his only mere free goodness. Now this belonged to the Levites, as we see it was their office to sing, and although that all the people were present there & the praise of God ought to sound in all their mouths: yet notwithstanding the Levites were to begin the choir, and to lead the melody. Nevertheless, they did also bless in the name of God. And how was that? They witnessed Gods grace unto the people: and the same thing takes place still at this day, in such as are ordained ministers of the word. For to what end served our daily preaching of the Gospel, but to bless the things in Gods name, which were accursed before? For by nature we are all of us accursed and reprobate. And therefore it stands us in hand to be delivered out of the wretchedness wherein we be: which to do, there is none other mean but only that God show himself loving and favorable towards us, and that is the blessing which is spoken of here. For when the scripture said that God blessed men, it is as much to say, as that he showed them by effect that he loves them, and makes them to feel the fruit & operation of his grace and fatherly adoption. Now therefore when we come to hear the Gospel, let us confider to what end it is: that is to wit, to certify us that God looked upon us with pity, even upon us wretched creatures, and that he sets us free from the cursedness that is in us, insomuch that although we deserve to be cast off at his hand, yet nevertheless he showed himself gracious unto us, and that whereas he might with good right be our enemy, he showed himself as a father towards us. Let us (say I) be well advised that we make our profit of this doctrine, when it is preached unto us. For whereas we be allured by the scriptures, that God showed himself favorable to us, in laying aside all enmity that was betwixt him and us by reason of our sins: if the same were well printed in our hearts, we would have another manner of desire than we have, to let forth his praise. What a treasure is it, that our Lord shows himself so to us, as though we saw him in his own person? & that he opens the heavens to assure us that he loves us, even us which make war against him, insomuch that whereas he should utterly mislike of us, he vouchsafes nevertheless to take us into his favor, & makes us to feel it in very deed. But what: We welter in our own dung even till we do as it were stink in it, without any care or regard at all. And that is the cause of such contempt of the gospel, & of such unthankful ness as is seen almost every where. Yet notwithstanding, it behooves the faithful to consider of how great value it is, that God received them to mercy, & shows himself to be a father to them, & that such as are appointed to preach his word, are as witnesses to certify us that God bears us such fatherly love. Truth it is that this was accomplished by our Lord Jesus Christ, for he was the only priest: and that that which we do, is not to take his office upon us, but only to approve & ratify the thing that he did. And therefore let us mark well, that it belongs only to our Lord Jesus Christ to assure us of the love of God his father: but yet does he also witness it unto us, by the mouths of such as preach the Gospel in his name. It had been told us herewith all, that the things which were figured under the Law, have been performed in his person. For the high priests (when they blessed the people) had a solemn ceremony of lifting up of their hands, as though they made an offering up of all the people unto God. Likewise when Jesus Christ went up into heaven, he used the same fashion, by lifting up his hands to bless his disciples, in whose persons he pronounced a general blessing upon the whole body of his Church. We see then that the figures of the Law belong to us at this day, howbeit, not as touching the outward use of them, but as in respect of the substance & truth of them. Whereby we be warned to get us to our Lord Jesus Christ, who brings us the full accomplishment of all things. And we must understand, that although he be not now conversant in the world to bless us: yet will he have us to be made partakers of the same blessing by means of that gospel, when it is preached among us. This is the effect of the things which we have to gather upon that place.

Now Moses adds, That God had given the Levites no portion among their brethren, but that he himself would be their portion and heritage. Yea, but yet for all that, he appointed them the tenths & first fruits as is showed in the fourth book of Moses. Now then, Gods assigning of a portion unto them was in such sort as they possessed not any Land or inheritance, more than their towns & suburbs for their chattel. But yet took they the tenthes, first fruits, & all other such things of all the people. Herein God had a consideration, that such as he meant to dedicate to the serving of himself, should be withdrawn from all worldly affairs, that they might intend to the serving of God. Gods intent then was, that the Levites & their children should not give themselves to husbandry & such other things. And why For they had enough to do to discharge themselves of their duty otherwise: that is to wit, in calling upon the people to follow Gods commandments, & to keep his covenant, so as religion might continue unpaired, & faith might have his full force; & so consequently that God might be honored. Also they had the Sacrifices, which served them instead of Sacraments, & at that time they were many in number, because the people could not otherwise be held in order: they would easily have been mard, if they had not been restrained with many bridles. That therefore was enough to keep the Levites occupied. And for the same cause God gave them a portion beside the tithes that they might have wherewith to find & maintain themselves, while they were a doing of their duties.

But this had been corrupted & falsified by the papists. For they have borne men in hand, that tithes belong to them by Gods Law. And why? Because (as they say) they belonged to the Levites. But they consider not, that the Levites were inheritors of the land of Canaan, as well as those that were of the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, Ephraim, Manasseh and all the residue. In respect whereof it was meant they should have had their portion with their brethren, & they ought not to have been excluded or banished from it: for the inheritance of the land was common to them all: Therefore was it meant that they should have had their part of it. Yea, but God recompensed them after an other fashion. It were meant then that the Pope & all his rabble, should show how the inheritances of all lands belong to them, & then might they there upon demand their tithes. Thus you see how this text has been miswrested. But yet for all this, let us bear in mind how St. Paul said, that even at this day it is Gods will that they which preach the Gospel should be nourished and maintained, as well as the Priests had their livings appointed them in old time. St. Paul demands in way of comparison, whether the spiritual service that is yielded to God nowadays, ought not at the least to be as much esteemed, as the service that was under the figures of the law? Now it was Gods will, that such as served at the altar, should be maintained by the altar, therefore it is good reason, that such as at this day do serve Gods Church in bringing them his word, should also be nourished and maintained. Thus you see that the way to under stand this text a right, is to take St. Paul for our expounder thereof. But to conclude peremptorily that tithes belong to the preachers of the gospel, is to gross an abuse & fondness. Nevertheless we must mark also, that it is not our Lords meaning, that idols or idle bellies, & much less that such as pervert all order & turn us away from the serving & obeying of God should be nourished in his Church. Now then if the Shepherds will needs claim to be found at the common charges of the Church: they must look that they occupy themselves in the service of God. As how? It is no title of idleness, it is no fantastical dignity, to be called the Shepherd of a Church: but it is a kind of bondage, howbeit that it be honorable. And therefore the party that is appointed to be a shepherd or minister must look that he obey God and serve his people. For we cannot serve him that has put us in office, but by serving of his Church. You see then how the Pope & all his hangers on, are disappointed of the things which they pretend to pertain to them of right. And if they devour the goods that were appointed to such as serve Gods Church: they must be fain to yield an account of them in the end. For the world sees they be but idle bellies and idols, and not only that, but also deadly enemies to Gods honor, laboring to overthrow it to the uttermost of their power. Now then, all this geere must be cut off: for the nourishing & maintaining of them, is all one as if men were minded to marry all the good seed that is in Gods Church. True it is that where they usurp such tyranny, men may well hope that they shall yield a reckoning for it before God, and such as are held down in that bondage may well sigh & groan: And although they know it to be an intolerable treachery and extortion, that such exactions should be laid upon them: yet nevertheless they must be fain to bear with them. But when so ever the Church shall happen to be well reformed and well ordered, doubtless those Cormorants shall no longer devour the substance of Gods people after that fashion, but the things that have been misused, shall be brought home to their good & holy use again, so as they than serve to the nourishing & maintaining of such as have the charge of the preaching of Gods word, & also to the relieving and maintaining of the poor, after the manner of the priests in the old law, who (as we know) were bound thereunto, insomuch that their having of such portion as I have told you of before, was for the relieving of the poor, & of such as were in penury, And so you see how we may profit ourselves by this text. But by the way, let us come back again to the things that I have alleged as well out of the prophet Esay, as out of Zachary, that is to wit, that we in these days are succeeded in the room of the Levites. And since it is so, let us mark that although we possess inheritances of lands, meadows, and vineyards in this world, yet we must make light account of them, without being tied to them, & must put the thing in vre which Saint Paul speaks of in the seventh Chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, that is to wit, that he which is rich be as if he possessed nothing. And why? For if we have not God for our heritage & portion, wo be to us. And how may that be, but only by being discharged of all earthly affections and cares? Although God give a man riches, yet must he be as a sheep, meek & lowly to offer himself unto God, so as nothing may let or hinder him from following his vocation, or from going on still towards the heavenly life whereunto he is called. that You see then that the thing which we have to confider generally in our knowing that God will have the ministers of his word and the shepherds of his Church to be nourished and maintained: is that we must likewise know, that all of us are a royal priesthood, in respect whereof he will not have us to be so entangled with the goods of this world, that we should not look up to him, but that we should run apace through the world, assuring ourselves that we cannot be children of the kingdom of heaven, unless we be strangers here beneath.

Now after that Moses had told the said things, he added yet one word more, which is Even unto this day. Whereby he means that Gods will was to have those things observed. True it is that these things had not at that time endured about forty years: but yet do Moses put the people in mind of them, telling them that that order must not be broken, but continued still even till the coming of the redeemer. Indeed the priest themselves were greatly out of order & had marred all, so as they had well deserved that God should undo his covenant with them, & bereave them of the prerogative that he had given unto their father Levi, according to this text of the prophet Malachi, which said the God made his covenant with Levi, but yet forasmuch as the Levites had shrunk away, & not regarded the promise that they had made unto God, they deserved to be cut off, and God would curse all their blessings, as if he should say, when you think you have made a great hand, then will God but blow upon you, & by & by it will appear that all was but shame. Yet notwithstanding the priesthood was to continue still, even to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, & so it did. Likewise let us mark well nowadays, that when things be out of frame in the Church, so as all goes to havoc, the mischief is indeed to be corrected, but yet must not gods ordinance be therefore disannulled, so as we should let it alone, & not put it in execution, upon misliking of the vices & offences that have set all in a broil: but we must always resort back to Gods pure rule. We see there have been no such devils incarnate, as those that have boasted themselves to be Prelates, Bishops, & shepherds. Now is upon misliking of such corruptions, a man would abolish all order in the Church, so as there should be no ministers, nor any more folk appointed to teach the people: what else were it than a horrible confusion, and a setting open of hell, that all things in the world might got to havoc? But let us keep still this principle, that men's vices must be corrected, and gods commandment therewithal observed. Thus you see what Moses meant, in saying that Gods choosing of the Levites was not for a day or twain, but to continue still, that by that mean the Church might be maintained.

On the other side, we know that the death of our Lord Jesus Christ should not come unto us in there days, without the preaching of the Gospel. Therefore if we intend to feel the redemption and soul healthy that had been purchased for us, the same order must be maintained still. And how great store of vices so ever there be, let Gods Church be cleansed of them, let all stumbling blocks be removed out of it, & let not men for all that, cease to have preachers of Gods word, & ministers of his sacraments still: for otherwise it were the next way to cut the Churches throat, & to bring all to utter desolation. For we know how St. Paul said that Jesus Christ was given to be our peace, and that at his coming he preached it to them that were near hand, and to them that were far off. Saint Paul showed there, how our Lord Jesus makes the virtue of his death & passion available: namely by commanding the Gospel to be preached unto us, whereby we be done to understand, that God having once offered himself unto us in the person of his son, will continually still hold on to take and accept us for his children, and confirm the adoption which he had made of us, even until we come to the present enjoying of the heritage which he hath promised us.

Moses having spoken so, adds for a final conclusion, that God had heard him, and said unto him, Go your way and lead this people into the Land that I promised to their fathers, yea even with an oath: let them go into it and take possession of it. Here again Moses shows the people that when they be come into the Land of promise, they must understand that that befalls not to them for their own deserving, but through Gods great mercy, yea and such mercy as ought to ravish their wits to wonder at it: for they had refused all the promises that had been made unto them. So then it stood this people in hand, to be new reared & set up again in their former state, through a singular grace. That is the intent of Moses, whereof I have treated more fully already, and therefore it is enough as now to touch it. But yet let us not forget to apply it to our use, which is, that it behooved us to understand, that although God have called us to the belief of his Gospel, yet so that in respect of this present life, we cease not to shrink away from him, whereby we were worthy to have the door shut against us, & to be taken as folk utterly rejected, unless he receive us to mercy, and that not for once only, but also in that he must double & treble his mercy upon us, in so many sins as we commit against him. Now then, before we can come to the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven, God must be fain to show us many a time and often, that we have it not for any worthiness of our own, nor for any purchase that we can make of it by our service, to say that we have earned it: but that his making of us to be his heirs, is of his own mere and free bestowed liberality, for none other cause, but that he had vouchsafed to choose us, and to bear with us, and to pardon the infinite offences, whereby we cease not to provoke him in such wise, as he should needs root us out, if he meant to use rigor towards us. Thus you see how we should apply this lesson of Moses to our behoofe.

Moreover it ought also to serve us for a comfort, that we be not discouraged when we have offended our God, even after we have known him and are fallen in train of walking according to his word. For though we step a side for a time: yet must not our so doing make us to despair, but we must come back again, assuring ourselves that if God heard Moses in the time of the figures of the Law, he will certainly hear him that makes intercession for us now, that is to wit, his own only son. For our Lord Jesus Christ was a priest, not only to die once to purchase salvation for us, but also to enjoy the same office everlastingly, as in respect of appearing in the sight of God his father, to obtain forgiveness for the sins which we commit daily. Let us mark (I say) that if this grace was granted to the fathers under the Law, surely we shall not be disappointed of it as now. Yet notwithstanding it is not meant hereby, that that should make us the readier or bolder to offend: but we must understand, that when we come before God, we must acknowledge the faults that we have committed, We must be sorry for our misdeeds, & we must beseech God to bring us home again to him. For as for those that hate not their sins, they be so far of from obtaining of favor at Gods hand, that they do the more provoke his wrath. Contrariwise, when we hate our sins, God looks no more upon them, but buried them out of sight. And this warns us, that when God continues his mercy towards us, & renews the same daily, and takes us into favor again after we have offended him: his so doing is not to make us the bolder to do evil, as who would say we have made a good market at his hand: let us beware of such blasphemy: but it must be applied wholly to the faults that are past. Therefore when there is speaking of Gods mercy & of the forgiveness of our sins in the holy scripture, we must understand that God sends us back to the sins that are past: & therewithal putts us in mind to beware afterward of the danger that we were in afore: warning us to pray him to govern us with his holy spirit, so as he suffer us not to be led out of the way, nor to fall to willful breaking of the covenant, which ought to be kept inviolate, as well on our part by our faithful obedience, as it is on his part, yea & that with such constancy, that although we offend him daily, yet he ceases not to continue steadfast still in his purpose. And to be the better assured of this doctrine, let us always have recourse to this saying, that the Land of Canaan was as an earnest penny of the everlasting inheritance to the fathers that lived under the Law. And so the things that are set down in the holy scripture, must be to us as a looking glass or picture, wherein to be, hold the manner of Gods guiding of us, till we be come to the everlasting life. The people of Israel was chose before they were born, God showed his favor to them by the law, & moreover he chastised them, insomuch that he lifted not to put them in possession of their promised heritage out of hand, as indeed they were not worthy of it, but yet for all that they came into it at the last. And so we perceive, that our Lord had not delayed his receiving of us till, we come unto him: but that he had prevented us, with his infinite goodness, insomuch that he had chosen us before the making of the world, & had offered us his grace & confirmed it by the preaching of the Gospel, as well as the Law was published by the hand of Moses. For our Lord Jesus Christ had vouchsafed to be a faithful witness of God his father, & of the love that he brings us. And because he is not abiding any more here below with us in his own person, he had appointed his ministers to whom he had given authority to preach in his name, & therewithal had given commandment to all people to receive them, saying, he that hears you, hears me. And he had given them express charge to preach the forgiveness of sins, as if they should draw the wretched captive souls out of the bondage of hell. You see then how our Lord Jesus Christ had uttered the grace that was unknown unto us before: but we take small profit by it. For although we were baptized from our infancy, yet when we come to years of discretion, whereby begin we to show ourselves to have some wit, but by choosing the evil, as though we meant to spite God wittingly? And again beside this, when our Lord teaches us, and reforms us by his word, so as he ceases not to show us our faults, to the intent to tame us and to daunt us, and to draw us to repentance: how dull are we upon the spur? After what fashion deal we? Are we not so spiteful and stubborn, as a man can not by any means win us? yes, and therefore he is fain to send us many chastisements & to make this present life to be as a wilderness to us to wander up and down in, with the feeling of his wrath. For all the miseries wherewith we be hemmed in, are remembrances to make us hang down our heads, and to make us perceive that we be wretched sinners, & that we be worthy, not only of temporal correction, but also to be sunk down into hell. Yet notwithstanding, this serves not to drive us to despair, for we may well assure ourselves that God will receive us to mercy so we flee to our Lord Jesus Christ. For if Moses were heard who was a wretched sinner: what shall he be, who had all righteousness perfectly in him? and to whom authority is given to make full atonement between God and man? Now then seeing that our Lord Jesus Christ is appointed to be our mediator: let us not doubt but that although God hold us in this world as poor banished wretches, and withdraw himself from us, and shrink aside to outward appearance: yet we be not bereft of the inheritance which he had promised us, and purchased for us by our Lord Jesus Christ. But howsoever we far, let us not tempt him, nor abuse his patience: but let us weigh well this speech, where Moses said that he was heard for that time also. For it serves to hold us in awe, that we flatter not ourselves when God bears with us, but that we should look about us to amend our faults, and to bridle our wicked lusts, that we give not ourselves over unto evil, but hate it and abhor it, so as God may go on with the thing that he had begun in us, until he have rid us quite and clean of all worldly lettes, and put us in possession of the everlasting life. If we do so, we may boldly protest that we have praised God and that we have given him such glory as he deserves, and we have cause to rejoice in that we were able to overcome all the temptations and distrusts that could happen unto us: and therefore we shall not need to doubt, but that our good God is and will be merciful to us, though we be not worthy of it.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to make us so to feel them, as it may serve to mortify us daily more & more, that when we perceive his displeasure, we may flee to his goodness and mercy, to obtain favor at his hand, that being rid quite and cleans of our vices and spots, we may be so governed by the power of his holy spirit, as we may become true sacrifices unto him, by dedicating ourselves wholly to his glory through newness of life. And so let us all say that Almighty God heavenly father, & c.

The 71st Sermon, which is the third upon the tenth Chapter

12 And now O Israel, what does the Lord your GOD require of you, but that you should fear the Lord your GOD, and walk in all his ways, and that you should love him, and serve the Lord your God with all your heart and all your souls:

13 And that you should keep the commandments of the Lord, and his ordinances, which I command you this day, to the end it may go well with you?

14 Behold, the heavens, and the heavens of heavens are the Lord your Gods, and likewise the earth and all that is therein.

Here Moses proceeds with the matter that we have hard these days past, that is to wit, that God had used marvelous favor towards his people, in forgiving them so many and so grievous offences . It was very much that they were received to mercy, so as they were not dispossessed of the heritage that God had promised them. Now Moses adds here an other respect, which serves to make Gods great and infinite goodness yet better known, & to give it the greater beauty: which is, that he not only forgave the people the faults that they had done, but also received them again with so gentle and friendly conditions, as might set all men a wonder to think upon it. If a City or a country have rebelled against their prince, so as they have broken their allegiance, although he lift not to use extreme rigor by putting all to fire and sword, but be contented to grant them their lives: yet will he bereave them of all their privileges, he will lay fines and exactions upon them, & he will perchance deprive them of their ancient liberties, so as the wretched souls shall groan under the burden, & have cause to remember their offence a hundred years years after. But Moses shows here, that God dealt not so with the leaves. For when he had once pardoned their offence, he dealt with them as if they had never done amiss, & their state was as pleasant & amiable, as if they had obeyed him in all points as became them. And so you see the intent of Moses in this place.

He had reported heretofore, how he had been heard: & now he adds here, What is it that the Lord required of you? He charges you not with any amercement, he lays no punishment upon you, he lays no burden upon you to bear you down with: his only desire is, that you should love him, that you should honor him, that you should keep his commandments. And is this any profit to himself? Every whit of it redounds to your own benefit. Was it not enough to make this peoples heart to melt; though they had been the wickedest in the world. When they might say, whereas we had forsaken Lord, & broken the covenant that he had made with us & chose an idol instead of him; he has not only forgiven that so heinous crime, & been contented to take us still for his children, & to leave us the inheritance that he had promised us: but also he governs us after such a fashion, as it might seem we had deserved all the benefits in the world. Could he dealt more kindly with us, if we had honored him & given ourselves wholly to him? Such consideration then ought well to have moved the hearts of that people; & although they were hard & stubborn, yet ought they to have bowed, seeing they knew that God sought nothing but their benefit & welfare. Thus we see now the intent of Moses & to what circumstances his sayings are to be referred. Which is, that the people should know that God had not only pardoned their fault before past, but also was minded to forget it utterly forever after: & that in the meanwhile they should think thus dutifully with themselves, our God behaves himself towards us, as if we had never offended him, our hate is not a whit appaired, he uses nothing but gentleness towards us. Mark that for one point.

But now have we a general sentence to gather upon the thing that Moses told unto the people. For the doctrine that is contained in the Law, belongs as well to us, as to them. Now then o Israel, what requires your God of you? After the same manner does God speak unto us at this day: he shows us his will as a rule to direct our lives by. And what means he in so doing? Let us mark what he commands, & see what profit can redound unto himself by it. Certain it is that God requires no more at our hands, but that we should love him; & is not that a condition which we should rather chose, than all the kingdoms of the world? Yes; for if our God should make us princess surely the greatest honor that he should do us therein, were but that he should make us his servants. We see that such as live at ease, yea even men of worship & of good revenue, had lever to trot to the Court, & to be in service with the prince, and to take much toil, yea and to spend their goods to get estimation; than to play the smudges at home in their own houses, & to live at rest upon their own revenues. Behold our God entertains us & keeps us in his house, & that not in degree of slavery, but as his children; insomuch that he calls us his inheritance. Indeed, were there no further than this, that he accepts the service of us, of us I say which are altogether unprofitable, & have nothing but all manner of corruption in us: whereas notwithstanding he vouchsafes to employ us to good purpose, & to make us vessels of honor, so as we shine like pearls in his church, when as ourselves we be but dung & mire: seeing our God deals so gently with us, what an unthankfulness is it, that we come not to yield ourselves to him with all obedience? And I pray you what profit shall he reap by us, when we shall have settled him never so well? Shall he be the better at ease? Has he need of our help in anything? No, but all redounds to our welfare, & he intends nothing but to our profit. Wo worth us therefore, yea & double wo worth us, if such goodness overcome us not, & that our hearts be not inflamed with a right affection of giving ourselves wholly to our God, to be governed by him, so as we suffer him to overrule us, & that we be prest and ready to yield to his hand, & to turn every way as he will have us. That is the thing which we have to mark upon this text. So then, when so ever the law seems over rough & sharp unto us, & our wicked lusts tickle us to spurn against God, so as it is hard for us to do as he commands us: let us bethink ourselves thus: You wretched wight, is the law of your god burdensome & grievous to you? what demands he of you? Where at shots he? His demand is that you should love him, honor him, & serve him: & will you in this case become an unnatural monster? Shall the life which your god has given you, serve to make you kick against him? will you grieve your maker who has created you & shaped you, & does also maintains you? Were it not better that heaven & earth were mingled together, & that all things were confounded; than that it might be said that you make no reckoning of your god? Nay rather, that you spites him of set purpose, insomuch that there is neither lawn nor scripture that can bring you to such obedience, as to make you yield glory to thy God? Is it not reason that we should serve God, when he utters such goodness towards us, as to tell us that he will be our father, specially by planting the belief of his Gospel in us? Now then, as the earth when it is lusty & in good plight does always bring forth something or other, to show that it has heart in it, so, seeing that, God has given us understanding & reason about the brute beasts, it becomes us to consider that his doing thereof is to the end that we should know him that made us, of purpose that we should serve & honor him, and stoop to him with all humility, assuring ourselves that he ought to have sovereign dominion over all creatures. Therefore let us mark well, that when so ever we be tempted to strive against God, and his law seems over heavy to us, and our affections fight against it, or go the clean contrary way from it; then to overmaster such frowardness of our nature, we must bethink us as it is told us here, What is it that your God requires of you? And then is it certain that we shall be too too much ashamed of ourselves. For what that we answer before the Angels of heaven, when this saying shall be laid before us? For it shall be well laid to the charge of all such as have made none account of obeying God, & of all such as have despised him and his word. Yea and although the Angels were not to judge of it verily even the Oxen, the Asses, the dogs & the very stones & trees might be our judges: for all those creatures retain natural inclination of obeying God. Therefore how shall we do, when we shall be upbraided with this saying uttered by Gods own holy mouth, What have I required at your hands? no more but that you should love me & honor me. That is the very sum, & effect of all that my law contains. I have loved you, & my desire has been to be loved of you. Were you worthy to be received & loved of me, when yet drew clean contrary to my will? Look here wherewith to hold us in awe, as oft as we cannot find in our hearts to yield to the obeying of our God, & his commandments seem hard & sharp unto us. What? Surely our God could not use greater courtesy towards us, than to assure us to him by loving of us, to the intent that we should love him again. His meaning is that we should follow him the same way that he has led us before. But now it is certain; although God require nothing of us but to have the reverence that he deserves: yet can we not serve him & honor him, until he have reformed our hearts. And thereby it appears what frowardness there is in all men by original sin. Behold, God commands us but to love him & to yield him honor: that is all that is contained in his law. And yet we come all of us so far short of the perfect performance of the thing that is commanded, that we cannot so much as think a good thought, but we endeavor by all means possible to withstand whatsoever God commands. Therefore let us learn to be abashed & ashamed of the crabbedness of our nature, seeing we be so wayward as to strive against our God & his righteousness, yea even though; things that he requires be more than rightfull. And so you see what we have to mark, when we feel such a law in ourselves, contrary to the law if God has given us.

And hereby we be warned that it is in vain for men to make protestation, as a number do, which go about to excuse themselves; they cannot give themselves to God, because of the weakness & sinfulness of their nature. Verily, as who would say, that the evil which is in us should serve us for our defense. Were not that a mocking of God? Shall a man be acquit at his judges hand, by confessing himself to be guilty? But here it is showed us, that all the hardness that we have in us to obey God, yea even though it be impossible for us to move forward to the performance of the least commandment of the law: will not serve to justify us. Why so? Let a man look well to it, & he shall find that the fault is not in the law: for it requires no more but that we should serve our God, & therewithal love him by yielding him his dew reverence; and what is it to do that? Let us know therefore, that the whole fault is in ourselves that we obey not our God; & that although we have no power at all to perform our duty, yet does not that discharge us, seeing that God demands nothing but that which is right & reason.

By the way, we must call to mind what has been declared heretofore: namely that as concerning this text, where Moses shows that mean how to fulfill the law aright: it is not meant that we must but only have our eyes, hands & feet well ruled; but that we must begin at the reformation of our hearts. You shall love your God (says he) & serve him. And how? With all your soul, & with all your heart. Then let us learn; if we do the things by compulsion which are commanded us; it is nothing worth: we may not think that it shall pass in account. And indeed there are divers that bear countenance fair enough before men, so as they cannot be accused of theft, murder, or whoredom: but in the meanwhile they be full of wicked lusts, so as they be ready to burst with them, & it is a cotsie to them to obey God, neither find they any taste in his commandments. And therefore all is but hypocrisy, all is but a fair pretence & show to the worldward, & (to be short) all is but vanity and leasing till the heart be won unto God, & until we be fully minded & bent to do as God commands us. That (say I) is the end that we must begin at, if we will accomplish the law thoroughly. Wherefore let us not beguile ourselves any more as the hypocrites do, with desire that men only should be contented. Let us understand that we have to do with the heavenly judge who admits no eye service, but looks to the truth of the heart. Therefore let us give ourselves to God with hearty affection, & not content ourselves so with the outward works, that the intent of doing well should not also be grounded in our hearts.

Besides this, Moses tells us; God will not only be served & honored, but also loved. And here are three words; the one is Love, the other is Reverence, & the third is Service. Now as touching Reverence or Fear, (for he uses the same term of fear;) it is not a slavish fearfulness, but it is the serviceableness & honor which we yield unto god in submitting ourselves unto him, because we be thoroughly persuaded that forasmuch as he has all sovereignty over us, it is good reason that we should be subject unto him. First & foremost therefore let us consider, that although God had not spoken to us to persuade us to this reverence; surely even nature shows it us sufficiently, and it is well enough proved unto us in ourselves. For although it were never told us that the lewdness of men is such, as they seek nothing else but to turn away from God, & to become beastlike by all means they can devise, yea even wittingly & willfully: yet our heads & hearts are stuffed so full of that lesson, as we cannot be ignorant of it. And therefore it stands us greatly in hand to bear in mind what this word reverence or fear imports, that is to wit, that God ought to be honored of all his creatures, & that seeing we be his, we ought to offer ourselves to be subject to him.

Also it imports, that when we think upon God, we should hallow his name, that is to say, not imagine anything of him to the derogation of his glory, but yield honor to his righteousness, wisdom & power. This is the first point which Moses sets down here discerning obedience and the right observing of the Law.

Now this reverence requires also love. For God will be honored with hearty affection. If we reverence his majesty, & yet stand in fear of it, so as it is a terror to us: then would we with that there were no God at all, and we could find in our hearts to pluck him out of his seat, if it were possible. As many as worship God upon no further ground, but for that they are sure they cannot escape his hand, & because they know him to be their maker; those (say I) being not touched with any free love will shun God; and when they hear any speaking of him, it grieves them; insomuch that if it were in their choice & power, they would pluck him out of his seat if they could, as I said before. So then, it is not possible for us to fear God, (I mean to yield him right reverence, so as we bear a hearty god will to him, & have a feeling of his goodness towards us, & that he is the place where we must seek all our welfare) unless we love him. Therefore if we have not this love, there will be no reverence at all. Wherefore let us learn, that God requires freewill offerings, that is to say, that our offering of ourselves unto him should not be of force or constraint, but with such devotion as we should be desirous to serve him, & at we might protest with David, not only that we set more before by his law than by gold & silver; but also that it is more sweet & pleasant to us, than honey. Thus you see what the second word Love imports.

The third word is Service. For if we make pretence to worship God with ceremonies and gewgaws as they say, & in the meanwhile do him no true service indeed: is it not a mocking of him? Is men bear solks in hand that their intent is to honor God, & that they love him, & submit themselves to him; & in the mean season make but a flimflam of it when God sets forth his commandments unto them: what a presumptuousness were that? And [likewise what a matter were it,] as if they should show no proof whereby a man might perceive, that his love which he speaks of here is rooted in their heart? Then let us learn; that we must show by our deeds that we love & fear God. And what are the doings that must bear witness thereof? Even our serving of him, that is to wit, when we play not the loose colts by taking leave to do every man after his owns lust & liking; but suffer God to overrule us, so as our whole desire be that he should hold the rains of the bridle, & we yield every way under his hand to turn to & fro according to his good will. And so we see that, the way whereby we must show ourselves to love God, is by our serving of him.

Howbeit, forasmuch as men are given to devise services of their own brain, & do make boast that they glorify God when they have followed their own foolish inventions: Moses rebukes this over boldness of men, and this curiosity of theirs, telling them that the service of God consists in keeping the commandments & ordinances which he delivers to them in the name of God. Now then we see here, that our Lord has cut off all our fond inventions, that we should not imagine to serve him any more after our own fancy. For why? He will have obedience, & he esteems more of that than of all the sacrifices in the world. Had this point been well observed, there would not be such disputing as is seen nowadays, among such as bear the name of Christians. For the Papists may good cheap say, that a man may fulfill the law of God. And why? Because they never wist what end or what mark God aimed at. They think it enough for a man to be able to discharge himself to the worldward; & so they make God like a little babe, by reason whereof they say it is a blasphemy to say that we cannot perform the law. For they never came to the trial of it. The despisers of God step forth here & say, that the law is easy, when as notwithstanding they never put so much as their little finger towards the doing of it. But when we have well weighed the things that are contained here; we shall find that it is not so easy a matter. Again if we compare the law with our own frowardness, we shall find that the law were easy enough of itself, if we were as well disposed as we ought to be. But we come far short of being Angels; & we had need of an angelical nature to the obeying of Gods law. For it draws us from the world, and leads us up to heaven: and we go the clean contrary way. Again; when the serving of god comes in question, it will not suffice us to play the hypocrites & to say, well, this or that is to be done, & in the meanwhile to over hip the chief point: but when it is said that we must love our GOD with all our heart; we come to the well head, and to the very root, which is that GOD requires such a soundness, as not only we should do whatsoever he commands us, but also have a pleasure in it so as our chief delight should be therein, and when we see an agreeableness between God & our affections, we should be gladder thereof than if we had obtained all our fleshly desires & likings. Again, men should not be doubtful of the means how to serve God as we see the world has always been, by swerving from the rule that is contained in Gods word. What is it that is termed Gods service in the Popedom nowadays, but fancies that men have devised without any reason? And no marvel. For (to their seeming) Gods law was of no great importance, neither did they busy their heads greatly about it. And therefore needs must they invent a great number of other small trifles. But they that give themselves to Gods law, do see; there is cause for them to say thus; Alas, although I take never so much pain yet can I not compass it, but always I come short of my ways end. Nay (which more is) all my enforcing of myself is in vain: in so much that if my God were not merciful to me, to give me power & strength, I should go clean backward; and contrary to his will.

As for the Papists, they had no regard of this, but invented a sort of gewgaws to serve God withal; as setting up of candles before puppets, gadding on pilgrimage, hearing of masses, taking of holy water, and all the rest of their pelting trash. But such as know what it is to keep the law, do never set their minds upon such childish baubles. But when men know not how to serve God aright, then they roam wandering here and there. Therefore let us bear in mind, that here our Lord has declared which is the true service that he likes and allows of; namely the following of his commandments, so as men deal not after their own fancy and liking, but hold themselves to his word; and as it were bridling and keeping themselves captive, do attempt nothing but that which they know to be the pleasure of their God. Thus you see in effect what we have to gather upon this text.

Now for a conclusion, here Moses sets forth commandments for the welfare of the people. Whereas he says that he sets them forth, it is to take away all excuses of ignorance, and to quail men's foolish curiosity, that would sty above the clouds to know Gods will. You see then how GOD makes us inexcusable, when he sends us his word, and commands it to be preached unto us. Could he make himself more familiar unto us, than by sending mortal men as his messengers unto us, to speak unto us in his name, and to give us understanding of his will by their means? Then is we say that we know not Gods will, you see here is wherewith to disprove us; for God has given us his word in writing, so as we need not to seek for it: and therefore it ought to be sufficiently known unto us. Now then let us also learn to receive it with reverence & humilities and when we hear mortal men speaking unto us, let us assure ourselves, that we must not measure the majesty of Gods word by their persons. But we must have an eye to him from whom it comes, and which is the author of it, that we may submit ourselves wholly unto it. Therefore let us not have these devilish fancies with us, as some dreamers have, which say, O that God would speak to me from heaven, I would fain have some revelation. Let it content us that God comes down unto us, to make us priurie to his will: for that is it which Moses meant, in saying that he did see forth Gods commandments: as if he had said, that men need not to go far to seek him. And in the end he shows, that all this tends to the welfare of the people, so as God seeks not any benefit to himself, for he needs not to borrow ought of us, neither can we do him any pleasure: we can do him neither good nor harm, all things are his: according to the eight Psalm, and also the fiftieth Psalm, where it is said, that all the beasts in the field are in his possession, and that if he be hungry or want anything he needs not to seek it at our hands. Why then requires he to be served of us? It is for our benefit, for that there cannot be a greater good turn unto men, than to be the servants of their maker. Then let us understand, that whereas our Lord lays not the bridle loose upon our neck, but governs us himself, and holds us under his obedience, thereby to move us to serve him the more willingly: he does it to our benefit and respects nothing but our welfare. Yet notwithstanding it is true that the law will find us all guilty, & that when God has showed us all that is good and right: that doctrine does so little benefit us, that it rather brings us death, and we be curled by it. For it is a looking glass wherein to see that we be Gods enemies: and it is a key to open the gates of hell. And how then comes it to pass that God should procure our welfare, and yet notwithstanding we should receive nothing but harm by it? That is not of itself; but it falls out by another mean, that is to say by our own fault. Then let us understand, that Gods law (if we consider it in itself) is unto us a doctrine of welfare, whereby God comes near unto us to be our father and to make us find life in him, that by his ruling of our life, we might stick unto him, and thereby be made partakers of his benefits, & in the end attain to the heritage of the heavenly life. But here withal we be so froward and full of corruption, that the law can serve us to no other purpose, but to curse us, & to make us perceive how loathsome we be unto God, in as much as we be his deadly enemies, & so we have double cause to be abashed & afraid, & ashamed of ourselves, when we see that the good is so turned to our harm: & it is more than if the nature of the sun were changed by our infection. Would it not make us to loath ourselves, if we should find such soul & vile smokes in us, as should darken and quench the light of the sun? yes verily. Now we see that Gods law is the light of our life: and yet we not only dim it, but also turn it into the darkness of death; & it is impossible that it should stand us in any other steed, until our Lord Jesus Christ have wrought in us, and reformed us by his holy spirit, & by writing his law new again in our hearts. For as much then as we see that men turn life into death, light into darkness, & benefit into bane: alas, ought we not to be exceeding abashed? yes, but yet must not that put us out of conceit of the doctrine of the law, so as we should not love it, howbeit that we cannot perform it, until god have changed our hearts to cause us to submit ourselves unto him, and have made us new creatures in our lord Jesus Christ. True it is that the setting forth of the law unto us, is not for naught: but yet must we needs perceive by experience, that until God has brought us home again unto him, that doctrine of his law will serve for nothing but to condemn us. But when he has once wrought in us by his holy spirit: then shall we perceive that in setting forth his law unto us, he procures our benefit & welfare, according as is said of it here by Moses. And so you hear what we have to gather upon this text. But Moses does yet better confirms the matter that we have seen; which is, that God held not his people down like slaves, nor handled them roughly to be revenged of them, & to make them feel the offence they had committed; but that he handled them after a gentle and loving fashion. Now then (said he) has the everlasting your God any need of you? Behold (said he) the heavens, yeah, and the heaven of the heaven are Gods. As if he should say, you think that God would fain have a people, as though he could not forbear to be without them. Has not he the skies at commandment? has not he his heavenly host? has he not whole millions of Angels? has he not peaceable dominion in heaven? Yes, and therefore you must not imagine any more, that his choosing of you was to better his own estate by you. If he should destroy you, and make quite riddance of you; should his reign cease? No, no, and for proof thereof, he has no need of men. Again, besides that, is not the earth and all things in it, in his possession? Yes: What is the cause then that he has not taken and chosen other nations to him as well as you? Is it for that you are nobler, or mightier, or worthier in any respect, than the rest, as it is mentioned in the seventh Chapter? No. It is certain that the Jews were not better than the Gentiles: insomuch that if they should have been compared with them, they should have found themselves to have been neither nobler of lineage, nor richer in substance, nor vertuouser in life, nor to have excelled them in anything. What is the cause then (said Moses) that God has vouchsafed to take you for his people, and that he has let all others alone, & reached you his hand to govern you? Sought he his own profit or advantage? No. Seeing then that you be so greatly bound unto him; serve him with the better will.

Here we see in effect two things. The one is Moses his confirming of the Israelites still in the doctrine that we have hard; which, that all of them should learn to glorify God for their welfare, acknowledging themselves beholden to him for all good things, so as they have not any worthiness or deserving to vaunt themselves of, but must exalt their God & utterly abase themselves. Mark that, for the one point. And out of this proceeds the other point; which is, that such as have had such experience of Gods goodness towards themselves, & are taught beforehand to glorify god, must take courage to serve him the more frankly, & offer themselves to God with a more zealous will, to be quietly governed & overruled by him. Thus you see two points that are to be gathered upon that text. Yea & let us mark well, how it is not without cause Moses stands so much upon doctrine. For we see how the unthankfulness of men is so great, that they labor continually to deface Gods goodness, by reason of the cursed root of pride & lustiness which cannot be quite & clean taken from us. Men then do always bear themselves in hand, that they be somewhat worth, & thereupon they land in their own conceits, yea even as it were in despite of God. Although God lay on sure load upon our heads with beetles; yet cease we not to set up our bristles still, & to grunt at him, & to think there is yet some virtue or power in us. For this cause Moses thinks it not enough to have said once or twice, you must father all your welfare upon the only favor of God: but he returns soon to the confirming of the same doctrine, to the intent that mans cackling might be the better stilled, and that such as deceit themselves through their vain imaginations, might learn to conclude the end, that it is not for us to look for any valor or worthiness in ourselves, but that we must yield God that which belongs peculiarly unto him, namely, that his calling of us, his choosing of us, & his maintaining of us; & likewise our having of his word, & our retaining of some order in the Church, come altogether of him, so as we cannot say we have gotten them by our own skill, cunning or strength. Thus much concerning the first point.

Now for our better confirmation herein, let us compare ourselves with the Angels & withal the world besides, & let us think thus: what are we? Truly, if we go no further than to our own selves, we may have our eyes dazzled, & we know naturally men do so besot themselves, that they be as good as bewitched with the fond imagination of their own worthiness. Therefore if we should look no further than to ourselves; it would seem to us that we be something worth: but if we look further of, & fall to considering with ourselves, What are other men? Do they not set as much or more by themselves than we do yes: & if there were a third party to play the judge, would he not make more account of them than of us? Yes. For to outward show there is much more greatness, richness, worthiness, & honor; there is much more discretion & wisdom in them than in us. What is the cause then God has chosen us, & let the others go? Have we anything whereof we may be proud? Alas, no, if we be not over far besotted in our own fond imaginations. But if we cannot yet be brought to this reason by comparing ourselves with all the world beside: let us mount up a little higher & come to the Angels of heaven. Could not God have contented himself with his Angels, without coming unto us? We be but poor worms, there is nothing but rottenness in us, & yet god vouchsafes to seek us. His will is to have us to be his children, not only to enjoy his gifts & benefits here beneath, but also to advance us up to his heavenly kingdom. And for what deserts of ours? [None at all.] Wherefore seeing we cannot be so beaten down at one blow, as to come humble ourselves unto God; let us weigh well these words of Moses, & bethink us of the thing that is told us here; namely that the heaven of heaven are the lords. For Moses thinks it not enough to say simply the heavens: but he enlarges his speech yet further, & said, the heavens of heavens. It had been enough to have said the heavens; for seeing that earth (how wide and huge so ever it be) is nothing in comparison of the immeasurable greatness of the skies: the only word heavens extent ought well to have sufficed. But Moses intended to express it yet more in saying the heavens of heavens, yea even the heavens of heavens. In respect whereof he repeats those words three times: as if he should say, God can find a kingdom large & great enough, & of such wideness as he shall not need to come borrow some little corner in the world to lodge in: he needs not to seek in dark caves for anything wherewith to let forth his glory. Men are but worms; they be but like frogs in a puddle of mire; and shall God come down here below, to make his glory shine there? Has he not his heavenly power, to show there above that he has sovereign dominion over all creatures? Must he be fain to stand to our courtesy for the doing of anything? So then, we see that men must not only become drunken & beastlike, but also stark devils through pride, if this declaration of Moses make them not to stoop, & to acknowledge it to be good reason that God should be glorified everywhere, and that they ought not to reserve to themselves any whit of the praise of their own salvation or welfare.

Now furthermore Moses adds, that Gods affection towards that people, & his loving of them to choose their seed, proceeded only of his own good will. Your God (said he) has dominion over heaven & earth; And yet notwithstanding he has vouchsafed to be your Lord. What is the cause thereof? Moses has showed it already. But yet he adds (for greater confirmation) that God did cast an earnest free good will towards this people. The first word which he uses, signifies sometime to cleave unto, & sometime to take pleasure. But here the proper & natural meaning of it is, that God took pleasure in that people, to that he acquainted himself with them through a free love: for he adds the word Love thereunto. You see then, that willing pleasure went before, & afterward love ensued of it, and it serves to show, that it is a fondness for men to imagine that there is any cause why God should love one more than another, save only that it is his pleasure so to do. Moses could not have expressed this more plainly, than by laying that it was Gods good pleasure. That is the very fountain; and out of that fountain springs afterward the love. Let us learn then, that God must first love us, and that we must feel the same by effect in us; and yet notwithstanding we must not stay still at that love. But to the end we may the better feel that it is a free love, we must proceed to Gods pleasure or will; that is to say, we must know, that he respected neither one thing nor other, whereby to be persuaded and moved to that love, but that he sought the cause of it in himself, and because it liked him, therefore he listed it. That is the thing that Moses has declared in this text. Howbeit for as much as we cannot as now proceeds any farther, let us bear away but this lesson, that as often as there is any speaking of our salvation, we must not seek the cause of it anywhere else, than in God; & that being utterly naked of all goodness, we must confess ourselves to be utterly accursed, but that God pitying us, and minding to show us mercy, draws us out of the cursedness wherein we were, in which respect, for as much as he & assures us to the salvation which he has purchased so dearly for us, we must not doubt but that he will bring us there, at leastwise if we abide steadfast in his covenant, & yet nevertheless, that because we cannot have such steadfastness of ourselves, he will hold us up strengthen us by his holy spirit, to the end that feeling his power in us, we may be the more encouraged to serve him, and not be unthankful for so great goodness as he has showed us.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may continually mislike them more and more, and in so doing returns unto him, as to the only party that can remedy our diseases, and let us up again by pardoning our offences: so as we may feel the sweetness that is in him, and the bitterness of our affections may not make us to mislike of his service, but rather that we may be the more affectioned unto it, so as by that means we may be framed unto his righteousness, & unto the obeying of him, until we be gathered into the company of his Angels. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people & nations of the earth, &c.

On Friday the 13th of September 1555

The 72nd Sermon which is the fourth upon the tenth Chapter

15 Yet notwithstanding the Lord has through love acquainted himself with your fathers, and loved them, and chosen their seeds after them, that is to wit, even you above all people, as appears this day.

16 Therefore cut away the foreskin of your hearts, and harden not your necks from henceforth .

17 For the Lord your God is God of Gods, and Lord of Lords, a great, mighty and terrible God, which regards not any mans person, nor takes any gifts.

We have to lay forth more at large; the sentence that was begun yesterday, which is, that here Moses declares unto the Jews, that all the goodness which they had, proceeded of Gods love, yea even of free love. For his loving of them above all other people was not for that they were worthier, but because it so pleased him. Moreover, he adds that God took not Abraham only, but also all his offspring into his favor, so as his choosing of the people, proceeded thereof. Whereof comes it then, that the Jews were so preferred before all the rest of the world? If we say it was because they were better than the rest, that is a manifest gainsaying of God, who will have us to acknowledge his only favor & goodness in that behalf. Then let us conclude, that God sought not the cause thereof elsewhere than in himself: But his will was to lay forth the infinite treasures of his mercy, to show that he was not indented to any creature, but that his bearing of good will towards them, is for he himself is good, and therefore all things are to be referred to his praise according as the scripture shows that his choosing of his church in all ages has been to that end. Now we see in effect what this doctrine means.

Yesterday it was declared what was the use of it, namely that men should be humbled in themselves, to exalt Gods goodness, & thereupon take the better courage to serve him. For how greatly are we bound unto him, seeing he has vouchsafed to take us for his heritage, & to adopt us to be his children, whereas in the mean season he has related others that were like unto us? For if it be demanded wherein we differ from other men: there will no difference be found in respect of ourselves. And therefore seeing that God has esteemed us so highly, we are bound to serve him and to give ourselves wholly unto him. But by the way let us mark, that there is a general election belonging to all this people, which election deserves well to be had in estimation. But yet should not all avail, except every man were made partaker of it particularly in himself. This would be darksome, if it were not declared more at large. But it will become easy enough if we call to mind, first what Moses teaches here, and which we have seen already heretofore: namely that God chose Abraham's offspring out of the whole world. And why? because it pleased him. All the world was his (as has been declared already) and all nations were alike near unto him, and in quail degree as that offspring was that was to come of Abraham. Nay: (which more is) he chose a people that had no being, and of whom there was no hope. For Abraham was like a dry timber log, and therefore was there no hope that ever he could have any offspring. Sara his wife was barren & both of them drooped for age, and their bodies were withered, so as God chose the thing which was not, and his promise seemed as it were to hang in the air, without foundation to rest upon. And yet notwithstanding, by virtue of the promise wherein God said that he would bless Abraham's lineage; there must needs come a people, as shall be showed in the next lecture. See here I pray you the election of God, whereby he puts such difference between the lineage of Abraham and all the rest of the world, that he made the same lineage his Church of purpose that the signs of his favor and of his covenant should remain there, and that his name should be called upon there, so as he offered the promises of salvation to them that descended of the same race and lineage, & the redeemer that was to be sent into the world, was set forth unto that they might be gathered together under him. Look here (I say) a general election that belonged to all the children of Abraham, and yet was that grace to be confirmed by faith but in a part of them, & in some of them. For we see that many of them were cut off, not for that they were not Abraham's children, in respect of the flesh and the world: But for that they were not his children in spirit and before God, which was the chief point, as S. Paul declares. As for those which were unbelievers and unthrift, and embraced not the promise that was made unto Abraham with true faith, those were let beside the inheritance. Indeed they were accounted for his children: howbeit, that was but as Ishmael was who was not lawfully begotten. Now then Gods general election which extended to the whole people, was not sufficient: But it behoved every man to be partaker of it in his own peculiar behalf. And how was that to be done? by faith. But let us see from whence faith proceeds, but only of Gods will, in that he vouchsafes to confirm his tailor towards whom he thought good. Therefore chose he whom he listed out of this people, and sealed his promise in their hearts by his holy spirit, so as they were made partakers of his truth, & it took full and perfect effect in them. Look here the double election of God. The one extends to the whole people, because circumcision was given indifferently to all, both small and great, and the promises likewise were common. But yet for all that, God was fain to add a second grace, by touching the hearts of his chosen, namely of such as he listed to reserve to himself, and those came unto him, & he made them to receive the benefit that was offered them. And indeed, we see that the greatest number of that people have been cast off, and as it were banished from Gods favor, so as there remained but a small remnant of them not only at frame one time, but also even after the captivity of Babylon, according to this fore saying of the prophet Esay: Although you wart never so many in number, so as your folk were as the sand of the sea, yet shall the remnant of you be very small God will save. For the hypocrites abused Gods promise falsely. And because it was said that the people should be in multitude as the sand of the sea, they bragged at the sight of a great number, and in the meanwhile despised God. But he tells them that he could as well diminish them, as he had multiplied them: so as there should I remain but a small portion of them . And so it came to pass, insomuch as the prophet says, that if God had not reserved some feed; the country of Judah had been as Sodom & Gomorrah, & God had utterly rooted them out as they had well deserved.

Now is this very profitable for us. For nowadays when it is told us that we have the pure doctrine of the Gospel preached unto us, & we have the sacrament of baptism for the warrant of our salvation, that is one choice that God makes of us. We be no better than other men, that are drowned in idolatry & abominations, on whom God has not vouchsafed to look with such pity, as to make the truth of his gospel to your upon them: but has let them alone as destitute of all things, so as there is nothing but horrible confusion amongst them; & yet in the mean season, he takes us between his arms, and into his bosom, vouchsafing to cause his word to be preached unto us, whereby we see Jesus Christ who enlightens us as the day sun of righteousness, & we have the sacraments whereof we know the use. Look here one choice God makes of us, which is well worthy to be esteemed, wherein it behoves us to consider Gods only infinite goodness, for that he espies nothing in us, for that which he should prefer us, before such as are nobler than we, & have much more than we to outward appearance. But yet is it not enough for us to be so chosen of God as that he takes us into his house, admits us to be of his flock, & dwells among us; every of us must have an eye to himself, so as the gospel be not preached in vain nor we bear the bare name of Christians, without showing the effort of it in our deeds. For until our adoption be sealed by the holy Ghost, let us not think that it avails us any whit to have heard the word of God. But it shall turn to our double condemnation, because that when God had chosen us, we offended him; when he had entered into a covenant with us, we brake our faithful promise which we had made & plighted unto him; and therefore we must be punished the more grievously. But when we have once a warrant in our hearts, that his promises belong unto us, & are benighted unto us, by reason that we receive them with true obedience, & stick to our Lord Jesus Christ, suffering him to govern us: that is a sure seal of Gods choosing of us, so as we not only have the outward appearance of it before men, but also the truth of it before our God. And like as Abraham was made the father of all the faithful before God: so are we made his children in spirit & truth, and not only as in respect of adoption to the world. Thus we see what we have to gather upon this text, & upon this declaration that Moses makes here to the Jews.

And for the same cause he adds the exhortation which we have read, in that he wills the Jews to circumcise their hearts, and to beware that they harden not their necks any more. Good reason it is that men should submit themselves to God, after that manner by forsaking themselves, seeing that his seeking to win us to him is not for any commodity to himself, (as was showed yesterday,) but because he is desirous of our welfare, so as he puts us not to the doing of anything which redounds not to our own benefit & profit. Seeing then that God respects nothing but us in his assuring of us to come unto him: should we drag back in that case? Or should we have proud and lofty hearts to advance ourselves against him? Now for the better understanding of this doctrine, let us note that Moses had an eye to the outward sign that was given at that time to the Jews, after the same manner that we have baptism at this day. For circumcision served to two ends. First, God thereby condemned all mankind and all that is of man own nature: showing them thereby, that all of it is evil. And secondly he gave hope of salvation in the seed of Abraham, accordingly as he had promised. To this purpose (say I) served the figure of circumcision, namely to put the Jews in mind, that from their mothers womb, they brought nothing with them but condemnation, & that ally that ever was of man was cursed before God, because it had nothing in it but sin & corruption. Secondly again they were comforted, forasmuch as they saw that God promised them salvation, by the seed of man, and that he received them into savor, and justified them of purpose to have them separated from all the rest of the world. Seeing the Jews had this prerogative, surely if they had not meant to deface Gods power as much as in them lay, they should have made their circumcision available, by cutting off all that ever was of their own nature, assuring themselves that men cannot please God, until they have given over the things that were their own. Hereunto had Moses an eye when he said, Circumcise your heart this day. For their observing of the figure was nothing, except they considered to what end God meant to lead them by it. They beguiled themselves with the visible signs, and that was enough to them: for Satan has always this policy with him, to make men busy their wits about the things that they see with their eyes as whereunto he sees them inclined. For all our seeking is to content God with fair covers; and though we never come near him in very deed; yet would we fain pay him with a sort of pelting trifles. The Jews then esteemed their circumcision enough & too much, but yet in so doing they abused it, because they regarded not the thing that God meant to show them thereby, but were tied altogether to the visible sign. Therefore does Moses rebuke them, laying: think not that the having of circumcision in your bodies, is all that you have to do: for Gods giving of the sign unto you, was to help your infirmity, of purpose to lead you further thereby, namely to bring you to true repentance. For when you once perceive that all that ever is of your own nature brings nothing but cursing: you shall see that all of it is to be done quite and clean away. Therefore bethink you to mortify yourselves: as if he should say, Circumcision consists not in the outward paring away of the flesh, but the truth thereof is within: it is your hearts that must be circumcised. Moses his meaning hereby, is not to condemn the outward sign: but to show the true use of it, which folk had corrupted through superstition and hypocrisy. Accordingly whereunto Joel says, Rend your hearts, & not your garments. Wherein his meaning is, not that men should no more show any token of repentance; by humbling themselves before God, but to show that all that ever men do by outward signs, (as by rending of the hair from their heads and beards, by much weeping, by knocking upon their breasts, and by all other manner of gestures that may show them to be abashed, & in manner out of comfort before God) is nothing, except that heart be broken before. Even so, circumcision is utterly unprofitable, unless that hart be circumcised as well as the body.

Now we see the meaning of Moses, but it will become the plainer & easier unto us, if we come to our baptism. I have already touched the likeness that is between these two sacraments: and it is all one, as if a man should say unto us nowadays, if you would that God should take you, for his people and heritage, you must be baptized in your souls. What? baptized in our souls? Yea for south. For the water that is cast upon our bodies is nothing, if wee have not the truth of it, namely that we be so plunged under the water, as if we were in a grave; that is to say, that it makes us to die in ourselves, so as our own affections, our own thoughts, our own wit, our own reason, and our own wisdom bear not any more sway in us; but that we suffer ourselves, to be governed by God, so as all our fleshly lusts be subdued and held in captivity under him, and under his yoke. Therefore if a man would show us the true meaning of our baptism, he should say, look that you be baptized within. And for the same cause also does Saint Paul in the second to the Romans, set down a difference between the circumcision of the letter, and the circumcision of the spirit: And he lays that the one is inward, and the other outward. Whereas he terms it the Circumcision of the letter, it is by a similitude, for he has an eye to the word. To what purpose serves the reading of Gods Law, and of the Gospel, if it touch us not inwardly? Verily if every of us have his Bible in print, and yet let it alone, what do we else but make it unholy by our not applying of so great a treasure to our use, & by our not employing of the same to our profit according to the intent of our God? Even so stands the case with the sacraments says Saint Paul. For they be but as a dead letter, so long as we have no more but the visible signs, it is but a gay appearance and show before men: But the whole matter consists in having the truth before God. Will we have the true Circumcision? then must it be inwardly, that is to say, in the Spirit. That is to say, God must work there. So we see now that the meaning of Moses was, that folk should not boast vainly of the bare name of God, nor of the wearing of his badge, without the truth of it, so as they could show the power thereof: but that they should fare the better by the sign that is given them to warrant their adoption, to the intent it might appear that God has not without cause separated them from the heathen, which were as good as banished out of his church, & had no acquaintance at all with him.

Again we see that this doctrine touches and concerns us nowadays, because we have baptism which serves to the same use that circumcision did, namely to lead us to repentance. Therefore must we apply it to our use. And forasmuch as God has vouchsafed to give us a feel of the fatherly love which he be bears us, and that is pleased him to gather us into his Church, and to show that he has taken us unto himself to be heirs of his kingdom: Let not us disappoint ourselves of such a benefit through our own lewdness and unthankfulness; but let us endeavor to fare the better by it, by being washed in our souls, that is to say, by mortifying our own imaginations, reasons, and tunes, and by offering up of ourselves in sacrifice unto god, to the end that he may renew us, and that nothing else but his spirit may reign in us so as he may bear the whole sway. This exhortation is made unto the Jews, because it was their duty to apply their sacraments unto such end. Nevertheless let us mark, that it is not in our power to perform the thing that is required here. For although the Jews ought to have been circumcised in their hearts; yet was it very necessary that God should work in that behalf. Likewise it stands us in hand nowadays, to mortify ourselves, & we be commanded so to do; but yet must we be fain to resort unto God, who reserves to himself the office of renewing our souls. And that is the cause why it is said that our Lord Jesus Christ is only he which baptizes with fire & the holy Ghost. For if a many that ministers baptism, had power to regenerate, then had he in himself the power, majesty, & glory, which is given to the son of God. But our baptizing is only with water, that is to say, we have but the sign of baptism committed unto us, yet notwithstanding, our doing is not in vain for we must needs be faithful witnesses of God. And forasmuch as we do it in his name; we must not think that the thing is void & unprofitable. But yet for all that, it behoves us to resort to our Lord Jesus Christ, and to consider that our ministering of baptism in his Church, is by his authority, & therefore that it belongs unto him to make it available & that it is only his spirit whereby we be regenerate. For if every man could wash his own soul: it might be said that the minister baptizes with water, and every man baptizes himself with truth; but it cannot be said so: for that were as much as to rob Gods son of the thing that is peculiar unto him. He has reserved that honor to himself, & never given it to any creature, no not unto Angels of heaven. Therefore let us understand, that nowadays when it is told us, that we must make the outward sign available unto us, by being baptized in our souls: we must therewithal immediately submit ourselves unto God, praying him to perform the thing by the power of his holy spirit, which he represents to us outwardly by the figure thereof; and to mortify and renew us in such wise, as we may have the truth of baptism sealed up and engraved in our souls. In like case was it with the people of old time.

True it is that here Moses exhorts the Jews to Circumcise their hearts: but yet we shall see hereafter, how he will say, the Lord our God will circumcise your hearts it may well seem at the first sight, that these two things stand not well together, but that there is some contrariety in them: and yet they agree both together very well. For (as have touched before) it is our duty to be circumcised; that is to say, to cut off all that is of our own nature, and to rid it quite away, that God may reign in us. But do we discharge ourselves thereof? No: but God must be fain to supply our want: And therefore it is he that Circumcises us. Why then does he commands us to do it, seeing we have neither power nor ability to do it? It is to the end that we should be sorry at the sight of our own wretchedness, and that seeing we fail, and are so blame worthy, we should on the other side resort unto our God, condemning ourselves, & on the other side be encouraged to cleave him to do that which we ourselves cannot. There is yet one other reason, that whereas God does all in us, yet he calls his doing ours, and will have every of us to endeavor ourselves, though he be the worker of it. Thus it is he that does all, notwithstanding that we be not as blocks; For he has given us a will by nature. Nevertheless that will is wicked, but he corrects it and makes it good; & his working is after such a sort, as he will have us to endeavor ourselves lustily like good men of war; in so much that although we do nothing, & that that, which we do comes of him; yet will have us to have such feeling of his power, as to overcome all temptations, & be circumcised in our hearts, by renewing of our minds, & by forsaking about own affections, to fight against Satan, until we have gotten the upper hand.

But yet by the way we must understand that this serves not to magnify our own free will as the Papists have imagined. We have showed already, that we be so little able by nature to come unto God, that we draw clean back from him. Nevertheless to the intent to show us plainly what our duties is, he says unto us, do it: & although we be not able to let hand to the work, no, nor to put forth a finger towards it: yet does he command us to do our duty, notwithstanding that we be utterly unable by any means to perform it. And that is to the end we seeing our default, should be the more ashamed of it, & humble ourselves before God, and again that we should be provoked to pray him to work in us, seeing it is he that does all in us, notwithstanding that it be his will that we should be the instruments of the power of his holy spirit. For as he is so gracious unto us, as to impute his own doings unto us & to make us partakers of them: so also it is his will, that we should acknowledge and take them for our own.

And now to go forward with the matter that I have touched already, let us bear well in mind that if our hearts be not circumcised, we shall be condemned of falsehood, for breaking of the promise, that we have made to our God, as this people were, who therefore were often times upbraided with the uncircumcisedness of their hearts. The Prophets cried out often times to the Jews; come on your ways with your circumcision. You bear yourselves in hand that God is greatly beholden unto you, because you bear his mark. But you deal too lewdly with him, & you abuse his name with too wicked treachery. That mark was given you to make you holy, & yet notwithstanding you be defiled, insomuch you lie weltering in your own dung, & (which worse is) you make your circumcision a cloke of hypocrisy to cover your wickedness withal: So that if you were stripped naked, you would be ashamed to see your own filthiness. But now because you have Circumcision, you imagine that should hide all your uncleanness; and thereupon you fall to spiting of God, by your corrupting & falsifying of the thing which he had ordained for your welfare & profit. Away therefore you uncircumcised, worse than the very heathen themselves. Away you people of Chanaan, your father was an Amorrhite and your mother an Hethit: that is to say, you be worse than the varieties naughty packs in the world. Hence you Harlottes birds, come you here to boast that Abraham was your father; Go seek your ancestors somewhere else; for you be bastards and unworthy to be counted Abraham's children or seed. We see how the prophets did cut the combs of the prating Jews, the intent they should not brag any more of their circumcision, yea and even Saint Steven uses the same manner of speech in the seventh of the Acts. Go to you uncircumcised of heart & stiff necked people (says he) you be like your fathers, who has always rebelled against Gods & you follow their foot steps, or rather you got on from evil to worse. And think we that such upbraiding concern not us nowadays? Yes: For if we be once baptized, we shall pay dear for our defiling of the water which God had dedicated to so holy & sacred an use. Indeed the water of itself is nothing; but when it is once joined to the word, there is as it were an authentical seal which God has engraved in it. Now he that counterfeits the leak of a Prince, shall he not be punished? Behold, this is the seal of God, which serves not to leak conveyances of earthly possessions; as Lands, Meadows, Vineyards, and Lordships: but to assure us that we be called to the heavenly life; it is such a leak as brings warrant with it, that we be washed clean from our sins by the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and regenerated again by his holy spirit: and shall we break all this, & scape unpunished. They let us took well about us and consider, that our Baptism will cost us very dear if we make it not available so as it may take effect in us by being truly baptized in our souls.

And he adds immediately, Harden not your necks anymore. We have expounded the like similitude heretofore: but yet must I tell you briefly in this text, that by this figurative speech which I am about to expound, Moses went to express that the Jews circumcising of their hearts, was their submitting of themselves unto God by receiving his yoke, so as they kicked no more against him like wild colts. You see then that the thing which God requires at our hands in that he will have us to be renewed, is that we should be obedient unto him. And hereby we be warned, that as ong as men abide in their own nature, they be rebels against God, and do nothing else but spite him by drawing the contrary way from his righteousness, so as (to be short) they be enemies to all goodness. And for proof thereof, God requires no more but that we should bow down our necks unto him, and bear his yoke meekly. That is the whole perfection of our life; and the greatest holiness that God commands, is that men should mortify all their wicked affections, according to the former saying, that they should be circumcised to please God, that is to say, they must die to live well, that is to wit, God must rid them of all that is their own, if he intend to have any good of them. Then let us bear in mind that there will be nothing but stubbornness in us, to make us to lift up ourselves against God, and to play the wild beasts, so long as we abide in our own nature. To be short as long as a man follows his own inclination; he must needs be at war with God, and all goodness: for there is not that vein in him; which tends not altogether to evil. Now let us go brag of our own freewill, and say that men may well bind God to them by their good works and deserts, as the papists have imagined. For when the Papists hear that God commands us to do anything; they conclude thereupon by and by, that then it is in our power to do it. Yea, but (as I said before) God respects not our ability or power, but our duty. Neither passes he for the gay appearance or outward show, to accept the things that carry fair countenance to the worldward. But the thing that likes me (says he) is that you receive my yoke which I lay upon you, not by tyranny or cruelty, but [of favor & good will,] so as it shall be sweet and amiable to you, if you can inure yourselves to it with humility. Think not that I come to be pleased with your fair countenances. Indeed you can well enough pretend outwardly, to be as lowly & meek as sheep in hearing the voice of your shepherd: but inwardly you be as stall fed bulls, ready to strike at him with your horns; you be wolves & foxes; there is nothing in you but pride & cruelty; there is nothing but hypocrisy, guile, & spitefulness; you be of so sturdy nature, that it is impossible to tame you: & therefore it behoves you to be quite & clean changed, or else you can never away with my yoke, but you will be like wild beasts, so as I shall not be never able to compass you. Such then are we by nature, & such do we continue still until god have reformed us by his grace, & we see the proof of it here before our eyes. And yet notwithstanding we will needs still magnify our own reason & say we have some seeds of goodness in us, so as we be inclined unto goodness, & can help to further Gods grace, so he aid us, & so we make a hotchpotch of half figs & half reisons as they say. True it is that God stirs us up & puts us forward (say they;) but we go on of our own self moving: & afterward as he increases his grace, so do we put to our collup; and finally our attaining to the accomplishment of our enterprises, comes of our own wisdom, strength & forwardness. But Moses gives no place to such follies: but contrariwise, he shows, that (spite of our teeth) this sentence of condemnation must need stand, namely that if we intend to be obedient unto God, we must first & foremost be circumcised, so as all that is of the world must be killed in us: Let that serve for one point.

And here withal we have to mark, that (as has been told us oftentimes) God makes more account of obedience, than of all the precious things that men imagine themselves to have. For in all ages men have invented fond devotions, and they have born themselves in handy they should please God well enough, with devising of apes toys of their own brain. But contrariwise, the thing that God requires of us, is that we should submit ourselves to him & say; Lord reign you over us, & be you our only master, so as all our righteousness & holiness may be to frame ourselves according to your word, & not to make long vagaries to invent this or that; but to hold ourselves contented with your single will, to yield toy which you commands, & to bear your yoke quietly; yea and to learn to stoop & to bow down our necks unto it, though it seem painful to us. That is the subjection which God requires at our hands. Whereas Moses said: Harden not your neck any more; he rebukes the Jews for their former life, as if he should say. It is enough & too much that you have hitherto been stubborn against your God: according to this former saying of his heretofore, From the first day that I was acquainted with you, unto this hour, I have seen nothing but naughtiness & forwardness in you. He rehearses the same here, as a thing should make them ashamed: For we like not to have our former faults laid in our dish. As soon as a man does but touch them, because our ears are nice, it is a corsy unto us, & we think all such things should be buried in forgetfulness so as they should never be remembered any more. Indeed if we ourselves did bear them well in mind, it should not needs to tell us of them any more; but we see how every of us falls asleep in them; & it grieves us to come to any back reckoning of the offences that we have committed against God. We call them a great way behind us, it is a matter of heaviness to us: and yet ought we to bethink ourselves diligently both even and morn of our former faults. Howbeit not to be speechless of them, or to fall into despair for them; but to be sorry in such wise for them, as we may walk more warily than we have done, be thankful to God for his goodness in that he has vouchsafed to correct us, as I have declared often heretofore. You see then how men ought to have good remembrance of their faults, thought they were never warned thereof by others. But what do we? We forget them, and cannot abide that any man should tell us of them: and that is a doubling of the fault. Therefore let us assure ourselves, that it is needful for us to be told of our sins often times, and to be put in remembrance of them. And that is the cause why Moses says again; Harden not your hearts any more. He does not lonely warn the Jews but also therewithal accuse them, telling them that even unto that time they had behaved themselves so ill: as it was very requisite for them to be done to understand, that it was but a fondness for them to boast themselves to be Gods people.

Now to the intent we may learn to put this doctrine in practice as it ought to be; Let us understand, that such as will needs harden themselves in naughtiness, shall be destroyed by God who will make them to feel force of his power according to this laying of his. If you fall to stubbornness with me, I will deal stubbornly with you again. And it is all one with this saying of the xuij. Psalm, With the froward I will be froward, and I will deal roughly with such as harden themselves against me. Then let us learn that Gods intent is to lay a yoke upon our necks by his word, of purpose to bring us in subjection to his righteousness: And all is for our benefit insomuch that although it bee so impossible for us to fulfill the Law, that we cannot so much as put forth one of our little fingers to the furtherance of it, no nor once think a good thought: yet is that yoke gentle & amiable of itself, and all the harm of it comes of ourselves. For if we will not bow down our necks, but strout them out as hard as if they were steel or brass; to as instead of being as Oxen to labor, or as sheep to hear the voice of our shepherd, we become sturdy bull and fall to striking with rage & fury to shake off the yoke, so as we not only follow not the word, but also shake off all subjection, and enharden ourselves against God: what excuse will there be for us, seeing we yield not ourselves unto him willingly to be taught at his hand? Yet for all that, we see how the world goes. God therefore must be fain to overmaster us, & to tame us by main hand. And in very deed, look what afflictions so ever light upon us, we ought to take them as strokes of Gods hand, to make us bow our necks under him, and to become tractable and obedient. But when we go awk and clean contrary after that fashion, then does he threaten us thus by Moses, I will deal stubbornly as well as you. He uses that term of purpose, to the intent if men should not dally with him. For at the first blush the saying might seem strange which I alleged out of the xuij Psalm; namely, that he will deal frowardly with such as are froward. For how can that be? Can God be froward? No: But it is all one as if he should say: you shall find in me a greater harness than your is: Let us encounter together, and see which of us is stoutest and best able to hold out. I tell you, it is you that are like to be confounded and go to wreck. And therefore let us leave our naughtiness, and repair unto God while he calls us; and when we become to him, let us suffer ourselves to be governed by his holy spirit, which, the spirit of meekness, that we may submit ourselves obediently unto him. And for performance thereof, let us mark the lesson that Moses adds immediately.

The everlasting your God (says he) is the God of Gods, a great, a mighty, & a strong God yea but let us mark also, that he does not accept (that is to say, regard) mean persons; but judges according to the truth, Beware therefore that you must not anymore in your circumcision not in such like things, but bear in mind that God will have your service to be such, as your hearts may be wholly dedicated unto him: and that he would have you to submit yourselves unto him, so as he may have you in his possession, and you enjoy the inheritance which he promised to your fathers, and which belongs unto, God greatness which Moses speaks of in this place, is the first foundation which we must lay whereby to take courage to serve him. For if there be no certainty in our religion, we shall always make but a cold work of it, and if it be matched with any willfulness, it will make us to stand in our own conceits, yean and stark fool; so as there shall be no truth nor right in our doing. How so ever the case stand, I say if men be not sure who the GOD is whom they worship, they shall but run astray and at random, without any zeal to serve him. For although the Papists be so greatly given to their idolatry, that to their own seeming they have sure hold of the things that they have imagined: yet it is but doubtful opinion and surmise which deceives them. Indeed they do their service with many ceremonies; but if a man come to the searching of their hearts, he shall find them always doubting, and so snarled in their superstitions, that they know not where they be. And truly when so ever they be pinched with adversity, then does the venom break out, so as they show that they ought not whether there is a GOD or no, but by blaspheming of him, by gnashing their teeth against him, by finding fault with him, and by accusing him of cruelty, for punishing them (as they suppose) without their deserving. Look in what taking all they be, which follow their own fancies in cases of religion. True it is that the Idolaters become so beastly in their superstitions, that they follow them with burning affection, as the prophets say; who upbraids the Jews that they were like stoned horses neighing after mares, that is to wit, they were so devilishly minded that their doings were counted as ordinary kind of whoredom, but as a villainy even against nature. Likewise in the Popedom is it not seen that such as are taken to be the earnestest maintainers of their religion, are rather carried away with rage than moved with any true zeal to God ward? Yes certainly; and thereby they do the more bewray their own lewdness and shame. Indeed they behold enough to scorn us, as though we were turned away from the right religion: but let it suffice us, that we may always upbraid them that they know not what GOD they worship, whereas we on our side have good warrant of the doctrine that we follow, and are sure that God accepts the service which we yield unto him according thereunto, and that in so doing we may boldly offer ourselves unto him. You see then that unless we be sure of our religion, we shall never have any right ordered zeal, nor hearts disposed to serve God. And that is the cause why Moses says here, Go too, you be not as the heathen that go at all adventure, weaning that they do well in serving their idols, howbeit that it be but a weaning, so as they know not what the Gods be whom: they serve for it is but a fancy of their own devising. But your God is the God that made heaven and earth, it is he that has revealed himself unto you. Now then, if you follow them that have not the like assurance, and fall to disguising of Gods service: what excuse will there be for you? Were it not meet that you should rather give over both your bodies and souls to him, so as you might be honored at your hands all your life long? And so we see here the intent of Moses as concerning this text.

Now let us learn hereby, that we can never rule our lives to Gods liking, unless we first know him. For what a thing is it if we think we live uprightly, and in the meanwhile know not the God whom we ought to serve? For when is our life to be counted good and holy? When it is spent in the honoring of God: that is the final end of it. For if we know not what God it is, nor what his will is, well may we toil ourselves all our life long, and yet shall all of it be but confusion. It is as if a man should run gadding over the fields, he might well break his sins, and tire his whole body, and yet be never the further forward, but rather the swiftlier he runs, the further is he off from his journeys end. We see then that all things are out of order in the Popedom, because they be blind and ignorant, and wore not what God they serve, nor what Saint they should make their vows unto, as says their own proverb. Insomuch that when they have tired themselves with trotting up and down, they ought not where they be, but are new to seek in their imaginations, whereas to know God as he has showed himself to us in his word, that they might yield him the reverence which is dew unto him: they can no skill of it, neither is there any tidings of it among them. But as for us, if we intend to know the true service of GOD, and to obey him thoroughly, the first point that we must come unto, must be to know him. Indeed this lesson cannot be dispatched at this present, and therefore it shall suffice us to know in one word for a conclusion, that it is an inestimable treasure to us, when it pleases GOD to show himself unto us, so as we be sure that our religion is good, and that he allows it, and that we go not by opinion or by weaning, as these wretched beasts do, which suffer themselves to be lead by the nose, as not having any certain rule whereby to guide and to govern themselves. Mark that for one point.

And for the second point let us mark also, that for as much as our God is great and terrible; it behoves us to be humbled under his mighty hand, and to learn to walk in such wise in his fear, as we not only be abashed at his Majesty, but also besides our honoring of him with fear and reverence, we repair and resort unto him without any doubting that he is our father.

Now let us fall down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our sins, praying him to touch us still more and more, so as we may be made to know that we have nothing but stubbornness and naughtiness in us, and therefore may seek to him for the spirit of meekness, lowliness, and fear, that being reformed by his grace, we may seek to amend our whole lives according to his righteousness, and fight continually against our wicked lusts, until we be discharged of this mortal body, and be gathered up into his kingdom: Beseeching him further to grant us such grace as we may never cease to follow him whither so ever he calls us, and in the meanwhile to bear with our infirmities, till he have rid us quite and clean of them: and that for as much as we have now our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the end of the law, and the substance and truth of the Sacraments that he has given us, it may please him to grant us the grace to be so washed in our hearts through the power of the holy Ghost, as all our filthiness may be purged and cleansed, so as in the end we may be wholly transformed into his glory. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The 73rd Sermon, which is the fifth upon the tenth Chapter

17 For the Lord &c.

18 Who does right to the fatherless and widow, and loves the stranger to give him food and raiment.

19 Therefore love the stranger: for you yourselves have been strangers in the land of Egypt.

20 Thou shalt fear the Lord your God, and serve him, and stick to him, and swear by his name. He is your praise, he is your God, who has done those great and terrible things for you, which your eyes have seen.

We saw yesterday, that to have a right zeal and affection in serving GOD, we must be sure that the religion which we hold of, is good and allowed of him. For so long as we stand in doubt, it is impossible for us to go on with a free courage: we shall always go limping and as constrained: and if there be any earnest mind in us, the same proceeds of an insensibleness, and not for that we be given in good earnest to serve the GOD whom we know not. And therefore we must be well and duly instructed, ere we can be disposed to do well. And that is the cause why Moses said expressly here, that the GOD which uttered himself by the Law, and showed himself before to the Patriarchs, is the God of Gods, and that there is not any other to be fought: insomuch that although we were very well disposed, and that we were never so full of devotion (as they say:) yet should all that ever we were able to do be nothing worth, without faith. Therefore we must be sure and know, that we do not anything in vain, not at all adventure: but that we follow Gods will, and that he likes well of our doings.

Now Moses having told the people, that this Law was the Law of the living God; adds now further, that he is great, strong, and terrible. For we see how men take leave to despise God, and oversette themselves so much in their pride and presumption, as they cannot be brought to any subjection. To the end therefore that men should not daily with such a Lord, he says expressly that the God which willed his Law to be published unto them at that time is great, mighty, & dreadful. His terming of him Great, is to show what honor is due to him. His terming of him strong or mighty, is to withhold men from standing against him. And his terming of him terrible or dreadful, is to make us know that if he do but touch us with his hand, we must needs be undone. Therefore let us beware we despise him not: and when he calls us before his Majesty, let us tremble and quake for fear, that we may come with right humility. Thus do we now see Moses meaning. And therefore let us mark, that if we will direct our lives aright, we must have pure doctrine, that our religion may be grounded upon Gods truth, so as we may be sure that the doctrine which we process, is infallible, & therewithal we must beware that when we know God, we set not light by him, but that our knowing of him do bring a lowliness with it, so as we submit ourselves wholly to the honoring of him that is so high and incomprehensible, before whom the very Angels themselves do tremble. You see then how the thing which we have to mark, is that men shall never know God until they have gotten such feeling of the infinite glory that is in him, as makes them to stoop, yea & to make none account at all of themselves, that they may give over themselves wholly to the honoring & serving of him. But this is very yll put in ure. For even they that make greatest boast of their profiting in the Gospel, can skill to babble well enough, & they bear themselves in hand that they be jolly fellows, when they can prattle at pleasure, though it be without any reverence at all. And we see how the holy scripture is shamefully abused nowadays by a number of men's discoursing as it were but of a fable, or to show the fineness of their wit, by ranging into curious and unprofitable questions. Thus you see how Gods word is abused nowadays at teens pleasures, without any fear or reverence, for want of considering that which Moses tells here, that is to wit, that when we resort unto God, we must bethink us of the dreadful Majesty that is in him, that it may bridle us and hold us in subjection to him, and make us yield him such honor, as to be abashed at his speaking to us, until we have conceived what he said to us: & upon the knowledge thereof, to be ready and forward in obeying the same, without any gainsaying. And so you see what we have to gather upon this text, where he said that the God which has uttered himself by the Law, is great & terrible.

Certain it is that GOD intends not to drive us away from him, but rather to win us to him by gentleness. But yet must we be fain to be tamed, because of the pride that is in us least we grow bold to offend him and cannot find in our hearts to be inured to his yoke, than the which there is not anything more hard for us to do. We must (I say) be first subdued by the fear or terror that Moses speaks of here, before we can conceive Gods goodness. But yet must it be so tempered, as we shun not his good instruction, he be so dismayed as to refuse Gods word out of hand; but as it may be as a preparative, to make us good scholars, to draw our wits to such a teachableness, as all that ever we have of nature may be done away, and nothing may hinder us to receive his doctrine without gainsaying, but that his word (besides that we love it) may also be revered at our hands, and we follow it by submitting ourselves to it always and in all cases.

Now after that Moses has said so, he adds that God has no respect of persons, nor receives any reward. Whereas he said that he has no respect of persons, his meaning is that there is no favor to be had at his hand for the things that men are willingly moved with. For this word Person betokens the outward appearance. It is not taken here nor in any other places of the scripture, for that which we mean by the word person when we say, Look here is one person, Look here are two persons: but it is taken for riches, poverty, birth, nobility, or honor. All things therefore that carry an outward show before men, to move us to favor them or to hate them, to honor them or despise them, all those things (I say) are comprehended under the word Person, for they be but as visors. And after that manner is it said that God accepts no man's person. To what purpose now does Moses speak thereof? It is because that the great ones perceiving themselves to be born out by the world, think they may do as much before God, & thereupon become proud. If a man have once won credit, so as me dare not open their mouths against his misbehavior, but he dashes them out of countenance as many as stand against him: he bears himself in hand that he may bear as great sway with God, & thereupon plays the prince among them. That is the cause why a number overshoot themselves, & cast away all fear of God. For when they see men fear them & stand in awe of them, or when they see men commend them and savor them: Then they think they have won the goal, then they fall to triumphing, & they bear themselves in hand that they should no more be called to account. Now because men overshoot themselves after that fashion: Moses summons them to gods judgment, which is done according to truth, after which manner S. Paul speaks of it where he expounds this same saying, that God has no respect of persons. He judges truly (said he) according to the deed & according to righteousness, so as men must not think they shall fare ever the better for their alleging this or that.

Furthermore he signifies therewithal, that God is not contented with ey service, but has respect to the trueness of the heart, & not to the outward seeming of things, as is said in the first book of Samuel. And so we have to mark, that although a man be great to the worldward, yet he must not lift up his head or his neck against God. For they shall gain nothing by it, because all that greatness of the world, is but as smoke before him. And on the other side they that are underlings, must not think that God will bear with them the more for that, as they now and then move mortal men to compassion thereby. Therefore away with all these things that muster before our eyes, & whereby we be moved to love or hatred: for all this is neither here nor there before God: When we come before him, the first thing that he will look upon, is our hearts: and although they be now wrapped up, and (to our own seeming) we have lurking holes to hide us in: yet shall all be laid open. Therefore let us not beguile our fates in that behalf. Again, let us consider, that God will judge according to the truth of the deed. We may well face out matters for a while, as we do because we be naturally given to hypocrisy: but all that paintings and all that gay colors that we pretend as now, shall be wiped quite & clean away when we come once before God. Therefore let us walk uprightly & with a pure heart, & in especially let us rule all our works by his law, knowing that he has no respect of persons, & lay bridle us all. Let such as are in authority & of power to grieve inferior & weaker force, forbear to do so. And on the other side let the weaker bear in mind, that God will not fail to judge them for all that, because he is not an acceptor of persons: & therefore let us bring nothing with us but righteousness & soundness of conscience before him, for nothing will pass for payment but only that.

It is not without cause, that Moses adds yet further, that God takes no rewards. If a man ask us whether God be like mortal judges that will be corrupted with bribes & money: truly there is none of us all but will say no: yea and it is such a blasphemy to say otherwise, that even the wickedest person that are would abhor it. For they would say, what has God to do with gold and silver? Is God corruptible? But yet for all that, wee cease not to deem that thing of him which we know to be false. And how so? Because that as we see that worldly judges are corrupted, insomuch that if a man grease them my hand, they will suffer themselves to be carried away, and whereas they had done him wrong before, they will now do him right, & they be to be bound & changed every way: we bear ourselves in hand that God will be dealt with after the same manner. We will not speak it with open mouth: but surely men would never be so bold to do evil, if they did not transfigure God, & bear themselves in hand that he is pliable, & such a one as will be won by rewards. But let us come to the ordinary custom of all ages. What is the means wherewith men think to pacify God in the Popedom, but by setting up of tapers, by burning of perfumes, & by doing such other pretty trifles? It seems to them that he should hold himself contented with such payments, as if a man brought a bribe to an earthly Judge to corrupt him & to win him with all. But this had not his first beginning in Popery. The Jews were deceived therewith. Also the heathen men had the same superstition, notwithstanding that some of them misliked it, I mean some of the whole booke we have, insomuch that they have cried out against it, saying: what intend you to do you wretched folk? When you have given yourselves to deceit, theft, open wrong, cruelty, extortion, & all manner of wickedness, you come by & by to reconcile yourselves unto God. And how? By bringing him some part of the bootie. But forasmuch as the guile of the Popedom is best known unto us, let us see what is done there. When a man has pilled & polled his fill, if he give some Cope to the Church, if he build some chapel, if he found some Masses, if he cause some puppets to be made, or if he do some other such gewgaw; that's a fellow alone, God is well recompensed at his hand, he needs not to doubt off the forgiveness of all his sins before God: If he do but offer him a piece of the bootie, he is well enough contented, his mouth is so stopt that he can demand no more. Indeed men will not lay thus, but yet is it so nevertheless. For whereof comes it that the wicked surmise all their wicked deeds to be covered, but of that they imagine themselves to have compounded with God, so as he knows not what to say any more, when they have once as it were bribed him after that sort with some present? Now then because the world does dally so with God, & bears itself in hand that it can agree with him for rewards: Moses said on the contrary, that God is not like mortal men, nor will yield a whit for all that: and therefore he would not have men to beguile themselves. For if we desire to be reconciled unto him hen we have offended him: there is none other way for us, but to cast ourselves down, and to come to him with a sorry heart for it. For as it is said in the psalm, that is the sacrifice which he accepts above all: And when he receives us into his favor, let us assure ourselves that it is for payments sake, which was made in the person of our lord Jesus Christ. Wherefore let us not presume to bring him anything of our own, but let us borrow elsewhere, that which we have not in ourselves: Yet for all this, it behoves us to hate sin, if we mean that God should admit us into his favor. Yea and we must condemn the evil that we know to be in ourselves, if we intend to be acquit of it. And therefore let us not come any more with our own vain fancies, upon hope to pacify God with such pelting trash, or by likening him to a corrupted judge, that will have his eyes blinded with rewards: let us not imagine any such thing in him, but let us walk soundly.

Now then we see how Moses intent was to bridle us, by showing us what the nature of God is: and he exhorts us to fear him because he is terrible. And again, for as much as he regards no mans person, let us put away all pride & presumption. Let the great ones know that they shall gain nothing by their stoutness, but that all creatures must stoop to him. Finally let us not think that when we have offended God, we shall please him again with this fond shift of offering him some amends for it. For he does so greatly abhor & loath sin, as he can by no means away with it, neither is there any payment in the world that can make satisfaction for it. What is to be done then, but to resort simply & plainly to our God, submitting ourselves unto him, & seeking nothing else at his hand but to be reformed by him, so as all that ever he mislikes may be corrected & cast down in us? Furthermore when as it is said God takes no rewards, we be done to understand, that (as much as in us lies) we defile the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is the only payment & satisfaction for our sins, when we be the bolder to sin under pretence of reconciling ourselves unto God. They (I say) that take such liberty to do evil, defile the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, as if they trampled it under foot. For to say that when we have done a fault, we may be discharged of it by bringing some ransom or recompense for it, were a plain declaration that we love not our gold & silver at all. If a man should break all law because he is sure he has to do with corrupt judges, whose favor he shall win his purse, and yet notwithstanding for all his offending after that sort, had no care how he wasted & consumed his money, men would say he were witless. But we have not any other means whereby to be reconciled unto God, than the only blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. Now then if we fall to lashing of it out after that fashion without discretion, is it not a token of too villainous contempt? Yes. And therefore let us learn to hold ourselves to that inestimable price that was paid for our ransom: let us learn (I say) to hold ourselves in the fear of God, so as we give not ourselves over unto evil. And therewithal let us learn also, to behave ourselves in such wise towards our neighbors, as the mighty grieve not the weak and feeble. For although we may scape in this world, yet when we come before the heavenly judge, we shall be punished double for our abusing of our power & credit after that fashion. According whereunto S. Paul warns masters that they should not misintreat their servants: for God (said he) judges without respect of persons: Whereby he shows, that such as are set in high estate & authority, ought to abstain utterly from all cruelty & pride. For why? They may well be served of the same sauce themselves. And it is not for them to think themselves to have the better hand because that as now they have that vantage & are in better degree: for all the geere shall be dasht, when it comes before God. Thus you see what we have to bear in mind.

Now for a further declaration he adds, that God does right to the fatherless, the widow and the stranger: & that God has a care of the stranger to give him clothing & food. Yea & he tells the Jews that they had been strangers in the land of Egypt, & therefore they ought to be mindful still of that state of theirs, that they might use all manner of gentleness towards strangers. This serves for the proof of the doctrine which I touched even now; that is to wit, that god has no respect of persons. And in that respect does Moses say, that the widows, fatherless, and strangers shall be vexed in this world, they shall have none to bear them out, men shall suffer the widows to be troubled, the fatherless shall be made a pray, strangers shall be laid open to all injuries, & no man shall withstand it. And why? For in as much as they bear no countenance in this world, nor have any kinsfolk or friends to maintain them: it seems that they may be put to that bearing of all things: that is the custom of the world. But contrariwise it is said here, that God is a defender of the fatherless, a maintainer of the widows, & a protector of strangers. This is utterly against the common custom of men. For (as I have said already) men are given to the pleasuring of such as may stand them in some stead again: Kinsfolk & friends will help one another: & in the meanwhile poor people are forsaken. But see here how God deals clean contrary way. When he sees men trust in their own stays, and in their own strength, he lets them alone, as if he should say to them, Very well, try what you can do of yourselves. For commonly when means are proffered us in this world whereby to help us, we despise God, & we bear ourselves in hand, that we may well enough forbear him. Not that we will so say; but for as much as few folk do call upon God when the world favors them: therefore does God also make no account of them. Behold, it is the widow, the stranger, and the fatherless, that are constrained to make their mone unto him; and when they have looked about them, they find no favor nor help among men. They shall be delayed withal, and although some fair promises be made them, all is but holy water of the court as they term it: insomuch that the poor souls ought not where to become. This kind of entreatance drives them to God, & he earkens to their sighs & complaints. And so we see, that by such examples, Moses has well confirmed the lesson which he had set down; namely that God respects no persons. For the things that are despised in the world; are precious in his sight: and whom men hold scorn to bestow a look upon; them does he give good care unto.

Since it is so, let us mark for the first point, that if we vex such as are without defense in the world, God will let himself as an adversary against us. And surely, were we well persuaded thereof, we would be more afraid to offend a poor fatherless child, a widow, or a stranger, than to offend those that are best friends, and are able to revenge themselves to the worldward. But what? Our unbelief bewrays itself in that behalf: insomuch that if there be a man that is rich, mighty and well propped up, we dare not withstand him. And although he have done us some wrong, yet we put it up meekly, & dare not complain of it, & much less dare we lift up our hand against him. But as for a poor man, we will not tarry till he have done us some wrong or outrage, we will be at host with him beforehand. For why? We fear not that he will be even us; he may not be so bold as once to murmur against us. And if he do, we can put a bar in his way. with who are you sir? He shall obtain no right in Law. And if he do, yet shall he have the worse end of the staff. Thus stand we in fear of men if they be armed with any power, but in the meanwhile we fear not God, who declares himself to be the defender of all poor folks that are destitute of help. If we believed the holy scripture, surely this only one saying of Moses would more abash us, than all the worldly considerations that could befall us. On the contrary part, when we be so bold in troubling poor folks; it is a token that we believe not any whit of all that is contained in the holy scripture, and that we be worse than heathen folk: And yet for all that, it is the common fashion of the world. But hereby it appears, that nowadays unbelief overflows the whole earth, like a water flood. Indeed it is a horrible thing: but yet is it so, & it cannot be denied. What is to be done then? Let us lock into ourselves. If the Arms of a common weal or of a prince be let upon a house, or upon a piece of land, no man dares presume into it, for it were a breaking of his allegiance and not a private offence. Behold, God sets his arms or badge upon the widow, the fatherless, and the stranger, & he tells us that he has taken them into his protection. Now if a man fall to troubling of them, & deal outrageously, with them: is it not an open despising of God, and a defying of him, as it were to bid him battail? Indeed we will not take it so, but God will not refer himself to our vain opinion and fancy. Whatsoever come of it, let us mark well, that although the widows be shaken off as to the worldward, though fatherless children be put to the spoil, though poor strangers be scorned and trodden under foot: yet does God set nevertheless store by them, but has his eyes continually upon them, and will surely maintain them. And therefore unless we purpose to have God our adversary, and that he should show himself to be our deadly enemy; let us abstain from all wrong dealing, extortion outrage, deceit, and malice, towards those that are friendless in respect of the world, and utterly destitute of all shifts, and after a sort set open to the spoil, as I said before. Let us not oppress them, least God set himself against us, & show himself to be their continual shield. Mark well this first fruit which we have to gather of the said lesson that was given to the Jews in old time, to the end that if we fear not the punishment of men, we may yet be afraid of the determinate sentence that God sets down: which is, that he will not over slip the wrongful troubling of poor folk, without showing of himself to be on their side, and that he has taken their quarrel in hand, according to this saying, that he will do them right.

He says not, only that he loves them, or that he pities them; but that he will do them right, Now then, if we see that the judges on earth do but mock poor folks when they come to them for succor, and that instead of helping them they do but scorn them, let us understand that those Judges must come before the heavenly Judge, who will surely punish both those whom he had put in commission to defend poor folk, and also those that have abused the liberty which they had in this world, by doing the more evil by cause they saw they might scape unpunished. God therefore looks upon them, and yet makes as though he saw them not, for a time; so as if men misentreat poor folks, be they widows, fatherless, or strangers, indeed he sets not himself against their doings at the first, but when he has let them take their pleasure a while, then lays he his hand upon all such as have passed their bounds in doing outrage to the feeble and little ones; and specially upon such as have not done their office when they were in authority to do Justice, nor have succored poor souls when they were oppressed. For God must needs redress such enormities, and show such persons their negligence, by setting himself against them, as against the corrupters of the law when it was put into their hand. And so you see what Moses meant, in saying that God does right to such as are wrongfully trodden under foot, and are not regarded in the world.

By the way, we have also great comfort to receive of this text: so that if we be destitute of worldly helps, our God here takes us into his tuition; yea and he tarries not till we come unto him, but tells us that he is our defense, and that he will be our maintainer. Now then although poor folk be wronged, and have never so much violence offered them, so as they be in manner trodden under foot: have they not wherewith to content themselves, since they know that God looks upon them with pity and will in the end stretch forth his mighty hand to succor them? True it is that they must be exercised with patience so long as pleases God: but yet if they be not too unthankful, they have well wherewith to content themselves, in that they be sure that God never forgets them, but succors them, & keeps a register of all the wrongs that are done unto them, to bring the to account in time convenient. Howbeit to the intent we may enjoy this comfort, let us note also, that it is not enough for men to be fatherless or strangers, or for women to be husbandless; but we must also be truly distressed before God, so as we humble ourselves & resort to him for rescue when men afflict us wrongfully. For if a stranger be prouder than he that is at home in his own country and among his friends: it is in vain for him to trust the God will be the defender of his welfare. When a stranger is so lordly, he will take more upon him than the panic that has wherewith to help himself: he may got seek his maintenance elsewhere than at Gods hand; for he shall not find it there. But if a stranger perceiving himself destitute of all worldly help, & yet that God is on his side, do call upon him & put himself wholly into his hands; surely then shall he find at length, that Gods promising to do right to the stranger, is not in vain. If a widow play the she devil, in troubling and vexing of other folks and there is more to do with her than with a dozen men: let her not think that God will trouble himself for her. But if a widow be helpless, & behave herself meekly, & seek no further than to live peaceably with all men: such a one will the heavenly Judge receive into his protection. In like case stands it with the fatherless. If they give themselves to naughtiness, shaking off all yoke, & become unthrift in spite of God & the world; they beguile themselves if they think that God favors them, under pretence of this doctrine. And therefore let us mark well, that this is set down expressly for such as suffer afflictions patiently, & avenge not themselves, but put their case into Gods hands. Although then that such folk be scorned of the world, and pointed at with the finger, and triumphed at by such as tread them under foot: yet does God take their case in hand, and will surely show it how long so ever he delay. Wherefore let us learn hereby, to comfort ourselves in our afflictions: which is, by being tamed and made to stoop, so as we seek to be pitied at Gods hand, & refer our whole case unto him, casting all our cares & sorrows into his lap. And again, let us be well advised, that although the world give us leave to do evil, so as we may vex & trouble men at our pleasure; yet shall we not scape Gods wrath: well may we wrangle with him, but it shall not boot us at all. Thus you see what we have to remember upon that text.

To be short, let us mark, that here Moses intended to commend equity and uprightness unto us. I say he shows us how our Lord will be served at our hands: namely by behaving ourselves plainly with our neighbors, so as we offer no violence or wrong to anybody, & specially to the weaker sort, and to such as have no maintenance at mans hand. God then will not have us to serve him with Ceremonies, but we must deal justly and uprightly, so as we yield every man his right. That is the true serving of God, as showed us oftentimes in the holy scripture. And from thence also is it, that the Prophets have drawn these sayings, That God requires mercy & not sacrifice; That God will have us to live among our neighbors without doing harm to anybody; That he will have at violence to cease; & that he will have all cruelty & deceit to be far from us. The Prophets have good store of such exhortations: & the fountain where out of they have fetched them, is this doctrine of Moseses, that God will not be served with I ought not what superstitions as men are wont to do, who use much pomp & gloriousness in serving God with fair temples, goodly pictures, gay imagery, sweet perfumes, ringing of bells, setting up of tapers, & such other pelting trash. They bear themselves in hand that God delights in such things, & that when they play upon their Organs, they make him to dance as if he were a little babe. But let not us busy our heads about such small trifles, for God will be served with truth, righteousness, & soundness of heart. Again he will have us to endeavor to serve our neighbors: for we have nothing else that is worth the bringing unto him: but he will have us to communicate together, so as every of us according to his ability, do strain his wits to succor them that have need of help, & in any wise to beware that we take not liberty to do any hurt or harm to any body. Now then let us mark well the mean of serving our God according to his will, that we transform him not by our vain folly, by bearing ourselves in hand, that he is well honored when we bring in our own pelting trash, as it were to dazzle his eyes withal, which thing is impossible.

Now after that Moses has showed that God is terrible, and that it is not for us to dally with so great a Lord, who can well enough hamper us if we rebel against him; and therefore that it behoves us to live uprightly, & to pity the poor, & to succor them that are oppressed, so as we offer no cruelty nor tyranny to the weaker sort, & to such as are destitute of friends to support them: now after all this he adds, that God is the praise of his people. And it is to the end to win their hearts by gentleness & friendly dealing. And herein we see the God omits not anything whereby to draw us to him, but bury after he has used threatening & put us in fear, to make us to stoop & to stand in awe of him, he comes like a father that should flatter his child, & uses mild & gentle words, rather than his fatherly authority. Thus you see how our Lord labors by all means to win us; & therefore so much the more to blame are we, and less to be excused, if we cannot be bowed neither by fair means nor by soul, seeing our Lord tries all the ways to the wood, to draw us to him. Therefore does Moses purposely say, That God is the praise of his people, & that he had done great & terrible things for their sakes. For this cause he said, first of all that God is their praise. And by that speech he means, that when we once know God, and he has showed himself to us by his word; his will is that we should glorify him. Mark that for one point.

Secondly he puts the people in remembrance of the great miracles that had been done for them in their going out of the land of Egypt. For they were as marks or tokens of Gods goodness, so as the people could not but be convicted of unthankfulness, forasmuch as God had uttered himself as familiarly as was possible, to show himself favorable to Abraham's posterity. To be short, we see how God not only uses his dominion & right of sovereignty, which he has over us to make us subject to his law and commandments: but also comes to us as a father, and utters as mild and gracious lovingness towards us, as can be; and all to the end to break the hardness of our hearts. Insomuch that if we be not moved at his majesty, or if we yield him not such reverence as we ought to do in respect of his sovereignty over us: at least wise yet ought we to be meekened, seeing he stoops to us, & comes down from his peace unto us, as if he should say, Well sirs, assure yourselves I am your father, and therefore I pray you consider well the good that I have done you, and whereby I have witnessed my favor towards you, and let it move you at least wise to love and serve me. That is the very principal meaning of Moses.

But yet by the way, let us mark also that God is never duly honored at our hands, unless we lay all our glory upon him. For when he is termed our praise, by that word he bereaves us of all glory, & shows us that there is not anything in us, whereof we ought to be proud. Therefore let a man set as much store by himself as he lists, yet in the end he shall come to shame, so as he shall perceive there is not one drop of goodness in himself. What is to be done then? Let us resort right forth to our God, to seek al goodness in him, & let us glorify him for showing himself so liberal towards us, that we may also make our boat thereof, according as it is said by Jeremy, that the rich man must forget his riches, and the strong man his strength, & the wise man his wisdom, and all that ever is of man must be beaten down, that we may fetch our glory at Gods hand, knowing that it is he that executes righteousness, judgment, and mercy. Thus you see what we have to remember in this word, where Moses said that God is the praise of his people. And if we be not moved by that which is told us in the holy scripture, at least wise yet let us open our eyes, and let the often experience of Gods benefits frame us to such humility as we may not presume to commend ourselves any more, but only have our mouths open to praise and magnify the things that we shall have received at Gods hand. For since he shows us so many ways, that all our welfare consists in him, and that it comes only of him, if we will shut our eyes at it like a sort of blockheads, and vouchsafe not ne list not to hold ourselves to the thing that is thoroughly known and apparent; surely we shall be convicted of bereaving God of his praise, & of bringing him to nothing as much as in us lies, for his benefits are infinite towards us. And therefore let us learn by this lesson, to acknowledge the benefits thoroughly which God has bestowed upon us: for they be a sufficient business to keep us occupied. If we gather our wits about us to consider Gods goodness towards us, we shall find that we ought to seek our whole praise no where else than only in him. And for that cause does Moses add, It is he that has, done the great and terrible things which your eyes have seen.

As if he should say, God needs not to seek here & there for record, or for judges to arraign you: for (spite of your teeth) it shall be proved to your faces, that your God is great, mighty, and terrible. For you were the miserablest creatures in the world, you were in bondage like brute beasts; and your God loved you so dearly, that he has stretched out his arm against the Realm of Egypt, that stately & excellent Realm, that realm so renowned, wherein all the wisdom of the world was enclosed, insomuch that he has made more account of your welfare, than of the Realm. Since it is so, know ye that it is not for you to glory any more of yourselves, but to glory only of him. Assure yourselves that look how many benefits you have received at his hand, so many records have you to bewray your lewdness and unthankfulness, if you acknowledge them not unto him. And so by the example that is set us down here, let us learn to acknowledge gods gracious goodness, & to lay it up in mind, and to make a good memorial thereof, & to call it often to remembrance, that we may be provoked thereby to yield all glory unto God, & to confess that for our parts we be silly and wretched creatures, in whom there is nothing but condemnation, and therefore there belongs nothing to us but wrath, & it is only God to whom all the glory & praise of our welfare pertains. Wherefore let it suffice us that he is ours, and that having given himself unto us, he vouchsafes also to make his benefits common unto us.

Now let us fall down in the pretence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us to perceive them throughly, and that therewithal we may so know the greatness of his majesty, as it may move us to submit ourselves to the obeying of him, and draw us to fetch subjection, as we may frame ourselves to his will, and be no more entangled and wrapped in worldly things; but that we may be so rid of them, as all our seeking may be to dedicate ourselves wholly unto him, that he may acknowledge & accept us for his people, & have his hand always wretched out to succor us at our need. And that in the meanwhile we may patiently bear all the adversities that he shall send us for the trial of our obedience, & so apply ourselves thereunto, as we may not fail to take comfort in his goodness, and to rest upon the same, till he have made us to feel the things perfectly, whereof he has given us a taste already in this transitory life. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people & nations of the earth. &c.

On Wednesday the 18th of September 1555
The 74th Sermon, in which the last verse of the tenth Chapter is expounded, and this is the first Sermon upon the eleventh Chapter

22 Your fathers went down into Egypt, in number threescore and ten souls: and now the Lord your God has made you in multitude as the stars of the sky.

The eleventh Chapter

1 Love the Lord your God therefore, and keep his appointments, Ordinances, Laws, and Commandments forever.

2 And consider you this day (for I speak not to your children which have neither known nor seen [them]) the instruction of the Lord your God, his greatness, his mighty hand, and his stretched out arm,

3 And his wonders and works which he did in the midst of Egypt, unto Pharaoh king of Egypt and all his Land:

4 And what he did to the host of the Egyptians, unto their horses & Chariots, when the Lord brought the waters of the red sea upon their faces when they pursued, and how the Lord destroyed them unto this day.

I have already showed the meaning of Moses, how that by rehearsing the wonder that GOD had wrought for the delivering of his people out of captivity he showed the Jews that they ought to have been the more confirmable to him, in respect of the favor and love which he had showed to them at all times. For he had always showed by his doing, that his promising to take Abraham & all his offspring into his protection, was not in vain. You see then an evident proof that God having received Abraham's offspring into his free favor, has also confirmed it by deeds, & experience. And thereupon it is to be concluded, that if that people had not been altogether froward, they ought of reason to have served God. And that is the point that Moses shot at. Consider with yourselves (said he) if you be not bound to give yourselves wholly to the obeying of your God. For he has multiplied you as the stars of the sky. Through his gracious goodness you are become so great a number, that even you yourselves may be astonished at it. To be short, if you look upon your body, that is to your state; you cannot but see such a wonderful favor of your God, as you could never have once looked for or hope. Since it is so, there is now no excuse for you if you cannot find in your hearts to glorify his name, seeing he has showed himself so good & merciful toward you. That the sum of the matter that Moses intended to set down.

And he speaks expressly of the stars of the sky, because of the promise. For God speaking to his servant Abraham, showed him in a vision the multitude of the stars, which is infinite. Even as their be past reckoning (said god) so also shall your seed be. Now then the meaning of Moses in this text is, that Gods saying so was not in vain, & that Abraham was not disappointed of his hope in resting altogether upon the promise: for we see the thing performed before our eyes. And this is well worth the noting. For if God have done us any good, we will indeed for manner sake say it was he that did it: but to be thoroughly persuaded of it in our heart, that is a very hard thing. Therefore is it requisite in respect of such rudeness, that we should be condemned by Gods word, to the end we may the better consider of his hand & power. As for example: if we had never read any whit of holy scripture, & yet notwithstanding god should have delivered us from some adversity: to say the truth, our own natural wit would put us in mind; to think ourselves indicted to God for the fame: But when we be exercised in the holy scriptures, and have seen there that God reserves to himself the dues of death, & that it is in him to succor us, yea even after a strange fashion when all seems to be utterly forlorn; so as if we call upon him, he will hear our sighs: the performance therefore makes it the easier for us to conceive his goodness, because we be taught beforehand, the same things which we come to find by experience. For why? The word that went before, is as a lamp to give us light. Of our own nature we be as it were blind. True it is that God enlightens us by his holy spirit: but yet are we still in darkness & cannot see two fingers breadth before us. But when God teaches us by his word; that is as a lamp to guide us & chew us our way. Therefore let us mark well that to profit ourselves by the benefits, God bestows upon us, it is good, yea & needful for us to be put in mind of his promises, & to compare them together God had promised it; & now he has performed it: here we see a testimony that he is always faithful in his sayings, & that a man may safely rest upon his truth. That is the thing which Moses shows us in this text, in that he speaks not simply of the great multitude where into the people had been increased, but also said that God had multiplied them as the stars of the sky, to the intent that every should think upon the promise which was universally known among them, & thereby confirm themselves, inasmuch as God had so kept touch with his servant Abraham: & every man consider thus in himself, Indeed we ought to receive gods simple & single word; although the effect of it were not seen. But now that Gods hand & his mouth go jointly together; so as he has chewed a true proof of his presence before our eyes, and that he meant not to disappoint the hope of his servants; we know that our God has a care of us, & forget us not at such time as we were in the land of Egypt. For the time of the peoples abode there was as a kind of burial in their graves, so as it might have seemed that all Gods promises had been quite dashed. When he drew Abraham out of the land that he was born in, he said unto him, I give you all this land from one side to another, to you & to your offspring forever. And yet for al this, yet see how Abraham did but sojourn there as a stranger: he was hunted & fain to fleet from place to place, & he trotted up and down like a poor man that had not a corner to hide him in. The like befell to his son Isaac, Jacob was banished thence during all the flower of his youth, & when he returned thither again, he was fain to remove oftentimes in his old age, and in the end God conveyed him away into Egypt. Thus was that house as it were broken up & clean banished out of the country. And where is the land of Chanaan which was the heritage that God had promised them? They were bereft of it. Indeed Jacob caused his body to be conveyed thither again when he was dead: but yet did the people abide still in Egypt, & god seemed to have mocked the in saying, you shall inherit this land. But when god brought them again out of the captivity & cruel tyranny wherein they were, it was as a rising again from the dead, & as a taking of them again out of their graves. So then, that people are exhorted in this text, to understand that they ought to impute this redemption of theirs to the promise that had been made long time before.

And we on our side have generally a very profitable lesson: which is this. As often as we fall asleep and mind not Gods benefits so sufficiently as might make us to perceive his working & power: we must resort to his promises, that they may be as a light unto us to show us the good way. Let that serve for one point. And now by the way, we see how God uttered his power in multiplying the people after that fashion. For who would have looked that of threescore & ten persons there should have issued seven hundred thousand & above? It is incredible (if we look no further than to the course of nature) that in three hundred years, threescore & ten persons should increase & multiply to so great a number. Had there come of them ten thousand or twenty thousand, it might well have been imputed to the course of nature. But when it came to a hundred thousand, or a two or three hundred thousand, yea & to so huge a number as seven hundred thousand; all men must needs be abashed at it, & it was not to be thought ever it could have been possible. But we must not measure Gods power by our wit: for it was his will to work after that strange & unaccustomed fashion, that men might be driven to think it to be his work. For if God work after an ordinary manner with us, we be so unthankful, that we take the thing to happen by chance, or by our own policy, or by some mans favor, or other mean which we have sound in the world! & we bereave God continually of his honor. Indeed we will not say that we purpose any such thing; nay, we protest the clean contrary: but yet for all that men are so wickedly given, that they always deface Gods power & goodness to the uttermost that they can: God therefore is fain to bring us perforce to the acknowledging of his works, so as we must be compelled to confess it is he which helps & succors us. Let us mark well then, that when he multiplied his people after that sort, he meant to work a miracle that had never been looked for, to the intent that men should no more doubt that it was he that spake unto Abraham,& that he had not in vain promised him to become the defender of him & of all his offspring. Nowadays there are a sort of scoffers, who to make all things doubtful, will cavil after this manner; Is it possible that in so short a space of time, threescore & ten persons should grow to so huge a number as a seven hundred thousand? Is it possible? Yea, & if that people had been increased but after an ordinary manner, what would they say then? Came not this of other men? & should we then say that god governs us? Why? the order of nature affords as much. After that manner would the mockers prate. And thereby we see the lewdness, is in me. For if God go not beyond the ordinary course of nature, they have no sight at all to discern his hand, but (to their seeming)it is fortune or their own wisdom, or some inferior mean of the world. And on the other side, if God lift up his mighty hand, & do a thing beyond mans capacity, and such as men would have thought could never have been done: then will they say, how come this to pass? And they could find in their hearts even to deface gods power quite & clean, under color that it surmounts their reason & capacity. But for our part, let us learn to do god so much honor, (for so he well deserves) as not to judge of his works after our own fancy specially when they be miraculous.

And here we have as it were a looking glass, wherein to see how God raises up his Church, according also to this his speaking of it by his prophet Esay, Look back to the quarry of stole (said he) where out of you were hewn, have an eye to the womb of your mother Sara. Look upon Abraham your father: was not he alone? yes, & yet have I now made you many in number, as the thing itself declares. In that place God likens Sara's womb to a quarry of stone. See here (said he) from whence you become. How is it possible that such a multitude of people as you be now grown unto, should be drawn out of one quarry of stone?

And yet notwithstanding, from thence have I fetched you, all of you are come from out of that spring. For as for your father Abraham, what was he? A silly old man foreworn and broken with years. Who would have looked for such a people from out of him? Now then, learn to know that it is I which have so multiplied you, and that you be beholden to me, for all that ever you have. Thus you see that the thing which we have to gather, is that when God calls his Church & gives it a being, his working is after such a sort in that behalf, that (as said Saint Paul in the first chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians) it may well be said that it is he of whom we have our being. And his meaning is not that we were but created of him as mortal men only: but that he has gathered us together to be his people, and that he was inclined to the doing thereof, without any likelihood given on our behalf. Therefore let us first and foremost bear well in mind, to be as it were astonished at the power that God has showed so as we may reverence the thing that passes our small capacity. And therewithal let us understand, that the manner of Gods raising up of his Church, is, that where nothing was before, but men reckoned that all should have gone to wrack: there men are at their wits end to see how things fall out clean contrary, as we find by often experience. True it is that the people which receive the doctrine of the Gospel, are but a handful in comparison of them that refuse it: but yet was it not thought, that things should ever have spread so far abroad as they have done. For when God stirred up the poor Fryer, yea even out of a Cloister or cell: who would have thought, that from thence the Gospel should have been spread far and wide, and that so many folk would have submitted themselves unto it? Again we see that although the whole world have conspired to oppress this doctrine, and that the power of the enemies thereof be such, as they be like enough to swallow it up quite and clean: yet does not God cease to augment his Church continually. It is seen what cruelty is executed against all her children: & yet notwithstanding she holds on still. Seeing then that in our time God has gone beyond all hope and all imagination of man: let us understand that he has renewed the remembrance of that which is spoken here by Moses: namely that out of nothing, it has pleased him to raise up a kingdom to himself in this world, insomuch that at this day there is as great a number of his, as ever there was at any time. If a man compare the children of Abraham, with such as have some knowledge of the Gospel nowadays, it is certain that the number of the present sort is far the greater. And therefore let us learn to magnify the goodness & power of our God. And to the end that Gods glory may be the greater, let us understand that we come up of nothing, & let it be considered it is he which has stretched out his hand, so as all must be fathered upon him, and he must be acknowledged to be the author of all. Thus you see what we have to mark upon that place.

Furthermore the people are warned, not to glory of their own greatness, as if it were said whatsoever you possess, you have obtained it at Gods hand, and therefore do him homage for it with all humility. Therefore when so ever our Lord increases us, so as we have greater prosperity than we looked for: let it not blind us, nor shut up our eyes, but let us always remember to have our eyes upon Gods hand, who had promised to have pity upon us, & has also showed us it by experience. And so you see in effect what we have to mark, where Moses speaks of the increase of church. For like as God raises up a people where none was to be seen before: so also is it his will to repair his church again with his own hand. And to be short, the holy scripture shows us, forasmuch as the Church is the spiritual kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ: he will also work after a marvelous fashion, when the case concerns the preservation thereof. Therefore let us trust in him by all means. Let us not doubt but that he which multiplied the offspring of Abraham as the stars of the sky, is as well able to do the like with us still at this day: & therefore let us not be afraid but that God can well skill how to set up his Church again, when it seems at the point to be utterly overthrown. And this is accomplished chiefly in our Lord Jesus Christ, as the scripture shows us. For all that ever was before his coming was but a shadow of things that are nowadays in their perfection. Therefore when the whole world seems unto us to be utterly void of believers & that all is forlorn & as a vast wilderness, let us look up to the stars of heaven, & both consider and hope that our Lord which did once raise up so huge a multitude out of threescore & ten persons, can likewise do as much for his church at this day. And when he has done it, let it not be unto us as a dream, but let us be amazed & astonished at it, forasmuch as it shall have surmounted our natural wit and reason. But let us come now to the conclusion Moses makes. Therefore love the Lord your God, keep his Laws, his statutes, his commandments, his rights, & his ordinances, even forever. Hereby we be done to understand, that when we once know Gods grace, we must be the more inflamed to give ourselves wholly to the serving of him, accordingly as S. Paul found not a more vehement & effectual persuasion, that that same where he said, Brethren I beseech you & adjure you by the pity & mercy which God has showed towards you. Because S. Paul saw men flow & negligent, yea & even the faithful, (for it is they to who he directs his doctrine) have need to be quickened up & pricked forward: therefore to give the more liveliness to his exhortation, he takes this for his ground, & said: brethren, I beseech you by the mercifulness of God. As if he should say how hard hearted so ever you be, yet must the great number of the gracious good turns which God has done for you, have some power to mone you, & to set your hearts on fire. Were your hearts as cold as ice, yet must you needs be moved, & you cannot but feel how gracious and liberal your God has showed himself towards you. Now therefore when so ever we find not ourselves sufficiently disposed to serve God, but that we be held back and indered by the vanities of this world, and by our own fleshly lusts, let us put this saying of S. Paul's in ure: when we be entangled in our delights, let us come back again & say: what? Shall God have lost his labor in showing himself so good towards us? & shall we become unprofitable people towards him? We be his Vineyard, and he has dressed us, & we bring him forth no fruit but wild sower & bitter fruit, such as were able to choke one: & shall we by our naughtiness defeat the grace that God has showed towards us? After such manner ought every of us to rebuke himself, when we live not as we ought to do. But when instead of going forward, we go back, or else he weltering in our own idleness: let us bethink us of gods benefits, & keep a register or book of remembrance of them: & thereupon fall to concluding that there remains no excuse for us, if we make not some acknowledgement unto God, of the mercy that he has showed towards us. That was the thing Moses aimed at. Therefore love the lord your god (said he) seeing you know him to be such a one.

And further besides the thing that we have seen already, which is that the true performance of the law begins at the loving of God: here Moses tells us, that Gods intent is not to be feared like a prince that desires no more but to have his subjects to stand in awe of him, & therefore will not suffer any man so much as once to quench against him, but will have them to do all that he commands them: but that God comes to us after a more loving manner. Truly if we consider well what the princess of the earth are, they be but smoke or very worms of the earth: but yet are they to be honored, because god has printed his mark upon them. Albeit that they be nothing of themselves: yet are they so full of pride, their subjects must be fain to put it up quietly at their hands, though they would set their feet upon the throats of them. And they be so far of from considering themselves to be shepherds or herdsmen, or to owe any duty or good demeanor towards their people to their own seeming, the world was created lonely for themselves. They pass not for meek & quiet reverence: but they will needs have an enforced & constrained bondage. But behold, Our God whole majesty is so great, that even the Angels of heaven are fain to sink under it, even he I say stoops down unto us, & said, love me. He could have said, stand in fear of me, & tremble at my speech, or else you shall feel that there is such a glory in me, as you must needs be overwhelmed by it. Nay, he uses no such speech, but said: true it is that I am to be feared, for I have sovereign dominion over heaven and earth, & therefore it is not for any man to dally with me as with his fellow, for if he be so malapert with me, he cannot but go away with confusion. Now then, my desire is that men should reverence me: but yet would I also that you should come familiarly unto me, & that you should come boldly as to your father. And that is the cause why I require love at your hands as the chiefest thing that I like best of. Love me therefore, & show yourselves to bear me hearty good will. For my mind is not to draw you to me by constraint of fear, my mind is not to rule you like Oxen & asses. My intent is to hold you as my children, without exercising any tyrannical lordliness over you. I would have but a fatherly authority over you, & that you likewise should serve me with a childly love, & give yourselves wholly & obediently unto me. Thus see you that two points which we have to note in Moses concluding, that the people should love the everlasting their God. For if we will perform gods law well, we must first & foremost love him before all things. Well may we be busy with our feet & hands, so as we shall be blameless before men: & yet shall all be nothing, except God pale & our affections, and that we serve him with a good will, & with a free and unfeigned heart. That is the one point. The other is, that we must understand how God applies himself to us, & fashions himself to our capacity, in that his will is not that we should stand in fear & terror of him, but that we should rake him for our father, according to his calling of us, which is so gentle and so full of allurements, as though he would set up in his lap, because he has adopted us to be his children. That is the effect of the things which we have to remember here.

Now as touching that Moses adds, that men should keep gods observances, his statutes, his judgments, his rights, his ordinances, his commandments, & his decrees: I have declared already heretofore why he sets down so many words. For it had been enough for him to have said shortly, Keep the commandment of your god, you have his law, which is the certain rule, hold yourselves to that. But Moses thinking it not enough to have spoke simply after that manner, to the intent to express the contents of the law, & what doctrine we have to gather thereof, sets down Statutes, commandments, rights, ordinances, & observances. And why is that? To do us to understand, that there we have the full perfection of all holiness. We know that in all ages men have been tickle headed: & that their failing to serve god simply & purely, has sprung of this that every man would needs be casting of some piece or collop of his own making, to the things that God had commanded. And thereof come all the superstitions that are at this day in that world. The very ground (say I) from whence all the devilish superstitions wherewith gods service has been corrupted, is that men have not thought enough to have observed the things that God commanded, unless every man added somewhat more of his own devising. But now God to hold his people in awe, said thus: In my law you have rights, ordinances, statutes, &c. And to be short, when you have thoroughly examined the rule that I have given you, you shall find it perfect & without want of anything. Therefore play not the loose colts: but be contented to serve me simply, according to my will: & add not anything of your own brain. You see then that as well in this text as in other without number, (for you shall find at that left two hundred of the like) Moses endeavors to magnify Gods law, to the intent that men should not esteem it to be of insufficient authority, or but as able to teach us by halves: but that they should know it to be their duty to hold themselves wholly to it, so submitting themselves to the same, as they may give over their own wit, & not take upon them to be wise in their opinion, but ut only answer: Let GOD be obeyed, according to the prayers which he has commanded folk to make with this solemn protestation Amen, so as there may not be any replying at all to that which God has once uttered with his mouth. And that is the very cause why the word Keep, is set down here. For men will needs have many things to keep, and they bear themselves in hand, that they have kept the law very well, after what fashion so ever it be. But our Lord tells us that we have things enough to keep and to observe, in following his law, so as we need not to add anything to it.

Furthermore to the intent that the people may be the more moved, Moses confirming here the matter that we heard even now, said thus: Bethink you therefore: for it is not spoken to your children which have neither seen nor heard of it, but to you yourselves which are witnesses of the great miracles, mightfull works, and tokens which God showed in bringing you out of the land of Egypt, and specially in your passing of the red sea, where he wrought with a wonderful power. For what a thing was it that the sea shrunk aside to make you way to pass through it? And that afterward it swallowed up all your enemies, that followed you with so great puissance, that you thought yourselves utterly undone? You have seen those things with your eyes said he. What a thing were it then, if you should forget such wonderful works of God, and suffer them to vanish away? Might it be imputed to any ignorance? No, but to unthankfulness, & it were malicious spitefulness for you to tread the things so under foot, which God has showed unto you.

And whereas he said. It is not spoken to your children which have neither seen nor heard of it: He means that he speaks not of them as that be spoken afterward. True it is that at this day when we read the story of the deliverance that was wrought at that time, we ought to be moved at it. For it is an everlasting evidence of the care which God has had of his Church. And in the same we have a finely picture to show us how God draws us as it were out of the dungeon and gulf of death, by choosing us to be of his house, and therefore it behoves us to make our profit of the things that were done then, although we saw them not. But here Moses reasons thus by comparison. If I speak to your children (said he) yet were it their duty to make their profit of that things which they were taught: and although they have not seen the things with their eyes, yet ought this recording of them, to do them good. But as for you, you ought to be better advised in taking heed to the things that God has showed you. For your thanklessness is double, & much sorer shall your condemnation be, if you profit not by them. What can you allege for yourselves, if you give not yourselves wholly to the magnifying of such grace, that is to say if you honor not God, seeing he has bought you so dearly, and showed that he sets so great store by your welfare? Seeing that God has showed himself to be such a one towards you, what is your duty? Here we be put in mind that when our Lord has made us to find favor by experience, if we profit not by it to serve him with the better courage and earnestest zeal, it must of necessity come to account, & we must look for more horrible damnation in reward of such unthankfulness. But now let us see what we become the better by gods benefits. Has it not been sufficiently seen & perceived in our time how he has helped us at our need, & how he has stretched out his mighty hand? If every man would acknowledge for his own part, how many ways god has showed himself bountiful towards him, surely we should be at our wits end. Again, let us look upon the state of the Church in general. Has not god wrought after such a sort on all sides in our days, as if we be not very monsters, or at leastwise worse than brute beasts, we must needs perceive by his miracles, that he went to show here how he reigns in heave? But now let us see how every of us is stirred up thereby, to serve him. Nay it should seem we seek nothing else but towels to hid our eyes withal, and that we believe not the things which are & ought to be most apparent to us. Yet was not this doctrine uttered to no end. For if God have showed us by his deeds, that he dwells among us, & have reached out his hand from heaven, to prove if all power belongs unto him, and that he will be the savior of his church, & yet we believe it not, but play the blind buffards, and turn our backs upon him, shutting our eyes willfully when we should take most heed to consider in what wise that Lord has showed himself to be the father & savior, both of ourselves & of all that are his: what excuse will there be for us? You see then here is a lesson that touches us. For if ever God uttered himself: surely we of our time have seen such deeds of his, as are worthy of remembrance. And who men shall rehearse them a hundred years hereafter, (if the world endure so long) it is certain that they shall serve to make them ashamed that shall have heard them spoken of, so we may well say, (as is said by the prophets) that the strangeness of them shall make their ears to glow that shall hear of them: for that is the manner of speech which the Prophets use in such cases. And we have seen those things, and had experience of them. Now if the report of them in time to come, ought to move the people that shall be then: although they shall have had none other knowledge of them: ought not we much rather to be moved by them now presently? Ought they not to pierce our hearts? Must not Satan needs have utterly sorted us, when after such perceiving of gods benefits & power, we see nothing at all, but go on still & conceive nothing? Is such blockishness to be borne with? No verily. And therefore let us bethink ourselves, & consider well how god has wrought in gathering us together, & in that we can worship him purely as he requires. Who is he, (be he a citizen born or a stranger,) which has not cause to say, look how my god has so uttered himself to me, as if I had seen his hand come down from heaven to me in some visible shape: For what hope had they which are here townsmen born, to be either in liberty, or to be but even a mean people? Insomuch as it seemed that all should have gone to wrack, & come to utter ruin here this time. As touching the Gospel, this title was but a hellish gulf of superstitions and devilishness, (as was to be seen everywhere) and all manner of abuses, idolatries & practices of Satan did so reign in it, as there was no likelihood that ever there should have been any rooms for Gods grace: And therefore those whom God has visited so lovingly, and to whom he has vouchsafed to come home into their houses to seek them out, have good cause to glorify him: And as for them that are come out of foreign countries, and are gathered together here as it were into one flock; what can they say, but that our Lord has performed that thing towards them at this day, which he spake so long ago by his prophet Esay: namely that he would make chariots and wagons trot space through the world, to bring folk from all coasts to serve & worship him in his Church? Now then if we look not up at such things, surely it will be no excuse or shift for us, to say: I thought not on these things, because they were not known to me: for God shows us the apparently enough, so as we need but to open our eyes to see them. Thus you see how we ought to practice this lesson nowadays, where it is said I speak not to your children which might reply that they never saw nor heard of these things. For look what you ought to know as concerning Gods power, he has done you to understand it by his deeds.

And now by the way let us be contented with the experience which we have had of the goodness and power of our God, in his redeeming of us from the endless confusion wherein we be all born in Adam. For what is our original? Whence does God draw us when he vouchsafes to have us to be of his flock? From our mothers womb we bring nothing with us but true cursedness: we be heirs of endless death: we be forlorn & damned: if God should judge us after our deserts, he should needs be our enemy and adversary, and employ all his power against us. Now is our nature be so graceless & froward, that as long as it bears sway in us, it bends itself against God: must we not needs also wage battle against him? Yes: for look how many lusts be in us, so many defiance are there, as is our purpose were to arm him to vengeance against us. Yet notwithstanding it has pleased him to pull us back. When God take us so to him to be his people and of his household, it is more than was his delivering of the Jews out of the thralldom of Egypt. For that was but a figure of this redemption that is wrought by our Lord Jesus Christ. For his delivering of us is not from thralldom to some earthly & mortal prince: but from the gulf of hell, & from Satan's bonds. Where does God take us when he vouchsafes to call us to him, & to make us feel his grace? Must some messenger be fain to bring us news from far? Let every of us look upon himself, and we shall find that as in respect of ourselves, our state is nothing but eternal death. Therefore to apply this doctrine to our use, we must understand that when God calls any of us to him, it is more than if he had rid us out of all the bondages and slaveries of this world, yea even of the cruelest that could be endured. Let us know that: and also let us apply ourselves advisedly to the considering of Gods works: for that is the thing whereto the scripture brings us, to make us perceive the benefits that he has bestowed upon us, that we may fare the better by them. And it is also a way to bring us to the knowing of God, and to provoke us not only to worship him as our God, and to make us stoop under his glorious majesty: but also to bear him such a childly love, as to come unto him willingly, and to yield him such reverence, as he may accept us and owe us to be his, for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake.

Now let us cast ourselves down before the heavenly throne of our good God, acknowledging our wretched sinfulness, that we may be wholly cast down before him: & yet notwithstanding, praying him to vouchsafe to admit us in the name of our lord Jesus Christ so as we may not be shake off at his hand, though we be worthy of it, but rather that he bear with us of his infinite goodness, until he have conveyed us quite & clean out of this world, & clothed us again with his own righteousness, & with the perfection which he has promised us. And so let us say, Almighty god &c.

On Monday the 23rd of September 1555
The 75th Sermon which is the second upon the eleventh Chapter

5 And what he did for you in the wilderness, until you came unto this place:

6 And what he did to Dathan and Abiram the sons of Eliab the son of Ruben: how the earth opened her throne, and swallowed them up with their households and Tents, and with all the substance that was under their feet, in the midst of all Israel

7 For your eyes have seen all the great works of the Lord which he has done.

8 Therefore keep all the commandments which I command you this day, that you may be strong and go in and possess the Land, whereunto you go to possess it.

We have seen heretofore how Moses has told us, that such as have been witnesses of Gods wonders; are much less to be excused than such as have but only heard that things by report, and have not seen them with their eyes. For when God has been so gracious unto us as to show us his power to our faces; it must needs be that we be too blockish, if we be not mindful thereof. When our children shall but hear of it, shall become them to be moved at it: & what ought then to be done in the very presentness of the things? Hitherto Moses has showed after what manner God had dealt with his people through his goodness for he had behaved himself as an utter enemy to the Realms of Egypt, to show himself to be the savior of the lineage of Abraham. It is a benefit that ought to be very highly esteemed, when God chooses us after that sort to be his: which is not for any worthiness that he finds in us, but of his own only goodness, in that he vouchsafes to prefer us before others, so that although we be no better than they, yet he takes part with us, and fights for us at our need. If folk do trouble and torment us, and God be always ready to succor us; is it not such a bond, as if we keep it not unbroken, the very world may condemn our malicious frowardness. Now after he has spoken of the wonders that were wrought in Egypt, & in the passing of the red sea, he tells them briefly, that they ought to consider well, how God handled them in the wilderness. And under that speech he comprehends the thing which we have seen expounded heretofore: that is to wit, both the great number of benefits which they had received at Gods hand, and also his chastisements: for both of them ought to teach us to fear God, & to walk in his ways. If he do us good, it is to draw us to him by gentleness, that we should worship him. And if he correct us for our faults, it is to meeken us, that we may learn to bear his yoke, & to serve him as becomes us. Moses therefore comprehends here both twain of them: As if he should say, Seeing that God hash fed you with Manna, without any travel or labor of your own; ought you not to give yourselves all wholly to the serving of him? If a mortal man had kept you in his bottle & maintained you with food & apparel, should you not be so bound unto him, as your whole life might be answerable to such a benefit? Behold, God has maintained you in wilderness, by sending you Manna from heaven. Now then if you should forget such a gracious good turn, what an offence were it? Nay, he has not only lent you Manna: but he has also preserved your garments, so as they have not but marred not outworn by the space of forty years together. He has showed himself to be your guide in the night, in giving you a visible sign by fire; & he has kept you likewise a daytimes from the heat of the sun, by spreading his clouds over you. In all sorts he has tendered you as much as was possible. When you were thirsty, he made water to come gushing out of the rock that was dry before. To be short, he left nothing undone, whereby he might show himself a loving & liberal father towards you. Now then what can you less do, than yield yourselves to the obeying of him? Again, remember what he did, when you murmured against him for your fond lusts sake. Did you not then feel his heavy hand for your labor? When you required flesh, indeed he sent it you; but he made you to pay dear for the shot: for the meat was as good as a choking of you. While the meat was yet in your mouths, his wrath came down upon you. Again, when you misbehaved yourselves in whoredom, you know that his hand strake you in such sort, that a great number of people perished among you. When you were disobedient to his mouth, he set a fire among you, consumed you until the brazen serpent was set up. All manner of ways therefore have you been chastised at Gods hand; so as if you be not mindful of it, you be worse than brute beasts.

Now after that Moses has declared all these chastisements: he infers an example that was notable and worthy to be born in mind above all the rest: that is to wit, of the rebellion that was made by Coree, Dathan, and Abiram. For (as is declared in the sixteenth of the numbers), these three with another of the tribe of Ruben, made insurrection against Aaron, laying to his charge that he had usurped the priesthood, which was an office of great authority among the people. For Aaron was there as in person of our Lord Jesus Christ, & went into the Sanctuary to make atonement between God & the people. Now it spited these men, that they could not come to the like dignity, & therefore upon envy they would needs stir the people to a commotion, saying: What? This is a derogation to the prerogative that belongs in common to all of us that are the children of Abraham. God has sanctified us, he terms us his heritage and a priestly kingdom: & yet you see here how Aaron and his children have taken that thing peculiarly to themselves, which belongs generally to the whole people. Therefore let us maintain our right, & not suffer this dignity to be turned to a state of inheritance. This was their pretence: but indeed they did it of great spite. For first of all God had well provided beforehand, that there should be no indirect or wicked suspicion against Aaron, & his children for the priesthoods sake. Moses was the leader of the people; he was the setter of them at liberty, & therefore there was good likelihood that his offspring should have been preferred before all others. He had children: & yet he took not the priesthood unto himself, but left it to his brother. True it is that he made no choice, god did that. But howsoever he fared, to the intent that the law and the things that depended thereupon should not be suspected: Gods will was not to do Moses so much honor as to make him the priest, but he was fain to stand humbly aloof with the rest of the people worshipping God, when Aaron his brother went to carry the names of the people of Israel into the sanctuary, & to offer sacrifice to God in their behalf. And what were his children? They abode my inferior degree, without advancement to the dignity, which remained to his brother Aaron. Whereby God showed that those things were not done upon ambition or worldly covetousness, but that it was his own doing, who had set down the order that should be kept in his Church and Temple. Notwithstanding all this, those lewd persons fell to rebelling; & charged Aaron falsely with usurping the dignity of the high priesthood. So was God fain to maintain his own doing. And thereupon Moses laid unto them, How now? What is Aaron? As if he should say, has he thrust himself in of his own head? No: & now although he be of Gods advancing to that high and honorable state, yet if you consider all things aright, he does but only serve you. But those malicious creatures were not contented with that. We be sanctified (said they) we be gods people; & what are you more? In this case god was to put to his hand for the redress of it: And according as was commanded by Moses, Tomorrow (quote he) let every of you bring his sensor, & you that are the chief of this rebellion, (for they were as then to the number of two hundred & fifty) come together, & you shall see by your offerings, whether parties service is best liked of God. This done he said unto the people, Assure yourselves that if these folk do die the common death, and that God lay not his hand upon them in your sight, so as some horrible & dreadful punishment do not light upon their heads: I am contented that you shall not esteem me as sent of God. But if you perceive that god make good the thing that I have uttered with my mouth, then be you sure that I have done nothing on mine own head, but that I have faithfully performed that which was enjoined me from heaven. Hereupon the earth opened and swallowed up those rebels that had made the insurrection among the people. And when this was done, the people forbear not to murmur still & to say, See here I pray you, how Moses and Aaron fall to destroying of Gods people. Those whom God has chosen must be fain to perish at their pleasure, to maintain their priestly dignity, and of the same number are we also. What an unkindness is this? You see here how God had wrought a miracle that ought to astonish & amaze the whole world, yea even the very brute beasts & all: and yet this people which reported themselves to be chosen and holy, cease not to repine & rebel still of malicious set purpose, against God and his hand that was openly to be seen. God was fain to ratify Aaron's priesthood yet once again: whereupon he commanded that every of them should bring a wooden staff with their names written upon them and put them altogether, so as they might not be discerned as under but by the sight of the names. These Staves were laid before God in the sanctuary: & when they were taken thence again, Aaron's staff that had his name upon it did flourish, & all the residue remained dry: whereby God showed that he had chosen that house to the High priesthood.

Of these things does Moses here put the people in remembrance, to do them to understand, first that if they dallied any more with God by seeking any change, or by attempting anything against the commandment of his word: they should feel his vengeance in likewise as they had seen it light upon Coree, Dathan, & Abiram, and their partakers. Besides this, he tells them of their spitefulness, how they had provoked God again; even after they had felt his justice: that intent they should no more return to such doings, because that if they abused Gods patience & bearing with them for that one time, he would in the end use that greater rigor against them. And so you see what the intent of Moses was. Now hereby we be warned to consider well with ourselves, that when so ever any fault or offence is committed among us, & God has laid his hand upon us for it: we ought to bear it so printed in our hearts, as it may make us to keep his commandments, as Moses adds afterward. For it is not enough for us to know the bare story: but we must also apply the same to our instruction. So that if god have corrected us gently, we must acknowledge his fatherly goodness towards us. And from thenceforth let us not provoke him any more, but to the intent we may keep ourselves from offending, let it suffice us to know that he cannot away with sin. That (say I) is that thing whereof we be warned in this text. And herewith all let us also have such humility printed in our hearts, as to be continually sorry for the faults that we shall have committed. And if our God have been so gracious as to execute his wrath upon some others, let us be well ware that we wrap not ourselves in the same condemnation with them, by taking their part. Nay, let us shun them a great way off, and let us have nothing to do with them, if we intend not to provoke the wrath of our God. That is the effect of the matter which Moses speaks of here. And it is written for our sakes, to the intent that every of us should have an eye to himself.

I have told you already, that the things which were spoken as then to the people of Israel, do concern us likewise. After what sort have you felt Gods hand? I mean as well those that are Citizens born, as those that resort hither from strange Countries. Is there any of us that has not perceived gods wonderful power in his deliverance? For has not this Town been as it were appointed to ruin and destruction? Was it not likely that it should utterly have perished, and that there was none other remedy as in respect of the world ? Yet has God reached out his hand after such a fashion as the world has seen an incredible alteration. It was as a dream, men would never have thought it: even they themselves that did service in it, were astonished at it afterward. Now then, if this be forgotten, on whom shall we lay the fault? And God has not only given liberty to those that were in bondage, and drawn them out of the gulf of death at inch time as it was looked that all should have gone to havoc; but also vouchsafed to see up his kingdom among them. He has planted his Gospel here, he has set up his chair of estate here, here has he chosen him a sanctuary & a place to dwell in. And as touching them that are come from strange Countries, how has god reached his hand to them? Were not they also as it were in the gulf of hell, when they were in the cursed Popedom? You see then how we be gathered here, altogether under the hand of God. And therefore well ought we to esteem this grace, and not only to preach it with our mouths, but also to show throughout all our whole life, that forasmuch as our Lord has gotten us to him, we be illing to be his, & thereupon endeavor to please him in all things. Unless we do so, surely there will be no excuse for us, but that we shall be a hundredfold more blameworthy, than those whom God has let alone, so as they continue still in their old trade, without finding him so gracious & favorable towards them. Besides this, Gods working in our behalf has not been for once & away: but if we look well upon his maintaining of the state which he has established in this city; there has not been any year wherein he has not renewed his miracles, & made it appear openly by some notable sign, that he has had a continual care of us, and that he has never forsaken us. And indeed we be worse than blind, if we perceive not that our life hangs as by a thread. For there needs but turning of a hand to dispatch us all: one conspiracy was like enough to have put the whole church of God in danger of destruction. But yet for all this God has preserved us. And after what fashion? We cannot tell. Had we any drop of wisdom, surely as oft as it came to our mind we would be astonished at it & say; Lord, how far has you exceeded; expectation of men! Again on the other side let us mark, let us mark I say how God has lifted up his hand to punish such as went about to trouble the order of his Church, and to overthrow the building which he had set up by his Gospel. For it is certain that he has punished them, to the end that we should take instruction at their cost. He has been so gracious to us as to let us see and know his vengeance, and yet we ourselves have been exempted from it: not for our own deserts, (for there is none of us all, but upon due examination of his doings, he shall find him self faulty) but because it pleased God to spare us. Nevertheless he has showed us as it were with his finger, that it is not for any man to provoke him: and that if any body step up against him, he shall find himself too hardly overmatched. This (say I) has been told us sufficiently. But what: God works, and we have no eyes to see his working: & although we have, yet do we willfully shut them against him. Yea & (to go no further,) let us apply this story to our own use. Truly I touch things as soberly as I can; but yet is not the holy scripture written to end we should but only know what was done to the people of Israel: but to the end we should consider the likeness that is between them & us, that when the like matters befall among us, we might do ourselves good by the warning peals that are given us by them. According whereunto S. Paul said, that the things which God did at that time, are as a picture for us to look upon, to the end we should refer all to our own profit: For the end of time (said he) is come upon us, and we see now the perfection of the things which God had but begun as then.

And here is mention made of Coree, Dathan, and Abiram, that is to wit, of such as could not abide the observing of things in such sort as God had then commanded them by Moses. True it is that they processed themselves to be Gods chosen, & the children of Abraham: mark that for one point. For they alleged that they were sanctified; their intent was that their circumcision should be as a $\neg \vee a:r.1E$ for them that they were a holy & sacred generation. But yet for al that, they would none of the priesthood, at leastwise not as God had ordained it, but every of them would have it to himself. Now I pray you, have not we for our part seen the like rebellion against God & his word? For wherefore has all the skirmishing bin, both against the doctrine & against the discipline of the church with such rage: but to displace the order that God set among us? When heretics, (yea even such heretics as brought mo blasphemies than ever were heard of since there was any Christian Church) came hither: they were maintained here with tooth & nail, & openly, yea even by such as fate in the seat of justice: in so much as they took part with them, and showed them as much favor as Turks should have under Mahomet. Afterward when other heretics came hither to bring in Freewill again, & to sit it up to the derogation of Gods grace, blaspheming his election and Providence: they had those men for their Patrons & Advocates, which ought to have been their Judges: & those spake for them in our presence, and that with such impudence, as if they had bent themselves like bulls to strike us with their horns, & to let themselves as shamefully as could be, against God and his doctrine. This have we seen. Again, when things were showed them so plainly by the holy scripture, as would have been received even among the very papists, and when so clear and evident texts were alleged, as could not be gainsaid, which things we not only spake by mouth, but also gave them the articles in writing, & set down the sentences of the scripture whereby the truth was pointed to as with ones finger: They were not ashamed to reject all, but stepped forth proudly still, as it were to say; we will sight against God whatsoever come of it. True it is that they spewed not out such sayings with full mouth, for they protested still to hold themselves to the Gospel. O (said they) our desire is to have the Gospel. Yea but what manner of Gospel? A tavern gospel. There was no talking among them of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ: For it was a common by word among them to say, There needs no more to be known than that which all of us know; that is to wit, that we must love God and our neighbour. And what needs there so much preaching for that matter? If a man replied hereupon & said unto them, how can you be? If you will have preaching to cease & the Sacraments to be superfluous, then must the whole order which God has let in his church be disannulled: Well (would they say) then let the Gospel be preached simply without such storming. And again as touching the Sacraments, belong they not to us as well as to you: Why not? would we that there should be no more order kept? Nay we can minister supper as well as you preachers. Such things as these (I say) were seen and heard. But is Coree, Dathan, & Abiram be condemned here by the holy ghost, to have intended the breaking of all order: I pray you what shall a man say, of those which have fought so manifestly against god after this fashion? For these things were not done of ignorance. Although they be so shameless as to say still, we have meant no such thing yet is their heir malice too too apparent. For had no man spoken to them of it, or had no man pointed them as with his finger to the texts of the scripture, so as it might have been said, see here the will of God, there is no difficulty in the matter, it needs not any scanning as though there were any doubtfulness in it, see here the open text: [they might have had some colour for their pretence]. But seeing that things were so showed unto them, & yet they continued willful still: see you not that it was an open making of war against God? Is it not to be seen also what pretence was made by Coree, Dathan & Abiram? Out of question, their sayings were after this manner: Why? If Aaron have the high priesthood alone to himself, he shall have all superiority, & what shall we be? Even so stands the case with these men: to their seeming, all were marred on their side, if God should bear the sway. But god will bear the sway by this order, and we see it is no impeachment at all to the civil power which is a thing utterly distinct from it, neither can anything better maintain Magistrates in their sovereignty, forasmuch as the order of Gods Church is spiritual, so as it meddles not with the punishing of men's bodies, nor with penalties, nor with imprisonments, nor with such other like things: but all is referred to the word & the sacraments. Seeing this is apparent does it not serve better for the establishment of Empires, kingdoms, & Lordships: than if there were nothing else to be had than a confuted tyranny, where nothing were reserved unto God & to our Lord Jesus Christ? And therefore when men strain themselves to the uttermost of their power to overthrow the order, do they not fall to spitting in the face of Jesus Christ to spite him withal? For it is his will to reign among us, yea & he will have his kingdom to be in us. Now then, when he chooses men & sets them up to govern his church in his name, is it not too shameful an unthankfulness to say, we will not admit it, but thrust it from us? As who should say, they would make men believe that the Consistory were a thing utterly severed from Geneva itself, whereas God has granted us the grace to make it a member of the body. Now then, to dismember Jesus Christ by separating the things which he has joined together, is it not a setting of themselves openly against him? We see then that these rebellions have happened among us: & who is to be blamed for it? Truly the heads of the sedition are to be seen, and the perceiving of them has not been at some one time, or a day or twain ago, but it is now a seven or eight years since it began, insomuch as Gods children have been fain to groan and sigh under their burden, & to cry out alas, beseeching God to have pity on his poor Church, seeing it was in such a burly burly. Things went worse & worse, and one licentiousness brought in another, so as they bare themselves in handy all things were lawful for them. And yet notwithstanding, of all that while they did but double the stings which they had felt before in their wicked consciences, by thinking thus with themselves: What? We can never hold out, except we lay our heads together to fortify ourselves thus & thus. Hereupon they made continually new provisions. And after what manner? By practicing all manner of treason & disloyalty, & by applying their minds to all wicked shifts for the maintenance of the thing that they had misbegun. But in the end our Lord wrought. And what have we to consider therein? That we be worthy of blame.

For although those folk did fight openly against God: yet would he not have suffered such miseries to have happened among us; but for our offences. And therefore let us consider that seeing he has so punished the parties that came to set themselves o apparently against him, & made their reckoning to overthrow ally that he had builded: he has schooled us at their cost, & therefore we ought first of all to thank him for his sparing of us, and that he wrapped us not in the confusion that was prepared for us, but has put a miraculous difference between them & us. Thus you see that the thing which we have to mark, is on the one side Gods mercy in bearing with us, & on the other, the punishing of a few folk, which ought to serve us for an instruction to teach us to fare the better by it. For it is certain that thereby God has showed us, how it is his will to have things go peaceably, & to keep their ordinary course according to his words. For it is not for men to pretend Gods name falsely in this behalf, to swarve aside one way or other. The ministers of the word & such as are appointed to be preachers, must for their part be able to protest before God, & to show openly before men, that they neither be nor & desire to be counted any other, than as persons to whom God has committed charge of preaching & of administering his sacraments with such pureness as things may not be corrupted in the church. When it is so: let us understand that we must submit ourselves thereto, & that we shall win nothing by striving against it, but Gods hand must needs be always against us. For he forgets not what he has ordained, but will maintain & defend the fame continually. Therefore let us learn to leave the seeking of any change against Gods ordinance. Let us look upon the rule that is contained in the holy scripture, & let no man attempt to encounter it by any manner of means. Let us rather die than alter anything, or attempt anything against our God. Let us be as sheep, if we will have Jesus Christ to be our shepherd. For whatsoever he is that has not a meek heart like a lamb, is unworthy to be counted of Gods Church, because our Lords Christ will not be our shepherd, but upon the condition. That then is the thing which we have to bear away in the first place. But let us also look well upon the maliciousness of the Jewish people, & take good heed that we become not like them. Sothly it is a terrible case that God should show forth his power so upon rebels, that the very earth should open and swallow them up with their wines and children. There were to the number of 250 that had murmured against Moses and Aaron, which were all rooted outing open sight of men, so as men saw that God wrought from heaven: & yet notwithstanding complaints were still cast forth against Moses and Aaron, men charged them with all the blame, all the fault was laid in their necks. Seeing it was so, must it not needs be that people was exceedingly hardhearted? Yes: but let us now look into ourselves. For we also are guilty of the like maliciousness nowadays in that behalf.

For there are number to be seen which foster poison in their hearts, & are willfully wedded to wicked matters, and yet know neither why nor wherefore. If a man ask them what it boots them: they cannot tell, saving that the devil has so carried them away, that they be easily won to maintain evil matters, and to murmur and grudge: and therewithal they fall to running upon those that cannot do withal, for none other cause but that they endeavor to maintain the things that concern God. How have we had an eye to the things which God has done beyond mans expectation? He wrought of all the while, when no man thought it. There were neither judges, nor people, nor ministers of the word, that ever thought upon the things that are come to pass. Well: is the thing done & past? and do we not perceive that God pitied us in the end, and that thereby he meant to school us, and that we should be mindful of that deed forever? Why consider we not that he laid his hand upon us to humble us, to the intent we should henceforth live in all subjection under him, & according to his order? Are they not too too inexcusable, which cannot make their profit thereof? Yes surely. For it is as a willful shutting of their eyes against Gods works. But no marvel if things be so out of order nowadays. For we see that in the countries where the Gospel is, there is more inordinate liberty & more lewdness than is among the papists. Whereby we may understand, that God does justly give them over. For when men have heard the gospel and will not believe it: they must needs always become devils incarnate and as bad as monsters, so as nothing may be seen in them but cursed disorder. Indeed the Papists, forasmuch as they be deadly enemies unto God, are well worthy of the reprobate mind wherein they be. But as for them that boast of the Gospel, & make a mock of it, utterly refusing all good doctrine, & fighting against god: must not God needs utter greater rigor towards them, as men see he has done? And a man needs not to look far for the matter. Let us but look a little about us & we shall see the Gods vengeance has broken out to the uttermost, upon those unhappy creatures which do so refuse his grace daily offered unto them. Now then, is those kind of folk conceive rancor against all goodness, what get they by it, but that they heap up still greater punishment upon their own heads? But as for our part, let us learn to keep ourselves in array under the standard of our God: and then let us assure ourselves, that as he made Aaron's rod to flourish in spite of all the rebels so will he also make the order to flourish which he has set among us. Let us wait up on him, & rest upon that order: and in the meanwhile shroud ourselves under his wings, and not seek any thing against his preeminence & dignity, but honor him all of us both great & small. If we proceed after that fashion, we may well hope that as he wrought then, so will he continue also towards us.

But by the way let us bear in mind what Moses said here. Bethink yourselves (said he) even to keep the commandments which I set before you this day. Hereby he shows us whereto the minding of the chastisements which we have perceived to have been done by Gods hand, should serve us. Namely to bring us unto his obedience. For if we think to quit ourselves by condemning such as have so troubled gods order, & gone about to overthrow the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ: and yet in the meanwhile do play the same pageants, and follow their footsteps within an hour after: surely you shall be double punished. We see what befell to Jehu, and it is a looking glass for us to behold continually. For if a judge turn his one hand unto bribes, and punish thieves with the other for his own profit: is not he himself worthy of double punishment? Even so stood that case with Jehu. True it is that God used his service in punishing the idolatries & abominations of Achabs house: but yet for all that, Jehu himself followed the same, & therefore was God fain to punish him also as a robber, & to use greater rigor against him than against the house of Achab, though all things were out of order there and full of wickedness. As much shall befall us when wee shall have condemned the wicked, and the despisers of God, and such as have turned quite & clean against him: if we ourselves referable them afterward. Therefore let us take heed to that which is spoken here, which is that God calls us home to him, by our beholding of the desolation that men had practiced. Very well then, our Lord punishes them: but his punishing of the wicked is for our benefit. For his meaning is that by their example we should learn to turn head when we have gone astray, that whereas erst we followed him not, ne framed our lives according to his word, we should come to atonement again in him, and take heed to our conversation, that we observe all the commandments which he sets before us.

Again, Moses shows us here, that it is not enough for us to serve God by halves, as men commonly do to make their market as they list themselves. Indeed we will be ashamed so to do, specially if we perceive that God chastises any man for the like doings, and that we ourselves have found that he has vouchsafed to bear us, and to show himself as our father. I say we will be ashamed to disdain to have any regard at all of it. But what? We will let a good face upon the matter, and we will pretend some shadow of upright dealing, at leastwise in small particular matters: but otherwise, we will hold on still in our old trace, and we will do such things as may well bewray that in all the rest there was nothing but hypocrisy, so as we went not to work roundly & soundly because we be double hearted. But god admits no such parting of stake. He said expressly, Look about you when I punish such as have done amiss. For unless you purpose to wrap yourselves in the same curse, you must not only reform your lives in one or two points, but also to rule yourselves throughout according to my law, you must walk in such uprightness, as it may be perceived that you have given yourselves to my service, and that your whole seeking is to have me to be your Lord & master. . Thus you see whereas Moses looked in saying. Therefore do you all the commandments which set before you this day.

But surely mans frailty is such, as he can never attain to the full performing of the law: but yet must we still endeavor towards it. When we have enforced ourselves to the uttermost, yet shall we be behind hand still in many things. And if we enter into account for every point which we shall have performed, we shall have failed in a hundred. Therefore let us acknowledge our faults: but yet for all that, the mark that we must shoot at, must be the obeying of our God without exception, so as we make no parting of stakes with him to say, God to, as for in this thing, I am contented to yield to God, but he must pardon me in that thing, and he must bear with me for the other matter. If we fall to such chauffeuring with him, we shall find in the end that our fond overweening has beguiled us.

And in anywise let us way well this saying, where he says: that it is he himself that sets forth the commandments of God. And thereby he brings us back to Gods word in such wise as it is preached, for he will not have us go seek in the air nor yet about the clouds for the knowledge of his will. We must be contented with his coming down unto us, and with his speaking to us by the mouths of men. The rebellious sort have always said that their intent was to serve God: for it were too horrible a thing to be so blasphemous in words, as to say that they give over God and will be none of his. Therefore do they make fair protestations: but in the meanwhile they tread under foot the word whereby God will be known and served. This has been seen in all ages: and we have found it in these despisers that have crept in here among us to corrupt us, that all their talk has tended to none other end, but to abolish to me piece of the holy scripture. For they have given forth that there is no more need of the Law and the prophets, but that they be quite abolished. And this blasphemy has been held or rather flushed out in such sort, as it required to be resisted with stoutness. Insomuch as they have not been ashamed to spew out such wicked sayings as these: in my presence: namely that the old Testament was to be rejected, and belonged not at all unto us. And on their Ale benches they made it a common proverb, that the having of the Gospel was sufficient, that is to say, that we ought to hold us contented with these two words, A man must love God, and he must love his neighbour. Thus you see how they have gone about to bring in a Turkishness

upon us, yea and a confusion more horrible than Turkishness, in that they durst so openly pronounce all those lewd speeches. Let us mark then how it is not without cause that Moses said here, The commandments which I set before you, as if he should say: come not hither to protest dissembling that your intent is to serve God: but [say flatly] that you will not admit his Law because it is preached unto you by me, by me (I say) which am a mortal man as you be and not your God, least you should make an idol of me. Allege none of all these shifts said he: for God has ordained me to set forth his Law, and he will have it received at my hand. And seeing he has given me that charge and office: it behoves you on your side to obey. Now again we know that our Lord Jesus Christ intends not to dwell here visibly in his own person among us. He has ordained Pastors in his Church, and he will be heard by their means : that is the perfection whereunto he brings us, until we come to that happy meeting, to be thoroughly joined unto him. Those are the words of Saint Paul. Now if we will not submit ourselves to that order: it is as if we would rend asunder the body of Christ as much as in us lies. Therefore let us beware that we yield due authority to Gods word, and accept it reverently when it is preached unto us. So then, when so ever we have to deal with Gods service and religion: let us not fall to fancying of high speculations, as if we would say, Let God show me what pleases him, and I will do it. For that is but a vain excuse, as we shall see that Moses himself will tell us hereafter where he says: You need not to go over the sea, nor to mount up into the air, nor to go down into the deep, forasmuch as you has the word in your heart and in your mouth. And this word (said S. Paul) is not only that which was preached by Moses: but also the same word of faith which we preach at this day. Since it is so, let us bear in mind that God meant as it were to bridle us by telling us that it was his will to make us subject unto him, and that for the bringing thereof to pass, it behoved us to observe the doctrine which he did let forth by the hand of Moses, And consequently it behoves our Lord Jesus Christ's governing of us nowadays to be such, as we receive and believe whatsoever is preached to us in his name. You see them that the way for Gods word to have due preeminence and authority among us: is that we govern not ourselves after our own liking: but hearken to the voice of Jesus Christ to submit ourselves thereto, so as he may have the sovereignty over us that is given him by God his father, and we receive his word without exception or gainsaying, knowing that that is the mean whereby God intends to try what obedience we yield unto him.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us perceive them better than we have done heretofore, so as we may fare the better by all the instructions that are given us, as well by the benefits that are daily bestowed upon us at his hand, as by the chastisements which he shows us: that thereby we may be brought to fear him, and to honor him by all means, and not take upon us the name of Christianity falsely, but become his people in very deed being separated from all worldly infections, and from all witched lusts that are contrary to his law, or which strive against it. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The 76th Sermon, which is the third upon the eleventh Chapter

8 Therefore keep all & c.

9 And that you may prolong your days in the land which the Lord swear to your fathers to give to them and to their seed, even a land that flows with milk and honey.

10 For the land which you goes unto to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt whence you came: where you diddest sow your seed and water it with your feet as a garden of herbs:

11 But the Land which you go unto to possess, is a land wherein are hills and plains, and it drinks rain water from the sky

12 It is a land which the Lord your God regards: the eyes of the Lord your God are continually upon it, from the beginning of the year to the end of the year.

13 And if you be diligent in obeying my commandments which I command you this day, so as you love the Lord your God, and serve him with all your heart and with all your soul:

14. Then will I give the fore rain and the after rain in season upon your lands, that you may gather up your Corn, your Wine, and your Oil.

15 Also I will give you grass upon the field for your Cattle. So shall you eat and have your fill.

After that Moses has warned the people to keep Gods commandments, now he heartens them by setting Gods promises before them, as if GOD should tell them, that his will was they should not serve him but for good wages. And indeed, God perceiving how loth & How we be to follow him, allures us to it, by promising us that we shall not lose our labor in so doing. Not that he is bound to do it, or that he intends to have us as hirelings, or that we can deserve or earn anything at his hand: we must rid away all such imaginations. It is meet that we should yield obedience unto God, though no reward at all were benighted us. For we ought to love him for his own sake, & not for any recompense that can be looked for. Again on the other side, our affection must be frank & free, and not like theirs that will do nothing, except their profit be always before them. We must love God with a free heart. Thirdly, we can deserve nothing at all by our doings: do what we can, God is never the more bound unto us for it. For we be his already, & what can we bring, which is not due to him already by nature? Yet is he contented to apply himself to our rawness, in laying that if we serve him, there is a reward ready for us, so as we shall not need to be afraid that our Labor in honoring him should be unprofitable to us if we endeavor so to honor him. Now we see what a fondness it is for men to conclude, that because God promises reward to such as keep his Law, therefore men can deserve at his hand: For that is not his meaning: but it is done for our infirmities sake because God sees that we have need to be quickened up. And therefore all the promises of the law are as strokes with spur. Besides this, we must also come back to the doctrine of S. Paul, which is, that whatsoever promise with condition God do make us in his law, it stands us in no stead. For we on our side, instead of performing the things God commands us, do go clean back from them, and by that means are far off from all the benefit that is benighted us there. And whereas the Law says, he that does these things shall live in them: that boots us nothing at all until God of his owns free goodness be at one with us again. For then writes he his law in our hearts, and we learnt to obey him: which thing we cannot do by nature. And yet for all that, we do it not then perfectly, but there is some blemish in our doings, so as God might justly reject our works, because they be altogether sinful. Nevertheless he takes them in good worth, and yields us reward, not as of duty, but of his own good will.

Therefore to come again to the first matter, let us note that God provokes us to the keeping of his commandments, by such means as he knows to be most convenient for us. And that is the cause why he says, that if we be wholly his, he also is ours: and that if we draw near unto him he will draw ny unto us: & will bless us, & he will not only prosper us in this transitory life: but we may well hope for a far greater reward in the kingdom of heaven. All these things are told us: and to what end? Not to puff us up with any vain presumption, as though we were able to deserve aught at Gods hand, but to encourage us the more to do well, seeing that our God which might well exact the performance of all that is contained in his Law, without allowing us an reward at all, does nevertheless vouchsafe to bind himself freely of his own accord. Mark that for the first point. For we see here, that God promising of all there things to that people was not for any obedience that they had yielded unto him; for the land had been promised to their fathers, yea even by oath, long before they were born. And if a man speak of the time that was to come: we see that God had no respect of that, he looks not that the people should behave themselves so well as to receive reward of him for it: but he says; I have already promised you the land, yea I have promised it you for your inheritance, to the intent you should not think, you have gotten it by your own purchase. And for proof thereof, I assured it unto you by free gift before you were begotten: but yet if you intend to enjoy it, take heed that you give yourselves to me. Here you see how God prevented all deserving: he regards not what we have deserved, but whereas he sees us to be wretches and destitute of all goodness, so as he finds nothing but sin in us, whereby we deserve to be rejected: yet nevertheless he of his own infinite mercy binds himself unto us, & tells us he will do us good, as though we had served him according to his law. Mark that for one point.

And thereupon he ceases not to say, Do the things that I have commanded you, that your may enjoy the benefits that I have promised you. The reason is, that he will not have his goodness dallied withal. If he be liberal, he will not have men to abuse it as they commonly do. When it is told us that all that ever we have at Gods hand, is of his only free gift: we bear ourselves in hand, that we have leave to do evil, and to live every man after his own liking, and that it is no matter what we do. But God will not have his gracious goodness so disgraced. For his showing of himself favorable unto us, is to another end and purpose: namely to provoke us to love him again; and that because we find him so good a father, we should be likeminded again towards him, & behave ourselves as his children. That is the thing which Moses tells us here when he says, Look that you obey your God, if you mind to possess the land which he promised to your fathers. For on the one side he shows that the land of Chanaan was an heritage of free gift: and yet he forbears not to tell them, that they must not dally with God in abusing that liberality of his, but so much the rather both love him & fear him. And when they see that God has poured out the great riches of his mercy so upon them; the same ought to inflame them to say, let us give over ourselves wholly to our God: Seeing that he has sought us out at such time as we were gone from him, & prevented us with his goodness, not respecting our unworthiness, but taking occasion of himself to do us good: let it kindle the greater desire in us to submit ourselves to his power and will.

And whereas Moses speaks here but only of land of Chanaan & of the fruits that the people should gather there for their finding and sustenance: it is not for that God meant not to lead the faithful any further than so at that time: for it is certain that they had the promise of life after the same manner as it is contained at this play in the Gospel. And therefore it is horrible blasphemy again God, to say that God held the people of old time like swine in a sty, and that they had no more but a certain figure of to that spiritual good things which are given us presently in these days, as that wretched caitise said which was punished here, who turned all things upside down, & was so bold as to balk out this heresy the old testament was nothing else but a figure: insomuch even Abraham the father of all the faithful, had but a fantastical faith and knew not God aright. And for proof thereof (quote he,) he worshipped Angels instead of God, & had no knowledge of the everlasting life. Look what cursed stuff here was: for we know (said S. Paul) that the fathers of old time were the children of God, & heirs of the kingdom of heaven as well as we. There is but this difference, that they were like young children: but yet for all that they failed not to possess the benefit, howbeit that they were still under tutors and governors, according to the similitude that S. Paul alleges there. The ancient fathers had the law & the ceremonies & such other like things: but yet they wanted not the substance & truth also. Now then, Gods setting forth of the land of Chanaan to the Jews was not to the intent they should stand poring upon that, like twine that stand muffling with their groins in their swill trough: but under the earthly inheritance which he had promised to their fathers, he gave them a taste of the heavenly heritage, accordingly as we see that in their sacrificing, although they offered brute beasts: yet were they made partakers of the redemption that is purchased for us by our Lord Jesus Christ; and their offering of the brute beasts in sacrifice, directed them to the redemption that was wrought by the son of God, when he shredded his holy blood to wash away our spots and sins. And after the same manner was it with the land of Chanaan. For such was their slender capacity, that it behoved them to be guided that way. The land of Chanaan then, was to them not only a pledge but also an earnest penny of the heavenly life & endless welfare which the fathers hoped for as well as we, inasmuch as they had the same faith that we have. So then let us mark well, that whereas here is mention made of the land of Chanaan, and of Gods maintaining of his people there in wealth: it serves not to the end that the Jews should look for nothing else but earthly things: but to the end that by taling of Gods goodness in this transitory life, they should understand that he had prepared the another heritage in heaven, which was more worth than all the world.

But our Lord uses no such manner of dealing with us nowadays. True it is that (as said Saint. Paul unto Timothy) if we walk as becomes us, we have promises both of this present life, & of the life to come. God tells us if he will not only receive us into the everlasting life, but also that he will ever forsake us so long as we be in this world and in this earthly pilgrimage, but will still have a care of us to do us good, and to succor us and provide for us in all our needs: howbeit the heavenly life is the chief thing, and that is the place whereunto our Lord draws us, notwithstanding that he add this present life to it as an accessory. And that is done because we have a greater light nowadays, than our forefathers had under the Law. For Jesus Christ is come down from heaven, and has opened the everlasting kingdom unto us: & he has gone up there as in our person: for he is risen again nature of man which he took of us. You see then; heaven is now opened: and therefore it is not to be wondered at though God speak in a larger language now, that he did in the time of the law. For it behoved the people of those days to be led as we see little children are: & (as said Saint Paul) we become to mans estate, in comparison of them. Yet notwithstanding we may gather hereupon, that God intending to encourage his people to serve him with the better will, tells them; he will show himself a father towards them, even in respect of this world, howbeit not in all points, but only so far forth as may give them same taste and feeling of his fatherly love, that they may lift up the eyes of their faith yet higher, and understand that God has reserved the true blessedness and perfection of glory for them, till they be taken out of this world and our of this corruptible life. Thus you see in effect what we have to gather upon that text: Yea and it behoves us to mark well this saying, That you must be strengthened.

Hereby Moses declares that God for his part is faithful, and that when he has once spoken the words, we may well assure ourselves of it. But forasmuch as we drag our legs after us, and although he allure us to him so gently, and draw towards us of his own accord: yet are we lazy & flow in coming unto him: we have need to be strengthened. That is the very end; all the promises of the law do tend unto. It is not meant that God should bind himself unto us as our debtor: it is not for that he looks whether we have deserved anything at all or no: neither is it of purpose to bargain or indent with us, as though he should take up hackenies among us to serve his turn withal, by constraint: but forasmuch as he sees we be feeble, and have not so resolute a mind as were requisite, but are entangled in this world, and held back with a number of vanities, and wicked affections, and (to be short) are not so lively as to yield ourselves unto his obedience: his purpose is to strengthen us, and to help us. He sees our default, and he remedies it. Be strong therefore. And how? Even by considering thus with yourselves: Go to, Our Lord might command us peremptorily at one word: for he has full sovereignty over us, and we be his by nature. And when we have all of us strained ourselves to the uttermost of our power, yet can we not do as we ought to do. Yet notwithstanding, he will not be served at our hands recompense, but he said that if we do but a peace of that which is due to him, he binds himself to us for it. Since we see this, are we not too lewd if we be not touched to the quick, & amend not all slothfulness, to go forth unto God lustily without stopping for any worldly impediment or hindrance? That is the strength which Moses speaks of here.

And he adds hereunto, that it is not enough to be cored into the land: but we must also abide and dwell there: for if we have once received the promise of salvation, and God has blessed us & made us to prosper to worldward: we must not thereupon fall asleep, but we must still follow our cause. We know that this life is a way, and therefore we must still go on forward. And whither is it that God calls us? Said he to us, when you have gone on a little way, tarry still entangled in the world? No: but we must travel still upward to the heavenly life. And that cannot be done without forsaking the world continually more and more. Then let us mark well, how it is told us here; when God has once put us in hope of salvation, so as he has taken us into his Church and into his flock, and begun to do us good: we must not fall asleep upon it, but proceed on still, assuring ourselves that all is to no purpose, unless we hold out to our lives end, without ceasing or failing in the midst of our way. This is it that Moses meant, in saying; when the people were once entered into the land, it behoved them to have an eye to the everlasting enjoying & possessing thereof which had been promised them with the same. Having said so, he adds that the land of Chanaan is not as the land of Egypt, And why? For your being in Egypt (said he) was as it had been in a garden. For men do water their gardens, so as when they have sowed or set their herbs, they will have water at hand to moisten them withal. After the same manner was it with you in the land of Egypt, which is watered partly by cunning, & partly by nature. For we must understand, that that the land has one property which all other lands have not. We read not any other country of the world is unmoistened with rain and showers from above, save only Egypt. For once a year the river Niles overflows his banks, & according to growing thereof, so does it behight them abundance of fruits. Insomuch that is it overflow not above five or six foot deep, it is a token of dearth, as who should say that God threatens famine to the whole country. If it rise to twenty foot or somewhat upward, well, there will be same abundance. But if it increase to thirty or forty foot, then will there be much more: so as in Egypt they have none other sign of a good year & a fruitful harvest, than the overflowing of Niles. Whereas all other rivers do mar the lands where they overflow: and although they be muddy, yet do they much harm: This river, by his overflowing, causes that land to yield great abundance.

That is the cause why it is said, that at that time; Israelites had as it were every man his garden, & were fain to have water to moisten then withal after the manner of that country, which is cut into many ditches & trenches to water the land withal: & all this is according to the ordinance which God has set there. But here Moses tells the Israelites, that it shall not be so with them in the land of Chanaan. For why? There is small store of rivers in many of the countries, yea and in the most part of them. True it is that Jordan passes through it, and there are certain lakes also: but that is all, and yet one of them settles but to infect the land. For the lake where Sodom stood, did rather mar the countries than yield any commodity. And therewith all we see how the fathers had much ado to dig pits, and were in danger to be undone with drought: insomuch that they were driven from place to place for lack of water. You see then that the land of Chanaan was not watered after the manner of Egypt, neither had it water at hand and at commandment as Egypt had. And therefore is it said unto them, See how God visits the land of Egypt but once a year: and if the river flow lustily over all the country, it is as good as if he had rained never so much upon it, so as the Egyptians are sure of a good harvests, when the river has increased after that fashion. But your God must be fain to send you rain and convenient moisture from above, from the one end of the year to the other. When you have sown your seed, you must wait for rain from above, and think thus with yourselves, Alas Lord, will not you make the seed to increase which we have laid into the ground? Now must you show that you regards us, and that it is your will that our labor shall prosper. And when you has so given us rain, we must be fain to rewrite again and look up still to heaven, that you our God must have your eyes continually upon the land, to make it yield fruit. For it is not enough for you that your God send you rain once; but he must be fain to hold on still: for other way there is none to water the land, except your God power out his blessing upon you from heaven. Otherwise the land must need lie dry and untilled. Thus do we see how Moseses meaning is, to stir up the people to live in awe and fear, and to provoke them to call upon God continually, and therewithal to submit themselves to his government, and to consider how great need they have of his help, so as they may say: Alas Lord, what will become of us if you bless us not?

Moreover he puts them in mind also, to consider what a fatherly care God had of the land of Chanaan, since it was his pleasure to rain so upon it, not for once a year only, but yearly from the beginning of the year to the end of it. That is the effect of the things that Moses intended to say here. And thereby we be done to understand, that Gods bringing of us into distress and necessity, is to provoke us to repair unto him, and to look up to his goodness, so as we should not only have cause to give him thanks for his benefits; but also be driven to call upon him by being held at the staves end, and thereupon daily resort unto him. After the same manner, wee see nowadays how we have need of fair weather; and that not for four or five days in a year: but as often as seed is to be laid into the ground, or the land is to be tilled; or else we see men could not put the plough into the ground; nor sow their corn: if they should, it would rot immediately, and never take root in the earth: Again the grapes would rot upon the vines and never ripen. Nevertheless, when corn is laid into the ground, it requires rain; and it is mard if there follow an immeasurable drought. Afterward in summer time when harvest comes, the time must be fit for it and likewise for dressing of vines and for mowing of grass. To be short, all the year long God calls us to him, by making us to have need of him. And although we were not provoked at all, yet the very wit and understanding that he gives us by nature, may cause us to see that he calls us daily to come unto him, and to put our whole trust in his goodness. This is the thing in effect which we hate to remember upon this text:

But the chief point is to put this lesson well in practice. And therefore when so ever we see that our God has looked upon us throughout all the year; let us understand that his intent was to show the more familiarly, what a fatherly care he has over us. For if we had any river like to Niles which watered the land instead of rain: we would think thus with ourselves well, now has God done pitying of us for this year: & it would not touch us so well, as when we see the God not only regards us in the spring time, but also holds on all the year long, so as there is not any one day of all the year, wherein we may not behold Gods wonderful goodness, in makings earth to yield fruit for our sustenance, by considering how he is fain one while to hold the rain locked up, & another while to open the windows & water gates of heaven, that we may have moisture in due season: How he is fain to send heat, and to assuage it again: & to send cold and to abate it again; how he is fain to send fair weather & soil and to temper the one with the other: so as finally, we have need of all these diversities, in their due times and seasons. And since we see that God provides us of all there things; ought we not to be the better assured that he has a continual regard of us and never forgets us, and that he is a father to us all the year long? Like as a man that is mindful of his household, rises betimes a mornings to go to his business; & when he has done one thing, looks about if there be anything else to let in order; forecasting in his mind how to dispose the things that are given him so as the benefit thereof may redound to his whole household: even so God behaves himself as a householder towards us, so as he ceases not to watch for our benefit both early and late; not that he is fain to toil after the manner of men: but that

howsoever the case stand, he makes us to feel that he is more than a foster father to us, & we be too blind & beastly if we consider it not. Thus you see how the practicing of this lesson of Moseses, consists in giving thanks to our God, according to the variety of the time & weather which we perceive in the year. And when he has provided us for the whole year; let us assure ourselves that he has had pity of us, and regarded us, and never turned his eye from our benefit, to the end that we might be furnished and provided thereof. Furthermore, it is not enough for us to thank God when we have so felt his goodness: but like as Moses said here, that his eyes are always upon the lands that are full of hills & dales, where hollow grounds are not at commandment to cut trenches in, nor streams at hand to water the fields as it were gardens: so when we think upon those things, we must bear in mind that God has his eyes continually upon us, to the end that we also should lift up our eyes unto him, to call upon him and to reform to him for succor all the year long, & that when he has given us a good season, we should pray for the continuance thereof thereafter, as we should have need of it, and it ought to provoke us to do the like from day to day. But contrariwise, we see our own negligence. For when things fall out according to our mind, we do as it were despise God. If we see there has been a good seed time, then go to, let us make good cheer: seeing the seed time was so good, we are like to have as good a harvest. And do we wonder; God disappoints us of our desire, because of such unthankfulness? What a lewdness is that? God has his eyes upon us, & yet we shut our eyes at him, & kick & spurn against him, & mock at him: and think we that he either ought or can bear with such beastliness? Nay rather, seeing that he says first, My children, I look upon you & have a care of you, to provide sustenance for you: it would become us to be answerable unto him. Seeing; our Lord begins after that fashion, what ought we to do? Ought we not at leastwise to say, well Lord, and we likewise will have an eye unto you? Nay, contrariwise, when we have received benefits at his hand, we fall to kicking against him. He would take us into his protection, & we fall to flinging away from him. Again, where is the care that we ought to have to call upon him? It would become us to consider thus with ourselves, Our Lord holds us as it were at the staves end, to the intent we should stand in awe of him: now therefore, let us not give our lusts the head: as if a father should say to his children, sirs, look that you apply yourselves well, the one of you at his book and the other at his work, & then shall you have your dinner, & else you shall have nothing. If a father hold his children at that point, so as they know not whether they shall have meat & drink or no, except it appear that they have done some good, surely it will move them though they have no reason nor understanding. Behold, our God could well give us at once all that ever we need:

or else he could in one day show us that the year should be prosperous, so as there should be both a good harvest and good vintage: but he will not do it. When we have passed over one day, we must begin again the next day to pray to him: & God has ordained that it should be so, because he sees well that it is more than requisite for us to be held in awe. And therefore let us learn to profit ourselves by this lesson: & when so ever we want rain, let us beware that we be patient, in waiting quietly God open the clouds. And on the other side, when he vouchsafes to watery earth; let us understand that he gives us sustenance with his own hand, and let us call upon him daily: & since we perceive he watches for us; let us likewise have our eyes upon him again. Thus you see in effect what Moses meant to declare here.

Now he adds thereunto; If you keep the commandments which I set before you, so as you love your God, & serve him with all your heart, in the land which I will give you. Here Moses puts the people in mind again what the true service of God is: namely that we learn to obey him. This has been sufficiently laid forth already: but yet is it not without cause that the holy Ghost speaks of it so often. For it stands us in hand to have such warnings set before us, as it were every minute of an hour. And for proof thereof, how serve we God, but by force & constraint? We have no willingness nor desire at all to it. But our Lord tells us; he accepts no service that is done unto him, except it come from the heart, & that we love him as our father, according as it is said in the psalm, that we cannot fear God but because he shows himself merciful unto us. For so long as we conceive nothing in God but rigor; we can do nothing else but shun him, shrink away from him as far as is possible: & although we be constrained to look unto him, yet shall he draw nothing that is aught worth from us. Therefore first step to serve God well & to love him, is to know his favorableness that we may rest upon it, & look for mercy & labor at his hand. For like as in the said hundred & thirty psalm: so also here, mention is made of obedience after love, to show us that it is not enough to pretend the service of God; but that we must so submit ourselves to him, as we may say, Lord you has given us the grace to rule our life aright; & therefore vouchsafe to govern us in such sort, as none of us may take leave to do what he hit, but all of us may harken simply to your voice, to submit ourselves thereunto.

Now let us come to the word that Moses adds which is, I will give. Here he speaks in the person of God. He had said before, look that you obey the commandments which I set before you, & the Lord your God will bless you. And now he says: I will give, as though he himself were god. It is not without cause he changes the person after that fashion: for it serves to give the greater authority to his doctrine, & to make it robe the better received. For we be inclined to such contempt & scornfulness, that when God speaks unto us by men, we make no account of it, because his word is preached unto us by mortal men. Behold, a man speaks in the pulpit, & we be not touched with his doctrine as were requisite. It ought to have there a heavenly majesty; and we be so dull and gross, that we perceive not how it is God that speaks there. In this respect Moses said here; I will give you: and yet for all that, he was not able to give them one drop of rain. And what is his giving then? Verily he shows that his speaking is not of himself, but of God, , and therefore that we must receive it as if God had spoken it with his own mouth, and had showed himself in visible shape, and uttered his glory to the eye. Let us mark well then that in this text we be done to understand, that when we come to the hearing of a sermon or to the reading of the holy scripture, we must not bring deaf ears with us to be no whit moved at the words, nor to be quickened up by the commandments and exhortations that are given us there: but we must yield ourselves unto our God, assuring ourselves that although he serve his turn by men as his instruments, yet is it he himself that sends the message and authorizes the word, according to this saying of our Lord Jesus Christ: He that hears you hears me, and he that receives you receives me. And whosoever rejects you, rejects me also, and likewise my father that sent me. You see then how it is an open rebelling against God, when we disdain to hear his word that is preached unto us by men, and to hear it with as much humility as is he himself came down unto us, or as if he sent it us by the Angels of heaven. That is the matter which Moses meant to show here.

Now in the end he says, that they shall have their fill, and be well maintained, when they shall have kept Gods commandments after that fashion. We have two points to mark in this text for a conclusion. The first is, that our Lord tells his people, that he will not barely give them whatsoever is needful for them: but also give them their fill of his benefits, so as they that be thoroughly lodged with them. That is for the one. The second is a coming back to that which has been touched already: namely, that although God speak but of temporal goods, such as concern but this transitory life; yet he leads them further thereby. First therefore let us understand, that God not only gives and bestows upon us, such things as he knows to be needful for us; but also enlarges and extends his riches yet further, by using a kind of over measure. And in very deed we see it to be so. For as in respect of natural necessity, what needed we more than bread and water? But God adds wine to comfort and glad mans heart, as is said in the psalm. Again we see he vouchsafes to pleasure us after all sorts, by sending us so many things as are in the world to delight us withal, which are all witnesses of his liberality towards us, in that he not only provides us of all the things which we could not forbear; but also adds as an over plus, a great number of good things that serve for our pleasure: Whereby we ought to be the more provoked to love him, and they ought to be as wings to us, wherewith to fly unto him. But contrariwise, if God give us store, we cannot forbear to pamper ourselves like brute beasts, insomuch that we be wedded to this world. I speak not only of drunkards and Gluttons that cram themselves till they be without wit & reason: but also of all such as are in love with their delicates and delights, so as if they have abundance more than ordinary, they cannot hold themselves within any measure, but thereupon do fall asleep, and in stead of being provoked to resort unto God, do run away from him, or rather lie weltering and bathing of themselves in their pleasures, and forget themselves I ought not how. Wherefore let us mark well, that when God gives us abundance, it is not to minister occasion of disorder, but to make us the more in love with him, forasmuch as he handles us not as servants or hirelings, but as his own children, from whom he withholds nothing. Now then, since we see this; let us learn to fare the better by it. Thus much concerning that word Fill. But yet let us mark, that although God give us not our fill; yet fails he not to show his free goodness in so doing, insomuch that there was never yet so great a famine, but that our Lord has always showed himself a father, yea and more than a father towards men: but ill is that considered of us. And that is a cause an why he bestows not so much as were requisite Gods benefits have so ill entertainment at our hands, he also is fain to shut his blessings from us, and to let us alone in want and penury. Thus much concerning the first point.

And touching the second, let us mark that when God feeds and maintains us in this world even to our own contentation; the same must be a provocation to us to consider by faith, the infinite riches that are reserved for us above in heaven. It is said in the psalm, I shall have my fill of the abundance of your goodness. And in an other place it is said, Lord how great is the abundance of your goodness, which you has laid up for them that love you? True it is that God makes us to feel the abundance of his goodness, partly even in this world: but yet shall we never have our fill of it, (as is said in the sixteenth psalm) until our Lord have taken us up to himself, & rid us quite out of this world. And so let us mark, that the full measure of the good things that are promised us, & which we look to enjoy, is not to be found here beneath, it is enough that we see some part of them. Yea and although our Lord bestow but as much upon us as he sees requisite for our infirmity: Let us always be led up higher thereby, so as it may make us to consider, that when the time comes wherein God well show himself unto us face to face, then shall we be linked much nearer to him than we be now: and (to be short,) that when we be gathered up into his heavenly kingdom, then we shall have our fill of all things. You see then that we must so pass through this world, as we must not take our fill, contentation, and rest in the things that are here, but be drawn ever higher and higher to the spiritual good things: and that if we linger in penury hour beneath, we must consider that by that mean God provokes us to come unto him, until we be perfectly united unto him, as the union shall be at the last day.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good GOD with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, so as it may cause us to liable ourselves continually, and to mislike of ourselves, and to ask him forgiveness of the great number of sins and iniquities which we have committed; and that in the meanwhile it may please him to bear with us in our weakness; until he have clothed us again with his owns righteousness, and also taken us up into his endless glory. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all, &c.

The 77th Sermon which is the fourth upon the
eleventh Chapter

16 Beware that your heart be not beguiled, and that you turn not away to serve other Gods, and to bow down before them.

17 Least the wrath of your God be kindled against you, and he shut up the heaven that it rain not, and the earth yield not her fruit, and least you perish suddenly from of the good Land which the Lord gives you.

18 Therefore lay up there words in your hearts and in your minds, and tie them for a token to your hands, & let them be as frontlets written between your eyes.

19 And teach them to your children, talking of them when you are at home in your house, & when you goes abroad, and when you lie down, & when you rifest.

20 See you write them upon the portals and gates of your house.

21 That your days & the days of your children, may be increased in the Land which the Lord swear to your fathers to give you, as long as the skies are over the earth.

When as Moses says here, that men must beware that they overshoot not themselves: thereby he does us to understand, how frail we be, & how inclined unto evil, if we be not diligently restrained by the fear of God, & by continual minding of the doctrine whereby he guides and governs us. To our seeming it had been enough to have said; Keep the commandments of your God. You see what he requires of you: since you know his will, hold yourselves to it. But forasmuch as men are inconstant, & a small thing or nothing will make them start out of the right way: he adds yet further this warning, that they should beware; As if he should say; Sirs, keep good watch. Why so? For wee shall be surprised by and by, if we watch not to withstand Satan's temptations & wiles. Specially when the case concerns the serving of God, we be straight ways turned aside, and we need none other body to tempt us, for every man shall find continually some seed of superstition in his own heart, and the mind of man is a warehouse of Idolatry, so as even without schooling, every of us will forge idols, & overthrow the service of God. For the devil sleeps not, ne ceases to entangle us in many fond & wicked fancies. Hereby therefore we may judge how needful this warning is for us, where we be willed to be watchful: Yea and we know that frailty of our mind to be such, that if we be not well fenced to understand Satan's temptations constantly, he will soon have turned us out of the way of salvation, & from the pure doctrine of God. And therefore let us understand at a word, that we have need to stand continually upon our guard, as long as we live in this mortal life. For why? On the one side the devil tempts us, & has an infinite number of wiles to wind about us every minute of an hour: & although his temptations were not so great as they be; yet are we so weak of ourselves, that everything of nothing is able to overthrow us. Since it is so with us, let us watch, specially seeing that the spirit of God warns us so to do. But what? It is well seen how we be taken unawares & unprovided, and God punishes our negligence in falling so asleep, as though we were at peace & rest here. Nay our life must be kept occupied here as though there were continual war, & the devil fails not to put us to infinite assaults & skirmishes on all sides. And therefore seeing we on our side be so sleepy, and our enemy on the other side is so watching to cut our throats: it is good reason that we should so be overcome. For seeing that God warns us to stand at our defense, & we vouchsafe not to be mindful of it, & to call upon him & to refer ourselves unto his protection; must he not needs show us by experience, that his warning of us is not without cause? Yes; & therefore let us bear this exhortation in mind, & specially when God is to be served (as I said afore), let us assure ourselves there needs nothing to dazzle our eyes, as appears by experience. As soon as the true & pure religion is established in any place; by & by men fall to embracing of it; for their very nature affords it. And therefore so much the more behoves it us to hold ourselves as imprisoned, and not to swarve one way nor other, that we may hold ourselves continually in the pure simplicity of Gods word. Again let us not be out of quiet though never so many men do turn out of the right way: for it is their kind so to do. Wherefore let us strengthen ourselves against such stumbling blocks, when we see corruptions creep in again, & that such as were in a good trade doe disgrace themselves. Since it is so that men do easily fall asleep, & take no heed to themselves: let us not marvel though every thing of nothing do corrupt them. Thus you see how this sentence may serve us to double purpose.

And it is said expressly, that our hearts should not be beguiled. For it is not enough for a man to abstain from doing of evil willfully: but also all fond devotions are likewise condemned, because our Lord will not have men to be self-wise, but to obey simply whatsoever God commands them. Men think it to be a reasonable excuse before God, when they can say, I meant to do well: but that meant is but a mockery, as Moses shows here. And for proof thereof, although our hearts be beguiled, so as men perceive not their own evil doings and destruction, but make their reckoning that God will take their doings in good worth: yet are they condemned here (as you see) with all their good intents, and they fail not to offend God nevertheless, and in offending him they fail not also to heap up vengeance upon their own heads. And why so? Even because they walk not in obedience unto him. Now then, let us learn, not to shield or shroud ourselves any more under devotions after the foolish manner that has reigned too much in the world: but let us understand that our Lord will have us to fetch light at his word, and to rule our lives by that. And since he is so good to us as to teach us what is good, to the intent that Satan may not have any entrance into us, but that he may be put back though he go prying about us and endeavor to undermine is, and seek never so many by ways to creep into us: let us assure ourselves throughly, that we have but only one way, from that which it is not lawful for us to step aside in any wise. And when we stand so upon our guard, let us not doubt but that God will reach us his hand, & so fence us on all sides, as Satan may well practice what he lists, but he shall never win anything at our hands. For otherwise this exhortation were to no purpose. If God should say unto us, beware, & in the meanwhile we had no means to beware, he might seem to mock us. But inasmuch as when we resort unto him, he vouchsafes to guide us, by giving us the spirit of wisdom & discretion, to the end we should not be deceived surely whatsoever the devil praise, yet shall he not prevail, but we shall ever overcome his temptations, at least wise if we suffer ourselves to be governed by Gods pure word, so as we forsake our own fancies, & trust not to our own wit, but pray God to enlighten us, and to show us by his holy spirit, what is acceptable unto him. When we go to work after that fashion, so as our wariness is matched with humility, it is certain that God will always reach us out his mighty hand. Thus you see that the thing which we have to put in use, is first of all to be vigilant & to keep good watch: and secondly that forasmuch as we know we may quickly be deceived, we must pray God to defend us, & utterly distrusting ourselves, lean only unto him. These two things will so preserve us, that we shall continually keep right way, even in the midst of darkness. For why? God himself will serve us both for Sun and Moon, as it is said in the Prophet Esay.

serving of God and in his pure religion, they were less to be excused than all the infidels of the world: for it is said unto them, turn not away. Men that have never had any good instruction, are by nature as brute beasts; but when God has called us and showed us the true soundness, then if we fail afterward, it is not with us as with the silly infidels that have ever been blind and ignorant, but it is a rebellious turning away unto wickedness, as though we meant to spite our God by separating ourselves from him, by renouncing the covenant which he had made with us, to hold us under his subjection. This saying therefore ought to be well weyed, & specially of us in these days which have the pure truth of Gospels whereas you see how all our neighbors round about us run headlong on still to blindness. Indeed it is pity that they have not known Gods truth but yet shall not that excuse them. But what is to be said to us in comparison of them, seeing that our God has showed himself to us, & has laid the matter so plain before us, as we cannot miss but know how to obey him? Wherefore let us take heed that we keep on our course, when God shall have let us in the way of his obedience, & taught us how to do it. Let us beware (I say) that we step not aside in any wise, unless we intend to be worthy of double blame. Let us bethink us of this saying, that the servant which knows his masters will, shall have double punishment if he do it not. And that we may so do, let us seek to settle ourselves; more by Gods word. When he has once told us what he would have us to do, let us profit therein, & let us be so strengthened thereby; the devil (do what he can, and enforce he himself never so much against us) may not be able to turn us out of the way.

Now he speaks afterward of strange Gods. For the wellspring of all evil, is the not knowing what God we should serve. If men be to seek in that point, needs must all the rest of their life be utterly uncertain, & wrapped up altogether in error. And therefore it is not for naught that God stands upon this point, that men should know him, & serve & worship only him alone. For when we say we must serve no strange Gods: it imports two things. The first is that we should be able to discern who is our God, so as we ground not ourselves upon false opinion or fancy, but upon substantial certainty: which thing cannot be if we give way to our own mother wit. For that is the root whence all the superstitions in the world have sprung. And the very cause of huge confusion is still in the world at this day, is that men take leave continually to imagine whatsoever comes in their heads. O (say they) I crow God will like well of this: & to my seeming, such a thing is good. Now if men behave themselves so after their own imagination, all things must needs be out of order. You see it is even a very sea gulf. Therefore let us learn to give ear to God when he speaks to us, & let us not take leave to conceive anything of him, otherwise than is showed us by his word. This then is the first point, that we should learn to discern our God from all the idols which the world forgets to itself: & therewithal that we should not attempt any thing, but that which he allows. For the Papists can well enough protest, that their intent is to serve; God that made both heaven & earth; & so also do the Jews & Turks: the case is common to them all. But yet for all that, you see how the Turks have wounded themselves into a maze of superstitions, through deceitfulness of their Mahomet who has bewitched them. Again the Jews on their part are grown out of kind, & have mingled the Law their own inventions, refusing the redeemer that had been promised them, who is the very foundation of all the religion which they should have held. And as for the Papists, world sees how they have corrupted all truth, & turned it utterly into lying. Therefore let us learn, that if we will not worship strange Gods, we must so hold ourselves in awe, as we attempt not anything; unless we be sure that it is according to Gods will. For when so ever we fall to worshipping him after our own device; we doe set up an idol in our own brain: & that is a thing which he utterly dislikes, rejects, and abhors. Thus you see that the thing which we have to remember upon this place is that seeing God has granted us the grace to have his word to be our guide, we ought to be the more watchful: & since we be so weak as we need not anything to thrust us out of the way; we ought to take so much the more heed, that we may profit daily by his word. And besides that, let us assure ourselves throughly, that it is not enough for us to wean we do well: for we win nothing by being deceived, our case is never a whit amended by it before God: & therefore let us learn to pray him to enlighten us. And therewithal let us know, when God has showed us his will, we must hold us to it without adding aught thereto. Thus you see in effect what we have to remember upon this text of Moseses.

Now he adds immediately, that men should lay up the things in their hearts which he tells them, & that they should make a continual monument of them: as if it were of bracelets about their wrists, or of attires on their heads, or of devices in writing at the entrance of their doors: to the intent they might occasion them to think upon the la of God; so as at their rising in the morning, & confer of it, that their children might learn thereby. Hereby Moses shows yet better, that unless men be held as it were by force, they will soon start away from God: Like as when a man thinks he has made a Fox tame, if he let him alone but one half day, he returns again to his kind by and by. Even so is it with us. We be so wild, that although it may seem for a time that we be throughly brought home unto God, & very well reformed: yet in the turning of a hand all is quite forgotten.

And therefore our Lord is fain to put us in remembrance, (as he does in this text) & to quicken us up to enforce ourselves to seek all the means and helps that may be, to hold ourselves in awe under his obedience. That is the cause why he said, that folk should make the frontlets as ornaments of their heads. Whereas men do commonly wear brooches, buttons, & such other things, & women wear billiments of gold and other costly attires upon their heads: the attire of the faithful must be to have some remembrance of Gods law. Instead of bracelets & other fine toys to apparel & deck ourselves withal; we must use such an attire as may teach us to garnish our souls, yea & to give ourselves wholly to God, & to submit ourselves altogether to his word. Instead of the having of gay things to furnish our houses withal or delight, we must have some such thing as may put us in mind to say, These are the things that our God calls us unto, he will never have us to forget him. And if we have overshot ourselves so as our minds do wander abroad, he calls us home again, & tells us that we must not range so after our own vain fancies. Thus we see some of that which is contained here. We have had the like saying in the sixth Chapter. But yet this shows us more expressly, that it is not enough for us to have withdrawn ourselves for once from our vain and wandering imaginations: but God must be fair to bring us to that point again, by putting us in mind of our slouth and negligence, or else we shall dwell in it continually, and he must be fain also to show us the weakness & feebleness of our spirits. And indeed, very experience shows it: for the whisking of a fly before our eyes, is enough to make us run after it, & to do what we can to stop her. We build castles in the air, & by and by all vanishes away. Now then seeing there are so many vanities in our brain, do we wonder that we do very quickly flat away from God? What a number of occasions are there in this world, to turn us this way & that way, so as we shall be led & caned quite away ere ever we think on it? Again, Satan is such a subtle Sire, that if we be not well armed against him, we shall never continue in the obeying of our God. This repetition therefore is not superfluous, where God tells us again, that it is good for us to have his law written everywhere, so as we might read his commandments upon our fingers. And he has disposed them into ten sentences, to the end they should be the better known unto us. For look how many fingers there are upon our hands, so many are commandments of God, to the intent they should be the easier to bear in remembrance: so as there needs no log registers, (which were hard to carry away,) forasmuch as he has given us so short a rule, that if we be long in learning of it, we prove ourselves to be willful. To be short, if we shut not our eyes willfully, we cannot say but that we may soon have learned the things which our god shows us. Again since it is his will that instead of the decking whereunto both men & women are too much given through fond desire of vainglory, we should have wherewith to put ourselves in mind of his law, that we might be held in awe by it: what excuse will there be for us, if we fall to going astray, or if we be wedded to this world, or give ourselves to wickedness? Thus much concerning this text.

But according to the fashion of the world, which is always given to hypocrisy, & to shameful mocking at all Gods ordinances, the Jews made them frontlets of certain sentences of Gods law, and they observed the law very well as in respect of the words that are let down here. For they had bracelets of them, & rolls, & attires on their heads, so as it might seem that there was nothing but holiness in them. Also they had the commandments written in their houses. All this (say I) was well done. But they surmised that they served God by there outward shows: and that was nothing so. We also for our part should come to the same point likewise, if we considered not what the will of our God is, to submit ourselves thereto. For as I said before) hypocrisy is so rooted in mans nature, that they would always be dallying with God, & content him with counterfeiting, so as there might be nothing but dissimulation: & yet for all that, they bear themselves in hand, that he ought to hold the discharged. But we must mark that God will not be served by the writing of some sentence of his Law upon a post or a door, or at the entry of a house; his meaning is nothing so, But what? Forasmuch as he sees that we be short witted, & that although we have been taught his word duly, yet we bee easily turned away from it; it is not without cause he will have us to seek all the helps that can be, that we may have the better stay of ourselves, & learn the remedies of our frailty, since we need none other thing to turn us out of the way. And since we know that vice to be in us; let us be the diligenter in seeking God, & let us say: How is it possible that I should hold myself in the fear of my God? If I should pass but one day without thinking upon him & upon his commandments: I should forget him by & by. What is to be done then? As soon as I rise in the morning, the devil offers me the many lets. Now it stands me in hand to resist him, & that I tarry not till mine enemy give me the assault: but I must think upon my God who calls me to him. Again at night when I go to bed, forasmuch as a nighttimes the devil ceases not to put many fond fancies in my head, and a man is not able to restrain his own mind from conceiving some vain thoughts or other: it behoves me to be still fenced by being mindful of my God, & by referring myself unto him & by resting wholly there. For if I tarry long, I shall be so withdrawn from him, that I shall not find the way there again, like as when a man takes no heed, but runs galloping on without minding of his way whether he be right or no; the longer he travels, the further he is from his way; yeah & if there be fold to se thim in the way, & he regards not to take the right way gain, then is he well worthy to wander still out of his way. If one say to him, Sir, you must take on that hand, and yet he will needs go the contrary way, as though his wits were roving in the air, & so goes on still: in the end he shall find himself far off from the right way. And therefore let us beware that we be not so headstrong in our vanities, as not to endeavor to amend ourselves. For (as I said before) we may easily wander out of the ay every minute of hour, so as we need not anything to make us stray from the right way. But if we be out of it, let us seek to come in again by and by & to be reformed. For our God is not far from us, he promises by his Prophet Esay, that he will be at our backs, as a schoolmaster is at the back of a young scholar. And like as the mother that has her eye always upon the child that she brings up, will always be at hand by it: so God shows by a familiar example, that he will be at our elbow, if so be that we seek him & suffer him to reform us. And therefore let us learn to exercise ourselves in the study all the time of our life. And specially since we see there is so urgent necessity, let every of us quicken up himself, & let us not tarry till the devil have carried us so far astray, that we can no more return into the way; but as soon as we set but one step away, or swarve never so little aside, let us bethink ourselves again by & by. Nay let us not tarry so long; but let us be beforehand, & let us call so much the more earnestly upon our God to guide us, & to prevent us with his goodness. Let us follow his word, which the true shoot anker, & the very lamp to give us light. Let us open our eyes to behold the light that he shows us, & let us often call to mind the things which we have learned. Let every of us mark to what vice he is inclined, that he may seek the remedy of it, as some be given to one affection & some to another. And so when we once know our own diseases, let us apply the fit medicines unto them. In God word we shall find that now of them wherewith to heal & cure us, so we be willing to use the good that is offered us there. Thus you see in effect how we ought to practice this text. It consists not in the doing of a sort of Ceremonies, nor in pretending fair countenances, by wearing texts of Gods law upon our apparel, or by writing up of a number of goodly sentences without any other minding of them at all; all that (say I) is nothing. What then? We must seek the means to confirm ourselves in the fear of our God, and to recover again into the right way: & because we be so weak, we must receive such remedies as God appoints us.

Above all things we must observe that which is said here; Lay up the commandments which I set before you, in your hear and in your soul. To the intent then that men should not stand poring upon the outward fashion & figure; that is the chief point. The mark (say I) whereat he shoots, and whereunto all this doctrine is to be referred, is that Gods law should be in our hearts and in our souls. For though we have it ever before our eyes, & at our tongues end, so as we seem to set never so great store by it, and yet in the meanwhile our hear is locked up, & we have no courage to serve God: truly we do but deceive men, & procure ourselves the sorer condemnation before God. Now then let us have gods law written, let us have the saying of it painted upon our walls as in the tables, & let us have things to put us in mind of it easily & lare; but let not that serve for our discharge, as though God were to be paid in such coin, How then? Let us endeavor to have it so graven in our hearts, as it may never be wiped out again, year even in our hearts & in our souls. That is to say, in such sort as it may possess all our affections. For that is the place where Gods word is to be kept. But what? The thing that S. James speaks of, is seen more nowadays a days than ever it was; namely that they which come to hear Gods word, take as much profit by it, as by looking upon themselves in a glass: they be no sooner gone, but all is forgotten. What fares a man the better by his seeing of himself in a glass? As soon as he turns away his face, his shape vanishes away. Even so it is with us. Whereas our coming to Gods word, should be to be transformed into the likeness of God, (as S. Paul teaches us in the second to the Corinthians,) & whereas it is the power & property of the Gospel, to transform us into the glory of God, by beholding him in the person of Jesus Christ: we come to it but to make a pastime of it, so as Anon all slips away again, & there remains no substance nor power of it with us. And by that means the precious seed of the Gospel perishes. For it lights among stones, so as it can take no route. A man may look a good deal of corn, if he cast it upon the dry ground, or in a footpath, or upon stones: for the birds will pick it up by and by. Even so let us not marvel though Gods word enter not into us, for whereas our hearts ought to be tilled as when a plough has eared a piece of land: they lie fully opened & unbroken up at all. By reason whereof, Gods word may well be given us as a seed, but it shall do us no good, the devil will catch it away by and by, because it sinks not into our hearts & our souls. That is the cause why I said that all Moses has spoken of frontlets, of bracelets, & of writings set up in men's houses, must be referred altogether to this, that we shall fare never a whit the better for the uttering of the Law unto us, nor understand anything at all by it, until it have taken root in us, & that we have received it with hearty affection to give ourselves unto God.

And yet is not all that we have to do, neither does God thing that enough that every man should endeavor to profit himself by it: but he will also have the fathers to teach their children. Where in he shows that (as I have said before) it is not enough for us to serve our God during our own life: but we must also provide that the lead of religion may remain after our decease. For we be transitory and our life is but a shallow and therefore in as much as Gods truth is immortal, it is good reason that it should continue for ever, & that it should be preserved from hand to hand, & that men should put their endeavor thereunto. And specially when God has given them children, it behoves them to know that it is a treasure, and that they must yield an account therefore. For it is no small honor that God does to men & women, when he gives them children. They be creatures fashioned after the image of God, & we term them the seed of the Church. Now then seeing that God commits them to our charge: it is good reason that we should endeavor to bring them up in such wise as god may be served by them, that when religion shall have continued our course all our life long, it may also hold and continue still even after our death. But here we see our own negligence, or rather lewdness. For we be not only slothful; but we see how the most part of us do shun and eschew (as much as we can) to be trained in Gods word. If men be spoken to of it, it is a corsie to them, & if they perceive that there shall be talk of any good doctrine, they have no regard to come there. It is well seen that a number are word than that Turks, & are so bewitched with their own fond options, that as soon as they bell rolls to call & provoke us to come daily to that hearing of Gods word, they go another way. And for proof thereof, what a number are there which withdraw themselves from it as much as they can? Yea & when they come; they stop their ears willfully, because they be occupied about their wicked affections, and the devil has to besotted them, as they find not any favor at all in any word that is spoken unto them, but are weary of it as soon as there is any matter spoken concerning God.

As for the bringing up of children, the world see what it is. Fathers are loth to have their children better than themselves, for fear least they should put them to shame. Forasmuch as they themselves have despised God all the time of their life; they be contented that their children shall despise him full as much or double: & if they happen to have any regard to the doctrine, it is but for fashions sake, & by way of constraint. But we be so taught these things in this text, that it shall cost us full dear to have been so warned by God, if we regard as the things that he has told us. Therefore let us be always careful to bear Gods word in mind, assuring ourselves that although we have profited never so well; yet are we but in the way, & we must go on still; so as the once knowing of things is not enough for us, but we must be fain to be put in remembrance of them continually, & to be stirred up by God; or else we shall start away by and by. Now then let us think upon it, & let every of us have an eye to that change that is committed unto him. Let such as have children bring them up in the fear of God, & let they be their chief care; for it is the best inheritance that they can leave them. For otherwise, although they leave them never for rich, and set them at never of good a stay; all must needs go to ruin. For God will curse all, if it be not grounded upon the pure religion. For whereas our Lord speaks of going to bed, and rising up, of rest and labor: it is not for naught. For he shows us that we have need of all the helps that can be, to put us in mind of his law. And therefore since we see that by all manner of means we be turned away from the remembering of God, if the helps that are showed us here be not set still before us: there occasions ought to quicken us and stir us up thereunto.

First of all then, whereas it is said when you go to bed at night, when you raise a mornings: it shows us that we may well take our rest, and think upon all our bodily needs, so as a man may well seek his case when he is weary of traveling & of following his business all day long: but if we be so careful to seek the rest of our bodies: is it not said also that the rest of our souls is to hear the voice of god. If a man say, I have no leisure: has you no leisure to rise in the morning? Again, when you comes to the table to take your repast, has you not time enough to edify yourself in the fear of God? Moreover, when you are about your business all the day, or when you are going a journey; must God needs be forgotten all the while? No: but yet do men always find lets to keep them from coming unto God. Indeed we may easily find trifling excuses to content men withal: but when God said unto us, Go to, what have you to do all your life long? are you so fore troubled that you cannot spare a little time to exercise yourselves in my word? I give you time enough to follow your own business and yet so as you may bestow some time in the study of my doctrine: but you think not upon it: Nay rather you take occasion to turn away from it at every small let that can happen. And by that means you be hardened in all evil, so as a man cannot reclaim you, but you become worse than wild beasts. Thus you see of what contempt and ungodliness we be convicted, when we benefit not ourselves by Gods doctrine, wherein we ought to keep ourselves occupied at all times.

Furthermore whereas he speaks of talking of it; it is a rebuking of the wicked corruption that is among men, who never make an end of their foolish talk: but when they should speak of god; the matter must be cut off by & by by the waste, and they think it to be but matter of grief. Yea and they be not contented to use fond and foolish talk; but they do also use ribaldry & lewd talk, such as tends to the poisoning one of another. And therefore it is good reason that God should tell us that the things which we have heard today, had need to be brought oftentimes to our remembrance: and that God had need to quicken us up, so as we may be made to bethink ourselves; And that forasmuch as we be pulled back with such sloth, and we see ourselves are carried away with so great and urgent necessity, that our minds are given altogether to evil; insomuch that when so ever God allures them to good, by and by they shrink away unto evil: we perceiving the same, should take the helps that God sets down for us, in telling us that we must think upon his laws both at our uprising a mornings, and at our going to bed a nights, & that we must talk of them all the day long. Let us assure ourselves it is not without cause that God spake so to his own people; but that it is a general lesson for all men in all ages, and he speaks not only to the rude and unskillful, that they should take those helps to refresh their remembrance: but he said All of you, do it every one of you. He speaks to those that wean themselves wisest. And therefore let no man think himself excepted here. such as have the charge of teaching others, understand that this is not spoken only to the rude and ignorant; but also to the intent that even they themselves should learn to rouse up themselves, and that all of us together should show ourselves so desirous to profit in Gods word; as we may seek to be put continually in mind of it, And let us assure ourselves, that it is the chief thing wherein we ought to occupy ourselves, so long as we be in this world.

And now let us cast ourselves down before the majesty of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to bring us to such repentance; that being ashamed of ourselves our only seeking may be to win his favor by fleeing to his mercy, and that we may attain thereunto by means of our lord Jesus Christ, praying him not only to forgive our offences past, but also to correct them after such sort in us, as our whole seeking may be to obey him. And that in the meanwhile it may please him to guide us: by his holy spirit, until he have brought us to the full fruition of the glory whereunto we be now going. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and Nations of the earth etc.

The 78th Sermon which is the fifth upon the eleventh Chapter

22 For if you do earnestly keep all the commandments which I command you to do, and that you love the Lord your God and walk in all his ways and flicks unto him:

23 Then the Lord will drive out all these Nations before you, and you possess Nations that are greater and stronger than yourselves.

24 Whatsoever place the sole of your foot treads on, it shall be yours. Your bounds shall be from the wilderness and from Libanus, and from the River, even the river of Euphrates, unto the uttermost sea.

25 No man shall be able to stand against you . The Lord your God will call the fear and dread of you upon the face of all the Land whereunto you go, as he has said unto you. We have seen what promise Moses made to the Israelites: namely that they should possess land which was given them to inherit. Howbeit forasmuch as their enemies might be a stop in their way, and it might well seem that God was not yet fully minded to performs that which he had said: he adds further, that that let also should be taken away. As how? Even by this, that God would cast a terror upon all the nations whom he had erst condemned, so as none of them should be all be to withstand the people that was so guided by his own hand. That is the effect of Moseses meaning in this place. And it is as much as if he had said unto us, When God has once warranted us a thing, although all the lets in the world should encounter us, yet ought we not to doubt of his promise. For why? The things that may seem impossible to men, are altogether in his, power, because no creature is able to refill him. And therefore when we be abashed at the sight of the impediments that come before our eyes: we must fall to the considering of the mightiness of our God, which is able to overcome all things. So then let us mark well, that wee muff fully conclude with our selves , that God is able to perform whatsoever bee bath uttered with his mouth: insomuch that although all accesses be (in our judgment) foreclosed unto him; yet will he wade through them all by his power. And therefore let us not measure the effect of Gods promises, by our own eye sight, nor by the conceit of our own natural understanding: but let us assure our Celtics that he has victory always in his hand, how much so ever the worlds let itself against him, and strive to stop the performance of that which he has spoken.

Herewith all, it stands us in hand to apply this thing chiefly to our own strengthening: and forasmuch as we see the devil ever ready to hinder our welfare, yea and to disappoint it utterly: let us have this saying continually printed in our remembrance, that God which has received us into his favor, and promised to lead us into the heritage of the kingdom of heaven, is the God of hosts and of victory, and that although all the furniture of hell do let itself against him, it is all naught worth, but shall be turned into smoke: insomuch that although we be driven to abide never so many assaults in this world; and that the devil never cease to practice one thing or other against us: yet are we sure that god will well enough work such devises, as wee shall never be overcome, so he be on our side, as he has assured us, so that we keep ourselves under his protection. And this is to be understood, not only of Satan himself, but also of all his upholders. For the devil uses all the means that can be; he has all the wicked at his beck; he rules them and drives them to all evil. Forasmuch therefore as they be led by the wicked spirit; they vex and trouble us as much as they can. But we have God on our side to fight for us, and we shall be defended by his power. Wherefore let us not fear but that he will always give us the victory, though we be same to endure much pain and trouble; for it cannot be but that in such encounters, there must ever needs be some terror, because we see that the wicked are always as whot as fire to annoy the children of God, and that as soon as they be able to stir but one finger, by and by they begin a new skirmish. Therefore must we bear it patiently, when so ever it pleases God to exercise us after that fashion. And we must wait for the end which Moses promises here to the faithful; which is, that they shall always have victory of their enemies. And so we see to what end this doctrine is to be applied.

Now remains to be noted also, that whereas God promises such things, he has men's hearts in his hand: for he adds the mean, which is, that he will cast our dread and our fear upon all our enemies. As if he should say, he will print his mark upon us, so as the wicked (be they never so full of rancor, and be they caned with never so great fury and rage) shall be abashed, dismayed, & utterly at their wits end. As to the worldward, they may well seem to have the hearts of Lions: but God will make them to melt away like water, so as men shall see with their eyes, that there is not so much as one drop of courage in any man, but so far forth as God gives it them. And as for us, although we be afraid, and have not so time a courage by nature: yet will God change us, & give us invincible constancy, so as although we had been men of war, and very valiant; yet should our manliness be nothing like to that which he will make us to feel in ourselves, so we go not presumptuously to work, but rest upon him, seeking to be upheld by his hand and favor. The matter therefore which we have to mark upon that place, is, first that whereas our life is as a warfare, yet must we not be afraid, because god has promised to fight for us. Yea, but we have to do with an over mighty enemy: and it is not one devil alone that we have to withstand, but infinite legions of devils. What can we do then, seeing we be so frail, and are tempted so on all sides, & (to be short) our safety is set as it were to the spoil? For what have we to defend ourselves withal? But wee must have an eye to our god. I have told you heretofore, that it is not without cause that he entitles himself to be the Gods of Hosts. It serves to show that he will defend us in such sort, as our enemies shall be disappointed. Although they advance themselves with never so raging violence, & that we be feared at their first alarms, yet that we always get the upper hand, by the helps of him which has all power in his hand. And indeed we know that God has his Angels, whom he has ordained for our safeguard. He thinks it not enough to reach out his arm to help us, but he has also uttered forth all his blessings, to fence us with them on all sides. Therefore let us trust to it, and let us walk on boldly through all the troubles that are prepared for us, not doubting but that we shall overcome them, having such a guide as is spoken of in this text. Again, let us also apply these things even to the necessities of this present life. Indeed the chief point is, that god should succor us to the intent we may finish the course of this present life. But yet must we be same to be aided by him every minute of an hour so as he lead us through the great number of evil ways which we have to pass, and preserve us from all dangers. So then we must be fully resolved of this, that God will not only give us victory in the end, thereby to bring us to the kingdom of heaven; but also will help us continually in this world, so as we shall wade out of all the troubles and perplexities wherein we be; insomuch that even when we seem to be utterly overwhelmed, he needs no more but to teach us his hand, and by & by we shall be afloat again. Moreover let us assure ourselves, that seeing God has promised us such victory against Satan and our Ghostly enemies: men also shall not be able to prevail, when they let themselves against us: but although the whole world be bent against us and at deadly food with us; yet ought it to suffice us; that God is favorable to us. For inasmuch as he has promised that all their practices which they attempt shall be to no purpose and that he will turn them upside down: we may well be quiet, and tarry his leisure still with patience; and although we be abashed for a time, and perceive not that God intends to work according to his sayings: yet let us stand steadfast in his doctrine, until he have showed us the effect of his truth. That is the way for us to despise and defy all the wicked that seek nothing else but to destroy us. They be like a sort of mad dogs, and when they cannot bite they will bark. They have their throats always open, and their teeth always sharpened, & their paws are always in a readiness, so as when so ever God lets them loose; they be crueller than Lions or any other beasts. Let us stick always to this that our Lord has taken us into his protection, and that when the wicked have done what they can, in the end they shall be overthrown and all their attempts shall come to no purpose or effect. That is the thing which you have to remember here. Notwithstanding, forasmuch as it cannot but be a trouble and vexation of mind unto us at all times, to see what power our enemies are of, and to see how spiteful they show themselves against us; let us have recourse to that which is said here, namely that God has men's hearts in his hand. And therefore be the pride of men never so great, and their stoutness such as were able to make the air and the world to tremble: yet let us assure ourselves that our Lord will turn it into fear and cowardliness, so as the parties that would needs be so feared of others, shall in the end have less courage than women and children. For why? it is God that gives men courage and constancy: and it is he that bereaves them of it again when he lists. Now then if we be fully persuaded and resolved that our Lord bridles men's hearts: we will not doubt but that he will always give us victory against our enemies; and it is the point which the scripture stands expressly upon. And to the intent we may know that men have not one spark of prowess or manhood in them, further forth than God gives it them, Salomon said expressly, that the hearts of kings are in the hand of God. It should seem that though all the rest of mankind be in subjection and bridled; yet kings be exempted from the common array: for no man dares once open his lips against them: & when they have once spoken the word, by and by it must be put in execution. It should seem therefore that they have a prerogative above all the world beside. Yea, but like as God makes the rivers to run here and there, and turns their streams which way he lists: so also does he hold the hearts of kings in his hand said Salomon. And what shall then become of the little Goslings when they perk up; & have no power nor strength at all: Shall we be dismayed at their threatening? The thing then wherein we must trust, is our yielding of honor to God which he requires at our hands, to wit; that it belongs to him to give men courage when they be fearful, & to daunt the courage of such as are as lusty as if they had the thunder & lightening at their commandment: for God will so cut their combs, as they shall not know where to become, but be utterly dismayed, so that instead of stoutness which they had showed before; there shall be nothing in them but weakness and fearfulness. After that manner must the faithful assure themselves. For otherwise what will become of us? In what taking are we? As I said before, we be hemmed in on all sides by Satan & his underlings. There is not that minute of an hour, wherein we have not somewhat to be afraid of: a thousand dangers beset us round about: & therefore what will become of us, if we be not so fully persuaded of this doctrine, as to make it to serve us for ditches & rampires, to hold out all the assaults that our enemies make upon us? And so, forasmuch as our life is full of unquietness, & we be threatened with many forte of death, so as we cannot step forth one foot but we shall meet with some mischance or other, specially considering the means which the devil has to annoy us withal, & the endeavor which he puts thereunto; & also considering the multitude of the wicked, whom he drives forward & carries headlong: let us put this lesson in ure, that the god of hosts who has the victory in his own hand, is on our fide & will defend us, so as we shall not be overcome, but be preserved & defended by his power. Have we this once well printed in our hearts, we may go on boldly: and though we see men never so full of pride that they spew it our again, and so spiteful that they could find in their hearts to ease us up at one bit: let us not pass for that; for God will strike them in such a fear, that they shall be daunted and discouraged; and although we have neither sword nor staff, yet shall they be vanquished by themselves, & not perceive why nor how, but only by Gods secret working. Let us look upon it, & experience will show us that God meant not to beguile us when he behighted it us with his own mouth. But our own unbelief & lewdness, suffer us not to perceive the thing by experience which is spoken here. We can enough make our complaints and say; how happens it that God gives such prowess to our enemies? how happens it that we be so cowardly and forlorn? We can ask such questions well enough. But we consider not the cause of them: & yet it is in ourselves & our enemies have none other power, than we ourselves give them: and I say the same of Satan, as well as of all his underlings. For when we forsake our god it is good reason that we should be disfurnished of his help, and he should let us alone like poor forlorn caitits looking on either side of us, & not espying any remedy to resist our enemies withal, because we be bereft of the guard and invincible fortress that God promised us, according as it is spoken of, both in Exodus and in the Psalm, where it said that the people were disappointed of their strong hold, when they had once forsaken God. I pray you if we stand not in awe of God, is it not reason that he should make us afraid, both of men & beasts, yea and even of a sly when it does but fly by us, as the scripture tells us? Behold, our God offers himself in his majesty, requiring that we should do him homage, by humbling ourselves unto him, and by offering ourselves both body & soul in sacrifice to him, that he may possess us: & we despise him, making but a mock at his holy word, so as he cannot get any service at our hands, for we strive against him like wild beasts. Seeing that this is apparent, is it not reason that he should chastise us, by making us to stand in fear of men? Yes: for what are we? Behold I am feared & made afraid, at the peering of a worm that does but put up his head at me. I need not to seek far to know the cause thereof. Let me but consider whether I have behaved myself well towards my God, in yielding him obedience in all things. Nay contrariwise, I have turned away from him, and moreover I have played the rebel, I have leaped beyond my bounds, and to be short, I have fought against him: and therefore I must not think it strange, if I be afraid of men, which are nothing. Verily God well yet more laugh our pride and overweening to scorn. For he will make us to quake at the falling of a leaf from a tree. To be short, as Salomon says, we shall flee when no man follows us: every little noise shall make us to think that we be pursued with main strokes. Verily it is a singular gift of God to have quietness of conscience, so as we may be assured of his defense. And on the contrary part, if we be not under his protection, we shall be dismayed without any cause on mans behalf, only because we have God against us. And so the cause why our enemies do so trouble us as we ought not where to become; is that we regard not our god. For is it reason that he should be our friend when we be not on his side? No: but he must rather let himself against us . And that is the cause why Moses both in other places, and specially in his song that is in the 32. Chapter, said, How could it be that a hundred of you should flee before one man, and that a thousand of you should be chased by a hundred of your enemies, if it were not for that the Lord has forsaken you, and delivered you as Prisoners into your enemies hands? Consider then (said he) that when you be afflicted by your enemies, it is for that your God has appalled you. For you be not worthy that he should put his power into you, or utter it in your behalf. And therefore when so ever we stand too much in fear of our enemies, & are so dismayed that we can hardly call upon God, but are overwhelmed with distrust and vexation of mind: let us understand that God has withdrawn himself from us, and has left us destitute after that fashion, because we be turned away from him, and have shaken off his fear, and not stood in awe of him as we ought to have done, in respect whereof he threatens us by men, & makes us to feel our own wretchedness, to the intent we should return unto him. Furthermore he shows well by the sequel, that his promises was not in vain. What a proof was there thereof, at the entering of the people into the land of Chanaan? For they had such a multitude of enemies, as might have made them all dismayed. But what for that? God himself fought for his people. And that did the poor harlot well perceive, when she said to the men that were come to spy out the land, I know that your God is the God of heaven and earth, which reigns over all. And for proof thereof, I see that all the inhibitors of these countries, are astonished at the only fame and report of you, wherewith they be discouraged, that they be as good as vanquished already. She attributes this indeed to the wonderful working of God. Now seeing that this silly woman, having but a little taft of faith, did lay so sure hold upon it: I pray you ought not we to behold the strength much more openly, which our Lord promises us here, which is, that he will cast a terror and fearfulness upon all those that are much stronger & mightier than we? It is said that even when God sets his mark upon kings & princes, the brute beasts which have no reason do stand in awe of them. And why is that? Because God works by a secret means unknown to us. If our lord had not such power to inspire men withal; surely principalities & seniories could not continue one minute of an hour. Now then seeing that God imprints such a mark, that he makes not only me but also beasts to stand in awe, & to be subject to those to whom he has committed the sword of justice: let us note that if we be his children, we shall also bear his image; insomuch that if we be under his tuition, we shall be defended in despite of our enemies: yea & we shall be feared, so as we shall perceive by the effect, that it is long of none but ourselves that we be not succored by him, and that although our unthankfulness do beat back his hand, yet does he overcome us with his infinite goodness. For we see that although the wicked have the Law in their own hand; yet notwithstanding they be so abashed & dismayed, that they be quite and clean without heart. We must needs see it, or else we be duller than blocks. For our Lord has wrought with such power, that though we were blind, yet we might grope it with our hands, namely that God has daunted those that thought to have cut the throats throats of his children, even when no man durst lift up his little finger against them, insomuch that when they thought themselves to have won the goal, then were they seen to be so stricken down & discouraged, & call into such fear & perplexity, and so at their wits end, as they will not what to do nor where to become. Indeed they had the law in their own hand (as I said), they had practices and devices ynow, and the world sees that they had neither uprightness nor faithfulness in them. But yet howsoever they fared, they were discouraged, & were made to stand gaping & gazing one upon another, & could not tell what to do for fear. Hereby we see that our Lord not only held their hands tied; but also bereft them of heart; so as he disappointed them of wit & reason, by reason whereof they were so dulled, that there was less skill in them than little babes, yea or even in beasts. You see then how it is a goodly proof of that which is promised here: so as if we yield god his due honor, we should be the more stayed wider his protection, to walk on continually, yea & to keep ourselves from stepping out of the way.

Now let us take good heed to that which I have said, namely that such as do so go astray & give themselves to naughtiness, have not the protection which our Lord has promised: for they go willfully to cast themselves up as it were to the spoil. Therefore it is good reason that God should forsake them, & that they should find themselves to be taken unprovided. But if we walk in humility, & seek to be always guided by the hand of our God: then let us hardily put our trust in him, and we shall ever be maintained. Although men gape upon us like Lions with open mouth; & although we have not wherewith to resist them: yet will God be able enough to beat them back. We may be driven to sight; but in the midst of the encounter we shall be sustained as God has promised us, and that will be an invincible fortress unto us. That is the thing which we have to remember upon this place.

Yea and Moses said expressly, People or Nations that are mightier and stronger than you; to the intent we should not make comparison with the things that are seen, to think that God will not help us except there be some natural means, or some worldly entrance. No no, we must not be at that point: but we must consider that his power is infinite. Therefore we do him great wrong, when we restrain his power to that which our senses can attain unto. Nay, when our enemies are too strong and too mighty for us, and when it seems that they be ready to tread us under foot: even then must we persuade ourselves that God will utter his power to succor us. And therefore let us go on boldly, at leastwise so there be no presumption in us, and that we be not stubborn against our God. For there are two things which are very requisite for us. The first is that we give over ourselves wholly to the serving and honoring of our God: & secondly that we put our trust in him, and stick unto his promises, not doubting but that he will give things a good end, though they seem utterly past all hope. Thus you see in effect what we have to remember upon this lesson.

Now immediately Moses adds, That where so ever the people set their foot, they shall possess the whole land, from the wilderness unto Libanus, and from the great River Euphrates unto the Sea. For those were the bounds & borders which God had promised to his people; as appears in the person of Abraham. For the promise that is made here is no new thing, but a ratifying or confirming of the same thing that God had spoken long before. As if he should say, nothing shall bar you from enjoying the heritage that I have assigned you: stick you to me, & I will perform whatsoever I have said unto you. True it is that is you have an eye to the great number of Nations which you have to overcome; you may be so scared as to say, How shall we now do, Indeed we be a great multitude of us; but what are we in comparison of our enemies, which are men exercised in fear of arms, & huge men like giants? As we have seen already heretofore. Again they be nestled already, they have their towns well fortified and when we shall have taken a two or three hundred of their towns, yet is it nothing in respect of the rest, but our enemies will be continually both before us & behind us: You see then there were things that might well have made the people afraid. But it is said unto the; Although that land be never so large, although you have never so many cities to take, and although there be never so great a number of battle prepared for you: yet settle you yourselves upon the promise of your God, for he can skill well enough how to perform the thing that he has spoken: Shut you your eyes against all likelihood of things that may daunt your courage, and open your eyes to behold the inestimable power of your God, & doubt not but he will show himself faithful. Now we see whereat Moses aimed. But yet was not this thing accomplished to the full, until the reign of David & Salomon. For although Josua made partition of their portions, & god appointed him to the office: yet were the unbelieving people mixed still with the Jews; and (which work is) whereas they should have rooted them out quite & clean, & have had peasable possession of the land: they paid tribute to their enemies, which held the in bondage like slaves & fleeced the wool from their backs. They were vexed in such sort, that they were as good as slain quick, & they endured such cruelty as was pity to see. It should seem therefore that God kept not touch with them, But here is an excellent goodly text, to open unto us the thing which I have expounded before, and which will come to be spoken of again, It is said that god will give his people the victory, conditionally that they keep all the commandments which are enjoined them. God ties it with a condition. Do whatsoever I command you (said he,) & then shall you find my power to such, as your enemies (do what they can) shall not be able to prevail any whit against you. Now let us see if the Jews were able to perform all Gods commandments. Nay, they were utterly disobedient unto god, & therefore were disappointed of his promise. Yea, but yet for all that he ceased not to make place for his own mercy still by means of their lewdness. For although their enemies pricked them like thorns; yet they held still the possession of the dwelling place that God had appointed them. Truth it is that it is said expressly forasmuch as you have behaved yourselves lewdly, and provoked your God, by refusing to go forward when he was ready to guide you: therefore shall you not overcome your enemies, but they shall remain still, and be as thorns in your sides, & as wasps to sting you, yea and they shall even pick out your eyes, because you have not taken courage as you ought to have done, nor submitted yourselves to God, to go forward at his commandment. Look what threatening are made unto them: & they perceive them well enough: and afterward they become subject unto them, insomuch that they were fain to bear charges & tributes even till they groaned again. But our Lord having chastised them so many ways, did afterward show unto them, that he failed not to pity them still; for he raised them up such men from time to time, as saved them from their enemies. And so howsoever the world went with them, they still enjoyed Gods gracious gifts, at leastwise in part: not that they were worthy, of them, but because Gods will was to be as good as his promise, so as we might not be disappointed of it through their own lewdness & unthankfulness. In the end, David and Salomon obtained the promise, so as God by their hand did let the people in full & perfect liberty, & their kingdom was perfectly established, because god had so promised. But we must note, that David and Salomon were a figure of our Lord Jesus Christ and we be sure that it is long of none but ourselves, that God shows not himself bountiful & liberal to the uttermost. For if we obeyed him according to his commandment; you should want nothing, but we should even in this earthly life feel his drawing of us unto everlasting salvation. And forasmuch as he is the fountain of all goodness, he would give us such abundance of all things, that we should have all things at will; and we should pass through this world as through an earthly paradise, and afterward attain to the kingdom of heaven that is prepared for us. Look how God offers himself unto us in his law: but yet with condition that we do whatsoever he commands us. But we be so far off from doing it, that we drag back from it, and there is not that thought nor that affection in us, which is not enemy to God & his righteousness. By reason whereof, instead of the enjoying of his benefits which he has promised in his Law, he is same to become our enemy, & to arm himself against us, and to consume us till we be utterly come to nothing. Sometimes he thunders in such sort; we be overthrown in the turning of a hand. And whereof comes that? Even so it must needs be: for (as I said before) god shows himself liberal towards us & utters his great treasures towards us. But what? Our hearts are shut & locked up. And therefore must we needs be bereft of them, and feel the pain thereof; we must be so vexed as we may groan again, & be in such anguish of mind, as we may not wote where to become. Yet notwithstanding, if we be his, he never fails to mingle some sweetness continually with the corrections that he sends us. True it is that he bears with the wicked, and with such as are utter castaways: but yet in the end he is terrible to them and deals not in such wise with them, as he does with those whom he intends to reserve to himself. Although that naturally all of us be disobedient unto him, yet ceases he not to have pity upon us: and although we feel four blows at his hand; yet does he show us therewithal; he is not minded to root us out utterly. But surely we should continue still in our sins to the end, yea and rot away in them, were it not for his railing up of the promised David, that is to say, of our Lord Jesus Christ. For by his means we recover; which we had lost by our own sins, and so you see how Jesus Christ sets us in possession of the heritage that was promised us by the Law. Yet notwithstanding we should be disappointed of it, and it could not belong unto us, unless that Jesus Christ had as well made us partakers of the benefits of God his father in his own person, as redeemed us in our own persons. Now then, we recover all this in him, whereas erst we were quite & clean bereft and cut off from the enjoying thereof. Therefore let us mark well, that whereas God made so many & so large promises to the Jews in his law, upon condition that they should keep his commandments: he meant to show that the same took no place, until the kingdom was established in the person of David. And therefore you must not allege as the beastly Papists do, who say: Tush, God promises us this and that, if we keep his commandments; therefore it follows that we win Gods favor by our own deserts, and that we purchase the kingdom of heaven, and are able to attain salvation by our own obedience; for God has an eye to yield unto every man according to his desert. They show full well, that they never understood one syllable of the holy scripture. And even this text without going any further, is enough to bewray their beastliness & ignorance. True it is that God promised his people that they should enjoy the land which he had appointed unto them: but performance thereof was to be deferred to the reign of David. Whereupon let us mark how it is our Lord Jesus Christ which makes the promises of the Law available towards us, so as we shall not be disappointed of the things that are contained therein. And indeed, that is the very cause why the promise is made expressly to David & Salomon, as it had been made before to all the people. And this serves well to make the doctrine yet plainer which I come to treat of. For there are two sorts of promises in the holy scripture. The one is; He that does there things, shall live in them. The other is, He that believes in the son whom the father has sent, shall be saved. Look here two promises, between the which it behoves us well to put a difference; for they be far unlike. When god said, He that does these things: he binds not himself to us but with an if, namely that we discharge ourselves by performing his Law, and that, not only in part, but throughout and perfectly. But no man is able to do that; and herefore you see we be shut out from all hope, and we cannot look that the promise should be of force any more towards us, because of our default. For God continues always faithful but we suffer not his goodness to come unto us. Now when he sees us so bereft of all his benefits; he finds another new remedy for us, which is this : Look here my son who is universal heir both of heaven and earth; and he holds all the world in subjection, he has the whole fullness of the Godhead enclosed in him, my image shines most perfectly in him: which is showed forth in his Gospel: and therefore they that are members of this body, are made partakers of all the benefits which he has in him. That is the way for the promises to have their effect and force in us, and not to look simply to the doctrine of the law. For when God said, I will give you the land; to whom spake he? To all the people. But yet with condition, if you keep my commandments. And that was made void. As how? Because the people were disobedient, and kept not covenant with God. And so you see that the whole covenant was broken, so as God was set free again, and no longer bound unto them, he then? He sends us a king to whom he says, I will give you the land for your inheritance. He uses the self same words that are set down here by Moses. I will give you the land (said he) for your inheritance, from the wilderness unto mount Libanus, & from the river Euphrates to the great sea. And to whom does God give it? To David & Salomon. True it that he had given the same land before to all the people; but he people were banished from it through their own fault. And was it then but for one only person? Was it the worthiness of David or Salomon that made God willing to give them the thing which he had promised to all the offspring of Abraham? No: but it was because they were a figure of our Lord Jesus Christ. And in very deed when the Prophets intended to assure then people of the quiet state that was promised to them, and of the enjoining of the land; they said, I will raise you up a David. Now then, Gods offering to lay forth hi riches to all men without exception in his law, to maintain them withal in this present life, is as if he should say, whatsoever I have promised to give to the fathers of old time, belongs to you also, at leastwise if you obey my law throughly in all points, & not by pieces and starts. But we be so far unable to discharge ourselves of that duty, that we fall to despising of God, so as he is fain to show himself an enemy unto us. That is all that we be able to win by our keeping of the law, if we will needs stick simply to it as I said before. Nevertheless there is this other remedy for it. When our Lord Jesus Christ comes forth & reaches us his hand to pull us to him; then we find that he is not without cause termed the universal heir of all the goods which God his father has. And his possessing of them is not for himself; for he is one self same essence with God the father, he has been the God of glory at all times. But in this flesh of ours & in our human nature wherewith he was clothed, he was ordained chief king, and the dominion of the world was given unto him, even as well in heaven as in earth. Now then if we be once grassed into his body, and perfectly made one with him; then shall we recover that thing in him, which we cannot obtain by our deeds, & deserts. And then shall we see that Jesus Christ being raised again unto glory, will of his goodness draw us after him, to make us partakers of all things that he has.

Furthermore, the telling of this thing unto us is not to give men scope to do evil; but we must mark that when God reserves us to himself to put us in possession of his goods, he does also reform us by his holy spirit. Yet notwithstanding, all that ever we can do, albeit that we be governed by God & have a good will to serve him, is of no value at all if it be esteemed of itself; but yet for Jesus Christ's sake God will accept us and our works, and the inheritance shall abide sure & steadfast unto us: for we must not be afraid but that we shall attain unto it. It is not given us for our own sakes, but because we be partakers of our Lord Jesus Christ, & receive the grace that he has purchased us, so as we be reconciled to God by his death & passion, in respect whereof he is merciful to us, & we be sure of the forgiveness of our sins, because all our spots are washed & scoured clean away. Although there be sins & imperfections in us, which might make us blamable before God; yet are we justified and brought into his favor again, when he has once renewed us by his holy spirit. Therefore if we go that way to work let us to doubt but the promise shall stand fast, so as we shall feel the effect & force of it to our salvation. But in the meanwhile let us not glory in ourselves, for there is no matter nor cause why we should do so.

Now let us fall down in the presence of our good God with acknowledging of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, yea and so to feel them as that misliking and condemning ourselves for the, we may submit ourselves to our Lord Jesus Christ, beseeching him so to reform us by his holy spirit, as Gods image may shine forth in us, and we not fail to continue in the possession of the heritage which he has promised us, because it is not grounded upon our own works and deeds, but upon his free bestowed goodness. And moreover let us pray our Lord to be so gracious to us, as to give us such strength while we pass through this world, wherein we have a great sort of enemies to fight against, that we may get the upper hand of them, & be always certified more and more, that he is near at hand to such as call upon him & submit themselves unto him, that by that means he may continually be glorified at our hand, & that it may appear how he will always uphold us, if we fight under standard. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and nation of the earth, &c.

On Friday the 27th of September 1555
The 79th Sermon which is the sixth upon the eleventh Chapter

26 Behold, I set before you this day a blessing & a curse.

27 A blessing if you obey the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you this day.

28 And likewise a curse if you obey not the commandments of the Lord your God, but turn out of the way which I command you this day, to go after orange gods which you know not.

29 And when the Lord your God shall have brought you into the land which you goes unto to possess it: then shall you set the blessing upon mount Garizim, & the curse upon mount Ebal.

30 Are they not on the other side of Jordan, on the west side in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the plain over against Gilgal, beside the grove of Moreh?

31 For you shall pass over Jordan, to go & possess the land which the Lord your God gives you: and you shall possess it & dwell therein.

32 Take heed therefore, & perform all the ordinances & laws which I see before you this day.

The protestation that Moses makes here, serves to show that men themselves are the cause of all their miseries, & that it is not for them to seek the blame thereof any where else. And on the other side, that when God declares his will unto us, the way of welfare is showed us, & it is long of ourselves that our life is not happy in all respects throughout. So then, the meaning of Moses is, that God does men a singular good turn, when he vouchsafes to teach them by his word. For when they have the record of his will, it is as good as a showing of them how to attain to salvation, & how to prosper in this transitory life. Contrariwise also they be warned that if they fare not the better by the doctrine that is delivered unto them, unhappy are they, & they have not cause to complaint of God afterward as though it were long of him; for they had choice. Therefore when we have been instructed in Gods word, & known the true & pure religion: if we hold not on through out, all the blame is to be laid upon ourselves. For God had showed us the good way; & we held it not, ne kept ourselves in it. Needs therefore must we be barred from all excuse, and God must hold us as convicted for that we had lever to perish willfully, & to go to destruction, than submit ourselves to him who was willing to have led us to life & salvation. For this cause Moses says, Behold, this day do I set before you a blessing & a curse. As if he should say; Bethink yourselves: Seeing that God has commanded me to publish his law, it is not for you to fall asleep: For on the one side he shows you how you may prosper all your life long: namely by obeying him. On the contrary part think not to escape scot-free when ye shall have disobeyed your God; such unthankfulness shall not abide unpunished. For God must needs be revenged of such as have refused his doctrine & made no reckonings of it.

So then, first we be done to understand that the having of the knowledge of Gods will is an inestimable treasure. All of us are desirous to lead a happy life, but there is no mean for us to attain to it, unless God open us the gate to come unto him. If it be alleged, How then? Shall not men be blessed, if they endeavor to do well? Will not God accept all their service when he sees them go on with a good intent? Let us mark first of all, that men may (to their own seeming) have as great devotion as is possible, & yet they shall but err. To wean that we do well is not all that we have to do. We must be sure that the way which we take is no by path, but the way that leads straight forth unto God. You see then that we cannot be sure of any blessing, that is to say, that our lives please God, and that the service which we do him is well liked of; until he have showed us what he requires & what he allows. For so long as we walk after our own imagination, we go the clean contrary way; & instead of going forward we go back. Mark that for one point. Again, for the second point, when we have done all, yet is God nothing beholden to us for it. What owes he unto us? [Nothing.] Now then all that we can hope for is by reason of the promise that he makes unto us, & by telling us that is we keep his law, we shall not lose our labor nor be disappointed, but we shall have a good reward at his hand. Gods saying so, is the ground from whence the blessing springs that Moses speaks here. And it is the same thing that S. Paul tells us, where he presupposes that even before the law, men could not deserve any thing: & not without cause. For if wee had done all that which were possible for us to do, (as I said before) were it possible for us to deserve aught at Gods hands? No: for we owe it him every whit of it, & he owes nothing unto us. And so you see why Moses says here, that when the law was published, then was a blessing let before the people. As if he should say, Heretofore you have known no rule, you have been as the wretched infidels which go on at all adventure & have no certainty to unit unto. But now has your God gathered you to him, & showed you the right way. Therefore the way for you to lead a happy life is to obey the will of your God.

Also here is a promise added to it, whereby the people might be in the better hope that God would bless them. It is all one then with that which I have told you already, namely that God is very gracious to us, in showing us after what manner we ought to lead our life. For without that, we might martyr ourselves as much as we listed, & yet it should be to no purpose. Wherefore let us beware that we receive the word the more reverently which is preached unto us in his name, specially seeing it brings us a blessing, not only in that we learn thereby to know what Gods will is, & how to live in his favor; but also for that he binds himself of his own good will: insomuch that although no duty compel him thereto; yet vouchsafes he to covenant with us in such sort, as we shall not serve him in vain. But here a man might call a doubt, how it comes to pass that Moses speaking of the law, says that he sets forth a blessing? For (as was declared yesterday) whatsoever God promises us in his laws, we fare never a whit the better by it, because of the condition that goes with it, which is that the promise of his blessing is tied to performing of his commandments. But no man does that; & therefore are we all disappointed of the promise of the law, by reason of the impossibility of the condition. It should seem then that Moses speaks to no purpose in this text, in promising a blessing to the people. And indeed we hear how S. Paul speaks of it. He said that the law brings nothing but Gods wrath & vengeance; for it rebukes every one of us, so as there is none of us all that is righteous, neither has ever any man been. All of us then are convicted by the law, as transgressors against Gods righteousness; & so be we in danger of endless death. Since it is so: it follows the law of itself can do no more but shows us that we be accursed of our God, & that he is our deadly enemy & must needs be our judge. And where is then the blessing that Moses speaks of here? The answer hereto is this; that if we look no further but what we be in our own froward nature, in respect of the sin we have drawn from Adam: the law can do nothing but curse us. For whereas God shows us what our righteousness ought to be; if we fall to the examining of our lives; we shall find that we have offended him in every point, & therefore we be past hope. Yea, but that springs not of the nature of the law, but of our own sinfulness, in that we are stubborn against God, so that instead of obeying him, we endeavor altogether to follow our own wicked lusts. The law then as in respect of ourselves, brings nothing but wrath & death. But as in respect of itself surely it brings blessing. For were we as we ought to be, that is to wit, were we so sound & uncorrupted that we were as throughly disposed to serve God as was our forefather Adam by creation before his fall: the law should bring us his blessing. For why? It shows us that we must love God with all our heart. When we be once joined unto him, & when we be once knit unto him in all perfection of goodness, of joy, of life, & of glory; then shall this saying be found true. For were we of nature good & right, we should be answerable to this doctrine, & we should observe it: & so should this blessing be performed towards us. Whereof is it long that as now the law brings us nothing but, death & damnation? Even for that we be not able to receive the promises that are contained there. Our Lord said, Come you to me, & I will fill you full of all goodness; & we shrink quite & clean from him. So is it not long of the doctrine. Whereof then? Even of ourselves. Where is the fault to be found? In the law? No: but in our own selves. Now then let us mark, that whereas Moses protests here that he sets a blessing before the people, his so doing is not without cause.

But here it might be replied, that although our own sin be the let that we be not made partakers of the blessing that is behighted in the law to enjoy it; yet notwithstanding, forasmuch as we be utterly excluded from it; it is in vain for him to say, I set before you a blessing. That is not so: For we have two points to note. The one is, that Gods speaking after that manner concerning his word, is to the end that we should have it in reverence & estimation, & also love it & set our hearts upon it; & moreover fall to the considering of our own cursedness, so as we might be humbled & cast down, & be sorry when we see our benefit turned to our bane, & our life into death because we be not disposed to receive it. But God shall have won nothing at our hands by letting us alone there: we must be fain to go one step further. Forasmuch as we see ourselves bereft of the blessing of the law so long as it continues but a dead letter; that is to say, so long as it does but only tell us what we should do, & gives us not power to do it indeed we must resort to our Lord Jesus Christ, whose office is to write the things in our hearts which God had written in stones, that he may make us willing to obey, instead of our swerving aside to the contrary. Again, our Lord Jesus Christ has deserved this blessing for us; that we might henceforth be received into favor for his sake, & our works be accepted at Gods hand though they be nothing worth of themselves. For we come not as every man in his own person, nor as they that had performed the law themselves: but we come in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, as members of his bodies. You see then that the blessing is performed in us by seeking the remedy which we want, which is that whereas God has promised to bless men upon condition, forasmuch as the same boots us not, there is added another point of favor, which is that he receives us for his sons sake, & writing his law in our hearts, imputes not our sins unto us; by means whereof we fail not to be partakers of the blessing that is contained here, though we be not able to perform the law, but that the same pass our ability. Mark that for one point.

Now let us come to that which Moses says concerning the curse. He says that like as the law offers us Gods favor, which is the blessing that tends to our welfare; so also we must not let light by the threatening that are set down there. For if we give deaf care to Gods speaking, so as our hearts rankle against it through stubbornness, or we play the scoffers which turn all things to 8Laughter: let us bear this in mind, that howsoever the world go, God's word shall either be our life or our death, there shall not so much as one word thereof fall to the ground. Such as benefit themselves by those things that are told them on God's behalf, shall find that the doctrine serves to their salvation: And on the other side, the despisers thereof, and such as refuse to be taught by it, must yield an account thereof, and they shall feel that no one iote of it shall be lost, neither is to be despised. For should the thing be undone and vanish away without effect, which passes out of the mouth of God? No. And therefore let us mark well, that if men cannot find in their hearts to use God's doctrine to their benefit when he sends it unto them, it shall turn to their everlasting death, and their damnation will be doubled, because they held scorn of the benefit that was proffered them. And this is very needful for us. For we see how men dally wit God's word; and they that cast it not quit and clean away, do think themselves to be more than half perfect; because they become not utter enemies to fight against it, they bear themselves in hand that God ought to hold himself contented with it. But think we that God will suffer so good a thing to perish? He offered us life, and we refused it: and does not such unkindness deserve horrible vengeance? Again, God sets ore store by his own honor, than by the salvation of our souls. And good reason it is that he should: Now he has showed us after what manner he will be glorified by us, and we make no account of it but reject it utterly. And therefore let us consider well, that if we receive not the blessing of God's word, that is to say, if it serve not to reconcile us to him, that we may take him for our father: we must (spite of our teeth) feel him our judge, and his word must condemn us. Whereas it should have been a witness of is love towards us to bring us to salvation, and to the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven: it must become an incitement to pass upon our lives, so as we shall be accursed in this present life, and after our death God's vengeance shall pursue us for ever, because we obeyed not God's word when it was preached and set forth to us.

Now then, seeing that God tells us that this is the convenient time and that he calls us into him: let us learn, let us learn I say to go to him and to make hast, least this threat light upon us, that we be cursed for our wickedness, in that we lifted not to receive the benefit that was offered us. And specially nowadays we ought to be the more provoked thereunto, because our fathers of old time had not the like occasion. It is true that Moses might well say he offered the blessing to those people in the law: But we in these days have the blessing set forth more openly in the Gospel. The promises at that time were dark, and they pointed at Jesus Christ, howbeit a far off. They yielded some small taste of life; but we sat this day have our sill of it, so as God gives us even his heart there without omitting of any thing, to the intent to make us to perceive his inestimable love, thereby to draw us and to win us unto him. Sith it is so that the law shoes us it aloof, and the gospel brings it nearer to us. Let us not be so forward as to shrink away as though we would need spite God of purpose to be cursed: but let us rather embrace the blessing which costs us nothing as they say: For there is no more for us to do but to receive it willingly according to the promise which he makes us, saying Open your mouth and I will fill it. And for the same cause also does S. Paul say, Now are these acceptable days, now are these days of salvation; how the same is to be applied to the preaching of the Gospel. His alleging of that text of Esayes is as he should say, Our Lord's desire is nothing else but to do the office of a savior among us. And therefore suffer him to show himself such a one. Again, let us understand that we need not to seek far for him, for he offers himself to us before we once think of him,. To make us perceive his fatherly kindness and goodness. And on the contrary part, when he threatens us and is minded to make us feel his rigor; he runs not upon us at the first dash, neither lifts he up his hand by and by to strike us: but only shows it us first aloof. Yet notwithstanding, howsoever he far, let us mark that the Gospel is never preached, but that he witnesses on the one side that he is ready to receive men to mercy and to open them the gate of his kingdom that they may go into it and on the other side that if they be stubborn and willful I their wickedness, it shall not boot them to think to escape, or to ween that the word shall be vain and to no put pose: for God will always give it force and power. What to do? To destroy those that have so refused it, and trod it under foot and made a mock of it, and openly resisted it. Now by the way we must call to mind again what I have touched already heretofore in following Moses discourse: namely that God promises not any blessing but to such as obey his commandments like as one that other side he threatens none but such as turn away from him. And thereby he shows that men may well take much pain, but they shall but lose their labor if they rule not themselves according to the law. Here you see how Moses says they be utterly fruitless. In deed that Papists, Turks and Jews doe persuade themselves, that they deserve much at god's hand by their doing of things upon their own head, when they be able to say; I take it to be very good. They bear themselves in hand that they come very near to God by their wandering in their windlasses after that fashion. But on the contrary part we see that God promises not anything but to such as obey his word. Therefore if we indented to be un-disappointed of our hope, let us seek to know God's will by asking it at his own mouth, and thereupon let us simply obey whatsoever he tells us. For as long as men rule themselves after their own imaginations, or after the traditions of men, it is no obedience, but a displeasing of God, and he will not admit it to come in their account. Thus much for the first point concerning this blessing.

On the contrary, how much so ever men repine at it, setting themselves against us, yea and condemning us for our refusing to follow their foolish inventions; God acquits us here, for he threatens none but such as rebel against him. Nowadays the Pope thunders against us, because we.. ill not be subject to him as other do, which hold down their necks unto him and yield themselves in bondage to him like wretched beasts.

True it is that their imagining that he has power to ding us down to the deep pit of hell, is the thing that amazes them, and makes the rude and ignorant sort to quake. But forasmuch as we hear it at the mouth of our God, that we need not be afraid except we have disobeyed him: let us hold us to it, and behold to laugh all the popes menaces to scorn, for they be no better than the rattling of a bladder with a few beans init to fear a young babe withal. In deed it makes a great noise but yet it is but a toy. And even in like case is it with all the menacing that men can make.

But here is yet one other saying well worthy to be noted. Moses says that the curse shall come upon the people when they turn away from their GOD to serve strange Gods and such as they have not known. Here again he shows that they which have been rightly taught, are much more blameworthy than the wretched infidels. For they spite God maliciously and willfully: they offend not any more of ignorance, but turn aside willfully from the way that God had willed them to walk in, and seem to make war against him of set purpose: by means whereof they make their condemnation the grievous. And therefore let us mark well, that we which have received the doctrine of the Gospel, shall less excusable than the papists, if we obey not our God. For the papists hold on still their old trade, they be gone astray like silly beasts, and all that ever they do is but filth and abomination. This is true. And yet do we for our parts much worse in turning away from our God, after his coming unto us, and that he had brought us nigh unto himself. And Moses says expressly; The Gods which you have not known. Wherein he rebukes the malice of men, in that they had lever to follow the uncertain than the certain. True it is that we have a clean contrary ground in nature. For if a man be demanded whether he had lever to be sure of a thing or to be doubtful of it, he will always say he had lever be sure of it. And yet for all that, we seem all of us to strive who may be most wearing, doubtful, and uncertain of his soul health and yet not withstanding what is there that we should make more account of? And God is ready to assure us of it, warranting us it by his word, so as we cannot fail of it, if we obey him. We hear it and can Godly? No: and therefore let us go on as he has commanded us, Nay, we be loth to do so. And what do we in stead thereof? I trow, I ween. Loc at what point we be! Let us see how the papists do. When they should pray unto god, this one good point they have, that they know themselves unworthy to prease unto him. That is true. But behold, our Lord gives us a remedy, which is, that our Lord Jesus Christ shall be our spokesman: so as if he intreat for us, we shall be admitted and God will hear all our prayers. It is the thing which the holy scripture assures us of every where. But what do the Papists? I am not worthy to prease unto God (Say they) and therefore I will go seek to the virgin Mary, S. Michael and S. Peter: and thereupon they devise and set up a Great sort of Saints at their own pleasure. And what a dealing is that? Sure we be that our Lord Jesus Christ will not sail us: for as much as it is his office appointed him of his father; he will discharge it. And why then do we not go right forth unto him? He will be a good stay for us. Come unto me says he, alluring us gently. Again we have promises innumerable, t hat if we resort unto him we shall not be disappointed of that which we hope for: and yet for all this we lean to our own weening, and we say, to my seeming I were best to go to S. Michael or to our Lady. And so we fall to forsaking the certainty that God has given us, to ketch an uncertainty and in likewise wise deal we with all the rest. For in serving God according to his law, we be sure that our service shall be well taken. But the Papists fall to inventing of this and t hat, and leave the law of God: and is not that a forsaking of the certain to follow an uncertain? Yes and t hat is against nature. Therefore it appears that we be blinded by Satan. For we have the clean contrary in us by nature. We have with enough to say, I would fain be assured and we be loth to hazard ourselves at all adventure and yet in this case we be so mad, t hat neither ropes not chains can hold us. My alleging of these examples is to show after what sort we should put this doctrine in use: for it falls out that men have willfully estranged themselves from God in all cases. How so? For whereas God has discovered himself unto them; they have not vouchsafed to hold themselves to him, but rather have busied themselves about their own dreams and dotages. Indeed, they will easily say, We know there is but one God the maker of heaven and earth: but in the meanwhile they hatch a whole swarm of other Gods, as we may well perceive by the idols which they have forged. And whereof comes that? Even of this, that whereas men knew God, yet they have had no lift to glorify him, but have wandered away after their own imagination, by means whereof they be turned away from him. And at such time as God gave his law, the blessing was darksome than it is nowadays in the time of Gospel. Behold, God does not only report himself to be the maker of heaven and earth, but also because he is incomprehensible and his majesty passes all our understanding: he will have us to look upon him in his lively image, that is to wit in our Lord Jesus Christ. He is the son of God, which has showed himself so familiarly that we may be sure enough that we worship the living God forasmuch as we know that the wholefulness of glory and of the Godhead dwells of him. That is the cause also why the Prophet Esay speaking of him, faith, Lo this is he, lo this is our God. If the case stood so with the fathers of old time, that it behooves them to stand upon a certaiity even in the time of the law, so as God would not have his people hang in doubt, but that they should be certified of as much as was for their behooove and benefit: much more ought we to be sure nowadays. For we have a large discovery of things in our Lord Jesus Christ, so as the voice of the prophet Esay; Lo this is he, lo this is our God, ought to found continually in our ears; by Reason whereof it is not for any man to turn away from it, nor to run gadding at rovers, nor to reel one way or other; but we must know and assure ourselves that we have the full and perfect measure of all wisdom, if we can hold us to Jesus Christ, and to the things which his doctrine teaches us. But herein we see how the wretched world gads up and down, every man trotting after his own way, so as every man's will is to astray: and yet notwithstanding we shield ourselves with ignorance. When we have shut our eyes after that fashion against the light, when we have stopped our ears against the doctrine of salvation, when we have turned our backs upon him at his showing of his faces, and when we have spit at him for his reaching of hand unto us: yet we fall still to excusing of ourselves by ignorance. So then the thing which we have to remember here in this place, by God's upbraiding of men with their turning away from his word when it is preached unto them, is that their so doing is through is devilish stubbornness and that (even by the witness of their own conscience) it is a worshiping of Gods which they have not known. For our faith must not be uncertain, it must not be an opinion or weaning, but it must bring a sure knowledge with it. And what manner of knowledge? Truly as in respect of our own wit and reason, if we intend to come unto God, we must worship him with all humility and remember that his secrets surmount our understanding. But yet here withal it behooves us to stand upon so sure a ground, even by knowledge; as our own consciences may bear record of it, and we be able to say with S. John, we wote well that we be the children of God. Lo here what the true Religion is. It is not an unadvised zeal or a liking that men cast to this thing or that: but a sure known doctrine grounded upon God's truth, where through we be able to say that it is he which has spoken to us, and that he is a faithful witness of the things that are for our welfare and salvation. And again, whatsoever we allege, we shall always abide convicted of our malice. So that when we have once been taught the word of God, if we afterward worship Gods whom we have not known, if we swerve aside to any superstition or if we continue not in the pure simplicity of the Holy Scripture: surely we shall justly be accused to have had strange Gods, and to have been forgers of them, as folk that love the untruth better than the truth. According whereunto S. Paul speaking of all such as obeyed not the Gospel, faith it is good reason they should be stricken with horrible blindness, and that forasmuch as they honored not the creator it was meet that they should become underlings to the creatures, that is to say, to the things which they had dreamed in their own fond brain and foolish fancies. Now then seeing that our God has taught us, let us learn to hold ourselves at a stay to his word, and to understand in what manner he has showed himself unto us, and let us benefit ourselves by all the records which he gives us and beware that we wander not one way or other, nor follow not our own leasings. For there will be no excuse for such as would not be certified of God when he was ready to do it.

Now in the end Moses Adds, that when the people were come in to the land of promise, they should divide their company in two parts: the one half upon mount Garizim, and the other half upon mount Eball: and that they which should be upon mount Garizim, should pronounce the blessings; and that those which should be upon mount Eball, should pronounce the curses, which thing we see was done accordingly. For this commandment shall be rehearsed yet again in the 27th Chapter of this book. And Joshua in his eighth Chapter declares that he had obeyed the commandment of Moses. The effect of the story is, that when the people were entered into the land, they should meet with two mountains, the one called Hebal and the other Garizim. Now God had commanded that one part of the people, namely certain tribes, should be on the one side on mount Garizim, and the rest of the tribes should be upon mount Hebal and that the Levites should stand in the midst of the host bearing the Ark of God, to show that God was chief so ever in there and that the Levites were as witness of sureties to undertake matters in the behalf of the people, like as if there were two parties to make some solemn match or covenant, a notary or register is present to take an oath betwixt them; even so God had ordained that the people should be there to hear and receive the doctrine of salvation and that they should answer on their part, as in the passing of some solemn contract to the end they might know upon what condition God had chosen them and preferred them before all other nations of the earth, as shall be showed hereinafter in the foresaid 27th Chapter. And what were the blessings? They were a rehearsal of the same thing that God had spoken afore: namely, all such as keep my law shall be blessed; All such as worship me with a pure conscience shall be blessed; all such as hallow my name, shall be blessed: all such as obey their fathers and mothers, shall be blessed: all those live chastely shall be blessed: all those abstain from deceit, extortion and all manner of evil shall be blessed. God then on his part promised blessing after that manner. Here unto the people answered, Amen, Amen: that is to say, so be it: whereby they ratified that which had been spoken by the mouth of God. Again, on the contrary part, the curses were uttered on mount Hebal in this wise: Cursed be he that turns aside after strange Gods: Cursed be he that dishonors his father or his mother. Cursed be he that offends in theft or in whoredom: Cursed be he that performs not all the commandments contained in this book. Amen, Amen, said the people. When the curses were uttered after that fashion, it behooves every man to answer Amen. And so you see what is said in this text.

Now let us mark that by that means God meant to touch the people nearer to the quick, by their agreeing to such a covenant. And the same belongs unto us. For although we have not the same ceremony that was observed at that time, yet have we the truth howsoever the world go: and whensoever God's word is preached unto us, although we receive it not, yet shall it not fall to the ground, but it shall light upon our heads spite of our teeth, and it shall be an intolerable burthen to sink us down to the bottom of hell. Therefore when we receive God's word into our hearts, let beware that we like well of it and that we ratify the promise of our salvation which he makes us. Now he adopts us to be his children; and if we be his children we be also his heirs. Therefore when we embrace the preached word by faith and obedience, although our mouth speak not a word, yet do we confirm God's truth to our salvation, according to this saying of S. Johns, that as many as believe in the only son of God, have set to their seals that God is true. Thus you see how the full measure of our salvation and of the promise is accomplished and has his full effect and power, when we on our side do answering rightly Amen. And although it be not spoken with the mouth, yet let the heart say it: for that is the chief point. True it is that if there be faith in the heart, the mouth must need agree unto it also; according to this saying of the Psalm, I did believe and therefore will I speak, which saying, is alleged likewise by S. Paul to the Corinthians. But my speaking at this time is of the ceremonic; namely that although we have not a mount Garizim and a mount Heball among us, although there be not a visible Ark among us, and his once setting down of a memorial thereof before us is sufficient for us, to make us know that the same belongs to us at this day, and that the preaching of the Gospel unto us in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, is all one as if we confirmed God to be our father by our saying Amen. That is the very mean whereby we be received to be his children, and whereby we be assured of the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven. For otherwise, how were it possible that we wretched creatures should attain so such dignity, as the God should vouchsafe to win us by gentleness, and utter the good love that he bears us and be willing to have us to be his, to the end that he might be owner of us? Must it not need be that we be worse than forward if we benefit not ourselves by such grace? Yes, and therefore let us learn to answer Amen willingly, when our Lord behights us his blessings. For on the contrary part, although we harden our hearts and shut our eyes, yea and grind our teeth at God as it were in rage and despite of him: yet must there follow an Amen thereupon, which shall burn us like a fearing iron, whereby God will show that his word is as burning fire to consume all things, so as we must need feel the inward scalding there of when God utters the power of his word, by reason whereof we shall be in continual unquiteness and torment forever, if he set himself against us. Yet for all this the faithful must answer Amen as well to the blessings as the cursing. Amen, by embracing the grace that God offers us. Does God offer himself so unto us? Comes he so seek us out when we be utterly lost and forlorn? Does he come down to these horrible miseries wherein we be plunged? Well, then it is our duty to go unto him, and not to be so forward as to draw back when he allres us so gently. Thus you see how we must answer Amen to the blessings, by embracing the grace of the holy Ghost, that we may be guided and governed by it, and made acceptable to our God, by fashioning our life after the rule that he has given us, in resting upon the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereby he is reconciled unto us, and accepts us for righteous, insomuch that although we be sinners, yet he receives us for his son same, and covers all our sins and vices. After that sort therefore must we answer Amen, that our Lord may perform all the free promises which he has made unto us.

Also we must answer Amen to the curses. For why? We have such a number of contraries in us, as is pity to see. Although God have given us a good desire to receive his word, and that we receive it in deed; yet do we it not to the full. For we drag our legs after us; there is always some gain striving in us; we have still some remnants of our flesh, and besides that, there is too much stubbornness in us, so as we be like asses that have need to be driven forward by force. And therefore I said that we must answer Amen to the curses. When we see that God will have us to pass through the afflictions of this world, and through the cares that are upon cares: Let them provoke us to repair unto him, and let us assure ourselves that oftentimes his causing of us to feel his curse, is for our benefit. Moreover let us consider thus with ourselves: Alas, if God curse all such as transgress his commandments; what shall become of me? Now then let every of us find such fault with himself, as we may patiently endure whatsoever it pleases God to lay upon us in this present life. Thus our pronouncing of the curses must be to the end that they light not upon us. For they that quicken up themselves after that manner, shall be set free from the curses. And let us mark by the way that when we shall not have performed all, the commandments of the law, we have a remedy for it in our Lord Jesus Christ, for otherwise we should be accursed everyone of us, according to this allegation of saint Pauls to the Galathians: Cursed are they that perform not the whole law to the full. Whereupon he concludes that all men are cursed of God as in respect of their own works, and that if we will be justified by our own defects, we must go seek our payment in hell. For God has shot out one thunderbolt against all mankind, in saying, cursed be all they that perform not the whole law. But no man performs it. Even the holiest men in the world are indebted in that behalf. So then S. Paul rightly concludes, that we be all accursed in ourselves. But yet he sends us to our Lord Jesus Christ, and tells us that forasmuch as he is given unto us, we be set free from the rigor of the law: so that whereas God as now does teach us his will, telling us what way we should walk, and setting before us both his promises and his threatening: although our lives be still imperfect, yet will he not cease to accept us., so we have recourse to him which has supplied our want. For our Lord Jesus Christ has made such satisfaction by the sacrifice of his death, that God accepts it in full payment to cover all our faults. Therefore let us repair thither, and let us so plunge ourselves in it, as we may be cleaned and scourd from all our spots. Which thing will come to pass, if we learn to walk in humility and fear before our God, and abuse not his goodness and patience. For that is the mean to make us acceptable unto him, so as his curses shall be turned from our heads, and his grace and blessing so increased after he has once uttered the same, as it shall grow continually in us, until it become to the full perfection.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him &c.

On Saturday, the 28th of September 1555

The 80th Sermon, which is the first upon the twelfth Chapter

These are the ordinances and laws which you shall keep, that you may do them in the Land which the Lord God of thy fathers has given thee to possess all the days which thou shall live upon the earth.

2. You shall destroy all the places wherein the pople, whom you shall conquer have served their gods, whether it be upon high mountains, or upon the hills, or under any manner of green trees.
3. Also you shall dig down their Altars, and break their images, and burn their woods with fire. You shall destroy the images of their gods, and dispatch the names of them out of that place.
4. you shall not deal so with the Lord your God.
5. But look what place so ever the Lord your God shall chose out of all your tribes to set his name in and to dwell in: there shall you seek him, and thither shall you resort.

Whereas Moses exhorts that people here again to observe the ordinances and statutes of the law and to do them ; it does us to understand that if we be not diligent in following Gods will, we shall soon be carried away unto wickedness one way or other. For it falls out upon us that we do commit many faults through oversight, we stumble at every turning of a hand because the devil does easily beguile us and we have no great wit or discretion in us, our mind is full of fondness and consequently inconstant: and therefore if we be not very diligent in obeying our God; we shall never observe his law as we ought to do. Now then let us beware that we set our minds earnestly to the ordering of our life. For if we bethink us not advisedly of it, nor have any great care of it, we shall not fail to do amiss some way or other. That is the thing which we have to gather upon this place where Moses says that we must not only put God's commandments in execution, but also keep them to do them. As if he should say, that if men hold not themselves well in awe, if they be not very watchfull in following their duty, and if they be not well advised and earnest in their doings: by and by they flip away, and there is no stediness in them, and although there have been some good zeal in them, yet it vanishes away out of hand.

And he says expressly that they be the statutes and ordinances of the God of their fathers. Which serves to the better confirming of the matter that we have seen heretofore: which is, that the Land of Channan was given them by virtue of the covenant and promise that was made before they were born. The Jews then are put in mind in this place to think themselves beholden to God's bestowed goodness, for their promised inheritance forasmuch as they could not boast of it as of a conquest, because God had assigned it to their fathers before they were born. Nevertheless his purpose is also to confirm them in the doctrine of the Law, to the end they might know that they worshipped not a new God, or a god lately found out, but the same God which had been reviled to their fathers in all ages afore and therefore he tells them they were less to be excused, if they held them not to the religion that had been known in all times afore, at leastwise among their fore fathers. For we hear what God upbraids them withal by his prophet Jeremy. Go seek all the world about (says he) go over the sea, and see if the hearthen nations have changed their gods, and yet they be but idols. Sith you see such steadfastness and constancy in the infidels, thaty they be not variable in their superstitions, but rather as it were wedded and willfully given over to them, what a shame will it be to you to have forsaken the living God when you have known him and not to continue in his word? Then let us mark well in this text, that God's upbraiding of the Jewes with his manifesting of himself unto them and to their fathers so long time aforehand, is to the end they should be the more worthy to be condemned, if they hild not themselves to the doctrine which had been so well warranted unto them. But let us mark also that it is not enough for us that our forefathers held some kind of religion: but we must also see that the same be allowable. And whereas it is said here, that their forefathers knew the same God which had set forth his Law to them at that time; the knowledge or opinion which the fathers had, is not the chief ground that we ought to stand upon; for God presupposes that he had so certified them of his word, as they were not in any doubt at all. Therefore first let us learn to know what our Lord declares unto us, and then let us afterward go to antiquitic. And it is certain that if the religion be true, and good, it is not new nor devised in our time, but our repair must be to the things that are witnessed in the Law and the prophets. There we shall see how God has gathered his Church, how he has governed it, and how it has always had his truth, even from the beginning of the world. Indeed the number of people is but small that have followed godliness: the rest have turned away after their own inventions. Howbeit, we must not have an eye to the world, but let it suffice us that got has had a church of his own in all ages, whereunto it behooves us to be joined and to become one with it. For although the Church have been despised of the world; yet has it always been precious in God's fight. And we see the like still at this day. True it is that the most part of such as boast themselves to be believers, are doted with leasings, errors and abuses: but we must let them alone and submit ourselves to the truth that God tells us, knitting ourselves in unity of faith and concord with the faithful which are contented to follow whatsoever God has showed them. Thus you see that the way for us to put this text in use where the God of the fathers is spoken of, is that it is enough for us to have some antiquity as the Papists allege, saying; we have been a long time in possession: but we must be well grounded upon certainty, so as we know that the God whom we worship is not an idol. When a man knows that once, then let him proceed to the consent and agreement of faith, according to our belief whereby we confess that there is but one almighty god, which is the father of our lord Jesus Christ, and by the same reason our father too; that our Lord Jesus Christ is the redeemer that has appeared unto us; that we be sanctified by the Holy Ghost, and also that we can bear record of the majesty of our God, at leastwise according to his uttering of himself unto us by his Holy Scriptures. Which done, then let us add, that we believe the Holy catholic Church, and that there is a communion of sancts, so as there is but one body. But yet must God be fain to show himself to us to be the almighty: that he is the same which made both heaven and earth, that he is the same at whose hand we must hope for salvation; that he is able to maintain his own glory, so as all the things that men have devised of their own brain are but lies. That is the first end whereat we must begin. And afterward we must agree with the holy patriarchs, Apostles, and all the faithful that have lived since the world began. We must have that indissoluble band of faith, and all must come to this point, namely that they be grounded upon the certain and unfallible truth. As for example, The Jews that came after, had the fathers as well as they, of whom also they made themselves a shield, but God did utterly mislike their so doing, according to this saying of the prophet Ezechiel; Walk not after the righteousness of your forefathers. At the first blush here seems to be some contrary. For in this same place it is said; Worship you the God of your fathers, stick to him, and beware you change not your religion. And there the prophet Ezechiel says contrariwise, beware that you follow not the devotion of your fathers. Yea verily: for there were two sorts of fathers among the Jews: the one was Abraham, and the holy Patriarches and Prophets, and such as knew the living God and served him in all pureness: those it behooved the Jews to rule themselves by. And in that respect does Moses say now unto them, beware that you turn not away from the God of your fathers, but continue still in their faith. Besides this, they had other fathers also, which were backsliders, and forward and had corrupted the law. And made a mingle mangle of it with all the superstitions of the hearthen. In respect of this it is said, beware you follow not your fathers: for they were forward and falsehearted towards God. In the same taking is the world at this day. The Papists allege their fathers. But what? Are not the Apostles the true fathers of the Christian Church? Yes, but the papists will not hear them speak, nor any other that have stabilized such order in the Church as God commanded. But they have their bastard fathers like themselves, which being a misbegotten generation, they take Monkeys and old dotterels for their fathers. Again when they allege any of the ancient doctors, if there be any folly or superstition in their writings, they can skill to cull it out every whit: but as for the good, they cast that a great way off. Now then let us beware of such manner of fatherhood and let us use discretion in choosing out the true fathers, and let us put that in use which Paul speaks of where he says that all fatherhood depends upon God and upon our Lord Jesus Christ. Thither (say I) must we refer our fatherhood, if we will have good fathers; so as God may be the chief father of them all, and they give record that they be his sons, that they may beget us by the incorruptible feed of his word: or else there will be nothing but utter confusion. Thus you see what we have to remember upon that saying.

Now heretofore Moses Adds further, that the Jews must not serve God at the first, and afterward become cold: but that they must persevere in it all the time of their life. And after that manner will God be honored of us. For he takes us not to hire for certain days, and then to let us go, or to give us leave to depart at the end of our term: he takes us for life and death. And it is good reason, as S. Paul shows us where he says that our Lord Jesus died and rose again to reign both over the quick and the dead. Though there were none other respect than this, were it not enough? Behold, the son of God which bought us by his death and passion, is risen again immediately: and is it not meet then that we should give ourselves to him and to God his father, and that we should be wholly dedicated unto him, and that we should both endeavor to serve him as long as we live upon the earth, and also that our death should be as a sacrifice and offering unto him, to show ourselves obedient to him in all points? Yes: and therefore let us mark well, that we must not do it, as it were in a pang as a number of folk do, who are very whot in gods service for a two or three days, and afterward their mind is altered and their devotion is quite gone, and they show full well that there was no zeal in them. But let us always bear in mind to serve God as long as we live. And therewithal let us also bethink us of that which set down here here Moses speaks yet again of the heritage that had been promised to the Jews. For seeing that our Lord does daily put us in mind of his grace: it is good reason that we should pluck up a good courage to honor him, and gather new strength to say, forasmuch as I have lived out this day in the world, and have served God this morning, seeing that I perceive he continues his goodness still towards me, yea, and increases it: is it not reason that my zeal and mine affection to serve him should be the more kindled, and that my hope should not be abated? That is the thing which Moses meant in saying, You shall possess the land and as long as you possess it you shall have a fair mirror before your eyes to show you how your God calls you to him, and maintains you in the possession of the benefit which he has once bestowed upon you.

And therefore let us mark, that we deserve well to be bereft of the grace that God shall have granted us, if we acknowledge it not toward him, but for get it, and apply it to another end than he meant it. It has been said heretofore that the Jews should possess the land, as long as the heaven hung over the earth. And yet we see how they be put out of it, insomuch that at this day they possess not any part of it, but wander abroad in the world, and are hunted to and fro. And what is the cause thereof? Surely God had maintained them in the inheritance which he had promised them, if they had not turned away from him after that fashion. For it was not without cause, that the land was called Gods resting place. As if he had said, that when all the residue of the world were tossed and turmoiled, the Jews should dwell at ease and rest in that land, so as if any man made war upon them and troubled them, yet God would establish them there. Yea but they have broken covenant with him. And therefore at this day (as we see) they be banished from resting in any place of the whole world. They be as vagabonds everywhere. And what is the cause o it but their own unthankfulness in that they have forsaken God's promise through their unbelief and stubbornness, and have utterly disannulled it to the uttermost of their power? THERefore let us bethink ourselves. True it is that we must be as wayfarers in this world, if we will be heires of heaven, as the Apostle tells us. But howsoever the case stand, if we intend to be blessed of our God, and to feel that he is a good defense for us: let us hold us in obedience and subjection to him. Otherwise let us assure ourselves, that although all the whole world hold with us, yet we shall find ourselves so persecuted and pursued, as we shall find no rest anywhere. If a faithful man walk in the fear of God, although he be persecuted and tormented; yet may he rest upon this point to say, yet is God my protector; and he will call upon him, and by his calling upon him he shall find cause of comfort. But on the contrary part, if an unbeliever play the rebel against God, although he have peace to the worldward, and be in favor of men, yea and alos dreaded: yet shall he ever be unquite and agaft. And the reason is, because he seeks not to be at peace with God. So then let us mark that whereas Moses exhorts the people here to serve God all their life long; it is to the end we knowingly that God renews his mercy goodness daily toward us; should be inflamed to serve him with the greater courage, and that from day to day we should always continue therein as though we were at rest. We see that even sleep sets a man in good plight again, so that when he has wearied himself with walking or working, he becomes ready and disposed to return to his labor again the next morning. Even so must we take courage at our Lords encouraging of us, and at his calling of us unto him, so as it may appear that we be willing and ready to follow him.

But now let us come to that which Moses has set down concerning the Lord's ordinances and statutes. The first commandment that he gives the Jews is that when they be come into the Land which they were to possess for their inheritance they should beat down all the altars of the heathen, break and deface their idols, burn all the grasses where they have used their superstitions, and utterly root out the remembrance of them. Here we see again how hateful a thing idolatry is unto God, and that he cannot abide that his service should in any wise be corrupted. Let us mark I say, that God accepts not any service at our hands, when it is mingled with any abuse or folly of our own heads: but as we must serve him only, so must we serve him not after our own fashion, but according to his own will, commandment and allowance. Wherein we see how a great number of ignorant wretches beguile themselves nowadays. For having protested that heir intent is to serve the only one God, they put to many patches of their own, bearing themselves in hand that that is not amiss. And why? So long as mine in devour be to serve God say they, and that I do it of a good intent; why should it be condemned? Yea, but we hear how our God cannot away with any companion, as he declares everywhere; and even in this text we be taught the same expressly enough: for God will have all remembrance of idols utterly rooted out. For why? As long as idols have their use, God is defaced and over covered that he cannot be discerned, and likewise all things in the world are confounded by it. Therefore it is all one as if men should go about to spoil him of his majesty and glory. And even the Papists themselves vows the same thing in their common byword, when they say that God is not known for the Apostles. And it was God's will that they should make a common proverb of it, to show that they cut their own throats with their own knife, in that they can allege no excuse at the latter day. For they say they meant it not: no, but will not their proverb prove them liars? Yes: for their own words shall judge them. Howsoever, they far, let us not that if God's service be not kept in the own pureness, all is marde: so that although men worship him never so much, yet he dislikes it, as we see by his speaking therefore in his prophet Ezechiell. Go serve your own Gods says he, for I have done with your. As if he should say; belong altogether to the devil if you will: Seeing that you hold you not all wholly to me, but that I must have companions joined with me, and you make me but as one of the common sort, so as I must be as good as nobody. I renounce you and give you over that your may go to the devil; for I will have no more to doe with you. So then let us mark well, that to serve our God aright, we must yield such preeminence to his majesty, as to depend all wholly upon his word and doctrine, without adding anything to that which he commands as shall be declared more at length in the next Lecture.

Now let furthermore, whereas it is said that the [very] remembrance of idols must be rooted out: it is to the end that folk should be the better advised. Truly God shows us on the one side (as I have said) how greatly he hates all idolatry, seeing he wills men to burn the woods and all that ever has served to the maintenance thereof, insomuch that he will have the very stones beaten to powder, and the gold and silver broken, so as all may be quite and clean done away. Seeing that God does so condemn the cratures which are good as in respect of themselves, because they have been instruments of superstition: thereby we see well that he can in no wise away with idolatry. Besides this he has always respect to the frailty of men: for as soon as we meet with anything, by and by we be miscarried: we be ever strange one way or other. And what is the cause? Naturally we be inclined to idolatry: and because we be earthly and fleshly; we be ever imagining of God something that seems good to ourselves, by reason whereof we turn him into sundry shapes. If we have never so small an occasion, by and by we be drawn unto evil. If a fly do but cross our eyes, we make an idol of it. We see then whereat God looked when he gave so straight commandment beat down the altars, to heave down the groves, to burn up the woods, to break the images, and to destroy the puppets utterly. For had those things continued still among the Jews; there would ever have been some among them, which would have given themselves to the superstitions of the heathen. Tush, would they have said; what and if a man had devotion to it? it is a hallowed thing: like as at this day, such as have been nufled in papistry, are so held to it as long as they see their pelting trash, that they can never wind themselves out of it, though they would never so fain. If a man that has been long inured to the Mass do see a chalice: his mind gives him still that there is some holiness in it: whereas clean contrariwise it is an filthy and stinking an infection as any can be, and yet notwithstanding we cannot conceive it. For

why? As said afore, we be fleshly by nature: and besides that, Satan uses such flight, that when he sets such things before our eyes to beguile us with, we be snared by them out of hand; and therefore there is none other remedy, but to make clean riddance of all such things as may allure us to superstition. Truly if they were puppets among us as are in the Popedoem, it might be alleged that they could not hurt us as long as they were not worshipped. Indeed, it is true that they of themselves could not hurt us: but let us look into ourselves, and we shall find ourselves so weak, that we should be blinded immediately by such baggage, and it would turn us away from God's pure world, insomuch that if we had altars still, we should not know that the Lord's supper were ministered unto us to the intent we should be partakers of him, and enjoy all his goods: but there would remain I wote not what a wicked imagination of that hellish sacrifice which is done in the popedome, namely of the Mass, wherein men think that Christ is offered there to God his father for the remission of our sins. And so there would always remain some wicked fancy still in our head. That is the cause why God has so straightly commanded to break the images, destroy the altars, and burn up the woods or groves where idols have been served and worshipped. The Papists in these days reply that that commandment was given but to the Jews, because they were given to superstition. Verily as who should say that we were better disposed nowadays than they were. True it is that GOD gives not his commandment to us as touching the Ceremony of burning all things wherewith idols have been served: but yet for all that, his will is that we should make clean riddance of all things that may turn us from the pure religion. If it were of necessity that his will is that we should make clean riddance of all things that may turn us from the pure religion. If it were of necessity that all things should be done away wherewith idols have been worshiped: this temple should now not stand to have the name of GOD preached in it. It has been a brothel house of Satans, but now must we apply it to good use, by taking away the trumpery that has reigned in it, which was quite contrary to God's word. But howsoever the world go, if we look well upon our infirmity, we shall find that this lesson belongs to us at this day, namely that all remembrance of idols is to be utterly razed out. And now insomuch as the malady of superstition is so rooted in us, there is none other remedy for it, but to take away all objects that may move us thereunto, that the devil may have no more any means to entangle us in his nets which he lays for us: but that we may know simply after what manner God will be worshipped and served.

Also we may gather further upon this text, how mad men be in their superstitions, accordingly as the prophets do speak thereof. For they use such similitude as these; namely that men not only resemble such folk as are carried away with fond love, and have lost both honesty, wit and countenance : but also resemble horses that ney after Mares, and are such other brute beasts. You see then after what manner the wretched idolaters are carried away in their superstitions. And this is declared unto us, in that we hear him speaking of woods of high growth, as men term them, and of Mountains and Hills. For there was not that odd nook wherein the Jews had not Some peculiar devotion; after which manner we see how our idolaters also have poisoned the fountains, woods and Hills with the filthiness of their superstitions and charms. Wheresoever was any notable thing, by and by there was reared some Temple, or there was some chapel built, and all to worship some idol in. There is never any end or measure when men take leave after that fashion to worship GOD after their own liking. And forasmuch as we see that, we ought to bridle our seves the more, that we attempt not anything without the warrant of God's word. For if we hold not ourselves within our bounds, and as it were tie ourselves simply to that which GOD has commanded: it can not be but that Satan shall lead us out of the way, so as there will be horrible confusion in our case.

The first reason then is, that such as will needs serve GOD after their own fancy, do always go into such a dungeon as they can never get out of again, and they fall continually from one superstition to other. Mark that for one point. And on the other side we see how greatly it will be to our condemnation, that we cannot find out in our hearts to dedicate our lives unto GOD, seeing that the idolaters are so carried away by their foolish fancies, that they have never done with them, nor can never think themselves superstitious enough. Therefore if we for our part seek not to keep ourselves in obedience to our GOD, what will become of us? For God has laid such a yoke upon our necks, as is gentle enough. He has an eye to our infirmity, he gives us such strength as he knows to be meet for us, he bears with us as gently as may be. And yet for all this, he can not compass us, we be so nice as is pity to see. We fall to complaining and say; Alas, GOD pinches us too fore. And if we do him but half service, yea or but the hundredth part of our duty, we think he ought to hold himself contented with it: whereas in the meanwhile the idolaters do martyr themselves out of measure, they endure after a sort the pains of damned souls, and they are ever ready to increase their superstitions.

Wherefore let us look well to ourselves; and seeing it is not lawful for us to attempt anything beyond God's will; but it behooves us to know what he requires of us, and to submit ourselves wholly unto him: let us be gentle and meek minded to bear the yoke patiently with GOD lays upon us, seeing it is neither hard nor grievous (as I said afore). And seeing that the idolaters do so follow their geere, and nothing can stay their trotting and gadding, but that they do as it were fly to the service of their idols. Let us step forward also, sith we see that our Lord shows us the way, yea and such a way as though it be very hard as in respect of our corruption, is nevertheless very plain and easy to us, in respect of the grace of his Holy Spirit.

Here is this moreover, that Moses says not here, that the Jews shall destroy and break the idols in all places wheresoever they become: but that GOD commands them to do it in the land that is given them to inherit. Wherein we see that the Holy Ghost commands not all the faithful in general to pull down and to break all idols in the world: but only where they themselves have authority. And it is a point well worth the noting. For if we be among idolaters, it lies not in us to rid the Land from the superstitions that reign in it. What is to be done then? Every man must reform himself in his own heart, so as all idols may be thrust out from thence. When I see God's service corrupted anywhere, I must forbear to haunt that place or to communicate in company with those idolaters. I must cut off all the wicked affections that are in my flesh, and I must show moreover that I am not minded to forsake my GOD, nor to falsify the faith that I have plighted unto him by defiling myself with the idolatries that are about me. Therefore every man must first and foremost reform his own heart, and secondly separate himself from all things that may defile him. And that is because GOD has given us a charge of our own persons, and made us as it were keepers of his temples, to the intent that every of us should look narrowly to ourselves. That is a thing which it behooves us to do when we be in the country of idolaters. Besides this, every man must purge and cleanse his own house from all filthiness. So as if a man be a householder, he must look well about him that he hold well his children and servants in the fear of GOD and in the pureness of religion. For if a man suffer his house to be defiled, and all things there to go to havoc: he shall be sure to make account thereof to God. Not that a man can hold his wife and servants continually tied to his sleeve to turn them to the Christian faith when he lifts: but my meaning is, that he must not suffer any superstition or idolatry. For why? Seeing that GOD has given him sovereignty in his own house; it behooves him to deal in such wise as GOD be honored there, and as no filthiness be mingled with the pure religion, but that all be rid quite and clean away. But as for Kings, princes, and Magistrates, which have power and authority, they must root out all superstition and idolatry. And seeing that GOD has armed them with the sword: it behooves them to use it in that behalf, so as they do not in any wise suffer or give leave, that there be any uncleanness to grieve GOD withal, or to abolish or deface his service. Those are the things which we have to mark upon this text of Moses. And therefore to be short, let us remember that he commands every of us to keep clean his own body and soul. For why? God has laid such a charge upon us, that he will have us to be the Temples of his Holy Ghost: and therefore he will have every of us to keep his bodies as clean as can be. Now then let us be careful to drive all idolatry far from us, and not to meddle with it in any wise. And again, let every of us have an eye to his household, that there be no infection in it to mar the service of God. And thirdly let those that are in estate of chief sovereignty, as kings, Princes and magistrates, let them I say consider, that sith the Lord hath given them authority and power, if they suffer his service to be defaced; they shall be called to account for it. For it is said that when thou art come into the land: though must drive out all idolatry, and utterly deface whatsoever has served to any superstition.

And in speaking after that manner, Moses shows that the putting away of idols is not all that we have to do: but that the chief point is the advancing, restoring and establishing of God's pure service. And that is well worthy to be noted. For we shall see a great number nowadays, which can well enough mock at the follies of the Pope, and at the abuses which reign under his tyranny. They dare well enough eat flesh upon Fridays, and they make no great account of Lend and Saints even, or of the taking of holy water, or of kissing of Relics, or of gadding in pilgrimage, or of any other such petty trash. They have no great devotion to the mass, or to Shrift, neither pass they for the dead, or for the singing [of dirges and such other paltry] for such as are deceased. We shall see a great number that can well enough despise all the superstitions of the Popedome, yea and even laugh them to scorn and utterly condemn them. But what? There is no fear of God, there is no Religion in them. Surely it were much better for them to have gone on still like brute beasts in their ignorance, than by such contempt to fall to rushing against God's Majesty like wild beasts, and not to perceive that there is a God which reigns over the whole world. Then does it not greatly boot to have abolished idols, except the true religion be set up in the steed of it. Like as when a house is built amiss, if it be said to be nothing worth, or that there be many faults in it; it shall be well done to pull it down again, whereas notwithstanding if it were let alone in the same plight, so as a man had lever to have some hoggerscote to lodge in; yet for all the ill favourdness and faultiness of it, it would serve his turn after a sort being let stand still; but if it were pulled down and raised to the ground and none other built up in steed thereof, the pulling down of it were to no purpose at all.

Let us mark then that here Moses delivers us a perfect doctrine which consists of two rules; Namely that we worship our God purely; and moreover that all superstitions be cast down, so as nothing may hinder the worshiping of God according to his worthiness, but that men may have an eye to him alone, and hold themselves lonely to his Majesty. And first he speaks of the abolishing of all superstitions. Why so? For if a man intend to till and sow a field, if the same be full of briers, thorns, and noisome weeds, he must first and foremost clean the ground, or else he must break it up with the plough to kill wicked weeds before he lay his seed into it. Even so must all corruptions be taken from among us, ere we can give ourselves over to the serving of God. Well may it be preached unto us that there is but one God whom we ought to worship: but if we be possessed beforehand with fond fancies or imaginations, we shall be never the better for it, but our minds shall ever be entangled. That is the cause why Moses begin the that end. But yet he adds further, that it is not enough to have cleaned a piece of ground, unless it be also tilled and sowed, that it may bring forth fruit, for else it will continue barren still. And what is a man the better then for his plucking up of the bushes and brambles that were in it afore? That is the thing which is showed us here. But first let us mark, that it is but a flat mockery, when men will need set forth God's word, without correcting of the vices that are contrary to the right religion; after which manner there are a number to be found nowadays in the Popedom, which row between two streams, of which sort are these hypocrites which have perchance some taste of the Gospel, and can boast indeed of the preaching of God's word. But how is that? Whereas they see the wretched world as fore blinded and besotted as may be, so as nothing else is minded but idolatry and superstition: yet they think it enough for them to say, there is but one God whom it behooves us to worship. They dare not say that he only is to be worshipped: but let us worship God, say they. And will not the Paynims say as much? Have not the Papists always said the same? And yet when they have said, we have Jesus Christ for our advocate: it is seen nevertheless that they let him alone behind them and run gadding after the patrons which the world has devised, and hold the wretched world at such a bay, that (like a sort of traitors to God and his Church) they make men believe that it is not evil to be partakers of all the abominations that are committed in it. But we see how God's meaning is clean contrary. For Moses faith not only, You shall serve the Lord your God: but before he come to that point, he saith, you shall beat down the Altars, break the images, burn the groves, and make clean riddance of all that ever has served unto wickedness: every whit of it must be utterly done away. And why? For had the people continued still in such infections, it had been impossible that God should have been worshipped purely. Then it is not enough for a man to give some taste of Gods truth; but if we see that Leasings have born sway aforetimes; they must be cut off, men must cry out against them, men must be reformed, they must be brought into the right way, and they must not be suffered to stay to anymore. But yet therewithal let us also learn, that when men have cried out against superstitions, they must not stay there: but they must chiefly proceed to the setting up again of Gods service, as Moses speakes thereof. For the very cause why there are so many Epicures in the world nowadays, and why there are so many fold that resemble swine and bruit beasts rather than men: is that they be contented to mock at the fondness and ignorance of the unbelievers, and yet could never skill themselves what it is to worship GOD purely, and to stick to him, and to humble themselves to his word. And therefore it is meet that they should be given up to a reprobate sense, and that they might no more have any honesty, humanity or aught else in them that is good. Wherefore let us learn not only to know that Papists are miserable and wretched creatures, and to condemn them in all their follies and superstitions: but also to be ready to go unto God when he calls us.

And let us understand that when he has been so gracious unto us as t teach us the true religion and doctrine of his Gospel; thereby he shows us that it is he only whom we ought to worship. Thus you see what we have to remember until the rest may be laid forth more fully.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our GOD with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them the more lively, that being cast down and as it were overwhelmed in ourselves, we may go seek the mercy which he has promised us for our Lord Jesus Christ's fake. And seeing he has granted us the grace to put away all superstitions from among us, let us beseech him that his service may be so set up again, as he suffer us not to become heathenish, but that as he has once sanctioned us, so we may hold out in the same, and profit continually more and more therein, until we have finished the course of this life. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth & c.

The 81st Sermon, which is the second upon the twelfth Chapter

3.4.5 But look what place so ever & c.

6 And thither shall you bring your burnt offerings, and your sacrifices, and your tithes, and the heave offerings of your hands, and your vows, and your freewill offerings, and the firstborn of your kin and sheep.

7 And there shall you eat before the Lord your God, and be merry both you and your household in all things that you set your hand unto, wherein the Lord your God shall have blessed you.

In the Doctrine that I have delivered unto you already, there are two parts. The one is that God will have all things utterly rooted out wherewith idols have been served. And good reason has he so to doe, because he sees the frailty of men: for if we have never so small an occasion, by and by we be miscarried. For idolatry is so rooted in our hearts, that we have need as it were to pluck ourselves from it by force: and what will then become of us, when we be drawn to it? Let us mark well therefore, that forasmuch as we be inclined to superstition, if we intend to serve GOD, we must put away all things that may turn us from the right way, and from the simplicity which God commands us. And men cannot stand too much upon their gard in that case. True it is that a number of men do ween themselves to be so strong, that although they be never so much conversant among the superstitions of the unbelievers, yet they shall not be attained with them: But God is wiser than we. And therefore let us remember the lesson that he tells us: namely that we must shun all the superstitions of the heathen and the misbelievers, or else his service will be marred among us by and by. But forasmuch as I have declared that part already, I will stand no longer upon it.

Let us proceed to that which Moses adds, namely that men must not deal so with God by which saying he means, that the Jews must not go about to honor the living GOD by building up the altars, Chapels, or any other of all the filthy things again which they had beaten down. As if he should say, GOD will not be served after the manner of idols, and therefore regard not what the heathen have done, follow them not, neither fashion yourselves to their example: but hold you to this one rule of doing that which your God commands our. And this is well worth the noting: for when we have condemned idolatry, we cease not for all that to imagine that God likes well that we should do the same things in honor of him, which were done by the unbelievers: and that appears by the dealings in the Popedome. After that the Gospel had been preached to the world, men fell to mingling of all manner of superstitions of the heathen with the true service of God. And what was the cause thereof? The heathen had their pilgrimages: and men knew well it was a devilish abuse: nevertheless they did not put them quite and clean away, they did but only change them. Instead of going on pilgrimage to such an idol, they go now to our Lady of Laureate, to the holy handkercher, so Saint Michael, to Saint James, and to visit the holy Sepulcher. Men should have utterly rooted out all the things that had been so brought in by Satan, and instead thereof they did but change them. Whereas men saw that the heathen made great feasts, and kept a great number of solemn holy days in honor of their idols: O (quote they) we must no more do so, for that were a serving of the devil: but let every parish make a Church holyday, to play, to dance, and to seed in till they burst again, and all in the honor of God. Besides this, let everyone have their patron, and let them worship him. And so instead of the solemn feasts that were among the heathen, let others be brought in among us. O sirs (say they) these things are not done any more in honor of the idols; but in honor of Saint Martine. And then let them dance and play the drunkards, for all is well enough so it be done in the honor of God. Again the heathen were wont to keep a holy day which they called the feast of all Spirits: and we must change the word and have he feast of all Souls. Moreover the heathen had a Temple which was called the Temple of all goddess, and we do now call it the Church of all Saints or all Hallows. See what an act worthy of remembrance and an Angelical act the Pope thought he did, as the Papists can well skill to make the brags. For lo (say they) there is a temple called the Temple of all the gods: but what? We have but one God, and therefore it must not continue after that fashion. Well, we will change the word, and whereas the heathen had a Temple which they called the Temple of All their gods, we will have it the Church of all Hallows, and we will have a Church holyday added to it. Again when they saw that the heathen had their sacrifices: Needs must they also have their Masses set up in the room of them. Moreover perceiving that the heathen had their washings, they also would need have their holy water. To be short, whatsoever filth and infection was among the infidels; the Papists took it to themselves to keep. And what was the cause thereof? Even for want of taking heed to this text, wherein it is said that whereas the Infidels have many devotions devised of their own brain, we must not covet to do the like to our God, nor look that way; but we must hearken what he says and commands. Were this saying of Moses understood; all the devilish devises that have reigned and do reign still at this day in the Popedome, should get them away to the bottom of hell. For we see here a general condemnation, whereby GOD shows that he hates all such things. And why? Because he will not have men to deal with him as the ignorant do with their idols. A thing may seem fair to the worldward, and men may clap their hands at it: but behold God says here, I will not be served after such fashion, or such manner, let not men perfume into my presence to devise what they think good themselves. And if it be alleged, yea, but shall such a thing be evil taken, when I do it in the honor of God? Shall it be said that I serve idols, when I do such a thing of a good intent, and all to serve God? Is it so great an evil that men should cry out at it? no, no, men must hearken what God commands, and ground themselves altogether thereupon, so as they presume not to add anything thereunto. We see then that the meaning of this text is, that we must forget all the follies that have beguiled us, and not allege custom or continuance of time, but receive the doctrine of the holy scripture like little children. A young child will not say, thus and thus have I been taught; for he knows yet nothing at all: But he receives that which is put to him, and is the readier to learn, because he is not inured beforehand with any manner of misteaching. But if a child have been mistaught and nufled in his fondness: then if a man go about to amend him, O (says he) I was taught so, and a man shall not be able to make him pronounce one syllable aright, nor to speak one word to any purpose. And why so? Because he has been trained by an ass, who has framed him to his own fashion, and he has learned the right trick of him. After the same manner it is with a great number of folk that have been brought up in cursed popery: always they hold still some relics of it, saying, Yea sir, but can such a thing be evil? There is ever some replying against God. But as for us, let us practice that which is said in the four and fortieth Psalm: My daughter, forget your own people and your fathers house, and your husband will take pleasure in you. We know that in that place our spiritual marriage with Jesus Christ is described under the person of Salomon. And first of all we be commanded to forget all that ever is of our own. For by our people and by our fathers house, is meant all that ever we have of nature, all things that we have loved afore, and all the pleasures and delights wherewith we have been held back. All these things must be thrust under foot, or else the son of God will nbever like us, whose calling of us to him is to make us all one with himself. Also we must put the same thing in use which I have alleged heretofore out of Saint Peter: namely that we must be like new born babies. For when a child begins at his Apsie he is easier to be taught and suffers himself to be over ruled: even so in all things, let us learn this lesson which God teaches us in his doctrine, and let all our wisdom be to obey him. That is the thing which we have to mark in this text where it is said, though shall not deal so with thy God: for God will not be weighed in the balance nor ruled by the measure of idols, but will have men to embrace whatsoever he commands, and to rest upon it without gainsaying or replying. For declaration hereof he says, Ye shall resort to the place which he shall have chosen to put his name in, and to dwell in. Which saying here is expounded of some to be his habitation, that is to say, his sanctuary or tabernacle. But all comes to one end: God's meaning is plain and undoubtful, namely that whereas the heathen had set up many Altars, built many Chappels, and gone on many pilgrimages: the Israelites should hold themselves contented with the only sacrificial. Now if it were lawful for men to be ruled by their own reason, the Jews might here have pleaded in this wise against God, What, the country is great, and shall there be no Altar in no place of it but only in one? There are diverse great Cities; and shall there be never a Temple in them for men to offer sacrifice in and to do their devotions? There are a great number of countries bordering upon it, [which do otherwise;] and shall we in worshipping God look only unto heaven? Why shall there be no altars? It might seem therefore that the Jews had very just cause to refuse this commandment and to say we will be so devoted that we will have some sign or mark of God's dwelling among us and we will worship him, and do solemn sacrifices unto him. But what? In this case men must bridle themselves and hold their own wits in captivity, so as they give God leave to speak, and they themselves hold their peace, without attempting to go any further than God's mouth permits them. You see then how it is God's will to humble his servants by making them subject to his word. Wherefore let us learn that we must not follow our own sway nor our own imagination: but this ought to suffice us, that our service be acceptable unto God, by our ordering of it according to his will: there is no other way but that.

And it is said expressly in the place which the everlasting, thy God that chose: as if he should say, it is not in the choice of the Jews to appoint God a place or to say unto him, here will we sacrifice. Men must not presume so far. It belongs to your God to choose says Moses. To be short he will have God's authority to be received and him only to be the ruler of his people, so as he may command what he lifts and be obeyed without gainsaying. You see then that the foundation of true religion is not to say, it seems so to me, I weene so, I would fain have it so, it is a goodly thing: but to let God speak, and to assure ourselves that it is not for us to do anything but that which he allows. And so is meant by this saying that obedience is more worth before him than all manner of sacrifice. And in very deed can we do him any greater honor than to rest upon his word, and suffer ourselves to be governed by it, and to be as poor blind folks until he have lightened us and showed us the way? Now as for those that follow their own devotions, they be reave God of his sovereignty and yield him no reverence at all: therefore it is but a building in the air and an utter confusion. Wherefore let us weigh well this word choose, that we may be surely resolved in ourselves that none but God has authority to set order how he should be honored and served,

And he adds yet further, from out of all your tribes. Here the people might be tempted to a kind of jealousy, for we know that men do willingly draw things to themselves, and that it is a grief and a corsey unto us when others are preferred before us. The same might be also among the Jews. The land of Channan is divided into twelve tribes, for the Tribe of Joseph made two, and the Levites had no portion at all. But yet for all that, you see there were twelve Tribes, which had every one his portion to inherit. Now GOD told them that this Tabernacle should be set in Jerusalem, and that his temple should be built upon mount Sion. Hereupon the residue might have quarreled thus: What? Are not we the children of Abraham as well as they? With whom is it that GOD has made his covenant? Are we not all of one stock? Why t hen should the Tribe of Juda be preferred before us? Specially seeing he is not the first begotten. Does the birth right belong unto him? Why should he be more honored than all the rest Whence has he this privilege? After that manner might the matter be debated. Also it might be alleged that the Arke ought to be removed every month of the year from one tribe to another throughout all the twelve Tribes. There are twelve months in the year, and we be twelve tribes of us: and therefore we ought to begin according to the order of birthright, so as the eldest have the carrying of the Ark the first month, and every Tribe after in his order. Were it not reason it should be so? You see then that the rest of the Tribes might have made that allegation when they saw the Tribes of Juda preferred before all the other Tribes. But Moses prevents that, saying, it belongs unto thy GOD to choose and to command what he thinks good. According whereunto it is said in the Psalm, that the land of Channan was indeed made holy, and that God had promised it to his servant Abraham. But what? He refused the tribes of Manses and Ephraim, and rested not there, but choose the Tribe of Juda. And why? Because it pleased him If a man should look upon the outward appearance, it is well known that the kingdom of Israel was far greater than the kingdom of Juda. True it is that in king David's time, they were all one kingdom: but when the people fell away, then the Tribe of Ephraim became of greatest honor among them: but yet for all that, God refused this dignity to the city of Jerusalem and to mount Sion, that he would be worshiped

there. Sith it is so, let us understand that to serve GOD aright, men must uncase themselves of all pride, so as they seek not to advance themselves, but submit themselves wholly to God's will without regarding to be honored above others after the ambitious manner of the Papists which strive who shall go foremost to the offering. They pretend to do it of devotion; but indeed they do it of devilish pride. And therefore if we will have God to accept our service, let us learn to come unto him with humility and not to turn our tails to our neighbors: and if God vouchsafe to endue any others with greater grace than ourselves, we must not spite them for it, as we be warned of it. We see that God distributes his gifts more unto one than unto another; what is now to be done? Should we gaze about us how to make ourselves jolly fellows? Alas we do but wander away from GOD when we step forth to advance ourselves before men. Therefore let us proceed with all loveliness, and not be so fondly and wickedly disposed as to have a will to be preferred before our neighbors. And so we see what Moses meant to express here in saying, God will choose him out some one certain place from among thy tribes: and let it not grieve them that are put back from it. For why? If it be God's will to humble them, they shall gain nothing by their coming to RUSH AGAINST HIM, and therefore let every man hold himself contented with his degree and measure, and let him that is little hold himself contented with his littleness.

And now he adds expressly also, that God will choose a place to put his name in. Whereby he means that he is not to be enclosed in it as in respect of his substance. For (as I have declared before) there are always two things which it behooves us to mark well. When we have an outward order or some of serving God, we must observe two things therein. The one is that forasmuch as God sees us to be rude and earthly, he stops unto us, and pleasures us so far, as to give us things fit for us. As for example, when we in praying do use these ceremonies of kneeling down, of putting off our caps and lifting up our hands: wherefore do we so? It is not for that GOD has need of it for his part, but for our own weakness sake. Because we be over gross, we be fain to be exercised after that fashion. After the same manner we have Baptism, and the Lord's Holy Supper, all which things are for the weakness of our nature. And so you see that that is one thing which we have to mark on our part. But when as God bears with us after that fashion, let us beware that we surmise him not to be like ourselves, or that we think him not to behave himself after our lust. For men are always in danger of falling into that extremity, The thing then in effect which Moses meant to say, is his sanctuary in, there will he have you to worship him: there will he have you to offer your sacrifices to him, thither will he have you to bring your oblations;

there will he have you to honor him with your person and goods, protesting yourselves to be wholly at his devotion. But yet must you not think that your God is come down from heaven and shut up in a coffer or chest. You must not think that the fits between Cherubins after the manner of men: but that is enough for you that his name is there, that is to say that he gives you some token of his presence and power, to the intent you may be sure that he will hear all our prayers and be merciful to you. And yet for all that he fills heaven and earth, howsoever the world go. Therefore you must not fall to shutting up of the infinity majesty and substance of your God, into a cornder, or into a material and corruptible Temple. Beware of such superstition, and be contented with the having of his name, that is to say, that your God is there called upon, that his Law is there preached to you, that his promises are there set before you, that you be grounded upon his grace, that you need not to doubt but that he is your father and Savior that you may boldly sue unto him, and that you be sure he is ready to receive your requests. That is the intent why your God is minded to be among you.

Of this place we have a good lesson to gather, which is, that seeing God has ordained means agreeable to our infirmity to serve him withal, we ought to use them, according to this saying, though shall seek out that place. For Moses having warned the Jews of their rudeness, commands them to benefit themselves by such means as the Lord teaches them:” that is to wit, by the ceremonies which he would give them. Nowadays we have not the like ceremonies to those that were under the law. Bu yet does our Lord bear with us also, so far forth as he sees it requisite, and gives us such ceremonies as are meet for us, in respect whereof we have the meetings that are made among us, as I have said afore. And why? To the end that Gods word should be preached to us, that we should make common prayers as it were with one mouth, that we should confess our faith, and Christendom together, and that the Sacraments should be ministered in the company of the faithful. Seeing that our Lord gives us such means, it behooves us to use them. For whosoever despises them, mocks God openly. Let us mark well that whatsoever our Lord has ordained for our behoof, we must receive it, and be diligent to strengthen our faith thereby daily more and more. For if I think myself to be so perfect, that I pass not to come at the Church, there to benefit myself with others: it is devilish overweening; and it were better for me that I were some poor beggar that had neither wit nor understanding, (so as in the meanwhile I knew mine own poverty) than to be so high minded. For it is the next way to cast me down to the bottom of hell, when I will need exempt myself from the common order. And therefore whosoever has any zeal and affection to serve God, must do that which is commanded here in seeking the place that God has appointed: that is to say, he must not hold scorn of anything which he has ordained for the confirming of our faith. That is one point.

Again we must always bear in mind that when God vouchsafes to plant his name among us, we must not serve him after our own fashion, and after our own rude manner, for his service is always spiritual, and the things that he shows us here beneath, must draw up aloft to heaven. And hereby a man may see how the wretched world has been beguiled. For the greatest warrant that we have of our Lord Jesus Christ's presence among us, is left us in his holy supper. There he does as it were put himself into our hands, of purpose to be incorporated into us, as the bread and wine become one substance with us when we have eaten it and taken sustenance of it. The son of God shows himself familiarly unto us. Yet for all this, we must not imagine that he is come down from heaven, and that we handle him here between our paws, or that he is enclosed within any certain place. No: but his coming down to us, is to draw us up to him. Therefore when we receive the communion, let it content us that we have there a good and sure pledge of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that we be sure of his dwelling in us, and of our being one with him. And yet for all that, we must not be so fleshly and gross, as to duck down our heads to it, or to worship it: but rather we must behold him by faith in his heavenly glory, and seek him there. For we see how beastly the papists became: They bear themselves in hand that there was no God at all, if he were not shut up in a box: they worshiped Jesus Christ after such gross manner, that they became utterly brutish and witless. For as much then as we see that the wretched world has been so bewitched by Satan, let us resort to the remedy. For the fault grew of this, that men followed not the rule that is contained in this text, There shall you seek your god. And why? For there is his name. Where as it is said you shall seek him there: it is not meant that you should shut him up there: but that you should there glorify his name. True it is that notwithstanding the choosing of that place, yet the people were still taught to serve him spiritually. For God renounced not his own nature, when he appointed a temple to be worshipped in: but his doing thereof was to the end that the people should exercise themselves continually in his spiritual service, notwithstanding that the Ceremonies were outward. That is the thing which we have plainly to gather out of that place.

Now we have to mark likewise, that God held his people a long time in suspense, before he showed them the place where he would dwell forever. True it is, that wheresoever the Ark was, there the sacrifices were to be made. Yet notwithstanding the place was not appointed out, that is to wit Mount Sion. Although the Ark were for the most part at Silo: yet did it wander up and down for a great time, and the people were in continually waiting where it should rest: and that was a great temptation. For see what might have been said: GOD promised us to choose out a place: but he does it not. And why then should we not choose a place ourselves? And why should not he like well of us for so doing? Howsoever the world go, it is not lawful so to do. The matter stood not here upon ten, twenty, thirty, a hundred, or three hundred years: but you see the people were fain to tarry a much longer time, even to the reign of David. There had been a number of changes, a great sort of Judges one after another, and a great sort of governors: and yet of all that while GOD spoke not a word of that matter, whereby it might seem he had utterly forgotten the promise that he had made by Moses. But yet must the people tarry his leisure still. And therefore let us not be as though we stood upon thorns, when our Lord lifts to hold us at a bay. Let us bear in mind that he tries our obedience. If he utter not things unto us at the first as we should wish, it is his meaning therein to try us the better, whether we can find in our hearts to be subject to him or no, and whether we have the loveliness and reverence to walk on in the simplicity of his word. That is the thing which we have to mark concerning the first point.

Furthermore, we must understand, that when God has chosen a place; it is not for us to remove to and fro. And yet we must not be drowned in so brutish superstition, as to think that GOD is tied to the place which he has chosen. Indeed it was an excellent prerogative for the city of Jerusalem to be called the royal city of GOD, so as he would vouchsafe to have his Temple there. But we see what befell them for abusing so honorable a title, and for refusing to serve GOD with pure consciences. After that God had patiently waited for their conversion, he withdrew himself from them. When he saw the Jews become stubborn; he took away his glory from that place. Yea and the Prophet Jeremy had upbraided them with it beforehand. Go your ways to Silo (says he) and see how desolate it is at this day. And yet notwithstanding Silo had been preferred before Jerusalem. For God's Ark had been there for a long time, and yet was that place razed to the ground. Behold a thing even at this present that might make your hairs to stand up upon your heads.

Do you boast of your Temple (quote Jeremy?) Think you that God is so much bound unto you that he can not withdraw his glory from thence? The threatening were uttered by Jeremy; but the people followed still their wicked trade: and in the end God's glory was fain to depart, as is said by Ezekiel. For the Majesty of GOD was showed him in the Temple, so as he saw there both heaven and earth, and things that were above nature. And yet for all that, he saw also that all vanished away as smoke, and the Temple abode empty and was unhallowed, because GOD had forsaken it and given it over. Whereby we be done to understand, that when our Lord shows us favor above others, we must live the more warily and fearfully; and that if we will continue in the possession of the benefits that we have received, we must not abuse them. Had Rome been chosen as was Jerusalem, how proud would they have been? For although they boast themselves to have the Apostolic sea, and that the Pope is the head of the world, so as the universal supremacy of all things is there: yet have they not one syllable for them in the Holy Scripture, but have usurped all that ever they challenge to themselves, and they have no color that God likes of them. But what though there were some text that God gave preeminence to that city? Yet we see that as now it is a very dungeon of hell, insomuch that they have not only burst out into all manner of lewdness, and by all means wrought dishonor unto God: but also are become as void of religion as Sodom, so as the devils themselves have more fear and reverence to Godward, than all those filthy and stinking rabble that rule the roste there. Seeing then that there is such contempt of God, and so outrageous wickedness there, think we that God is so bound unto them, that he cannot depart from them? He had said of Jerusalem, This is my resting place: but of Rome he never said any such thing. And therefore we see what a fondness it is to make such brags as to say, that howsoever the Pope do, yet is he still the head of the Church. Nay contrariwise we have God for our head, and it is not lawful for us to change him, except we will go to destruction with those whom we see to have been so far overseen after that fashion. And now sith we see that this is fallen out in the Popedome, let us look well to it when God dwells among us, that we drive him not away, but that we serve him with all pureness, that as he reigns over us at the present, so he may continue with us to the end, and never forsake us. That is the thing which we have to bear in mind when we look upon the examples that befell both the Ark had been a long time: and to Jerusalem where the place was appointed for the building of the Temple, according to the promise that Moses had made.

And now he adds, That they should resort thither to offer their Sacrifices and burnt offerings, there to do all their devotion, and to pay all their vows. As if he should say, that they might not attempt anything upon their own fond heads, but hearken unto God, and be governed by his only word. And therewithal we must call to mind what has been touched before; namely that God's ordaining of Sacrifices, burnt offerings, vows, and such like things, was not for any need that he himself had of them, or for that they could stand him in any stead: but to keep the people occupied with those ceremonies, and all because men are so frail and earthly. God then did ordain Sacrifices. And to what purpose? To instruct folk withal. For when the Jews came thereunto, it was for them to consider thus with themselves: We be wretched sinners, we be not worthy to approach unto the Majesty of our God, for he is righteous and the very righteousness itself, he is the fountain of all cleanness, and we on our side bring nothing to him but all manner of filth and uncleanness. Therefore it stood the Jews in hand to have some means to wash themselves and to make themselves clean before God. It stood them in hand to be discharged of their debts, and of the curse wherein they felt themselves to be wrapped. For the doing whereof God gave them the said Sacrifices. When they came to him, they protested on the one side, Alas Lord, we deserve death, but we hope that thou wilt hear us for the bloods sake which is to be shed for the washing away of our spots. Besides this, they had washings, whereby they were made to acknowledge thus: True it is Lord that we be full of filth, but it is in thee to make us clean. And so you see that the Sacrifices were ordained to instruct the people, as I said afore, and we likewise have the same order at this day, which God would have to continue still among the Christians. And therefore let us refer all to that end, namely that in as much as we be gross and rude, it is for our behoove to be exercised with some ceremonies. Yea, but yet must not those be our own inventing. For we shall never have done, if we go to work after our own fashion. Let us content ourselves with the plain things that are contained in God's word. For that is all our wisdom.

Finally Moses adds, There shall you eat and drink in the presence of your God, both you and your households. And when you come thither y our God will bless you. Here Moses adds that when the people submit themselves after the manner aforesaid, God will make them to prosper. That is the effect of his meaning here. And here withal he shows us, that even in the matters that concern this temporal life, we must dedicate all things to the service and honor of our God. And that is a thing well worthy to be marked. For we see how the world is desirous to discharge itself in such wise to Godward, that when they have once served God a little, they would have truce for a good while after. As how? When the greatest hypocrites in the Popedome have performed all their ceremonies in t heir Churches, as the besprinkling of themselves with their holy water, their crossing of themselves, and their much mumbling of their meaculpaes: they bear themselves in hand that all the day after they may t urn their backs upon God as soon as they have turned their tails from the Church, and God sees them no more. For why? He is well paid, and he must hold himself contented. After that manner do men behave themselves. And why so? It is because that although we know God's service to be spiritual, yet notwithstanding we consider not that all things which we do in this present life must be referred to the service of God: like as when we eat and drink, it is true that the doing thereof is to sustain us in this world till GOD take us out of it. Again, we have other needful things to be done, as the applying of every man's trade, in traveling and laboring of his living. True it is that all these things are worldly and earthly, and therefore they must not withdraw us from the heavenly things, whatsoever come of it. Therefore when we eat and drink, our taking of our bodily sustenance must be after such a sort, as therewith we must find some further taste of the goodness of our God, and joy in him for that he is our foster father, of whom we have our daily bread, as we profess by asking it at his hand. And when we have taken our repast, we must proceed to take sustenance of the good things that are prepared for us in heaven, against we depart out of this world, that we may have some beginning of them

Beforehand, and travel towards the attainment of them daily more and more. That is the thing which Moses meant plainly in this place saying, when you have offered sacrifice to your GOD, you shall make merry there in his presence. For the people were wound to make feasts at their sacrifices. And what manner a ones? Holy feasts: not that God was honored by their eating and drinking, but for that it was a testifying, that it behooved them to bear in mind that they were all their lifelong in God's sight: So as it behooved them not only to think upon him at the beginning of the year, or a three or four times a year when they came to Jerusalem to do sacrifice, but also to think thus with themselves continually: Although we be far off from the Temple, so as we cannot be there to do our sacrifices: yet does not our GOD fail to regard us: for he watches over us, and we be in his protection. Therefore whensoever we eat or drink, let us assure ourselves that he sees us, and we cannot hide ourselves out of his sight, neither ought we on the other side to forget him, as men commonly do when they be minded to make merry. They frisk it out in such sort, as I they thought they could get away from him. But on the contrary part, God's will was to do the people of old time to understand that whensoever they did eat and drink, they should think that God saw them. We in these days have no such Ceremony of feasting in Jerusalem and in the places near about the Temple: but yet does the truth there of continue still to us: which is, that we be done to understand that after we have been at the Church, and have met there together in the name of our God, when every of us returns home to his house to dinner, we must not let god alone in the Church, and take our leave of him; but we must bear in mind that God guides us, and when we be come home to take our repast every man by himself, we must behave ourselves as in the presence of our God, and our mirth must be after such sort, as he may be the witness of our gladness. For we know that if our mirth be unholy, it is cursed of God. Therefore let us learn to bear always in mind, that our God is our guide everywhere, and that he never forsakes us, to the intent that we on our part should not be as beasts that run astray. That is the thing which we have to mark upon t his text. The Ceremony thereof was in force during the time of the Law. But as for us nowadays, let us be contented with the truth thereof, and learn to understand that sith our Lord Jesus Christ is come, we need no more any material Temples to tell us that God is with us. For our Lord Jesus has not for naught taken to him the name of Emanuel (as the Prophet Esay calls him) that is to say: God with us. And forasmuch as our Lord Jesus Christ tells us that he will be with us continually to the world's end, let us not fear but that God will accept us for his children, so that in passing through this transitory life, we have our eye always upon him, and go forward still towards his heavenly kingdom. For then will he make all the rest to be dedicated to his honor, so as even our eating and drinking shall be a piece of his service, and he will take it in good worth and like well of it, so that we do wholly worship him, looking to be fed at his hand, not only with this corruptible food, but also with such nourishing food to himself wad, as we may live with him the same life that he himself lives.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our innumerable faults, which we commit daily against his Majesty without ceasing, praying him to make us perceive the better than we have done, and in the mean while to bear with us, until he have rid us quite and clean from all vices, and united us thoroughly to his righteousness. And so let us all say, almighty God heavenly father, &c.

On Monday, the 7th of October 1555

The 82nd Sermon, which is the third upon the twelfth Chapter

8 You shall not do according to all the things that you do here this day, that is to with every man as he things good.

9 For as yet you be not come into the resting place and the inheritance which the Lord your God gives you.

10 You shall go over Jordan, and dwell in the land which the Lord your God will make you to inherit. And he will give you rest from all your enemies round about you, and you shall dwell in safety.

11 And when the Lord your God shall have chosen a place there, to put his name in: you shall bring thither all that I command you that is to wit, your burnt offerings, your sacrifices, your tenths, your Heave offerings, and all the choice of your vows which you shall have vowed to the Lord.

12 And you shall make merry in the sight of the Lord your God, both you yourselves and your sons and daughters, your Menservants and your maid servants, and the Levite also that is within your gates: for he has no part nor inheritance with you.

13 Beware that thou offer not thy burnt offerings in all places which thou feast.

14 But in the place with the Lord will choose in one of thy Tribes. There shall thou offer thy burnt offerings, and thither shall thou bring all the things that I command thee.

Although Moses have treated of this matter heretofore, yet is it not without cause that he goes to it again for the better confirming thereof. For as I have told you already, Men are always desirous to pass their bounds, and cannot submit themselves to God, to attempt nothing beyond his word. Wherefore let us mark wll that God thinks it not enough to tell men once for all, that they should behave themselves according to his word and ordinances: but he repeats the same lesson oftentimes, to the intent that men should take the better heed of it, and mark it the better. And because the people had not as yet the law written as touching the Ceremonies; it is said expressly, You shall not do as you do now. For it behooved the people to bridle themselves thereafter as they were taught. Howbeit, for the better understanding of this text, it might be demanded first, whether the Israelites did for a time offer sacrifice at their own pleasure, without rule, or without being certain what God required or allowed. The answer hereunto is, that they had always some mark to shoot at, and that they had not the bridle so loose in their necks, but that they knew how they ought to sacrifice. And indeed, we hear how the Apostle says to the Hebrews, that from Abel forth on, there was no sacrifice accepted but by faith. And faith imports always obedience, so as if men deal at adventure, there is no faith at all in them. But the Apostle says expressly that Abel's sacrifices pleased God because of his faith. Whereupon it follows that God has ever showed his will to the faithful, so as they have not gone to work unadvisedly, but have had such certainty as was requisite for them. And whereas Moses reports in Genesis that Noy sacrificed of clean beasts unto God, it does us to understand that Noy must needs have had some knowledge of the difference of them beforehand: for it passed his understanding to find out which beasts were clean. Needs therefore must it be that God had imprinted it in him: and that order has continued forever. And so is it certain that the Israelites never had any such lawless liberties, but that they knew which was the true way of worshipping GOD. Also it is expressed by Moses that Abraham would instruct his posterity in the judgments, Laws and Ordinances of GOD. Whereby he does us to understand, that although there was not as then any law written; yet notwithstanding Abraham failed not to have knowledge of the things that God required and of whatsoever else was requisite. For Moses could have said at one word, Abraham will teach his children to live well and holily and according to the will of God: but he says that he will teach them his laws, statutes and ordinances. To what purpose? I have told you before, that it was to magnify God the better, for his well providing of all things requisite to the serving of him, so as the faithful could not stand in any doubt, but were sure of their duty what they ought to do.

According hereunto therefore let us mark, that when the people of Israel come out of Egypt, their sacrificing was not after the manner of the Heathen, according to the invention of man: but after a heavenly order, that is to say, according to the order which God had appointed. Yet notwithstanding, it is true that there was not as yet any such particular declaration made of the Sanctuary, and of all the appurtenances and things belonging thereunto, as we see is set down in Exodus and Leviticus. These things (Say I) were not so particularly set fort: it was not yet said unto them, You shall have but one altar, which shall be of such a measure, of such a height, and of such a breadth: you shall have a Tabernacle of such manner of stuff, of thus many pieces, thus long and thus broad: You shall have fire burning continually in the Sanctuary: Your sacrifices shall never be offered without salt: there shall always be light and perfume in the Temple: The cakes that shall be offered in the Temple shall be of such fashion: There shall be bread continually before the Lord, and it shall be renewed day by day: Again there shall be a high Priest, which shall enter once a year into the narrow Sanctuary, and here shall be an Altar of burnt sacrifices for him to offer upon from day to day. These things were not yet thus set out: and that is the thing which Moses meant in this text when he says, You shall not do after the same manner as we do this day. For there was greater liberty before such time as God had set forth his commandments to bridle the people whithal, and to hold them in such awe as they should not attempt anything upon their own head, nor step aside to the right hand or to the left; but follow the things roundly which were contained in his Law.

And hereof we have to gather, that after as God utters his will unto us, so are we the more bound to follow the same. For if we knew not what to do, and that God had let us alone in suspense: we might have some because of our? doing of things as seemed good to ourselves. For why? Our Lord has not been so gracious to us as to say unto us expressly, Thus shall you do: And therefore we may do according to our own skill, seeing we have no express word to the contrary. After that manner might a man reply. But now that God has witnessed his will unto us, we must stoop to it, and it is n to lawful for us to add anything thereto, For that were as much to say, as we would fall to scanning whether God or we were the wiser. And what a presumption were it, if we should needs have better things than those which he joins us? Yet notwithstanding, if men cannot find in their hearts to yield to the things that GOD commands, they enter into this devilish presumptuousness of purposing to be wiser than God has given them leave to be. Wherefore let us learn, that when we have once assurance what God allows, we must mark, that God did not without cause give the people of old time so many rules to show them how to do sacrifice. When we read the things that are contained in Leviticus, to our seeming there be many needless things. For God might well have said in few words, I will have a Temple, and there will I have you to sacrifice unto me. But there are such a sort of commandments as may make a man amazed and out of his wits. And what is the cause thereof? True it is that all things were made and done according to the pattern that Moses had seen in the Mount, as God himself declares. And thereby we be done to understand that the figures, (although that at this day we know not perfectly in all points to what use they served) had a spiritual truth, which may be referred to the things which we have nowadays by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ for he is the very body and substance of all the shadows that were under the Law. When we read that the high priest might not enter into Sanctuary, but with such attire as s there described we would think it strange to see a man so disguised, with so many things about him. And why was that? We must mark that it was to do the people to understand, that the party which was to be the mediator between God and men, was not of the common state and sort of men, but that it behooved him to have a special kind of holiness to preach unto GOD with all. And that was the cause why he carried this title in his frontlet upon his head; Hallowed unto God, or the holiness of God, Again, he had other attires about him, so as he could not go or stir, but there went a noise or found from him. For he ware bells upon the skirts of his garments; and that was to show that all men ought to give ear, when it is told them that the son of God was offered for us in sacrifice, so as the same may ring into our hearts, to the intent we may seek the means to be reconciled to GOD. There were other things whereof a man may perceive the reason. As the twelve precious stones which the high priest ware on his breast aloft upon the Ephod: and the names of the twelve tribes graven in other stones upon his shoulders. Whereby was meant that Jesus Christ did nothing for himself but all for us and in our behalf: and that his going unto God after that fashion, was to bring us into his presence, according to t his saying of his, I sanctify myself to make you all partakers of the same holiness. Now then we see the reason of many things that were commanded in the law, and we know it was not without cause that the Apostle said that all things were made according to the pattern that Moses had seen upon the Mount: after the which manner Saint Steven alleges the same text in the seventh of Acts. Nevertheless we must note that God's meaning was to hold his people in awe, that they might be the surer what to do, and not be occasioned to transgress the true service of God, by mingling of any inventions with it. I say it was God's intent to inure his people to obedience. For if we show ourselves to serve God otherwise, all that ever we do will be nothing worth: nay it will be sin. If I wean I do well, and in the meanwhile stand in doubt and perplexity; all must needs go to wreck. For if we be not enlightened by certainty of faith; God allows not any of our doings. And therefore I say his intent was to keep the people of old time in obedience. And that was the cause why he willed that there should be light continually in the Temple. It was not to give light unto God, or to do him any service, but to do the rude people to understand, that we must not do things disorderly, and be as blind folks when we approach unto God: but that we must have light to guide us by, which light is not to be found in our own brains, but must come from above. And for that cause the Holy candlestick had Lamps upon it, wherein was oil continually. Whereby was meant, that if men be not guided and governed by the holy Ghost, they do nothing but wander up and down and in the end they shall fall into destruction. Again, God willed that no strange fire should be brought unto his Altar. Whereby is meant that men must not bring aught of their own to the serving of God: we must have the holy fire, that is to say we must pray to God in the Church, and not go beyond his world, or beyond the doctrine that he gives us. Moreover it is said that no sacrifices should be offered without salt. And why so? For when we offer things to God without warrant that he allows them and requires them, they have no favor at all before him. Thus you see in effect how it was God's intent to comfort his servants, and to encourage them that they might serve him as became them. And again, it was his will to cut off all occasion of adding anything which they had learnt of the heathen. We know that although men have no encounters before their eyes, yet they cease not to forge many fond things, weaning to please god by the means. But when we see examples on either side of us, it is a further provocation to us. Besides the ticklishness which we have already of nature, it pricks us forward to say, why should not such a thing be good? For the Jews had seen the fashions of Egypt and of other heathen folk: and therefore they might have been provoked to fashion themselves like unto them: and that had been a corruption to overthrow the whole service of god. To prevent this mischief, God gave them a remedy, which held them occupied in such sort, as they had enough to do in the things that were enjoyed them, and had no leisure to withdraw themselves or to add any devise of their own. And so we see it was not for naught that God gave his people so many laws, rules, and ceremonies at their going into the land of Cannan. For first of all, it was meet that the figures and shadows should supply the room of the truth that was yet unrevealed, until Jesus Christ was showed openly to the world. Secondly it was God's will to try the obedience of this people by that means. And thirdly it took away all occasion of intermeddling themselves with the superstitions of the heathen and unbelievers.

And for the cause does Moses say, Thou shall go over Jordan, and God will give your rest in the land that he has promised you, and there shall you dwell in safety, though you have enemies round about you. And then will he choose him a place in one of your tribes, and thither shall you bring your sacrifices, burnt offerings, and oblations. And the very true sacrifice (says he) is to do nothing upon your own heads, but to obey your God thoroughly in all points. When he says that they shall come into the land, it is to show that God's deferring to give his law till that time, was to declare more particularly what things he liked of.

For it was his will to perform his promise made unto Abraham, before he would establish his own service. And thereby he gave them to understand that the land of Canaan ought to have led them to a further thing. For had there been no further matter in it than the land itself; it had been enough for them to have been settled in it, and there to have had where to find them abundantly. But God sets up his service, and shows them after what sort they should honor him thenceforth, and all is referred to our Lord Jesus Christ. We see then that the land of Canaan should have guided the Jews to the hope of the heavenly life; so as they should not have set their minds upon the enjoying and possessing of the profits that came thereof, but have proceeded on further and considered that God's meaning was to reign among them after a spiritual manner. That was the cause why he lifted not to give them the ceremonies at the first, after the manner that they be set down in Leviticus: but reserved the setting of them forth, until the people were come into their inheritance.

And he says expressly that the Jews should dwell in quiet and safety, notwithstanding that they were beset round about with enemies. Hereby we be done to understand, that it was not enough for them to have conquered the country, but that it behooved God to maintain them still under his protection. And as the Israelites were warned of it then: so does the same belong to us at this day. For God tells us that if he has once called us, it is all once as if he had made us to pass the red sea. True it is that he could call us without making of us to change our place. But let us consider from whence God takes us, and whither he draws us. He takes us out of the bottom of hell. For so long as we be in our own nature, we have none access to the kingdom of heaven, nor any acquaintance with him, but are utterly banished from the hope of life. And when he has drawn us out of such confusion, he pulls us up to himself, to the end we might cleave unto him: and although we dwell as yet on the earth; yet notwithstanding we cease not to be heirs of the heavenly inheritance. This is a far greater thing than to pass the red sea. For we have an enemy that is greater and much stronger than was Pharaoh and all his people. For what can we do when we have all the devils against us, laboring to hinder our salvation, and being so subtle and having all the means that can be do it withal? They be called the princes of the air, and they reign over our heads, so as they might easily overthrow us if God delivered us not from them. Therefore it is a great power which God utters when it pleases him to gather us unto himself. And yet is that to no purpose, except we be preserved still under his hand and tuition. For as long as we be in this world, we shall be environed continually round about with enemies. The devil cases not to trouble us; he has wiles and flights enough to do it withal and we on our side are unarmed and unprovided and therefore it stands us greatly upon, to have God to be our defender. Nay, the devil needs not to seek far: for we carry such a number of vices with us of our own, as we might be overcome a hundred times without any great ado or noise. Let us mark well then, that like as God promised to maintain the Jews in the inheritance that he had given them: so it stands us in hand at this day to be maintained by his hand in the faith, that we may persevere in his service: or else our salvation will go to wreck every minute of an hour, so as there will be no stay nor continuance.

Now afterward Moses adds: God will have you thenceforth to serve him in the place which he shall have chosen to put his name in. Which is as much to say, as that we must not make this our rest; to invent this or that; but we must hold ourselves in quiet, and abide under the government of our God. When we be at rest, then is our mind much troubled with unquietnes, which is clean contrary to God's meaning. For if he give us respite, so as we be not troubled with fear and terror, to what end is it? Is it not to the end that we should be so mild as to say, go to my God, if I were vexed or disquieted in mind, I had some cause to be carried here and there and to do something or other. I should be seeking of sundry remedies. But now that thou vouchsafest to maintain me in quiet rest, it is good reason that I should be still, and suffer myself to be ruled by thy word, and to be bowed which way thou liftest, without giving head to my lusts, for that were a wicked unthankfulnesse. That is the thing which Moses meant by that text. And the same matter concerns us also. For whensoever God vouchsafes to give us rest from our enemies, we ought to be so much the quieter in ourselves. As for example. If we were among the Papists, we might be in such fear, as we should be driven to seek new shifts every day, as the poor souls are which be among them, who may well say, Alas, I have no liberty to serve God. How may I behave myself in such sort as I may not defile myself with the superstitions of these Idolaters? Thus you see how these poor catifes are faine to seek all the ways to the wood to find some shift to swim between two streams. And no marvel though they be in that taking. Indeed it is no sufficient excuse; for howsoever the world go with us, we must be fully resolved in ourselves to serve God nevertheless. But yet are we the less to be born withal, when we abuse the time of quietness that God gives us. If we be at liberty, then must nothing withhold us from having our religion pure and clean. For he offers himself to us daily in his word. And therefore let us refrain ourselves from wandering after our own imaginations, and let us bridle ourselves in that behalf. Seeing that God has given us rest: let us follow all that he shows, without attempting anything at all to the contrary. But we see the contrary com to pass. For commonly it falls out that when men be in rest, so as no man troubles them nor disquiets them; then fall they to be lusty or sporting like a horse that is broken lose and has neither bridle nor saddle. And the experience hereof is too common, in so much that those to whom God has granted such favor as to have his truth in most safety, do think it better to behave themselves after another sort, and to change their state and what a kind of dealing is that? It is a devilish rage that we be carried away withal, when we cannot be quiet in ourselves at such time as god has given us outward rest, and holds our enemies locked up, so as although they be round about us, yet he suffers them not to make any change to disquiet us with all, and yet we ourselves cannot abide to fit in quiet. Wherefore let us mark well, that seeing God is so gracious to us as to grant us liberty to serve him purely: it is our duty to hold ourselves quietly under his obedience, without attempting anything at all. But the Papists have well showed in this case, that they cannot find in their hearts in any wise to submit themselves unto God, and that their intent is not to yield him any obedience. For first of all they looked not what God meant by the old figures of the Law, and yet they followed the things Moses commanded concerning lights, perfumes, and apparel. And why was that? Because they considered not that all those things were referred to our Lord Jesus Christ. They were much more brutish than very Jews that had no faith at all. For the Jews at leastwise held themselves to the rule that was given to them. Indeed they knew not the right use of their Ceremonies: but yet had they an express commandment from God, and durst not attempt anything against the same. But as for the Papists, notwithstanding that Jesus Christ be manifested, and have accomplished all the things that were betokened in old time: yet have they utterly overthrown that good and substantial foundation, and thrust his death and passion under foot. They fall to taking up of lights. And what needs that? The holy ghost has showed himself visibly in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, and afterward upon the Apostles, to do us to understand that we must no more look for any outward figures, because we have the truth and substance of them. But what? The papists have abolished the infinite grace of God, and utterly made a mock of it. They will needs offer sacrifice, and have attired their priests thereafter, disguising them as though it were to the playing of an interlude And all this geere is but gugawes, for they be not commanded of God, and besides that, they be done as it were in despite of him. All that was done in the law was of God setting up: and these men fall to setting up of new fashions such as God never spoke of. Again, they place a mortal man in the room of our Lord Jesus Christ; as who should say that the office of our Lord Jesus Christ were not well enough known and apparent, unless it were figured out with new and strange toys. It is all one as if a body should show forth the picture of a man when the party himself is present, and should say, behold this picture, and yet the man is there himself who can much better show himself what he is than the picture can do. Even so do the Papists in setting forth of the picture of Jesus Christ. He is named the lively image of God. Although the father be incomprehensible in his own majesty: yet has he so uttered himself in the person of his son, as we may behold him there face to face, as says saint Paul in the second to the Corinthians. But the Papists draw a Curtain before it, and tell us that we must be contented with pictures. It is therefore a turning of all things upside down, and a bringing in of devilish confusion. Nevertheless, we see that in the Popedome there is no harkening what God says; but all is done at the appointment of man. Look whatsoever they do, they term it by the name of God's service. Yea, but how is God duly served? God says, you shall not do whatsoever seems good to yourselves: seeing that I have set you down a certain order, be contented to be governed by my word. But what say the Papists? Me thinks this is good. This we take to be excellent: every man casts to his collup, and in all God's word a man shall not find one syllable of all the things which they term God's service, and which they will needs have to pass in their account. For let a man search all the things through which are comprised under that name in the popedom, and he shall find them everyone to be forged and built by men, and that God not only disclaims them, but also condemns them, because he has showed us his certain and infallible truth, which is the thing that we must frame ourselves unto. We see then how all this doctrine has been wickedly thrown down in the Popedome: and that is because they have perverted the true use of the figures of the Law, and taken in ordinate liberty to do whatsoever came in their heads, without having any regard to the witnessing that God gives us, whereby they might have said, These be the things which we ought to do. Now so much the more diligent ought we to be in marking this place: For were we still in doubt nowadays what to do, so as we knew not what things God allows: then might we have some fancy to make us to sway to and fro. But seeing that God has told us what he requires at our hands: that ought to be enough for us. And now has he abolished, the Ceremonies of the law that were of his own appointing? Yea. And wherefore? To show us thereby that he will not have us any more entangled in the outward figures. The reason is added; because we have them thoroughly fulfilled in Jesus Christ. Now then, if we will not deface the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, and overthrow the benefits that he brings us; we must put away the old figures. Mark that for one point.

Again, we see that God is contented with few ceremonies. For it is not his will that we should have any more deckings, lights, perfumes, Cakes, sacrificing of beasts, nor other such things: but his will is that in our baptism we should have such an assurance of our washing and cleaning by the grace that is purchased for us in our Lord Jesus Christ, as should continue with us forever. Have we that? We must hold ourselves contented with it. For God could have added more, if he had lifted: but he lifted not so to do. And so you see here is a bridle which must reign us back to gather us home to GOD, or else he shall never be able to wield us. Now what have the Papists done? Tush, this simplicity of baptism pleased not them, they would needs add this and that to it at their own pleasure. What say they? Should there be but sheer water? What a thing were that? Yea, but god has so ordained it, Jesus Christ has so appointed it. It is said that last of all God has spoken to us by his mouth, and that we must stand to whatsoever he says. Now he has ordained it in water alone. Yea, but we must have a taper (Say the papists) to represent the holy Ghost: we must have salt, to represent the heavenly wisdom, and the grace of God: we must have divers other things, and we must have spittle to make infants and dum folks to speak, and we must have a number of other gugawes to mock God withal, which are so gross, and fond, as they can serve for nothing but to make Christianity a laughingstock to the Jews and Turks: and the devil plays his part with them, when the world is sorted after such a sort. We see then that the Papists have broken and transgressed God's order, by adding after that manner to the things which he had set down certain, and in such measure as he would not have men to go beyond them.

But there has been yet a far more outrageous disorder in the Lords Supper. For therein our Lord Jesus Christ meant to show us, that his will is that we should settle our whole trust in him, because we be fed with his substance, and therefore we must not seek life anywhere else than in him: we must not eat there and drink somewhere else; for we have there full suffisance for the sustenance of our souls, we have the full perfection of all goodness in him. That is the thing which he shows us by his holy supper, and his will is that we should receive the bread and wine in witness thereof, and that it should be distributed among us, to the end we should be knit together in him, to become members of his body. But on the contrary part, they have set up the abominable mass, and will needs sacrifice Jesus Christ. And whereof comes that? Even of that they understand not that they usurp the office which is allotted to him in the holy scripture, according whereunto he has offered up himself once for all, and behold, men will needs take upon them to counterfeit him, for by their own saying, it is all one sacrifice. Yet for all that, they be but Apes to Jesus Christ. For it becomes them not to take upon them the office that is not allotted unto them. Again they will needs make a mingle mangle of all things: for they not only disguise and falsify all things that were ordained by our Lord Jesus Christ, but by all likelihood are fully bend to fight furiously against his institution. Jesus Christ ordained that the bread and wine should be divided among the faithful. But it is enough with them that one do take it all, and eat it up alone. Yea and when the people come of purpose to communicate with them, (which is but once a year) they be fain to content themselves with the one part of it, and the other part is reserved. Besides this, there is no opening of Gods word, their saying is that they go to receive their God, and they make a charm and forcerie of their consecrating of the bread and wine. Thus you see how proudly they be turned away from Christ's ordinance, so as they could not devise how to fight against him with more violence. Now sith we see these things, we ought to acknowledge God's grace in drawing us out of such confusion. And therewithal let us mark that God's standing so much upon that point that his people should not do what they liked themselves, is not without cause. For why? We see what men are when they once go astray. When they once take that liberty, they disguise the truth, and there is no end of their leasings. Therefore let us beware that we hold ourselves short, especially when God has given us rest from our enemies, and we dwell in a place where we may worship him purely, let us keep the simplicity that he commands, and allows by his word, without any swerving aside from the same how little so ever it be. For we had need to keep ourselves far off from all corruptions, if we be determined to obey our God. And why so? For man's heart is a dreadful gulf. And again, every man draws his neighbor into error after him. Therefore it is like an endless maze whereof is no way out again, unless the thing be observed that is spoken here: namely that men do not what every man thinks good in his own eyes.

And let us note also, that by this saying, all our intents (as men term them) are condemned, though they seem never so good to ourselves. For we be no competent Judges; God must tell us what is good: and if we on our side find any apparent reason, it is altogether but smoke. So then for as much as God in this place sets his own word, and the testimony of his will, directly against all our devotions, and all that ever seems good to us: let us assure ourselves that it is not lawful for us to follow whatsoever we think good. For all that is nothing worth: but all the service that we do unto god, must be grounded upon his word and his infallible truth. Without that, we do but build dreaming.

Now Moses adds the same things again which he had spoken concerning Sacrifices, Burnt offerings, freewill offerings, vows and tenths; namely, that all those things must be done and paid in the place that God had chosen out of one of their tribes. This thing was not so soon performed as I have showed heretofore. And the reason is, for that god intended to prove his peoples patience, and also for that the people were not worthy that God should establish the order at the first, in such sort as he had promised it. And that is a thing well worthy to be marked. For we see that gods gracious gifts are oftentimes long in coming. And yet God says you shall no sooner have spoken, but I will be ready to succor you, yea and my hand shall be stretched out to help you before your words be out of your mouths. So does God promise: and yet notwithstanding he suffers us to linger. And why? Because we have hindered the course of his grace by our unbelief; and we be so rechles, that he makes no hast to come unto us, because we for our part come not to him but with great hardness, and as it were limping. Yet notwithstanding he does always surmount all our vices with his infinite goodness, as it came to pass in that which Moses speaks here. God had promised to choose a place for his Sanctuary to rest in forever. Now, that thing was to have been done as soon as the Israelites were entered into the land of Canaan; and yet it was delayed a long time: insomuch as there passed a hundred years or twain, yea three or four hundred before the promise took effect. And that was because the people were not worthy to be so satisfied, as God had declared, and therefore were fain to abide the punishment of there sin. For they drove not out their enemies as he had commanded them, but became negligent: and besides that, they themselves turned away and fell into all manner of vices and corruptions. That therefore was the cause why God withdrew his hand, and performed not his promise till the time of David. Nevertheless, although the people were malicious, although they were unthankful towards God, although they provoked his wrath so many ways to the uttermost: yet could they not utterly disappoint the promise altogether. The reason was, for that it depended not upon that deserts of men. Therefore although men be unworthy of it; yet does God in the end perform whatsoever he says. Yet notwithstanding there is a delay made for a time, to the intent that folk should learn to know their own naughtiness, and dislike of it, and be sorry for it. Wherefore let us learn hereby, that if God at any time do show himself unwilling to put us in possession of his benefits out of hand: it is because that we have procured the delay of them by our own naughtiness. But yet shall we not be utterly be bereft of them, so we acknowledge our sins and be sorry for them: but in the end he will reach out his hand again to put us in possession of the benefits whereof we had deserved to be utterly dispossessed. Truly this will not boot the hypocrites at all: but as for gods church, although it live in suspense for a time; yet will our Lord show in the end, that his goodness surmounts all the sins of men, and that he will not fail to be faithful, though all of us be liars. Sothly (as I said afore) we must not under this color flatter ourselves. For if we be stubborn in evil, our Lord will well enough find the means to discharge himself of the promise whereof we shall have been disappointed. But let us learn to acknowledge our sins; and when we have acknowledged him, let us learn also to rest upon the goodness of our god, not doubting but that it is so great and infinite, that notwithstanding all the lets which we on our side shall cast in the way of it, yet it will so get the upper hand, that in the end we shall find the welfare from the which we had shut ourselves out of doors. That is the thing which we have to remember upon this text of Moses where he says that god would appoint a place, even such a one as he had chosen out from among all the tribes of Israel, where he would have his name to be called upon. The residue which cannot be declared as now, shall be pursued hereafter.

Now let us fall down in the presence of our good god with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us perceive them better than we have done heretofore, so as we may dislike them more and more, and thereby be brought back unto him: and that sith we for our parts bring nothing to him but utter corruptions; it may please him to grant us the grace so to reform us by his word, as the sacrifices which we shall offer unto him may be made holy by faith, and he accept them for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake. And for as much as we know that he requires spiritual sacrifices: let us call upon him with such boldness as we may be hard at his hand, and yield him praise for all his benefits bestowed upon us, and moreover endeavor to discharge ourselves of our duties every man towards his neighbor, because those be the sacrifices which he receives and allows. That it may please him to grant his grace not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

On Tuesday the 8th of October 1555
The 83rd Sermon, which is the fourth upon the twelfth chapter

12.13.14. And ye shall be merry, &c.

15 Nevertheless, look whatsoever thou hast a mind unto, that maist thou kill and eat within any of thy gates, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God, which he has given thee; as of the fallow deer of the Red deer: both he that is clean and he that is unclean may eat thereof.

16 Only f the blood shall you not eat, but you shall pore it upon the ground as water.

17 Thou maist not eat the tithes of thy Corn, of thy wine, or of thine oil, within any of thy gates, nor yet the first engendered of thy kin, or of thy sheep, nor any of the vows which thou shall have vowed, nor the free will offerings or the lifting up of thy hands.

18 But though shall eat those things in he presence of the Lord thy God, in the place which the Lord thy God will choose to himself. There shall thou eat them, both thyself, thy son, thy daughter, thy manservant, thy woman servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates. And thou shall be merry before the Lord thy God in all things whereunto thou put thy hand.

Moses going forward still with his matter, commands the Jews here to be merry in the presence of the Lord. Now although this lesson have been laid forth already, yet is it requisite for us to be put in mind of it again. For the treating of it here new again, is not for naught, neither has the holy Ghost set down anything more than needs, as I have said heretofore. Men cannot keep measure in their mirth without some disorder always. And the cause thereof is that they have not an eye unto God in their making marry. Nay rather (which worse is) they think it is no mirth at all unless they turn their backs upon him. Whereas we should seek all our welfare in GOD to have our rest there: we bear ourselves in hand that we be best at ease when we be furthest from him. For this cause God ordained the said Ceremony of solemn fasting when the folk offered sacrifice unto him, as it were of purpose to put them in remembrance, that God was there present, and showed himself unto them. Not that the doing thereof once a year was a sufficient discharge to them; but that every man ought to make lesson and a general rule of it, that whensoever they did eat or drink, they should refer it wholly unto God, accordingly as Saint Paul warns us to do. And thereby we see that the truth thereof abides unto us, though the Ceremony thereof be done away. Wherefore let us learn, that in playing and sporting after the fashion of the children of this world, we shake off God and bereave him his honor. And surely it is an inexcusable unthankfulness, when we acknowledge not the author of all welfare. If we refer all our mirth unto God, it will be always moderate. Besides that it shall ever have a good end, God will so hold us in awe by his Majesty, as we shall not pass our bounds as we see the wretched and blind unbelievers do, who have no more stay of themselves in their making merry, than wild beasts have. Now then, if our eyes be so set upon God, we shall be sober and modest enough. Mark that for one point.

But besides this, it is the meaning of Moses also, that fathers should teach their children, and masters their servants, to do like. For it is not enough for a faithful man, that he himself serve God: but he must also govern his household, assuring himself that it is committed to him to the same end, and that he is to yield account of it. And indeed, what reason is it that a man should have superiority over his neighbors that are creatures fashioned after the image of God as well as he, and that in the meanwhile God should be bereft of his right, and not be used as chief sovereign of all? What a presumption were that? Were it not an utter perverting of the order of nature? Then let us mark well, that here we be warned to rule our houses in such wise, as GOD may be served both of great and small. Let him to whom God has given children, beware that he bring them up in the right religion, and let him do the like to his men and his maids, so as God may be the common father and master of them all. That was the thing whereof Moses indented to warn the Jews, and in their persons it behooves us also to be taught at this day to do our duties, in that behalf. And therewithal we be exhorted to gentleness also. For although the master of a house have preeminence and authority over his household; yet notwithstanding his enjoying thereof, must not be to himself alone: but he must impart it to all his whole household: for else it is a separating of himself from the state of mankind. And a barring of the common society which God has set among men. Therefore there are here two points to be noted. The one is that whosoever has charge of children and servants, must do this endeavor to lead them to god. And the other is, that all such as are set over others and have inferior persons under them in what state of subjection so ever it be, ought to be kindhearted towards them, and not to reign over hem with tyranny and cruelty, but to rule them with all gentleness, so as they make them partakers of the benefits and gracious gifts which they have received at God's hand.

That which Moses adds concerning the Levites, serves for a further confirmation of that which he had spoken of their rejoicing or making merry in the presence of God. For (as I have declared already) God had appointed the towns of the Levites to be dispersed among the tribes, to the intent there should be good doctrine taught throughout the whole country. We know what the state of the tribe was, namely how it is said in the second of the Prophet Malachi, that the lips of the priest ought to teach knowledge, and that men should seek for good doctrine at his mouth, and that the Priests were as the messengers of the living God. God then had chosen the tribe of Levi to be continually among his people, to hold them in the true and pure religion. For had they been placed altogether in some corner by themselves, after the same manner that the rest of the tribes were in their portions; all the people besides had been without teaching. But inasmuch as there was no tribe where the Levites had not some town allotted to them; by that means the seed of God's word was spread abroad, so as the persons whom God had ordained to govern his Church and to have the charge of men's souls; were so dispersed that the land was furnished with them throughout. And now it is said that the Israelites shall make merry with the Levites that were mingled among them. And why? For they might hold the people in some awe. Though there had been some untruly persons, yet if they had seen the Levites, who bare their marks, and were specially chosen to the spiritual government of the Church; it would have been a bridle to restrain them withal. Thus the Lord seeing the frailty of his people, gave them this help to hold them in order and modesty. As if he should say, True it is that I have chosen you for mine inheritance and you be the people whom I have dedicated to myself: but yet is there a special holiness in the Levites, because they preach into the Tabernacle, and are appointed to teach you the law, and to keep you from running into superstition, and from starting aside to strange gods. Seeing then that I have committed this charge to my Levites: let them be in your company, that by your beholding of them you may be the more provoked to fear me, and to be merry after a holy manner, without defiling of yourselves with the lusts of the world as you see the unbelievers do, who rush out into all disorder: that seeing I have appointed my Levites to be as messengers from me, and that my law is in their mouth, and their office is to bear abroad my doctrine: you may not be so given to disorder, but rather consider that I dwell among you, so as the very sight of my servants may do you to understand, that I am near at hand, and that you ought not to separate yourselves from me. And hereby we be put in mind to behave ourselves soberly and modestly, and that we have need to be exhorted daily thereunto by the word of God, for fear of starting out into unthirstiness, for we see what feebleness is in us. True it is that when we be once entered into a wicked trade, we shall soon be hardened in it: but to be constant in doing good, we shall have much ado. Therefore although we have some good disposition and desire to serve God: yet must he be fain to quicken us up still from day to day. Wherefore let us seek the mean; which is to resort to the doctrine that should be our guide, and to yield willing care to the warning that are given to draw us unto God, and to confirm us in his fear and obedience. Yea and when we have been at a sermon, and have heard that word that is preached to us in his name: let it serve to keep us in awe, and although we be tempted to unthriftiness, yet let it be as a bridle to rein us back unto God. Thus you see how we ought to use the means and remedies that God has appointed unto us to redress the frailty that is in us. For otherwise we would start away by and by, and wonder that we should be so utterly strayed away from our God. That is the thing in effect which we have to remember upon the first sentence that is set down here.

Now he adds afterward, as we have seen already heretofore, that the people should not sacrifice in all places, but only in the place that God should choose among their tribes. And that is to hold the people in obedience, that they should not attempt to serve God after their own fancy and imagination. Indeed a man might say at the first blush, that there needed no rehearsing of the thing that was easy enough of itself. But the case concerns not the only understanding of it, there is another reason why god sets down this saying so often: which is that men cannot refrain from swerving one way or other, but that although they be fully minded for a time to serve God, yet do they start aside in the turning of a hand, because they be unconstant and light minded. Not without cause therefore does God rehearse here the same thing that we have seen here before, namely that the people should not offer sacrifice in all p laces. And why? For things in those days were very dark, and it was needful for the people to be restrained, to know that there was but one God. The heathen had everyone their religion by himself, and there was certainty at all among them. But it behooved the people of Israel to be fully resolved in this wise. The God whom we worship is the maker of heaven and earth: and because we be not able to get up unto him, he has showed himself unto our fathers, so as we cannot do amiss, if we worship him according to his Law. It behooved the people of Israel to be at that point. For had thy had divers altars, and that every man might have followed his own devotion: what a thing had it been? There would have been store of inventions: they would have brought in diversity of religions, every man would have devised what he had lifted, and he God of Abraham should no more have been worshipped after his own manner. For this cause is it said, you shall have but one Altar and one Sanctuary, and God reserves to himself the choosing ad appointing out of the place wherein he will be worshipped and served. We see then that here all liberty is taken from men, so as they may not take anything at all upon them in the serving of God. Mark that for one point.

Again, it is showed us here moreover, that forasmuch as we be subject to this corruption of forging fond opinions out of number: God meant to hold his people in the true unity of faith, and his choosing of one Sanctuary was as a band of concord, to the intent that men should not run gadding every one after his own fancy. To be short, without agreement in the one faith, we cannot serve God or do anything to his liking. And hereby we see that men do themselves no good at all by their foolish devotions, but rather provoke God's vengeance the more, by their straining of themselves to do the things that they have devised of their own brain. For the very ground of religion is to know whom we ought to serve, as our Lord Jesus tells us in the fourth of John, saying: We know what we worship. Now he speaks there of the Jews, because they had the law, and therein the full certainty how God was to be served. But it is said by the Prophets, that at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ there should be three Altars, one in Egypt, another in Assyria, and the third in Jewrie. Whereby is meant that God shall be served everywhere. For the material Altars were beaten down. As for the things that are termed Altars in the Popedome, they be devlish abominations: for their setting of them up is to sacrifice Christ on them. But he has offered himself once for all, according to the office that was given him by God his father. And therefore it were high treason and blasphemy against God to have altars nowadays among Christians. For Jesus Christ is our only spiritual Altar: and when we be knit unto him; then is God duly worshipped and as he himself requires. Wherefore let us learn that although the ceremony be disannulled; let the meaning of it may greatly profit us: which is, that we must serve God, not by turning aside every man after his own conceits, but by linking ourselves together in the bond of faith and by agreeing rightly together. And whereupon shall this concord be grounded? Upon God's word and upon our Lord Jesus Christ, who is his very wisdom. For if we resort to him, we shall have a certain mark to shoot at and such a one as cannot deceive us. But as soon as we swerve aside from him, be it never so little; by and by we vanish away in our own foolish thoughts. Thus you see in effect what we be taught as concerning this place.

told you before, so as the Israelites had not leave to spy it out themselves and to say, this is the fittest place: but God bare all the stroke alone. Hereby we be done to understand that it is not for us to set us a service of God after our own liking, but that we must hearken unto him, and so receive his word as nothing be added thereunto, as shall be declared yet better in the end of this chapter. And verily when as he says that he will choose it in one of their Tribes: thereby he does us to understand that we must not envy our brethren, though one of them be more honored than another. Let it content us that god accepts our service and although some of us be lesser and some greater and excellent than others: yet must not that breed any heartburning among us, nor occasion us to be grieved at God's granting of more favor unto others than to us: but every of us must do his duty in his own degree, and seek no further but to be received at God's hand all together, both they that go before, and they that come after.

Furthermore let us mark well, that whereas God says he will choose that place to put his name in: it is not meant that his being was shut up in the Sanctuary. But only that folk should there have a record of his presence. And that was to the intent that the Jews should not busy their heads about gross imaginations, as we see men commonly inclined to do. When God stops to impart himself familiarly unto us, we take occasion to make him some image; if we could we would tie him to some stone or to some pillar, or coop him up in some corner: and we think we have him not with us, except we have some visible sign of him. And this was the cause why men made puppets and idols to represent God by. For this cause he tells them expressly that he himself will choose the place wherein he will be worshiped and served, howbeit not that his being shall be shut up there, but only that his name shall be there. And moreover the Jews were to be put in mid, to look up to the heavenly pattern that Moses saw on the Mount, as oft as they looked upon the ark of covenant and the other signs that god had given them, and thereby to be led to the spiritual service which was figured by those things, whereof Jesus Christ was the very substance. True it is that even at this day still God comes down or stops unto our rudeness; insomuch that it is his will we should have temples or Churches to assemble in, and thither we come together to make our common prayers there. Again, Baptism is ministered there, for Jesus Christ also is there among us and rules over us, and in his supper we have an assurance that we be knit unto him, and grassed into his body, so as we have but one life common to us all. Yet must we not be held down by the signs and tokens that God gives us for our help; but we must rather be conveyed up by them, and not be wrapped in superstitions, to worship god after a fleshly manner. We must consider that he fills all things. Yea even abiding in his heavenly glory, and there must we seek him by faith. When we think upon him, we must not draw him down hither to have him after a fleshly manner, but we must mount up by faith into heaven where he dwells, as the scripture speaks of him. That therefore is the thing which we have to remember upon this place besides the things that have been declared already. For I do but put you in remembrance of the things that have been discoursed more at large heretofore.

Now afterward here is leave given by God to his people, to eat flesh throughout all the land of Chanaan, so it be not of any Sacrifices, tithes, burnt offerings, Heave offerings, or first fruits. It shall be lawful then for you to eat of all common flesh everywhere; but as for that which shall have been sacrificed unto me, let it not be eaten of in any other place, than in the same which I shall have chosen to set my Sanctuary in. Howbeit, he adds one word more here, saying: according to the blessing which thy God shall give thee. Here we see first of all, that it were not lawful for us to eat one bit of bread, unless we were sure in our minds that God gives it us and that we have leave of him to eat it. And that is the cause why Saint Paul requires faith where he speaks of eating and drinking; saying that whatsoever is not of faith, is sin. And whereof treats he there? Even of the eating of flesh or of herbs, of bread or of fish, and of all manner of food: and he says that it must be done with faith. As how? Some will say that faith is too precious a thing to be mingled with corruptible meats. Yea, but we must be sure in all our life, that we attempt not anything which may displease God, or that is not lawful for us to do by his leave or warrant given unto us. Therefore in the foresaid text, by the word Faith, Saint Paul means the record that we have in our eating and drinking, that God shows himself a father to us, by giving us food to nourish our bodies withal: and that our using of the benefits which the earth yields, is not by stealth as though we would rob him of them; but as it were by receiving them at his hand. When a father gives his children every one his pittance, saying, hold here, and eat it: it is no more than God does daily unto us, when we be certified by his word, that he has given power to the earth to bring forth corn and wine for our use, and delivered us the beasts and all other things to eat of. We must assure ourselves that the growing and increasing of victuals in the world comes not by haphazard, but of Gods ordinance, who has appointed them to feed us through his goodness. I told you this doctrine is very needful. For what a thing were it, if we could not eat a morsel of bread without offending God? And yet S. Paul vows it to be so. And why? For if in my eating and drinking at all times and in all places, I know not that I am beholden to God for the good things that he has ordained for me: it is all one as if I stole it from him: I do but file it from him like a dog or a cat, which takes that which was not

Again, it is as it were a burying of God, when men know not that it is he which gives them the food for their sustenance. If we be not fully persuaded of that; then is God disappointed of the honor that belongs to him, so as we acknowledge him not for our father and fosterer, but become so brutish that we mind no more the life which is prepared for us in the kingdom of heaven. But this taking of such fatherly care of us in this world, is to lead us up higher thereby. And so we see that unless we be sure that God gives us leave to eat and drink according to his blessing; we be but as brute beasts, and much worse than they. Again, on the other side, who gives us authority to devour God's benefits? Shall we wretched creatures which offend God without ceasing, presume to do it of our own heads, without considering that we have those things of his free goodness, and that they belong not to us otherwise than of Gods good will, who vouchsafes to show himself liberal towards us? Surely then do we rauin all things to us without any right or title. Therefore are we blame worthy every way for our eating and drinking, till we know that GOD is the giver of all. And hereby we be done to understand further, that in our eating and drinking we must not observe the traditions of men, but content ourselves with the testimony of Gods good will. And thereunto also does the holy scripture refer us by condemning the fond toys that men devise of themselves, as when they say, it is not Lawful to eat flesh upon such a day, this must be done and that must be done. And what authority have men to bid and forbid such things? For the pope and all his rabble are not able to make a silly fly: and shall they forbid us to eat beef, mutton, or any other of the things that were made for our sustenance? What else is their usurping of such authority, than a robbing of GOD of his sovereignty over us? Now then let us have an eye to the will of our GOD. And sith we know that he has given us all meats without exception: let every of us use them soberly, and be contented to be ruled by his word: for to him only does it belong to lay Laws upon us, and it is not for any mortal man to presume so far. If any man take that upon him which is not due to him, let us despise him, yea and abhor him, as one that goes about to overthrow the authority of God. And so you see what we have to mark in God's suffering and giving leave unto his people, to eat flesh in all places, so it were not sacrificed. As if he should say: In your eating and drinking consider well what is lawful for you. And how may you discern that? By my word. Give yourselves once over unto me; and you shall no more be afraid of anything. If men lay new laws upon you; make no account of it: for it is enough for you, that you have leave at my hand.

And now Moses adds expressly, according to the blessing which thy God shall have give thee whereby he does us to understand, that every man must have an eye to his own ability, and thereby rule his desires. For if the rich man having whereof to live, do far according to his ability, and the poor man will needs far as well as he: must need smart for it. And God likes not of it when he that has not wherewith will needs far as daintily as he that is rich. Indeed we must always bear this lesson of Saint Paul in mind and put it in practice, namely that he which has abundance glut not himself till he burst, nor give himself to his pleasures, according to his saying in the xiii. To the Romanes, that we must not have a care of our flesh to cocker it too much: For our flesh desires not the best things, and our appetites are inordinate: and therefore the following of them were but a confused disorder. Although the richer sort have great store of all things, yet must they not pamper themselves out of measure, so as they should at any time fall into disorder, and not endeavor to bestow of their abundance upon such as are in need and poverty. For Gods meaning is to try the charity of such as have wherewith, by giving them more than they themselves have need of, to the intent they should not be niggardly of the things which they have, but be helpful to their poor brethren and to such as want.; Never the latter, a rich man may far according to the blessing that God shall have given him, and the poor man must content himself with brown bread if he have none other, and not strain himself to eat white bread as well as the rich man, but bear his poverty patiently, and pray to God to nourish him as it were with Manna from heaven: And although he have nothing else but dry bread to feed on, the same must serve his turn instead of all other vittles. That is the thing in effect, which Moses meant to show us here. And it is a very good and profitable lesson: for thereby we be done to understand that if God give us abundance, it is a continual putting of us in remembrance that he dwells among us, that we be not as these drunkards which in a year when there is store of wine, do despise God and play the very brute beasts, so that if they may not drink wine till they spew it out again, and power it in as it were which tunnels, they have never enough. Let us beware of such beastliness: and let us bear in mind that we be in Gods presence. And surely if we bear hm that reverence, we will be ashamed to cram ourselves like dogs or swine, and to deface his image in us by unmeasureable eating and drinking till we burst again. Lo what we have to bear in mind. Likewise on the other side, if the year be barren, so as there be small store of wine, and corn is deer: This text teaches us to thank God for it and to cut out morsels the smaller, and to bridle ourselves. For why? It is said that our eating must be after as our God has blessed us, so as we must have an eye to the ability that God has given us: and accordingly as we behave wherewith, so must every of us learn to rule himself, and not play the unthrifths that are lead away by their lusts, which put all into the platter (as I say) to satisfy their bellies withal. Some are so delicate of their diet, that rather than they will forbear when God sends them scarcity, they will fell their cotes, yea and their dishes and platters too. Such folk might consider, that it were good for them to keep somewhat in store, for afterward, to the intent that if they fell into sickness or any other necessity, they might have wherewith to relieve them. Had they any honesty or any stay of themselves, to think that it is Gods will to deal sparely with them at that time: Had they any consideration at all I say: they might say, Lord thou has all good things in thine hand, and that so plentifully, as thou could well give us more: but thou intent to try our patience. Vouchsafe therefore to bless the little that thou has given us, so as it may suffice us. Let it be as the Manna to us, that we may perceive thy favor towards us, even thereby though there were none other thing. But what? All our mind is upon the filling of our bellies; yea even without regarding how far God gives us leave to go. So much he more therefore ought all men both rich and poor, to mark well this ext. Let the man of wealth say in himself, it is the blessing of my God: and sith it is so, I must yield him account of it, and I must look very well about me how I may use these things aright according to his ordinance: so as I give not my flesh whatsoever it likes or lusts for, but that I behave myself soberly howsoever the world go, and also impart my overplus to such as have want or need, and relieve them with mine abundance. Le the rich deal after that manner. Again on the other side, let the poor bethink them thus: well, God gives us not wherewith to find ourselves, and therefore it behooves us to bear our poor state patiently, and not give head to our lusts for then shall we but provoke Gods wrath, by following our dainty desires and such other like things: wherefore let us be well advised to content ourselves with the little that he gives us.

Thus you see that although the rich enjoy their ease and have wherewith to maintain their delights for the present time: yet they must be of such mind, that if God lift to bereave them of all things the next morrow, they must not repine to give over all, but so humble themselves as they may say, Lord I will live today according to he blessing which thou has given me: and if thou lift to impoverish me to morrow, do thy good pleasure: only grant me the grace to learn to content myself with any other state of living than I live in today. Whereas today I far according to mine ability; if thou lift to bring me down to brown bread, let me abide to be brought thereunto, and let my neck be playable to receive thy yoke. That is the effect of the things which we have to mark upon this sentence of Moses, where he declares that every man must ‘moderate his diet and far according to God’s blessing, that is to say, according to the ability that God gives him wherewith to do it.

And we be further warned to beware that we devour not all that ever we can get by pilfry and wicked trades: for that is no blessing of God.

When a man has raked other folks goods to him by fraud and Lewd dealing, can that be called Gods blessing? True it is that riches come always from Gods hand: but yet whosoever he is that enriches himself by rauin and fraud, is rejected of God, and utterly disliked of him. So then, let us mark that although a man could be wicked shifts gain wherewith to feed himself fat; yet must he not take such liberty to him. For why? In this place we be restrained back to the blessing of God. Were this point well marked, we should not see so much naughtiness in the world as there is to be seen nowadays. For all the care is how to get where with to maintain us: but as for whether the means be Lawful and reasonable, no man enters into the examination of that: but so he may scrape and catch, he never takes any further care at all. We see what rauening there is, we see what deceitful and lewd dealing there is: in so much as there is not any state or trade of men in the world this day, which is not so perverted as world irk a man to think upon it. Every man seeking is to pull to himself the goods of other men, and commonly all is fish that comes to net. For why? We have no regard of Gods blessing, but we wind them in unto us, some by lying, and some by fair glossing. And to what end? For sooth to find ourselves withal. Behold, God calls us all, and tells us that his blessing shall light upon us if we follow his word simply: and that he will not fail us in anything, at leastwise if we endeavor to do what we can. Indeed we may hap to far hardly now and then, so as God will not feed us so full as we would wish: but yet howsoever we far, he promises to give sustenance to as many as resort unto him. But we disappoint ourselves of it by our own lewdness. For first and foremost we be troubled and tormented with distrust; secondly our inordinate lusts do tempt us and tickle us: and thirdly the devil does so blind us, that we make no conscience of pilling and polling, of deceiving and beguiling, and of giving ourselves to all naughtiness, so we may be fat fed, and live daintily: as for all the rest we make none account of it. And therefore let us remember this word Blessing as whereby God shows us that we must resort wholly unto him, accordingly also as our Lord Jesus Christ teaches us by bidding us to ask our daily bread of God his father, whereby we protest that we hold all things of his blessing.

Finally he adds, That as well the clean as the unclean may ease thereof. Our Lord does not here give leave to the unclean, to eat the fruits of the earth with an evil conscience: but his meaning is that there is not so great straightness to be used in the receiving of the common meats and drinks, as in eating of the sacrifices. For the eating of the Sacrifices was to another purpose. In those holy feasts aforementioned, it behooved them in any wise to be cleansed afore hand according to the ceremony of the law: so as it was not for any man to come to the Temple and to eat of the Sacrifices, until he had first cleansed himself, and water was set ready at the coming in of the door for the same purpose. But here it is said that there was no such straight bondage to be observed in their common eating and drinking. That is the very meaning of Moses. But yet must we mark also therewithal, that all that every we touch is defiled by our uncleanness, if we ourselves be not dedicated unto God, according to this saying of Saint Paul, that all things are clean to the pure and clean, which have their own consciences right before God, and cleansed by faith: whereas on the contrary part, the unbelievers and such as have no fear of GOD, defile the bread and wine by their touching of it, and do but make all things unclean, so as God's creatures are infected by the filthiness that is in them.

This must we hold for a rule: and specially in eating and drinking we must have the said cleanness of dedicating ourselves unto God. Nevertheless we must note that we cannot at all times be so well disposed in our eating and drinking, as when we come to the Church: there we must be of another mind. True it is that even in our laboring, and in our looking to our household, we ought to have God always before our eyes; and that when we eat and drink, we ought to do it in his name, according to the lesson that I alleged out of Saint Paul. But when we come to the Church God is yet nearer us and more familiar with us. For our Lord Jesus Christ assures us that he is there among us when we come together in his name: and by our holding up of our hands towards heaven, we show that our coming thither is to present ourselves in the sight of our God. And therefore we must have a more singular and earnest affection when we become thither, than we be doing of our common business. Ought there not to be a difference put between the Lords supper and our common eating and drinking? True it is that whensoever we receive our ordinary repast, we ought to call upon God and to give him thanks, or else we be defiled. But yet when we come to the holy supper, we must be ravished after another fashion, as though we were no more in this world: our minds must not run upon the feeding of our bodies, but upon the son of GOD, who calls himself our life, telling us that his flesh is our food, and his blood our spiritual drink. And therefore it is meet that it should be separated from the things that belong to the common order of this earthly life.

We see then that the meaning of Moses in this place where our Lord gives us liberty to eat and drink, is that we should call upon him: and that although there be infirmity in us, yet must not we therefore forbear the liberty and leave that GOD gives us to use the food which he has appointed to our use: which thing we may do with a quiet conscience, not doubting but GOD does well like of it, seeing he has given us such warrant, and has dispensed with us of his own Free goodness, and specially that when we resort unto him, we must retire and call ourselves back from all earthly cares, that we may mount up wholly unto heaven. As for example, when we be to receive the holy supper, or when we see that Christ assures or warrants us by Baptism, that we be made clean by him, and newly reformed, so as he accepts us and takes us for his members, to the intent that his fathers judgment feat should not be terrible unto us: when we think on these things I say, it becomes us to be drawn to the heavenly life, and to be as it were secluded from our earthly cars, that we may the better stick unto our God, and far the better by it all the days of our life.

And now let us fall down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us perceive them daily more and more and to teach us so to serve him, as we may abide continually in the pure simplicity of his word, without adding aught to it or taking aught from it, upon our own head. And seeing we know ourselves guilty before him of many sins committed against his majesty, let us flee for refuge to his mercy, and not doubt but that seeing he has vouchsafed (not to have a visible Sanctuary among us, but) even to knit himself to us in the person of his son Jesus Christ, we may assure ourselves that he always has compassion of us, to receive us, notwithstanding that we be so wretched creatures as we be well worthy to be cut off from him, and to be utterly thrust out of his kingdom. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth, &c.

The 84th Sermon, which is the fifth upon the twelfth Chapter 19 Beware that thou forsake not the Levite of all the time that thou shalt be upon the earth.

20 When the Lord thy God shall have enlarged thy borders as he has said, and thou say, I will eat flesh: if thy mind be desirous to eat flesh, eat thou whatsoever flesh thou hast a mind unto.

21 If the place which the Lord thy God will choose to put his name in, be far from thee, thou shalt kill of the Oxen and sheep which the Lord has given thee, as I have commanded thee, and thou shalt eat of it within thine own gates, according to thine own heart's desire.

22 As the Fallow deer and the Red deer are eaten: so shalt thou eat them. The clean and the unclean may eat thereof alike.

23 Only take heed that thou eat not the blood: for the blood is the life, and thou mayest not eat the life with the flesh.

24 Therefore thou shalt not eat it, but shalt pour it upon the earth as water.

25 Eat not of it therefore: that it may go well with thee and with thy children after thee, when thou shalt have done the thing that is right in the sight of the Lord.

26 But as for the hallowed things that are in thy custody, and thy vows; thou shalt take and carry them to the place which the Lord has chosen.

27 And thou shalt offer thy whole burnt offerings both the flesh and the blood, upon the altar of the Lord thy God. And of thy peace offerings thou shalt pour the blood upon the altar of the Lord thy God, and thou shalt eat the flesh.

28 Take heed and hearken to all these words which I command thee, that it may go well with thee and with thy children after thee forever, when thou shalt have done the thing that is good and right in the sight of thy God.

We saw yesterday why God appointed the Levites to have cities here and there throughout the land of Jurie: namely for the maintaining of the true and pure religion among his people. For if any of them would have turned away to superstition, or idolatry, those whom God had appointed to his own service, might have amended them by good admonitions. So by that means was the feed of good doctrine sown everywhere. Now pursuing the same matter Mosses adds, that the people should beware in any wise that they defrauded them not of their right. And not without cause. For as I have told you before, God had appointed them of purpose to serve him, and the greater part of them also to teach his people, that his law might be known. Seeing it was so, it was good reason that they should have wherewith to find and maintain them. For in very deed a part of the inheritance belonged to them, because they were dissented of the lineage of Abraham. But GOD had put them from it, to the end they should not be troubled neither with tilling of the ground nor with any other business, but only give themselves all wholly to the doing of their office. And it is not without cause that Moses plainly exhorts the people to do their duty in this behalf: for we see the unthankfulness of the world. The Idolaters can find in their hearts to maintain their priests, and they spare for no cost: but as for them that serve God purely, there is commonly no account made of them, as has been seen in all times. We see how God himself complains that he was defrauded both of his first fruits and also his offerings, and of all the residue which he had appointed to himself in his law. But if a man had inquired how the heathen behaved themselves towards their idols: he should have found that they were willing to spend the most part of their substance in their superstitions. We see then as I have told you already, that the world is so thankless towards the living God, that if men be not thoroughly quickened up, they let slip all that ever God commands, and could be contented that such things should never be spoken of. Specially ads for those whom God has ordained to preach his word, men can find in their hearts, not only to set light by them, but also to forsake them utterly. And why? It is because god rebukes us for our faults, but we would he were further off from us, and that he would lay the bridle in our necks, so as every man might do what he lifted: and therefore it grieves us to be touched by Gods word. But yet for all that, if those that have that charge committed to them do their duty; they must be importunate in calling upon us, by rebuking, exhorting, and reproving us, that they may overcome us by their lively rebukes and sharp threatening. Now, that is not the thing which the world covets and desires. Nay the world had lever to maintain such as should never speak word of it, than to have a preacher that would rebuke sin lively. And if it were in the worlds choice, it had always lever to maintain a whole Covent of Monks and Chanons to howl out with full gorge, than to find one preacher that would speak as he ought to do. Men can be contented to have Organs. And why? For they put men to no grief by rebuking their sins. But as for such as preach Gods word to the quick, men could find in their hearts that they were rid out of the world, if it were possible. And therefore it is not without cause that our Lord says he will not have them forsaken, which bear abroad the true doctrine in his name. For by that means folk bereave themselves of the food of life, in that they refuse to maintain those that bring them the doctrine of salvation, which is all one as if they meant to starve themselves for hunger. And that is the cause also why Saint Paul stands so much upon that warning. Certain it is that he fought unto his own profit. Insomuch that he forbear to take his due wages in some places, because he saw that men grudged at it. And he chose rather to take it of other Churches, where he served not, than of the Corinthians, because of the unthankfulness which he saw among them. Nay, he choose to labor with his own hands, rather than he would give them any occasion to speak ill of him. Thus have we a man that is not given to his own profit, but rather forbears willingly even that which God had granted unto him; and yet he ceases not to tell them, that the preachers of Gods word ought to be found and maintained. And why is that? Because we see the devil's subtlety, who desires nothing so much as that the Churches should be destitute of good shepherds. Again Saint Paul has an eye to the spitefulness of the world. And that is the cause hwy he stands so much upon the said point, That those to whom God has committed the charge of the preaching of his word, should be faithfully maintained. It is a great matter (says he) that we for bringing our spiritual goods unto you, should have wherewith to sustain our bodies. It is a very fair recompense. And yet if the dislike you, you show great malice, and that you set but little store by the inestimable treasure sent of God. Now we see to what purpose Moses commends here the tribe of Levic unto them. It was not so much for the profit of those that were to be maintained by the offerings, first fruits and tithes; as for the common benefit of the whole people. For it was to the end they should be maintained altogether in the true union of faith, and that they might always have men to put them in mind to live in obedience towards God, and that the Religion might be preserved in the pureness thereof. This is not for the peculiar benefit of the Levites, but for the general welfare of the whole Church of God.

Now hereupon Moses repeats the same thing again which I have expounded heretofore: that is to say, That the Jews might eat flesh throughout all the land of Jurie, conditionally that the sacrifices were reserved for the Sanctuary, and for the temple when the time were come that it were built. I have told you already that the cause why God gave such leave, was to the end that men should learn to refrain from the attempting of anything which they were not sure to be lawful for them to do. And how shall we know that the things which we do are acceptable to God? By having his word which he gives us. For it is not for us to be further of his counsel, than he discloses unto us. To be short, it is showed us here, that in all our life we must not stir one finger, except we be sure that GOD has given us leave. Now he for his part leaves us not in doubt, but has given us a sure and infallible rule, so as we may always discern the certainty at leastwise if we will hold ourselves contented with the thing that God allows, without adding anything to his doctrine and his law. For there he has uttered his will in such wise unto us, that if we want anything now, it is because we lift not to hearken to him that has all dominion over us. As for example, all the doubts that are among the Papists proceed of nothing else but of a foolish curiosity which they have to do better than GOD commands them. O (say they) I would be so holy as nothing might pass from me which should not be good. And is it not enough to obey GOD? Yes (say they) but I would do yet more. He that passes those bounds, shall but torment himself, and dwell in inquietness all the time of his life, as we see these hypocrites are, which are always tossed and turmoiled with some doubt. And what is the cause thereof? It is a reward which they deserve very well because they will not rule themselves by God's word. But (as the Prophet Esay says) if we walk purely and simply according to Gods word, we shall have rest in our souls, and we shall be free from all these troubles and debates which the wretched unbelievers make: for they wote not at which end to begin, neither know they where to make an end. Therefore let us mark well how it is not without cause, that GOD speaking of eating and drinking, does give here express leave to his people, to the end we should not adventure anything, but in his name, and to do us to understand that he has such a care of us, that he will guide all our steps, and therefore we must live as in his presence.

Furthermore let us learn to receive the liberty which GOD has given us, that we may enjoy it so far forth, as is expedient: for we know that this liberty of our ought to carry a restraint with it: and S. Paul tells us that all the things which are lawful, are not always behoveful, because they do not always edify our neighbors. But yet howsoever the case stands, we must have our consciences free, so as we may use the things that GOD has granted us by his word. And therefore both in eating and drinking we may give him thanks with a cheerful heart, as they that know how it is he that feeds us, and that we do receive all things at his hand. Moreover we be continually put in mind hereby, that he is near at hand with us, and that his providence extends even to the least things. For it may well seem that eating and drinking are no such things as are worthy that God should have regard of them. But yet it is Gods will to bear sway in that behalf, to the end that we should know the fatherly care that he has of us, not only in respect of our souls, but also in respect of our bodies, though they be transitory and corruptible.

Hereunto Moses adds, that the people should refrain from eating the blood of beasts. Whereby he does us to understand, that we must so use Gods creatures as we abhor all cruelty. For at the first sight it seems an unnatural thing to kill the beasts to whom GOD has given life, by knocking of them down and by cutting of their throats. It seems to be a changing of Gods ordinance, and an utter perverting of all things, when men take leave to do such things. Yet notwithstanding our Lord says that men may lawfully eat the flesh of beasts, and that he has created them for man use. Nevertheless to the intent to inure his people to meekness, he wills them to abstain from blood. But that served but for the time of the Law and the ceremonies. For as we have seen already, our Lord governed the people of old time as little babes. And we know that men teach young children all things that are good: but for as much as they have not yet the capacity to use things as they that are come to man's estate: men hold them in awe, and suffer them not to have things at will which are lawful of themselves. As how? Men beat a child for handling knife, because he cannot tell yet how to use it. So then GOD used a childish kind of instruction and as it were rudiments, or even as we say, the A, B, C, to enter that people withal which was yet rude and weak; but yet we know what the end and intent of the Law was, in commanding men to abstain from the blood of beasts. For Gods will was that men should abhor all cruelty. And the same exposition hereof is set down by Moses himself in the ninth Chapter of Genesis. For after the flood God declares that men may well eat the flesh of beasts, so they forbear to eat of their blood. And why is that ? Because it is to be considered, that the soul or life of every living thing is after a sort represented by the blood. And I forbid you all manslaughter (says GOD:) bear well in mind that men are created after mine own image: and therefore you must not work any outrage one to another. For whosoever sheds mans blood, shall have his blood shed by man. We see (I say) that the respect which our Lord had, was not of the brute beasts: but rather that his meaning was to hold us together in brotherly love. And therefore he gave the people of old time a figure, whereby to put them in mind that they should not offer any outrage to the reasonable creatures. That is the very effect.

Now as touching the Ceremony, that is no more in use: it was meet that all such things should be done away at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ: but yet does the substance of it continue with us still, so as GOD commands us to live peaceably one with another. For seeing it is told us in his Law, that it was not lawful to eat the blood of beasts: how much the rather ought we to spare the blood of men? For men are not set in the world to make meat of; but GOD has printed his mark upon them, and made his own image to shine forth in them, to the end that we by our sparing of them, should show whatever reverence we bear towards GOD. There are two things which we ought chiefly to regard in maintaining concord and friendship among men. The one is that we be all of one kind. Thou shalt not despise thine own flesh, says the Prophet. And indeed, we see that even the wild beasts do though a natural instinct keep company together, and every of them lives quietly with others of the same sort. Needs them must we be more perverse and less reasonable than the brute beasts, if we fall to devouring one another, and play the cats and dogs, as they say. Nevertheless, considering the inordinate unruliness that is among men, how there is neither uprightness nor indifferent dealing among them: surely there needs none other judge to condemn them of their cruelty, than the very wild beasts.

But there is yet a further thing, which I said to be the second point: and that is, that God has set his image in us. Therefore when I do any outrage to my neighbor, it is all one as if I should deface the image of GOD, and so am I guilty of high treason. Wherefore let us bear well in mind that our Lord makes great account of the maintenance of peace and agreement between men: the mean whereof is that no man offer any violence or wrong unto his neighbor. And surely we know how greatly God dislike manslaughter. For the law was made so straight in that behalf, that if a body were found dead by chance, and it was not known who killed it, the elders should meet about it, and after great search for the matter, they should take a solemn oath that none of them was guilty of the murder: thereupon they should offer a sacrifice to witness that the land should be as it were defiled if God punished not so heinous an offence, though the murder were not found. And what shall then become of us when our hands are imbrued with blood, and the murderer is known, and we be full of cruelty towards our brethren? Think we to scape the hand of the judge unpunished, when as he has pronounced such sentence? Yea and even when manslaughter is committed in battles, although the same be permitted when the wars are Lawful: Yet notwithstanding the scripture tells us there is a kind of defiling in it, to the end the even when men are compelled to slay their enemies in the maintenance of just quarrels, they should consider thus with themselves: Alas, I must be fain to deface here in the creatures that are shaped after the image of God: and thereupon be sorry and loth to do it. Now then let us mark that above all things it is Gods will we should live quietly among ourselves, without offering of any violence or outrage one to another. But truly, murders are about all things most horrible in Gods sight: and yet must we mark therewithal, that by that means all other outrages are forbidden. And that was the cause why the Prophet Esay upbraided the Jews, with the bloodiness of their hands. It was not for that they had robbed by the highway sides, or for that they had so beaten or stricken folk, as they might have been indicted for it before earthly Judges, but it was for the pilferers and extortions which they had committed secretly, and for their wrongful consuming of other men's substances. Although then that there be no open murder committed nor any such outrageous act done as may be condemned by ordinary justice: yet does not God accept that as sufficient, except we be free from all ravin, and wrong dealing, and have lived so uprightly among our neighbors, as we have done nothing to them which we would not have done unto ourselves.

Moreover we have to note how Saint John in his Canonical Epistle says that he which hates his neighbor in his heart, is a murdered already by God. Although this hatred of ours be not known, although we show no outward token to the worldward that we be carried with desire or revenge, although there appear no such thing as may discover our malice unto men: Yet are we guilty of murder before God, if we have any heartburning at all within us. For even that were a giving of place unto Satan, as Saint Paul tells us here where he warns us that the sun should not go down upon our anger. He says that the party which has his heart so infected with hatred and rancor gives Satan the possession of him to reign over him. That is the thing which we have to bear in mind.

I told you even now, that the use of this ceremony has ceased ever since the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. And therefore we ought to be the more encouraged to serve God, sith we see that we be not reined in with so rough a bit, nor held so short as the Fathers of old time were. You see how at this day, GOD gives us leave to eat the blood of beasts, which thing was not granted to the Jews. We know what is told us of it by the Apostles themselves. For they made not a decree of it, as the Papists understand it, neither changed they anything in Gods word, (for that had been high treason to God): but forasmuch as they knew that our Lord Jesus Christ, had by his coming abolished the Ceremonial law: they showed that it might be lawful to eat blood, so it were done without offence to others. For their forbidding of it in the fifteenth of the Acts, was but for a time; and thereby they showed that it was free for every man according to conscience, to maintain peace and concord withal. Indeed they counseled men to abstain from it, how be it that was but for a time (as I said) until the faithful were better settled in the doctrine of the Gospel.

And now let us apply this doctrine to our own use. I have told you already, that first and foremost it behooves us always to bridle ourselves, assuring ourselves that nothing is permitted us which breeds offence. And why? Because God binds us one to another. But yet for all that, we have our consciences at liberty, so as we know that the things are free to us, which were not permitted to the fathers of old time. Now then ought not this to move us the more to serve God, which shows himself so freehearted towards us? For if we were under the bondage of the Law; we ought to abstain from manslaughter, seeing that the blood of beasts were forbidden us, which at this day is permitted unto us. And therefore let us beware we abuse not such goodness of our God: but rather the more that he grants us, the more let every of us bethink him to hold himself in his obedience and subjection, that we play not the loose Colts as the proverb says. That is the effect of the things which we have to note upon this text.

Now as touching the Vows and oblations whereof Moses speaks so much; let us remember what has been said heretofore; namely how it is not Gods will that his people should eat and drink, without having some record that all comes of him. As for example, whereas at this day he gives us leave to eat and drink, every man according to his ability; his meaning is that we should give our neighbors part with us, and show by our almosedeeds that we do homage unto him with the things that he has given us, as belonging unto him alone. There is not nowadays the like order that was under the Law of Moses, concerning oblations, first fruits, and Sacrifices: but almosedeeds are the sacrifices that God likes of, as is showed unto us, specially in the Epistle to the Hebrews. And it is a doctrine that is very rise in the holy Scriptures. But there it is said expressly, that we must not forget the brotherly love which we ought to have in succoring our neighbors that are distressed: for they be the sacrifices which God requires and allows. Sith it is so then, let us mark well, that if a man have wherewith to maintain himself abundantly, he must not exempt himself from doing service unto God therewithal. And after what manner? Every man must stain himself to the uttermost of his power to succor and relieve such as have scarcity and want of worldly goods. Thus you see how the right use which our Lord appoints to all his creatures, is to offer them up unto him, to show that we hold all of him, That is the very meaning that was intended in all first fruits of older time. And although the Ceremony continue not at this day; yet ought the truth thereof to reign still among us. Wherefore let us learn to cherish ourselves in such sort, as we forget not other folk: and specially let us bear in mind, that our unthankfulness will defile all our good fare, if we acknowledge not God to be the giver of all things unto us. We hear what our Lord Jesus Christ said to the hypocrites that took great pains to make clean their vessels that there might be no spot in them. Make clean the insides of them too, quote he. And afterward he adds, that the right way for men to make themselves clean, is to give to the poor, and not to busy themselves about a sort of pelting trifles as the world does continually, who think to dally with God, and would give him rattle rattles to play with as if he were a babe, but they cannot beguile him so. Therefore according to Jesus Christ's exhortation, if we mean that the meats which we take should be sanctified unto us, let us look that God be honored by them, and let us bear well in mind how it is of his only free goodness that we be nourished by them. And forasmuch as we can neither do him good nor harm, neither has he need of anything: let us show our good will towards his poor servants: For they be his bailiffs whom he sends to us, to receive the sins and other duties that we owe him for all his benefits. Thus you see in effect what we have to gather upon that saying.

Now it is said further, that if the people do the things that are right and just before God, they shall be blessed, both they and their children. Hereby we be still warned, that if we will direct our life aright, we must not follow our own good intents as they call them, but hearken what God says unto us, and rest simply upon his will, as shall be declared more at large tomorrow by God's will. Nevertheless Moses warns the people here as he does in many other places, that they must not demean themselves after their own fancies, but in any wise give ear unto God. If thou do that which is good and righteous faith he; And in whose sight? In the sight of men? True it is that we ought to live in such sort as we give no cause of offence to anybody, so as if any speak evil of us, they may have their mouths stopped. But yet must not men be made judges of their lives; that authority must be reserved unto GOD. And that is the cause why the scripture meaning to betoken an angelical perfection, says that such a man has walked before God. For if we should fashion ourselves after the world, what a thing were it? We see how the greatest multitude live out of all order, and so should we make evil custom a Law. hen whoredom, drunkenness, outrage, violence, and blasphemy reigned; we would bear ourselves in hand that such things were permitted us. And why? Because they be grown into custom.

Now therefore, if we should follow the guise of the world, we should be carried quite away. Again, even they that pretend to be fullest of devotion, may chance to use some pelting trash and baggage in the serving of God: they may happy to make a number of gewgaws and ruffraff: but all such things are nothing worth, they be but flat mockery. So then, it behooves us to walk before God; and although we see things utterly out of order, and all brought to confusion, yet must we hold the right way still which GOD shows unto us. If we see men go astray, and devise never so many fond devotions, let us leave all such things, and be contented to follow God's ordinance.

Surely although the world like never so well of our doings, yet shall we not fail to be condemned: but if God allow of us, then have we a good warrant. As for example, because that nowadays we use not the gewgaws of the Papists, we have not any puppets here, we have no decking of altars, we have no tapers nor such other stuff: they laugh our plain dealing to scorn, and they think there is no serving of GOD among us. But howsoever we fare, we have here a good record, which is, that we do the things that are good in the sight of our God. And it is not for once only that Moses speaks hereof. We have seen other texts heretofore tending to the same effect: but here this saying is set down twice within ten lines: and it is no more than needed, considering how forward we be to do the things which the world likes, insomuch that we covet to be sought, and will needs always justify ourselves to the worldward. Moses therefore brings back to that point. No (says he), be contented to do whatsoever our Lord enjoins you. For if he allow of your doings, then is it perforce righteousness: and therefore hardly laugh all the world to scorn. So then, that is one point which we have to bear in mind, when Moses tells us that we must do that which is good before God.

And now to give the people the better courage, he adds immediately a promise, saying To intent thou shalt prosper, both thou and thy children forever. Here first of all we see that which has been touched already; that is to wit, that our Lord provokes us to serve him with the better courage, by proffering us reward. Truly he is not bound to us in any case: insomuch that when we shall have served him, yea though it be a hundred thousand times more than we do; yet are we still indebted to him nevertheless: for we be his. And we must mark our Lord Jesus Christ's similitude, how that if a man have a servant that is as his slave, when his servant has labored all the day long, and comes home at night, his master will not rise up to give him his supper, but command him to wait upon him still at his table. Now it is certain that we owe much more unto God, than men owe one to another. Let us strain ourselves to the uttermost of our power, yea and above all our power, and yet shall we not be able to discharge ourselves of the hundredth part of our duty towards him, and what reward then can we deserve at his hand? Nevertheless, of his own free goodness it is said that we shall not lose our labor in serving him. So then let us mark that Gods meaning is not to place any worthiness in our works by promising us reward: but only to encourage us the more to them, And indeed we be too slothful, if the regard thereof move us not. Behold, God might command me, and exact at my hand whatsoever he lifts, for I am bound to him in all cases and all respects: and yet to the end that no sloth should hold me back, he tells me that if I serve him he will prosper me; and in his so doing there passes as it were a covenant, whereby he binds himself unto us. If this move us not, must it not needs be that we be more hard than stones? Yet notwithstanding, we see that the wretched world cannot be won by any means. When the promises are set before us; that God will bless us, though we be minded to give ourselves to his service, yet do we not cease to yield to all evil, and we bear ourselves in hand that we shall benefit ourselves greatly by provoking his displeasure. If we spy any likelihood of gain; we run gadding after it, and every of us is ravish in love of it. And what comes of it when we go about to enrich ourselves after that fashion by craft and wicked practices? When we will needs attain to some ambition or dignity, what will be the end of it? Our Lord will curse it every whit. It seems then that we intend to prosper even as it were in despite of God. And we be so carried away by our affections, and so driven by the headlines of them, that God cannot hold us back, neither by bridles, nor by ropes, nor by chains. Loe here a great mischief, that although our Lord allure us never so sweetly to him, and labor to win us to him by promising us reward: yet notwithstanding we be so full of mischief, that to our seeming, all his promises are vain and nothing worth; they move us not a whit. But as for the allurement of Satan, they draw us to them, insomuch that we bear ourselves in hand, that although God be against us and our enemy, yet we shall not fail to prosper, so the world laugh upon us, and that there be some likelihood of advancement. Mark that for one point.

Furthermore, we see that even the wicked fail not to stand in their own conceits. As for example, we see nowadays that in the Popedome men make a shield of these texts, to show that God is beholden to us, that our works are desertful, and that we be able to purchase Gods grace, yea and even everlasting salvation; so as not only God must needs prosper us in this world, but also the heritage of the heavenly kingdom becomes as a conquest unto us. The world (say I) beguiles itself in this behalf. And who be they that speak so boldly of it? Even the greatest despisers of God. As for example, you shall see a sort of these Frierly flatterers dispute of deserts with full mouth; and yet for all that, they be men without God, without religion, wicked out of measure, and scorers of God. Also let us take the greatest pretenders of holiness among them, and we shall find them full of pride and stateliness, full of malice and envy against their neighbors, and burning with covetousness. They make a fair outward show of holiness, but inwardly, there is no soundness at all. Their life bewrays that they be rank rebels against God, and that they do but turn the best side outward in all their devotions: and yet in the meanwhile, all their talk is of Merits, Merits. And what manner of desert? Look upon their lives, and you shall see what they be. But first and foremost, how can our works deserve, but Gods accepting of them of his own free goodness? For it stands us in hand, not only that he bind himself unto us, as he does not withstanding that he need not except he lifted; but also moreover, that he accept our works in good worth, forgiving the faults and blemishes that are in them. For we cannot bring any one work unto him which is not defiled with some imperfection, so as there is always some fault to be found in it. Now then we should be found blameworthy in all our virtues if God lifted to examine them with rigor. And so what becomes of the promises, which tell us that our works are desertful? Nay, let us mark that after our Lord's binding of himself so freely unto us, he yields us reward for the service that we have offered unto him, and then accepts our works of his own free goodness. As how? By putting all the blots and blemishes of them out of his remembrance, so as he imputes them not any more. And that is the way for us to prosper all kind of ways, through his only free goodness. But yet by the way let us call to mind the matter that we have touched afore: namely that we be very wretched, seeing our Lord allures us to him so gently and with so great courtesy, saying, Go to my children, I desire nothing else but to maintain you in prosperity, do you no more but follow me: and yet notwithstanding, after this choice of prosperity offered unto us, we forsake our GOD, and run gadding after the vanities of this world, Satan carries us away with his trumperies, and we shut our eyes wittingly, and willfully, as though all our seeking were to be deceived that we might perish: and yet for all this, we cease not to complain when we see the miseries and adversities of this world light upon us. And in what a time are we? We see nowadays how there is war on the one side, and dearth on the other; all things are so far out of order as it is pity to behold, and every man mourns, but no man has an eye to the cause of the mischief. For if we thought upon it, we could not but perceive Gods hand to be upon us, yea and that in such wise, as it would make us to bethink us after this manner: Alas, we have forsaken the fountain of all welfare, and therefore it is good reason that we should now feel thirst. For God is ready on his part to give us our fill, he is not niggardly, his power is not diminished, he has the fullness of all good things in him: and therefore if we be destitute, of whom is it long? When a man runs gadding here and there, and forsakes a fountain, and goes on wandering into desert places where he is in danger to die for thirst, so as he bears out his tong half a foot long, and finds not a drop of water to refresh himself withal: is he not worthy to die for thirst, seeing he has so forsaken the fountain? So then let us mark that God withdraw his blessings from us, because we have forsaken him, and it is a just reward whereof we be well worthy. And yet by the way we be warned therewithal, to return to our God: for his will is not that we should pin in such sort, as he should not be ready to receive us again. True it is that we be driven to feel our harms in good earnest, that we may be moved with hearty desire to return unto him: But yet notwithstanding, for all his rough chastising of us, and for all the long continuance of our misery, we miss not to come into his favor again, and to be made partakers of his benefits, when we cease to shrink away from him, and be fully minded to put ourselves again under his obedience.

So then let us learn to put this doctrine of Moses in use, namely of doing that which is good and rightful in the sight of our God. And let us mark how it is not only for a day or two that God says he will be merciful and favorable to his people: but that he will hold out to the end, yea even after the decease of those that shall have served him. And herein we have a confirmation of our hope of the everlasting life. For if God hold on in doing us good even after our decease, in the person of our children: it follows that he will not forget us, but that when we have finished our race in this world, we shall be gathered up unto him, to enjoy the benefits fully and perfectly, whereof he has given us but a tast by hope. Therefore must we mark that point; and sith we be so naughty and forward, that we cease not to go astray and to run gadding here and there: let us run back again to him, and consider that his uttering of his will unto us by word of mouth, or his writing of it in paper or parchment, is not enough for us: but that he must be fain to write in it our hearts also. Seeing then that we be so forward as to rush out into naughtiness, and to turn aside from the right way: let us pray our good God to hold us so in by his holy spirit, that although we see things in horrible disorder nowadays, so as we be moved at the beholding of the present state of the world: yet notwithstanding we may not cease to hold ourselves still under his hand, and government: which thing if we do, surely we may defy all that ever the unbelievers do practice against us. For if they despise us, if they shake us off, if they abhor us: what for that? Yet are we sure that God has not given us his word in vain, but that if we stick thereunto, we may be well paid though men find fault with us, for we shall be acquit and justified before GOD and his Angels, though the world have condemned us. Thus you see how we may walk in such certainty and hope, that although we see stumbling blocks round about us, yet shall we never be thrusts out of the right way, and therewithal we shall be well assured, that our Lord will hold us under his protection, so as when Satans underlings have wrought what they can, and the devil himself has strained all his force to the uttermost to overthrow us; yet notwithstanding forasmuch as we be shrouded under the shadow of our God, and have his blessings printed in us, we need not to fear but that he will continue the same from day to day. And although we see never so many changes and back turnings in this world: yet are we sure that we cannot light upon our feet, so long as our Lord be our upholder and stock to lean unto. Now let us fall down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults. Praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may be led to true repentance, and not only crave forgiveness of the sins which we have committed, but also obtain such increase of his grace in us henceforth, as he may be glorified by our whole life, when he has brought us back again to his holy Law. And so let us all say, Almighty God, Heavenly father, &c.

The 85th Sermon which is the sixth upon the twelfth
Chapter

29 When the Lord thy God shall have rooted out before thy face the nations which thou go to possess, so as thou has them in possession and dwell in their land

30 Then beware thou be not snared by them, after that they be overcome before thee. And enquire not after their gods, saying: Howe did these nations serve their gods? I will do so too.

31 Thou shall not do so to the Lord thy God. For they have done all such things to their gods, as the Lord abhors and hates. For they have burnt even their sons and daughters in fir to their gods.

32 Therefore whatsoever I command you, look that you do it, and put not anything to it, neither take anything from it.

When we hear that Moses warns the Jews that they turn not away from the right serving of God after his setting of them in possession of their inheritance: we may think they were a very malicious people, and right hard to be governed. For what is it that Moses requires of them? That they should not forget the party that had redeemed them, and afterward given them his law, but that they should hold themselves at a stay, and not defile themselves with the superstitions of the heathen. And they had two things to hold them to the service of God. For they ought to have born in mind after what manner he had deliver them from the bondage of Egypt: and did not such a gracious goodness well deserve that they should have persisted continually in the acknowledging of their redeemer? Again they had very fair looking glasses set before them for example, in that they saw that Gods rooting out of the inhabitors of the Land of Chanaan, was a token that he could not away with any of all their abominations: and ought not the Jews to have fared the better by their beholding of such examples? But now that we know the naughtiness of that people, let us come to ourselves and be well assured that we be not better than they were, but have need of the warning that is given here. And for proof hereof God does daily renew his gracious goodness towards us. Had we felt his goodness but once in all our life, it ought to serve us for a bridle to hold us under his obedience. But he ceases not to increase his benefits still daily, and yet we forget it in the turning of a hand, and we never think upon it any more, to benefit ourselves by it. To be short, it seems that all our endeavor is to honor him. Lo how our unthankfulness bewraieth itself too much on the one side. Yet notwithstanding we see how God gives us sufficient warnings, by chastising others that have done amiss before our eyes, and by sparing us: and ought we not to bethink us better of the judgments which he executes, after that fashion? Yes: for they be no things done in hudder mudder, there is no more for us to do but to take heed to them. But it should seem that we play the blind buzzards willfully, and lift not to know any of the things which are too apparent and notorious. Therefore whether it be that God do draw us to him by the great number of benefits which he bestows upon us, or that he teach us to fear him by punishing offenders in our presence; all this boots us not, for we be unthankful, and the time is but lost in doing us good, insomuch that although we see how he has showed himself judge against such as have offended by him, yet we think not upon it, but let it slip. Can we cast our eye anywhere nowadays, but we must needs see a great number of manifest examples, whereby we ought to take warnings to live warily and advisedly? We see how whole Nations and Countries are not spared, and we see the like in private persons: all is full of sighing and crying, and it is all one as if God should found a trumpet to the punishing of some offender, that every man might be warned to take example by him. We see these things: but how do we benefit ourselves by them? Let us not think then that in this place Moses speaks but only to the Jews: but let us understand that it was Gods will to show us by them, that even after we know him to be our father and Savior, and even after he has powered out the infinite riches of his mercy upon us; Yet have we still need to be warned to live in his fear: for otherwise we will turn our backs upon him. Again, when he has warned us by many examples; that is not enough unless he quicken us up to set our minds upon it, so as we may perceive wherein it was his will that we should fare the better by it.

But there is yet another point; which is, that when we be so taught by other men's harms, and by Gods bearing with us in that he lifted not to punish ourselves: we should at leastwise prevent his anger, and seeing there be so many that suffer, yea and which suffer to serve for our instruction, the same should be as a schooling unto us; that when we see our Lord utter his rigor after that sort, and show himself to be a Judge; we should not tarry till he smite us on the heads, but come meekly unto him, acknowledging our faults, and taking good heed that we wrap not ourselves in his curse with t hose against whom he has showed himself such an enemy and adversary. That is the thing which we have to bear in mind.

And Moses says expressly, Beware thou fall not into the snares after them. As if he should say, if you be not stark blind, you must need shun these people and not follow their example, seeing that God has punished them after that fashion. For if you meddle with their corruptions, God can make you to fall into the same pity well enough. You see into what case they be false: and therefore take heed to yourselves, or else it will be an open tempting of God, as though you sought your own destruction even in despite of him. Nevertheless, we see how men play the beasts in that behalf. For when we have seen GOD correct a man for some offence, by and by we fail not to provoke his wrath in the self same sort, that they did which were punished. Indeed we have wit enough to condemn them that suffer the punishment; O it is good right say we, they have well deserved it, they be worthy of such correction. We can skill to talk after that fashion: but in the meanwhile, when we plaide the judges towards other men, we cannot find the fault in ourselves, and therefore must we be double condemned at Gods hand, because our hypocrisy blinds us, and we look not into ourselves to correct our own misdoings.

Moses therefore speaks here expressly of the snares that the Cananites were false into. As if he should say, whatsoever you see in any unbelievers, is all one as if God warned you long beforehand, to beware that you fall not into the like curse by following their steps; and therefore shun them. For we must understand that as oft as our Lord punishes those that have offended him, and we know it, and he will have it so; it is all one as if he should make some sign to us, or rather arrest us with his own hand and say, Take heed to yourselves, proceed no further, go not on still; for if you do, you be undone, you be forlorn. Seeing that our Lord gives us such warning, may it not be said that we be worse than mad if we proceed on still? What excuse will there be for us, when God shall have showed us the ditch and bidden us beware that we fall not into it, and yet we be so willful in wickedness, that he cannot win so much at our hands, as to mark us turn back again from it?

Moreover we see by this text, that it is but a simple shift to say, Other men do so as well as I: and yet a great number of silly souls beguile themselves with it even at this day. If a man warn the Papists of their superstitions, to bring them to God's truth, O (say they) I am not alone, there be many others in the world. They bear themselves in hand that they may by and by disappoint God with the multitude of their partakers. But Moses tells us here, that all shall be tied together in one bundle, and one of them shall not help to acquire another or to diminish others fault, but that all of them shall be rooted out together, according to this saying of our Lord Jesus Christ, If the blind lead the blind, they shall both fall in to the ditch. What shall I have gained by it, when a great number of people shall have perished with me? Then let us not think our faults the lighter for the greatness of the number of them that offend with us: but rather let us mark on the contrary part, that there is not a worse thing than evil custom: and it is the thing that we had need to beware of as long as we live in this world. For we see very few of that sort of men which guide us the right way; but on the contrary part the multitude is infinite of those that thrust us out of the way: so as if we lean unto men, we shall scarcely find one among a hundred, which walks aright, but all of them do go astray. Also when the Prophet Esai speaks of the disorder that reigned everywhere, he says no more but that every man had turned aside after his own ways. Whereby he does us to understand that we need not to be beguiled by others, for every of us beguiles himself too much. Therefore when men follow their own imaginations, then are they quiet and clean out of the way of salvation. And sith it is so that we shall find very few that can amend us, and all the rest do but draw unto evil: what shall become of us if we ground ourselves upon custom? If we say, O, there be thus many and thus many that take this or t hat to be good: yea, but God dislikes it, and it makes no matter what men do, for we see they be all given to naughtiness, and are corrupted in their understanding. Again, their hearts are full of malice, so as they drag clean back from that which God has showed them. And if we allege, it is not now late that this thing came up, it has been used of custom in all ages long ago: verily it is all one as if we should say, the world is hardened in naughtiness. But yet has it not gotten so sure hold that it can displace God from being Judge, that he should not condemn them as they deserve. And therefore let us mark well how it is showed us here, that if we follow the steps of such as have gone astray; when God has punished them, we also must come to account after them. Yea and we deserve double punishment, when we fare not the better by the corrections that God has showed unto us: for it is all one as if we resisted him willfully. The matter in effect which we have to gather upon this saying where Moses speaks of the snares that are laid for us, is ; that when our Lord has once warned us, and we have seen the very examples themselves before our eyes; we should set our minds upon them, that we entangled not ourselves in the curse that is prepared for the despisers of Gods word.

And it is said further, that men should not enquire after their gods. Hereby he does us to understand, that men are oftentimes turned away from well doing, by their foolish curiosity. For when we be once instructed in the pure simplicity of Gods word, if we hold our minds imprisoned, that is to say, if we hold ourselves contented with Gods truth; then are we sure that our Lord will confirm us more and more, so as though all the world were on broil, yet should we be knit still in good agreement of faith. But our wits are so fickle, that they be always roving: we cannot hold ourselves from enquiring of this and that: not for any benefit that we reap by it, for we wote not what is the reason thereof: but yet our desirousness so tickles us, and so provokes us, that we cannot hold ourselves in quiet to say, let us obey our God. Therefore Moses meant plainly to condemn the vice that reigns overmuch in men, and is too deep rooted in the nature: which is, that in stead of soberness to hold ourselves in simple obedience to Gods word; we be continually turmoiled with vain fancies, and all our seeking is who did this and who did that, that we might be cunning in judging thereof. As for example, we see a great sort that would fain know all the Religions of the world. And to what end? It seems to them that they be not sure of the Christian faith, unless they know Machomets Alcoran; and all the devilishness that has reigned amon the Paynims and Papists; and have their heads full stuffed and besotted with all the dotages of Jews. Thus do they play the beasts through their wicked curiosity, and it appears well that there has been nothing in them but utter vanity and hypocrisy. Wherefore according to that which Moses has declared here, let us learn not to be too inquisitive of the things that are not good for us. We see that even in reading Gods word, we must use this modesty of forbearing to seek things needless which serve not to edifying: and what will come of it if we disguise Gods word, by ripping up the things which cannot but infect our minds, and corrupt them, and turn them from the pure truth? True it is that such as are to make warts are fain to be inquisitive of the force and policy of their enemies, that they may beware of them: but when we be so eager, that without any occasion or need, we will needs know that which does not touch us nor concern us; is not a tempting of God? is it not a casting of ourselves into the snares which we see that Satan has laid for us? Therefore when men have been taught of Gospel purely let them abide quietly therein, let them be contented with this, that they are approved of God; who cannot deceive them, and let them refuse all manner of trumperies, which can serve to no purpose but to entangle them in trifling disputations without profit, or without any furtherance to their faith. We see what has happened to their faith. We see what has happened to some, I mean of these wild headed fellows that would need be inquisitive of all things, and there was not any sect or opinion, but they would needs know it and have skill to dispute of it. Very well: but what won they by so doing? God gave them up, so as they were destitute of understanding, and there was less wit and discretion in them than in little children. Where things were in quiet they would needs set all on a broil, yea even without any rime or reason, so as they saw not a whit even in the things that were so visible and apparent, that they might have picked out their eyes with them. Seeing then that God does so punish these troublesome heads that ceases not to martyr themselves in their own unquietness, and cannot be satisfied but that they must needs be inquisitive of the things that are not for their profit: we ought to be the more mindful of Saint Paul's lesson, which is that we must not be over wise, but wise according to sobriety. Let us bethink us of our slenderness, how rude and gross witted we bee, and let it suffice us that GOD can well skill to teach us, if we take him for our master and teacher. And seeing we have his word, let every of us keep himself within the bounds thereof, and not play the colts that are broken loose.

Now after that Moses has spoken after that manner, he says Thou shall not do t the Lord thy God, as these nations here have done to their gods. As if he should say, we must not look upon men, when we intend to serve God aright; but Gods only will must be our rule, as he will add for a conclusion in the end. Let us mark well then that there is not a worse thing, than to fashion ourselves after the customs of men in cases that concern the serving of God. For that has been the very cause of so many mingle mangles and of so great confusion of all things in Christian religion. A man needs but a little Leven t sowre a whole batch of dowe. But there has been so much Leven brought in, that it has marred all the righteousness whereunto God calls those that are his. For as I have declared heretofore, men have thought it good that in steed of the fashions that were used by the heathen, there should be some such fashions brought in as had some resemblance of them.

As for example, the heathen worshipped such an idol, or held such a high feast on such a day: and therefore must we also appoint a feast to some Saint upon the same day. Yea, but that was but a changing of the name of the idol: and the nearer they came unto it, or took covert under it, the more did they falsely abuse God his name and defile it. Thus made they an exchange of the idols of the heathen, and in their steeds took up Hesaints and Shesaints made idols of them. Now seeding that this manner of dealing has been the cause of the perverting of all things; it stands us the more in hand to take heed to the things that Moses tells us here to wit that God requires not that we should do as the wretched and ignorant infidels do to their idols: but that if we will walk rightly we must keep us from counterfeiting the things that we may happen to see everywhere. True it is that forasmuch as we be fleshly, we will think the things that are done by men to be very godly: but what shall we gain in this case, by bringing our own weights and balances? For God will have us to hearken unto him; and shall not we then make a fair bargain, to say I ween I do well? All such stuff is nothing worth, it must be stricken off, every whit. That is the cause why Moses in this text expressly presupposes that God will not have the things done to him which the wretched infidels did to their idols.

And yet to persuade us the better in all these things, he adds that they had done such things as God abhorred, as namely the burning of their children in fire. Here under one kind, Moses shows that the wretched Paynims rushed out into so beastly dealings, as would make a man to abhorre their cruelty to thnk upon it. For how is it possible that they should be so destitute of all reason, as to forget even natural kindness, when they meant to serve their Gods? What a thing was it, that they should go burn their own children? Behold, the fathers which ought to have considered, that when God had given them children, it was a singular blessing, forasmuch as he had ordained them to be in his own stead, to the end there should always be some seed in the world to honor him and serve him: even the fathers themselves (I say) did cast their own children into the fire, and became murderers of them. Whereby we sees that idolaters may well be carried away with some devotion; but the same is but as a fury, they be out of their wits and the devil does so possess them, that they have neither wit nor discretion any more. And shall we allow of such doings? We see then whereat Moses aimed at declaring here that the wretched Paynims burned their own children, by means whereof they became stark devils, and there was not a more horrible thing than was their devotion, though they commended it never so much. If it be objected that GOD commanded Abraham to do the like; we see the end thereof. True it is that GOD meant so far forth to try Abraham says, by commanding him to kill his own son: but that was a singular example for a special purpose, and not a common rule/ On the other side, God provided for it, and showed that he desired not to have man's blood sacrificed unto him: for he preserved Abraham from doing it when it came to the point. Therefore there is great diversity to God in going about to sacrifice his son Isaac: and the madness of these blind wretches in purposing to honor their idols by murdering their own children.

Hereby let us learn generally to mark well that whensoever we see the wretched unbelievers rush out into disorder like brute beasts, we must learn to have the more stay of ourselves that we follow them not. As for example; whereas it is said nowadays in general, that we must not follow the steps of the Papists, because t hat all the things which they term by the name of Gods service, are but a heap of vain fancies, such as every man lifted to forge of his own brain, and a horrible hotchpotch of things confounded together, for the doing whereof they have not so much as one syllable in God's word to allow it and yet they martyr themselves exceedingly in the doing of them: besides this, they become so brutish, as we ought to be even ashamed of them. For proof whereof, what a thing is it that they should go kneel down before puppets, as though GOD were present there? They say they worship not the images; but men see what reverence they yield unto them, and it is the first lesson that is taught in their Synagogues. And surely what excuse so ever they make, when they kneel down before the image of S. Barbe which never was, (for you must understand that men have made a God of such a creature as never was in the world) or when they go to S. Catherin, or Saint Christopher which are things of the same stamp and say nine Paternosters and an Avemarie to them: to whom speak they? Is it not a flat mocking of God, or rather a villainous blaspheming of him? The heathen therefore had much more than the Papists, wherewith to color their abominations when they did things so far out of square as was pity to see, and yet thought they pleased God in so doing. When they drink till they be drunken upon the holiday, they think that God is content therewith. Again, when they be well appareled, they suppose it is a good service of God. To be short, they have such fond toys and gewgaws, as are worthy to be spit as often as a man hears them spoken of. And whosoever has but one drop of good understanding may perceive the fondness that is in them. Insomuch that when we consider the matter, we think it impossible that men should be so brutish as we see they have been. But it is gods own doing, who executes this threat, made by the prophets, that he would power out the spirit of giddiness and blockishness upon the world, to blind it withal, because that such as have forsaken the pure doctrine of God, and turned away from the holy scripture, are worthy to be so carried away, to the committing of such unreasonable things as we ought to be ashamed of and utterly to abhor. And this is told us to teach us to shun their company, and even that is the meaning of Moses when he says, Mark what is befallen unto them. Now then, let us beware that God punish us not after the same manner, by giving us over to a reprobate sense. Wherefore let us receive the light of his word, and follow the way while he shows us it, suffering ourselves to be held altogether in obedience under him. For step we once aside one way or other, indeed we shall not at the first dash fall into so great confusion as we see the idolaters are, but in the end we shall be paid home to our smart. For how became they so brutish? Had they neither wit nor reason? Yes: but God punishes them because they submitted not themselves to his word. Let us therefore stand in fear of the like condemnation: for it is certain that the like shall fall upon us, if we follow their steps. And we hear how Saint Paul speaking generally of all such as lift not to obey Gods will, says that they must needs have their eyes stopped, so as they may not be able to discern any more, but be trained in all things to other men's Jures. And this threat points at us. And therefore let us keep good watch, and be well ware that we set not one foot forward; for there is not any other way that is certain.

Now let us come to the conclusion that Moses adds. Look thou do all that I command thee this day, without adding anything to it or liking anything from it. Here he shows us the remedy to preserve us from all stumbling, and from all the wiles of Satan and all his snares, and from all occasions that are ministered to thrust us out of the way of salvation: and that is, to be contented with the rule that GOD gives us, and to follow the same, and to be so pliable to it, as we always have our ears stopped against all other sayings whatsoever, rejecting all things else, that none but only GOD may have dominion over us. And so let us mark well, that we shall never have the wit to keep ourselves from superstition, and from Satan's sleights; except our Lord remedy the matter by his word. True it is that we ought to give good ear to the counsel that is given us, and not to follow the follies and errors of the world, nor entangle ourselves in such a sort of fond toys; but to be short to eschew all the foolish devotions that men have devised of their own heads; we ought well to mark that. But yet is not that enough. For there is none of us all which has not a storehouse of many errors in his own head, in so much that every of us is a provocation to himself although we be not furthered by others. What remedy then? There is none other way, but to suffer ourselves to be governed by God. And that is the cause why Moses, after all his exhortations, tells us that if we follow not Gods word, we shall ever be entangled in many wicked imaginations, whereby the devil will find gap open, or as it were a breach to win thus by. Therefore if we purpose to put Satan back, and to be preserved from all uncleanness of superstition: let Gods word have his authority among us.

And first of all Moses says; Do whatsoever is commanded thee. Whereby he means (as I have declared in other places) that it is not enough for us to obey God by halves (for he can away with no such partnership:) but that we must submit ourselves to his commandments in all cases and all respects, without any gainsaying. And that is a thing very worthy to be noted. For most men can well enough find in their hearts to confess that it is good reason that GOD should be served, yea even according to his own will as he himself requires but yet they cease not to take exceptions still, and to say, This likes me not, such a thing would do better. To be short, for all their pretence of obeying GOD and although that in many respects they yield to the things that are spoken to them; yet do they bear themselves in hand, that they may let the rest alone. But contrariwise, God admits not any exception, but says that whatsoever he commands, must be done; and that we must not enter into disputation with him, to make him amends in one thing for missing in another; but that his Law must be observed, yea even according to the contents and substance thereof. For if I should receive some covenant or some public instrument or writing made upon it, and yet say, as for this point or that article, I will not admit it: what a thing were it? It were to disannul the whole. So then let us mark, that to honr God and to yield him obedience, his word must bear the whole sway, so as we submit ourselves wholly unto it. Mark that for one point.

Again whereas Moses says This day; it is a summoning of the people to follow without delay when God calls them. For is it a small matter that God communicates himself so familiarly unto us? Then is it not for us to require space to deliberate: but as soon as God opens his mouth, by and by we must gie ear to him, and be comfortable to his word out of hand without delay, by submitting ourselves thereunto. And not only this place serves to warn us how forward we ought to be to follow his Law: but also we hear how it is said in the Psalm, To day if you hear his voice: so that our Lord generally means that as soon as men hear him speak, they should by and by follow his saying, and fashion themselves thereafter. And the Apostle in the third Chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, shows us what is meant by this word To day: Namely the very same times wherein our Lord is so gracious as to send us his word, whatsoever these times be. Therefore let us not delay till tomorrow, for it were too great a mockery: and it may be that the gate shall be shut against us. Seeing then that God speaks unto us to day, let us give ear unto him readily and without any delay. That is the thing which we have to bear in mind. And therefore when we come to a Sermon, or read the holy scripture by ourselves, as soon as we have heard a sentence, let us enter into our own consciences: and if we find any sloth there, let us waken and quicken up ourselves, and think thus: what? It is not dallying with god in this case, it is not for us to defer to come unto him when he calls us, but we must answer him with such readiness, as the thing that is commanded us here by Moses may be performed, so as we bury not Gods word, nor suffer it to hang in the hook; but receive it into our hearts at the first, that it may take good root there, and bring forth fruit. Thus you see what we have to mark upon this word This day, or To day.

Now let us proceed to that which Moses adds. Without adding ought to it, (says he) or without taking ought from it. And this is the excellent text to show us how men's lives may be well ordered. I have told you before, that it is a good trial of our subjection unto God, when we receive his word, and that his commandments bear such sway with us, as we bow down our necks to receive the yoke that he lays upon them. But that were not sufficient, unless we had that which Moses adds here, which is that it is not lawful for us to add any whit to the things that God commands, nor to take any whit from them, as the Papists do in these days, who bear themselves in hand that they cannot do amiss in mingling their own follies with God's word. And why so? For we do as GOD commands us, say they. We deny not by that we ought to keep God's Laws; but what harm is it for us to do more? If we use some devotion of overplus, will not God take it in good worth? If I do more than I am bound to do, why should not God accept it in good part? I may well do whatsoever he appoints: yea, & I will add somewhat more to serve him withal. When the Papists get such a shrouding sheet, they bear themselves in hand that all their matters go very well, but in the meanwhile they consider not that God will have none to be counted wise but himself, nor none to have the authority to be our Lawgiver but himself. The Papists then do blasphemy GOD two ways: first in taking upon them to be holier than he would have them to be. For when we devise means of our own head to please God withal after that fashion; it is all one as if he had not been well advised in the matter. Behold God says that all our wisdom must consist in hearkening unto him. We have seen it in the fourth chapter and also in the tenth, where it is said, O Israel, what is it that thy God commands thee but only to stick to him, and to be wholly his. Hereby we see how it was God's intent to comprise that sum of all holiness and righteousness in his Law, so as it is a full perfection whereunto nothing can be added. Nevertheless men think and suppose that they themselves can do yet much better. And what is that to say? Is it not a blaming of God, as who should say he had forgotten himself, and foresaw not all things? Verily that is a cursed and devilish blasphemy. Therefore, let not the Papists boast their serving of God: for the devil is their founder, and God disavows all that ever they do. For he may always reply against them and say, who required these things at your hands? And not without cause: for their so doing is all one as if they charged God with envy towards men, as who would say he had not faithfully taught them all things that were for their behoove to do. And I pray you is that blasphemy tolerable?

But there is yet another point which I glanced at. For those who may be put both into one. The other point then is, that they utterly deface the sovereign dominion that God has over us. For thus do they allege: very well, God has ordained by his law, that we should keep his commandments, Statutes and Ordinances, but yet is it not amiss to add moreover what I myself would have done. But if a private person should fall to mingle of the inventions of his own brain, with the statutes that are set forth by public authority, should he not trouble the whole order of the commonweal? And as for such as took part with him, should they not show themselves to be rebels to their superiors? Now our Lord says by his prophet Esay that he himself will be known to be our only lawgiver. That is a title which he challenges to himself. Seeing then that God will be our only Lawmaker, what shall we say when men do thrust themselves into his place? Is it not more than to confound heaven and earth together? And surely Saint James expresses yet better the same thing that was said by the Prophet Esay. For he says that there is but only one lawgiver which is able to save and condemn. When men are set up in state and authority of making Laws to govern ourselves by, I means as touching the spiritual government; (for we treat not here of civil Laws, but of the serving of God;) when men (I say) are so highly exalted or take so highly upon them: it is all one as if they bereaved God of the title of Savior and Judge. For if he be not the only Lawmaker, Saint James concludes that he is not the only Judge, nor the party that has power alone to condemn us or to save us. And what a presumption is it that the creature should proceed so far, as to father our salvation upon wretched carcases and earthworms, which is to be fathered alone upon God? So then let us mark well, that whereas Moses has told us here that it is not Lawful for us to add any whit to the things that God commands in his Law: thereby he condemns all the devotions that ever were invented by the world. It will seem strange why God has so strictly forbidden men to add anything to his Law: but ought not the reasons to suffice which I will allege? Verily the world condemns itself by his own mouth. Has this proverb been invented in our time? Has it not been ever a common saying among the Papists to say, Thou art the devils servant, for thou do more than thou art bidden? This manner of speech has been used a hundred year before we were born: It has been a common word. And what have the Papists done? They have let the commandments of God alone, to run gadding after their own inventions, and gewgaws: And yet nevertheless they say daily still, Thou art the devils servant. If a Master be angry with his servant for leaving the thing undone which he had commanded him; to do the thing which he had conceived in his own imagination, and he things to content his Master in saying: I have done better than you were aware of: thou art the devils servant (will his master say) for thou has done more than was commanded thee. And I pray thee, what art thou? Thou do the like to God. For thou will need serve him after your own fashion, without regard what he has commanded you.

And therefore let us bear in mind, that forasmuch as GOD is robbed of his honor, and the creatures set themselves in his judgment seat, when they take upon them to make Laws for the establishing of a spiritual government: God declares that he will take horrible vengeance of it, and deal terribly with them. And why so? Even because they have served him after the commandments of men, and not held themselves to his single word, and therefore he will blind the wisest of them, so as they shall be destitute of all reason, and become so brutish that they shall not be able to discern anything at all. Is not this enough to make the hair stand upon our head? What is to be done then? Let us follow this saying: That obedience is better than sacrifice. Lo here a sentence that needs to glose. The Papists show themselves to be far past shame in these days, in that they will needs maintain of that idol, and still continue in their willfulness of following their own fond devotions, which have to any foundation in Gods word. Behold, our Lord requires but obedience, that is to say that men should submit themselves to his truth, and be contented with that which he commands. And the declaration hereof is delivered us here by Moses in two words; that is to wit, that they should neither add nor diminish ought at all in Gods word; but that when God speaks, they should receive his sayings with quiet obedience, saying: Yea Lord, all this is just and rightful, there is not anything to be gainsaid in any one point. Again, thou Lord has set us bounds within the which it behooves us to hold ourselves and not presume to say, this is good, or I will do this more than is commanded me. No, but we must assure ourselves that our true wisdom and perfect fondness, is to submit ourselves meekly to thy word. If we have that, let us not doubt but that God allows our whole life. And if we swerve never so little from it; we shall not only be utterly disliked of him, but also provoke his vengeance against us.

But now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us to perceive them better, so as it may bring us to a true and lively repentance. And because we be so much inclined to follow our own inventions, it may please him not to suffer such hardness of heart in us, as may mark us to turn away from his commandments, but rather that everyone may submit ourselves to his word, and frame ourselves wholly thereafter, that being void of all overweening of our own wit and discretion, we may suffer ourselves to be guided and governed by his hand: and specially that when he sends us preachers to show us his will, he vouchsafe us such grace, as we may submit ourselves thereunto, so as we may not only receive his word when it is preached by the voice of men, but also have it written in our hearts by his holy Ghost. That it may please him to grant his grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of earth. &c.

On Friday the 11th of October 1555
The 86th Sermon which is the first upon the thirteenth Chapter

If there rise up among you a Prophet is a dreamer of dreams, which gives the sign or a miracle;

2 And the sign or miracle which he has told thee, comes to pass: and he say unto thee, let us walk after other Gods which you have not know, and let us serve them:

3 Thou shall not hearken to the words of that Prophet, or dreamer of dreams; For the Lord your God tries you, to weet if you love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul.

Where god shows what steadfastness of faith ought to be in those that have been taught by his word namely even such as may be able to withstand all the lies and sleights of Satan, so as they be not hindered by any false doctrines or errors; but may continue always in the truth. For if we received his word when it is preached unto us, and yet it had no hold in us: but that we should turn aside from that which we had learned as soon as we perceived anything to the contrary: what a thing were it? It is said that faith must be the victory whereby to overcome the whole world: for so does Saint John speak thereof in his first Epistle. And if we yield to every wind, so as every blast of untruth is enough to withdraw us from God: our faith will soon be overcome; and where is then our victory? Therefore let us mark that when GOD grants us the grace to be taught by his word; it is not only to the end we should learn the things that are spoken, and bear them in mind for a while; but also to the end we should stay upon them, and be so grounded upon them, that if all the troubles of the world should rise up against us, we should still hold our won, and continue steadfast and invincible. If this were said to the people of old time, which had not so large instruction by a great deal as we have: much more does it belong to us nowadays. God gave the Jews sufficient instruction, so far forth as was requisite for their welfare. That is true: but yet did he teach them under shadows and figures, which manner of teaching was darksome in comparison of that which we have nowadays. For in the Gospel we have the sun of righteousness shining as it were at noontide. So then, Gods word must serve us, not only so show us the right way, but also to enable us to withstand all the temptations of Satan and his upholders. We must (say I) be so armed, as we may fight and put back all errors and falsehood, so as after we have once known God, we may stick to him steadfastly to the uttermost. And that is the cause why Saint Paul treating of the use of the Gospel, says that we must not be like little babes which are drawn too and for, so as we should no sooner see any trifling toy to beguile us, but we should by and by be gadding after it: and what a thing were that? But we must (says he) be so settled in the faith, that if there come any cou siners that go about to lead us by craft, and to deceive us, we may be fenced against them, and not be shaken by them oversoon. True it is that we must needs have a begetting in our Lord Jesus Christ, and that at the first our faith may be so weak, that we shall be like little babes: but we must grow still, and daily gather new strength, until we come to mans estate that we be perfect to meet with our Lord Jesus Christ. Thus you see what force the doctrine of truth ought to have, when it is taught us. That is to wit, we must not only count it good in consenting to it; but also be so well assured of it, that the devil, do what he can, may not be able to remove us, by reason of the certainty which we have, whereby we be enabled to beat back whatsoever shall be set against us. And doubtless we see by the example of our Lord Jesus Christ, that such as have been faithfully taught, may well repulse all the wiles of Satan. For when Jesus Christ was tempted, wherewith armed he himself but with the holy Scripture? We see that if there rise up never so many false Prophets among us, yet if we be thoroughly well grounded in faith, and settled in it as we ought to be: we shall continue steadfast and the devil shall win nothing at our hands. True it is that now and then we shall find some impediments; (for Gods servants shall be sure of trouble, that serves to humble them:) but yet whatsoever it be, their faith is always the better proved by errors, heresies, and such other like things, whereby our Lord shows that we have profited well in his school, and that we can never be led away unto wickedness, whatsoever be tides. Also we hear what Saint Paul says, when he arms us against all spiritual battles that may befall us: he gives us the sword of Gods word, he delivers us the shield of faith, and he gives us the helmet of hope. And thereupon he infers, that we shall not only be enabled to withstand all the assaults that Satan can make upon us, but also be defended from his fiery darts when there is no likelihood for us to escape from his subtleties. Now therefore, whensoever the Gospel is preached unto us, or that we read the holy scripture, let us learn not only to receive the things as true which are told us out of the mouth of God, but also to be so fully resolved of them in ourselves, as we may not be trained unto wickedness nor turned aside from the right way when the devil stirs up any heresies. And so you see what is told us in this text. For our Lord things it not enough that the faithful should serve him and hold them to his truth when they be in quiet and without temptation; but also he will have them to yield such trust unto his word, that if the devil fall to sowing of the darnel to mar all, and wicked men rise up to deface the truth by all means they can, and to turn it into lies: such as have learned what the true religion means, should not change nor be fickle and inconstant, but show that the things which they know are of God, and an abiding truth, so as it is not for men to swerve or start from them in any wise.

Now then, let us bear this warning in mind, and every of us examine himself; and when we have once understood the things that have been told us, and are necessary to our salvation: let us not imaging ourselves to have a perfect and right faith as is requisite, unless we be so constant and fully resolved in the things that our Lord has showed us, that we abide by it and follow our course still, whatsoever come of it. For whosoever fleets or starts aside at every matter, shows that he never know Jesus Christ as he ought to do. And therefore Saint Paul in another place uses two similitude to show what force Gods word ought to be with us, to hold us fast unto him in his obedience. He says that we must be thoroughly grounded and rooted. For many have a kind of faith: but that is but in outward show and appearance: as for inwardly it has no lively nor deep root. For if a man have but a fair branch covered with flowers, to what purpose is that? One blast of wind will deface it. But if a tree be well planted, the root of it will hold it fast in the midst of all storms. Even so must we be rooted in our Lord Jesus Christ, and we must be thoroughly well grounded upon him, so as men may perceive not only that we have knowledge, but also that our hearts do yield record of our plain dealing. And mark here the cause why so many men are greatly hindered and endeavor no further but to purchase themselves credit among men. When they come to a Sermon where the Gospel is preached, for the most part they think they have well profited, when they can skill to talk of it: and there are very few that have a care to be so grounded in it, as to lay it up in their hearts, that GOD may be witness of it: there are very few that endeavor to attain to the steadiness. And therefore does God abhor that foolish vain gloriousness, where through men seek but only to win themselves estimation, by setting a fair face and countenance upon this matter.

And therefore let us mark in few words, that Gods word ought to serve us to double purpose. First to teach us his will, that we may submit ourselves simply unto it: so that when we have the grace given us to have the doctrine purely taught us, then every of us should agree thereunto, and hearken to the voice of our shepherd, and follow whatsoever is told us, without gainsaying. The thing which we must do when we have order in the Church, so as there be no sects nor troubles in it, but God's truth is purely preached is, that there must be true concord and brotherly love among us, to answer our God all with one heart and one mouth, that his truth may be advanced among us. The second use thereof is, that when it falls out that Satan endeavors to turn us away, and there spring up heresies, false doctrines and errors among us: we must withstand all such things, and show that Gods truth is strong enough to hold us still unto him; according to my former saying that our faith must get the upper hand of all the world, so as we be stark deaf in hearkening to any of all the wiles that are put to us to entice us from GOD and his pure truth. Thus you see in effect what is told us in this text.

And let us mark well Mosses' manner of speech. If a prophet step up among you says he. Hereby he shows that we must not only withstand the open enemies that fight against Gods word, and pretend not at all to be of his flock, or to have any partnership or neighborhood with us: but also resist our homebred battles, insomuch that if there rise up any deceiver among ourselves, that is to say if any such as makes pretence to be of the fellowship of the faithful, and to be as it were of the very household faith, step up: we must not be troubled at it out of measure. And that is well worthy to be noted, for if the Christian faith be impugned by the wicked, which pretend not to come unto God, (as by the Turks, Paynims, and Jews) so as they blaspheme with open mouth: forasmuch as they be utterly cut off from the Church like rotten members, their resisting of the Gospel, and their striving to abolish the Christian religion, is no great wonder to us. For why? We be as it were hardened with such examples. Therefore when the open enemies set themselves against God and his word, it is a temptation that will easily be overcome. But when those that are knit unto us, and are as it were of our own body, do fall to tearing of the unity of our faith in pieces, to pervert Gods truth, and to mare it in such wise as it should be disfigured: that is such a perplexity and grief to us, as we wote not where to become. And that is the thing that troubles so many simple folks nowadays. What shall we do, say they? For we see so much disputing in the Church, and so great diversity of opinions, that it were better to ask no question of anything, insomuch that a great number become careless, for fear to be entangled in wicked matters and to be beguiled, and therefore they let all alone, and will not in any wise come near unto God. We see a great sort of men of that stamp. Other some let loof the raynes of the bridle, and take liberty to maintain one while one mans saying and another while another mans, and are never fully persuaded of anything; but are in one mind today, and in another mind tomorrow, and change at every minute of an hour.

We see a number of wild heads nowadays which have no stay at all, but think that all things are lawful. And why? For I see there are diverse opinions, say they. But such men do show that they never tasted what Gods truth is. The first sort do well bewray a cursed unbelief. For our Lord promises that such as seek him with a lovely heart, shall not be disappointed, but he will show himself to them. Lt us knock, and the door shall be opened. If we desire reverently to be guided by God, surely he will not fail us. Let us distrust our own infirmity and rudeness; and our Lord will give us the spirit of discretion, so as we shall not be beguiled. To be short this saying of Saint Paul which I have alleged already heretofore shall ever be performed; namely, that heresies shall turn to the true trial of our faith, and not be able to overthrow it. For as touching those that are so fleeting without cause; they show that there was nothing in them but a false pretence and that they did but play the hypocrites in making a countenance to stick to Gods truth; for had they been well rooted in it, as I said, they would have continued steadfast in it still.

To conclude, let such examples provoke us to put this lesson the better in use. And when we see the troubles that are nowadays in the world, let us not be overcome by them, neither let our faith be defaced. But the more the devil labors and insomuch himself to undo it, the more let it advance itself and get the upper hand of such assaults. And when we see false prophets step up among us, let us not cease to yield this honor still to God, that we hold ourselves to his word, and start not from it by any means. And very necessity constrains us to it in these days, because we see that such as call themselves Christians and take that title most upon them, are the worst enemies of God that a man can find. For the Turks and Jews are not more fiery and venomous at this day against God, to deface the whole doctrine of salvation; than are the Papists. And therefore let us arm ourselves with the warning that is given us here. Which is, that when we see false prophets step up in the sheepfold and in the middes of Gods house: yet notwithstanding we must not fail to hold on still, nor make a stumbling block of it to step aside or start away, but overgo it through the power of faith. Yea, and to come yet nearer the matter, when we see these varlets that had pretended to be at odds with the Papists, and had mingled themselves among us, do thereupon fall to inventing of false opinions: let us not be overmuch amazed for all that. True it is that we be not senseless, and that we have need to be waked: but yet must we always conclude thus with ourselves: How now? Our Lord has been so gracious to us as to open his own holy mouth to give us the certainty of faith by his Gospel: and shall we now turn away at every push? After that manner (say I) must we withstand all the temptations that may befall us, when deceivers and false fellows step up among us, of purpose to deface by their subtlety the pure doctrine that has been preached to us, and wherein we have been trained up.

Now first of all it is said, Thou shall not hearken to the Prophet when he says unto thee, Let us go and serve other gods which thou has not known. It behooves us to wey well all these words of Moses: For here he speaks to all believers. He speaks not only to the great doctors that have been at the university all the life long, but also to the unlearned. Although then that we be no clerks, yet let us learn that we must have this constancy of faith, of not following the wiles of Satan to be withdrawn from our God when he has been so gracious unto us, as to communicate himself to us. We must not say, Alas, I have no learning, nor fineness of wit to be so cunning; every man has not like measure. I grant that every man is not of ability to enter into disputation against sophisters, and against such as are full fraught with malice to deceive the simple: but yet, all men from the most to the least ought to have this invincible steadfastness of sticking unto God and his truth when they once know it. There is no excuse in that case. For it is not in vain that God has set down this general law for all his church. And it is certain also that he will give us power, so we resort to him, and seek to him for succor. For what is the cause why so many folk are seduced, but only their won fond presumption, or their negligence, or else their contempt of Gods word? For you shall see some stand so much in their own conceits, as (to their own seeming) no man is able to overmatch them: and yet for all that, they are but silly beasts. Our Lord therefore does blow away their pride, as men may perceive: and experience shows that God punishes many folks pride, which had too great an overweening of themselves. Now then, what is to be done? Let us humble ourselves and pray God to govern us so by his holy spirit, and to give us such wisdom, as we may not be taken tardy when the devil goes about to make a breach into us to enter at. If we go that way to work, let us assure ourselves that God will guide us, and that we shall never be caught in Satan snares. But there are many that keep on their race without care, as though they were privileged from all dangers. But let us for our part keep good watch, and have such a care to ward ourselves, as the deceivers (when they come) may not find us asleep. And that will so be, if we bear such reverence to Gods word, as we acknowledge it to be the precious treasure that we have. For if a man make so little reckoning of a thing, that he leave it t all adventure: the first that comes may rob him of it: but as for him that locks up his goods, (specially those that are the chief and which he counts to be most worth[̃] he cannot be so bereft of them. And therefore let us put our faith in good custody, and be so wary in the keeping of it, as [it may appear] that we have it in such estimation as it deserves; for it is an inestimable treasure. Thus you see what we have to note here, where Moses speaks to all such as had tasted what Gods law is, exempting no man from standing stoutly in battle and defense against the liars and sleights of Satan.

Now he adds, If he say unto thee, Let us follow strange gods, which thou hast not known. This serves to show us who be false prophets. For God tells us that we cannot withstand the wiles of Satan, without the knowledge of the truth: that is the only mean. And no marvel though the wretched world nowadays be allured to destruction: for Gods word is as it were buried: and when men are destitute of that light. It is certain that they be in horrible darkness, so as they cannot but stumble and stay here and there, because they have no certain aim at anything. But here our Lord declares that we must be instructed in his word; and thereunto also is this saying after a sort referred. For he presupposes that we be in a good trade already, and that we know the way of salvation: accordingly as Moses will protest hereafter; saying, I have showed you're the way of life and the way of death. Now therefore, whensoever we will resist false prophets, and their lies, let us take us the doctrine of truth. And that is the cause why it is said, The gods which thou hast not known. For in this case, we must match the living God whom we have known, against all the idols which the world has forged to itself. For God speaks not to such as never heard nor understood anything of him before: but to such as he had given his law unto, whom he had given an infallible rule. When he has so fenced men forehand, then says he unto them, Beware that you follow not the gods whom you have not been acquainted with.

To be short then, it is showed us that this doctrine concerns such as have been duly instructed in the faith. Will we beat back all Satan's devices? Let us have the skill to say, It is God that has certified u s, he is a faithful witness to us, we need not to be in doubt or uncertainty anymore, or to cast doubts, or to say, What? Which way shall we go? We may well assure ourselves that this is the way, that is the thing which we must stay upon. That in effect is the order which we have to keep, according as it is showed us in this text.

But let us mark also, that we must have our ears so stopped, as we may utterly dislike whatsoever may cause us to swerve to the contrary of those things which we have learnt by Gods word. For as soon as we give ear to hem, by and by we be half corrupted, according to this similitude which Saint Paul alleges in the second to the Corinthians, that when a woman gives ear to a bawd or a Russian, although she consent not to him out of hand, yet is she already perverted, and it is already an evil token. For if a woman be shamefast, she will in any wise shun all such messages as may be brought to her to entice her to folly and to make her to break wedlock. She must eschew such manner of things. Now Saint Paul says, that as long as we bide in the simplicity of the Gospel, we be as a chaste wife that keeps her faith and troth to her husband, and that our Lord Jesus Christ who has made such covenant with us, to choose us to be of his body, taken and receives us for his own. But if we hearken to the lies and trumperies that are brought unto us; and we refuse not to learn what Darnel is: it is an evil sign, and we be corrupted already. And therefore let us bear well in mind, that we ought so little to consent to false prophets, as we should not in any wise give ear unto them, but shun them a far off, as soon as we perceive that they go about to deceive us and to entice us to naughtiness. And to say the truth, this cursed curiosity has been the cause of many men's destruction. For it seems to many high minded persons, that all things should pass the trial of their wit: and that when they have sifted things after their own imagination, they may follow whatsoever they themselves think good, for they be able enough to discern the truth of all things. But when our Lord finds such over boldness in them, he puts them to confusion. The truth is, that they would so enquire of all things, as nothing might escape them: insomuch as they could find in their hearts to mingle Mahomets Alcoan, and all the dotages of the Heathen, and all the superstitions of the Papists with the pureness of the Gospel, and to make a medley of them, that when they had well clouted them together in their own brain, they might say, This is the thing that is good. But our Lord (as I said afore) cannot abide that men should trust so to their own wits. And again on the other side, he cannot abide such injury to be done to his word, as that it should be matched with the wiles of Satan, so as it might be said, now will I choose what likes me best.

It is too high a mounting for men to make themselves judges and umpires of Gods truth, which the Angels do honor with all reverence. Needs therefore must such men fall into horrible destruction. And therefore let us beware that we bridle ourselves, so as our minds wander not out into fond curiosity. And as soon as we perceive that the devil does about to falsify Gods pure truth, let us stop our ears, and not hearken to any such thing, but utterly abhor it.

Now moreover Moses says, That although the false prophets show some sign or miracle, & the same comes to pass, yet must not men give ear unto them. Here he shows that we must have such constancy and steadfastness in our faith, as it may not be overthrown though there be never so great occasion of stumbling. As for example, if there be such an illusion of Satan, that a false prophet say unto us, such a thing shall come to pass, and it comes to pass indeed: then are we at our wits end, and it is enough to overthrow our whole building though it were never so well built, unless God work on our side above the power of man's ability. But yet howsoever the world go, Gods truth must be of such force with us as to hold us back against all such temptation, so as if the devil bring an illusion, he may not gain anything at our hands, nor prevail against us.

And let us mark, that before that Moses says so: he gives us a sure declaration of false prophets, that is to say, of such as go about to turn us from the true God, whom we have once known, and wrap us in wicked superstitions wherein there is no reason. If any such thing befall us, no marvel through our Lord will have us to resist all that ever the devil puts to us to blear our eyes withal, yea, even though there be false miracles, in so much that although all that the false prophet or deceiver foretells, do come to pass; yet must we not be led away by it. We see then in effect what the meaning of Moses is, that we must be so well sensed by gods word, that although the devil rush against us with never so great violence, and work all the means he can to beguile us; yet we must not be overcome, but our faith must be as a well garded fortress, that notwithstanding any assault, or any battrie made against us, yet it may ward all blows, and be able to save itself from being vanquished by any enemies.

And now let us mark, that if God send such false miracles; it is not to entrap those that are his; but to punish such as have not believed the Gospel, as Saint Paul speaks thereof in the second to the Thessalonians. And therefore does Moses also add, Then is it Gods will to try thee whether thou love him with all thy heart and all thy soul or no. It is a saying that deserves to be well marked. For first Moses does us to understand, that such things happen not without the ordinance of God: and secondly he shows the end or reason wherefore: namely that the faithful may have wherewith to be confirmed, knowing well that God will give them constancy to hold out, thou the temptation be never so rough and violent. Those are the two things which we have to remember here. First, it is said, God tries thee. Hereby he shows, that Satan has no power over us, nor can sow any wicked weeds, further forth than God gives him leave. And that is a very needful thing for us to mark. For were we persuaded that the door were open for Satan, and that all errors might spring up at all adventure, and that God over ruled them not: alas what a thing were it? For we see how mad the devil is to overthrow all truth: we see with what fury he goes to work when he is to fight against the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ: and we see what spite he bears to our salvation. And therefore things would go too much to havoc if God wrought not to hinder Satan of his full scope, that he might not set up his lies among us. Wherefore let us understand, that whensoever there is any trouble, division, or diversity of opinion in the Church, the same happens not at all adventure, but God works from above, and overrules the whole matter, according to this protestation of Moses, Thy God tries thee. you see then that by knowing that God holds us under his hand, we be assured that no errors or abuses can have access unto us, unless so far forth as our Lord give them access. And mark it for a special point, to the end we think not that the devil reigns at his own pleasure, and does all things as it were whether God will or no: for he must be fain to have leave of his master.

And now let us come to that which Moses adds concerning the end and reason why God does it: For we may think it strange. What? That God should tire us? That errors should be said to come so of God? Then is he the author of lying. Again, does God stir up the devil unto evil? Then might we take occasion of stumbling at it. Yea; but in as much as Moses adds that God does it for just cause, the stumbling block is taken away. He says that God temps us, that is to say, that he tries us. After what manner? Whether we love the Lord our God or no. And hereby he shows, (as I have declared heretofore) that if we have a right meaning and pure heart, and have received his truth without hypocrisy, he will help us at our need, and we shall be upheld by his power, so as Satan may well strain himself to the uttermost, but the victory shall always go on our side. And this is the thing that I have touched out of Saint Paul where he says, that all the false miracles which befall under the reign of Antichrist. (as many have been seen) are all revengements of God, to punish such as would not obey his truth. And it is good reason that Satan should drive them to destruction, sith they would not open their eyes at such time as God would have enlightened them. And seeing they have thrust all good doctrine under foot; it is meet that they should be deceived by lies.

But let us come back again to the words of Moses. He says that we be tried, to weete if we love the Lord our God. Hereby he shows, that God puts a difference between the hypocrites and such as serve him in fondness of heart, as such time as heresies spring up and that there is trouble and disagreement. And why? For it is certain that such as love God are preserved by the power of his holy Ghost, and that the troubles which they sustain are a good proof and sealing up of their faith, whereby the same is made authentic. God shows by effect how he has wrought in them, and that they be in very deed of the number of those whom he has chosen. So then let us understand, that all the errors and heresies which the devil shall have sowed among us, shall be turned to good end to all God's children. So far off is it that they bring us any hurt or harm, that they serve ever to make our faith shine the brighter, and to warrant us that God has succored us, and that he will have the same known to the whole world, so as he may be glorified for it. And we also have the more cause to rest upon him with the greater certainty of faith, and to trust that he will never fail us.

For as much then as we see that our Lord works in such wise as he turns darkness into light, and deadly poison to our health: have we not whereof to rejoice? And ought we not to be patient albeit that troubles do vex us for a time, and that we have much ado to resist? Yet ought not our hearts to quail, seeing that God gives it so happy an issue. Thus much concerning the first point; that is to wit, that if we love God with all our heart, that is to say, roundly and fondly and without counter saying: he will not suffer us to be beguiled: but whensoever Satan comes to sow troubles and heresies, we shall be confirmed still better and heresies, we shall be confirmed still better and better, and profit in such wise, as we shall never be overcome. And therewithal we shall have the better proof that we be of the number of his servants, and of those whom he has committed to the custody of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that we shall see this saying fulfilled, that he will never suffer any of the things to perish, which his father has put into his hand. We see then how our Lord Jesus Christ is the keeper of our salvation; and that we find the thing by experience which Saint Peter says; namely that our salvation is kept in heaven by faith, and that we ourselves also shall get the upper hand of all the temptations which the devil stirs up against us, by sowing such cockle and darnel to the prejudice of Gods truth.

But let us mark also, that such as are wind shaken, do show that they never wist what it is to love God with all their hearts, and that there was nothing in them but vanity and hypocrisy. And therefore when we see men seduced, let us not wonder as though God were cruel to them. For it was meet that their hypocrisy should be discovered. They meant to mock God, and used a kind of varnishing and painting to make a show of that which they were not: and God bewrayes that they were indeed. Now therefore, whereas we see the wretched world so carried nowadays into darkness, superstition and idolatry, we must not think that they do it of mere simplicity, as though they were innocent and faultless, and that god had given Satan they bridle without cause: but we must rather consider that God with just vengeance punishes the unkindness of such as had neither purpose nor desire unto him.

Truth it is, that a man shall see some outward shew of holiness in a number of those that are seduced in the Popedome and elsewhere. But yet for all that, they be double hearted, and God perceives what they be in secret. So then, let us understand that God is a just Judge, and let us glorify him for his punishing of such as loved him not fondly in their hearts as they should have done. That is the thing which we have to note.

And indeed, experience shows it in such as turn back and fall to naughtiness after they have once known the Gospel. We have seen here that when Satan underlings have come hither to set troubles in the Church, those that have been seduced by them have known them well enough of old, and not now of late, for I speak of the space of eighteen years. Since the troubling of this Church, divers sects have been seen, and still God has been fain to show and to point these out with his finger, which had nothing in them but dissimulation and hypocrisy, how fair countenance so ever they did make. And I say that this has been known now these eighteen years; insomuch that even they that have pretended to be great upholders of the Gospel, are well known to me how they have behaved themselves and I could rehearse their doings if need were, but it is enough to give men an inclining of them, that others might take example by them. When the Anabaptists came hither to infect all, there was great cheer made them in the townhouse, and this was about an eighteen years ago. True it is, that men were constrained to reprove their doctrine openly: but yet in the meanwhile they were still chock under the chin; and instead of resisting them lustily, feasts were made to entertain them with. And since that time, we have seen in our own days, (and than not long ago) how other heretics have been favored at their coming hither, and specially how that horrible blasphemer was supported. And by whom? By such as had so long despised God, that in the end their shame was of necessity to be discovered. They protested sufficiently that their desire was to hve the Gospel: but that was the gospel of Mahomet to turn all things upside down, and to bring all things to confusion. For the world has seen how far they overshot themselves; insomuch that they took part against God and his word. Now sith we have such examples, let us learn to live in fear and wariness, and always come back to that which is told us here, that is to wit, that is not without cause that our Lord says, that he tries and examines such as were disguised afore: and that when he suffers false prophets to be stirred up by Satan, to sow their darnel among us, it is to tire us whether we love him with all our heart or no. And therefore let us proceed more and more in the fear of God, accordingly as it is said here, that we must serve him and obey his holy commandments, not doubting but that he will make us to get the upper hand in all assaults and conflicts wherewith we be assailed, so as we shall be sure of the victory, because he will fight for us.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may not proceed to provoke his wrath through our unthankfulness; but that seeing he has given us the infinite treasure of his holy word, whereby we have full assurance of our salvation; we may embrace it with all reverence and live in such pureness of heart before him, as he may bestow his riches more and more upon us and make us partakers of them, and that we may walk the whole race of our life after such sort in his obedience, as we may moreover resist all our enemies, and by the power of the spiritual sword of his word, and of the shield of faith, beat back all the assaults that shall be made upon us. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

On Saturday the 12th of October 1555
The 87th Sermon, which is the second upon the thirteenth chapter

2.3 And the sign or miracle, &c.

4 You shall walk after the Lord your God, and fear him, and keep his commandments, and obey his voice, and serve him, and stick to him:

5 but that Prophet or dreamer of dreams shall be put to death: for he has spoken to turn you from the Lord your God (which has brought you out of the land of Egypt, and delivered you from the house of bondage) and to thrust thee out of the way which the Lord thy God has commanded thee to walk in. And so shall you rid away the evil from among you.

We saw yesterday wherefore God gives the bridle to Satan, in such wise, that he sows many errors and corruptions, not only in the world, but also in the Church. For it is good reason that our faith should be tried, to weete whether we live in uprightness, fondness, and love before our God, or whether there be any fainedness in us. And there is not a truer trial thereof, than when we come to the encounter to know, whether Gods truth ought to be invincible against all errors and leasings. And therefore let it not offend us when we see him sow darnel: but let us bethink us of that which is said here, namely that our Lord will search us to the hard bottom, whether we bear reverence to his word in good earnest and unfeynedly or no. Not that he knows not well enough what we be; (for it is not for himself that he does it:) but to the end that our faith should show itself, and that there should be true record thereof.

Now moreover it is told us, that we must follow Gods word and hearken to him, that we may serve him and stick to him. And this is still to show us that which I have declared afore: namely that we can never be at any stay, unless we know well what God it is whom we worship. For if we be in doubt, there needs nothing to shake us down, as we see by experience. Therefore let us learn to profit so in our Gods school, as we may not be removed by false doctrines, but may have wherewith to withstand sleights of Satan, as was declared more at large yesterday.

But let us go back again to this saying, that although the false Prophet have given some sign or foretold some wonder, and the same thing is come to pass: yet notwithstanding we must hold our own still. Here it might be demanded whether the devil can prosper or no. I stand not much upon that, it is not material: but I have answered before, that GOD is above him, and that it is his will that his Church should live in warfare, to the end that the faith of all his might exercised. Then if a deceiver foretell a thing, and the same fall out indeed: it is not to be said, but GOD has given him the bridle. Therefore it is not for us to trouble ourselves greatly, to know whether Satan foresee things to come or no. For it is very certain that notwithstanding all the craft and subtlety that is in him, yet knows he not any more than our Lord imparts unto him. And all is to deceive the unbelievers according to their desert: or else to show, that do what he can, yet shall he never get the upper hand of the chosen, as is said in other places of the scripture.

Let us then leave these needless questions, whereby many folk have deceived and entangled themselves; to wit, whether the devils do know more than men do: for it is nothing to the matter as I said afore. But rather let us understand this justice of GOD, that it is his will to punish the unbelievers, because they be never contented with the single truth, but will needs be still wandering here and there, and therefore are they worthy of such payment. Besides this, the faithful also are exercised by encounters; and that is always to their benefit, and to their welfare. For God does so preserve them, as it is not possible for them to be deceived. But as yet there remains one question more: for it is said in the eighteenth Chapter, that a man may discern a true Prophet from a deceiver by this self same mark. If a Prophet (says Moses) have foretold a thing, and the same is come to pass: you shall understand that that Prophet has spoken truly and in the name of God. But if he be found a liar in the things that he has spoken, it appears that he was puffed up with pride and presumption, and that he took too highly upon him: and therefore let him be driven away and rooted out from among you. It may seem at the first blush, that here is some contrary: but we must mark that in so saying, Moses intends to declare, that God deceives not his servants as the idols are wont to do, that is to say, as the devils have under the title of idols deceived the ignorant wretches that did put their trust in them. For they foretold lies: and the people found themselves disappointed in giving ear unto them. And that is the cause why it is said by the Prophet Esay, that the gods of the Heathen can do neither good nor evil. But our Lord separates himself there from all the gods that had been invented by mans devise, and tells us saying: It belongs to me only to show what is to come. And why? For I order all things, and I have the world in my hand; and therefore I can well tell what shall come to pass. But as for the idols, they have no power at all: and therefore how can they declare anything to such as serve and worship them? This then is true in general. And according hereunto, the Prophet Jeremy speaking to Hananiah in his eight and twentieth Chapter, confirms this saying of Moses which we shall see in the eighth Chapter of this book of Deuteronomy. I wish (says he) that the thing which thou hast foretold may come to pass. For, that liar did foade the people with vain hope. When Jeremy told them saying: you have offended your God too much, and have continued in your willfulness unto this day; I have often times warned you to come to amendment, but you would not hear me, and therefore we be come now to the last cast; think not that God will bear with you any longer, but prepare yourselves to bear the yoke and burthen; for you must be carried away to Babylon, where your state shall be miserable; Because you have forsaken your God, he has given you over to be a pray to your enemies, and therefore there is no more remedy but to dispose yourselves to patience, that this adversity may tame you, and your GOD show pity unto you at the end of the term which he has set you: Hananiah setting himself against him, said no, fear not that any such thing shall befall you. And therewithal he went and put a yoke upon his neck, in scorn of Jeremy who had worn bonds and lines about his neck. Behold (says he) I come to break the thing, that Jeremy has showed you for a sign that you must be prisoners in Babylon. Very well (said the Prophet Jeremy) I would it were so; I wish not any harm to my country folk: but yet must not thou on the other side abuse them with vain hope as thou does. Moreover, thou shall find whether it be so or no: and experience shall show whether thou be a true Prophet or no: for wheresoever foretells a thing and the same comes to pass; yields proof that he was sent of God, and that he spoke out of Gods own mouth. But if it come not to pass, it appears that all was but a lie. In that place Jeremy had an eye to the foresaid text which we shall see hereafter. You see then how it is a general rule for all of us to hold, that it belongs only to God to foretell things to come, and that such as declares those things truly, do by that token show and prove themselves to be true Prophets. Yet notwithstanding, it may well be that particularly GOD will permit a deceiver to foretell something to come. And yet does not that falsify the general rule. For why? When our Lord foretells things to come, it is to frame all men to his law: And the false prophets what say they? In abusing the people, and turning them from God, they promise them that all shall go well with them: whereas contrariwise Gods servants do always match says and amendment of life with their admonitions: and they use a kind of teaching that has a good foundation to build upon: but the speaking of the other sort is altogether in the air. Now we see how desirous the world is to be beguiled, accordingly as it is said in the Prophet Micheas, that the unbelievers do like of none but such as bring them good tidings of a good vintage or of a good harvest. For so says he expressly, when it is said unto them, You shall be fat fed, and GOD favors you, take no thought, make good cheer. Those are the things which the world desires. Nevertheless GOD will now and then permit the deceivers to speak truth: but that is but in some peculiar case, and then do they build without foundation. Therefore is that no impediment to the continual truth of this rule, that when Gods prophets foretell things to come, it is a proof to warrant their doctrine, so as men may thereby know of whom they be sent. For in very deed although there appear some truth at the first blush in the false prophets: yet notwithstanding there is no hold of it. Mark that for one special point. Again all the matter lies in the falling out, which in the end shows itself clean contrary to that which was surmised. For in the turning of a hand all things go backward, and the unbelievers find that it was but a blearing of their eyes to make them the more blockish; and that their having of some true sign was but a bait to beguile them, whereas in the mean time they ceased not to hoard up Gods wrath and vengeance still against themselves.

Then let us bear well in mind, that whereas it is said in this text, that a prophet may say something that shall come to pass afterward, and yet nevertheless not have the more warrant to be taken for a servant of GOD: the reason is, for that his matter has no ground in the word of GOD, as I have said afore: And secondly, that it is but as a bait and a peculiar case, whereof there is no hold to be taken; like as when God suffers Satan to transform himself into an Angel of light, it is to harden the unbelievers as they deserve to be. And because they would not convert, therefore must the darkness be made the thicker for them, and the devil must have all manner of effectualness of error, as says Saint Paul in the second d to the Thessalonians; insomuch that GOD not only gives him leave to deceive, as a point belonging peculiarly to his office, and as wherein he is his crafts master: but also gives him such efficacy of error, that is to say such force and power, that men are blinded by him beyond all measure. Thus you see what we have to note. And therefore we be warned in effect, to pray GOD to give us the spirit of wisdom and discretion, that we may not be snarled by Satan's lies, what color or covert of craftiness so ever he use. Mark this for one point, that men must in any wise beware of presumption. For they be not so well able to judge as were requisite. But let us resort unto God, and he will make us to discern between white and black.

Again on the contrary part, we must understand that whensoever any good is promised our, or any evil is threatened us, we must take Gods doctrine for our foundation, assuring ourselves that Gods will is not so separate his blessing and grace from his Law; and therefore that it is in vain for us to hope for favor at his hand when we have offended him. For seeing we have provoked his wrath we shall find that his threatening of us is not in vain seeing that he says in his Law, that he will persecute all such as set themselves against him; it must needs be performed. Therefore let us first lay the foundation of faith and repentance; and then shall we not be deceived as in respect of the particular prophecies, but that this rule shall always hold true, to wit, that such as speak the truth are sent of GOD. yet notwithstanding Satan will not leave off to have leave after a certain sort to deceive the unbelievers as they be worthy: but that truth is no truth (as says Saint Paul): such miracles are but illusions to deceive those that trust to them, and the end that they tend unto is but to seduce the wretched world. After the same manner also does our Lord Jesus speak of them. And therefore let us mark well that although the deceivers have a show of truth in some particular case, yet is it nothing worth: for there is no hold of it: and it is so far off from any substantial truth, that in the end it appears to be utter vanity and untruth, to deceive the wretched unbelievers withal, which are turned away from God. That is the thing in effect, which we have to mark up on this text. But howsoever the world go, if we put the things in use which are spoken here by Moses, that is to wit, if we follow the Lord and walk in the way which he shows us: we need not to fear but that we be out of all danger of being deceived by the wiliness of our enemy. Although the devil be the father of lying, and do forge an infinite number of illusions against us, and although we on our side be never so roughly assailed by him: yet will GOD preserve us, so we abide continually in the obedience of his word, and be willing to hearken to him in all cases.

But now let us come to that which Moses adds. As for the prophet (Says he) or the deceiver which shall have deceived and abused folk, to make them turn away from the Lord their God; let him be put to death, and let the evil be taken from among you. Here our Lord will have us not only to beware that we hearken not to false prophets, but also to root out such pestilent persons utterly. And therein he shows how earnest we ought to be in the maintaining of his honor. Therefore to the end we should abide in the pure singleness of faith, he had said afore, Beware that you hearken not to the false prophet. And not without cause has our Lord forbidden all his to give ear to the bringers in of new learning. For why? Sith we have the word of God, that ought to content us well enough: and if that will not satisfy us, what an unthankfulness is it? For if we will needs entangle ourselves in false doctrines, is it not a yielding of ourselves to be a pray to Satan? Do we not well deserve that God should leave us destitute of understanding, to be drawn into all errors like brute beasts? But it behooves us not only to shun false prophets and to give their subtleties no entrance into us: but also (as Saint Paul says) to be diligent in purging of Gods Church from them, that such a plague be not nourished among us. And truly if we knew our own frailty, and considered well on the other side what Satan is able to do against us: it is certain that we would stand more upon our gard than we be wont to do. True it is (as I have said already) that we would fain repose and stay ourselves upon GOD, so as we might not minister any occasion to Satan to beguile us; and surely if we through our own fond desire of seeking lies, did not cast ourselves into Satan snares, we should be sure that GOD would always preserver us. But forasmuch as we be too too weak, and Satan needs no more but to hold up his finger to us, to carry us out of hand from the right way of salvation: in respect thereof we ought so much the more to seek the remedies whereby to prevent the mischief. Again let us consider what Satan is able to do: He is the prince of this world, and therefore we shall soon be overtaken by him, the rather if we be slothful, careless, or negligent. Then is it not without cause that our Lord warns us to take so good order, as such a plague may not lurk among us; that is to wit, that we may not have deceivers to beguile the simple, and to mar them by turning them from the pure truth. For it is a likelihood that we would fain be turned away from GOD, when we give the mischief such scope. If there were a breach in our town wall, and our enemies were at hand or that we were already besieged, so as we looked for the assault every minute of an hour; would we not provide for it? Now the case stands so with us, that our enemy is not only at hand, but also is entered in already. When we hear his lies, and withstand them not, nor make account of them; we may seem to be willfully disposed to perish, as we be worthy. And as touching us that are shepherds, it stands us in hand to have a double voice. For we must gather together the sheep as much as is possible: and when they be in the flock, we must keep them there quietly. But if there be wolves also, and thieves that that would invade the flock: against those we must cry out aloud. And yet besides this, such as have the sword in their hand, must provide for it also, and every man to his power must strain himself to keep Gods Church from infecting with such poison, that the devil may not have his full scope to falsify the pure truth, to advance himself against GOD, to overthrow the right religion, and (at a word) to turn all things upside down: but we must let these things as much as we can. Wherefore let us mark, that it was Gods will that false prophets should be rooted out from among this people. Now at the first sight this Law seems to be over strait: for is it meet that a man should be punished so for speaking his mind? Verily it is a wonder that we can abide that one should be punished for speaking against a mortal man, and that when a man shall have blasphemed the living GOD, we could find in our hearts that he should scape unpunished. It appears that what zeal is in them, which would have such rigor abolished. If a Prince be misused, men will think that death is too small a thing for the offender and that the fact cannot be sufficiently revenged, insomuch that whosoever speaks against the princes authority shall be punished, and no man will speak against it. If a man be found so wicked as to procure a rebellion, or to raise an insurrection among the people, very well, he must loose his head for it, and no man will say that such a Law is unjust or wicked. And why? Because it serves for the maintenance of the state and common weal of the Country. And yet for all this, whereas GOD has the sovereign dominion of all, a worm of the earth shall set himself against him, and go about to robe him of his honor, and to deface his majesty and authority; and yet all this shall be as nothing, it shall be let flip, and because it is but words, there is no reason why such punishment should ensue of it. But they that say so, do well show that they have no love at all towards GOD, but (which worse is) that they could find in their hearts that all things were confounded together in a hotchpotch, so as men might scoff at GOD and at his majesty, and turn all religion into a mockery and scorn. To be short, whosoever he is that speaks so: he is not to be taken for an ignorant person, seeing he would that false doctrines should be unpunished: but rather he is to be counted a despiser of GOD, and an upholder of the devil which seeks nothing else but the turning of all things upside down in the world. For our part, let us learn to have Gods honor in such estimation, that whereas we revenge the wrongs done to men, we think it much more reason that the party should be punished which violates the majesty of him that has created and fashioned us. And the matter concerns not only the honor of God, but also the salvation of our own souls: for they be things inseparable. And that ought well to whette us on the more, not to bear with the errors and deceits of false prophets. See how GOD witnesses the infinite Love that he bears us, in that he matches our salvation with his own glory, so as men cannot touch the one without hurting of the other: insomuch that if a man deface the honor of GOD, the salvation of man is assailed therewithal. In respect whereof GOD says unto us, suffer me not to be misused among you, nor yourselves to be enticed to shrink from my obedience. But if there be any wicked man among you, that goes about to egg you away, beware you nourish not such a plague. Does not our Lord in so saying show, that we can not serve to his honor, nor maintain him in his estate, but that in so doing we procure our own welfare? And therefore these dalyers and mockers that would have us to bear with all manner of false doctrine, and that it should be Lawful for every man to spew out whatsoever he lists, (besides that they show themselves traitors to GOD, and utter defacers of his majesty if it lay in them to do it:) do also bewraye themselves to be enemies of mankind, and desirous to bring their souls to ruin and destruction, so as they be worse than murderers. Let us mark then that if Gods honor be precious in our sight, and that the salvation of our own souls be deer unto us; we must not nourish heresies, nor abuses, nor any other of Satan's trumperies; but every of us in his own state and calling, must procure the purging of Gods Church from all evil, that we may worship him with one common consent that his doctrine may be received, and that there may be no division among us.

But this was said to the people of old time. Yea, and Gods honor must not be diminished by us at this day: the reasons that I have alleged already do serve as well for us as for them. Then let us not think that this Law is a special Law for the Jews: but let us understand that GOD intended to deliver us a general rule, to which we must tire ourselves. Indeed it is alleged that when our Lord Jesus Christ came into the world, he advanced not his doctrine by the sword, but rather both he and his were persecuted, and therefore that the right way to maintain the true religion, is not to punish such as set up themselves against it: but rather to hold ourselves contented with the spiritual sword, and to use that in our fighting against Satan, so as our unholding of the truth, be always by sufferance and patience, if the world do persecute it. But let us see whether our Lord have excluded and banished Princes and Magistrates and Officers of Justice out of his flock, so as they may not be Christians. No surely. For when he speaks of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, he says expressly; You kings stand you in awe; and you Judges of the earth, humble you yourselves, and all of you kiss the son. Moreover, before he speak to private persons, he wills expressly that Kings, Judges, and Officers of Justice should do homage to our Lord Jesus Christ: then they be called to the knowledge of the Gospel. And indeed, according hereunto it is said in the Psalm, that kings shall come to submit themselves to him that was to be sent to be the redeemer. And again that they shall be as foster fathers to the Church, and that Queens shall give her suck; that is to say, that such as have the sword of justice in their hand, shall take Gods Church into their protection to maintain it in the pure doctrine, and in the same Religion that is set down in Gods word. Sith it is so, it is to be concluded, not only that it is Lawful for all kings and Magistrates, to punish heretics and such as have perverted the pure truth: but also that they be bound to do it, and that they misbehave themselves towards GOD, if they suffer errors to roust without redress, and employ not their whole power to show a greater zeal in that behalf than in all other things. For is it reason that he which sits in the seat of Justice, should punish a thief for doing wrong but to the value of five shillings: and in the meanwhile let a traitor to GOD go unpunished? Gods name is thereby blasphemed, his truth which is his image is trampled under foot, and it is much more than if a man should rend some [princes] Cotearmour in pieces. In so doing the living image of GOD is scorned, and as it were spitted at, and the salvation of men's souls hindered: and shall the Magistrates sit still at it like idols? They must punish a thief for the value of fifteen pence; and behold, this is such a traitor as goes about to confound heaven and earth together, and must the same go unpunished? What a dealing where that? Does not even nature teach what is to be done in this behalf? And as for those that say that we should let the evil weeds grow still, do they not show themselves to be grown out of kind like monsters, and that they be more intolerable than if they were stark mad? For it should seem that their meaning is to defy the whole order of nature, and men see that they not only speak against GOD, but also poison men's souls, and bewray themselves not to have one drop of settled discretion. Now then let us mark, that sith God has declared that in the reign of his son, even kings should be called to the knowledge of the truth, and become a part of his Church: It behooves them to give example to their people, and it is good reason that they should employ their whole power and authority to maintain the good doctrine, and to cause GOD to be honored and served, and to drive away all idolatry and superstition, and to see that it be not Lawful for any man to spew our blasphemies against GOD. That is the thing which we have to mark upon this place.

And whereas it is alleged that Jesus Christ used not the material sword to advance his doctrine withal: that is true, and we also bring not the sword in our hand into the pulpit to prove the things that we preach. But let ujs learn to put a difference between offices, and let us consider how our Lord Jesus Christ came to preach his word, when he would that such as receive it should every man in his own state and calling, follow whatsoever is ordained for him. Now it is true that in the time of our Lord Jesus Christ, the great men of the word clave not to the Gospel, no more than we see them do yet still at this day: but the little ones and weaklings were fain to be chosen, thereby to beat down the pride of the world, as Saint Paul vows in the first to the Corinthians. You see (says he) that there be not many noble men, men of power, or wise men among you. And why? For men are but too much given to the advancing of themselves: and if God had begun at the great ones, the little ones should have seemed as nothing. But God meant to beat down all pride, that men might learn to challenge nothing to themselves. Notwithstanding howsoever the case stand, when the great ones are called to the service of God, then must they employ themselves in the things that I alleged out of Esay, David, and diverse other Psalms, belong to the reign of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the state of the Christian Church. Therefore must we needs conclude, that our Lord will have Princes and magistrates to use the sword that is given them, o the maintenance of his honor, and of the unity of faith and good agreement; so as if any man raise up trouble or go about to sow darnel, he may be rooted out. But is not that punishment too rigorous? [Yes:] for some will well enough grant (as constrained thereunto) that it is good that heresies should be repressed: but that it were too great an extremity to proceed so far as to punish them with death. Yea, but (as I said afore) we must esteem God's honor as it deserves. For if we would that deceivers should be reproved, so as they might not have their mouths open, and yet that they should not be utterly suppressed as were requisite: it were all one as if we should say, Indeed we ought to please God, but as for to put a man to death for blaspheming him, what a thing were that? Loe at what point we be.

Bet God for all that, will not fail to be had in estimation as I said afore: yea and that to our cost, if we go that way to work. For the very cause indeed, why we see the world infected with so many troubles and errors, is our laziness in that we have neither zeal nor disposition to beat down the leasings of Satan. Nay rather (which worse is) there are a great number which maintain them willingly. And yet in the meanwhile men cry out that all things are confounded, that all things go to havoc, and that there are so great troubles as is pity to behold. And what is the cause thereof? Even the princes that are willing to maintain errors, and further them by all the means they can, so as it may seem that they be of Satans setting up, as it were to uphold his part against God and his word. Their people likewise desire nothing so much, as o be fed with liars; that is all their seeking, and God sends it them. For (as I have showed afore) it is a just reward for them. Why then should men cry alas, or why should they be grieved at the matter, when all men both great and small seek the utter defacing of Gods truth, and to give scope the utter defacing of Gods truth, and to give scope to all manners of leasings? Therefore let us learn in any wise to have the zeal and affection which our Lord commands us: or else it will come to pass that heresies and errors shall in the end pick out our eyes, if we feed them still as we be seen to do. Let us take the aforementioned example of Ananias, and Jeremy. Jeremy taught in the name of God, and it was proved sufficiently that he stepped not forth on his own head: and yet for all that, the people would have had him to let them alone, that every man might have followed his own wicked lusts; they could not away with him, God his threatening were to corrosive, and therefore every man fought to withstand Jeremy. Yea (quote they) shall this fellow troubles us thus continually? Now hereupon God sent a deceiver that went about to make Jeremy a liar before all the people assembled in the Temple: and no doubt but a great number were offended at it specially such as might consider, or say thus: What? We have here the Temple of God, as he himself appointed, and it is the place where he will be worshipped; we have the Law, we have Gods promise that he will dwell among us forever. And yet now behold, here are two prophets, of whom the one says, you shall go into captivity, and the other says, it shall not be so. Besides this the deceiver fell to buffeting of Jeremy as it were to shame him, and gives him the lie, so as Gods prophet was faine to stand there as abashed at the sight of such trouble. By reason whereof many might be sore moved as I said afore. But what? Let us a little consider the state of that people. For when the governors were assembled, (which ought to have maintained the pure religion, and had the prophet Jeremy as it were in their keeping) they to show themselves void of all just dealing, did not only set themselves against Jeremy, but also (which worse is) affirm him to be worthy of death. Thus you see how Gods prophet was condemned both of great and small: insomuch that every man ran upon him. For they were fully bent to give themselves to all wickedness, and to be no more threatened in the name of GOD. If we see the like nowadays, let us understand that we be worthy of such payment. For without going any further, for all the preaching of the Gospel among us, how is it received? What reverence yield we to it? All men rush out into disorder, and we need not speak any more of the popish superstitions: for there is so devilish wickedness to be seen, that even such as have been counted the simplest coyness, are fraught full of blasphemies to spite GOD withal and to laugh his word openly to scorn. You see what murmuring here is, specially when vices are rebuked. To be short, men only desire is to have dumb dogges, such as may have no authority at all to speak, and unruly people, drunkards, gluttons, Lecherous, and I wot not what else. At a word, men would have either dogs or swine in the pulpit. This is men's desires in most places; who instead of good and faithfull servants to GOD, do choose dogs and swine. And if a man seek the remedy and the redress of it: He must go to the newfound isles, for there is no man here that will meddle with it. Sith we see such dealing, let us consider what manner of obedience and fear of God there is in such folk. So much the more therefore does it stand us in hand to bear the exhortation well in mind which have set down already: namely that Gods working of our salvation is always matched with his own glory. And therefore whensoever he persuades us to maintain his honor, it is all one as if he said, You wretched people, if you make reckoning of the salvation of your own souls: you must provide also that I may bear sway among you, and that I may be honored: and therefore see that you lay for it. Gods meaning them hereby is to show us that he will have his honor maintained by making us furtherer of his case, and that he will have us to set it forward as much as in us lies, or else we shall be pray to the devil. Seeing that he utters such love towards us, it is no reason that we on our side should be negligent: but it behooves us to endeavor that errors and heresies may be rooted out from among us. For if we do not, we must look for the reward that I spoke of, and God gives us too much proof of it. On the other side when we follow the order that is showed us here, we must understand that it behooves us to have Gods honor in such estimation, as all other things may be nothing with us in comparison of that. Which thing will come to pass, if we stick steadfastly to his word, and hold ourselves to it though we be assaulted on all sides; and specially if we resist the mischief by looking to it beforehand, so as it nestle not among us. Therefore let us take heed that we bend ourselves to it every man in his calling; and then we need not to doubt but that GOD will strengthen us and establish us in the faith which we have received of him, so as we shall continue steadfastly therein unto the end, and be thoroughly well fenced against all the assaults of Satan and his underlings.

Now let us fall down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us perceive them better, And therewithal forasmuch as we should soon be overtaken by false teachers, let us flee for succor to our God, and yield him thanks for his ridding of us from the heresies and errors wherein we were snarled, and for his giving of us the food of life; praying him to make us to tast thereof in such wise, as we may never be turned away from it, but wisely discern the way of life and the way of death asunder, to the end that our salvation may be kept safe in his hands, and we in the meanwhile eschew the wiles that Satan works against every of us particularly, so as we may put them from us lustily, and they have no access unto us: but that we may stick to steadfastly to our God, as our whole seeking may be to acknowledge him for our king, and we behave ourselves as his people, that he also may always vow us to be so. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us, but also to all people and nations of earth. &c.

On Wednesday the 16th of October 1555
The 88th Sermon which is the third upon the thirteenth Chapter

6 If thine own brother the son of thy Mother, or thine own son, or thy daughter, or the wife that is in thy bosomme, or thy neighbor that is to thee as thine own soul, go about to intice thee, saying secretly, Let us go and serve other gods which thou hast not known, nor yet thy fathers:

7 That is to wit, any of the gods of the nations that are about thee, whether they be near thee or far off from thee, from the one side of the earth to the other:

8 Consent not to him, neither give ear unto him: neither let thine eye favor him, show him not any pity, neither conceal him.

9 But thou shalt put him to death, thy hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hand of all the people.

10 And thou shalt stone him with stones and so he shall die: (for he has fought to thrust thee from the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage)

11 That all Israel may hear and be afraid, and not do such a wicked thing among you any more.

Had we the zeal in us that is spoken of the Psalm, that we took the reproach which is done unto GOD, as if it were offered to ourselves: this law here were in a manner needless. For every of us would willingly of his own accord endeavor to maintain Gods honor. But now inasmuch as many men think it to be too excessive rigor to put the troublers and perverters of religion to death: thereby it appears that we despise Gods honor and make no great account of it. For every of us would fain have his own honor maintained, and if any man have stormed against us, we think the time will never come soon enough for us to be revenged. If a man do us any wrong or injury, we would that every man should set himself against it in our defense: but if Gods honor be trampled under foot, we let it flip. We see then how cold and unlusty we bee, but this unlustiness of our deserves a more shameful name. For if a man suffer his father to be scorned, folk will say he is not worthy to live in the world, because he does against his kind. And behold, GOD is as it were torn in pieces by wicked men advancing of themselves to rend asunder the union of the faith where through it is his will to be known, and whereby it is his will to reign among us: and that is born withal. And is not that a token, that if it lay in us we would never have any remembrance of GOD at all? But forasmuch as there is so little zeal in us; therefore is this Law given us. And GOD declares that he is not unmindful of his own majesty, but that he will have the defacing thereof to be punished. Nay rather he shows that he disclaims us for his people, if we have not a special regard of this case of his.

We have heard heretofore what has been said concerning false prophets: namely that if any man troubled the Church of GOD, he should be stoned to death without sparing. Now God expresses yet better the thing that he had spoken: which is, that we must put all affections of nature under foot, when his honor comes in question, so as the father must not spare his son, nor the brother his brother, nor the husband his wife, nor the friend his friend that is as dear to him as his own life, that he be not put to death. And good reason. For do not all the friendships in the world proceed of that order of nature which the creator has established? Then if we will not set the cart before the horses, we must always begin at GOD. And Saint Paul does not without cause say; that all kinred comes from thence. And issues of that fountain.

Also when there is any friendship between man and man; it must always be referred to this mark, that GOD have still the chief preeminence, and that we be joined together in him. And cursed be all alliance that separates us from our maker, in whom consists all our life, welfare, and joy. Then if a husband love his wife, without regard of GOD, he is worthy to be thrust out among the brute beasts. In like case is the father, which aims not at the same mark in loving of his children. If we be so linked together, and have so plighted our faith and troth one to another, as we may seem after a sort to have as you would say but one soul in two bodies, and in the meanwhile GOD be let alone unthought on: do you not see that it is too shameful a beastliness? Then is it not without cause that GOD has told us expressly that his honor is to be preferred before all worldly or natural considerations. And let us mark well the words that are set down here; for they be of great weight.

Moses could have said singly, If thy brother, thy wife, thy son, or some friends of thine entice thee, and go about to allure thee to naughtiness; But he adds (which is of so much more vehemency) If thy brother the son of thy mother, which lay in the same belly that thou thyself did. And to what end is this done of GOD, but to search the bottom of our affections, by entering even unto our bowls, as if he should say, I will see whether you love me better than you do these carcasses? For what is thy brother? He is but a mortal creature: and I will see whether thou set more store by him than by me. Nay (say we) but he and I lay both on one belly. That is true,. (says GOD:) but is it not meet that I should always have the upper hand and highest preeminence? The same case is it when he says, thine own son, thine own daughter, thy wife that sleeps in thy bosom. He could have said singly; thy wife: but he says, No, thou must forget an d quite and clean shake off all the love which thou bears to thy wife, if thee go about to pluck thee away from me.

Again, If thou have a friend (says he) which is as dear to thee as thine own life: thou must lay thy hand upon him also to stone him: thou must not only be his accuser and give evidence against him; but thou must also set hand upon him without sparing: all mercy and pity must be put away in that case. Hereby we see in effect, as I said afore, that Gods will is to try us, whether we truly love him. And for that cause does he set down unto us whatsoever might hold us back, or hinder our desire from showing such zeal as we ought to have to the maintenance of his honor: declaring unto us that if anything be an impediment to our continual keeping of the union of faith above all things, in such wise as it is contained in his word: we be traitors and false hearted towards him, and he will shake us off; and instead of taking us for his children, he will give us over and banish us from his kingdom and his Church: for he will have that order observed among those that are his. Mark that for one point.

And herewithal it behooves us to consider of whom he speaks. He says not only,. If a man go about to abolish all religion, as we see some worldlings do, which could find in their hearts like a sort of dogs and swine, that men should make a mockery of all the service of God; he speaks not of such kind of men: But his saying is, if a man go about by superstitious means to turn thee from me to the serving of idols; although it be of the gods that are most renowned in the world, in the serving and worshiping of whom, the people that are about the do think themselves to do well: If any man labor to turn thee from my word, to make thee follow after those gods: let him be rooted out.

Now then, we see, that God punishes, not only theose that would abolish all religion: but also those that would corrupt his truth. And therefore for the better understanding of this law that is given us here, let us mark at a word, that is not for us to say, There is no God, it is but folly for men to trouble themselves about any devotion, for we shall gain nothing by it: but [we must consider,] that if a man be never so devout, and think to do never so well, yet if he turn himself to the superstitions of the Heathen like a renegade, and know not the true Go: he is condemned. And it is a distinction which we ought to bear well in minds. For our Lord shows us, that he will have us to be contented with his word, and to rest wholly upon it, that we may be bridled by it, and not attempt to alter anything, seeing he has once declared with his own mouth what he allows.

And he says expressly, the gods which neither thou nor thy fathers have known. By this saying he does us to understand that it behooves us to be well assured of our religion. For to put a man to death without having known which is the true God, were but a frantic zeal, as we see the Papists do at this day, and the Heathen have been wont to do at all times, yea, and even the Jews also, who have put this law in execution (howbeit amiss) against the prophets. And under the same pretence were our Lord Jesus and his Apostles driven to suffer persecution.

As for the Heathen, when they made laws for the observing of the manner of religion that was established among them; they had a good ground and foundation for the thing they did. For it is not enough for magistrates to make laws to repress robberies, murder, and violence; but they know also how it was meet that God should have the forehand. Now if nature taught them so much; what excuse will there be for us that profess Christianity, if we say it is enough for men to repress robberies, advowtries, murders, and other such violent and outrageous doing that tend to the hurt of private persons: and in the meanwhile make none account of God? What a dealing were that? The Heathen then had a good ground in that they knew that in a well ordered Common weal, religion ought to be observed, and that if any man attempted ought to the contrary, he was to be punished: in so much that it was a matter of life and death among them, and it was observed throughout all the world in all ages.

The Jews did not amiss in being zealous in punishing false prophets after that God had given them this law. Likewise in these days, whereas the Papists say that Heaertikes are to be punished; that is true, we confess that they be worthy of it. But therewithal they ought to come to the point that is set down here, namely that it behooves us to know which is the GOD whom we serve, and that we be sure that our religion is not a thing set forth at all adventure, but that we hold the infallible truth of Gods won sending, and that it is preached unto us in his name and by his authority: so as it is he on whom our faith is grounded. It would become us (say I) to come to that point. But the Papists play the beats in that behalf, bearing themselves in hand that so they shut their eyes, that may execute their rage and fury upon innocents.

And after the same manner have the Heathen overshot themselves. For, because religion was to be maintained, they not discerning what they did, nor perceiving whether it was good or evil: did set themselves against the servants of God. Likewise dealt the Jews with the Prophets. You see then here is a point which is stands us in hand to way well all our life long: and that is, that we must have known the true God, so as we may justly and without grudge of conscience condemn the errors which men would draw us to. Which thing will come to pass, if we have the light of Gods word to show us the way: for thence it is that all good discretion comes.

Now then, to the intent we may benefit ourselves by this text, let us mark first of all what love we ought to bear to our Lord God, when he has uttered himself unto us. Namely that we must beware that in any wise he may be served without gainsaying, and that the role which he has given us be unbroken, and that nothing be changed in his word, but that we make much more account of the doctrine which we have received of him, than of our lives. And therefore let us not be plucked back from the said zeal for any worldly respect as we see the world is, which favors more his own fleshly affections than God. But howsoever the case stand, yet must we fight against all impediments and distress, until the aid zeal do get the upper hand in us, so as we will rather cause them to dye which seek the defacing of the true Religion, than suffer such a plague to prevail in the Church, to the infection and marring of ourselves or of any others.

And hereof we may gather a good exhortation; which is, that when we see God's honor impaired any manner of way, it must grieve us at the heart, according to the general saying of the Psalm, concerning all reproaches. I say we must not bear with anything whatsoever it be, whereby Gods honor may be impeached or defaced. But what? Little (indeed) is this doctrine embraced nowadays. For blasphemy has his full scope everywhere; and if a body be to be reprov'd for so doing; though a dozen persons be at the hearing of the blasphemy: yet shall not a man find so much as one witness. In this case God ordains all both small and great to be his advocates, and he will have every man to do him service in it.

For it needs not to be said to a man, Have a care of bewray blasphemy when you hear it: No for he is know to have been present; and yet if he be asked of it, he does but wring his groin like a swain, and say I heard him not. Such folk are well worthy, not only that God should pluck their ears from their head, but also utterly overwhelm them. They be monsters that can hear the name of their maker blasphemed, and yet cover such filthiness and suffer it to abide unpunished. Is it not reason that God should show how it is he to whom they be to yield accompt for it? And though he wink at it, yet let not us think that they which forswear themselves so untrustily, shall scape scotfree, but that in the end GOD will show how it is not without cause that he has pronounced, that to favor evil is worse than to do evil. For it may be that he that does the evil is carried to it by choler or by some other affection: but as for him that clocks it, he is not only a partaker of it, but also a wilfull justifier of it as it were in despite of GOD: and that is an utter perverting of the order of nature. And therefore let us learn by that which is told us here, that every of us must bear such zeal to the maintenance of Gods honor, as not to spare any kin or friend, if they step up to set themselves against him to whom we belong, and to whom we owe all service, going about to overthrow his scate, and to disappoint him that he may no more reign among us. And therefore whensoever Gods honor is darkened or diminished among us, let every of us in his state look to it that we be so zealous as to redress it to the uttermost of his power. This is the first point which we have to mark here.

And moreover, if any man should go about to alter the Religion, so as GOD should after a sort be driven from among us; it were meet that our zeal should in that case be kindled yet more. For if we be nice in having our own honor touched: what ought we to be when Gods kingdom is in danger of utter dispatch? If there be some wicked practice in a City, so as some treason, insurrection or alteration of the state is a bruing, and one having but some secret inkling of it told him in his ear, do conceive it; shall he not be taken as accessory, and be adjudged worthy of punishment? If it be proved against a man that some wicked treason was a practicing; and he heard of the matter and yet discovered it not; he shall be punished as a traitor, and men will say he was well worthy of such punishment. And shall we be held excused of our silence, when an insurrection is made against GOD, and men go about to overthrow his holy temple, that he might not dwell anymore among us, so as they endeavor to deface his majesty, and furthermore to cast up the salvation of men's souls as a pray to Satan, and we say nothing to it? Does not our dissimulation import both treachery and perivry against GOD? Yet notwithstanding there be some so far past shame, that they demand at every turn, Who is he that finds fault with me? Whom have I wronged? Behold, he has played the blasphemous and wicked wretch, in flushing out some matter so ugly against GOD, as he ought to be rooted out for it; and yet he says, Who complains of me? If he had stolen but fifteen pence, he should be whipped; and for the second or third offence, he should go to the gallows: and like a Church traitor he has trampled God's majesty under foot, wherein he has done worse than the thief that cuts a travelers throat, in a wood; and yet to his own seeming he is just still. And whereof comes this, but of the foresaid laziness, that no man bethinks himself of his duty in that behalf? GOD does us the honor to make us maintainers of his truth, as though he made us a solemn commission of it.

And is not that such a preeminence, as of duty ought to make every of us to strain himself (yea even beyond his power) to show a constant and invincible zeal in causing men to serve and honor GOD? For if a prince employed a man in his affairs, and did put him in commission,; he would strain himself so far, as he would even hazard his life; and he would think that what pain so ever he took, though he did much more, yet all were too little seeing he had so honorable a charge.

Behold, the living GOD takes us as if we were his defenders, and will have every of us to represent his own person: and yet for all that, we despise all those things; when Gods name is blasphemed we make no reckoning of it; the party himself that has taken the oath to conceal no such thing, shall play the traitor first. And therefore it is no wonder though wicked folk take such liberty, and that when they be convicted, they allege that no man complains of them, and that they have done no man any wrong.

For were we the true children of GOD, surely we would tender the wrongs that are done to hm, more than the wrongs that are done to ourselves, and we would take them much sorer to hear.

For if we ourselves be offended, is it any great matter? But when Gods holy name is lightly esteemed, and reproached; then we ought to be very tender hearted. And because we think not of it; when we have blasphemed God, we say we have done no man any wrong.

Furthermore, let us consider (as I have said afore) that if we must endeavor by all the means we can to have swearing redressed: much more reason is it that we should not suffer any man to step up to trouble the Church, and to make any rebellion, but utterly root out such a pestilent fellow out of hand. But yet before all other things, let us look that we know Gods truth beforehand, that we may be able to maintain the same; for without that, we shall go lumpishly to work, and our zeal shall be but as the rage of mad folks, as I have already showed by the example of the heathen men, Jews, and Papists. The Papists have a fair color, in saying that if a man deface the majesty of a Prince, he shall not scape unpunished: and therefore it is much more reason that men should be punished for setting themselves against God. Yea: but in the meanwhile they wote not what GOD they worship: for they be carried away with their own wicked and devilish superstitions. Let us mark then, that we must not take this law here at alaventure; but that to begin well, we must lay this foundation, that we be sure that the religion which we hold is of God. As for example, we have the holy scripture; and there our Lord has showed us his will. He protests by his Prophet Esay that he has not spoken vainly not covertly, nor meant to beguile men in bidding them to seek him. Then have we an open declaration of Gods truth, so we obey his word by faith, and receive it without gainsaying.

When we be at that point, we may well with good conscience and safety punish such as seek to turn us away from the truth. But if we be doubtfull and wavering, and to it but by weening: what will come of it, but that we shall punish innocent persons, as we see the Papists do by persecuting our Lord Jesus in his members? It were better for them nowadays that they killed one another without color of justice, than to persecute the children of God after that fashion. For the matter stands not upon the punishing of men by taking away their lives, or by shedding of guiltless blood through wicked cruelty: but upon the making of war against the living God, and upon the suffering again of our Lord Jesus Christ in his members.

And let us mark, that whensoever we falsely pretend the name of God for a color; our fault is doubled in so abusing it, and we become so much the more blameworthy. As for example, when the Papists nowadays do persecute the faithful, and use such excessive cruelty as they do: they can well enough say, it is the zeal of God that drives us to do it. If a man have flayne one or robbed one; very well, he shall be laid upon the wheel. And what shall be done when Gods majesty is defaced? Should the party scape unpunished? So will they allege. Yea; but first they should enquire of the case. For like as sometimes men punish guiltless persons accused of false crimes: so may it well be (and we see it by experience) that Martyrs are persecuted instead of heretikes. Therefore were it meet to look well to the matter.

But nowadays if a man say that we ought to call upon none but only God in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that we should not fetch any further compasses after the imaginations of men, by praying to the Virgin Mary or other Saints deceased to be our patrons and advocates; but that we ought to hold ourselves contented with Jesus Christ, to whom that office is given by God his Father; By and by they cry out, to the fire with him. And how so? It is the pure doctrine of the holy Scripture. Yea, but the church Rome admits it not.

If a man say, we must worship God after a spiritual manner, without making any puppets to him, and that the breaking of the rule which our Lord Jesus Christ has given us, is utter abomination: out upon it, that's a soul heresies, at leastwise by the judgment of the Popedome. But yet for all that, the Scripture bears it. If a man say we have no freewill to do good, but that we be utterly corrupted; and that if there be any goodness in us, it proceeds of Gods mere grace and mercy, so that our going forward towards the mark, is because we be renewed by his holy Ghost, and yet nevertheless that we be weak, and had need to flee continually for refuge to the forgiveness which God promises us, and whereby we be reconciled unto him, whereunto we attain not by our own deserts and satisfactions, but must be fain to be purged by the bloodshed of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by that means we obtain salvation: if these things (say I) be alleged: by and by he must be healed to the stake. And why? Because all this is condemned by their Synagogues.

Yea, but it were meet for them that they should give ear unto God. For did he forgo his authority when he said that we should neither add nor diminish from the things that he has spoken, as we have seen already heretofore? For thereby does he show at what end it behooves us to begin. Then is it a hellish kind of dealing, when men stay not upon the things that GOD commands, and that are contained in his word, and yet notwithstanding do take upon them to burthen other men with what laws they lift.

If a man say that we must serve God according to his commandments, and not depend upon those that take upon them to enjoin laws to men's fouts, and that all such inventions are foolish: What? Shall the traditions of our mother holy Church be so rejected? That were a deadly and intolerable crime. If a man speak of the Sacraments, and say that baptism ought to be ministered in a known tong, that men may understand to what end our Lord Jesus ordained it, what fruit it yields, and how to use it aright: and moreover that men may perceive that baptism sends us to our Lord Jesus Christ, and has no power of itself further than God works by his holy spirit, which appears when we have an eye to him that is the very substance of baptism: and that all the trifling toys ought to be put away wherewith men have mocked God to the full, namely, the ceremonies of their own inventing which are but utter corruptions of baptism, as their spittle, their salt, and all their other maygames which they play withal: If a man talk so of their stuff, he must be put to death for it out of hand. And why? Fye upon him, he is a rank heretike, he is not to be born with. Yea, but they should see first whether it be an heresie or no. For by that means they make God himself an heretike for want of due examination; and what a dealing is that? If a man say that our Lord's supper ought to be received according to the rule which he himself did give us, that is to wit, that we should communicate together, so as the bread might be a warrant to us that we be truly become partakers of his blood, and consequently that the Mass is an abomination of the devils own devising, for that therein the Christians are so far off from communicating together, that one man separates himself from all the rest of the company: behold, then must excommunication serve as a sauce for all meats.

Again, if a man come at Easter to receive the Lord's supper, he must have but a morsel, and he must hold him contented with the one half of it: and moreover, contrary to Christ his institution, which says: take and cate: they would bear God in hand that he shall receive; we give it thee, say they. Besides this, if a man intend to be reconciled to GOD, the Mass must serve as a new sacrifice, and although they say it is the same that Jesus Christ himself offered, yet do they oftentimes reiterate it. If a man open his mouth against such abominations, O that is an intolerable crime. The air must ring of the great outcries that shall be made against it. How now, say they? What ado have we here? He has spoken against the decrees of the Holy Councils. Yea, but before that God commanded the punishment of Renegates that should go about to trouble the Church, and to set division in the faith; he said, Thou shall not do what seems good in thine own eyes; but thou shall submit thy self obediently to my sayings, and not step aside from my word, but yield yourselves to it both great and small; and therefore that order ought to be maintained.

But we see that all things are turned upside down. And therefore let us look that we be well informed, (as I said afore) and that we be well assured that we have God's certain truth, and that we be thoroughly resolved of it, so as we may be able to say, It is God that has spoken it, we have been taught it in his school, and we renounce all imaginations of men: for we know there is nothing but vanity and untruth in men. God then must be the author of our faith, and allow it, before we can say. This is the truth. And when we be so resolved, then may we obey this commandment here.

But we must mark therewithal, that it is not enough for men to excuse themselves by saying, as for me I mean not to abolish all religion; and yet if I like well of this thing, why should it not be lawful for me to have it? Moses shows us that although a man pretend the title of some god, yet is that nothing: for we must have the living GOD; and that when we have once the knowledge of the true Religion, that must suffice us, and that if we go astray, it is through our own fault, and there is no excuse for us. That is the meaning of Moses, and it is a doctrine well worthy to be noted. For many men might find starting holes in this behalf.

May not a man be overseen through simplicity? Yes: but when we have once known God, we cannot be separated from him, but our malice must needs be utterly inexcusable. And therefore let us take courage to benefit ourselves: and when Gods word is given us freely and preached unto us purely, let us be so confirmed in it, as we be not anymore like wavering reeds, yielding to every wind, nor as little children whom every man may beguile: but let us use wit and discretion. And indeed our Lord gives us his word, not only to the intent we should say, Lo, this or that is good: but to the end that every man should keep himself from evil, and be fenced and armed against all temptations of Satan, so as we might have wherewith to resist him when he goes about to thrust us out of the way.

Now, Gods word is termed a spiritual sword: and therefore we have wherewith to outstand all assaults, so we have profited in Gods word as we should do. And hereby it appears what devils they be, which would nowadays leave all things in doubt. For there are fantastical persons which say, What? If a man will punish Heretikes, he must do it continually; because all things are out of order. True it is, that men ought to serve God. And if any man would say there were no divine majesty in heaven, there is no GOD, there ought to be no religion in the world, O, that were not to be bidden. But as long as men hold this ground, that there is GOD; it is enough.

And although the heathen keep still their dotages, although the Jews be willful in maintaining their false exposition of the law, although the Turks hold still their Mahomets alcoran, although the Papists be still entangled in their superstitions: all in one, so they hold fast this principle, that there is a God. Yea, but Moses says here expressly, that although a man pretend an intent to serve God: yet must he be stoned to death, if it be known that he meant but only to overthrow or disguise the true religion. And what more then? For (as I have said) we must not only pronounce with our mouth that there is a God: but we must also discern him from all the abuses that men have invented of their own brain. For otherwise it is but a mocking of all the holy scripture. I shall say I worship God, and in the meantime I worship puppet. And what is my God? It is a fantasy that I have devised in mine own head: it is not the living God, he disclaims all such dealings, and so am I but a forger. For (as Saint Paul speaks of it in the first to the Romans,) such as have wandered away after their own imaginations, have transformed the majesty of GOD, though their intent was to worship the living God, as the Papists do, which protest that they worship God the maker of heaven and earth; and likewise the Turks, who say the same thing; and so also do the Jews, notwithstanding that they abhor Jesus Christ.

And it is said in Saint John, that he which believes not in the Son believes not in the Father which sent him. Nay he that turns away from Jesus Christ, does utterly renounce God. For where dwells the fullness of the Godhead but in Jesus Christ? When the Turks set their Mahomet in the place of Gods son, knowing not that God has manifested himself in the flesh (which is one of the chief articles of our faith): what a dealing is it? So then, how many things so ever men term by the name of God, they be but devils of their own devising and setting up, if they keep not themselves fast enclosed within the bounds of the holy scripture. And therefore let us mark well, that we must hold us to the pure religion; and when we be well assured of that, then must we come to this law whereof Moses speaks here. And whosoever advances himself against it, let him be rooted out.

Now if the man that would draw us to the serving of strange gods, deserve to be put to death: what is to be done to those dogs whose whole endeavor is to turn all upside down, and to besot the whole world, so as men may not know any more what religion is? And in these kind of weed to rise thorough the world, a sort of heathenish people, which serve to no purpose but to scoff and jest at all things that are spoken of GOD. Also what shall become of those that commit so open blasphemy, as they may seem to make but a mockery of all the holy scripture, as though it were nothing else but fables? Now then, sith we see that Moses speaks so: what do they deserve which do so trouble and defile the holy things?

Behold there comes me an hypocrite that would devise a new Religion, as it were to set up a Popedome here again, or to bring in the Alcoran of Mahomet: now ought such a one to be put to death without forbearing, for so hath God ordained. And if any man say, it is cruelty; let him find fault with God for it, and we shall see if he can prevail.

On the other side, if we may well spit in such men's faces, notwithstanding that they say that their so doing is to maintain God's honor, what is to be done to such as will needs after a sort deface it quite and clean? But let us come back again to the matter. There is a man that goes about to pervert the truth through fond devotion; and to turn it into untruth: the same man ought to dye. There is a Roister that casts forth lewd scoffs against the holy scripture, as does that devilish fellow which is called Pantagruel, and all his filthy and ribauldly writings: and this sort of men pretend not to set up any new Religion, as though they were deluded by their own foolish imaginations: but like mad dogs they belke out their filthiness against the majesty of God, and their meanings is to overthrow all religion: and should such be spared? Why not? For they have the Cardinals for their upholders, they be favored and maintained by them: in so much that the names of these Lord Cardinals are blazed in those goodly books, which serve to mock God as well as Mahomet. All is one, all may be bidden, so the Cardinals be curried, it is well enough, and it does them good to be so registered: whereby a man may see that they not only mock at all religion, but also could find in their hearts to abolish all religion quite and clean.

But herewithal let us also see how we may apply this to our own use, for we must not only condemn those that have showed themselves such as I have spoken of: but we must also far the better by their example, t the end we may know how it is too wicked, yea, and to devilish a thing, that when men go about to make some backsliding or to set some trouble among us, and much rather to drive away all fear of GOD, and be favored or shrowded, or hearkened unto, or have any gap left open to them, or be let alone unpunished; it is the next way to undo and mar all. And yet we have seen examples of such as have maintained so cursed things, yea, and of such importance as the very Papists themselves could not endure them. For it is certain that the two heretikes that were here, did wrest the holy Scriptures much more than the Papists. As touching this Triaclemaker, who was the first of them; he maintained free will, and destroyed among the Papists? Nevertheless we see how he was savored, and he was held up by the chin as it were in despite of God.

Again, as touching the second, we know how he was so horrible a blasphemer, that all men abhorred his lewd opinions: and yet for all that, had he not his maintainers and defenders? Yes; for men showed them more favor than if they had been the nearest of their kin. And yet was it not evident that they conspired continually against God and his truth, to wage battle against him? Therefore let us look nearly to ourselves, and to conclude let us understand that when God has given us the grace to have the certainty of faith, so as we be grounded upon his word; we must hold us to it after such a sort, that whensoever we see anybody go about to trouble the order which God has set, we may all set ourselves against it, and not tarry till all agree in one, but that whosoever of us does first perceive the mischief, the same do discover it out of hand, and every of us do his duty in such wise, as such plagie persons be not nourished among us. For (as I have declared already) we see there is such frailty in us, that a very little leaven will sower our whole batch of dowe; and as soon as we give ear to Satan's juggling tricks, by and by we be overthrown and so entangled, that in the end we be carried quite away from our God and from the true religion.

God therefore being acquainted with our frailty, meant to provide for it by showing us that it behooves us to cut up the wicked weeds out of hand. Accordingly also as the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrew says, that we must not suffer any evil weeds to grow: for they will mar the good corn, and if the time be foreflowd, it will be too late afterward. Then must we not drive off till tomorrow; but every of must quicken and stir up himself, following the exhortation that is made unto us here.

Moreover, seeing we be commanded to pluck up whatsoever is contrary to the majesty of God, and whatsoever may pervert or put away the true religion: let every of us see that he so offer and dedicate himself to our God, as we may not thrust one another out of the right way. If any man go about to thrust me out of the way: behold, God commands me to rise up against him; and though it were mine own brother, my son or my wife; yet is it said that I ought not to spare them. Now then, if I myself thrust others out of the way, is it not a far more heinous crime? I shall be taken for an accessory if I do but conceal another body's misbehavior, and I show myself a traitor to Godward: Now then, if I myself been an author of evil, how deep am I in? So then, if we will correct other folks misdealing so roughly, let us bear in mind that we must in any wise hold ourselves in the fear of God, so as in cases concerning his honor, we be not a stumbling block to drive wretched souls to destruction; but rather endeavor to gather home the stray sheep into the flock, and to bring back the wanderers into the right way, and to maintain and further such as are in the good way already, and all of us lend our helping hands one to another, that we may go serve our God with one common accord.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to receive us into his favor, and that although we be wretched sinners and unworthy to come in his sight; yet notwithstanding it may please him to accept of us, and to reform us in such wise by his holy spirit, as all our life may be employed to his glory, and our whole seeking henceforth may be to advance the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ his son. And so let us all say, Almighty God, heavenly father, &c.

On Monday, the 21st of October 1555
The 89th Sermon, which is the fourth upon the thirteenth Chapter

12 If thou hear say, that in any of the cities which the lord thy God gives thee to dwell in,

13 Some wicked men are gone from among you, and have seduced the inhabitants of their cities, saying, let us go and serve other gods whom you have not known:

14 Then shall thou search, and inquire, and examine the matter thoroughly, and if it be true and certain that such abomination has been done among you:

15 Thou shall root out the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword, and utterly destroy the city, and all that is in it, and the very cattle thereof with the edge of the sword.

16 And thou shall gather all the spoil thereof together into the middes of the city, and burn up the city and all the spoil thereof with fire to the Lord thy God: and it shall be a heap for ever, and never be built again,

17 And none of the cursed things shall stick to thy hands, that the Lord your God may turn away the fierceness of his wrath from thee, and give thee mercy, and have pity upon thee and multiply thee, as he sware to thy fathers, 18 because thou shall have obeyed the voice of the Lord thy God, in keeping all his commandments which I command thee this day, to the end thou may do the things that are right in the eye of the Lord thy God.

We have seen heretofore what manner of zeal we ought to have to the maintaining of Gods true service and the pure religion that is to wit, that we must forget all the friendship of the world, and show that we make more account of the honor of our God, than of all those that are as dear to us as our own souls. But now Moses proceeds further, and says that we must use such rigor not only against particular persons, but also against whole cities. Now if a whole city ought to be razed for breaking the service of God, what shall be done to any one man? Should he be born with? Here then we see how Gods honor ought to be preferred before the whole world. And because he had set down a right and pure order to the people of Israel how to do it; his mind was that it should be kept to the uttermost, and that if any man transgressed it, he should be cut off; insomuch that if it were a whole people that had done it; they should be dealt withal after the same manner. Now then we see yet better, how careful we ought to be for the preservation of religion in his pureness. True it is that we ought to be always mindful of that which we have said already; namely that it serves not to excuse idolaters when they be so enraged with zeal without discretion. For we must be sure a forehand, that the religion which we hold is holy, and that God allows of it, so as it is not a doctrine forged at the pleasure of men, but Gods own will uttered unto us of his own free favor, whereof we have good and infallible record, that if any set himself against it, he must be cut off: yea though it were a whole City. So little ought any private person to be forborne, that even a whole city ought to be destroyed for it.

But to the intent this doctrine may be the better understood; let us mark the order which God commands here to be kept. If it be said, that is to say, if the report go, that some wicked persons are gone from among you, and have led away the inhabitants of a city: make good inquisition of the matter, and search it out diligently and unfainedly to the uttermost: and if it be found to be so; let that city be utterly destroyed with the edge of the sword, and so forth. Now first our Lord's will is, that when any brute goes of an evil deed, we should first inquire how the case stands. And hereby he shows that such as have authority of the sword, and fit in the seat of Justice, must not be retchless, in suffering things to pass before their eyes, without making any countenance to see them. Is there then any brute of a thing? Inquisition must be made of it. For if it be let pass, we show that our intent is to nourish the evil: and the parties that have so concealed it, must in the end abide their payment, which is that it must light wholly upon their own heads, as we see it comes to pass. And it is a just punishment of God, that when such as are in office to remedy and redress evil, do bear with it, they themselves should abide the pain of it. And when they suffer it, it happens not by haphazard, but God yields them the just wages which they have deserved. Therefore we must mark this text, that God will have us to be doing beforehand as soon as the brute is reported to given forth, and not to tarry till the thing be apparent, without setting hand to it or without making inquisition of it: but he will have the Justice to inquire of it betimes, especially when there goes any brute of it. And by the way, to the intent there be not a flight inquiry made of it as it were but for fashions sake, he uses here three words: and afterward he adds that it must be done thoroughly, so as there be an exquisite care used in the matter. For divers times, information are taken when some complaint is made, and that the evil is known, yea and that in such wise as they be ashamed to clock it altogether, and so witnesses be called. But they will not seek to understand the pith of the matter, they do but use a kind of form for fashions sake, as who should say the matter is not buried, because there has been some seeking to know the truth of it. But what? This is no proof: that is to say, we will not search how the case stands indeed. For the witnesses are dispatched ere they have told half their tales: and that which they have spoken is let flip, so as we see not the thing that is as apparent as the noonday.

Now to the end that men should not dally after that sort with God; it is said expressly that inquisition should be made, that the matter should be examined, and information duly taken. And therefore let justice understand, that they shall not go quit, but that God will hold them guilty, for neglecting their duty, if they do not what they can to bring matters to light, when they hear any complaint or any brute of them. Nevertheless our Lords meaning is not that men should judge at aladventure, but that the crime should be duly proved whether it be so of a truth indeed. He uses tow words to show that a Judge ought not to be led by bare suspicion to conclude what he lifts. For we must be fain to bear with the evil when it is not known, because God has not yet brought it to light. As for example, there be some sins (says S. Paul) which make hast to come to their condemnation; and we see that God does so thrust and drive some wicked men forward, that they run a head into mischief.

For sometimes it is Gods will to humble us by making our offence known, that we may feel them and be sorry at the heart for them. Yea and [sometimes again] a man knows not at what end to begin, but is let that he cannot punish, because he finds no mean how to do it. Therefore a judge must be discrete and mild, that he give not sentence upon bare conjectures, but that he first of all do see the matter substantially proved. Now then, here are two notable things: the one is that we must not be rechless, but diligent in searching out of things, that the evil may be discovered and not nourished. The other is, that we should not judge rashly, but that the matter should be well known and thoroughly brought to light, before me come to give definitive sentence of it, so as our judgment may be ripe and settled. Now this being so, it is said, thou shall destroy the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword. Whereby God shows (as I have declared already) what affection we ought to bear unto his service. For if we consider what a thing his glory is, it ought to be more dear to us than all the whole word. What see we either in heaven or on earth but little sparks of the power, righteousness, goodness and wisdom which are infinite in God? They be not to be measured: we have but only some little signs and tokens of them in heaven and earth. Therefore it were better that the world should perish ten thousand times, than that Gods glory should be defaced. But it falls out that his glory is conveyed over unto idols, yea and bestowed upon Satan, when his service is corrupted. And therefore it is not for us to fall asleep or to cocker ourselves in this case, as we have been wont to do, making sale of God's honor, and letting it pass as though we seemed to count it as a thing of nothing. But contrariwise we see here how he puts all cities to destruction, if they have defaced his honor. So then let us understand that it is not for us to row anymore between two steams as we have been wont to, if we intend to keep our religion unappaired: but we must see that all Church treasons, that is to say all outrages that are done to the majesty of God, may be punished. Seeing we know and nature teaches us that robberies, murders, thefts, and all manner of pilfries ought not to be born with; what shall we do when gods name is blasphemed, all religion turned upside down, and the pure doctrine falsified, to thrust folk out of the way and to break the union of faith? Such things are not toe be winked at: for they be too heinous crimes.

Yea and it behooved us to mark how it is said here, that if any wicked men be risen up, and have seduced the inhabitants of a city. For it may seem that this circumstances should somewhat abate the fault, forasmuch as we whole city went not away of their own accord, but were carried away by certain wicked persons, as indeed a few such firebrands of hell are enough to set all things out of order. Yea, but yet are not they to be born with, which have given ear to such deceivers; they must be punished for it nevertheless: yea and that not with stripes of rods only, but even with death. And indeed, how trifling an excuse is it for a man to say, I was undermined, I would never have done amiss if I had not been enticed to it, you may see what ill counsel is. Yea, but yet notwithstanding thou had been taught by the voice of they God, thou know his will, and was ascertained of it. Behold, a man whom thou knew to be wicked came to seduce thee, and thou gave more credit to his lewdness and to thine own wit, than to the infallible truth of thy God. Thou know that thy God speaks for thy benefit, and thou leave him, thou give him deaf ear, thou art loth to give him any hearing, thou refuses all that he tells thee: and is that to be excused? Nay rather, should we not spit in the faces of such men as will need make a shield of other men's enticements? Yes: and for that cause does not God hold a whole city excused, when the people of it have been deluded by wicked persons. Both great and small (say I) must be punishable: and God is not cruel in punishing them all, as

Furthermore, let us mark well that God meant to do us to understand what it is to have wicked persons in a city. For (as says S. Paul) a little leaven fouleth a whole lump of dough. Now then, wheresoever deceivers be, there are the people by and by infected. God speaks so thereof plainly to the intent we should not suffer evil to harbor among us. If there be any poisonings, we are all afraid of them, and it troubles us to provide how to save ourselves from them: O (Say we) such a plague must not abide among us. Now it is certain that there is not a worse nor a more deadly plague, than the stepping up of unruly persons, despisers of God, and wicked men, which seek to turn all things upside down, and to bring all to confusion, corrupting all things to the intent to have the more liberty to do evil. When such folk rise up, and be born withal; it is good reason that all should be guilty of their fault. And we see also that God punishes those that bear with evil doing when they both should and could correct them: insomuch that the common proverb is verified in them, that when a man is saved from the gallows, he could find in his heart to see them hanged that delivered him from it. And good reason it is that they should have such reward, for their corrupting of justice, and for their impeaching of right. Therefore when we see men go about to turn all things upside down, we must repress them beforehand: and not tarry till the end, for that is a cursed patience. True it is (as I said before) that if God give us not the mean to rid away evil so soon as we would; then must we be sorry for it and have patience. But when things are evident, and there is none other let than lack of courage: then if we be cold and lazy, and shut our eyes because we be loth to sustain displeasure; [as if a man should say,] I will not be too forward, least I be left in the briers, for fear least I pray for the shot when I have entered into such a quarrel, for I see that such fellows are full of revenge and may easily be even with me: when we use such cowardliness. Then must we abide the penalty of it. And surely it is a great grace of God to have power to redress a mischief that has been known of long afore: and therefore it must not be left flip without providing for it in time convenient.

Moreover we must hear what a simple shift it is to allege pity, when men make all things by giving cause of offence. For what kind of pity is it to spare two or three to cut the throats of a whole nation? On the contrary part, if they that be so wickedly bent, be repressed that they may no more have their own swing, but rather be utterly rooted out: it is a purging of the whole nation, it is a healing of a common sore. So then if we love the welfare of all men, let us not give head after that sort of all men, let us not give head after that sort to such as entice men to forsake the right way. But we must go back again to the matter which I have spoken of already, and which Moses goes forward withal in this text: to wit, that the worst corruption which can befall a nation, is to have despisers of God that falsify the true religion, or to have upholders of Satan that lead men into superstition and idolatry, to abolish the pure doctrine and the truth which they had received. True it is that if there be glutton, drunkards, whoremongers, and such other like folk, it is an infection that is well worthy to be feared, and meet to be redressed out of hand, least the mischief grow too strong: But as for those that put all things out of order, showing themselves to be bent to spite God, and to make men to yield no more reverence to his majesty: it is as a gathering of all sins together into one heap, and a packing of them up in one bundle. For there can be nothing pure when Gods service is taken away, and when men walk not in his fear, all other things must needs be out of order. For the knowing of God and the worshipping of him as he deserves, is the very bridle that holds men in all holiness and honesty. But if men turn their backs upon him, they must needs play the beasts, and their life must needs become so loose and loathsome, that a man shall see as it were a gulf of hell among them. And therefore not without cause are we so straightly commanded in no wise to bear with men, when they become wicked and go about to inveigle folk to do service to idols. Let us mark then, that if we be desirous to live as we ought and in good concord; we must above all things have Gods service in estimation, as the thing wherein it behooves us to use severity and rigor, or else all will go to wreck and confusion. That is the thing which we have to gather upon this place: and would to God that it were better in use nowadays. For as I have touched heretofore, men are moved at the things that concern and touch themselves. Insomuch that if we perceive that the suffering of an offence will turn to our harm or loss, every of us cries out to have it punished. And why? Because we have no regard but ourselves. But if GOD his honor be impeached, that is let slip, and we say it is not so great an evil. And why? For our purses are not pinched by it: and therefore it seems to make no skill at all. Now see here on the contrary part, how GOD punishes us as we deserve. For things become so far out of order among us, that we wote not which way to turn us. And good reason it is that it should come so to pass, even because we have forsaken GOD, and been more mindful of ourselves than of his majesty, so as we have not yielded him his due honor whereof he is worthy, and which he requires at our hands. Thus much concerning this text.

And it is said, that all that ever is in the city must be brought together on a heap, and set on fire, and be taken as a cursed thing, and be made a sacrifice unto God.

Here Moses shows how hateful a thing idolatry is, and consequently whatsoever overthrowes the true service of God and the pure religion: and that is done to move men so much the more. But [you will say, that] when such a fault is committed, the city is self, the cattle, and the house are not to be blamed for it. And why then will God have all to be destroyed? It is to the end that folk should learn to abhor idolatry the more, that we might understand that the wicked folks whom Satan drives to give themselves to idolatry are so little to be born with, that we must even abhor the very place where they have dwelled, yea and the very sight of them, and think with ourselves, behold, this is a place wherein Gods wrath has been provoked, and that was enough to have soonke us all to hell. We see then whereat God aimed. For he knew that we see now with our eyes; namely that we have not such zeal to maintain his glory, as we ought to have, we pass not for it, every man is occupied about his own gain, and about the things that concern himself. Now because we be so cold, God on the other side quickens us up, and tells us that the corrupting of his service is a great misdeed, you and so horrible a thing, as might make the hairs to stand stiff upon our heads. That is one point which we ought to mark.

And herewithal we have to mark also, that the rigor of this law, is not to be observed of from point to point as it is commanded here to the people of Israel. But yet the substance thereof abides still in force, as I have declared heretofore entreating of idolatry, where I told you that we were commanded to put away all places that have served to superstition. Now then, we in these days be not in such thralldom, but that we may use a Church that has been one of Satan's brothelhouses. Idols have been worshipped here, and GOD has been blasphemed here: and yet for all that we be now come here together in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. This place then is new dedicated, according to the saying of Saint Paul, that all things are sanctified unto us by faith and by calling upon the name of God. And therefore if a place be put to such use, that God is honored there, it is a kind of hallowing of hat place. But under the Law God held the people in greater and more slavish bondage, commanding them to make clean riddance and utter dispatch of all things that had been used in the service of idols. So is it in this text, where GOD commands that the whole city shall be razed, and never inhabited anymore. And the straightness of this bond served for the time wherein the fathers were governed like little children. But yet does the substance thereof abide with us still: and we have to gather of this text, that our Lord abhors idolatry above all things; and that if other offences be to be punished, this is not to be endured in any wise, but that we ought to abhor it. And because we be too cold in that behalf, we be warned to quicken up ourselves, and to take the means which we know to be fit for it, to the end we may be the forwarder in causing God to be served purely among us, and open no gap to deceivers, ne make any way for superstitions and idolatry, that might bereave us of the pure truth and draw us unto lies. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this text.

But here a man might ask a question, how Moses may say that all the things which shall be found in such a city shall be accursed; and yet they must be put over unto God as an offering or sacrifice? Yet does GOD speak after that fashion in many places, and not without cause. For it is an offering of sacrifice unto him, when we protest that only he ought to be worshiped, and when we make as it were a solemn homage unto him. And again when other appurtenances come in place: as when men sacrificed under the Law, they protested that they were worthy of death, and yet notwithstanding they had a warrant of their reconciliation unto God, by the sacrifice that was to be offered. Also men offered of their goods unto GOD, as who should say, Lord, all that I have comes of thee, and it is always at thy commandment. You see then that sacrifices were blessed: and yet nevertheless there was a kind of cursedness in the sacrifices that were offered for sin. In the Firstlings, there was nothing but the praising of God and giving of thanks unto him: but as for the sacrifice that was offered for sin, it behooves Gods curse to be thereupon, as who should say, Loe this is he that shall answer for all. To the end that men may be acquit and delivered from death, this sacrifice must answer for them. And therefore those sacrifices were called sins: and the same name is attributed to our Lord Jesus Christ, because he bare our curse in his person. But here is another kind of cursedness; namely that GOD is honored, and homage is done unto him by rooting out the things that had defaced his honor before. Therefore when a city is destroyed that had erst been a den of idolatry, and all the spoil thereof is set on fire: it is a sacrifice that God likes very well of. And why so? Because it is a protesting that we be not willing to suffer anything that impeaches the honoring of him at all men's hands, and that all men should submit themselves to him, and his majesty be known as it ought to be. Now then we see how it is not without cause that Moses commanded sacrifice to be done unto GOD with the utter destruction of all things that had been infected and defiled with idolatry.

And he says expressly, to the end that the wrath of God be not upon thee. Whereby he confirms the matter I have touched already, which is that we must beware that we wrap not ourselves in other men's sins. For they that correct not evil doing when they may, and when their office requires it; are guilty of it themselves. As for example, if a preacher wink at the vices that reign; surely the

is a traitor and unfaithful: for he should keep good watch and waken such as are in danger of undoing. Then if I bear with the evil wittingly or through negligence: I am the first that shall be condemned. Likewise if they that hold the sword of Justice, execute not the rigor which they ought to redress men's misbehaviors: surely the wrath of God is upon them continually, yea and upon the whole country, because no man is found, that complains of this, that the mischief was so born withal. One good zealous man is enough to turn away the wrath of God, for he will enforce others that were negligent. But when no man begins the dance, but all men draw back, and every man says, What now? If all the rest put not to their hands, what can I alone do? Surely none of them all can exempt themselves from condemnation before God; when every one of them speaks so. Not without cause then does Moses here wrap up a whole country under condemnation, if a wicked deed be born with, or not punished when it comes to knowledge. And hereby we be put in mind, to be more diligent than we are wont to be, in riding away of all filth and uncleanness from among us. For it is all one as if we should lay wood upon the fire that is kindled enough [and too much] already so as we shall all of us be consumed with it in the end; and yet we do so even wittingly and willfully. Why then do we not open our eyes, sith our Lord shows us the danger so evidently, and warns us to provide for it beforehand? Why do we not think upon it? Nay, we be well worthy to perish, and to be utterly confounded, because we have not vouchsafed to receive the counsel that God has given us.

After that Moses has thus threatened us; now he adds a promise that God will bless his people, if they obey his voice, and do the things that are right before him. Our Lord endeavoring after his manner, to win us to him always by gentleness and friendly dealing: when he has done threatening of us in this text, does also attempt the contrary way saying: If you find the means to have my service purely maintained, I will be with you; you shall find that my seeking is but to increase the benefits which I have begone already to bestow upon you, you shall enjoy the land that I have given you to inherit; you shall perceive that my promising of my favor and mercy to your fathers is not in vain. And let us mark, that here it is our Lord's intent to draw us to a willing serving of him. True it is that yet for all this we must not forget his threatening, seeing we be so flow in resorting unto him. Then let us be afraid of them, and consider that we shall not scape his vengeance except we maintain his service. But yet howsoever the world go with us, let us not do it by constraint, but let us go to work with a free courage. And how may that be done? Even by being drawn by the gentleness that Moses shows here unto us: as if he should say, go to happy will our state be if we serve our GOD, and every man endeavor to draw his neighbors with him, and suffer not any man (as far as lies in us) to pervert or trouble our state when it is well settled. If we do so, our Lord tells us that he will be among us, blessing us in such sort as we shall prosper more and more, and that he will establish us in the possession of all the benefits which he has given us. Seeing the case stands so, too lewd were we if we would not submit ourselves to him, seeing that his desiring to have us, is altogether for our benefits and welfare. Let us learn then on the one side to quicken up ourselves with Gods threatening; but yet on the other side let us be moved and allured to serve him with a free and pure affection, void of enforcement or constraint. Let us go to work of our own goodwill, assuring ourselves that we be bereft and dispossessed of all good things, if we serve not our GOD. And why? Because we cannot prosper but by his favor. And let us not delude ourselves: if we see that he make us to prosper this present time, let us not fall asleep, but let us consider that we have need to continuance of his benefits and free favor towards us. And this is a very needful warning: for we see how men take liberty, as soon as they have any respite. So long as GOD shows us his rods, or as we feel his stripes; we make countenance still to serve him. Yea, but that is but hypocrisy, according to this complaint which the Lord makes by his prophet. As long as I afflicted them, they turned unto me; but either the same day or the next morrow they became like themselves again. Therefore let not us do so, but although GOD let us alone in rest, and we perceive no harm at hand; yet let us look for it affarre off, and forecast that there will come a sudden tempest which we looked not for, if we swerve aside from his service. We see how that in summer the whether change in a minute of an hour: even so may it fall out in respect of God wrath: and therefore let us not welter in our delights. When God prospers us, let us not fall to frisking as abusers of his goodness and patience: but let us remember how Moses says, that when he has given us a Land to inhabit, he must be fain to maintain us in it, and to establish us in the possession thereof. For I have told you hereto fore that under this word The Land of Chanaan, all the benefits that GOD bestowed upon his people, were comprehended, ads all in one particular. Now then, let us look to ourselves, and if we purpose to continue in the perpetual enjoying of the benefits belonging both to our bodies and to our souls which GOD has bestowed upon us: let us look that we continue steadfastly in the serving of him, without swerving one way or other. And moreover let us labor that there may be one common accord among us, and that every of us hearten up his neighbor to do well, so as we may do as has been declared already, and as we have seen heretofore; that is to wit, that it is not for us to demean ourselves after our own imagination and fancy as we see men do in bearing with themselves, not only when they do as ill as may be, but also when they do their duty by halves, and yet they bear themselves in hand that they have done enough and that there is no fault to be found in them, GOD can require no more at their hand. And though a man point them to a thing with his finger, as if he should say, This is a general rule, and we must not go to it by halves; but God must have all that belongs unto him, or else he will accept none of all the things that can be done: they shut their eyes at it. O (say they) it makes no matter, we must have a respect of our infirmity, we must be well advised by wisdom and discretion. Yea, but for all that, shall we swerve from that which GOD has ordained? Let men use as much discretion and gentleness as can be: but yet howsoever the case stand, let him look well to it, that Gods honor be not trodden under foot, and that men's sins be not so bolstered that anybody come to advance himself against the sacred majesty of him that made us and fashioned us, which also maintains us by whose power we be upheld, and without whose grace we could not continue one minute of an hour. Let this be well considered, and let men do the things that are right in the eyes of the Lord: for he will not frame himself to our diet. Imagine we ourselves to do things never so well, to the contentation of men, yet will not GOD be contented with them, because he measures not himself by our eights and balance. He will have us to hearken to his word, and to have an eye to the things that he likes, so as we may say, Lord, thou shall have the governing of us. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this text, if we intend to eschew our curse which GOD denounces against all such as have suffered the perverting of the true Religion and the corrupting of his service, and to have him not only to bless us, but also to increase the benefits which we have received at his hand, and also to continue them towards us to the end.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good GOD with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them the better, so as we may be able to show that his instructing of us in his word has nor been in vain, but that we may yield him such reverence, as our whole seeking may be to have him purely worshipped among us, and that the same may be done with one accord, and all stumbling blocks be cut off from among us, so as we suffer not ourselves to be deluded wittingly, nor the ignorant to be led to destruction, but that we may look to the drawing of them back: and that having such zeal to amend other folks misdeeds, every of us may begin at himself, and not give our own flesh such liberty, as that it should turn us aside and alienate us from our God, but rein ourselves short fearing his threats and also in respect of his blessings and promises which he makes us for that it is his will to maintain us in his house as his children. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth. &c.

The 90th Sermon which is the first upon the fourteenth Chapter

You be the children of the Lord your God; Therefore you shall not cut yourselves, nor make any shavings between your eyes for the dead.

2. For thou art a holy people to the Lord thy God. And the Lord God has chosen thee from all people that are upon the face of the earth, to be a peculiar people to himself.

3 Thou shall not eat any manner of loathsome thing.

4. These are the beasts that you shall eat of: namely, the Oxe, the Sheep, and the Goat:

5 The Red deer, the fallow deer, the Bugle, the wild Goat, the Unicorn, the wild Oxe, the Chamois,

6 And all manner of beats that divide the hoof and clive the hoof into tow claws and chaweth the cudd also: among the beats them shall you eat.

7 But as for these, you shall not eat; among those that chawe cudde or do but only divide their claws, that is to wit, the Camell, the Hare and the Cunnie. For inasmuch as they chew cudd and yet divide not the hoof, they shall be unclean to you.

8 Also the swine, (because he clives the hoof, and yhet chews not cudd) shall be unclean to you. You shall not eat of their flesh, nor touch their dead carcasses.

9 These are they that you shall eat of all that are in the waters: namely, whatsoever have fins and scales.

10 And whatsoever has not fins and scales, you shall not eat thereof, but it shall be unclean to you.

11 Of all clean birds you shall eat.

12 But these are they of which you shall not eat: namely the Eagle, the Ospray, and the Fawcon:

13 The Glead, the Kite, the Vulture after their kind:

14 All manner of Raven after thirk kind:

15 The Estrich, the night crow, the Cuckowe, and the Sparehauke after their kind:

16 The Skritchowle, the great owle, the Swanne,

17 The cormorant, the Pellicane, the Dophchicken,

18 The Storke, and the Heronsewe in his kind, and he Lapwing, and the Backe

19 And all creeping souls shall be unclean unto you, and you shall not eat of them.

20 But of all celan fouls you may eat

We have here two commandments to expound, which God gave unto his people: The one is that when any man died among them, they should make no excessive mourning and lamentation for them in disfiguring their bodies, after the ceremonies and fashions of the heathen. The other concerns meats: for it was not lawful for the Jews to eat of all meats indifferently: There was a difference set them between clean beasts and unclean beats. Now as touching the first, Moes tells them, that they be a people chosen of God to be separated from all other Nations of the world. Whereupon he concludes, that they must not then disfigure themselves: for inasmuch as God had set his mark upon them: they ought not to do any wrong or violence to their own bodies. And therewithal this commandment is so moderated, that if a man have forgone any kinsman or friend of his, he must not lament for him out of measure as we see men do, who are wont to be too excessive in their passions. When a body is dead, we see what sorrowing is made for him, yea even with grudging against God, so all is out of order and there is no reason at all in their dealings. Moses therefore commands the Jews to be patient, when it pleases God to be bereave them of their kinsfolk or friends. And therewithal he tells them it is a shame for them to disfigure themselves after the manner of the heathen, for as much as it was defacing of Gods image which was in them because they were made holy from among all the people of the world. Now as touching the first point, for as much as this inconvenience reigns as well nowadays, as it did at any time heretofore; that is to wit, that men are too excessively given to making of sorrow: this is not superfluous for us. Indeed this ceremony of rending folks hayre, and of scratching their faces to disfigure themselves is no more used: but yet we see how God is grudged at in the greese that men take for the death of their friends, insomuch as they martyr themselves without regard of submitting themselves to God. There is no dealing with them to comfort them, they be carried with such rage, as God cannot be heard, whatsoever you say to them they be deaf. Now then, seeing that this misdealing continues still at this ay, we must understand that this doctrine concerns us also.

And here we have to mark first of all that if the heathen and the unbelievers, and the poor ignorant souls which have not been trained in the word of God were not excused for this vice: wee on our side offend God much more grievously and without all excuse. For he has separated us fro all the world. Yet notwithstanding men may well sooth themselves: for there is not anything where God tries our obedience more, that by the living and dying at his pleasure, so as we know that our lives be not in our own hands, but that it belongs to him to dispose of them: and every of us is ready to depart out of this world, whensoever it pleases him to call us: Or if he take away our kinsfolk or friends from us, we be well contented with it. And indeed, why pray we daily that his will should be done, but to protect that we be willing to hold all our affections in captivity, and to keep them in aw? Sith it is so: Surely they that vex themselves with immoderate lamenting for the decease of their friends, are sufficiently convicted by the only order of nature, that they strive with God and rebel against him. Nevertheless, (as I said afore) if the silly ignorant souls torment themselves after that fashion, they be to be pitied. For they know not that our days are determined, and that God reserved the authority and privilege of calling us unto him, when he sent us into the world. They know none of all this: and therefore it is no wonder though they use such excess in their mourning. Moreover, they have not wherewith to comfort themselves: for none of hem hath ever had any understanding of the everlasting life. To their seeming, if a man be once dead, all is lost, he is quite and clean come to naught. And that is the cause why they conceive so excessive and immeasurable grief. Othersome go at aladventure: and although they have some imagination of the endless life, yet are they not assured of the salvation of the parties, and therefore they cannot comfort themselves with the favor of God. But as for us, we know that death is but a parting of our soul and body asunder, to the end that God may show his inestimable power in raising us again. And we know also that he is a faithful keeper of our souls when he has received them: and therefore that we may well put them into his hands, assuring ourselves that our Lord Jesus Christ died not for us in vain.

Seeing we have such comfort, is it not too great an unthankfulness to torment ourselves after the manner of the heathen and the infidels, when God takes any man away from us? Yes: And therefore when Saint Paul exhorts the faithful to have patience in the departure of their friends, he says expressly, Sorrow not as the unbelievers do. Indeed Saint Paul saw well that we cannot be senseless: For in very deed it were no patience if we felt no grief. If we were stark blocks, it were no virtue at all if a man should laugh at the death of his wife or his father, it were a beastly brutishness. Therefore it behooves us to feel the inconvenience and to be touched with it, so as it pinch us and grieve us: But yet must God assuage it again, because we know that he has all superiority over our lives, and we must suffer him to dispose of us as he thinks good. Again we must go boldly unto him, being well assured of his goodness and mercy, and we must not doubt but that death shall be to our salvation, and that whether we live or die, all shall without fail turn to our benefit and welfare so we be in Christ Jesus. Thus you see what we have to bear in mind.

To be short, that we may benefit ourselves by this lesson of Moses; let us understand, first of all, that until God bridle us, our affection will ever be inordinate whether it be in mirth or in mourning. If we have prosperity, by and by it makes us to forget ourselves what we be, so as we think not ourselves to be mortal men. And we see how all men fall to flinging as it were in despite of God when they have their ease and delights. Likewise on the contrary part, if our Lord afflict us whether it be by the death of some kinsman or friend of ours, or by some other adversity: we be piteously forlorn, we cannot measure our grief, we be so overwhelmed with sorrow as is pitiful to behold, and finally our heart is full of bitterness and poison. We see how a number do spew out blasphemies against God. Let us consider all these vices in ourselves, and seek the remedy of them as it is set us down here. Let us bear in mind (I say) that our Lord commands all of us to hold ourselves as in captivity, that if our nature be faulty in that behalf, we should not nourish the evil, but withstand it as much as is possible. This cannot be done except we use force in subduing ourselves to the obeying of God, and even strain ourselves to the uttermost. And one of the chief sacrifices that God requires of us and whereof he likes best, is that we consider that we must not sorrow out of measure, when we be afflicted, but fly unto God praying him to give us the grace to submit ourselves wholly to his will: so as if the husband be bereft of his wife, he may bear it patiently. And why? Because he knows it is God's will to try his obedience in that behalf. Let the wife do the like by her husband, and let everybody submit themselves to this order of Gods, that we may be able to say, that like as he has set us in the world, so also it is good reason that he should take us hence again, not at our pleasure but at his. For it is not without cause that he has limited the race of our life, and that it pleases him to take away one rather than another. We be mortal before we come to this world: for a young babe may die as well in his mother's womb as after he is born. Sith it is so; as soon as God gives us discretion, let us apply our endeavor to understand that death besieges us every minute of an hour, and that we must not promise ourselves life till the next morrow, nor set any term to God: for his daily prolonging of our life is but so much respiting of us. But howsoever we fare, let us be mindful of our own frailty, and the same lead us to consider that if GOD take us out of his world, sooner than we looked for, it is meet that he should have us at commandment, and that every of us should offer up our own bodies to him in that manner of sacrifice, in suffering GOD to separate us asunder; that what friendship or bend of kinred so ever there have been betwixt us, yet we may not fail to glorify God when he takes away our kinsfolk and friends, nor use this beastly impatience, in pulling ourselves by the hair of our heads, and in scratching and disfiguring of our faces, as though we know not what it were, to live in the obedience of God, and to die in the same likewise.

And moreover as well in this as in all other things, let us take heed in this as in all other things, let us take heed to that which is told here to the Jews by Moses: namely that when God is so gracious as to dedicate us to himself, and to gather us together to be his people, we must give ourselves so much the more earnestly unto him. True it is that in respect of nature we differ nothing at all from the silly ignorant and unbelievers. For our being of Christ's Church befalls us not by the right of inheritance. Indeed the promise extends to a thousand generations: but yet for all that, it is of his free goodness, that we have the prerogative too be of his house. Sith it is so, let us acknowledge the honor that he does us, in separating us from the heathen and unbelievers though we were forlorn and damned as well as they; and let us benefit ourselves by that grace, that it perish not through our own wickedness. Thus you see for what purpose Moses said, Thou art a people shooled out to thy God; have a care to maintain the self in thy calling: acknowledge the good that is done unto thee, and go not about to bereave yourself willfully of such favor. Let us think upon it (say I,) and that in such sort as God may be glorified in us, accordingly as he has vouchsafed to call us.

had chosen the Jews, adds That they must be a holy people. For God gathers not the of skowrings of the world to keep them in his Church; his intent is not to have his Church to be as it were a swine sty, so as there should be nothing but filth and infection; but he purges us from all uncleanness. Now then whereas God calls us unto him, it is with condition that we should worship and serve him in all pureness. True it is that he finds us as it were drowned in the depth of all lewdness so as by nature we have nothing but utter uncleanness, and we be altogether so defiled that we be even loathsome to him: but yet does he purge us and make us clean by his holy spirit, and it behooves us to lead a holy conversation of all the time of our life. And so you see how he would that men should ratify their free election, as Saint Peter speaks of it. And that is a thing which we have to mark in this saying of Moses: whereupon we have to conclude that it is not lawful for us to take example at the unbelievers and such as have not been brought up in Gods school. And it is a very necessary doctrine for us, considering how we ever shroud ourselves under the causes of offence which we see: and if anybody give us an evil example, we bear ourselves in hand that we be excused before GOD, and that such a person is a shelter to us. But contrariwise Moses tells us here, that we must be a people sanitized unto GOD, so as if the wretched unbelievers do play the unthrift, we must not marvel it. When we see a silly blind soul stumble or stray out of his way, we pity him because he is in darkness, but we think it is no strange thing. Even so is it with those that never knew the truth of GOD: they be silly blind souls that go in darkness. But GOD enlightens us, and shows us the way of salvation. If we rush against things, or if we wander out of the way; whence comes the fault? Are not we ourselves to be blamed for it? Yes, and therefore let us ever bear in mind the greatness of the grace which we have received of GOD, that it perish not through our own lewdness and negligence. And above all things, let us take heed to that which is spoken here concerning the moderating of our sorrow and heaviness. And this shall be done, if we be not troubled and grieved out of measure for the death of any of our kinfolks or fiends, or for any other affliction that befalls us, but that we suffer God to use our lives as he lifts, to dispose of them according to his good will. Thus you see in effect what we have to remember upon the first point that is contained here.

Now as touching the second, Moses says, that the Jews must not eat all manner of meats, but that they must have a care to discern between the clean beasts and the unclean. And afterward he names the beasts, whereof it was lawful for them to eat: and also the several kinds which it was not lawful for them to touch. And to be short, he says that the beats which chaw cud, (that is to say; which keep in their mouths that last of their meat, to chew it again) are clean, so as they might eat of them, conditionally that those beasts do also cleave the hoof. Now, to seek here for nice points, as what this should mean, that the hooves should be cloven, or that they should chew the cud; were no matter to be greatly stood upon. And as for them that have pried into the matter to fetch the new and the old Testament out of the beasts cleaving of their hooves, and have told us that we must needs put a difference betwixt them; and moreover, that we must chew our cud, that is to say feed upon the doctrine again and again, that we may be better digest it, because it is the food of our souls: it is too too curious. For if it be so, what do the scales of the fishes betoken? There will be occasion of seeking everywhere, and we shall fall into many fond speculations. And therefore let us be advised to use modesty in this case. Some hold opinion that God had no further respect but to the health of men's bodies, when he forbade the eating of such beasts as he terms unclean, and they think that God played the part of a Physician. But that is too cold and too barren stuff, and the scripture shows us the contrary. Indeed a man may well think that our Lord had regard what was good and convenient for men's bodies: but to think that he had a further consideration, than to spy out what meats were best for man's health; that is too childish a matter. And (as I said before) it is no matter for us to scan upon, seeing the holy Ghost has told us plainly, that god aimed at a far other end. Let us mark well then, that this commandment is no such order as it wont to be prescribed by a physician for the preservation of man's health; but a ceremonial law, to hold them in obedience and to lead them up higher and higher to the cleanness of the mind: for it was God will that the Jews should always have as it were looking glasses before their eyes, to make them see that they ought not have to do with the defilements of the world, but to apply their whole endeavor to keep themselves in such wise as god might be glorified in them. That is the first point, which we have to mark. For when the Apostles treated of meats, they allege not that GOD meant to do the office of a Physician. And that is a very short solution. When St. Paul declares that the false Apostle and couseners troubled the Church, going about to hold men in bondage to the old law he shows that this difference of meats was a part of the childish doctrine, under the which GOD led the people of old time, because there was more rudeness, and infirmity at that time than there is nowadays. Not that we be better, or stronger in faith, or that we be any perfecter in ourselves than they were: but because that God has set us further forward, by giving us the doctrine of the gospel. For the law was an Apsie in comparison of the doctrine that is preached unto us at this day. It is not to be marveled then though there were many Ceremonies for that people, and that we have not those Ceremonies in use nowadays, which served but only for that time. If a man reply then and say, that the preaching of them unto us is more than needs: we see the contrary. For although the figures be past and utterly abolished by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ: Yet does the substance of them continue still with us, so as it behooves us to know still for what purpose God would have the Jews forbear the meats that are forbidden them here. Seeing then that the same reason and force remains common to us which served for them, it is not unprofitable for us to have the same things showed unto us. Moreover although the Sun do drive away all darkness with his light: yet is it not inexpedient for us to think upon the night in the day time, and upon that wonderful order which God has established, sith that in winter we think upon summer, and in summer we think upon winter. For we see how God set forth his wisdom therein. And if there were no such variety, we should have no such occasion to wonder thereat and go glorify our God. Again, on the other side, we be assured of the race that is brought us by our Lord Jesus Christ: for we be preferred before the holy fathers and Patriarchs which were worthier to have been preferred than we, and yet notwithstanding God kept them under like little children, whereas nowadays he deals with us as with perfect men of full age and growth. Seeing then that God uses such goodness and liberty towards us: have we not the more cause to honor him?

But now let us come back again to the matter which I was in hand with afore, and show yet further how all the said things may redound to the benefiting and profiting of us, as well in faith as in the fear of God, I have told you already, that whereas God did put a difference between beasts, declaring some to be clean and some unclean, it was to accustom the Jews unto the spiritual cleanness, even in eating and drinking. True it is that God enjoined them soberness and temperance therein: but he had yet a further respect, which was that in all things they should have a care to be undefiled, and to have such a stay of themselves, as they might not be stained with the uncleanness of the world. God's intent then was to give them as it were a kind of exercise, to keep them the better in use. We know how men do take too large scope in eating and drinking. For whereas the rest of their life does put them in mind to pray unto God, and to take pains, and to discharge themselves of their duty: when they take their repast, they give themselves to mirth and rejoicing. And it is lawful for them so to do, so they keep measure. But what? They so overshoot themselves in the turning of a hand as a man might wonder to see their excess or mirth. This was the cause that God would have his people put in mind of the soberness which we ought to use in our eating and drinking all our life long, that it might be as a bridle to restrain us, for after as our diseases be, so does God give us medicines for them. Now (as I said afore) there is more disorder in eating and drinking, than in all our life besides. And therefore it was requisite that our Lord should exercise his people in that behalf. And for the same cause did he deliver them instructions, to warn them that they ought to behave themselves purely in all things, and to put them always in mind thereof. You see then that the first point which we have to remember upon this text, is that God tells the Jews that forasmuch as he had chosen them to be his own inheritance, they ought to dedicate themselves to him even in things that concern the outward conversation, and to abstain from worldly corruptions, not intermeddling themselves with the vices of the heathen after our common manner which we know to be always tending unto evil. Gods will was to hold them in that awe. And now we see how it is no more than needed. For why? True it is that the ceremony continues not nowadays: for our lord Jesus Christ has set us in greater liberty than the fathers were under the law: but yet is not the pith of it put away, that is to wit, that we should live soberly under the fear of our God, cutting off all corruptions, and abridging ourselves of all liberty of having to do with the lusts of the world. What though the unbelievers do bear with themselves too much? Should we do so too? Seeing that our Lord tells us that we be his temples, so as he dwells in us by his holy spirit, and that he would have us to be as sacrifices unto him, so as we should offer up both our souls and bodies unto him daily: is it lawful for us to cast ourselves into the uncleanness of the world, without any regard how to repress it? Then let us mark well that although the ceremony be no longer in use, yet the law in itself is not done away, but that God enjoins us the same sobriety at this day, whereto he meant to lead the people of old time by the means that were agreeable to that time. Again sith we see what privilege God gives us; let the same move us the more to yield ourselves freely unto him. If we compare ourselves with the fathers of old time, we shall find that God led them but as young babes and yet were they as Angels among mortal men. If we look upon the life of Abraham, what a perfection of holiness shall we find there? As much is to be said of the rest of the Patriarchs and Prophets: and yet nevertheless, you see how God held them in darkness, giving them but a small tast of his grace insomuch that his showing of Jesus Christ unto them, was but a far off. But we in these days have much further preeminence: for God shows himself fully unto us, and we have the spirit of adoption, whereby we may cry with full mouth, that God is our father, even we that come of the heathen, and had no acquaintance with God, but were utterly unclean, and (to be short) were by nature cursed, and had none other heritage than death and damnation. Now then is it not an inestimable privilege, that God has brought us so near to himself? What is to be done then? Seeing that God allures us more freely than he did the fathers, let us be the more earnestly minded to serve him. He discharges us of the burthen as concerning th shadows and figures: what is to be done

therefore? We must have this willingness of giving ourselves to the spiritual sobriety which he requires continually now still as well as he required it then. Therefore let every man bethink himself, and inasmuch as God gives us leave to eat of all manner of meats freely without exception, (that is to say, of all such as may serve for our sustenance) let us have this consideration with ourselves, Alas my God, yet must I not abuse thy goodness. How many ways does thou show thyself liberal to me? Therefore does it become me to bridle myself of mine own accord and to cut off all the wicked affections that reign in me.

And first of all let us put the doctrine in use which Saint Paul sets down in the thirteenth to the Romans, which is, that we be not careful for our flesh, at leastwise to fulfill the lusts thereof (for that is a gulf that can never be filled) but only look to the sustaining of our bodies, so far forth as they may be maintained in good plight, and so use Gods creatures, as we defile them not. For although God's creatures are permitted unto us; yet do we not cease to defile them by our unbelief, intemperance, gluttony, or other abuses which we commit. God shows that as now we may eat both of the Hare and of the Connie, as well as of the sheep or of the Goat. Yet notwithstanding if we glut ourselves with them, the meat that is clean of itself becomes unclean unto us, because we be unthankful to GOD, in that we consider not to what end he gives us sustenance. One man rushes forth into all excess, and yet is never the more maintained in strength of body by it: for he is ready to burst, and makes himself altogether unwieldy. A drunkard plays the swine or some other brute beast, and the wine so overcomes him, that he has neither wit nor reason. And although wine be a creature that God has blessed, and have no uncleanness at all in itself: yet is it defiled by such misusing of it. Other some never remember to give GOD thanks, nor to call upon his name. And that is another kind of defiling our food. Again othersome abuse it to vainglory and deliciousness, and grow so far out of order, that they can no skill to serve GOD. othersome are so given to dainty far, that it makes them to put their consciences in jeopardy, insomuch that they will not stick to make them bondflaves to all lewdness and wickedness, so they may have good cheer. Othersome are afraid of want, and fall to snatching, so filching, to catching, and to all that can be devised, to get somewhat by hook or by crook. And thus do all of us defile God's creatures, which of themselves are clean. And that is the cause why I said, that sith our Lord has given us greater privilege, and set us more at liberty, to the end that the bondage of the law should not have dominion over us: therefore we ought to be the willinger to restrain ourselves in abstaining from all uncleanness, and to consider that the cause why God has given us the free use of all kind of meats, is that we should use them purely, and not be defiled on our side, so as we might not be blamed for defiling of the things which have no manner of uncleanness in themselves, in respect of God and in respect of the order that he has set among us. And we must have this regard not only in respect of meat and drink, but also in respect of our whole life in general. Considering then that God nurtured the people of old time, by forbidding certain meats, to the end that they should think thus with themselves; well then, seeing that our God has forbidden us the things that are lawful for the heathen, and which they take leave to do; let us understand that it behooves us to live in all manner of pureness, and that seeing God will have us to be pure in small things, he will much rather have us to be so in great things. Let us nowadays consider to what purpose this ceremony of the law may serve us, to the end that every of us may enter into himself. As for example, if a man be led with ambition, so as he will needs advance himself and climb too high: or if he be carried away with covetousness, so as he burn therewith: or if he be an unthrift and lead a lawless life: or if he be a whore hunter and given to beastly lust: let us bethink ourselves thus: how now? Our Lord abhors every little uncleanness even in eating and drinking: and what will come of it then if our souls be defiled, sith they be the things wherein he will have his glory to shine most cheerfully? True it is that our bodies also are the Temple of the holy Ghost: but yet has God set his own image in our souls: and what a thing were it then to defile them after that sort with all devilish and worldly uncleanness? Thus you see whereunto it behooves us to apply this doctrine to use it well.

And by the way let us mark, that God's will was to hold the people of old time in obedience that they might know how it is not for men to take such liberty and license as they lift, but that they must receive it at his hand. To be short, let us not attempt anything in all our whole life, except we know it to be acceptable to our God. When we have leave of him, then may we well go forward: but if he say it not; then let us be still. And indeed although this prohibition were not put in writing; yet had God put a difference afore between clean beasts and unclean beasts, as we may easily perceive by that which is written of Noe. God commanded him to make sacrifice after the flood. And whereof? Was it of all beasts in general? No: Neither had he reserved so great a number of the unclean beasts as of the clean, and that was by reason of sacrificing. Then was there a difference already even at that time. And whereof proceeds that? Had men devised it of their own brain? No. And therefore let us mark how God reserved to himself the prerogative of putting difference between the beasts that were clean and the beasts that were unclean, to the intent that men should know that it is not for them to live as they lift, and to have the bridle loose in all things; but that it behooves them to look upward to hearken what God gives them leave to do. And when he gives them leave; then let them use their liberty, or else let them keep themselves still. You see here a doctrine that is as profitable as that which we have touched already: for we see how men burst forth into such disorder, and with so great headiness, that they have no mind at all to use God's benefits according to his meaning. You shall not find one among a thousand that will consider with himself whether God gives him leave to do a thing or no. but men rush out into all disorder, as though they had leave to do what they list. Now then seeing we be so lewd and unkind that we fall to thrusting our groins into things like swine, and consider not from whence the benefits come: good cause have we to remember this doctrine, wherein it is showed us that even from the beginning of the world, God did put a difference between the clean beasts and the unclean. And let us understand, that although the ceremony continue not any longer nowadays; Yet notwithstanding the same ought to serve us for a warning, to lift up our minds on high in our eating and drinking and in our using of all the rest of God's creatures, that we may know how far God has given us leave, and simply submit ourselves thereunto.

Again, if he give us liberty, let it always provoke us to glorify his name and to give him thanks: for it is one of the sacrifices which he requires of us, that we should do him homage for all his benefits as holding them from him. But that cannot be done, except we be first put in mind that we cannot so much as eat one bit of bread, without it be given us from above, not only for that he has created all things, but also for that it behooves us to receive all things as at his hand. Therefore whensoever we eat or drink, we must not only call to mind that God has created all things for man's use; but also that he feeds us, as a father that cuts out meat to his little children, so as our having of things is as it were by his deliverance, as if he should say to us, I do the office of a father, I have care to nourish you. If we know not this, it is impossible for us to thank God heartily and unfainedly. True it is that even they that have no such thought will say grace; but that is but for fashion sake and in way of hypocrisy. Will we then magnify God's goodness truly: then must we be fully resolved, not only that God has created all things for man's use: but also that he still shows himself a father, and gives us assurance that he will sustain our bodies, and maintain us in this transitory life. Sith it is so, is it not an encouragement unto us to yield him the thanks as he deserves? Yes: For it is not without cause that he lifts to put a difference between the ceremonies of the Law, and the things that we have at this day. But although this prohibition was done away by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ; yet cease we not to come back still to this point, that forasmuch s our Lord Jesus Christ gives us leave to use all his creatures indifferently, we must use them in such wise as he may be glorified by them, so as we refer all to them, and take all as at his hand.

And herewithal we see what privilege we have, in that we may quietly and with safe conscience eat the things that God gives us. For as for the wretched papists, which behave themselves after the manner of the world, in forbearing certain meats that are forbidden them, whereas they think themselves to serve God in making but small meals upon some certain days, and abstaining from eggs and white meats on some other days; and bear themselves in hand that their so doing is great devotion, and that God is greatly bound to them for it, and yet in the meanwhile suffer themselves to be led like silly beasts by the tyranny of men: in what case are they before God? They cannot eat one bit of bread without doubting, because they know not who it is that gives it to them. But sith we see that our Lord has set us at liberty, so as we may use all manner of meats with thanksgiving: let us consider that it is such a privilege as cannot be esteemed sufficiently: and therefore let us acknowledge it in our eating and drinking. Sith we perceive that God has such a care of us, as to stoop so low, as to be chary of our food: [let us assure ourselves that] although our bodies be but carions; yet notwithstanding God will give them sustenance to maintain them. Seeing we have such a certainty and knowledge (which cannot be without faith) that is to wit that we be sure what God has granted unto us: we ought greatly to magnify his grace, and therewithal to use all his creatures with such sobriety, as we may yield him good account of them at the last day, and glorify him in all points as long as he keeps us in this world.

Now let us kneel down before the majesty of our good god with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, by touching us to the quick, so as we acknowledging him to be the author of all good things, may learn to seek him in all our life, and cleave wholly to his will: and that for the bringing thereof to pass, it may please him to grant us the grace to forsake all our corruptions, and to fence us so from the wiles and subtleties of Satan and the world, as nothing may keep us from being truly united to him that is the fountain both of life, of joy, and of all happiness. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth, & c.

On Wednesday the 23rd of October 1555
The 91st Semon, which is the second upon the fourteenth chapter

21 you shall not eat any dead body, but thou shall give it to the stranger that is within thy gates, that he may eat it: or else thou shall sell it to a stranger: For thou art a holy people to the Lord thy God. Thou shall not seeth a kind in his dames milk.

22 Thou shall give the tenth of all the increase of thy seed which grows yearly on thy Land:

23 And in the place which the Lord thy GOD will choose to put his name in, thou shall eat before him the tythe of thy grain, and of thy wine, and of thine oil, and the first born of thy kin, and of thy sheep, that thou must learn to fear the Lord thy God always.

Yesterday I told you the cause why God forbad the people of old time to eat of some certain kinds of meats. For in as much as we be fed and sustained by his hand, it is good reason that we should use his creatures purely, and that we should have leave of him, so as every man take not leave of him, so as every man take not leave to do what he lifts, but what Gods word permits us to do. Therewithal I showed also, that although the ceremony be no more used nowadays, nor we anymore bound thereunto as the fathers of old time were which lived under the law: yet notwithstanding the doctrine thereof ceases not to be profitable for us. And hereby we be done to understand, that it is not lawful for us to eat or drink without faith. (as S. Paul speaks of it in the xiii, to the Romans) that is to say, unless we be sure that God gives us the things which we receive for our sustenance, as if a father should feed his children. On the other side, we have far greater liberty nowadays, than was under the Law. We see how liberal GOD is towards us: and we have the more cause to yield him thanks. Moreover the thing that was set down in figures to the Jews in old time, is uttered as now unto us without figure: that is to say, that in all cases and all respects we must bridle ourselves, so as we meddle not with the defilements of the unbelievers, but separate ourselves from them, seeing that our Lord has gathered us into his flock and sheepfold. And this figure of the old time, is a warning for us nowadays. For although we be no more bound to the keeping of it; yet notwithstanding it ought to move us the more to serve our god purely, sith we see he has given us a greater privilege than he gave to the Patriarchs and Prophets. After the selfsame manner is it with the things that Moses adds here. For yesterday he treated of the meats that were foul and unclean in those days. And he sorted them into their several kinds. You shall eat of such beasts, said he: but in any wise beware that you touch no swine, nor any such like things. Now he treats of strangled meat, as of flesh that dies alone without killing and without letting of it blood. And no doubt but that his setting down of this, is to show that in so doing there is a double abomination according to the law. For first and foremost when a beast died so alone of itself, it was unholy forehand, and the very only touching of it was able to make a man unclean. And that was the cause why God did so forbid his people to eat thereof. Again, the blood of it was settled in it, we have seen already how it was not lawful for the Jews to eat blood, and that was because that in the blood we have as it were a lively image of the soul and of the life: and Gods meaning was to teach his people to abstain from all cruelty. And hereof we have the reason expressed in Genesis, at such time as Noe and his offspring were forbidden to eat blood; where it is added that we must spare men, because a man is the image of God, and whosoever does any outrage unto him, shall not escape unpunished. Now then, Gods care was not for the beasts when he forbad the Jews that eating of their blood: but his intent was to teach them by that means to abstain from all cruelty, so as they should be loth to do any outrage, and specially any murder. But as for us in theses days we be not in such bondage. For our Lord Jesus Christ has freed us by his death and passion. Nevertheless, howsoever we far, the groundwork abides still; so as a man may forbid a little child to handle a knife, least he should hurt himself with it: and yet an elder body also is to be forefended from hurting of himself, whereas yet notwithstanding, the handling of a knife were not evil for a children but in respect aforesaid. And therefore God who took the Jews as little children, forbad them straightly the things that are permitted us at this day. Howbeit, the final end is all one both to them and us: insomuch that we must consider, that if Gods will was to have the Jews kindhearted, and to know that the shedding of blood is a detestable thing: the same ought also to be regarded of us at this day, although the figure thereof be abolished. True it is (as we read in the xv. Of the Acts) that the Apostles forbad the Gentles to eat blood or anything that is strangled: but that was not for any sin that was in so doing. It was to avoid occasion of offence, because (as it is there alleged) Moses was read openly, and the law was published abroad in all cities, so as they heard it there forbidden. The Jews could not abide at the first, to see them eat blood, which named themselves Christians: for that was a loathsome thing to them. Therefore men were fain for a time to forbear the liberty that God gives nowadays to all the faithful, accordingly as S. Paul speaks thereof, saying that the things which are lawful for us are not always expedient: for they edify not. We have indeed our consciences free before God: but yet if I see my brother offended, it behooves me to bear with him, if his so doing be through infirmity, and in any wise I must have a consideration, whether a man be already thoroughly instructed in the faith or no. The intent of the Apostles then was not to make a grounded law wherewith to tie men's conscience, and to hold them in bondage: but only to avoid all occasion of causing folk to stumble. But this has been ill marked of a great sort of ignorant persons. For they have thought it to be deadly sin to eat the blood of any beast, as we see it maintained still at this day: and that was a foolish and beastly superstition. For (as I said afore) our Lord Jesus Christ has cancelled the obligation of the Law of Moses, so as we be no more bound unto it. But yet for all that, it behooves us to live in concord one with another, and to have a regard what our neighbors are able to bear. There is not the like reason for us nowadays to forbear the eating of flesh upon Fridays: for it is a mere devotion, and it was forged and invented without any likelihood of reason, yea and it was matched with a kind of idolatry, for as much as the Papists have surmised themselves to serve God by that means in forbearing to eat flesh upon certain days, which was too gross a folly. Nevertheless, if a christen man should come among the Papists, and go about to teach them that are yet altogether blinded, the point that he should begin at, must not be the eating of flesh upon Fridays, for that would fear them quite away; because they never heard that it is lawful to do it, and therefore could never conceive the truth of it, and besides that they should see him go about to break a law which they take to be most holy, without informing them of the true meaning of the whole. Such dealing therefore should be contrary to God's meaning, and to Christen liberty. And therefore order and measure are to be observed in those cases. But by the way, let us remember that we have cause to give thanks to our God, for exempting us from the bondage that our fathers were subject to under the law: and that we must also benefit ourselves by those figures, by learning to live friendly with our neighbors, abhorring all murders and outrages, not only actual murders but also hatred, which is likewise condemned for murder before God, though it be never so secret and close kept, as says S. John. That is the thing which we have to note when it is said unto us that God utters his will without any shadow, and not in dark speech as he did to the fathers, but as one that speaks with open mouth: and therefore let us hold ourselves contented therewith.

Now after this commandment, Moses adds that we must not feeth a kidde in his dames Milk.: but word for word, it is but in Milk. It has been commonly understood, that a man should not feeth a Kid in his dames milk, or make sauce with Goat's milk to eat Kidde's flesh withal. And thereupon, the Jews (who will needs be always adding of somewhat to the pure word of God) have made a Law that it should not be lawful for a man to eat cheese made of Goats milk after he had eaten kiddes flesh, until he had first well scoured and washed his teeth, for to their seeming, that would have been a defiling of the man. But when all things are well considered, the meaning of this text is that men should not rost a kid as soon as he were new yeaned, but that they should let it suck for a time, that it might be flesh meet to be eaten. And this was done to the end that folk should not injure themselves so much to the following of their own appetite, as to fall into any beastly cruelty: for from te one, men come to the other. Let us always bear in mind how it was declared yesterday, that God was well willing to give his people leave to eat of all manner of good and convenient meats, saving that Ire meant to hold them in awe for the trial of their obedience, and yet notwithstanding ment not only to set them down some order of diet or fare like a Physician. For it were to gross an imagination to think that God provided but only for the diseases of his people, as though all his Ceremonies had tended but to the feeding of their bodies. For the putting hereof among the old figures and shadows was not for naught. Then let us conclude that God had a further regard when he forbad the eating of a kidde in his dames milk. And indeed we see how in another place he forbids men to catch an old bird sitting upon her young ones, for it is a kind of cruelty. If a man find a nest of Partridges or other birds, and catch the dam sitting upon the young; God condemns it, that is to say, he condemned it in old time in the Law among the Ceremonies. And why so? Because it is against nature. For we see how the feely birds are so careful for their young that the damme will rather starve than forsake them. Whereby we be put in mind to do the like. Seeing then that the feely birds, to discharge their natural duty, do forget themselves so far that they pass not what misery they endure, nor what care they take for the cherishing of their young ones, insomuch as they suffer themselves to be taken with hand, and yield themselves as it were into bondage for them: were it not an act of extreme cruelty for a man to go kill them? Good cause therefore had God to forbid it, to show that men ought not to pass their bounds, as take leave to do what they lift, but to restrain themselves to some kind of humanity. And so whereas in this text God forbids men to eat a kid in his dams milk; it is as much to say, as men ought not to devour a young beast as soon as it is come into the world, until it have sucked a time: neither can the flesh of it be kindly and good to eat. Nay, moreover it imports a kind of barbarous over fierceness, when men are so greedy that they will need take the beasts at the first fall of them, and not tarry till they may come to their full season to be eaten, as some have been seen to be so beastly, that they have ripped that dams bellies to take out the young ones. It has been seen that a glutton has not been contented with the creatures which God has brought forth into the world, but he must also go rip up a Hind to have the Calf for the satisfying of his appetite. It is said that the earth is full of infinite riches, and that god has powered out such treasures as are able to amaze us: and yet for all that you see how some man will play the detestable monster. When he has pampered his belly with ordinary food, he falls to devising I wote not what: in so much that if it were possible he would create a new world, to feed his paunch withal. And although he be not able to make a fly, yet falls he to imagining. I will go slit a Hind or a Doe, and take out the untimely fruit out of her belly to feed upon. And is not that too great a wickedness? No doubt but that such desires have been in all ages; but behold, God tells us that we must use such temperance and soberness in our diet, as we may always have a regard to the maintaining of humanity. We must prescribe a rule ourselves, and our eating and drinking must not be so barbarous, that it should be a mean to harden our hearts and make us to forgo all humanity, which is a thing divers times quite forgotten; but that we should live together in good quietness, and abstain from all injury and evil dealing.

And as touching the Ceremony whereof I am to speak, which the Jews observe and whereof they have made a very solemn law: we see thereby how the world will needs pay God always with petty trifles. And that is it from whence such superstition is come. It is all one with that which we have seen heretofore, where God forbad his people to disfigure themselves at the death of any of their friends. But the Jews considering not to go what end such prohibition was set down: observe it according to the letter. Well then, they must not disfigure themselves: but yet they had not an eye to gods meaning, which is that men overshoot themselves too far in making too much sorrow at the decease of their friends, tormenting themselves without measure, blaspheming the name of God, and fretting inwardly. And therefore God intended to repress such corruption. Yea and as though men's sins provoked not God's wrath sufficiently of themselves: they think it not enough to be impatient, but they do also provoke themselves to it still more and more. For we see there is no measure in men's sorrowing, but they enforce themselves to weep, and do many other things to increase their grief and heaviness, kindling the fire still more and more, which is great enough already of itself. After the same manner deal they in all other things. But what do the Jews still in this behalf? They may not disfigure themselves: but in the meanwhile they rend their garments. And so the meaning of the Lawmaker, which was simple, is defeated. For to their seeming, when a friend of theirs is dead, they must not be without sorrow for him, for that were a dishonoring of him, and therefore they must rend their garments for him. And besides that, they must make such Countenances, and such Ceremonies,. So as they must not eat that day in their own houses, but spend that day abroad in mourning, and in doing his and that. When they have finished a hundred pelting toys, they bear themselves in hand that they have well pacified God; and yet notwithstanding that they may despise him all their life long. And herein we see as in a looking glass, how greatly our nature is inclined to superstition; and secondly that always we will need have ceremonies to content God withal, and to discharge our duties towards him. Our nature (I say) is so bent to superstition, that if God forbid a thing, indeed we dare not do it with intent to resist him, but we seek some other byway, so as GOD shall be disappointed, and never have the thing that he demands. As for example, the Christians which bear that name, take not upon them the very superstitions of the idolaters as they term them; but yet they follow the self fame indeed with a little disfiguring of them, and so they bear themselves in hand that god espies them not at all. The idolaters carried bread and drink to the graves of the dead. Bearing themselves in hand that the souls were fed therewith; and they carried thither lights to the intend to glad them. Now the Papists have thought this to be too great an absurdity. But what for that? They offer up bread, and wine, and candles, and money at their Masses; and the souls departed (say they shall find relief by it. Verily if it be replied that the superstition of the Papists is not all one with the superstition of the heathen: indeed there is some difference betwixt them. But to what end do they so, but to content GOD with some new exchange? For (as I said) it is a thing rooted in man's nature. And we ought to mark it well: for we would soon fall into it, if we were not restrained by God's word, as by a short and rough bridle. And all comes from out of this spring, that we will not serve GOD as he requires, but by a sort of Ceremonies I wote not what. And when we have once made some show of devotion; we bear ourselves in hand that he is well appeased, and that he ought not to press us any further. And thus you see that the cause why men in all ages have toiled themselves so much in the serving of God, and have invented so many trifling things: is that they will need pay him in such coin, because they were loath to deal uprightly and faithfully with him. God requires our hearts: and if he possess not them, all the rest is nothing worth. Now we be full of hypocrisy, and we be not willing to discover our back nooks which are full of dissimulation, malice, and rebellion, but would always keep them still to ourselves. And yet in the mean season we pretend marvelous holiness with our eyes, our feet, and our hands. Therefore let us learn that this mischief has reigned in all ages, to the intent we may rid ourselves of it; and let us assure ourselves that God will not be served at our hands by outward Ceremonies. True it is that all our whole life ought to bear witness that the fear of him is well rooted in our hearts. Faith is a dead thing if it utter not itself by good fruits. Moreover if we intend to have our service accepted of God, let us assure ourselves that we must begin at the fondness of heart, and that all Ceremonies are to no purpose, except they show that our heart is right, pure, and unfeigned. Thus much concerning the superstition and abuse the reigned among the Jews and still reigns at this present.

We must always come back to this saying of our Lord, that the things which go into a man's mouth defile him not, but the things that come out at his mouth, as all manner of wicked affections. One is full of ambition and pride, another burns in covetousness, and a third practices spitefulness and treason. Every man has his vice himself, so as one is a glutton and another is a whoremonger. These are the things that infect the man, yea and they infect the whole world. Therefore let us learn to clean ourselves from all such filthiness: and as for Ceremonies, let us know that we ought to use them so far forth as God requires them for the uttering of our faith: but yet must we use them simply, and not be wedded too much to them. For we see that the devil will by and by have a towel ready to blindfold our eyes withal, so as we shall no more consider the principal, but forget it utterly and abuse ourselves to things of nothing. To the intent then that we may not have our eyes so bleared; let us follow God that way which he calls us: that is, to serve him in all pureness.

And now as touching the principal point of this sentence, where it is said that a kid must be eaten in his dam's milk: let us understand that God will have us to use honesty and soberness in our eating and drinking: that is the thing in effect, which we have to remember in that text. Truly as touching the figure, we be no more tied to it, as I have said afore: but as for God's meaning, that is durable. When men do give themselves to their lewd and outrageous appetites, it is all one as though they meant to overthrow the order of nature. You see how drunkards (when they be so full that they be ready to burst) do invent such shameful things, that an honest man would be ready to cast up his stomach to hear the things spoken of which those swine do. When they be as full as their skins can hold, they whet their stomachs, and take shooting horns (as they term them) to draw on a cup of wine, and such other like things, so as we may see that men cannot content themselves with any measure; but although God show himself liberal towards them, yet notwithstanding they will needs follow their inordinate lusts still, declaring that their desires are insatiable and never at rest, till they have brought themselves to shameful disorder, without regard of any modesty. Sith we see such things, we may well perceive how it is not without cause that God has warned the Jews to use a kind of honesty in their living and feeding: which thing belongs much more to us at this day. Although we have not the Ceremony anymore; yet will God have us to live honestly, and to use a sobriety in our eating and drinking, so as we may always lift up our eyes and say, Lord, we have received food at thy hand, and we know that thou show thyself a father towards us. But if we make a hotchpotch of all things without discretion, surely it is no taking of them as at God's hand, but we shall find at the last, that we ravened them up like beasts. And therefore let us learn to refrain ourselves. Thus we see how the doctrine that is contained here, is not unnecessary at this day, so we can apply it duly, and with discretion of the holy ghost to our instruction.

Now after this, he says concerning beasts that are strangled, and are dead in their blood; that they should give them to strangers or else sell them. It seems here at the first sight, that God should as well condemn those beasts for the strangers as for the Jews. For if it be not lawful for me myself to do a thing; why should I be an occasion to my neighbor to do it? Am I not guilty of sin in so doing? Here we have to consider the reason that Moses adds: Thou art a people holy unto thy God. Here he shows that God had shooled out the Jews from all other nations of the earth, and therefore he would not have them to defile themselves with any kind of meat. Now if it be demanded, and why then had they leave to sell or give the things to strangers, which were abominable as in respect of themselves? The reason is this: That god having named the beasts which he would have his people to eat of, did leave all beasts without difference for all other men to feed on which were not instructed in his Law. True it is that he had forbidden all mankind to eat the blood of anything, and consequently to eat of any beast that was strangled to died alone. But the most part of the world was already gone astray, so as they know not the law anymore, and we see how that even in the life of Noe, his posterity entangled themselves in a number of superstitions and idolatries, and had forgotten god who had preserved them so wonderfully: so as there was no more but the lineage of Sem, which was but a very small portion, that held themselves to any pureness in the serving of God. By reason whereof the whole world grew into such a licentious liberty, that all was mard. God therefore reserves a people to himself, and brings them back to the first law, saying. Seeing I tell you that I have chosen you to be my household: I set you down a special order, that you may have my badge whereby to be known from all the unbelievers of the earth. After that manner does god deal. But men run gadding on their own head, and follow always their own affections, and cannot find in their hearts to submit themselves simply to God's law as he requires. Truly the thing of itself were not evil, if there had been no law against it. And this law was given to the Jews, for the two reasons which I have alleged afore. The first was for the try all of their obedience, that they should show themselves to be subject unto God. And the second was, that thereby they might be quickened up to keep themselves from all corruption. But as for the heathen, they might have eaten of all meats, so they had acknowledged the giver of them and the creator that had made all things to their use, worshipping him purely and abstaining from all cruelty and outrage: but they lived in the world like beasts. They had indeed a kind of imagination that there was one God; and they forged a great number of gods: and yet for all that while every man had an idol by himself, the living God was forsaken of all men. For as much then as the heathen had not the Law appointed unto them: the Jews might well leave those kind of meats unto them.

And verily thereby they were done to understand that the thing of itself was not evil. Seeing that God gave them leave to sell or give unto the heathen the flesh of such things as were not ordinarily flain; thereby they might perceive how it behooved them to look yet further. And why so? As touching murder, because it is forbidden of itself, if it be not lawful for me to kill a man, neither is it lawful for me to lend a sword to kill him withal, nor to use any manner of treachery. No then, in things that God condemns of themselves, and which are evil of themselves: it is certain that all men ought not only to abstain from them, but also to beware that he give not any occasion to any other body to do them. And so it is to be concluded, that sith the Jews might without offending God give or sell the flesh of strangled beasts: God showed thereby, that the thing of itself was not evil; and that his forbidding of it was but to hold them under awe, and thereby to lead them yet further, intending to make them understand, that they ought to live in tall manner of pureness, because they were a holy people. This is that which we have to remember upon this place. Now, whereas he speaks here of strangers, he means all the heathen which were not of the line of Abraham, as if we in these days should speak of the Turks and Sarazins, we might say they have no fellowship with us because they were not the badge of Baptism, and despise the God whom we worship. For God's law speaks to all men alike, at leastwise the moral law as the term it, that is to say, the law that rules our life: but the law that belongs to the Gospel, speaks to none but to the Church of God. s for example the Turks and the Sarazins have not to do with the supper of our Lord Jesus Christ, neither can they any skill of Baptism. True it is that they have washings, and they wash themselves oft enough: but all that ever they have is no better than the holy water of the Papists. As for the things that are peculiar to us, and which God has given to us as to his children and household folk, those belong not to such as are altogether estranged from the Church, and the holy scripture. And therefore let us mark well, that whereas God does here give the heathen leave to eat all manner of meats: it is because he was not so gracious to them, as to give them the instruction that was peculiar to the children of Abraham, and to the holy lineage which he had chosen from the whole world. Now notwithstanding all this, if the Jews had complained that God held them in more subjection than he did the heathen, and that their own estate was worse than others: might we not say that it were too great an unthankfulness? If a Jew should say, How now? Seeing that God has chosen us for his children, why does he not give us as great liberty at the least, as he has given to those that belong not unto him? If a Jew should speak after that manner, we would be his judges, and every of us would say, fie on him wretch, he shows himself too dishonest and churlish. For seeing that god has chosen them for his people, and instructed them in his pure doctrine: should they find fault with him for his holding of them under the obedience of his law? But let us apply this to ourselves. For in as much as God has gathered us together into his house; he will have us to walk more carefully and warely, than the silly ignorant souls that are strayed from the way of Salvation. If we say that that were too rough and severe a dealing; we ourselves are too unthankful. It is said that we must live as children of the light: and no marvel it is though such as have not learned God's word do stut and stumble and go astray; for they be like blind wretches in the dark. But we have God's word, which is as a lamp to give us light, and again we have been enlightened by the holy Ghost, so as we know the will of God. And shall we now run astray as though we had never known any good doctrine? Now then whereas God has tied us shorter than he has tied the ignorant; if we thereupon will needs shake off his yoke and fall to checking at him, as though we had lever to have the licentious liberty of the unbelievers, than to be held under the obedience of God our father: we were worthy to be rooted out of the world/ For it were too great a defacing of God's gracious goodness, to do so, when God has chosen us to himself and given us his badge, as if he should say, I will reign among you, let it appear that you have been in my school, let not my showing of myself to have been your father and Savior be in vain. So then, let us mark well, that whereas God calls us unto him, it is with this condition, that we should not live any more after the manner of the ignorant wretches which woote not how to order their conversation: for they do follow their own beastly lusts. It is enough (says Saint Peter speaking to the heathen that had been converted to the belief of the Gospel,) it is enough (says he) that you have done heretofore, you have given too much heed to your wicked affections already, see that none of you take such licentious liberty anymore, but submit yourselves to God's yoke; and sith it is god's will to have the government of you, suffer yourselves to be guided by his hand, and obey his word in all things, utterly forsaking your own wicked lusts.

Now then, whereas in these days we see the world to be altogether corrupted: let us not alleged other men's cross dealings in defense of our own, neither let us make shield of them to say, why should we be held more in awe than other men? Alas, is it to be marveled at that those should go astray, which have no light? But seeing that God has sent us the son of righteousness, let us assure ourselves that it will be no excuse for us, though the ignorant wretches do go astray after their own imaginations. Surely this is ill put in practice. For our whole seeking nowadays, is nothing else but to heap together all the offences in the world, to make a confused hotchpotch of them. If it be said that there be a number of men which are given to fraud and guile, and are full of subtlety and deceit: we rest upon that and are contented to counterfeit their vices, and to allege them in sport. As for men's virtues, we let them alone, and make none account of them: but as for their vices, we make a bar of them against God. O say we, you see how such a man does so, another does after that fashion: this is a common custom everywhere: and while have us to be holier than all other men? Besides this, it is alleged thus also. What I pray you, do not the Papists so before us? Yes: but the Papists have shaken off the yoke of our Lord Jesus Christ, they have withdrawn themselves from him and from his Church. True it is that they have baptism which is the sign of Christianity: but they have utterly abolished the true use of baptism, and we see how they have no skill at all either of God or of his word. As for our part, forasmuch as we have the Gospel, and that we are thereby convicted that it is God's truth, and we be preferred before those that were at leastwise as good as we in respect of the world, and seeing he has chosen us after that fashion, are we not too much to blame if we come not to offer ourselves wholly unto him, saying, Lord govern thou us, and let us not look at other men's doing to be carried away by their mis-example ; but let us always be gathered together as it were under the shadow of thy wings? Thus you see that we have to mark upon this admonition of Moses, know you (says he) that the Lord your God has separated you out from all other nations of the earth.

After this, he comes to the tyths whereof he had spoken afore, and says, You shall tyth the first of all your fruits which you shall have gathered , as well of Corn, Wine, and Oil, as also of the first born of all your cattle. The repetition which our Lord uses here is not more than needed. For (as we have seen heretofore) men are so wedded to their own profit, that their duty cannot be had at their hands, but by force, and they must be fain to have their ears beaten daily, or else (if it be possible) they will do what they can to exempt themselves from doing their duty, specially when it comes to the Law of God and to the things that he requires at our hand: for we will be ashamed if we yield not our duty unto men. When a man has misbehaved himself towards men, you shall see him ashamed to lift up his head. True it is that faults shall not fail to be committed, and that there will be a thousand devises to defraud men by theft, robbery, extortion, and other wicked practices: but yet will men always look the warelyer to themselves, because they be restrained by shame. But as for to Godward, men are quite past shame, and set all the random as though they would pull out his tongue, or forbid him to speak, when they have taken from him that which belonged unto him. And so you see what is the cause that God has spoken so oft of tithes which he would have offered unto him, and likewise of the first fruits. I have told you already that the tithes were allotted to the Levites, because God reserved them to do him service: and it behooved them to live upon the Altar, because they were dedicated thereunto. The same reason is in force at this day towards us. Not that we be bound to the same manner of tything that the Jews were further forth than civil order requires: but that we must always come back to this saying of Saint Paul, that like as the Levies lived upon tithes because they were dedicated to the service of GOD: so nowadays they that have the charge of teaching in the Church, ought to be maintained with living likewise, and God has made an everlasting law thereof.

But yet moreover, we have to note, that the tithes were allotted to the Levites as in recompense of their inheritance whereof they were deprived. For God had promised the Land of Canaan to all the lineage of Abraham, by reason whereof the children of Levie ought not to have been bereft of their portion. Yet notwithstanding, God bereft them of it. And why did he so? To the intent they should not toil themselves in tilling the ground as other men do, but give themselves wholly to his service as became them. In respect whereof it was good reason that they should be recompensed after another manner. Truly this matter cannot be discovered at large as now, and therefore we will delay the going through with it till tomorrow, taking this brief sum of it for a conclusion, that our Lords meaning in this place, was to set down a Law for the maintenance of his service. And for that cause it was his mind that the Levites should have whereon to live for they were the parties that had the charge to maintain the pure religion:

and for that purpose were they dispersed throughout the whole land of Canaan to the end they should keep the people in the pureness of God's services, as we see the prophet Malachi speaks of them, saying that they ought to be expounders of god's law, as at whose mouth men ought to seek what is good and lawful. The cause then why GOD has not only set down this law but also repeated it, is for that he will have his services maintained. And because men are negligent in yielding him his dew, he has vouchsafed to repeat the law again which he had set down before; and besides that, his intend was also to put us in mind to honor him with all the goods which he bestows upon us in this life. For surely if men eat and drink without yielding any honor unto God, they defile the things which they receive. For the true mean to sanctify meats, is by faith and prayer says S. Paul. Without faith and prayer, all things become unclean to us. And now you see here how god commands men to offer unto him their first fruits and tenths. And why is that? Because that be the means folk were provoked to say, True it is that the earth brings forth her fruits, we have a good harvest and vintage, we have store of Oil and vittles; and how is he that gives us all these things? Has the earth a soul to determine whit itself to nourish us? No, it is God our father that does it: and therefore it is good reason that we should have regard of him, and consider how much we bound unto him. Thus you see how that in the tithes and first fruits, there was a solemn protestation that whatsoever we have we receive it at god's hand, and therefore we ought to do him homage and sacrifice therewith. Which thing is then done, when we pray unto him to bless them all, and when we show effectually by our almesdeeds and such other like things, that we be willing to offer all things unto him which he has put into our hands, and to use them in such sort, as we may have a care to follow measure, and to frame ourselves to the sobriety which he has commanded us.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good GOD with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to behold us with pity, and not to impute unto us the great number of offences whereof we be guilty before him, but that it may please him to rid us clean from them, even by forgiving them: and moreover to draw us so unto him by his holy spirit, as our whole seeking may be too dedicate ourselves thoroughly unto him, continuing throughout in his holy calling, to the end. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father &c.

fourteenth Chapter

24 And if the way be too long, so as thou cannot bring them, because the place which the Lord thy God shall have chosen to set his name in, is too far from thee: and that the Lord thy God have blessed thee:

25 Then shall thou make it into money, and take the money in thy hand, and repair to the place which the Lord thy GOD shall have chosen for himself.

26 And thou shall give the money for whatsoever thy heart desires; whether it be oxen or sheep, wine, or strange drink, or any other thing which thy heart likes. And there feed thou on it in the presence of the Lord thy God, and be merry both thou and thy household.

27 And thou shall not forsake the Levite that is within thy gates: for he has no portion nor inheritance with thee.

28 At the three years end thou shall gather together all the tithes of then increase of that year, and lay it up within thy gates.

29 And then the Levite which has no part nor inheritance with thee, and likewise the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow which are within thy gates, shall come and eat, and be refreshed, that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the works of thy hands which thou do.

Forasmuch as Moses, in speaking heretofore of first fruits and offerings, and freewill obligations; had commanded that they should be offered in Jerusalem, or else in the place which God was then to choose: now he adds, that if a man dwell too far off from that place, he might make money of the things that were to be given for an offering unto God, and after the sale thereof, buy the like things again, which should be wholly dedicated to God whatsoever they were. Now I have told you already, how it was not for naught that God would have one certain place, wherein to offer solemn sacrifices unto him and to worship him: for it served to maintain the unity of faith. Insomuch that if every tribe, or at leastwise every city had had an Altar by themselves; it had been enough to have made havoc of all, and men could not have continued in concord and brotherly love. Therefore it behooved the Temple to be a meeting place for God's people, to the intent they should altogether acknowledge themselves to be but one body, and understand that they were bound all to one rule, which is the law, and all of them obey the same, without any diversity of opinions, or strange manner of dealings, or ceremonies among them. And in the same respect also were they commanded to offer in the Temple, to the end that every man should not behave himself after his own devotion as they term it. For when men will needs serve God after their own fancy, there will be nothing but corruption. We must always bear this saying in mind, that obedience is better than all the sacrifices in the world. And therefore they were forbidden to offer sacrifices in any other place than only one which was appointed for that purpose, to the intent they should not every man muse upon foolish superstitions, but hold themselves to the order that was set down, without attempting anything rashly and fondly upon their own heads as I said. And this is spoken expressly unto us. For although we have not the selfsame order of religion which was among the ancient father under the Law: yet does this ground stand still, that God will not which thing is then done, when we pray to him to bless them all, and when we show effectually by our alms deeds and such other like things, that we be willing to offer all things to him which he has put into our hands, and to use them in such sort, as we may have a care to follow measure, and to frame ourselves to the sobriety which he has commanded us.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to behold us with pity, and not to impute to us the great number of offences whereof we be guilty before him, but that it may please him to rid us clean from them, even by forgiving them, and moreover to draw us so to him by his Holy Spirit, as our whole seeking may be to dedicate ourselves thoroughly to him, continuing throughout in his holy calling, to the end. And so let us all say, Almighty God, heavenly father etcetera.

On Thursday, the 24th of October 1555
The 92nd Sermon, which is the third upon the fourteenth Chapter

24. And if the way be too long, so as though cannot bring them, because the place which the Lord your God shall have chosen to set his name in, is too far from you: and that the Lord your God have bless you:

25. Then shall you make it into money, and take the money in your hand, and repair to the place which the Lord your God shall have chosen for himself.

26. And you shall give the money for whatsoever your heart desires: whether it be oxen of sheep, wine, or strange drink, or any other thing which your heart likes of. And there feed you on it in the presence of the Lord your God, and be merry both you and your household.

27. And you shall not forsake the Levite that is within your gates: for he has no portion nor inheritance with you.

28. At the three years end you shall gather together all the tithes of thin increase of that year, and lay it up within your gates.

29. And then the Levite which has no part nor inheritance with you, and likewise the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow which are within your gates, shall come and eat, and be refreshed, that the Lord your God may bless you in all the works of your hands which you do.

Forasmuch as Moses, in speaking heretofore of first fruits and offerings, and freewill oblations: had commanded that they should be offered in Jerusalem, or else in the place which God was then to choose: now he adds, that if a man dwelt too far from that place, he might make money of the things that were to be given for an offering to God, and after the sale thereof, buy the like things again, which should be wholly dedicated to God whatsoever they were. Now I have told you already, how it was not for naught that God would have one certain place, wherein to offer solemn sacrifices to him and to worship him: for it served to maintain the unity of faith. Insomuch that it every tribe, or at leastwise every city had had an Altar by themselves; it had been enough to have made havoc of all, and men could not have continued in concord and brotherly love. Therefore it behooved the Temple to be a meeting place for God's people, to the intent they should altogether acknowledge themselves to be but one body, and understand that they were bound all to one rule, which is the law, and all of them obey the same, without any diversity of opinions, or strange manner of dealings, or ceremonies among them. And in the same respect also were they commanded to offer in the Temple, to the end that every man should not behave himself after his own devotion as they term it. For when men will needs serve God after their own fancy, there will be nothing but corruption. We must always bear this saying in mind, that obedience is better than all the sacrifices in the world. And therefore they were forbidden to offer sacrifice in any other place than only one which was appointed for that purpose, to the intent they should not every man muse upon foolish superstitions, but hold themselves to the order that was set down, without attempting anything rashly and fondly upon their own heads as I said. And this is spoken expressly to us. For although we have not the selfsame order of religion which was among the ancient fathers under the Law: yet does this ground stand still, that God will not be worshipped after our opinion, but according to his own will. Therefore let us be well aware that we invent not superstitions (as the Papists have done) upon surmise that they will be accepted of God: for they will do nothing else but provoke his wrath, insomuch that when men turn away from God's truth, the more they enforce themselves forward; the further off do they still stray from it. Will we then keep the right way? God's word must overmaster us. And this thing is yet the better confirmed to us, by God's reserving of he place to himself wherein he would be served. For he could well have said by Moses; Choose what place you yourselves like best, and when you have so done, God will give you leave to come every man thither, and there to do him service. All this might well have been said. But God says, it belongs to me to choose, I will not give the choice to men. Herein we see how he reserves the right of sovereignty to himself, to the end that the faithful should the better know, that it is not for them to enterprise aught at all adventure, but that it behooves them to have warrant from above, so as they may say, God accepts all that ever we do; for we do nothing but what he commands us, none of us deals upon his own head in this behalf. Wherefore let us mark well, that God has here done us to understand, that he will not have his service mingled with our inventions, but that we should simply follow the things that are contained in his word. And so you see that as concerning the things which I have said already, God was to be worshipped solemnly nowhere else than in the Temple of Jerusalem after it was declared: and that until that time, it behooves the Jews to resort to the Ark and to the Sanctuary. But now let us come back again to that which is set down here in writing.

If the place (says Moses) be too far from you, you shall sell the things which you want minded to offer, or the things which you ought to offer. For it behooved them to offer the first born of all their cattle. Now they that dwell in the uttermost coasts of Jewry should have had much ado to drive thither their Lambs, Sheep, Goats, and Calves. Therefore they were to be born withal: and God being no oppressor of his people, gives them here a remedy, to the intent they should not be grieved too much. As for those that dwell near to Jerusalem says he, let them bring thither as well the first born of their cattle, as also all their freewill offerings, and whatsoever other things they have dedicated to God. For otherwise the City of Jerusalem might be famished. If all that had come thither should have bought their sacrifices there: what a thing had that been? Therefore it was God's will that men should bring that thither from all the countries, unless the places were over far off. And in that case he says it should be Lawful for them to sell the things that they had dedicated, namely such as were due by commandment of the Law: as the first born things, in remembrance that God had smitten the first born of Egypt, and spared the firstborn of Israel, whereof he would have the memorial to continue forever. You shall sell it (says he) and put up the money, of fold it up (for so does the word signify which he uses.) Fold up the money in your hand (says he) that is to say, consider with yourselves that that money is none of your own, but that it must be put up alone by itself as a holy thing. And when you comes to Jerusalem, you shall buy shine offering after thin own liking, and after that the same has been offered in the Temple, the Priests shall take their dues thereof, and then shall you eat and drink thereof before the Lord as soon as you have made your oblation thereof, and you shall be merry in eating of your sacrifices, as far as every man's portion will extend. That is the thing in effect which we have to remember in this text.

And here we see (as I have said before,) that although God held his people under very straight bondage, yet notwithstanding he laid no more upon them than they were able to bear, but so mitigated the rigor of the Law, as no man could say it was impossible to do the things that he had enjoyed. Since we see it is so; Let us assure ourselves, that if our good GOD do in these days lay any burden upon their shoulders, that may be too heavy for us; he does also give us ability to bear it, so as we be not born down by it, at leastwise if we commit ourselves to him; so as we have no cause to complain of him as though he did utterly overwhelm us. True it is, that the righteousness which God requires of us in his law, does far surmount all our ability, yes, and we come so far short of the performing of all that he has commanded us, so as we be not able to stir one finger towards it, nor, we cannot so much as think one good thought towards it: GOD must be fine to give us every whit. But when he assists us with his Holy Spirit, then we find his yoke sweet and easy, specially, when he lays it upon our necks by the hand of our Lord Jesus Christ. And that is the cause why Jesus Christ protests that his burden is not too heavy, nor his yoke too hard. But how comes that to pass? It is because God gives us both the will to serve him, and also the ability to put the same in execution. And therewithal he adds a second grace, which is that he bears with us when we have done amiss. For we of ourselves are over frail, we cannot thoroughly perform the things that he commands us, and therefore he pardons our infirmities and forgets them. But howsoever the case stand, yet have we good cause to serve him freely and with a frank heart, forasmuch as we see that he on his side desires no more but to guide us as the father does his children, as he avows by his Prophet Hosheah.

But now let us mark, that whereas Moses says, Let them by whatsoever they have a mind to: his meaning therein is not to give men leave to play the gluttons at their pleasure, as though there were no measure nor modesty to be observed. A certain sect of Heretics called the Maniches, which scorned God's law and the Prophets, alleged this present text and such other like, to show that the God of the Old Testament as they blasphemously termed him, was a God of disorder, and such a one as kept no good rule. For why, said they; he laid the bridle upon his people's neck, and bad them eat whatsoever they liked, and so his meaning was to make them drunkards and gluttons, by encouraging them to eat and drink after that fashion. But the true God (said they) will have folk to be sober, whereby a man may see that the Law was not given from heaven. But we see how this text was corrupted by their malice, yes, even by their shameful malice, in blaspheming without any color of truth, seeing that the lusts of men were restrained before by the same Law. I told you yesterday how it was God's will to bridle his people, by restraining them from the eating of all sorts of meats without exception, wherein he meant to have a trial of their sobriety. Since it is so: it is a foul shame to allege this text as a placard for the setting of all lusts at liberty. The word Liking, Longing, or Lifting, ought rather to be restrained to the things that were Lawful, and which God had given them leave to deal with. As if it had been said, Those that have a mind to eat of any kind of meat which is Lawful for them to eat, let them buy it and make an offering thereof to God. And when the Priests have taken their rights thereof, let them eat the residue themselves.

So then let us mark that here are two things contained. The one is, that our Lord shows himself liberal towards his people in that he says, Go too, although I could withhold my blessing from you; yet notwithstanding I give you leave to make your own choice of your meat and drink, albeit with this exception , that you take heed that you touch not any meat that is not pure and clean to you: for it behooves you to be exercised for a time in the endeavor of dedicating yourselves to me, that you be not tangled in the defilements of infidels. Therefore let that proviso stand forever, so as you always take good heed to use your liberty in such sort, as you may have no cause to blame me as though I held you too straight. For I leave you to your own likings, so they be well ruled. Now then let us understand, that here our Lord bears with us, in that he vouchsafes to give us the use of his creatures, not only for our need without other desire to them, but also even for our pleasure: and yet notwithstanding, that we must always take good heed, that our mirth be not excessive, but rather well moderated. And for that cause is it said, You shall eat there in the presence of your God, which saying has been set down already heretofore. Nevertheless it is not for naught that Moses repeats it here again. For we see how men are wedded to their own sensuality, and how they forget themselves in their eating and drinking, so that it is very hard to keep such measure as God be not offended, yes even are we think of it. I say that even such as are not given to gluttony and drunkenness, and which have a care not only to the health of their bodies, but also the sober using of the things which God gives them for their repast; even they (I say) fail not to commit some fault or other. So then, let us bear well in mind what is said here, where God commands men to eat and drink in his presence, specially at their solemn feasts when they came to Jerusalem: namely how that thereby he did warn all the faithful to have an eye to him in their eating and drinking when they were at home in their own houses.

Therefore when men sit down to the table, they must in anywise beware that they take not their repast without minding of God. For why? First it is a defiling of all our meats and drinks when we begin not at the calling upon his name. Of whom shall we receive our food, if we seek it no at God's hand? Then must we begin at prayer and that is as it were a dedication, to the end that our meats may become clean and holy to us, as Saint Paul speaks of them. But yet besides this, we must come again to the thing that is said here; namely that we must come eat as in the presence of our God. Were it well printed in our minds that our God is present at the table with us: surely we would use another manner of modesty than we do. And out of doubt, the putting of this lesson in use, that God is among us, is a true proof of our Christianity. But it is a wonder to see what insensibleness there is in these days among Christians. For it was God's will that even among the Infidels there should remain still some confused tokens of that which is said here. Because the heathen were of opinion that their God's were always attendant at their meals; they termed their Tables holy. And why so? It is certain that they understood not the reason of it: for all things were become unholy among them, by their misusing of all things against their kind. Yet notwithstanding, God to make them inexcusable, did leave this mark still among them, as if he should say, whensoever men do eat and drink, I am present at it, so as all things done there must needs come to account before me. Now then, if we know less hereof than those blind wretches, what a thing is it? So much that more therefore ought we to mark well this lesson, where God commands the people old time to eat and drink in his presence, to the intent that the same might hold them in awe, and make them to consider that whensoever they did eat or drink, God governed them and beheld their doing. And now although we have not the ceremony that was under the law; yet let the truth thereof have his force among us: which is that we never come to the table, without considering that God is present there, and that as he vouchsafes to have a care to feed us, so will he also have us to take our food with all reverence and honest behavior, like as if a child be at the table with his father, and his father sitting at the upper end do look upon him, surely he will not use such boldness as if he were in a corner by himself. For their perchance he would play the way, and throw his trencher under foot, and play other wanton pranks: but if he be at his father's table, either he must behave himself soberly, or else be rebuked for his labor. Let every man bethink him of this, and let it be a mean to hold us in such awe, as the meats which God gives us may have their pure and lawful use. That is the thing which we have in effect to remember upon this text.

And now he speaks likewise of men's household folk, showing that if we intend to be merry before God, we must also have a care to instruct those that are committed to our charge. Mark that for one point. It is not enough for a man to live in the fear of God himself; but the father that has children, and the master that has men servants and maid servants must lead them with him, and there must be one consent in every household, so as both great and small do serve God. For it is intolerable lewdness, when a man lets his household play the beasts, so as God is not known among them. And what a thing is it that men should look to be served of their folk, and in the meanwhile forget God? There is none of us all but he will look to be known for master in his own house: and in the meanwhile what a pride is it that God should be thrust out of doors? What a thing is it, that we which are but wretched earthworms should look to have our duties yielded to us, and that God should be defrauded of his? That is the cause why is it said expressly, that men should make merry with their households before God.

Nevertheless, hereby God meant also to ensure his people to humanity. For we see a number of men that can find in their hearts to cram themselves till they burst, and in the meanwhile pass not though other's starve: and it should seem that a whole world were little enough to find one of them. But our Lord's will is that there should be courtesy among men, that when the masters have sufficed themselves with meat and drink, they should not be niggardly in giving food and sustenance to such as take pains in their service, but have a care of them. That is a second thing which our lord meant in this text. But now let us pass on.

After that Moses has spoken of first fruits and offerings; he returns again to Tithes, and treats more fully of them. You shall not forget the Levite (says he) which is within your gates. Every third year shall you lay aside the tenth of all your fruits, and the Levites shall come and gather them, and likewise the widows, the fatherless, and the strangers, that your God may bless you in all the works of your hands. Yesterday I began to tell you that in old time that Tithes were appointed to the Levites, because they served at the altar: and that God would not have then occupied about any such labor, as might hinder them either from teaching the law, or from doing of sacrifice and such other like things.

For inasmuch as God has reserved then to that purpose, his will was that they should give themselves wholly thereunto. That was the cause why he exempted them from tilling of that ground, and from such other labors. Besides this, there was also another reason, which was, that they should have had a portion in that land which was promised to the lineage of Abraham, for there was a whole tribe of them: but God had excluded them from it, and put in two tribes instead of the one, so as Ephraim and Manassas the sons of Joseph made two heads. And so were there twelve portions of the Land. But yet instead of the Levites you see the Ephraim succeeded: for Manassas was the first born of Joseph, and yet was he put after his brother and set in the second place, and made inferior to him. And so were the Levites excluded. But yet behooved it them to have their right. And therefore God recompensed them, and like as if a man should give his child recompense some other way when he would not have him to come to the parting of that inheritance with his brethren, even so stood the case with the Levites. Those were the two chief reasons for the Tithes. Nevertheless it was God's will that the over plus should be divided among the poor and needy. For the Levites had not so large a portion given them to make them gluttons and to enrich them above other men: but to the end they should be as deacons to have a care of God's poor folk, and to distribute his alms to his people. Now we see what was the cause of the Tithes.

But it is clean contrariwise in the Popedom, where it is said that by God's law the tithes are due to the Priests. Although (say I) that their Priests were such as they ought to be, so as they were not the priests of Moloch and of other idols, but that they served God purely: yet were it a gross ignorance to imagine that tithing were an everlasting order set down for all nations to observe. Again it was a flat fraud, in that the Priests being overruled by covetousness, did bear men in hand that the tithes belonged to them by God's law. For the contrary is well known. And their challenging of that, was at such time as the whole world was corrupted, and men were utterly ignorant of the meaning of the Holy Scripture. For since the time that Christianity has begun to flourish, and that there has been greater fondness of judgment than was before, it has never been said that Tithes are due to the Shepherds, nor to those which have the spiritual government of that Church: but it has been always orderly observed, that Princes and Lords have taken the Tenths: yes and in some places and countries which are less fruitful, they have taken but the Thirties or at leastwise but the Twenties: whereas in other places where the lands are more fruitful, and where there is greater abundance that is ordinarily in other countries, they have taken the tenths. Hereupon the priests and Clergymen of the Popedom, have taken occasion to finger all things, and to usurp upon all men most wickedly. For they have thundered out their ex-communications against such as would not grant them their robbery, so as men were driven to let them have their own wills. And then fell they together by the ears among themselves like a sort of corndogs about a bone. The Monks said, they be ours: the Priests said they were theirs: and to be short, there was nothing but utter disorder among them.

Yet notwithstanding, we must return again to that which was touched yesterday, and which I am about to rehearse again now presently: which is, that inasmuch as the sacrificing Priests were found at the common charges of the people, in the time of the old Law, it is good reason that the preachers of the Gospel should be maintained likewise at this day, as Saint Paul speaks thereof, albeit not for his own advantage sake, but to the intent there should not be so great unthankfulness among those which name themselves Christians, as to defraud those of their bodily living, which preach to them the world of life, and bring them the spiritual food of their souls. The thing itself then remains still: but that it should be taken up in this kind or in that kind; that is not so; it is not so said by God's law, and therefore what shall become of Tithes? Let the possession continue still, and let the use of them be amended. That is to say, because men see evidently that Tithes have been wrongfully usurped, and that the parties which hold them in their hands have wrested them by superstitions: let us now consider the right use of them. And to say the truth, look how many Priests there are in the Popedom, so many thieves are there. I say not this according to the Holy Scripture, but according to their own Canons, whereby they be all excommunicated for thieves and robbers. For their Canons command them to part their Church goods in such sort, as the poor have one fourth part of them, and strangers another fourth part. To be short, the one half of the Church goods ought to be bestowed in alms upon the poor and upon strangers. Who says this? Not God's word, (for the Papists make none account of that) but their own Canons have so decreed. You see then how all the Bishops, Chansons, Pryor, and Abbots in the Popedom are excommunicated everyone from the highest to the lowest, even by their own Canons: so as there is every where most horrible confusion among them, I mean even according to their own orders. But it is not enough for us to condemn them: we must also have an eye to ourselves, and see that the right use of the things which have been dedicated to God, be set up again: And that were any abuse has been, the same be redressed. And how may that be? We see it was God's will that the poor should be found and maintained by a part of the tithes, that is to say of the offerings which were made in those days. After the same manner must we come to the use of God's Law at this day: and forasmuch as Tenths or Twentieths were left even in old time to Princes and chief Lords, and that the same order was set down for the benefit of the Church; Let us consider how it may be employed to the benefit of the Church at this day. It is not meant that such as bear the name of Prelates and Pastors should glut themselves with them: nor that when they have slotted themselves with them: nor that when they have sot themselves in their pleasures and delights and spend more than needs in prodigality and idle expenses, they should have wherewith to maintain whoredom and other stumbling blocks, as we see that the Church goods are commonly wasted in such things. For we know that such doings are against the order of nature, and therefore can in no wise be justified by God's word. What is to be done then? Let the possession remain quietly, and in the meanwhile let men return them to their right use. Let them be maintained whom God has commanded to be maintained whom God has commanded to be maintained. And let the things be continued which are requisite for the well ordering of the Church. Moreover, let the poor and needy be pitied; Let men know them to be the takers up of God's rents; and that it is an acceptable kind of sacrifice to him when such are relieved as ought to be succored. After that manner we may justly condemn the Papists at this day, yes and take them for Church robbers and thieves, by reason of their wrongful challenging of the things to themselves which belong not to them. And we on our side shall not be condemned for the like, if we run back to God's will, and dispose the Church goods in such wise, as the poor be not defrauded of them, but that such alms deeds be done with them, as the necessity of those be relieved whom God commands us to succor, and whom he offers us as in his own stead, according to this saying of his, that look whatsoever we do to the poor, he takes it as done to himself. Since it is so, let us follow that rule. For we see how this lesson is greatly for our behoove nowadays, and how we may put the same in use.

Let us mark well then, that it is not only said that the Levites shall come and gather up their right; but also it is added that the widows, the fatherless and the strangers shall be sustained likewise. Yes verily: Albeit that the strangers were not some times of the body of the Israelites, nor of their religion: yet was it God's will that they should be pitied. Not to nourish any filth and uncleanness thereby; (for it folk might have resorted thither from all nations, and have dwelled there, it had been the next way to have turned the people away to wickedness:) but it served for travelers, and for such as had intercourse of merchandise with them, whom God's will was to have succored when they fell into any adversary. Now seeing that the Israelites were to relieve those that were not so near neighbors to them: what ought we to do to our brethren, and to such as are all of oneself same faith and Religion with us? If we shake them off and suffer them to pine away for poverty, how greatly shall we be to blame, seeing that God commends to us that poor strangers, yes even which have no acquaintance with us in the serving of the true God? But howsoever that case stand, let us remember in general, that of the goods which were consecrated in those days to God, part was to be employed not only upon the Priests and Levites, but also upon the relief of the poor, so as it behoved them to have a part with the priests so far forth as the tenths would yield. What is to be done then nowadays? Forasmuch as the ceremony of bringing of our Freewill offerings to a place chosen for that purpose is done away, if we intend to offer such sacrifices as maybe acceptable to God, every of us must do alms deeds according to his ability, and think thus with himself: Go too, my God has given me change of meats, I eat one kind of porridge today and another kind tomorrow, and yet might I content myself all my life long with bread and water. But God of his bounteousness gives me more over what meats so ever like of best, yes and change of them also; so as if I be weary of one meat, I may take another according to my ability. Seeing then that he deals so with me, what unthankfulness is it for me to despise him that shows himself so liberal towards me? True it is that our so doing is neither here nor there (as they say) in respect of God: the service that we do him does neither amend him nor pair him: but he gives us the poor among us, to be succored at our hands, to the end that none of us should so glut himself by cramming his own belly, as to despise others that are in necessity, but that we should be well advised to make an offering to God of the things that he has put into our hands, and that the same might become holy by that means. Not that we should pay it as a ransom to God: but that the acknowledgment which we make to him in having compassion upon our poor needy brethren, is as though our Lord should allow of our eating and drinking, saying thus: Now is all lawful for you, I like well of it, I give it to you; and that is because you honor me in doing alms deeds to such as are in poverty. Thus you see what every man has to bear in mind as in his own peculiar and private behalf.

Albeit, for common orders sake, because there are revenues appoint to the Church, as I have touched before: let us beware that they be not abused by being devoured I knew not how, or that they be not misspent about wordily matters. For men are always given to cantle out the poor folks morsels as short as can be, and it seems to them that whatsoever is bestowed in hospitality, is loft. Oh (say they) we must lock up, we must spare, we must play the good husbands: but cursed be that good husbandry which regards not the well bestowing of a man's goods. Therefore let us have an eye to the disposing of the things which God offers to us, and whereas there have been abuse and superstition, let us understand that all ought to be brought back again to their right use: and that although the ceremonies continue not still; yet notwithstanding God will not be mocked: but that this principle must always stand in force, namely, that whatsoever has been dedicated to God, must be distributed accordingly. Now there was also a tithing of the tithes, whereof I cannot but say somewhat. For after that the general tithes were taken up, the high priests took their tenths thereof, and afterward laid out a tenth part for the poor. Forasmuch as this third tithing was not intended by God; but proceeded of the covetousness of the Levites, who could have found in their hearts to have raked all to themselves: it was meet that they should be restrained. And after the same manner, the Popes Canons that I spoke of, were made of purpose because men saw the Church goods devoured by the Priests, by reason whereof it behooved them to be bridled. The tithes therefore were parted in such sort, as the poor might have their portion, and not be defrauded of the right that was assigned to them. But (as I said) we need not as now to stand sifting of these things by parcel meal: it is enough for us that we have the meaning of the law, and that we know wherein the abuse rested, to the end we may retain the right use of them still.

Now it is said consequently, That the Lords your God may bless you in all the works of your hands. In this text we have two things to mark. The one is that all our Labor would be to no purpose, if God of his mere grace did not prosper it. Let that serve for one point. Another is, that if we will have God to further us, we must honor him with the goods which he gives us, by using them in such wise as he commands us. For if he be defrauded of his right, he can soon bereave us of his blessing, so as we shall be dis-pervade and strip out of all things; and when we think ourselves to have abundance of all things at will, he will make it to vanish away to less than nothing. Those be the two things which we have to bear in mind. As touching the first, let us bear in mind that men are commanded to travel for their living, and that such as do take pains shall be maintained by their labor. But yet must not men say, It is mine own policy, it is the labor of mine own hands that has gotten me this or that, as we have seen in the eighth chapter, where God fed his people forty years with Manna, to make them to know that when they were come into the land of Canaan, albeit that they tilled the ground, gathered the grapes, and reaped down the corn; yet they should not imagine that their living proceeded from elsewhere than from God's mere goodness who blessed them. And that is the cause why it is said in the psalm, that we may well rise early and go to bed late, and eat our bread with sorrow; and yet notwithstanding all shall go to decay, and God shall hold us under foot, until we be sure of his blessing.

True it is that God does oftentimes multiply the goods of the wicked, and of such as live altogether by extortion, deceit and the every: we see that such kind of men may well enrich themselves, and God bears with such things to blind their eyes he more with their riches, that they maybe as a poison to them; and as a bait to choke them withal. For inasmuch as they imagine that they can enrich themselves whether God will or not: he lets them do so, yes and he gives them riches as if he should say, Gather till you burst: yet shall it not turn to your sustenance, but it shall be as a poison to kill you, as I said before. For when men enrich themselves after that fashion by wicked practices, we see what comes to it in the end. God's wrath lights upon them, and they be tormented all their lifelong: and when they look to enjoy the goods that they have gathered together, God's curse does so utter itself upon them, that they cannot do themselves any good with them: insomuch that although they have their garners and store houses full fraught, and their bags full of money; yet does God send them diseases or such other afflictions, by which he holds them as it were upon the torture or rack; as if he should say: what has you done your wretched creature? You has offended me all the time of your life, and yet has you born yourself in hand that all should go well with you if you might heap up rich now. But you must now be made to know, that all your raking up of the riches which you cannot enjoy, will stand you in no stead. Thus you see what reward they have which will needs enrich themselves as it were in despite of God: insomuch that all their scrapings to themselves on all hands by unlawful means, are but as cords to snare their children with all, as experience shows. And therefore let us be thoroughly persuaded in ourselves, that if we will prosper, the only blessing of God must suffice us though we have not all things at will. When we have taken never so much pains, yet must we not trust in the strength of our own hands, nor be so blinded with fond presumption as to say, I am an able man. I am politic and can take pains. But let every man refer himself to God, knowing that it is he which gives him sustenance. And although I take never so much pains to get my living: yet must I have it at his hand, and when I have asked my ordinary bread today, I must do the like tomorrow too, and yield myself to the will of him that gives it me. Thus much concerning the first point, where mention is made of God's blessing of the works of men's hand. And therewithal let us call to mind what has been declared thereof more at large heretofore, where our Lord will men to consider how it is only he that bears the sway in making our labors to prosper. Let that serve for one point.

And now let us come to the second point: which is, that if we desire to be partakers of God's blessing, we must first yield him his right: for if he be defrauded of it, he will revenge it upon us. And that is the cause why he says by his Prophet, Do you complain that you be afflicted? Consider the cause, says he. You have defrauded me. Whereof? Of my tithes, first fruits, and all other things. You bear yourselves in hand that you increase yourselves greatly by robbing of me, and that you gain much by defrauding me of my right. The people of Israel were so witless, that they stole the tithes; or if they tithed, they did it but by halves: and likewise of their first fruits, instead of making good fulsome sheaves and bundles to God, they gelded them and made them very thin and lank: and yet these miserable wretches bare themselves in hand that they benefited themselves greatly by laying up some little quantity more than they ought to have done. Contrariwise our Lord says to them: Go to first, should you have either tithes, or first fruits, or any crop at all, but by my blessing? And think you that your filching away of any of the things that belong to me, shall boot you? No, no: you must needs be wasted and die for hunger by reason of your unthankfulness. Therefore let us learn to yield God the things which he reserves to himself: and then will he bless us. As how? When we be to be sustained, the first fruits that God requires of us, are that we should wait upon him, and sue to his mere gracious goodness for all things requisite to the maintenance of this frightful life.

And afterward when he has given us whereon to live, we must use the same soberly, that our life being ruled after that fashion, maybe as another sacrifice to him, and consequently that we give our neighbors part with us. Let such as have wherewith impart to the poor that want: and let every man beware that he filch away none other men's goods, and let us be contented with our competent food and raiment as God lifts to bestow upon us: and in so doing we shall be blessed at his hand. But what? Our distrustfulness, our excess, and our insatiable lusts cause God to withdraw his blessing from us, and that we are, as it were dried up. Also it is seen that instead of going forward we go backward: and what do we thereupon? Such as have plenty can no skill to use it according to God's ordinance, and to be thankful to him for the abundance which he sends them, but they would still have more and more. Oh, say they, this is not enough for me, and though it be enough for me, yet it is not enough for my children. And so we fall to gathering of more and more. But to consider how we come by it, and whether it be lawful before God or not, we never hearken after it: we go to it by hock and by crook, and we never think that we shall come to a reckoning for it before God. To this point (I say) are we come nowadays. And therefore it is no wonder though we feel no blessing of God, but that we be find to be set besides it. Again we may see hereby how cold and faint our prayers are: for our asking of our daily bread at God's hand is but from the teeth outward: and therefore it is good reason that we should receive as scant and slender fruit as appears that we do. Wherefore let us mark, that if we intend to feel God's blessing, and that he should continue the same towards us; we must offer up ourselves in sacrifice, and all that ever he gives us, so as all may be wholly dedicated to him.

And when we see the use that he allows us, let every of us behave himself thereafter, that God maybe glorified by us as his intent is to be.

Now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to grant us the grace to come to him with humility, sorry for provoking him so many ways as we do without ceasing; and to vouchsafe so to bury our offences, as we preach into the presence of his majesty by means of our Lord Jesus Christ, to be guided by his holy Spirit, and to be confirmed more and more in this; that he holds and avows us for his children. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth et cetera.

On Friday, the 25th of October 1555

The 93rd Sermon, which is the first upon the fifteenth Chapter

At the term of seven years you shall make a year of Freedom.

2 And the manner of the freedom shall be after this sort. Every creditor shall release the debt of his hand which he has lent to his neighbor, and he shall not constrain his neighbor nor his brother: for it is called the year of the Lord's release.

3 You must compel a stranger, but as for your brother, forgive him.

4 In any wise let there be no poor body among you: for the Lord will bless you in the Land which the Lord your God gives you for an heritage to possess.

5 Yes, if you obey the voice of the Lord your God in keeping and performing all his commandments which I command you this day.

6 For the Lord your God will bless you, as he has promised, so as you shall lend to many folk, and not borrow of any. You shall reign over many Nations, and they shall not reign over you.

We have here a law for the releasing of such as were indebted. Now we know that God governed the Jews according to their own rudeness, insomuch that he granted them a toleration in many things because they were a people hard to be ruled. Yet notwithstanding he ceased not by all manner of means to allure them to gentleness, to the end that no man should grieve his neighbor beyond measure, nor use too extreme rigor, nor deal cruelly one with another. That is the mark which the law shoots at which I have read here presently; so as you must understand that it was not Lawful for them to press any man with his debts in the seventh year. And it has been thought that in this place Moses commanded the clear forgiving of all debts the seventh year. But in that supposal is no reason at all. For if debts had been quite and clean released: much more reason had it been that such persons as had yielded themselves into bondage for the discharge of their debts, should have been released: for we know that the freedom of men's persons is much more acceptable, than the releasing of the debt of money. Must a poor man be held as a slave and make it good with his body because he has not wherewith to pay that he owes: and shall he be released which keeps the money still in his purse, or else uses some odd by shift, so as he abides freely at home in his own house? That were no upright dealing. But the case stood so among the Jews, that such as yielded themselves into bondage for the discharge of their debts, were not set at liberty again till the year of Jubilee which was the fiftieth year. Therefore it follows that here is not meant the clear release of all debts. For that had been the way to have procured more disorder, rather than to have set down a rule of courtesy and gentleness. For no man would ever have lent any money the sixth year. Again, men would have been the more hasty in calling for their debts, so as their debtors should have been much less privileged than if there had been much less privileged than if there had been no release at all. Also there are other reasons which are very sufficient; insomuch that every man should have been driven to sell his own house and land. To be short, it is not to be doubted but that God's intent here, was to command no more but that the seventh year should be privileged. And hereby it appears that such as have interpreted the seventh years compass to be the seventh year's end, have been too grossly overseen. For the making of this law was in respect that the seventh year should be a year of solemn rest. Like as God had reserved one day in every week to be holy to himself: so also was it his will that every seventh year should be a high solemnity, so as the ground should not be tilled that year. The land of Jury was battling enough to have born all years, that is to say, men might have tilled and sowed the ground every year saving the seventh year. And that year was spared, not for fear least men should have worn away the heart of the soil too near: but to the end that the people should inure themselves continually to the day of rest, because it contained the chief point of the Law, that it to know, that men ought to gather their wits to them, to give themselves wholly to the minding of God's benefits, whereby it is showed them that they should renounce themselves, and refer themselves wholly to his Holy Spirit, to be so governed by him, as that their affections and thoughts may no more overmaster them. And indeed, because the Jews did break the day of rest, and the Prophets could not win them to yield to that which was commanded them: our Lord says that he would punish them in such sort, that since they would not, the Land should take rest for them. Forasmuch as you (says he) will not keep the Sabbath days accordingly as I have ordained in my Law: I will shortly find out one that shall observe my Law, and that shall be the Land itself. For you shall be driven out of it, and none shall be left in it to manure it; all the Sabbaths that have been broken must be put into a reckoning, that they may be recompensed again. Three score and ten years were the people banished out of it. And look how many commandments there are, so many tokens were there continually of the solemn resting times. What resting times? Not every seventh day, or every seventh year only: but for the space of seventy years together was the Land to take rest. You see then that this seventh year was a confirmation of the fourth commandment of the Law, that is to know, of keeping holy the seventh day. For in that year (as I said) men tilled not the ground. And why? To the end that folk should have the better leisure to give themselves to the serving of God, and be not so much let by their business, as indeed they had the more liberty to mind this lesson, and to be well instructed in the doctrine of God. And for the same cause also was it commanded, that the book of the Law should be read openly every seventh year at the feast of Tabernacles, as we shall see hereafter in the one and thirtieth Chapter

Now that we have God's meaning, which is that his ordaining of the seventh year was to the end that the people should have some easement: let us assure ourselves that the Sabbath day was not enjoined without cause. Not only to give men to understand that our Lord had forbidden that any man should be sued for his debts that year (for that was likewise done every week): but also to avow the thing which we see objected in the eight and fiftieth of Esau, against such as through hypocrisy observed the feast, but yet ceased not any whit the more to sue for their debts. Verily I am much beholden to you, says the Lord: for you say you have fasted, and observed my ceremonies. But yet is all that ever you have done, nothing worth: for the very substance of it wants: whereas you should be pitiful to your neighbors, you do nothing else but fleece them and persecute them to the uttermost. And surely that is a goodly observing of the Sabbath. Therefore do I renounce you, and I disavow all your doings, says the Lord.

So then, we have here the end of the Law that is set down here, and also the thing which the same commands. For like as God meant not that men should plead the seventh day, to the end they might be the better drawn to observe that feast, which was to gather men to God, and to cause them to rest in him: so meant he also concerning the seventh year: namely that the Jews should give themselves to upright dealing: insomuch that if it were not lawful to gather the fruits of the earth, and that the fruits which grew without tilt were common, so as the poor which had no possession were partakers of them: it was much more reason that if a man were over pinched, he should not be pursued with rigor of Law. But in the year of Jubilee, which was every fiftieth year; there was a greater freedom, and such a one as extended much further. For if a man were in bondage, he was then made free, unless it were that he liked so well of his master, that he bound himself to be his slave forever as long as he lived.

Afterward, all possessions returned home again. True it is that the houses in Cities could not revert again, unless the sellers of them redeemed them within a year. But as for Farms, and other possessions in the country; the purchaser was to convey them back again at the fiftieth year, so as they returned to home again to their former owners. And according to the nearness or farness of the year of Jubilee, men sold their possessions the dearer or the cheaper: insomuch that the lands so purchased were released again within thirty, twenty, or ten years after the purchasing of them. And of this dealing there was one special reason; which was that God having divided that Land of Canaan by lot, intended to have it continue in that order forever, to the end that men's possessions should not be intermingled together.

And he says expressly, Other Nations possess their lands in see simple: but I hold you as my farmers. I will not have you to be as owners, so as you might say this is mine: neither shall you be as purchasers of the Land at my hand: you shall have as it were but a sojourning place in it for a time, and you shall be but as a farmer under a master. Lo here the cause why our Lords will was that the possessions should return to the first owners again. But as for that which is spoken here, concerns but the seventh year, at which time every man ought to be released, and no man ought to sew his dotters, yet every man ought to retain his own right nevertheless still. For God's meaning was not that he which had lent money should lose it, so as he should have no means to recover his debt again: (for so should one man have robbed another substance; and the distrust merchant that had wasted his goods in riot and excess at his ease without care, should have laughed his creditor to scorn as scorn as the seventh year were come, which had been a great disorder, and would have caused unthrift to have become the worse): but God's intent was only that there should a kind of respect be given, that the poorer sort might not be pinched out of measure.

But now let us return to that which is set down in the text. In the seventh year there shall be a forgiving, that is to say, a forbearing or a giving of further respect. He means not that there should be a clear acquittal or releasing forever: but only that he which had lent money, should not challenge his deter out of hand, nor be so greedy and hasty as to seek it by sure of law that year. And he speaks expressly of the end of the year, to show that his forbearing or respecting should not only be at the beginning of the year, but even throughout to the seventh year's end. And here God meant to bound his law according to the circumstance: that is to say, because the seventh year was a kind of resting time as well as the seventh day was: therefore our lord's will was that the same should be observed.

Therefore says he, at the term: albeit not to signify the end of the year, but to betoken the continuance of the time appointed by the law. You shall give a respite, says he, and the manner thereof shall be thus: If any man owe you aught, you shall not constrain him, at leastwise for the deter of your hands. As if he had said, you shall not take the thing by force, but shall rather forbear the deter. And why so? From this forbearing comes specially of God: that is to say, God reserves that year specially to himself, as he will have it openly proclaimed as it was indeed, and he will have the order thereof to be kept.

He adds, In any wise let there be no poor body among you. This speech is somewhat dark, because the first word that Moses uses signifies Nothing, or it is not at all: and sometimes when it is joined with another word, (as it is in this place,) it betokens except that, or saving that. And for that cause some men understand that our Lord sets down an exception here, namely so there were no poor folks. For if the deter were rich, they might always be well contented to pay. But the poorer sort were to be born with, and to have some easement: the vexing of whom after that sort, was a kind of sucking of their blood, and a drawing of the marrow out of their bones. Again the seventh years respect was a mean for them to gather somewhat towards their discharge.

Moreover there was the more cause why the poor should be born with all the seventh year, the ground was not tilled that year, and therefore Corn might become the dearer by reason that there was not gathering of anything that year. For it was not with them in those days as it is with us in these days, that when one piece of ground lay fallow, as they say, another piece was with corn, so as they might have a crop every year one after another wherewith to find themselves. In that land of Jewry they gathered not so much as one kernel of wheat, Oats, or other kind of grain in the seventh year, neither was it lawful for them to till the ground that year: by reason whereof the poorer sort had much ado to get their living by their labor and travel. That was the cause why some have taken it to be as an exception when our Lord said, if per adventure you have no poor among you. Well, may you demand your deter of such as are wealthy and well able to pay, but beware that you pinch not your neighbors that are behind hand. Other some take it thus, so as there be no poor among you: that is to say, deal in such wise as no man be brought under foot by you, but that the poor and the meaner sort may live with the rich: and let no man be so greedily minded as to put things out of order by his excess, like the great fishes that eat up the smaller fishes: Take heed that you sue no such cruelty towards your neighbors. Also a man might take the said word as betokening Nothing: as though our Lord had spoken after our common manner and said, No, no, there must be no poor among you. But as for the meaning of the Law it is certain enough to us, which thing ought to suffice us, and it is all that we should look for.

Therefore let us understand that our Lords intent was to say here in few words, that men ought to behave themselves so friendly, as no man were oppressed, and that although it lie not in men to let that there should not be both poor and rich among them: yet they should so deal as the poorer sort were not trodden under foot. For we see that such as are wealthy do lay their snares, and catch whatsoever they can come by, so as the poorer sort dare not come near them: and if they get but the value of a pin at their hands, they fleece them of it by and by again. Therefore it was our Lord's intent to provide a remedy for that mischief among his people. Now remains that we apply this matter to our own behoove. True it is that this order belonged peculiarly to the Jews: but yet does it concern us also: namely that we should not vex them out of measure, which are indebted to us. And it may well be among those that bear the name of Christians, that they will not go to law upon the Sabbath day: and the reason is, that upon that day every man ought to have leisure to withdraw himself to Godward to mind his works that we may all of us be provoked to serve and honor him. For, all our lifelong we ought to give ourselves to praying and supplication. Nevertheless common meetings are made that men may hear the common doctrine of salvation, and it is good reason that on the Sabbath day all other cares and thoughts should be laid aside. Notwithstanding let us take good heed that we keep not the single ceremony only, but also the intent of God therewithal, which is, that our neighbors be not so vexed by us, as they may have occasion to despise God, and to be cast into despair. For our Lord will have us give such respite as the poor may not be over grieved. We see how the faith in other places, that we must not take a poor man matters from under him: As for example, when a man has broken payment, if he bring his bed to lay to gauge, our Lord forbidden the taking thereof, and likewise the taking of a poor man's payment which he has need to wear. For it he be a cold (says he) and you keeps his bed from him, although he speak never a word, yet shall his sides curse you, because you best so head hearted that you have no pity of him when you sees him afflicted in his body. And albeit that poor man be patient in his adversity, yet does God in heaven consider the cruelty; and in the end he will revenge it. Contrariwise he that gives his poor neighbor his gage again, and is so pitiful towards him that he cannot find in his heart to see him endure necessity:

although the party so relieved to play the Churl, and regard not the good that has been done to him: yet shall he have his good deed to answer for him before me, says the Lord.

You see then that we must be kind-hearted both generally and particularly as time requires. As how? If there come a year of dearth, many men will seek to enrich themselves by it, and they bear themselves in hand, that it is a time even for their own tooth: and it is a thing too much used nowadays, as it has been at all times heretofore: and would God we could forget it. But we shall see a number that lie in wait like scouts or spies, and if there come a dear year, Oh, say they, this serves well to make me rich, when as in very deed it is the time wherein they should open their bowls to have compassion of such as are in necessity. We see that poor folk have much ado to maintain themselves though they be succor: yes and such as heretofore have been able to live in their own houses without being pinched over near, are now driven to borrow. And why is that? They have their ordinary earnings as before: but corn and wine are at such excessive prices, that they be not able to buy them: every man shrinks away and holds himself short. And as for the rich man that hath wherewith to live. His mind is upon nothing else but how he may enrich himself, faith he this is fate year for me, for it is a lean year for all others. Alas, here is a wretched regard. So then let us learn that our Lords meaning by this law is not that we should forbear to reduce such as you would say. Wind shaken already, but that if we see a man that hath much ado to maintain himself we should not run upon him to overthrow him altogether. As how? If I see a man a little behind hand and I have a mind to some corner ground or vineyard of his, lo, he is in fit case for my purpose: and if I take him at the vantage, he is undone by it, and it is impossible for him to scope utter ruin. And when a man having that regard to self profit, endeavors to catch away the poor man's possessions: surely although there were no law of God at all: yet does even natural equity condemn it. But here our Lord shows us his will, which is, that whensoever we see any man distressed, we should spare him so much the more, until he have some means to recover himself again; and that we should not lie in wait to catch from him at every occasion that is offered to further the matter but rather that we should use such uprightness as to say, If I bear with him he will pay me one time or other, I see he is willing enough, I see he would pay me mine own and do as much for me if he were not over pressed otherwise: and seeing I know him to be such a one, shall I now set upon him with rigor? That were even as much as though I would cut asunder his hamstrings that he might be able to go no further. I see he is scarce able to draw his legs after him, and therefore if I should fall to cutting of his sinews asunder, and so fell him down altogether: if he be utterly overthrown for want of lending him my helping hand at his need, am not I the cause thereof? Shall not his poverty cry out for vengeance against me to God?

Now we see how this law served as a policy among the Jews, and yet nevertheless that it shows us God's will at this day, because it teaches us to bear with the poor and needy. To be short, let us mark that our sparing of the poor after that fashion, is an acceptable sacrifice to God, and that after the same manner, he will accept all other services that we do to him: whereas if we perform never so many ceremonies, and in the meanwhile have no equity nor upright meaning in us, we do but provoke God's wrath according to the saying of the Prophet Esau which I have alleged already. If we resort to sermons, and show ourselves to have never so great zeal and goodwill to God's word, and yet for all that, every of us do practice wicked devises to overthrow our neighbors, so as we seek to devour one another like dogs and cats: our Lord shall be much beholding to us for giving ear to his sayings, when in the meanwhile we make non account of the keeping of them. Nor contrariwise, let us consider that our coming hither is to be induced to brotherly love, so as the rich may bear with the poor, and that where any poverty is among us, they maybe so provided for as they may still come forward, and be so comforted as they may eat the bread which God gives them, with thanksgiving, and not be driven to despair, nor the name of God be thereby blasphemed. And we must not tarry till the time of forbearing be proclaimed by the sound of a trumpet: but we must hold ourselves contented with God's loud crying out to us from day to day. And this word must sound into our hearts: By which God requires that we should so partake with our neighbors that they should no manner of way be grieved by us: Again we must no look for a seventh year, because we must have at this present a continual rest: Seeing that God has rid us from the old bondage of the law: and therefore he will have us to rest ourselves all our lifelong in him: let us therefore give rest of our neighbors, so as they may be relieved and not have any occasion of heart burning against us for our despising and rejecting of them: but that the fatherly love which God shows towards us, maybe as a band to tie us together in brotherly goodwill as member of one body, so as no man do misuse his brother anymore than that hand would misuse the foot, because it would turn to the hurt of itself. And therefore let us have the same consideration of ourselves one towards another. Now let us proceed to that which God adds.

He says that his blessing shall be upon the people, so as they shall all prosper, and have wherewith to lend and not be driven to borrow: and that they shall reign over many Nations, and no Nation shall reign over them. The cause why our Lord adds this promise, is to confirm the law. And at a word (as I have said heretofore) albeit that our Lord might command after a precise manner: yet does he apply himself to us, endeavoring to win us to him, that we should obey him with a free heart, and not go to work by compulsion and constraint. You see then that the thing which he requires of us, is that we should offer him free will offerings as they term them. But let us mark that the upright dealing which we have treated of, served but only for the Jews. And therefore this promise, I will bless you, answers thereto. For it was lawful for the Jews to pursue strangers, such as were not circumcised. After that manner meant Moses, they were privileged, as being of the body of the Jewish people. But as for them that worshipped not the God of Israel, and were among them but only in way of traffic or for some other affairs: they enjoyed not the benefit of this law whereby the sewing of men for debt was forbidden. And the reason thereof was that they kept not the Sabbath for any devotions sake. True it is that they were fain to rest themselves whether they would or no: it was not lawful for them in any wise to work: they were driven to submit themselves to God's ordinance: but yet in the meanwhile they had no desire to serve the God of Israel. And therefore they were not to be spared as in respect of common policy. But now that God's grace is shed forth everywhere, we must not make any more difference between Jew and Gentle. For (as says Saint Paul) our Lord Jesus Christ has broken down the partition wall, to the end that being adopted of God for his children, we should maintain brotherly unity among ourselves, and every of us acknowledge his neighbor to be as his brother.

And as touching this promise, it was restrained for that time to the people of Israel. But nowadays, forasmuch as God's promises are common to all men because he has showed himself to be the father indifferently of all men: let us understand that our Lord declares here in general, that if we fear him and keep his commandments, he will bless us and make us to prosper: And this promise must be referred to the circumstance of the place. For we see how covetousness provokes us to catch what we can from our neighbors, because we be ever afraid of want. Oh (say we) If I may not have mine own, what a thing were it? True it is that our Lord does indeed permit every man to have his right: but yet must not every man be so given over to himself and to his own profit, that he should have no regard to spare those whom he holds as his underlings. For whomsoever has no regard of him that stands at his mercy: surely he can find in his heart, not only to live upon the parties labor, but also even to suck his blood. If I bereave a man of the mean whereby he should follow his little trade, so as he is brought utterly under foot: it is all one as if I maimed him in his body, so as I made him to pine away all his life after. So then let us mark well, that as touching this promise, our Lord had an eye to the eagerness which every of us has to draw to himself. And why do we so? Because we be afraid lest we should want. And therefore our Lord says, No, make more account of my blessing than of all that ever you can gather. When you have used all the craft and force you can devise to fish to yourselves by hook and by crook, and when you have gathered never so how a heap of goods together: all that shall not boot you so much as my blessing, that I multiply you and give you so much as shall suffice to maintain you withal. And although you have not so great store of things at once, as you could find in your hearts to wish: yet will I make the things available which you have in your hands. And if it be but little yet shall it be so enlarged, that you shall live at your ease. Now we see what God's meaning is. And therefore whensoever we be tempted by unbelief to catch other men's goods: let us bethink ourselves thus: how now? Shall we become rich in despite of God? At whose hand have we our living? Have we it not of his mere liberalities? Now he has not promised his blessing to any other than to such as walk in integrity, and do so bear with their neighbors, that they trample them not under their feet through over great rigor. But if I will needs enrich myself by hook and by crook: then do I spite God and provoke his wrath against me: and what hope is there then that God will bless me? Nor rather his horrible curse must needs light upon me. Therefore let us think advisedly upon these things. And that we may so do, Let us consider how it is he that gives wherewith to find and feed us, and that he must be fine to preserve the things that he has given us, and to make them available for our use, or otherwise we may well do what we can, and trot up and down, but all shall be but lost labor. God (say I) must be fine to open his hand to give us wherewith to live. And when he has once given it, he must also maintain it. For it might slip away from us every minute of an hour, if he should not make us to enjoy still the things that he has given us. Thirdly he must also be fine to give us the mean to it, and to turn the things to our benefit which he has put into our hands. For if we put them to any other use, we shall wonder to see how they shall come to naught. And why? Because God's blessing fails us. You see then how the thing which we have to consider when our flesh is so forward as to provoke us to grieve our neighbors: is that we must think thus with ourselves, yea, but what shall I gain in the end when God is against me? Sure, I am that I ought to think myself beholden to him for all things: and though I had all the world under my wing: yet were it nothing worth unless God blessed me. Since it is so, I must have an eye to him, and bethink me well how may obtain his blessing by enlarging my heart towards my neighbors after his example, who shows himself so liberal towards

And Saint Paul gives the self same admonition, not only to cause us to spare those that are in our debt: but also to induce us to do alms deeds, and to succor the need: for he sends us to him that gives us seed to sow Come on sirs (says he): think you that you have lost your labor when you have compassion upon the poor, and bestow alms upon them? No: no more than the husband man that lays his seed into the ground; for he looks to reap his crop again at Harvest time. Therefore when you do alms deeds, you sow: and your God avows that he receives with his own hand, whatsoever you give to the poor, yes and that he will make it return every whit of it to your own benefit, so as you shall reap fruit of it, not only at that great harvest time which shall be at the last day; but also even in this transitory life, your God will make you to perceive that your alms deeds are acceptable to him, and you shall be so much the more increased by them. And for proof thereof (says he) is it not he that gives the Corn every year to sow? When the husband man has sown his ground, how could he sow it again the next year, unless God gave it a head again? Consider then that when God gives you wherewith to do Alms deeds, it is to the intent to make it fruitful to you. It is alone as if he should give you seed in your hand and say that if you intend to gather fruit of it, you must first cast it into the ground. Will the husband man keep his corn still in his garner? Will he leave his land unsown for fear of bestowing some quantity of grain upon it? Even so when you see an unsown ground, that is to say a poor neighbor whom God offers to you, leave him not unsown still, but be free hearted towards him, and God will not suffer the seed to be lost which you have bestowed upon him, but will make it to yield you fruit out of hand. And so you see where to the promise that is set down here tends, namely Your God will multiple you in the Land which he has promised you.

Here Moses did put the people expressly in mind that their having of the Land of Canaan was of God's gift. As if he should say, whence comes to goods that you have, but out of the earth? And is that Land yours? No verily, not as in see simple. You have it but as bay lives. Your God will be known continually to be the Lord and master of it. Seeing then that he betakes the Land to you, may he not at leastwise require some of the fruit thereof at your hands? And that is done when you be pitiful towards the poor. That is the thing which Moses had respect to, when he said, This land has been promised you, and your God will give it you in possession. True it is that at this day we have not the Land of Canaan as the Jews had: but yet wheresoever we live, we be harbored there as it were by the hand of God, and it is he that finds us. Seeing then that we have our life and all things else of him, let us know that it is good reason that we should comfort our neighbors, and that we should use compassion towards them bearing with them, at leastwise if we will have God to continue his well doing towards us. To be short whensoever we be not sufficiently stirred up to refer ourselves to the blessing of God; let us repair to that things which we know by experience. Men cannot find in their hearts to trust to God, but rather are carried away and inflamed with their own wicked lusts, deceits, and lewd practices, so as they pass not how they come by things so they have them. But when we behave ourselves after that lewd fashion, and pass not for the blessing of God as we ought to do: let us come to the exhortation that Moses makes in this place to us; namely, that if I have nothing of mine own, I hold all things of my God. And seeing it is so that he has fed me and maintained me to this day: should I not put myself still into his hand? Though I had a thousand times more that I have, yet would it soon be swallowed up: but if I have very little yes, and yet less, my God who has not failed me to this hour, will continue his blessing still, and that ought to suffice me. Seeing then that experience (which is the school mistress of fools as they say) shows us how strong God's blessing is: are we not too lewd if we follow not that thing that is told us in this text, that is to wit, if we have not pity upon our poor brethren, seeing we have his promise, the performance whereof we have had accomplished by effect? That is the point where in God will have a trial of the love that we bear to him. Now he says that mercy is more worth than all the sacrifices in the world: and therefore he will have us to honor him the way, that is to say by pitying of our poor brethren, by succoring them, and by bearing with them when it lies in our power to trouble them: assuring ourselves that God accept the things that are so done to our neighbors for his sake. And he will not only show himself liberal towards us by making us ourselves to feel the fruit of our Alms deeds; but he will also continually increase his benefits upon us, in such sort that by means thereof we shall have continual cause to bless him and to glorify his holy name.

And now let us kneel down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to wipe them out so as they may not hinder us from being received at his hand: and that if he make us to feel his favor even in this corruptible life, we may much more be environed roundabout with all his spiritual benefits, that we may so grow in them more and more, as we may not be held back by the brittle things of this world, but rather so use them as we may keep on our way still, and communicate together after such a sort, s it maybe to the exercising of the faith which we have in God, and in his pure doctrine, and for the confirming of us in the hope which we have of the heritage of heaven, so as we may tend even thitherward, as we be daily called thither by the preaching of his word. That is may please him to grant this graced, not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth et cetera.

On Saturday, the 26th of October 1555
The 94th Sermon, which is the second upon the fifteenth Chapter

7. If a brother of thin become poor within any of the gates in the Land which the Lord your God gives you, you shall not harden your heart nor shut your hand from your brother that is poor.

8. But you shall open your hand bountifully, and lend him sufficiently for his need wherewith he is pinched.

9. Beware that there be no point of peevishness in your heart, that you say not, the seventh year which is the year of respiring is at hand, and thereupon you have a wicked eye against your poor brother, so as you give him nothing; and then he cry against you to the Lord your God, so as it become sin to you.

10. You shall give him freely, and let not your heart repine at your giving to him: for because of this the Lord your God will bless you in all your works, and in all that ever you put your hand to.

Here Moses goes on with the same matter that was ripped up yesterday, that is to know, that in the seventh year debts should be respite, to the intent that the poor should not be sued not molested. And I told you that the meaning thereof was not that they should be quite and clean forgiven, but that the poor should be so much eased. Now Moses adds a larger declaration, That the same ought not to hinder men from lending liberally when anybody had need. And this is added because men do always go about to defraud the Law. Although equity be showed us never so plainly, and that the Laws be set never so well together: yet are men so subtle in naughtiness, that they find always some starting hole, to bear the world in hand that they have not offended the Law, and yet the intent of the Law maker is defrauded. This is a thing too much accustomed; and would God there were not too many examples of it in experience. But what? When men think themselves to have set things in as good order as can be, a thousand means are devised to escape from them, and thereof comes so much brambling in Law.

For the end of good Laws is to stop the way to all prattlers, that there might be no debate or quarreling among men, but that every man might have his own right. And inasmuch as Laws do show that whomsoever offends must be punished; is it not a mean to hold every man in awe? But as I said before, the Law serves us but to devise wicked shift how to do hurt and harm until our hearts be reformed. Nevertheless, our Lord's meaning in this text, was to provide that the Law which he had set down should be kept, and that men should not take occasion there at to withhold themselves from succoring such as are in necessity. And yet notwithstanding, that which is spoken here was not only wrested to the defrauding of the Law; but also applied much worse. For such as were too much wedded to their own profit, took occasion at God's law to do less good and to show less mercy to their neighbors than otherwise they would have done. For why? Had it been lawful for them to have sued men at all times, so as they might have required their right at all times without exception: they would have lent money in the sixth year as well as in the first, and they would have made no bones at all at it. But now that a law was set forth, that there should be a forbearing of it in the seventh year, if a poor man requires succor, every man thought thus with himself: if I lend him money now, it is laid a water, I lose a whole years occupying of it, and what a thing is that? It were better that this good fellow should go provide himself where he can: for I intend not to hazard myself in this wife: for what can I tell what will befall within a year and a half? Their needs but a little hindrance, and beside he may fall into further poverty and then am I cut short of my money. Thus you see how every man would shrink away, and under color that God had commanded men to use gentleness towards their neighbors in the seventh year; the poor were disappointed of help and relief, and their throats were cut, so as there was no way for them to ease themselves of their want. And hereby we see yet better, that men not only be subtle in devising new shifts from time to time, to cover their misdoings: but also that when they have never so good and lust laws, they turn them to the clean contrary. And this comes to pass not only in worldly government, but also even in matter concerning God: wherein we see, that horrible corruption of our nature. And this is one point well worthy to be noted. When such as are in authority over us, as Princes, Magistrates, and Judges make Laws and Statutes: if we break them, that disobedience of ours (as Saint Paul shows) touches God, and therefore is not to be excused. But when as God comes as it were in his own person, and tells us his will as it were with his own mouth: if we then dally with him, and shroud ourselves by shifts and subtleties as though he were not able to see us: is not that a devilish malapert? But there is yet a far greater and more outrageous extremity, as I said before. God goes about to rule our life aright, he sees us pitifully wandering in our own affections: he sets us down an order what to do: and his will ought to be as a definitive sentence for us to stand to, so as we ought to inquire no further: for we know that whatsoever God allows, is perfect righteousness. Now when he has been so gracious to us as to teach us, What do we? We not only fall to dissemble in his Law, but also turn all order upside down, and transgress the very Laws themselves which he gives us to direct us by: Since we see such forwardness, we have good cause to dislike of ourselves, and to condemn ourselves utterly. And therefore seeing we be of malicious and forward nature, let us learn to suspect ourselves, and to yield to God's goodwill, that when he has given us his Law, he may also give us the grace to receive it with all singleness of heart, so as it may be to our benefit, and that we may not turn life into death, nor light into darkness. Thus you see what we have remember in the first place.

Secondly it behooves us to mark here, that the keeping of the outward form of the Law is not all that we have to do: but that we must specially observe the substance of the Law. Will we prove our obedience towards God? The way to do it is not by ceremonies, but to seek out the certainty of his meaning, and to submit ourselves thereto. For men will take good heed to the world ward, that they offend not in such wise, as they may be punished: and if a man can find some pretty shift to excuse himself withal when he comes before the judge: he thinks all his doings to be justifiable enough. A man then will make no conscience to offend, so he have wherewith to hide himself when he is reprov'd, and that he can say, as for me, I understood it not so: the Law says not so. He finds out some little word that carries a show of contrariety to the true meaning of the Law, and sets a counterfeit construction upon it, and so bears himself in hand that he has well ridded his hands of the matter, and that by that means he is clear of it. And therefore let us learn that it is nothing worth to have observed the Law as in respect of the outward form of it, that is to say, in such wise as men can find no fault with us; but that the chief point is to live soundly and roundly, accordingly as we see here that it was God's will that in the seventh year there should be a respect, that is to know that men should not sue for their debts, but suffer it to be a resting time, as I declared yesterday.

True it is that the Jews would not utterly transgress this order: but yet they thought it enough for them to discharge themselves of the ceremony, and they bare themselves in hand that God might well hold himself contented with such disguising, when in the meanwhile the chief thing was left undone. For the poor were not pitied to their relief, but rather men took occasion to leave them utterly destitute. Insomuch that how great so ever their need was, they were never the more relieved, and all under color that men could not recover that which they had lent. We see then how men would always appeal God with ceremonies. But let us bear in mind how he says by his Prophet, that he has an eye to the soundness of the heart. Therefore let us deal faithfully with our neighbors, if we will have God to accept the service which we yield to him.

And now let us come to that which is set down here. If any of your brethren (says he) be fallen behind hand, at leastwise of such as dwell within your gates: look that you harden not your heart, nor shut your hands against him. His speaking peculiarly of the Israelites themselves, was not to give the Jews leave to devour the goods of the heathen, nor to deal cruelly with them: but his meaning was that there should be the more friendliness used among themselves, because that besides the kindred that was among them, there was also an union of faith. For God had showed out the lineage of Abraham from the rest of the world, and had knit them together into one body, whereof he himself vouchsafed to be the head: and therefore it was good reason that they should maintain one another, and be the more inclined one to succor another. But hereof the Jews took occasion to hold fast all that ever they could catch; for they construed all the promises of the holy Scripture to their own advantage, as though God had laid the bridle on their necks, and had no more care of the Gentles than of brute beasts. As for example; whereas it is said, You shall reign over many Nations: thereupon they concluded, then is it lawful for us to execute all manner of Tyranny upon the Gentiles, and to eat them up: for they be uncircumcised and unclean, and belong not to God at all: and therefore let us suck what we can possible out of them; and not spare them. Yes and they stretched the word Lend very far: for they stick not a whit to overload the strangers with unsure to the uttermost that they could bear, without any regard of uprightness. Thus you see how the Jews did always restrain the right of God's promises, bearing themselves in hand that it behooved them to be a little friendlier to their neighbors, that is to say to those that were of their own kindred: And yet even in that behalf also they were counted as ravening Wolves, as the Prophet Jeremy unbraid them, and as shall be declared in due place.

But let us now come back again to that which is said here, to apply it to our instruction. If the Jews used this hypocrisy of covering their covetousness with a pretense that they might well pill and poll the heathen and Infidels: let us see if we ourselves do not the like at this day. True it is that our Lord commands to us the household folk of faith above all others: and yet is it not meant that he gives us leave to fleece such as have not the knowledge of his word. For he has knit us generally altogether in that he has said by his Prophet Esau, You shall not despise thin own flesh, in which saying he comprehends all men without exception. Therefore must we behave ourselves uprightly and indifferently towards all men; and likewise we must have pity and compassion upon all: For in them we behold our own nature; but yet for all that, the household folk of faith are linked to us with a much nearer bond: in respect whereof it is good reason that we should love them more specially as our brethren. Thus you see after what manner this text is to be understood, where God says If any of your brethren, that is to say of thin own countrymen. And he does it for that they were linked together in a holy band, had the true religion, and were adopted to be kind hearted and pitiful one towards another, and yet ought they not to have despised the rest of the world as they did.

And whereas it is said within your Gates: it is to show that the exercising of our charity ought to be according to our knowledge of men's necessities. For we be not able to judge of all men's needs. Rue it is that even without seeing the extremities that are everywhere, we ought to be touched with compassion. When we hear of wars, that one country has been burned, another spoiled, and all things have been turned upside down; it is not for us to go to the place to see what has been done. For if we be not too blockish, we may well think that those things cannot be done without horrible confusion. Therefore must we pray for those whom we never saw: for they touch us, they be men as well as we, they be reasonable creatures shaped after the Image of God. And in that respect we ought to pity those that are nothing near to us. But as in respect of succoring, every man must strain himself according to the need that he sees, for I cannot judge of those that are far off from me. But if I see a body in present necessity; then must I be moved to pity, and I must consider that God provokes and calls me to the succoring of him that is in need.

Thus you see why Moses has set it down expressly, that men should have a regard of those that are within their gates. The heathen could well skill to say, that although all mankind be allied together; yet notwithstanding, the neighbors that are acquainted one with another, ought to use a special friendliness in succoring one another. And indeed, even without any reading of the holy scripture, every man can well skill to say in his own behalf when his neighbor fails him, How now? What neighborhood is this? And who teaches them that lesson? Nature. Here therefore our Lord tells us that if we perceive any of our neighbors to be in necessity, it ought to stir us up, so as if we be not too unnatural, we must needs be touched with it without any further putting of us in mind thereof. For the thing itself speaks when we see our neighbor so distressed. Now he adds further, You shall not harden your heart, nor shut your hand. He might well have begun at this point, You hand shall not be shut, for that is the matter which he tends to in effect. But it is not for naught that he says, You shall not shut up your heart. For why, his intent is to prevent the thing that hinders our well doing and our succoring of our neighbors that are in distress: namely, the hardness of our hearts. For where pity is, that is to say if we be pitiful, we will endeavor to utter it if we have wherewith. Indeed a man shall see a number that can well skill to weep; but all that they can find in their hearts to do is but to shed a few tears: they cast forth such sights that a man would think their hearts should burst; but to spare one penny out of their purse, that is no part of their thought. Many such hypocrisies are to be seen. But let us have the true kindness in us, and let us not be hard hearted, but let us hand ever follow our heart. And that is the cause why our Lord began at this point. That men should not harden their hearts. As if he should say, will you be good alms men? Will you be well disposed to succor such as have need of your help? Then let your hearts be softened, and not locked up to hold fast to yourselves, but to make rather with yourselves thus: Behold God offers me here a man, he is my neighbor, and although he be neither kith nor kin to me, yet is he a creature shaped after the image of God, and therefore must I open my heart towards him, and have some pity upon him. As often then as we be cold and negligent in succoring our neighbors, let us learn to enter into this consideration that is set down here, and to say to ourselves: How now? Wretched man, if you wart s he is, would you not be glad that others should succor you? Yes: and if they should let you alone, you could skill well enough to say for yourself, Alas, men make no more account of a creature fashions after the image of God, than of a dog. You could well skill to say so; and yet for all that will you yourself harden your heart after the same fashion? Thus you see what we have in the first place to mark upon this text.

And now for the second part, let us mark how our Lord's intent here, is to show us that alms deeds please him not, unless they come from a willing and free disposed heart. And therefore let us learn to order our succoring of our neighbors needs in such sort, as we do it not repining and unwillingly, so as when our hand is stretched out, there be a wicked affection in us which may hinder us from offering up to God that succor which we owe to our neighbors when we see then in necessity. And would God that this lesson were well put in use, and that every one of us did bear it better in mind than we do. For although we do form alms deeds, yet may the world see that our hearts are straightened, and that we cannot come to this doctrine of Saint Paul's, that God loves the liberal giver, and that he will not have men go to work as it were, by constraint and enforcement, but of a free goodwill. How many be there that put this lesson in use? Nor, the giver has always some heart guiding in himself, and would faine draw his head out of the collar if he could, and his doing if he could, and his doing of it is as if he were put to his task as they term it, or as though he paid some tribute. But our Lord calls Alms deeds Sacrifices, to the end we should do them cheerfully. And I pray you, if we will offer anything to God, should it be as the paying of a tribute or of some tillage or imported in these two speeches; namely that we must not have our hearts looked up to hinder us from well doing; but that not only our hands but also our hearts must be open towards such as are distressed, to have pity upon them, and to use kindness to them. Where this is not, there must needs be all manner of cruelty, as we commonly see that such as have most to spare, do fall to repining if a body go about to wring an alms from them and they make a grudging at it like a dog when one would take away a bone out of his mouth. And if they happen to give anything, be it for shame or for any other cause, it is a death to them to part from it. And surely it were better that such rake hells were rooted out of the world, than that they should live among men. For they be monsters against kind, they be foul churls, that could find in their hearts to devour and swallow down all the world into their maws. Or rather they be men full of unbelief, which have no more trust in God than devils, bearing themselves in hand that the earth is not able to find them. By reason whereof if it come to the point that they must give anything, it strikes them to the heart, it kills them, insomuch that the asking of an Alms at their hand, is as the drawing of a sword to cut their throats. Therefore let us look to ourselves, and when we hear our Lord speak of the not hardening of our hearts, let us begin at this point of kindness in having pity and compassion upon such as are in distress. And therewithal let our hand be at liberty afterward, in such sort as we may protest that we offer God a sacrifice with a free heart.

And now Moses adds, Beware that his wicked thought come not in your heart to say, Behold, the Seventh year is at hand, and if I lend, my money must lie dead for the time. He calls it a wicked thought when we be held back by it too much to our own profit, and in the meanwhile for sake the party that is in need. For were our thoughts well ruled, surely we should not be so greatly wedded to our own profit, but that we would also think upon those whom God commands to us. It is said that love seeks not his own. True it is that it cannot be but that every man will be mindful of himself. But Saint Paul's meaning in saying so, is that men must not be carried away with the love of their own profit, as who should say they would have no fellowship with their neighbors, nor strain themselves to do anything for them. Therefore as for those which say, I must have regard of myself, and therewithal do despise others, and pass not what they endure: those seek their own gain, and in so doing show themselves to be utterly void of charity. Contrariwise, if we be kindhearted although we be mindful of ourselves, yet are we not so carried away with it; but that we bear an even hand and proceed to the loving of our neighbors as ourselves. Whereas our nature wholly draws us to our own private profit, let us bethink ourselves thus: What? I cannot separate myself from those to whom God has knit me; for that were a wicked divorce. If I should hold myself alone, and have no regard but of mine own advantage; it were a cutting of myself off from mankind and I were worthy to be cut from the rest of the world, for it is against kind. So then, it is not without cause that Moses says, that when a man is so mindful of his own profit, and seeks it in such sort that he takes it as an occasion to refuse to help his neighbors at all: it is a wicked thought, for thereby we be done to understand, that we must not justify ourselves because that although men be not able to accuse us so as we may be condemned by man's Law; yet does it not follow therefore that we be quit before God. If a man come to borrow money of me, and I think thus with myself, I cannot tell whether this man be able to pay me again or not, he is a poor man, and when I have tarried a long time, he may chance to grow poorer and poorer, and then is my money lost. Now then if this poor man that was to be succored abide still in distress, and in the end perish: the other that would not lend him, shall not be accused for it not brought to answer for it before men. And if men cast him in the teeth with it. Oh (will he say) It was for me to seek mine own profit, I lifted not to hazard myself after that fashion. Well this excuse may serve before men: but in the meanwhile what says the heavenly judge to it? It is a wicked thought, says he: and let men flatter themselves never so much, they shall win nothing by it. Therefore let us mark that we must not weigh our workers in our own scales, as who should say we shall go scot free because we have some starting hole. For our Lord tells us that the thing which bears a show to be excusable of itself, is cursed in his sight; that is to wit if we succor not the party that has need, at leastwise according to our ability. And it is the self same thing that our Lord Jesus Christ puts us in mind of, where he says that we must do good to such as are not able to require us with the like, and that we must lend without looking for any gain. For neither in lending nor in giving, commonly is there any liberality among men, but every man has an eye to his own gain. If a man give, it is to the end to receive gifts again: and if a man lend, always his respect is, that such a one day do him pleasure and recompense him with the like good turn again. It is no liberality when we do good in hope to be recompensed for it again. But if we do good to a poor man, as whose hand we cannot by any means reap any profit; that is a point of free goodness, and God allows of it, for it is an acceptable sacrifice to him. And that is the cause why he says that we should not give to such as are able to requisite us, but to such as are utterly unable, and of whom we have no hope to recover the principal: for it is no alms deed, that is to say, no deed of mercy, unless there be need: and where is need, but among such as are not able to recompense? Yes and even where our money may seem to be cast into the water, insomuch that we have succored such a man as it may be said, verily this is quite lost for aught that I can see? Yes, verily, as to the world ward. But our Lord says, I receive it: you think you put your alms into a mortal man's hand, but it is I that become debtor for it. Although all things be his yet hinds be himself in the person of the poor; and should then any niggardly stay us from succoring those whom God offers to us, seeing he sets them as in his own stead, and avows all to be done to himself which is done to them?

Moreover let us mark that Moses speaks here, of such as are in need. For God meant not to maintain wicked folk in idleness and naughtiness. The man that seeks to waste away other men's good, and to defraud his creditors, is not commended to us here of God: but he speaks directly of mercy. And that is the cause why he says, You shall not harden your heart. For if we have not that discretion: do what alms deeds we will, and yet shall none of them be acceptable. Wherefore let us mark, that here God speaks not in favor of all men, but only sets before us such as are in need and know not what to do, and should perish in distress if they were not relieved. Those are they which are to be helped according to our ability. True it is, that to mark a Law of it, it is not possible. God has set this order among his people, that the poor should be succored. But he has not told with what sum, nor how oftentimes: he has not made a tax of it, to say that every man should bear thus much; Only we must resort to this which S. Paul says, Let every man do that which he does with a free heart, and not lay a tribute upon me as though they should pay as much as they were set at: but let every man himself of his own good will, and think thus, although I strained myself a hundred times more, yet could I not discharge myself to my Godward. Albeit forasmuch as he shows me this favor to accept it as an offering of my hand, although I do not so much as I ought to do nothing near, yet does it please him to receive that which I give him, so it be done with a free heart. Since we know this, albeit that we cannot make a grounded Law of it, to say how far we shall go in succoring our neighbors, yet let every of us strain himself, and always be doing, with the foresaid free heart.

And it is said, You shall not think with yourself, the year of respect it at hand, and therefore I will not lend. Hereby it is showed us (as I have touched before) that if a poor man require help, although he be not able to pay the thing again out of hand which he borrows yet must not we be cold for all that. For we must think, if I help this poor man at this time, he is a faithful man, and my succoring and relieving of him shall set him half up again, but how so ever the world go, he may be able to maintain his trade, and at length he may pay me all that he borrows. But I utterly fail him at this time, he is quite sunk, he is brought under foot forever, and he has no means to get up again: and I am too blame if I see him perish so. Had we this consideration with us, we should not have the niggard lines that Moses mentions and condemns here. And how so? Let us know that where need requires, we must not have such respect to our own profit, as to let the poor perish in their distress without lending them out helping hand.

Again, let us weigh well this saying which Moses sets down here: namely that we must open our hands. He repeats it twice or thrice: and that is to show us that there is nothing but hypocrisy in us, when we pretend to have compassion, and yet our hand is always shut, and nothing can be wrong out of us. I have told you already that a number of folk will not pass greatly to say; Alas, when they see poor people: but they bear themselves in hand that it is enough to have pretended a countenance. But here God reproves men's dissimulation, if they have not their hands open: for it is a token that their heart is hardened, so as there is nothing but beastly churlishness in them, and when their hands be not opened, it must needs be a record of it. Again he sets down that the poor is to be succored according to his need and that a gage is to be taken of him, if there be a gage to be had: for it may also full well be understood of the taking of gages. And hereby we see yet better, that our Lords meaning was not to have debts utterly released by the respect that was given in the seventh year: but only to have a time of rest given for the respects and considerations which I have treated off before.

Furthermore it is told us here, that we must relieve our neighbors wants: for our Lord speaks here of the lending that are done of alms. And indeed, it is often times a greater alms deeds to lend some competent sum, than to give a very little. For it may be that the giving of a little will do a man no ease at all: but the lending of as much as need requires relieves him very well, and he may in time content his creditor again. That then is the thing where to our Lord appoints us. And therefore let us mark the thing which I have touched already; that is to know, that although a man cannot set down a law certain in this behalf; yet must every man be a rule to himself, to do according to his own ability and according to that need that he sees in his neighbors.

Now here is added yet further, that God will bless such as do so, according as he had begun yesterday to promise his blessing to all such a were so liberally minded towards the succoring of the poor. And this serves still to correct the cursed unbelief that holds our hearts locked up so as no man minds aught else than himself and his own profit. For it seems to us that if we forgo never so little of that which we have, we be in that way to be undone by it. That is the cause why ever man holds fast, and never thinks he has enough Oh (say we) it is true that we may do so and so: but thereby I should be impaired, and I cannot tell what may befall to myself. We cast so many doubts, that we can never find occasion to give anything. Any why so? For sooth because I might want it myself. But that is a cursed distrust, and such a one as provokes God's wrath. For we ought rather to hope well at his hand, that as he has not failed us heretofore, so he will continue to do us good still. And yet we go to seek these doubts afar off, which we be afraid of: insomuch that it grieves us even to hear then spoken of. If a man should say to us, such a thing may befall the if your house should be burned, and all the goods be consumed in it, and you be driven to sell your land and possession, in what case warr you them? None of these songs would please us, but we would chase and storm at him that should speak so. And why? For a rich man would fine sleep in his riches, he hopes that he shall stand always at one stay, and he fade himself in his delights. But in that meanwhile, if he be to do any good; he by and by forecasts, Oh such a thing might befall me; famine and war and I know not what else must be feared. We heap together all that mischance that can be devised. And to what end? Even to shut up our hearts and our hands; that we might do no man good. Now our Lord minding to correct such distrust, brings us back to his blessing, and says, Know you that it belongs to me to multiply you. And therefore you may well hope that when you seem to be impaired to the world ward, you shall have a greater treasure that if you had kept all that ever could have come to your hands, and had never done any good to your neighbors to succor the withal. For I am rich enough to fill you again, even when you be utterly destitute of all things. Seeing that our Lord speaks after that manner, must we not needs be worse than Infidels if we be not moved there at to do good? Yes and though we go not to work with so earnest minds as we should do, yet if we be not moved at leastwise to do somewhat; may it not be said that we stop our ears against God and give him no audience at all, yes and that we give no credit nor trust at all to any of his promises? Therefore let us learn to weigh better that value of this lesson concerning God's blessing, and let no man rest upon that things that he has in his own possession, nor put such trust in them as to say; This is my stay, this is the trust in them as to say; This is my stay, this is the staff that I must lean upon. Let us beware of such trust, for it is devilish. Nor rather, let us think thus; Seeing that God has given me whereon to live, I am contented with that which I have, and I hope that he will also provide for me still hereafter; and in the meantime I will so use that which I have, and I hope that he will also provide for me still hereafter; and in the meantime I will so use that which I have, and I hope that he will also provide for me still hereafter; and in the meantime I will so use that which he gives me, as I may succor those that have need. And therewithal I will put from me all things that may draw me from the obeying of my God, and from that trust which I ought to repose in his goodness. Thus you see how we ought to benefit ourselves by the promises of God's blessing, so as they may quicken up, not only to have recourse to him, but also to use liberality towards those that have need of us, to the end that our Lord may be praised both of great and small, poor and rich, and all of us have our contentment in him alone, according to the grace that he shall bestowed upon us.

Now let us kneel down in his presence with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us perceive them better, and to touch us to the quick, to the end that knowing his infallible truth, and what his will is towards us, we may be moved thereby to follow the same, and to fashion ourselves to his example, by imparting ourselves in such wise to our neighbors, and by disposing the good in such sort which he has put into your hands, as we may one day yield him a good and faithful account of them, that we have not been too much addicted to ourselves: but that when we shall have endeavored to do good according to his meaning, our whole seeking maybe to live and die in his obedience, drawing others with us to the self same faith, so as we may all call upon him as our father truly and unfriendly, because we maintain a right brotherhood with all such as are knit to us. That is may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth, et cetera.

On Wednesday, the 30th of October 1555

The 95th Sermon, which is the third upon the fifteenth Chapter

11. For there shall be some needy folk in the Land. And therefore I command you, saying, that you open your hand to your brother, to the needy and to the poor in the Land.

12 When your brother an Hebrew, or [your sister] and Hebrewess shall have sold himself to you, and served you six years: in the seventh year you shall let him go free from you.

13 And when you lets him go free from you, you shall not let him go empty.

14 But you shall load him upon his neck with somewhat of your flock, of your vineyard, and of your winepress. You shall give him of the things wherewith the Lord has bless you.

15 Remember how you yourself was a bond servant in the Land of Egypt, and that the Lord your God delivered and therefore do I command you this thing this day.

It is said in the common proverb, that laws are not made for things that are not wont to come to pass, but for things that are in use, and which it behooves to practice daily. And that is the cause why our Lord in this text says, that his speaking of that succoring of the poor is not without cause, for that as long as this mortal life endures, we shall ever find whereon to execute our duty, by relieving the necessities of our neighbors, because there shall always be poor folk among us in the world. Thus we see in effect, that God's intent was to make the Jews to take the better heed to his Law, forasmuch as it was a very requisite, yes and necessary thing, that they should be put in mind of their duty in that behalf. And thereupon we have to gather, that the more available a doctrine is to the well ordering of our life, that better ought we to set our minds upon it. We see a number of folk which are fond and curious in forecasting for things that happen not once in a hundred years: they imagine things that are utterly impossible: and if this should come to pass (say they) what should we do then? They beat their brains about things that have no profit in them, and in the meanwhile they see not the things that are before their feet. And for proof hereof, how many are to be seen nowadays, which grossly overshoot themselves in things that ought to be thoroughly known, shutting their eyes at them so as they see not one whit? And yet for all that, they toil themselves exceedingly in searching out I know not what: and if a man ask them why they do so, they cannot tell, but that they be driven thereto by a foolish curiosity. Therefore let us bear in mind that our Lord's intent is to keep us occupied to far froth as is for our behoove. And that is the cause why that in the holy Scripture, we see that God has not vouchsafed to feed our humors with things which he knows to be of no edification, but restrains us to the things which are for our behoove to put in use. Let us consider then that every of us ought to look diligently to his own duty: and that is the warning that is given us in this text, where God tells us that he makes not laws of things that concern us not, but that he has an eye to the things which we ought to put in practice daily.

But now let us come to this saying of his, That there shall be poor folk continually. This was spoken expressly, to do us to understand that God will try our charity. For he is rich enough to supply all men's wants, and it comes not of any niggard ship, that he powers not out of his treasures upon us. What is the cause then that God suffers men to be poor in this world, but only to give us occasion to do good? Therefore when we see one man poor and another rich, let us not attribute it to fortune: but let us understand how it is God that disposes things so, and that it is not without reason. True it is that our eyes shall not always see why God enriches one and impoverishes another, we cannot discern that cause thereof certainly. And by that means God will have us to cast down our eyes oftentimes, to the end we should yield him the honor of governing men at his will, and according to his own device which is incomprehensible. Yet notwithstanding we have to remember in general, the thing that I touched already: which is, that God's distributing of these wordily goods so unequally, is to betray what is in men's hearts, by making a trial of then that way. So that if a man be rich, he may be the better discerned what one he is. For thereby he is enabled to do hurt, and can the better undamaged his enemies. But if he abstain from doing evil, if he extend no cruelty towards his neighbors, if he hold himself win his own bounds without coveting more than God gives to him: it is a sign of honesty, which had not been known if such occasions had not been ministered to him. Again, if a man of wealth be liberal so as he endeavor to do good to such as have need of his help, and advance not himself through pride and stateliness; but always behave himself mildly: that is a very good profit. If another man bearing poor take patiently whatsoever it pleases God to send him, and moreover be not lead to any deceit or naughtiness how much so ever he suffer, or how hard so ever his state be: that also is a good and behoove trial. Now then let us mark that whereas there are both rich and poor in this world, God has so ordained it, and it comes of his providence, and therefore we must hold it for a sure ground, that there shall never want poor folk.

And now by the way let us come to that which I spoke of, namely that God's commanding of wealthy folk to have their hands open to succor without cause. For it is as it were a setting down before our eyes, wherein and after what manner he will be served at our hands: namely in doing him homage with the goods which he has bestowed abundantly upon us: Yes verily, for he sends us poor folks to be as his receivers. And although that alms deed be done to mortal creatures, yet does God well accept and well like thereof, and puts it into his accounts, as though the things which we bestow upon that poor were delivered into his own hands. Truth it is that as in respect of God that deed that we do is not alms deeds, but an homage of that goods that he has given us, and for the which we be beholden to him. Yet nevertheless there is this moreover, that besides his accepting of the acknowledgment which we yield to him for that good that he does us, it is all one as if that mercy which we show to our brethren, extended itself to him. And that is the cause why it is said, that he which shuts his ears at the crying of the poor, shall cry himself to God and not be heard. On the contrary part, if we be pitiful, and be moved to pity the poor when we hear of their wants; God also will use pity and compassion towards us to succor us again at our need. And in the same respect Moses says expressly in this text, that God commands us to have our hands open to the poor that dwell in the land among us. For God offers them to us, to the intent we should have no excuse to say, I wish not to whom I should do good. Seeing then that our Lord ministers the means to us, we must not seek for starting holes: for we shall be still guilty, because we have not used the occasion that was offered us. Our Lord Jesus Christ goes yet further and says, that he himself will not be always with us, but that the poor shall ever be with us. for in commenting that deed that was done to his honor, because the precious ointment seemed superstitious, when his head was appointed therewith, he said, let it be so for this once: but from thenceforth he sends his disciples to the poor. And why? For it was all one as if he had said, that it has no ordinary service that he required, nor for his own person, nor for the person of God his father, that men should present him with the precious things of this world: for he had no need of them: but his will was that look whatsoever men were willing to bestow upon him they should bestow it upon the poor. And here let us mark well, (that as I have touched before) that alms deeds which we do to poor, are accepted of God as sacrifices done to him. Therefore let us not deceive ourselves in our offering to him, as though he received anything at our hands: for he does send us back again, to do good to such as stand in need of our help.

Had this lesson been well born in mind, the wretched world had not so misspend their labor any money in foolish pomp, as we see they have done in the Popedom, where they use a great sort of lights, and a number of other petty trifles. And why is that? Oh, they think that God takes pleasure in paintings, in imaginary, and in such other gewgaws. That is the things wherein the world is wholly occupied: and in the meanwhile the poor are let alone and forgotten. Contrariwise, our Lord Jesus tells us that that is the thing whereby God will try whether we be willing to honor him or not. For (as I have declared already) he could well make all men rich: but he sends us poor folk, to give us occasion to keep ourselves occupied, if we have any desire to show to whom we think ourselves beholden for our goods, and be minded to apply them to such use as he may well like of. Therefore if we have any such desire, the occasion to show it is offered us and there never wants any. That is the thing in effect, which we have to consider upon this place.

It should seem at the first blush, that this agrees not with that which we have seen already, namely that there should be no poor beggars in the land. But that solution is very easy, because it may well fall out that there should be poor folks, and yet that all begging be taken away. And smoothly it must needs be a great shame for a people that profess God, that there should be beggars among them, because it is even against common order and honesty. Although we had not the commandment of our God; yet let us consider according to nature what may ensue of suffering beggars to be. First it is a token that the richer sort do devour all, and that they have no regard of succoring such as be in need and penury. Again, when the bridle is laid loose; we see it follows that the more do give themselves to raging. For men know not to whom they give; insomuch that when those kind of people go crying up and down the streets from gate to gate; it cannot be discerned whether they have need or not: and importunate creatures do commonly bear away that wherewith the poor should be fed and maintained. Moreover the rewarding of such as go about begging after that fashion, is a maintenance of false harlots. For there is none so great deceit to be found, as in these Rages that go begging about. And he that is once nous led in raging, becomes a thief in the end. Finally although there were none other inconvenience; yet we see that those which are once inured so with begging, can never fall to any labor afterward, nor learn to do any good, but are idle bodies and loiterers ever after. Thus you see how begging is even by the order of nature to be always condemned. For it brings nothing with it but sin and corruption, and all things must at length needs come to confusion, where begging is suffered and born with. But we have God's commandment which is a far higher thing, which says that we must not have any beggars among us, but that the inconvenience thereof ought to be prevented beforehand, by relieving such as want, accordingly as men can discern of them, and be of ability to succor them. You see then that these two places are not contrary to one another. For whereas he says that there shall always be poor folks; it is to the end (as I have said before) that the rich should have occasion to offer such sacrifice to God as he requires, by succoring the needy with such things as they have in their hands, and by doing it with discretion, by searching out as much as is possible who they be that have need. But that men should give without discretion, or that it should be lawful for men to go begging up and down the streets, or to stand begging at the gates or at men's doors: it is a shameful thing and against all good order, and brings nothing but confusion, as a nourishment of evil in all those to whom such liberty is given, as I have showed already.

Now remains to put this doctrine in practice. First of all we must understand, that according to the greatness of men's necessities, God stirs us up ever to do them the more good, and it is then chief time to strain ourselves, when there is any famine or death. For then men ought rather to cut their own morsels short, than to suffer others to want, themselves living so in excess. And whereas many men take occasion to pinch when they see a dear years, bearing themselves in hand that it serves their turn well to make their hand the better: Let us understand that our Lord does then cite us, and declare to us that if ever we be minded to do him homage with the goods that he has put into our hands, he will have us to utter it at that time. Let that serve for one point. And whereas we see many poor folk in necessity; let us assure ourselves that our Lord warns us that it is as a waking of us from sleep; and that because we have not been sufficiently mindful of our duty, our Lord comes to put us in remembrance of that which he had commanded us: and that if we be not too lazy, we must needs enforce ourselves, to consider every of us the measure that is given him and the ability of his power, and thereafter employ himself. This is that thing that we have to mark in the first place.

And as touching the second point, Let us look to keep order and policy, so as this shame and dishonesty of begging be not among us. For why, it is nothing else but a nourishment of wicked rascals, and they will never be brought to any good, which are so maintained, but they become rages and idle persons as I have told you before. And in the end they take a pleasure in their begging, and like so well of their script or wallet, that they would not change it for a yearly rent: which thing experience shows too much. To be short, of Rages, they become robbers, and in the end what must become of that? Therefore let all this be taken away, unless we purpose to provoke God's wrath willfully, and to cause things to grow every day worse than other. But yet howsoever that case stand, let us see that the poor be maintained. For if a man forbid begging, and therewithal do no alms at all: it is as much as if he did cut the throats of those that are in necessity. Nor, we must so provide for the poor, and redress their want, that such as are stout beggars and apparently seem not to be pitied, may be reformed. For they do but eat up the other's bread, and rob that needy of that which should be given to them. That (say I) in effect, is the thing that we have to mark here. But how may that be done? First that hospitals should provide well for such needs. For what a shame is it, that the goods which are dedicated to God and the poor, should nevertheless be applied to other uses? That is not simply robbery, but a robbing of God. Therefore let them be employed according to his commandment; and let not men play that good husbands in hording up that things that ought to be bestowed upon God and upon those whom he offers to us. Also according as every man knows that particular needs of his neighbors, so let him endeavor to succor them, and consider where want or need is, and help to remedy it. If this be done, then shall beggary be taken away as it ought to be, and they shall not need to make a simple forbidding of it: saying; let not men beg anymore: and in the mean season that poor be left destitute, to die for hunger and thirst.

And truly it is not for naught that our Lord says here, your poor and your needy which are in your Land. He could well enough have said, the poor and needy: but he uses another manner of phrase saying, you poor and you needy. As if he should say, if a man be poor, everybody disdains him and turns his back to him: and why is that? Because the rich do bear themselves in hand, that the poor are not worthy to come to them, and they could find in their hearts to have a world alone by themselves. Were it not that they be contented to have the poor folks service, they could find in their hearts never to see them. But on the contrary part, to pull down such pride and presumption, our Lord says, who are you that despises so your brother? He is the poor, he is the needy. He speaks as to our own flesh. Therefore let us weigh well the words which the Holy Ghost has used, that no pride may hinder us to have compassion upon those that are so united to us. And let us mark that they be our own poor folks, that is to say, that the persons which are so in need, are offered to us of the Lord, as if he should say, it is my will to make such an intercourse, as the rich may be mingled with the poor, and either of them may meet the other, to the intent they should communicate together, that poor to receive and the rich to give, so as I may be honored at the hands of them both, as well for that the rich man has wherewith to do good, as for that that poor man acknowledges himself to be sustained and maintained for my names sake, and so both of them bless me. That is the cause why Moses speaks of the poor and needy after such as ort, that he shows that rich how it is they themselves whom he speaks to, and that there ought to be a kind of intercommoning between them and the poor, not to make them fellow like, but to relieve the need of those whom God offers to them after that manner.

After this, Moses adds a law that served but for the common weal of the Jews, that substance whereof continues nevertheless to us at this day. If your brother an Hebrew (says he) or your sister an Hebrewess be sold to you, let him serve you the space of six years: At the end of that term you shall release him. And at that releasing of him, you shall not send him away empty, but you shall give him some corn or some cattle according to your ability, that he may feel of the blessing which the Lord your God has given you, and that the same maybe as a hire to him. Now we must mark, that in those days they were no such servants as are nowadays which take certain wages by that year: but they were in bondage after that manner of those whom we call bond slaves in Barbary and in other countries in these days. So then they were all slaves at that time, and among the heathen that bondage was endless: insomuch that if a man had lived a hundred lives, yet should he never have been released, unless his master had pitied him. Moreover, the man that had such slaves might marry them, and forasmuch as the wretched souls were not free themselves, their children also were in bondage like the beasts that we have. If a man have Horses, Kine, Cattle or Sheep, he reaps the fruit of them: and so did they with their bond servants at that time. And surely that state of bondage as it was then through the whole world, was very hard. For it was lawful even among Christians. It is not commanded to be abolished: We see that whereas S. Paul speaks of masters that had such bond servants and were faithful, he bids them not to set them quite at liberty, but to deal gently by all kind of means. Know you (says he) that you have one common Master in heaven, and that your servants be God's children as well as you: and therefore deal gently with them, and hold them not in such thralldom as the unbelievers do. S. Paul, that is to say, that Holy Ghost speaking by his mouth, thinks that to be enough. Albeit forasmuch as the Jews were privileged, and God had chosen them for his own inheritance: it behooves some moderation or mitigation to be among them, so as they should not use so extreme rigor as was among the Heathen. Nevertheless it is a good thing, that this slavish bondage is abolished in time among the faithful, albeit that there continue still some remnants of it in some places, but yet is that same much more tolerable than so rough a law could have been. For whereas there are some persons which are still taxable (as they term it) at this day, whether it be in their goods or in their persons: it is of that old slavery, and they be of that race of such as were very slaves in old time, and of such as might have been handled as bond slaves by rigor of Law. But as I said, this may well be born with: and it was a virtue worthy of condemnation, that the parties which had such bond slaves, released them upon a certain qualification.

But let us come again to the law that is given here to the Jews. It is said that such as were sold should serve by the space of six years: and the seventh year is privileged here in honor of that Sabbath day, that is to say to the rest, whereby our Lord meant always to reduce the Jews to gentleness, by bringing them back to himself. As if he should say, assure yourselves that your using of such mercy towards your neighbors, is an acceptable service to me. For that day of rest was the very mark of God's spiritual service, as is declared to us in many places of that scripture, both in Exodus and Ezekiel where our Lord speaks precisely of the day of rest, and also in the 17th Chapter of Jeremy. Yes and he speaks in such wise of it, as though all his service consisted therein. And why is that? Because that on the day of rest, he called that people to himself, as if he should say, know me, let me be worshipped, let every man give his mind to consider my goodness, my justice, my wisdom, and my power. And therewithal rest yourselves in me, and his own likings, that you may be, as it were subjected under my yoke, and I govern you. We see then that the day of rest was as that principal service of God. Now forasmuch as men cannot acquaint themselves with the doing of good to their neighbors, nor will willingly give over their right when they have them at the vantage, and can hardly be drawn to do so much as they ought to do. Therefore does our Lord set this before them here, and say, such as release their bond servants do me acceptable service, whereof I give them the day of rest for a sign and sure token. Seeing then that I set between you and me, this token and warrant, know you that your giving of release to your bond servants is by mine authority, so as I am among you and over rule you in that act, and your doing of it is for my sake. Though you have no regard of men, because you think you should not owe them so much service, at leastwise yet consider how much you be bound to me. Thus you see now to what end the seventh year was assigned. Six years (says he) shall they serve you, and the seventh year you shall let them go. And he contents not himself with the only releasing of the bond servants, but he will also have men to give them somewhat wherewith to set up their trade. And not without cause: For even the heathen themselves at the same time in which I told you, that that bondage was most rise, could skill to say that they were not to be used as bond servants but as hirelings, that is to say, after that manner of our servants that take wages by the year at this day. Is it not a great shame that the heathen both Greeks and Latin could speak after this fashion, we have bond slaves, we may use them as Oxen and Asses: but that is villainous, it is out of all order: and therefore albeit that it be lawful for us by the civil Laws: yet is it against all humanity, and we ought to have another regard. As how? Surely we must use them as though they were freemen whom we hired for wages. If that blind wretches speak so; and perceived that this kind of upright dealing was requisite: what shall become of us? Verily God has punished such as have dealt roughly with them. For it was lawful for a master in old time to kill his bond servant, and he needed not to ask leave of the Magistrate to put his servant to torture, but he might tear him in pieces one member from another, yes, even at home in his own private house: and when his Master had so murdered him, no man sought Justice or reformation of it. True it is that in the end men were forbidden to kill them without examination of their case: but yet had that masters always that authority still. And because they abused it, God paid them home with the like again, so as they had a common proverb among them, That look how many bond servant a man had at home, so many enemies had he. Also they could well skill to condemn themselves, saying: they be not enemies born, but we make them our enemies by our cruelty. Seeing them that the heathen knew thus much; it was requisite that there should be some greater mildness and humanity among God's people that were chosen of a singular privilege. That is that because why God said expressly that they should be helped at their departing from their houses in that seventh year. For if a poor man be sent away stark naked, now and then he had lever to continue a slave still, that to go seek what shall betide him he know not where. A poor man that has not much to take to, can find in his heart to take pains; and so he may have meat and drink, he is at a point. Thereupon he takes pains in his Master's house: Now if his Master drive him out of his doors and say get you hence: He may cry alas, what shall become of men? I have not a bit of bread to eat, I have no lodging, I know not where to become of me? I have not a bit of bread to eat, I have no lodging, I know not where to become. This sending away of their servants naked, was an indirect means to hold them in bondage still. For this cause our Lord says, when you have been served by the space of six years by those that are your brethren, give them somewhat in recompense of their service, according to your ability.

Again, to the end that men should be the willinger to such liberality, Look into your stables (says he) and into storehouses, and into your garners. Because men are always repining; here God falls to making of an inventory. Oh (says one) I have not so much to give: and what know I whether I myself shall want or not? Our Lord therefore makes an inventory to discuss that matter, saying, what? Cannot he which has corn in his garner give to him that has served him, whose blood he has drawn in making him to labor for him? Ought he not at leastwise to have an eye to the corn that is in his garner? He has husbanded his ground, he has tilled it, he has toiled himself about it: and is it not reason that he should feel some sweetness and fruit of it? Besides this, he goes to his winepress and to his stalls: as if he should say, let every man see what he has; for according to your ability you be bound to recompense them that have travelled for you, and have been in instruments of such blessings. For if we thank God with our mouths, confessing that it is he which has blessed us and in the meanwhile make none account of such as he has sent to do us service in that increase of our living, by taking pains and toil for us: all our thanking of him is but lip labor and utter hypocrisy. Thus you see in effect what we have to mark upon this text.

This law is set down likewise in the 21st Chapter of Exodus. Notwithstanding, although God had spoken of it after that fashion; yet was the thing ill observed which he commanded here. And hereby we see how malicious, hard hearted, yes and will full stubborn that Jews were. For at such times as God punished them, and they were driven to resort to him whether they would or not, they pretended a willingness to submit themselves to him, and to take some good way of amendment, [though they meant it not:] which thing among others he casts in their teeth, saying: what? I have commanded you concerning your brethren that are your servants; that you should let them go frank and free in the seventh year: but you have not done it. Now then seeing that my law is set in state again, Let it be kept. Indeed when men be pinched and constrained by necessity; then they can make some fair countenance and show well enough. Go to then, let servants be released: but immediately after they have shifts to bring them under arm again, as if a man should make a thief to creep under his arm, as who would say he should make restitution of his theft, and whereas he pretended to take it from him with the one hand he should convey to him again with the other. After the same manner was God mocked with his own law, yes even notwithstanding that the Jews were punished extremely at that time, and saw well that God persecuted them and did himself against them because of their disobedience. As touching the bond servants that would not use the freedom that was granted them, be sure to see more in the next sermon. But as touching the common law, the Jews were so full of malice that they refused to give freedom to their bond servants.

And here the first thing that we have together is the substance of the law, which concerns even us at this day. There is no more any such bondage among us as was then among the Jews and all the heathen. Indeed in some countries the same bondage remains still, as in the East countries, in Greece, and in Barbary, but yet for all that it is the better that the use of it is abolished, as it is among us: and that is a very commendable thing. Yet notwithstanding, it behooves us to consider, how our Lord admonishes us by his law, to deal gently with such as do us service, so as we bear with them and defraud them not of their hire, nor stand upon rigor towards them to take the uttermost of them that we may, but that we deal uprightly with them, and rule ourselves, as those that have a stay of themselves and look not to be compelled by law, but every man rightly to rule himself. That is the thing in effect which we have to note in this text. As how? A master that has a servant wrings all that ever he can out of him without any regard to him: therein he shows himself to be cruel. If he say, I find him meat and drink, and I pay him his wages: that is true, but he must also have respect what he is able to do, and what service he may have an eye to this natural uprightness: that we do not anything to another body, which we would not have done to ourselves. If a man have servants, he ought to think with himself, how would I desire to be born with. Truth is that we must not be at that point when a servant would live idly and do nothing, but would be kept like a cockney, never to put his hand to the doing of anything. For it is not meant of such as live disorderly, but only of such as we know to be reasonable. As how? I think with myself, if I were in this fellow's place, what ought I to do? I speak not here of wishing, but of that reasonableness which every of us knows. For when the case concerns our own profit or disprofit, we can very well skill to judge of it: but when the case concerns other men, then are we blind. But such as have servants ought to consider thus with themselves: If I were in their room, what would I reasonably desire to be done to me? Then must I not take more upon me than my conscience suffice in that it finds fault with me. Thus we see, that although this law belonged peculiarly to that state of the Jewish common weal, where this kind of bondage was used: yet notwithstanding it contains a lesson beneficial to us at this day: that is to know, that it behooves us to use the servants in such wise, as they be not oppressed beyond measure, nor cruelly handled; and secondly that we be kindhearted towards every of them, to do them good, and to show in very deed that we be willing to agree to his goodwill. For it is not enough for the mouth to speak unless the hand be answerable to the same. That is the thing in effect, which we have to mark upon this text.

Therewithal let us weigh well the words wherein our Lord makes an inquisition of every man's goods, and let us consider how it serves to show us that in the end we must come to account, so as we may not think to slip the collar and to shift our hands by saying, Do what I can, I shall not be well reported of for my labor: after which sort some folks continually repine when they be spoken to concerning alms deeds, to whom it seems to be as good as haling of them to the gallows, if you do but speak to them of the opening of their purses. To the end therefore that we should not imagine that such shifts can go for payment before God: let us mark well how he tells us here; that he forgets not what he has given us, but can very well cast us in the teeth with it. And seeing he casts us in the teeth with it already in this world, what will he do when all things shall be brought to light, and when the books of account shall be laid open? Will there be any excuse then? No: for then even the secret things shall be laid open; and what will become then of the things that are apparently known? Shall a man escape the judgment of God, when he is found to be a niggard and churl even before men? So then let us beware that we behave ourselves well in this behalf: and for the better doing thereof, let every of us mark the form of speech which the Holy Ghost uses in this text, forasmuch as themselves serves to search us to the bottom, to the intent that whereas every of us hides himself away when he should do any good, no man should shrink back, but every man put forth himself according to his ability and state.

Now for a conclusion our Lord adds here, that the Jews had been in bondage in the land of Egypt, and therefore he commands them to be kind hearted and pitiful towards those that are in their service. And hereby it is showed us, that if our Lord have given us experience of adversity, we must be readier to succor the distressed, and not play the proud fools which cannot abide to hear their former state spoken of, when they have been in poverty, but are more scornful and disdainful than such as lived continually at their ease. Nor, if our Lord have suffered us to be pinched and to stand in need of other folks service, let us print it thoroughly in our minds, and let it be as a spur to quicken us up, that whensoever we see any folk in necessity, it may always run in our minds, Alas, when I was in their case, what desires I? I could have found in my heart that all men should have opened their hearts and their bowels towards me: and shall I now shut up mine? Lo what the declaration that is set down here imports. And it is not in this place only that Moses uses to say so. For there is not anything more rise in all his books: insomuch that ever after the peoples deliverance out of the land of Egypt, Remember (says he) from time to time, that you yourself has been in bondage. Therefore let us mark, that look what experience every of us has had in his life, God's will is that the same should serve us for an instruction, and that we should bear it continually in mind. As for example, when a man has been a traveler of countries, he ought to consider into what distresses a man might fall: and he shall be the more inclined to succor others whom he sees in like danger. Again, when a man has been pinched for a time with poverty, and afterward comes to wealth, his former poverty ought to be a teacher to him forever after, to be the forwarder to put forth himself where need requires. True it is that although a man had lived all the days of his life in ease, and never with what need or want meant: yet shall he not therefore be held excused before God. But yet forasmuch as we be so slack and slow to do good: we had need to take to us the helps that may serve to quicken us withal. And so let every of us for his own part cheer up himself to do good. As for the rich which never has tasted any want of the goods of this world, if they look into themselves, they shall find that God has visited them some way or other, so as they have had need of other folk's help. And if they be not stark churls, the same must needs be as a stroke with a spur, to thrust them forward to well doing.

To conclude in few words, the principal purpose of this place, is that besides the uprightness which is of nature, our Lord will have every man to be inclined to mercy to do good to such as have need. But put the case there were none other respect why we should succor our neighbors but only this, that we be men: is not that respect great enough? Yes, for under this word Man, we comprehend many miseries. When I see a man in distress, I find in myself that I should be subject to the like things, if God had not a special regard of me. There is neither sickness, poverty, nor any other like thing in anybody, but that we ourselves are subject to the same miseries. And what is the cause that we be clear from them? The goodness of our God. And the cause why he spares us and bears with us, is to the end that we should be mindful of such as have need. For it is a very great proof of God's goodness towards me, that he not only exempts me from the adversities which I see in my neighbor's but also gives me wherewith to remedy theirs. And therefore it ought to be a sufficient provocation for me, that they be of mine own flesh, and of mine own nature, so as there is no difference betwixt us but that God has advanced the one of us, and put the other back. For we be all of one lump, and it is not for any man to glory, as though he had his riches of himself. If a man be not so miserable as a number of others are, he ought not to be proud of it, but rather to consider that he is so much the more bound to God. Accordingly therefore as God bestows his benefits upon us, let us beware that we acknowledge it towards him, by doing good to our neighbors whom he offers to us, so as we neither exempt ourselves from their want, not seclude them from our abundance, but gently make them partakers with us, as folk that are linked together in an inseparable bond.

And now let us fall down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may return to him with true repentance, and disliking our former life, crave forgiveness and mercy at his hand, and be always ready hereafter to yield ourselves to his obedience, so as our whole seeking may be to glorify him in all cases, after such a sort as our whole life may show that we have well profited in his holy world. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, et cetera.

On Monday, the 4th of November 1555
The 96th Sermon, which is the fourth upon the fifteenth Chapter

16 And if he happen to say to you, I will not depart from you because I love you and your house, by reason that he finds himself well with you:

17 Then shall you take an Aule, and bore him through the ear to the door, and he shall be your bondman forever. And likewise shall you do to your woman servant.

18 Let is not grieve you to let him go free from you: for he has serve you six years as a hireling of double wages. And the Lord your God will bless you in all your doings.

19 All the first born males that breed of your cattle and of your folks, you shall sanctify to the Lord your God. You shall not labor with the first born of your kind, nor there the first born of your sheep.

20 But you shall eat them, you and your household from year to year in the presence of the Lord my God, in the place which the Lord will choose.

21 But if there be any blemish in it, so as it be lame or blind, or have any evil fault in it: you shall not offer it to the Lord my God:

22 But shall eat it within your gates, as well the unclean as the clean, both alike, as the fallow deer and the red deer.

23 Only you shall not eat the blood of it, but shall power it upon the ground as water.

We have seen already the law which God placed among the Jews, whereby bondage was not to continue forever, but that the person which had been sold should serve six years, and afterward be set at liberty. And I told you that although the like law be not among us nowadays: yet notwithstanding we may gather a very profitable lesson of that which is therein contained, that is to know, that he which has any superiority over others, ought to forbear all tyranny, and to be kind hearted towards those whom God has put in subjection to him, so as he reign not over them with cruelty, nor enforce them to all that every he may, but deal gently with them as with his brethren. And although we be not nowadays of all one lineage as the Jews were: yet must it suffice us that we have all one father and one master in heaven, as is declared to us. For by means of our Lord Jesus Christ, we be so united together, that there is such a brotherhood betwixt us, as cannot be broken without forsaking the adoption which God has made of us. And therefore as may as intend to be taken for God's children, must lovingly bear with all those whom they may command. Again, we must come to account, so as it we will obtain mercy at the hand of God, and be born withal by his gracious favor, we must look to do the like to such as are in subjection to us.

But now Moses adds an exception to the law, whereby he had commanded to set servants at liberty after six years service: and he says that if any servant be so well contented with his state, that when his master is ready to send him away and to give him reward, he will say to his master; Nor sir, I had lesser to tarry still in your house because I find myself well at ease: then shall his master taken an Aule, and boar through his servant's ear in token that he is his forever. Yet was not this done without consideration of the case, as is written in the 21st of Exodus. For there it is said expressly that the master shall call to the Judges, that the matter may be inquired of by them. For otherwise, every master might have made other believe, that his servant was desirous to be his forever. Therefore it behooved the thing to be proved; and then was his ear bored through at the door, to the end that the matter might be done openly to the sight of all men. For in such cases there might have been much collusion, yes, and also compulsion, and a man might have been so urged by constraint of much beating, that he would have contented to have been in perpetual bondage. But when the thing was done in open sight, so as the Judges were called to the matter: then was there no deceit, neither could they be beguiled which did so yield themselves into bondage.

And as touching the marking of them, it was a common thing in the East countries. And it is seen in other Countries also, that such as were marked, were of worse state and condition than other bond servants were: but in this place there is no meaning of any harder bondage than the rest. And because God had granted that privilege among his people, he adds that if any man would needs be a bond slave of his own will, then he should bear some mark thereof. But yet was this mark made without any wounding, as if the top of a man's care should be bored with a pin or with an all that were sharp, it could put him to no pain, and it was no more but to make the matter known. And whereas God says that he should be so forever, we must understand that the years of Jubilee was excepted, as we may see in other places. And in very deed, the compass of fifty years was called a world, and the word that Moses uses is taken sometimes for the age of a man, His meaning then is, that he which consents to be a bond slave, shall abide in that state forever, that is to say even until the state of the country be renewed, as well concerning men's lands as their persons: at which time every man entered again into his own heritage, that God might always be known to be both sovereign Lord and as it were the only Lord of the soil, and that the inhabitants were not owners and freeholders but only as tenants at will, or farmers, for those are the very terms that our Lord uses. Therefore his will was that the parting of the Land which was made by his commandment should be kept: the mean whereof was that every man should return to his own inheritance and possession at the fiftieth year, at which time the whole state of the Realm was changed in all other things. Thus see we know what was the effect of this Law.

And here we have an example that masters ought to behave themselves gently, for we ought always to bear in mind what has been treated of, namely that this law was far other than the law of service ship that is among us. For as now we hire servants for wages, whereas in those days they were bought and sold, and men used them much more hardly than they do nowadays. If a servant had been mistreated at his master's hand, he could not depart from him, nor have any law against him: but he was faine to obey his master in all that ever he would put him to. If his master would send him to the fields, or use him as a droll in his house, to do whatsoever he had to be done; it was not for the servant to hand the groin at it, or to say I cannot do it: for his master would use him as he listed: insomuch as he would marry him even spite of his heart, and take his children from him. And though the servant were set at liberty at the seventh year, yet his children were faine to abide in bondage still. That is one thing which we have to note. Now then, seeing that the state of servants was so grievous: it may well be said, that there were masters of singular humanity among the people of Israel, seeing that a servant could find in his heart to say, I am contented to dwell with you still. Freedom (as the Heathen themselves have said) is an inestimable benefit: and when laws speak thereof, it is preferred in favor before all other things. And since it is so, what a thing was it that a man should give over his freedom, which ought to be as dear to him as his life? Needs must it be said that he was gently dealt with. And this ought to make us greatly ashamed. For seeing a man might safely at that time by the laws of man, use his bond servant as he listed: must not those whom Moses speaks of here, needs condemn the person that uses cruelty towards his household folk, now when we be bridled by the civil laws? Yes: for they had not Jesus Christ as yet revealed to them, who has gathered us together into the spiritual kindred, as has been touched heretofore. It was not declared to them that God would have us to be members of his only son, yes and even bond slaves and such as are of the worst state that is. Since it is so, let us have an eye to ourselves: and let not the example that Moses sets down here, be a witness before God to condemn our excessive cruelty against those whom God has made our underlings. Mark that for one point.

Moreover let us mark, that the boring of the servant's ear that is spoken of here, is to avoid the blearing of men's eyes, and that the matter should come to open trial. For although there were courteous matter to be found among the Jews: yet notwithstanding the most part of them were after the common trade of the world, as always we see, full of malice, full of fraud, and full of outrage. For there were of them that would have drawn their servants by naughty means to say, you thinks yourselves now escaped my hands, but I will make you come again after another fashion. Or else per adventure he would have flattered his servant for a time: and under pretence of dealing well with him for a month or six weeks, he would have drawn him into his nets and snares to bind himself to this perpetual bondage. For this cause it was our Lords will that it should pass by order of law, and that the magistrates should have knowledge thereof. And hereby we see how men had always need to be bridled, and to have their naughtiness prevented: for it were pity else. And although this seems somewhat hard, yet was it or denied in favor of that servants rather than of the masters. If there were any such mark here among us nowadays: very well, it were a kind of reproach. And why so? For such a one should show himself to have hand no heart: for he should rather have lived of his handle labor, and to have scratched his living out of the earth, rather than to have forgone his liberty when he was to be set free. Therefore the world sees that such a one is but an idle belly, and a very blockhead. Thus it should seem at the first blush, that God here does punish the guiltless. For if a man be in good state, and therefore is contented to yield himself into perpetual bondage; should he be put to shame for his labor? Nor, our Lords meaning was to waken up those that were to enter into such bondage, as if he should say; Beware what you do: for they come to nail you to the door, to show you that you should be tied to this place, to be his bond servants forever to whom you bind yourselves, and so you do after a sort renounce that privilege which I had given you: and therefore look well about you what you do. We see then that this law was not made for the masters sakes but for the servants sakes, to the intent they should bethink themselves thoroughly when they went about to be bound: and that even when they came to the deed doing, they might be at choice still to say, I will depart free, I am mine own man, I will use the liberty that God gives me.

Thus we see in few words, how God's intent was not only to show to the masters that they themselves also were under commandment: but also to warn such as had been misadvised, to beware how they did cast themselves into perpetual bondage. And so let us mark in few words upon this text, that the gentleness which we owe to our neighbors, is precious in the sight of God. For seeing he has such a care of it, and has enjoyed it so by his word: it is a token that it is an acceptable sacrifice to him. Will we then please God? Let us use such gentleness towards our neighbors, that even they themselves which are in subjection to us, may have cause to esteem of themselves and to rejoice and praise God, that we behave ourselves as brethren towards them. And let such as are masters think always with themselves, This does not take away nor abolish the spiritual kindred which God has planted and established between the great and the small. But seeing he vouchsafes them the honor to be their father: it is good reason that we also should take them for our brethren, forasmuch as he has chosen them as well as us. That is the thing in effect which we have to gather upon this text. And David seems to have had an eye to this ceremony in the fortieth Psalm where he says, Sacrifice and oblation for sin are not the things that your Lord requires: but you have bored my ear. As if he should say that God desires not sacrifices at our hands, but would have us to be wholly his, and to be wholly given to him, accordingly also as the scripture exhorts us not only to offer this thing or that thing to God, but also to offer him our bodies and souls, that he may possess and enjoy us. When Saint Paul shows us the service which he calls reasonable, he says not, offer of your goods to God: but mortify yourselves as true sacrifices. And there upon having mortified our human reason, and all our thoughts and lusts, let us offer up ourselves (says he) as living sacrifices to God. Nevertheless God's meaning is not to have us offer up ourselves as temporal sacrifices, so as we should be willing to honor him today, and forget him quite and clean tomorrow; but he will have us to be his both in life and death, accordingly as it is said in the 13th to the Romans, that our Lord Jesus died and rose again, to the end that we should live and die to him. It seems then that David's speaking of the boring of his ear, was to show that our giving of ourselves to our God must not be for a time, and then at the end thereof to take our leave of him: but that as we have lived in his obedience already, so we be ready to die in the same, following his call to the end, without ceasing or altering our purpose. We know then the God requires not sacrifice, for the chief thing ought to go before, and that is, to be wholly his.

Again, when a man dedicates himself to God, it is certain that all that ever he has does follow him: But yet the offering up of ourselves must be all wholly, so as he

enjoy both our bodies and our souls, and be glorified throughout by us. And as touching this matter which we treat of now presently, it is to be noted that God is not contented with our serving of him for a time, as a number do that make fair shows at fits, who think themselves well discharged when they have done a thing or twain in that honor of God, and therefore would exempt themselves from ever putting to their hand anymore as long as they live. Let us beware we deal not so: but rather as I have told you already, let every of us make his account, that inasmuch as God calls us to him, we must not shrink from him in the midst of our way: for this life is as a race wherein God intends to exercise us. Therefore let us keep on our way, and endeavor to go forward to the end. Let us strain ourselves to continue, and let us live and die in the obedience of him that has purchased us to dearly: and let us hold out in his service until he have taken us out of this world. After that sort is it God's meaning that we should have our ears bored, that we might be marked to be his servants forever, and not for a time. True it is also that God uses not any Aule to mark our ears withal: but he bores us inwardly. For that bondage that Moses speaks of here was earthly, and served for the state of this world. But God will have us to serve him after another fashion, namely by reducing all our thoughts and affections to the obeying of him. And how may that be done? For when he speaks to us, he speaks of deaf folk, so that the holy Ghost must be fine to bore our ears: and until we be touched after that manner, and that God have wrought in us, we never know what the serving of him does mean. Then let us mark well that God uses not such a manner of marking as was used among the Jews: but he will have us to be in his subjection to him. He takes no Aule to bore us through the ear, that the mark might be seen to the world ward: but it behooves us to be framed by his Holy Spirit to give ourselves wholly to him, and we must feel his power within us. That is the thing in effect which we have to remember upon this place.

Now let us come to that which Moses adds, that the wages of a Servant is double the wages of a hireling. This sentence is not understood of many men as it should be. For they have taken it, that the reward which was to be given to a bond man at his franchising, ought to be double the wages of an hireling, as though the servant that took wages, had taken but three years wages. But that was nothing to the purpose. And the Jews after their manner, have invented yet a more foolish gloze, and utterly corrupted the Holy Scripture, by mingling their own fancies therewith. For they say, that a man ought not to esteem of his life above three years, and that if he attain to six years, it is as it were a double pay. This is much to the purpose, as who should say I could warrant myself life till tomorrow, or as though I had my life in my own hand, to say, you shall live still such a time. Thus you may see their beastliness, how there was neither fear of God, nor any right understanding in those blind wretches. And good reason is it that they which have so forsaken the light of the world, should become brutish after that fashion, so that for all their reading and for all their having of the Holy Scripture, yet do they nothing else but betray their own ignorance. And it is God's just punishment for their despising of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereby they have cut themselves off from him which is the very soul and the guide of the law. But the meaning of Moses is large: namely, that it must not grieve a man to give liberally to his bond servant, when he has dwelt with him the space of six year.

For why? It is double the wages of a hireling: as if he should say, he deserves double wages in comparison of a hireling. We have seen already how our Lord has forbidden men to send away their servants empty when they were set at liberty. You shall rewarded him (says he) according as the Lord shall have blessed you. Look into the presses, look into the garners, look into your stalls: and according to thin ability give your servant somewhat, that he may fall to some trade, and not be put quite and clean out of heart. This we have seen already. Now here against a man might reply: I had leaver then to entertain a hired servant for wages. For if I take one for wages; he shall serve me but from day to day; and if he served me well, I can keep him still: or if he serve me amiss, I can send him away, and that were more for my profit. And therefore it seems prejudicial to my right to give reward now to a slave. A man might allege after that fashion, as men are always subtle in seeking of starting holes. If the case concern either their profit or their loss, they can be brought to no uprightness or reason. For this cause our Lord says here, How now? Think you not that a slave does, yes double the service of a hired servant? Yes: for if a man hire a servant for wages, if he find him not meat and drink, he must give him so much the more money, that he may find himself after his own liking. And again, if a man find him, he will look for a large pittance; and yet he will grudge at it and say; this is no fare meet for a man that takes wages. The man then that is hired for wages, must be maintained after a more courteous and liberal fashion, than a slave. Moreover, when the hired man has done his days work, he is dispatched, and he goes his way to bed till the next morning that he come again to his work. But the slave is in a harder case. For the similitude which our Lord Jesus makes in Saint Luke, is taken of the common fashion that reigned in those days. True it is that he treats of a far greater matter, to show how we bound to God. But yet does he allege this similitude, saying: Behold, if one of you have a bond servant, whom you send to labor in your vineyard or in your field, when this servant comes home at night stark weary of his laboring to do you service; I ask you whether his master will say to him, Come sit you down your turn, and take here my place, and I will serve you. Nor, his master will say further to him, Serra, go fetch me such a thing, and go do such a thing. And the servant dares not be so bold as to reply, why so? I have labored in the field all day, and must I now take pains still when I am come home at night? You see then to what purpose it is said now that the reward of a slave is double.

Again, the servant that is hired by the day has more ease and privilege: insomuch that if he be ill dealt with, he may go his way. But he poor bond slave is tired, so as he must be faine to serve his master day and night, and there is no regard had of giving him anything for his labor, but so he be found never so meanly it is well enough. To be short, it is showed us here, that we ought always to have consideration of the profit that redounds to us by such as have done us service. And although there were no law to compel us to the discharging of our duties, yet ought it to be printed in our hearts, and every man ought to have a conscience for the laws sake, which tells us that we ought not to deal churlishly with our servants. For if a man flatter himself, he is never the more discharged before God, but he must be faine to come to account. And those which as now do vaunt themselves because they have gotten some superiority about others, shall in the end find that God's will was there should have been some equality betwixt them, as Saint Paul speaks thereof. For he use the self same term when he commands masters to bear with their servants, and to spare them. Let there be an equality betwixt you, says he. As how? Is it meant that the servant should be checkmate with his master? No, but Saint Paul would there should be an answerable uprightness, so that as the master can well skill to take the labor and travel of his servant under pretence that he may say, He is mine underling, I may command him what I list: so must he also consider the mutual bond that ought to be between one and another of us, that he on his own side do answer and acknowledge, Go to, I am his master, but not to use tyranny; I am his master albeit in such sort as I am also his brother; I am his master, but yet is there one common master in heaven, which has authority both over me and over them that are under me: and in that behalf we be all but one household. And seeing that God has called us all into his house, it behooves both great and small to acknowledge one another for their brethren, forasmuch as God has done us the honor to adopt us to be his children; let not the great ones which have superiority use any Lord lines in reigning after their own will, but let them govern their subjects as their household with all gentleness and courtesy, in such sort as God who is the father of all, may have highest preeminence, and be honored as he deserves. Thus you see in effect, that the thing which we have to mark in this sentence, is that every of us should look to himself, and yield them right which are not able to demand it, but are after such a sort in our subjection, as they cannot open their mouths to complain of us. Let us not tarry till their complaint and cry mount up to heaven; but let us prevent that, and let us of ourselves be inclined to pity and gentleness. That is the thing which our Lord aimed at in this sentence.

Now he adds a promise to it, to the end we should be the better provoked to do that which he bids us. For although we feel our slackness in doing our duty to be such as our own conscience finds fault with it: yet does self profit so blind us and besot us, that we cannot be one to open our purses, and to give liberally of the things which seem to belong to us. Now then, God perceiving us to be so wedded to our own profit, that a man cannot wring anything from us, but by many force: adds here, that if we use liberality towards those that are under us, he on his side will bless us, and increase us the more for it. Surely, if there were any faith or right belief in the world, should not this promise inflame us, and move us to pity and compassion towards those that are in distress, to succor them and to help them? And although that mention be made here peculiarly of bond servants; and that God command some reward to be given to them: Yet is it a general law of courteous liberality. Seeing it is so, let us mark, that if we strain ourselves to do good to such as are in need, we ought to hope for God's blessing, and that the more liberal men be in succoring their neighbors, the more will God show himself liberal towards them again. And so far off are they from diminishing themselves by their giving to the needy; that it is as the opening of a window for God's grace to rain in at, to the greater increase of their wealth. That is the cause why I said; that if there were but one drop of faith among us, we would be inflamed after another fashion to do good. But we be locked up, and every man withhold that which he has, insomuch that when we should give, we think the earth must needs fail us. Whereby we show ourselves to have no trust in God. So then, let us mark well this text, wherein our Lord to soften our hard hearts and to induce us to compassion, says that according to our pitying of the poor and needy, by relieving their necessities: he also on his side will have regard thereof, and multiply us a hundred fold more by his blessing, than ever we could have increased ourselves by our own covetousness and niggardship. Insomuch that we shall set open a window (as I said before) for God's grace that is offered us, if we succor those that have need of our help. That is the thing which we have to consider as in respect of the promise which God adds here.

Now afterward follows the law of the first born, wherein it is said, that all the first born males shall be offered to God, and that they shall be offered every year, in the place which the Lord shall have chosen, so they be not faulty, nor in any wise blemished. As for example, if a beast were goggle eyed, or blind, or lame, or had any other ill favor or blemish in it: it might not be offered; but the beasts that were sound, were to be offered in the temple, as God had commanded to bring them to the place that he had chosen, according to that which has been told you heretofore. We know whereof this law of offering up the first born things sprang, namely of God's fleeing of all the first born of the land of Egypt, as well of men as of beasts at such time as he was about to deliver his people out of bondage of Egypt, and of his sparing of the children of Israel; for the blood of the Pascal Lamb was dipped upon their doors, and that was done for their preservation. Now our Lords will was that the firstborn should be offered up to him in acknowledgment of the great benefit. For seeing that so great a miracle had been wrought for them, it behooved them to honor God for it, and to be always the more moved to magnify his grace. But we see how forged we are in that behalf: insomuch that if God have done us any good turn, indeed we can speak of it and tell it forth with voice loud enough for a little while: but by and by it slips from us, and we think no more of it. But God's powering out of his gracious goodness towards us, is to the end that we should mind it continually and bear it in remembrance ever after. Therefore is it requisite that we should be warned and put in mind of the things which we would else forget. Even so stood that case as in respect of the offering of the firstborn. For God's will was that it should be a memorial of the said benefit, so as it might never be forgotten. And hereby let us mark, that although we have not the like ceremonies among us: yet does God still exhort us to be mindful of the benefits that we have received at his hand. And the excellent that his gracious doings are, the more ought we to be moved by them to exalt them, yes and to deal in such wise that even when we be dead and gone, our children may continue in doing the like. Thus you see what we have to remember concerning the order that was set down for the offering up of the firstborn things.

It had been enough to have spoken of it once; and why then does God repeat it again, but by reason of men's unthankfulness? And this concerns not the Jews only, but also us. Wherefore let us consider, that whereas God tells us that we ought to be mindful of the benefits which we have received at his hand, yet we cease not to turn our backs, and to shut our eyes that we might not see; and if we be driven to remember them whether we will or not, yet are we too lazy in doing it. Considering then the naughtiness that is in us, insomuch that God has no sooner turned his hand, but that we have by and by forgotten what he has done for us; or at leastwise whereas he would that the remembrance of his benefits should be printed in our hearts, we think it enough to have born them in mind a day or twain: Let us accustom ourselves to the mindfulness of them, and consider that we must not only blame the Jews for their unthankfulness, but also remember that we ourselves are of nature like to them.

Moreover whereas it is said that the firstborn things which are to be offered, must be sound and without blemish: hereby we see how men would fine beguile God with their by shifts. For they would have picked the faultiest of their firstborn things to have offered to God, and they would have thought with themselves, well, this shall set out to do service withal in the Temple; for it will do me no service: wonder beast does but pine away, well, eh must serve for sacrifice. This were a plain mocking of God: and yet was it a common thing among the Jews. But let us come to ourselves: there is none of us all but he finds himself so ill minded, as to defraud God continually of somewhat that belongs to him. For, (to let pass the ceremony of offering the firstborn things) God requires that every of us should offer up ourselves to him; and it is good reason that we should do so: for he has redeemed us from the bondage of death. We were by nature the bond slaves of Satan, and behold, God has made us his own children: therefore is it very meet, that we should do him homage with our persons. And as touching our souls, we know that the son of God spared not himself for the redeeming of them. And as for our bodies we hope that they shall be raised again to his heavenly glory. Is it not meet then that God should have the whole possession of us? But when it comes to the offering up of ourselves to him, the world sees that we go to it like cripples and purblind folk. Who is he that comes freely to God, and that suffers himself to be utterly cast down and to be stripped out of his sinful nature? Nor, if we go towards God with the sight of one eye, with the sight of the other we are tied to the vanities of the world. If we lend him our ears a little while, by and by we be listening to some other thing. If we have any good thought tending towards him, we be corrupted a thousand waies. Such are the sacrifices that we offer to God that is to wit sinful sacrifices and full of corruption. To be short, howsoever the world go, God can have no right at our hands. Call he never so much upon us, and be he never so importunate with us, yet are we so hard hearted, that we will never yield him his due. Thus we see that although the ceremony of offering that firstborn as well of cattle as of men, is taken away: yet this Law is not superstitious among Christians: but under the shadows of Moses' law, God shows us after what sort we should come to him nowadays: that is to know, not limping, nor as purblind folk ranging here and there: but that we should look to the purging of the wicked affections that are in us, so as we may come to him sound both in body and soul. True it is that do what we can, it is not possible for us to be without a great number of vices in us: but yet must not those vices be nourished, neither must we flatter ourselves. If any of us feel any imperfections in himself, he must dislike of it, and being sorry for it, we must desire God to purge and clean us from our sins, that we may be rid from all the corruptions that hinder us to become acceptable sacrifices to him. When we go that way to work, that is to say, when every of us fights against his own sins by true repentance; although there be many things amiss in us, yet will our Lord receive us, and not shake us off. For we know that the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ serves to scour out all our spots. And that is the cause why it is said that our sacrifices are offered to God the father in his name. Seeing then that Jesus Christ is there answering for us, although there be spots in us, yet are they not imputed to us. But yet must we on our side endeavor to amend them, and by that mean acknowledge the thing that is said here, that is to know, we must not offer faulty sacrifices to God, nor resemble the hypocrites, which come to him for fashions sake, but indeed make none account of him: so as we should make a fair face of it to the world ward, and in the meanwhile softer some secret poison within, but that we come right forth to our God as he commands us. Thus you see in effect what we have to remember upon this sentence of Moses', where he speaks of the firstborn.

Besides this, our Lord's meaning was that the firstborn should be valued at a sum of money as well of the cattle as of other things: so as the thing that was always aimed at, was the mindful of God's benefits. But as concerning these things we will not enter into them as now; for this text requires it not, neither does the time serve for it. It suffices us in few words to know that our Lord's meaning here, is that when we have received any gracious good turn, or that he has bestowed any benefit upon us, the remembrance thereof should continue with us, not for a day or two, but forever: and that the father's should tell their children the same, to the end that he may be honored among us for evermore. Finally let us not offer beasts to him in sacrifice, as they did under the Law as appears by this figure: but let us assure ourselves that the acceptable sacrifice which God requires, is the offering of ourselves to him both in body and soul, so as our whole seeking maybe to be guided and governed altogether by his Holy Spirit, and that all that ever we have be dedicated to his service, and applied to the use which he has showed us, that he may be glorified in all points.

Now let us fall down in the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, and that seeing there is nothing in us but all manner of forwardness and lewdness, we may seek to be renewed in such sort, that as long as we live in this mortal life, our whole seeking maybe to be guided to the happy end which we look for in heaven; and that in the meantime we may live after such a sort in this world, as he may be glorified in us, and that when it shall please him to take us hence, we may yield ourselves obediently into his hands, assuring ourselves that since he shows himself so gracious and liberal towards us, as to govern us in this transitory life, and of his goodness gives us all things behooove and necessary and we need not to doubt but that he will make us to attain to the perfection of the things which are now hidden, and which shall not be opened to us, until the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. That it may please him to grand this grace not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth, et cetera.

The 97th Sermon, which is the first upon the sixteenth Chapter

You shall keep the month of new fruits, that you may keep Passover to the Lord your God. For in the month of new fruits the Lord your God brought you out of the land of Egypt.

2 And you shall sacrifice the Passover to the Lord your God, even sheep and oxen, in the place which the Lord your God will choose to put his name therein.

3 You shall eat no leaven bread in that feast: Seven days shall you eat unleavened bread, even the bread, of sorrow. For you came in haste out ourselves the Land of Egypt: to the end you be mindful of the day of your departing out of the land of Egypt all the days of your life.

4 And there shall no leaven be seen in your house, during the seven days in all the coasts. Also you shall not leave of the flesh that is sacrificed from the evening of the former day till the next morning.

This present chapter treats of the three feasts which God ordained among the Jews: that is to know, the feast of Easter or Passover, that feast of Pentecost or Whitsuntide, and the feast of Tabernacles or Tents. First he treated of the Passover, and God ordained that it should be diligently observed: for it was a memorial of great importance, whereby the people were put in mind, how they had been redeemed, and put in possession of the inheritance that had been promised to them. It was behooove that the same should be known: for it was the foundation of all the benefits which the Jews had received at God's hand, and which they looked for afterward. Without that, they had been no people separated and dedicated to God, neither had they had any hope of salvation: for the covenant made with their fathers had been defeated. Therefore is it not without cause, that God would have that day kept holy, and with such ceremony. In like case was it with the feast of Tabernacles, as we shall see hereafter. For it served to put the Jews in mind of their going out of Egypt, and that whereas they had dwelt long time in the wilderness, without house or home, and yet God had ever preserved them: it behooved them likewise to acknowledge the same benefit. But we will treat of every feast in his due order.

Presently we have to speak of the Passover. But before I go any further, we must make also that God respected not only what he had done already; but also meant therewithal there should be a figure of things to come, whereof we have now the truth and substance, since the time that the Lord Jesus Christ has been discovered the world. That is the cause why Saint Paul tells the Colossians that these things were but shadows, the body whereof is in Christ Jesus. Truly it is that he speaks not there expressly of Easter day by name: but yet under the name of Sabbath, he comprehends all the feasts, and likewise all the ceremonies that depended upon them. To be short, God had a double respect in ordaining the day of the Passover. The one was to do the people of Israel to understand, that they came not into possession of the Land of Canaan by their own power: but that they had been led in thither by the hand of God. And because they had been delivered by miracle out of the land of Egypt; God's will was that the same should be declared. Again, forasmuch as the same deliverance was a figure of the deliverance that was to be hoped for by our Lord Jesus Christ: this feast of Passover extended yet further, that is to know, that when the people are of the Pascal Lamb (as they called it) they should think thus with themselves: This is a shadow and figure of the Sacrifice which shall be once offered up, whereby the world shall be reconciled and set free. And although the thing were not yet apparent to the eye. Yet behooves it the faithful to ensure themselves to the hope of the redeemer whom God had promised them. And in that respect says S. Paul in the first of the Corinthians, that Jesus Christ is our Passover or Pascal Lamb, and that he is sacrificed for us, and that we must now eat of that sacrifice: albeit not with the leaven of malice and deceitfulness, but with righteousness and soundness. That is the one point which we have to remember.

And that the Pascal Lamb was not a bare ceremony without doctrine: it appears by that which is written in the twelfth of Exodus; where it is said, that when the Lamb is sacrificed as it is a eating, if their children asked what it means: their fathers shall answer, The Lord brought us out of the land of Egypt where we were in bondage, and therefore he will have this thing done yearly in remembrance thereof: not that the doing thereof one only day may discharge us: but that the same should continue printed in our hearts, so as in enjoying the land of Canaan; we may understand that we conquered it not by our own strength, but through his good pleasure, because it was his will to harbor us here, according to the promise which he had made to our forefathers. We see then how the feast of Passover, was not a ceremony without instruction: but that it contained doctrine in it. And it is an article of great importance. For the world would always have a great number of ceremonies to no purpose: and in the meanwhile it seems

enough to have store of gay shows. But on that the contrary part, God tells us, that ceremonies are but toys and trifles, unless they lead us further, and be height us things concerning our salvation, so as we be taught and confirmed in the faith by means of them. If that be not in them, they be stark baggage, and nothing worth. Nor, they be nothing else than a corrupting of the service of God, and the highway to lead us to superstition and idolatry. As for example, we see how they make a great number of disguising in the Popedom: but in the meanwhile they know not what any of those things mean. If you come to their Mass, there they play and interlude, where there are as many fond toys as can be. Indeed the wretched world is ravished at them: but that is because they know nothing, but are utterly slotted, and yet they bear themselves in hand that they have done a dotty deed, and that God ought to like very well of it, when they have so bestirred themselves. But (as I told you before) they be but vain and fond Apish toys. And why so? For God never meant to ordain any ceremony among his people, which contained not some good instruction, and served not to some good end. And therefore let us mark well, that whereas the Jews had the feast of Passover, they had God's word also, whereby they were warranted that it was not invented at the pleasure of men. For God not only gave a prefixed commandment as saying: You shall observe such a day: but also a doctrine with it, and willed that the fathers should teach it their children, and put them in remembrance of the deliverance that had been made, as indeed it was an excellent a deed as might be. That then was of his appointment.

And so let us bear in mind, that if we nowadays have ceremonies without instruction, they shall be all condemned of God, who utterly dislikes them, and we cannot allege them to be his service. For he declares and avows it to be but foolish superstition, when men turn away from that mark, and that it is the next way to put us quite besides our salvation. And herein we may defy all the huge heap of pomp wherewith the Papists will needs serve God: for there is nothing in them that God avows. Also we be warned to mingle nothing with the pure simplicity of the Sacraments and ceremonies which God would have to be observed nowadays. Let us hold us contended with that which is showed us: for if we add never so little to it, surely we shall make such a mingle mangle as will be nothing worth, after the manner of the Papists, who (as we see) have invented many things of their own head. We must have this and that, say they, Why so? To what purpose? Oh (they say) it will serve for such a thing: but in the meanwhile there is no instruction to Godward. Is it their part to cause a doctrine to be brought in? It were meet that God should speak. And when men hear him, than everyone shall be edified. But when men thrust themselves in, and fall to forging of fond devotions without authority from God: all must needs be cast down. The world sees how the Papists have corrupted the true Sacraments. In Baptism, the water has been esteemed as nothing in the Popedom: for it is no matter if the infants piss in it. But as for the holy cream that is in it, Oh, it is not for any man to touch that: for that is too heavenly a thing. And yet notwithstanding the water is the substance of that Sacrament, and the whole perfection thereof. But as for the seam, who devised it? It is a stinking grease that men have charmed, and blew upon, like sorcerers. And should that be had in such reverence, that the Sacrament which proceeds from the son of God, should be had in no estimation for it? Moreover, the water (by their reckoning) is not good, unless it have been conjured, and that a number of charms have been made over it, to amaze the ignorant. And therefore so much the better ought we to bear this lesson in mind, that we may be fenced against all Satan's inventions: which is, that since we see our minds so ticklish, that we would find still invent some new thing, and we bear ourselves in hand that that we have spun a fair thread, when some new ceremony is come forth by our means: it stands us in hand to think thus, yes, but God despises all this gear, yes, and he shows us that we do but pervert his service, when we add anything after that fashion, of our own. Then is it an infallible doctrine that no ceremonies are behooved or to be made account of among the faithful, unless they carry instruction with them. And that instruction must come of God: for it is his office to teach us, he reserves that authority to himself. And therefore it is to be concluded, that the ceremonies which are set forth by men, are but trifles and gewgaws, how great a show of wisdom so ever there seem to be in them.

And hereby we see also that it was superstitiously done of such as bear the name of Christians, to bring in a feast of Passover under pretence that the Jews had it: for the respects are far divers. I mean not that we may not have one day in the year, whereon to celebrate the remembrance of the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ: for we must not run so rigorously into extremities, as that our infirmity might not have some help, to quicken it up withal, that we might the better bethink us all the time of our life, what benefit the rising again of our Lord Jesus Christ has brought to us. Well then may we have a day appointed to that purpose for orders sake: but to make a service of God thereof, or to think that we ought to fashion ourselves after the example of the Jews; that as they had their Passovers, so ought we too: it were an abuse that tends to the turning of all things upside down, and a putting of a veil before the face of Jesus Christ, that men might not know the light of the Gospel. These things (as I said) were but shadows, whereof we have as now the body and substance: and therefore it is a hiding of Jesus Christ, when men bring in feasts after the manner of the Jews.

But now let us come to that which is commanded here concerning the Easter day of the Jews you shall eat unleavened bread or cakes (says he) by the space of six days, and there shall no leavened bread be found in your houses. This was done because the Jews departed in half out of the Land of Egypt. And it ought to have made them to think that they went not out with banners displayed, as though their enemies had stood so in fear of them that they durst not quench against them: for they went away like a sort of poor fugitives. The women carried their children upon their shoulders, the men took up their stuff in their necks, and fled away privacy, and their enemies would fine have pursued them, and they were of strength and power enough to have done it. The Jews on the other side were a people that could no skill to handle a sword: for they had been held in such slavery, that they durst not once look upon a sword or any weapon of war. They had been used like Asses and Oxen. Their state had been as slavish as could be. Well then, when the time came that they should depart, it was said to them, Get you hence: And what bread shall we have to eat? What provision shall there be by the way? Grind your corn, and trust if up quickly in mean upon your shoulders, and as the time will serve you shall bake it by the way and eat it. Now when the people had this solemnity yearly, wherein they ate cakes without leaven: it served to put them in mind, that when their fathers departed out of Egypt, they were a poor fugitive people, that ran away like a Lamb that is pursued by wolves. You see in what plight they were. Needs therefore must it be concluded, that God had preserved them after a wonderful fashion. For what were the Egyptians? A nation full of pride and cruelty. A mighty nation, a nation that trusted to their own force and power; and moreover a nation that bare deadly hatred to the poor Jews, an utter enemy to them, and such a one as desired nothing so much as to root out the remembrance of them, as the tyranny of Pharaoh had well showed. Now then the Jews were put in mind that God had made them to escape out of their enemies hands, so as they could not but know that they had been helped by him, and that the praise of their life was to be yielded to him. As if they should say, You Lord has delivered us, not only from the state of bondage but also as it were by fetching us out of our graves. For we were as it were stark dead, and had been past all hope of recovery, if you had not reached us your mighty arm. That was the thing whereof the Jews were put in mind, when God commanded them to eat unleavened bread. And it was his will that this should be done, not only the same night that they ate the Pascal Lamb: but also that the same ceremony should be continued by the space of six days together. And why? God showed therein, that men be not thoroughly framed at the first burnt to the doctrine that he sets done to them, though the same be clear enough. Does God speak? There is no darkness in his speech. But yet howsoever the case stand, we cannot fasten upon it. For we be so slow minded, that we can never attain to his meaning, until he have repeated our lesson to us diverse times. That is the cause why he commanded expressly that they should eat unleavened bread by the space of six days together. As if he should say, truly the very one nights eating of the Pascal Lamb with unleavened bread, ought to be a sufficient instruction to you what is meant by the same. But what? I see well you be short witted, insomuch that if you have heard anything at God mouth and you forget it out of hand. And therefore when I intend to teach you, I must deal with you as it were by measure and compass. And therefore if you have a good long time before hand to bethink you of the eating of the Pascal Lamb, you will be the better prepared to it. Therefore shall you have a whole week, wherein you shall eat no leavened bread; by means whereof you shall be quickened up to think upon the great and inestimable benefit which God bestows upon your fathers in delivering them out of the land of Egypt, so as you may bear well in mind that his delivering of them was after a strange manner, and that he was faine to work after a heavenly fashion, because you were in so wretched plight, that you might seem to have been already swallowed upon death, and to have been already buried in your graves. Now we see why the Jews were expressly commanded to abstain from the eating of leavened bread.

There were other ceremonies also; that is to know, the girding up of their garments, the putting of their shoes, and the taking of their walking slaves staffs in their hands. For in those East countries they wear long garments after the same manner that the Turks do at this day. And when they travelled by the way, they trussed up their garments above their loins, as the gray Fryers and Jacobins or white Fryers do, and such other that are so greatly cumbered with clothes. Now God did the Jews to understand that they should be as wayfarers when they ate the Pascal Lamb, and that they should eat in the half, to put them in remembrance of the said departure out of Egypt. And our Lord did set down this figure as a looking glass for the Jews to behold how their forefathers ate the Pascal Lamb, even when they were hasted to go their ways, that they might acknowledge so great a benefit. And herein we see how God had a respect to the rudeness of his people as indeed all the ceremonies which we have served but for our infirmity. What does Baptism or the Lords Supper bring us? Do they make the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ of more value than it is of itself? What help find we in the read, or in the wine, or in the water, to that purpose? God's meaning then was not to add anything to that which we have received in our Lord Jesus Christ: but to bear with our rudeness because he sees us to be unable to comprehend the things that are gotten for us by our Lord Jesus Christ. For inasmuch as they be too high for us, God helps us up to them by the outward and visible signs which we have in the Sacraments. But it behooved the Jews to have more such helps than we. For they had not so plain a doctrine as is now contained in that Gospel. Again, Jesus Christ was not yet come, in whom we see all that ever can be wished for our salvation. The heavens were then opened to us, when his side was opened to wash us clean, and his body offered up for a sufficient sacrifice to reconcile us to God his father, and to do away all our offences and transgressors. When these things were done, then had we a full warrant of our salvation. Therefore we in these days need not to be helped with so huge a heap of ceremonies as the ancient fathers under the Law were. It is enough that we be lead to our Lord Jesus Christ, whereto few signs suffice, that is to know Baptism and the Lord his supper. For seeing that the son of God is contained with those two: we also ought to rest there. Nevertheless, we see here how God vouchsafed to stoop to the infirmity of his people, by giving them a lively representation of their departing out of the Land of Egypt, and by setting them down as it were in a looking glass or painted table, for them to behold how he had delivered them: that is to know, like a sort of poor people, that were taking their journey to flee away privy, and were so distressed as it was not for them to turn head against so mighty enemies, who were able to have swallowed them up at the first chop without any resistance. Seeing then that the Jews had such instruction; they should have considered thus with themselves: How comes it to pass that we be alive at this day, but because our God has preserved us? And how should our state stand but only by his mere mercy? For we had perished if he had not reached out his arm to bring us out of the Land of Egypt. Thus much concerning this point.

Now it was commanded further, that the Pascal Lamb should be eaten with bitter herbs. And our Lord himself speaks here expressly of the bread of sorrow: as if he had said, although you eat the Pascal Lamb in rest, and when you become to the enjoying of the inheritance which I have promised you: yet must you have a memorial ourselves the anguish wherein your forefathers were, and you must think that without my favor you should have had neither Pascal Lamb nor bit of bread to eat at this day: for you should have been utterly rooted out of the world. Consider it therefore, and that you maybe the better moved thereto, take bitter herbs, that is to say, abstain from all daintiness in your eating of the Pascal Lamb, as we see that our Lord Jesus Christ eating of the Pascal Lamb with this disciples, insomuch as they did not only sit down at a table, but also lie down after the manner of old time, which was to eat their meals lying half a ton side. Certain it is that he kept the Law to the uttermost: for he submitted himself to it to set us free from it. Then must we note that our Lord ate the Pascal Lamb after the same manner that was ordained yourselves Moses, that is to know, standing upon his feet, with his staff in his hand, and his shoes on his feet, and having his loins girded up like a wayfarer. And after this was done he took his accustomed repast, for this was a solemn sacrifice, and therefore we must not wonder that it was separated from the common meats: for it behooved all the folk of one house to ear thereof, so as if there were thirty or forty persons in a house, every man had his portion of it. And if the household were not great enough, two or three households were called together and they meat in one place, that the sacrifice might be eaten up hastily. A lamb was roasted in half and eaten up with a morsel of a sweet cake: yes and they were forbidden to see it. To show that they could have no leisure to tarry till it were half boiled, but they were fine to devour it hastily, life folk that were to go their ways out of hand. But howsoever the case stood, it behooved them to eat it with bitter herbs. Whereby we be done to understand, that daintiest do keep us from the due consideration of God's benefits, to be ravished by them. For although it be said, You shall be merry before your God: yet are we continually held back in this world, when we have some allurements to withdraw us from God. For if our flesh have her likings, then are we overtaken in such sort, that we sty not up aloft to behold well the spiritual grace of God. Thus you see that the cause why the bitter herbs were put to the sacrifice, was to make men to consider the better after what manner the people had been delivered, being Ernst in so extreme anguish as they were not able to endure anymore. Besides this, they were also forbidden to admit any heathen man to know, unless he were circumcised. True it is that God commanded that the bondmen being strangers born should eat thereof. Yes, but that was not before they were first incorporated into his Church by receiving the sign of circumcision. Hereby it is done us to understand, that it was a peculiar token given of God to his own people. For Sacraments are peculiar to the Church. They be no things for men to put to unholy uses, nor to leave at all adventure. For our Lord will have us to be gathered together under his name. When we use the Sacraments, let us think thus with ourselves, Behold here is a treasure that God has kept and laid up for us as for his children. And indeed, if a man should nowadays admit as many to the Lord's Supper as would offer to come to it: were it not a defiling of the Sacrament? And yet there are a number to be seen, which would have all men indifferently both tag and rag to be admitted to it: but such folks never wish yet how to use the Sacraments aright. For (as shall be declared hereafter) the Supper of our Lord Jesus Christ is to us at this day the same that the Pascal Lamb was, to the people of the Jews. Wherefore let us mark in few words, how our Lord has showed that this Sacrament was a warrant given of him to his people, that he took them to be his church, and therefore that it ought not to be set forth at adventure to all comers. True it is that circumcision likewise was a Sacrament: but there was a diversity of respects between the one and the other. For by circumcision, folk were received into the number of God's people, so as it was an entrance into the Church as Baptism is at this day: by means whereof such as by nature are not numbered in the company of God's children, are received and incorporated into them by Baptism. And so stood the case with the Jews for circumcision: But as for the Pascal Lamb, that was to be kept to the Jews themselves. Now it is also said, that it was not to be eaten throughout the whole country; but that it was to be done in the place which the Lord had chosen to put his name in. the Lord had chosen to put his name in. And truly this was not showed them at the first day, insomuch that they had been a long time in the land of Canaan, ear the Ark had any certain resting place, there was no such place assigned to it. But yet it behooved them always to be obedient to the ceremony of resorting to the place where the Ark was, until Mount Zion was marked out. And then were all m en bound to repair thither, even from the uttermost borders of the Country: all men were to come to Jerusalem, except they were let by sickness or old age. And why? It was not to give a president for the Pilgrimages which the Papists invented afterward: For in so doing they showed themselves to differ nothing at all from the Jews. Again, it is not for them to excuse themselves by the example of the Jews: for that Jews had a commandment of God, but the Papists made their vagaries for their own pleasure: wherein they utterly renounced Jesus Christ and overthrew that which is said in the fourth of S. John, namely that the time was come that God would no more be worshipped in any place certain, but would have his name called upon everywhere throughout that whole world. Besides this, we must mark that there was a special reason why God would have the Jews to resort to Jerusalem to sacrifice the Pascal Lamb there: namely to the end that no man should attempt to alter anything in that order which he had set by the law. And (as I have said) this ancient ceremony was a thing of great importance, as whereby the people were informed of their Redeemer, even that he had brought them out of the land of Egypt, and that he would send then yet another redeemer, by whom the whole world should be redeemer, by whom the whole world should be redeemed. Lo, here a ceremony that imported a wonderful secret, and therefore it was mere that it should be kept purely. For the doing whereof, god called all the Jews into one body, that having that sanctuary and the temple there before their eyes, they might be the better put in mind that it was not lawful for them to add anything at their own pleasure, but that it behooved them to follow the common doctrine, to understand that God represented himself there, and dwelt among them by means of the Ark. Seeing then that the people were so gathered together, they could not but be restrained from starting out into foolish inventions: and needs must the doctrine be retained therewithal, as I have said before: for that ceremony was nothing of itself, it had been but as a May game or a mockery. That was the cause why the people were drawn to Jerusalem, as to that place which God had appointed. And so we see now why it was said that they should not do sacrifice in any of their cities or towns, but assemble all together in the City of Jerusalem.

It is enjoyed further, that they should not break a bone of the Pascal Lamb. And why so? As if it were said that it was a meat to be eaten in half, (as I have showed before) so as they were forbidden to boil any part of it. And hereby God meant to show yet better that half which the people made in departing out of the land of Egypt, forasmuch as it was not for them to set the pot upon the fire to boil it: for they could never have had time to do it. Therefore were they fine to make half, and to eat this Lamb half roasted as people pressed upon by their enemies, and as folk that looked to have been overtaken every minute of an hour: by reason whereof they had no leisure to stand gnawing of the bones, or to break them to get out that marrow, as folk do when they have time at will. None of this could they do: but were fine to eat that sacrifice in half, and to cast away the rest. We see then as now, that as concerning that deliverance that had been wrought already, things were as it were pointed out with the finger in the Pascal Lamb: and for this cause that very term itself is expressed here, for the Hebrew word Passau is the same that we call Passing in English. And by that word our Lord confirmed that thing which we have spoken before namely that this ceremony was not a fond devise to busy men's heads with all as though they were little babes: but that it imports instruction to edify folk withal, to the end they should think thus: This day must we do homage to our God for our life, because he preserved us of his own mere infinite goodness, by bringing us out of the land of Egypt. So then God spoke not simply of the things that were to be observed: but his meaning was to show the end in such wise which he intended, as the people might consider, we have made passage: and what manner of Passage? Even such a one as we had no legs to go it withal, but also when we were yet in Egypt. For before we came at the red sea, there was another straight to pass, which we should never have escaped out at, if God had not opened us that way with his own hand. Yes and his will was that that day should be observed, to the intent that the remembrance thereof should be certain.

And for the same cause he pointed out the month that answers to March or April. Albeit it not to either of them, but because we cannot make a certain report of the months of the Jews to compare them with ours. The reason where of is, for that they had their months intermingled one with another, because they took them according to the Moon, so as they were interlaced together. This month therefore was sometime sooner and sometime later, and was named in Hebrew Abib, which signifies an ear of corn, when it begins to shoot forth at the first. Not when the ears of corn are full ripe: but when the corn begins newly to spindle. Indeed the time of itself imports nothing: but yet did it serve greatly to the instructing of the people, because the setting of it down made them to behold the matter the more presently. God's putting of them in remembrance of it was such as they could not but know the means whereby their fathers were brought out of the land of Egypt. And the very night itself was marked, to the end they should consider how God had delivered them from the thralldom of Pharaoh. On the other side, had the month been marked at the pleasure of men: they would have thought it might well have been changed for the commodity of the people. But God commanded it to be kept, to the end they should know he would have no part of his ordinance changed, not any man attempt to alter it in anywise.

And now we have to mark in effect, that by the ordaining of the Passover day, God meant to set down a memorial of his doings among his people, that they might acknowledge his grace, in delivering them out of the Land of Egypt after that fashion, and that their children might know that that was the means whereby they were come into the inheritance that had been promised them. Nevertheless, it was not God's intent to be honored and served with a trifling ceremony: but his mind was that there should be teaching, that men might be edified by it, and that the Jews might know that God's calling of them to him, was to be served by them as their redeemer and father. And therefore he would not have the Pascal Lamb eaten by unholy and unbelieving folk: but that it should be given lonely to such as were circumcised, and were already of the body of the Church. And seeing it is so, Let us remember that in all signs which God gives us, we must have instruction annexed to lead us to him. And forasmuch as we have the true Passover in our Lord Jesus Christ, as shall be declared tomorrow: we must nowadays step further. And although we have not the old Ceremony; yet let us hold fast the truth thereof, which is brought us by the son of God, as it is declared to us in these days by his Gospel.

Now let us fall down before the majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make us to perceive in what state we were, when he vouchsafed to call us to him, so as he has plucked us out of the gulf of death, in such sort as we have now cause to glorify him, and to give ourselves over to his service all the time of our life. And forasmuch as he not only shows himself to be our father and savior in the transitory life, but also calls us to the everlasting inheritance of heaven; according as he had chosen us thereto before the creation of the world: let us tend always thitherward, and be the more provoked to labor to that end, seeing we have the helps and remedies which he gives us, and that the badge is kept among us as he had commanded us by his word. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth, et cetera.

On Wednesday, the 6th of November 1555

The 98th Sermon, which is the second upon the sixteenth Chapter

2.3.4 And you shall sacrifice et cetera.

5 You must no sacrifice the Passover within any of the gates which the Lord your God give you:

6 But in the place which the Lord your God will choose to set his name in there shall you offer the Passover at even, about the going down of the Sun, just at the time that you went out of Egypt.

7 And you shall roast it, and eat it in the place which the Lord your God shall have chosen for himself. And the next morning you shall return from thence and go home to the Tents.

8 Six days shall you eat unleavened bread: and on the seventh day which is the solemn feast of the Lord your God, you shall do no matter of work.

It was declared yesterday, ho that by keeping the feast of the Passover, the Jews were put in mind of the deliverance of their forefathers made by God. And I told you how it was to double end. For God's will was to put his people in remembrance of the savor which he had showed to them already: and again, he meant to lead them to the hope of our Lord Jesus Christ. It was then but a temporal deliverance, which God had made of them out of the land of Egypt: but when he sent his only son, then delivered he his people out of a far worse bondage than that which we have spoken of. And therefore let us mark that the Pascal Lamb was a figure of our Lord Jesus Christ: which thing S. Paul witnesses in express words, saying: Christ our Passover is offered up. Also we know the sentence that is alleged out of the twelfth of Exodus by S. John, where it is said; You shall not break a bone of him. For there he declares how they came to our Lord Jesus Christ to have broken his bones after the accustomed manner, and found him already dead. And that came to pass by the wonderful providence of God, whose will it was that the thing which had been figured in the Pascal Lamb, should be laid open to men's eyes in Jesus Christ. And so Saint John applies this sentence to the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, in saying, it is written, you shall not break a bone of him. Yes, but God speaks but only of the

Pascal Lamb, which was offered in those days. Yet notwithstanding his intent was to show, that there was an agreement between Christ and the Passover, and that in that visible sacrament he meant to foreshow the redemption that was not yet seen, and that all this was fully accomplished in our Lord Jesus Christ. True it is that the Jews have not profited by this admonition: for they were the more in hardened by it. But let us on our side learn to refer the things that were done by our Lord Jesus Christ, to the things that were fore figured in the law. And we shall profit greatly by that mean. For it is not enough for us to know the story of the death and Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ; but the chief point is to resort to the use and fruit of it. And that is much the better attained to, by considered the ancient figures. Now it is said, that the Pascal Lamb was offered up, to the end that the house which were marked with the blood thereof, should be spared of God. For an Angel passed swiftly through the land of Egypt, and slew all the first born both of man and beast. There was but one reservation, namely the sacrificing of the Lamb, and look what door of a house was dipped with the blood thereof, that house did the Lords Angel pass over. The only safety then which we have, when God utters his wrath and vengeance through the whole world, is to bear the mark of our Lord Jesus Christ. For inasmuch as he was sacrificed for us, and we be besprinkled with his blood, God acknowledges us for his own, and upon special privilege withdraws his hand from us, so as we be not comprised nor enclosed under the common curse of the whole world. For that land of Egypt was at that time as an image of all mankind. And indeed, we be all accursed by nature: and good reason it is that God as a just judge should execute his vengeance upon us. But here the faithful are dispersed and mingled with the faithless. And how then are they discerned asunder, seeing they dwell together? God can well enough skill to discern the mark of his son. True it is that the state of our life may well be like that state of the faithless and the despisers of God. But yet howsoever we fare, our Lord gathers us continually to himself. Insomuch that if we be of his flock, he will be merciful to us even to that end, conditionally to himself. Insomuch that if we be of his flock, he will be merciful to us even to the end, conditionally also that we bear the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ of our badge. At the time that doors of their houses were sprinkled with a branch of Hyssop: but as now our besprinkling must be spiritual, as S. Peter tells us. Would we then that God should take us to mercy, when his hand is stretched out to punish all the world? Let us understand that there is no other mean for us to be marked by our Lord Jesus Christ, than only the holy Ghost. For his blood is not now a shedding, that we might make an outward and visible sprinkling of ourselves with it: but he had shed it for us in spirit (as the Apostle speaks of it in the Epistle of the Hebrews) That is to say, it was not the only pain that he suffered in his body, but also the matching of the heavenly power with it, that made the blood of him to be our washing and cleansing. And when we have once been warred with the holy Ghost, then will that blood be ever fresh and never dry. For it is not corruptible, in as much as we be washed and cleansed with it before God. Therefore let us so put the thing in use which is spoken of by Saint Peter, as it may besprinkle our souls. As how? Even by taking hold by faith, of the inestimable benefit which is brought us by our Lord Jesus Christ. And although we be full of filth and uncleanness: yet does not God fail to take us into his favor, because the blood that was once shed for our salvation, is sufficient to wash out all our spots at this day. Thus much for one point.

And therefore let us rest upon this point, that although we seem in this world to be wrapped up in the curse of God with the unbelievers; yet notwithstanding we shall be preserved from above: and that if the Angel could skill to discern the Jews which had marked their houses with the corruptible blood of a brute beast; it is much more likely that God will at this day know the blood of his own son, so as we may be discerned by it, and not have his wrath to fall upon us. True it is that we may well suffer some chastisement; for it is good for our soul's health. But the end thereof will always be good, and God will never cease to be still merciful to us. That is the first matter which we have to mark as in respect of the former saying, that our Lord Jesus Christ is the fulfilling of the things that were figured in the law, by the offering of the Pascal Lamb.

But let us now come back again to Saint Paul exhortation. He says that because our Easter lamb is offered up, we must now keep the feast in eating it, howbeit not with the Leaven of naughtiness or deceit, but in simplicity and uprightness. Whereas he says that our Passover is offered up, he does us to understand that if we will be reconciled to God, we must resort to the death and passion of his son, and not surmises any other sacrifice than that, which is the everlasting, because the virtue thereof can never fail. And it is a point well worth the noting: for it serves to condemn the abomination of the Mass which is brought into the Popedom. They be not contained with the offering up of Jesus Christ to God his Father, and with the one satisfaction which he has made to endure for ever: but they bear men in hand that he is yet sacrificed daily; whereas Saint Paul tells us that we must hold us to the redemption that was purchased once for all.

Now remains that we eat of this sacrifice, that is to say, that we become partakers thereof. As if he had said, there are two things in the Pascal Lamb: the one was the sprinkling of the Lambs blood, and the other was the eating of his flesh roasted. Now indeed it is the son of God that has offered this sacrifice, and that office belongs to him alone. The sprinkling of his blood is made in our hearts by the holy Ghost: for that cannot be attributed to the cunning of men. We must not become partakers of this Sacrifice: not by eating Jesus Christ after a fleshly manner; but Saint Paul had an eye to this partaking that is given us by the Gospel. For we be member of his body, and he knits us so to him, that look whatsoever he has, he communicates that same to us; so as we live in him and he also in us. And for as much as there is no severalty between the son of God and the faithful: therefore is he our meat. For we be no less fed with his power and his very substance as in respect of our souls, than our bodies are fed and nourished with bread. Again, to the intent we should understand that we have not our sustenance by halves in Jesus Christ: he adds wine also, to show that he is our drink as well as our meat. That is the thing which Saint Paul meant to betoken, in saying that we must now eat of this Easter Lamb: that is to know, that as now we should so communicate with the son of God, as we might be knit to him by the secret and marvelous working of his Holy Spirit, and he become our food and nourishment, and we be sustained by the same, because we must else needs decay through our own feebleness. And this eating is not for once a year; but continually during all the time of our life.

Then let us learn, that as long as we be in this world, we must daily frame ourselves to the spiritual fellowship which we have with our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the confirming of the union more and more: for without that, the crucifying of our Lord Jesus Christ will boot us nothing at all. He is the redeemer of all the whole world: and yet notwithstanding, what a number is there, which reap nothing else by his death but the greater condemnation? And that is because they refuse so excellent a benefit, whereby they make themselves unworthy of it, and exclude themselves quite and clean from it. But when we communicate with him by faith; then do we ratify the grace that was purchased for us. And therefore let us mark, that to be partakers of the fruit and operation of the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, we must be linked to him from day to day by faith, profiting and growing still in that holy union, until we have the thing wholly and perfectly, which we have as yet but in part. After that manner ought we to eat the sacrifice, to keep the Passover well. And for as much as our faith increases according to our profiting in the holy scripture: if we intend to communicate well with the son of God: everyone of us must exercise ourselves in the doctrine of the Gospel, and match the same with prayer, beseeching God that seeing he had vouchsafed to call us once into his son's company, he will maintain us therein, and never suffer us to be separated or withdrawn from it anymore. Therefore must we seek all the means which our Lord has ordained, to establish the communion which we ought to have in our Lord Jesus Christ.

Now S. Paul adds, that we cannot be partakers of the son of God, not have any acquaintance with him, if we be double minded that there be any fraud or malice in us. Then must we be changed if we will have Jesus Christ for our sustenance, that is to say, if we will have him to feed us with his substance. Certain it is that malice and hypocrisy are so rooted in us, that we must be fine to fight much with them, before we can be rid of the S. Paul then shows the faithful there, that they must be reformed or else Jesus Christ will cut them off from his body. And so although that hypocrites pretend to seek Jesus Christ and to stick thoroughly to him: yet notwithstanding they have none acquaintance at all with him. For why? They be things utterly impossible, that Jesus Christ should dwell in us, and yet nevertheless that all manner of deceit and naughtiness should reign in us. And therefore instead of abstaining from leavened bread as the fathers of old time did in eating of the Pascal Lamb under the law: let us mark that nowadays God will have us to discharge ourselves of all naughtiness and guile. And how may that be? It will not be done without great enforcement: for we of ourselves are not steady: but the spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ must be fine to work after such a sort with us, as we may be conformable to him in simplicity and uprightness. Thus you see what we have to gather of this exhortation with S. Paul makes in that first epistle to the Corinthians.

Now afterward here follows the thing that was treated of yesterday, namely the eating of the Pascal Lamb with their staffs in their hands, their shoes on their feet, and their loins girded up. For we cannot have the company of Jesus Christ unless we be as wayfarers in this world, to go on forward to seek our inheritance elsewhere. And S. Paul in the Epistle of the Colossians says plainly that our life is hidden with Christ, and that we must be as dead men, if we will be united to the son of God. And why? For he is in heaven, and therefore it follows that our life ought not to be tied here to that earth. What is to be done then? If we will have Jesus Christ to avow us to be members of his body, and to quicken us by his spirit: we must get us out of this world; not that we should not dwell in it, but that we should not be wedded into it. For these two things agree very well, that God's children should be conversant in this earthly life, and yet nevertheless he heirs and citizens of the kingdom of heaven, accordingly as the Apostle says to the Hebrews, that God can well find in his heart to take us for his children, if we be not tied to this world, but pass on beyond it. Wherefore let us mark, that to have fellowship with our Lord Jesus Christ, we must depart out of this world:

that is to say, our earthly affections must nor reign in us, we must not be mortised here, we must not be snarled here: but we must consider that seeing God has set us here to make a journey, yes and short journey, every of us ought to hire himself a pace, and to look well to the riding of ourselves of the things that may hinder us from attaining to the heavenly life. And we must understand that if we do so, Jesus Christ will come to us and reach us his hand to strengthen us, that we may be able to overcome all impediments. For it were impossible that ever we should compass that matter, unless we were aided from above. So then we see now that a man cannot be partaker of the Pascal Lamb, except he have his loins girded and his staff in his hand, that is to say, unless he be like a wayfarer and that he stay not in this world. And for the same cause also does our Lord Jesus Christ warn all his disciples to have lamps in their hands, and their garments trussed up, and to be always in a readiness till he come, and to stand waiting continually for his coming. And as he commands us to have our loins girded up, even so wills he us to have lamps in our hands, to show that there is neither night nor day for that faithful to make tarriance, and therefore that even in the midst of darkness we must have light, even the spiritual light to guide us; and that we must have the one foot always lifted up, to the intent we be not taken unawares when he comes, but that we have minded our way beforehand, to go still forward to meet with him. You see then that the way to communicate aright with our Lord Jesus Christ, that we may be partakers of the sacrifice which he has offered: is to make none account of the world, nor to have any love to it, but to seek that inheritance that is above, and to communicate so one with another here beneath, as it may be a mean to make us draw the nearer to God. And so we see that although that figures of the law continue not any longer: yet the truth of them abides with us, and it behooves us to put the same in use.

And hereby we be yet better informed of the thing that I have touched already: which is that the profit which redounded to us by the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, is much better known and beautifully seen of us, by laying it to the ancient future, and by considering how the things that were set forth darkly at that time, are now fulfilled to the sight of the eye. And like as it behooves us to communicate with our Lord Jesus Christ; so let us mark also that God gives us a help even at this day in that Sacrament of the Lord's super, because of our rudeness and infirmity. True it is (as I have touched already) that our communicating with our Lord Jesus Christ must not be only a thrice of four times a year, but continually all our lifelong. Yet notwithstanding we have need to be quickened up, because we come not to it with such strength as were requisite. Therefore like as the fathers of old time had the Pascal Lamb: so has the son of God left us his supper to be a help to us to guide us to him. Will we then be partakers of the supper of Lord Jesus Christ? Let us understand that according as I have avouched before, we must rid ourselves of all malice and guide, and forsake the world. True it is that the Hypocrites do thrust themselves in among the faithful, and come to defile the table of the son of God: but what carry they thence but utter cursedness? Therefore let us keep ourselves from being guilty of such a treachery, and consider that if it behooved a man to be circumcised in old time ere he might eat of the Pascal Lamb: it behooves us also at this day to be separated to their service of our God, and to be first made holy. And we know that we ought to be circumcised even at this day; albeit not by man's hand, but by inward reformation of mind, accordingly as S. Paul says thereof in the second Chapter to the Colossians, that whatsoever is of our flesh must be cut off: for there is nothing in it but sin and corruption. Now then, that we may come to the holy supper of our Lord Jesus Christ, and have there the warrant which he gives us that we be members of his body: let us look that we circumcise our hearts. For the figure is abolished: but yet have we the accomplishment of all things in our Lord Jesus Christ.

Moreover, let us come to the chief point: which is that our Lord Jesus Christ is named our Passover. For by him must we be delivered, not out of the land of Egypt, but out of the dungeons of death; and we must pass a passage that were impossible for us, if God drew us not with his own hand, and by his own wonderful power. For we be all born the children of wrath, and we should not in our misery, if God pitied us not, and reached us not his hand. And that man beguiles himself which thinks himself able to leave out of the mire wherein he is plunged. It is the office of our Lord Jesus Christ to draw us out from thence, according to this saying of S. John in his 8th Chapter, if that son of God make you free, then shall you be free. Whereby he shows us, that even from our very coming out of our mother's wombs, we be in that cursed thralldom of sin and death, and should continue therein to the end, if we were not set free from it by him which not without cause has taken upon him the title of Passover, to show that it is his office to set us free, as I said before. And hereby we must learn to presume nothing of ourselves, but to consider that we must think ourselves beholden to the son of God for all things, that he may be magnified, and all those devilish opinions of freewill and of power and ability to prepare ourselves to do good, beaten down; so as we may know that as long as God suffers us to follow our own swindge, we shall always abide fast tied in the chains of the devil and of death. And therefore let us yield our Lord Jesus Christ his due honor, which is that we acknowledge him to be the party which has set us free.

And here withal let us mark further, that when we be graphed into his body, it is not for us to serve sin. For, to be graphed into the body of our Lord Jesus Christ, and yet notwithstanding to serve Satan, are two things as contrary as fire and water. Now then if we intend not to defeat the power of the son of God, and to bereave him of his office: we must be in liberty to serve God. And let us not think that he meant to beguile us, in telling us that that office belongs to him. But it becomes us on our part to offer ourselves to him, and not to maintain willingly the cursed bondage wherein we be. For the very cause why men perish therein, is that they sooth themselves that fall asleep in it, and come not frankly to Jesus Christ. Now then let us note that the true mark of our Christendom; is that we be in freedom to do good, and that we have a pure and free will to dedicate ourselves to God. Not that we can do it perfectly so long as we be in this world (for we see how S. Paul, who had profited far above a number of other men, mourns and confess that he is still held as a captive in part:) but for that the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ must nevertheless work so far in us, as we may not be held quite back by these worldly things. But let us mark also that our Lord Jesus Christ has not only drawn us out of the gulf of death, but also will have us daily to pass further. And forasmuch as we be not quite and clean rid of this bondage of sin: this passing on must continue still. What is all our life then? It is a continual holding on to attain to that full and perfect freedom which God has promised to his children. And that is the cause why I said that it behooved us to eat the Pascal Lamb every day. For Jesus Christ is not our everlasting Passover, for that he is sacrificed every day: but for that we do daily take benefit continually available by his holy Spirit. Notwithstanding, howsoever that case go, yet must we still keep on forward, until we be taken out of this world.

This doctrine ought to be very common, yes and when it is preached, every man will think he knows it well enough: but in the meanwhile where is the practice thereof? Where it is said free heartedness to show by our deeds that our Lord has broken the bonds of Satan, so as we serve not sin anymore? Where is the earnestness of mind to proceed more and more until we be gone quite and clean out of the world? And yet must we exercise this doctrine, and put it in use, if we will be acknowledged for members of our Lord Jesus Christ. But we cannot have him to be our Redeemer, except he have always that said title of Passover. And that is in respect of us: for he has made his passage, by coming down into the world and by reconciling men to God his father, and by being received up again into his glory and Majesty. Therefore there must not be any more change in Jesus Christ. But we on our side must be made perfect in him: and as soon as he calls us to be of his body, we must begin to depart out of the dungeons of sin, from whence we must withdraw ourselves ever more and more, and still travel to attain to the heavenly righteousness. To be short, let us note that a Christian may well perceive whether he have profited in the Gospel or not, by examining whether he be withdrawn from the world or not, and whether he be ready and well disposed to depart from it as often as it shall please God to pull him away from it, so as his heart be not tied to it as long as he is here beneath (For look where our treasure is, there is also our heart with it) but that seeing Jesus Christ is our full life and felicity, we always tend to him, and ever have our minds lifted upon high.

And let us mark further, that to keep the Passover aright at this day, it behooves us to be united together, accordingly as we see how God has given a straight commandment thereof in this place, where he says it is not lawful to eat the Pascal Lamb in any other of the cities or towns of the country, but that they ought to assemble together to the Temple. Which thing I have told you heretofore, was done to preserve the religion in his pureness. Will we then nowadays be partakers of our Lord Jesus Christ? Let us agree together that there may be a true brotherhood among us. For if we be at odds among ourselves like dogs and cats, Jesus Christ must needs disclaim and disavow us. And therefore let us not imagine ourselves to be united to Jesus Christ, except there be good agreement and brotherly love among us. And wherein must that be? We may not conspire together as the wicked do; for they make confederacies and join hands together to make war against God. Cursed be such union: it behooves us to be far off from such dealing. Nor, we must resort to the temple of g. And although we have not now a material temple as the Jews had then in Jerusalem; (for our meeting together is for common orders sake, and not after the manner of the Jews, who had a place certain appointed out to them:) Although (say I) we have not the life figure; yet must we walk as in the presence of our God, we must be ruled by his word, we must have one melody of faith to praise God as it were with one mouth, and we must show ourselves truly to be one in him. Thus you see how we must be gathered together to God's Church, if we will be partakers of our Lord Jesus Christ.

And herein we see, that these scorers which turn away from the order of that church, exclude themselves from all hope of the heavenly life. They can say well enough that their intent is to be Christians: but yet for all that, inasmuch as they forsake that unity of faith, yes and even fight against it by despising all order: is it not to be concluded, that they cannot be partakers of the Pascal Lamb, at leastwise after the true manner thereof which we have nowadays? Let us mark well then, that to be partakers of our Lord Jesus Christ, we must not be only united in the doctrine of the Gospel: but we must also make confession of our faith, in assembling all together as though God were present with us. And truly we know how it is promised us, that where two or three are gathered together in that name of Jesus Christ, he will be there, and be present among them. And thereof let us have a diligent regard of resorting to Sermons. And therewithal, let us use the Sacrament of the Lord's supper, that we may ask one another what is meant by it. For in the 12th of Exodus, our Lord shows us full well, that we must profit in his school, to be partakers of that Pascal Lamb. If your son ask you what this act of ours betokens: You shall answer, we were bond slaves in that land of Egypt, and God pitied us. Thus you see what we have to do at this day, not for the eating of a roasted Lamb: but to be made partakers of our Lord Jesus Christ in spirit and truth. We must enquire diligently to know that benefits which our Lord Jesus Christ has brought us. And herein is our negligence betrayed. For it is enough for us to hear Jesus Christ spoken of: yes and there are a great sort which have not the skill to discern the father or not: insomuch that now and then a man shall find more best lines in those that have their ears daily beaten with the Gospel, than among that papists. Nor it is to be openly seen. Why then come we to Sermons, but to be taught? Nor, there are a number which fulfill the proverb that says, a fool doubts of nothing. And they that have most need to learn, think themselves to know most, and that they need not to open their mouths to ask which is God's truth. But as for us, let us inquire. And for that doing thereof let us mark, that it behooves us to live soberly, for if we go to work proudly and presumptuously as a number do which think themselves so great clerks (as I have said) that no man can teach them anymore than they know already: we shall be full enough, yes even till we burst: but it shall be but with wind, and we shall be void of all light of life. But if we can find in our hearts to be taught of God: we must be learners, that is to say, low minded: and we must understand that we have need to proceed further. And truly the very use of the Lord's supper ought to put us in mind, that our coming thither ought not to be without instruction. For (as I declared yesterday) a sacrament without teaching and instruction, is a dead thing, and a mocking of God, and a defiling of the thing itself. Therefore as often as we come to the supper, let it be awakening of us, to make us inquire of the things that we know not sufficiently before though we have had some taste of them. And truly if it be not lawful to admit young children to the Lord's supper, until they know what is meant by that Sacrament, and wherefore it was ordained: should such as has lived a forty and three score years come to it like dogs or swine? And yet we see they do so: and woe be to them for it. So then let the visible sign which our Lord has ordained be a mean to spur us forward the more, that we may seek to profit more and more in the knowing of Jesus Christ, specially seeing we be no more troubled nowadays with resorting to a place which God has appointed. For we have Jesus Christ who is God's temple, and he is not shut up within any certain place, but fills both heaven and earth, with his power. True it is that in the nature of man wherewith he clothed himself, he is gone up into heaven: and yet for all that, he ceases not to dwell here in us. So then we must go to Jerusalem, we need not to go on pilgrimage, but only to make our repair to the son of God, and we shall find in him the whole fullness and perfection of the Godhead. Nevertheless we must mark well also, that forasmuch as the fathers of old time had not the things that are given us at this time, it shall be to our sorer condemnation, if they have been diligent than we in exercising that figures and shadows, and that we nowadays be lazy and cold, so as the substance be put into our hands, and yet we make no reckoning of it. The Jews were fine to resort to the Temple of Jerusalem, leaving their houses and households. And their wives and children were fine to come trotting thither, with great travel and not without charges. And why? You shall resort to the place which the Lord shall have chosen to set his name in. He says not to dwell there throughout, but show his presence in such wise, as it may be known that we be united to our God, not only by figures and shadows, but also by his dwelling among us. As now there is not any one place which God has chosen to put his name in, that he might be called upon alone there: but we have God manifested in the flesh. For what is Jesus Christ? Even so is he entitled by Saint Paul. Seeing then that he calls us to himself, and that we need not to make any long circuits to find him, but rather that he prevents us, and that all his desire is to draw us to God his father: should we not be lazy and cold? What excuse will there be for us, when the Jews took such pain having but that first principles like young children's Apses, and that we nowadays being brought to the full perfection, do far never the better by it, or at leastwise it stands us not in so much stead, as the ancient figures stood the Jews under the law. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this text, where it is said that they resorted to the place which the Lord had chosen.

Now finally for a conclusion, Moses tells them that there should be no leavened bread in all their borders during those days: and secondly that on the day of the Passover, they should keep as great solemnity as on the Sabbath day. And hereby he shows that it is not enough for us to abstain from fraud and malice, but that we must labor to the uttermost we can, to put away all first from among us. For if I allege, that as for myself I will be no hypocrisy, and in the meantime do suffer stumbling blocks in the Church, yes or maintain them: I must not think myself therefore discharged. It is said, There shall no leaven bread seen in your coats. As if he had said, Every man must have an eye to himself and to his house, that you be not defiled in anything that may hinder you to eat of the Pascal Lamb in all pureness. Therefore begin at yourselves and at your own households. But yet therewithal be so watchful also, as there may be no corruption in all the rest of the people. Wherefore let us have an eye nowadays to the well practicing of this doctrine, and let every man look narrowly to himself. And afterward let such as have households to govern, look to the purging away of all filth and uncleanness. And then generally, if there be any stumbling blocks among us, which may put things out of order: let us all look to the reprovng of them out of hand. And above all things let us assure ourselves, that to be partakers of Jesus Christ in true pureness, we must begin in at the cleansing of ourselves, that God may govern us, and that our Passover may be kept in spirit and truth, by casting ourselves utterly down, and by yielding to forbear all our own thoughts and affections, so as we may keep a spiritual Sabbath, not for one day only (as I said before) but that we may continue therein during all the time of our life.

Now let us kneel down before the Majesty of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to make us to feel them better than we have done, that they may so dislike us from day to day, as every of us may enforce himself to repair to him, and to frame ourselves in such sort to his righteousness, as all our whole life may be ordered, et cetera. And so let us all say, Almighty God, heavenly father, et cetera.

On Thursday, the 7th of November 1555
The 99th Sermon, which is the third upon the sixteenth Chapter

9 You shall reckon seven weeks from the time that you beings to put the sickle into your harvest: you shall begin to reckon seven weeks:

10 Afterward you shall keep the feast of weeks to the Lord your God, with a freewill offering of your hands, which you shall give as the Lord your God shall have bless you.

11 And you shall rejoice before the face of the Lord your God, both you and your son, and your daughter, your man servant and your maid servant, and the Levite which is within your gates, and the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow which are among you, in the place which the Lord your God will choose to set his name in.

12 And you shall remember that you was a bond servant in Egypt: and you shall keep and do these ordinances.

Moses teaches here of the second great solemnity which was kept yearly among the Jews: and that was to give God thanks after the gathering of their harvest. And this day was named Pentecost, [that is to say fifty days] because there were seven weeks between Easter and that, so as there were nine and forty days between those feasts, where to one being added for the feast day itself, made fifty. And the Greek word signifies the same thing: but the Hebrews called it the feast of weeks, and all comes to one thing. Thus then we see now what this feast was whereof Moses speaks here, that is to know a mean to put them in mind to honor God for sending his benefits to the sustenance of man. And this concerned all manner of fruits of the earth: Albeit under one kind, all the rest were comprehended, as if God had exhorted his people to confess that all good things come of him. The sum then is, that we must acknowledge not only that God has set us in the world, but also that he shows himself continually to e a foster father, and that he maintains us, and that he makes the earth to yield fruit to find us withal, and at a word, that we live by his mere liberality. True it is that this ought to be done at all times of our life; albeit by reason of men's grossness, it was requisite that there should be yearly a feast kept upon someone certain day of the year. Moreover (as I have told you already) that feasts of the Jews served not only for the benefits that God had bestowed upon them already, but also for a service. And so, to be short, God's will was that the Jews should give him thanks one day in the year, that thereby they might be provoked to acknowledge all their life after, that they were sustained at his hand, so as they should never take any repast, but that they should think thus with themselves, we have offered sacrifice to God after harvest: whereby we were put in mind that it is he which has sent us our sustenance. Therefore are we hypocrites, if we think not upon his goodness daily, or if we turn not to him as often as we eat or drink, to acknowledge him to be the author of all welfare. So then, this solemn protestation made once a year was not a discharge for men to forget God all the rest of the time: but rather a mean to make them think, Go too, we have kept here a solemn feast for one day, that it might be a schooling to us all the year after, that if we have anything wherewith to sustain ourselves, it is God's doing who has had pity on us.

But now the ceremony of this feast is no long in use, and yet the truth thereof abides with us still. And so we receive good and profitable instruction by the doctrine thereof, by reason whereof it cannot be thought to be needless and that it was written alone for the Jews. For it was God's will that men should be taught by it even to the world's end, and that they should be put in mind not to swallow up God's benefits into our paunches without thinking upon him, but rather that we should be led to give him thanks, as often as we either eat or drink: so that whensoever we take any repast, we may consider how it is he that gives it us, first opening the heaven to give moisture and frozen to earth, and afterward giving power to the earth to bear fruit, and finally blesses the corn when it is sprung up, that it may prosper to yield food to us. Seeing then that we perceive all those things, let us have regard to benefit all these things, let us have regard to benefit ourselves by them. True it is (as I have touched before) that we must not have any one day certain in the year, as the Jews had, neither ought we also to be as young children. If a man allege for his excuse, that if he do not his duty, let him not use his reward given him as a little child has: it will not serve to excuse him. Folk do not use to give a young child his breakfast till he have prayed to God, because he has not the wit and discretion to do it, unless he be compelled to it by some certain order. Now then if an old fellow of the age of thirty or forty years eat his meat without praying to God, he deserves not to be beaten with a rod, but to be driven away and to be abhorred as a swine. And if he allege, I have no rule as is given to young children: what is that to the matter? Has you not discretion enough to do so much of yourself? Has you lived so long in the world and des you not yet know that you ought to yield God thanks for the good which he does to you? Therefore it is said that the Jews were young children in comparison of the Christians: for God had given them rules according to their infirmities. As now although those things be passed away in respect of us; yet are we the more bound to acknowledge God's grace in his feeding and maintaining of us. And why? The perfect that the doctrine is which is imparted to us in the Gospel, the more plainly ought we to acknowledge the benefits of our God towards us. That is the thing which we have first to remember out of this text.

Now it is said, That the people shall resort to Jerusalem to offer freewill offerings. God points out these things more particularly in the three and twentieth of Levities where he shows what offering were to be made on the behalf of the people. Albeit, he speaks there but of every particular person. And he says, You shall bring offerings according to your devotion. For although there was a law certain; yet behooved it their offerings to be made with a free will, and not as by consumption, accordingly as it is said, that God loves such as offer to him willingly and not as of necessity. You shall see many that will be liberal to Godward: howbeit, it is but a thing of constraint, which kind of dealing God utterly dislikes. A man may spoil himself of all his goods, and yet do god no such service as he shall like well of, if it be not matched with his freewill, as I said before. Besides this, God left it to every man's own choice to offer what he thought best, but yet he adds according as the Lord your God shall have blessed you. To the intent that men should not withhold through niggard ship as they be commonly wont to do: God puts them here in mind of his blessing: as if he had said, be well advised, true it is that in this case I lay the bridle on your necks, offer what you yourselves think good, I mean not to enforce you to anything, I would have the offerings which you bring to me, to be of a freewill. But yet for all that, you must come to account for it. Who is he that blesses you? If you have had a good and plentiful harvest, to whom are you beholden for it? Ought you not to consider how it is I that have opened my hand wide, to the end that your hearts also should open themselves wide on their part? Know you therefore that I have assured you, by multiplying you; wherefore when you have a good crop, look that you employ yourselves so much the freely in doing my service.

And hereby we be warned to look nearly to ourselves, that every of us may put forth the good things which God has committed to him. Here is mention made but only of corn, wine, and such other things. Then if God have enriched a man, he must see that he suppress not God's blessing, by keeping it close. For we see there are Cormorants which have no care of other folks poverty: they think they may scrap all that they can come by, and that no man ought to have any part of their goods. On the contrary part it is declared here, that accordingly as every man has received abundance at God's hand so must he impart to his neighbors: for that is the end which God aimed at. And if we think not of it, we must come to account for it: and we shall find at length, that God will impute it to us for theft, when we shall have devoured his goods after that fashion, without having any pity upon the needy to succor them. In like case is it with spiritual gifts. For according as every man is of ability and skill to succor his neighbors; so is he bound to discharge himself and to put himself forward. Otherwise God will show us to what purpose he had bestowed his our duty. That is the thing which we have to bear away in that Moses alleges God's blessing to stir up the Jews to offer sacrifice that more largely after as God shall have increased them, knowing that he binds them thereby to him.

And whereas he says, That they shall rejoice with their children, their men servants, and their women servants, the fatherless, the widows, and the strangers: thereby he shows that his law was not ceremonial only, but that it tended also to the doing of alms deeds: as indeed our Lord has at all time showed, that those are the very sacrifices which he requires. True it is that part of the things which were to be offered, were to be brought to the Altar, and there to be burned in sacrifice: but yet for all that, it was always provided that of the rest, the poor should be fed and maintained as well as the priests and Levites: and now does Moses speak thereof again. Wherefore let us mark, that even in the time of ceremonies and shadows of the law, God never required sacrifice, but that he willed men therewithal to have pity upon the needy to succor them, according to this saying of his by his Prophet Osee, I require mercy and not sacrifice. True it is that he had commanded both of them: but he shows that such as think to discharge themselves by coming to the church, and by offering their gifts there, do beguile themselves, and that all their doings are but hypocrisy, if they be not kind hearted in succoring the needy, and in doing of alms deeds. For I pray you, can we advance God any way by offering of our goods to him? Can we enrich him? Wants he anything? True it is that he requires oblations: albeit, that was to the end that men should acknowledge even by eyesight, that they were bound unto him. It was a kind of putting of them in mind of it. Yet notwithstanding it stood them always in hand to consider, that they could not otherwise discharge themselves, than by giving part of their goods to such of their neighbors as had want. Thus you see how the meaning of Moses was, that when the Jews offered their sacrifices after harvest, it was not enough for them to acknowledge with mouth and outward gestures, that they were bound to God for his sending of them wherewith to live, but that it behooved them also to show towards men that they intended to be faithful stewards of the things which he had put into their hands, and desired nothing but to be well discharged of them.

And to move them more thereto, he tells them That they themselves had been bond slaves in the Land of Egypt, which warning peal has been set down in other places heretofore. For we know that when men live at their own ease and in pleasure, they be not greatly touched with compassion though other men die for hunger: and even so was it with the Jews when they were come into the land of Canaan after they began once to wax full. For the land itself was fat and specially because God had blessed it. Therefore does he bring them back to the minding of their former state, and of the cruel bondage wherein they had been. Consider (says he) how you have been bond slaves in the land of Egypt, and that as then you would faine have been gently entreated. When you were too grievously vexed, you cried out to me. Now therefore know you that the poor and needy which are among you, do crave likewise to be regarded at your hands, and that I for my part do make account of them. This is the effect of the matter contained in that place.

Now to the end we may make our profit by it, let us call to mind the saying of the prophet Osseo accordingly also as it is alleged by our Lord Jesus Christ, that is to know, that God requires the sacrifice of Alms deeds. As if he should say, that he is not contented that men should use some ceremonies towards him, but will have us to be kind hearted in relieving such as have need of our help, if we have ability wherewith to do it. And if men play the thankless churls with us in forgetting the good which we have done them: it is enough for us that God allows our dealing, and puts it into his book of accounts. Also let us bethink ourselves how glad we would have been of release, if ever we were in necessity, that the same may move us to pity, and that we be not blinded with our wealth. I say to such as have abundance, let them not lie weltering in their pleasures, and withdraw their hand from succoring the poor: but let them consider that if ever they themselves felt the want of these wordily goods, they would be glad that every man should reach out his hand to relieve them: and therefore let they themselves do the like. Yes and although we had never felt any want, yet let us consider that want may fall upon us hereafter. For what are we? No man can exempt himself from the stroke of God that he should not be driven to beg his bread, yet though he had all the goods of the world. Hereof we see great store of example. Seeing it is so, let no man be proud of his goods, but let us all consider that we be men, and let us not despise our own flesh, as is said in the Prophet

Esau. And let us not say, what be the widows? What be the fatherless children? What be the strangers to us? But seeing that God offers and commends them to us, let us assure ourselves that we cannot have any folks more nigh to us to whom to do good. For when we wean to bind men to us, to have recompense at their hand; we shall be disappointed at all assays, and good right it is that it should be so. But as for the thing that is put into God's hand, that cannot perish nor be lost. Let us mark then that God's offering of the strangers, the widows, and the fatherless to us, is as if he should say, he made them his bay life to take up his Rents and Revenues. And when we be to do him homage for the benefits which we have received at his hand, let us assure ourselves, that he accepts and avows all that ever is done to those whom he speaks off here by Moses.

Now we know what was done in the feast of Pentecost, namely that the holy Ghost was sent down upon Christ's disciples, and that there was a kind of renewing of the world, to exalt the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ: for there he uttered his power, yes, more than he did in his resurrection. For what had we been the better for Christ's rising again in his own person, if he had not powered out the grace of his holy Spirit upon his Church, to show that he was set at the right hand of God his father, to fill all things and to dwell in us, and that he has such sovereign dominion over all things, that we be in safety when we be in his protection? And if we look well upon the matter, we shall find that the law was given the same time as after the Passover. For it is said that the people came to Sinai the third month after their departure out of Egypt, the same day that they departed from Raphidin. Now that was the first day of the month, and the fourteenth day was the day of the Passover. And according as the months were as then, which went by the course of the Moons, there was one whole moon added. And so in effect there were fifty days from the Passover to God's setting forth of his law upon Mount Sinai, so as the feast of Pentecost or Whitsuntide was referred to at that time. Now we know that the law could do men no good, if it were but only given them: for it is a dead letter. And again, it kills us, because it shows us our duty, and we be all transgressors of it, so as condemns and accuses us. What are men the better then for the publishing of the Law? Nothing at all, but that it shows them how they be bereft of all hope of salvation, and that they be all damned before God. And that is the cause why Saint Paul says, that the Jews at that time received the spirit of bondage, in terror and fear, says he. It is sufficiently showed in the nineteenth of Exodus how the Law affrights those that received it. For they went backward and entreated that God would speak to them by the mouth of Moses, because they could not hear his voice but they must needs die for it. You see then that the Law taught men the will of God. But what? Forasmuch as we be clean contrary to his goodness and righteousness: the law of itself can yield nothing but death, accordingly also as Saint Paul speaking thereof in the second to the Corinthians, says, that it is a letter which kills. Therefore it behooved the law to be renewed, and that God should publish it after another fashion, not writing it in tables of stone, but in our hearts by changing them. For by nature our hearts are as hard as stone, as it is said by the Prophet Ezekiel. Therefore must God be faine to so often them, and to make them pliable, that they may be obedient to his law. You see then how the law was published after another fashion upon Whitsunday, than it was in old time by Moses. For it was delivered us in tables of stone, but God wrought so in us by his holy Spirit, that we were then renewed, and the same continues still at this day.

And therefore let us mark, that besides the admonishment which the Jews had to do homage to God for their harvest and for their bodily sustenance which he gave them: they had also a remembrance which he gave them: they had also a resemblance of the things which were fulfilled at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, at which time God made another manner of Whitsuntide than had been in the time of the figures. For at that time he uttered the grace of the holy Ghost. Yet for all this, it is not meant that we should keep a feast of Pentecost: it is clean contrary. Seeing that the things which were figured under the law, were fulfilled in our Lord Jesus Christ, and that the figures themselves are ceased: if we bring them back again, we do wrong to him which has brought the full accomplishment of all things. If the shadows which were under the law, do come up again; Jesus Christ is to no purpose. So then let us mark that the holy Ghost was not sent to us, to the end that these figures should continue still: but to show that we differ from the people of old time. True it is (as I said before) that there is no ill in it for the Christians to have a certain day wherein this history should be declared to them: For we must not tie ourselves to so straight a preciseness, that it should not be lawful for us to use that help for our infirmity. But to make a service of God thereof, and to take example, at the Jews, as though it behooved us to fashion ourselves like to them, or as though the feast of Whitsuntide ought to be observed at this day, by reason of the sending of the holy Ghost: that were too gross a fondness. Let us understand then, first that the Jews had but a figure and shadow of the truth: and on our own part we may know in Jesus Christ, that God has not figured anything in vain, but that all the ceremonies of the Law tends to very good purpose because the effect of them as showed us in him. Therefore let us hold us contented therewith, and now let us learn to rejoice in the presence of our God, and to make other folks partakers of our mirth.

The Jews were commanded to resort to Jerusalem as soon as harvest was done, and not only to rejoice there, but also to impart of their goods to their neighbors, so as there might be a common gladness among them, and God might be glorified with one accord. And now that these things are at this day accomplished: what have we to do? We must not run trotting to Jerusalem to worship God there and to do him homage there. For we must lift up our hands everywhere, albeit so as they be clean. And moreover forasmuch as God has not only sent us a harvest of corruptible fruits to nourish our bodies withal but also powered out that infinite riches of his holy Spirit and set us the living waters as is said in Ezekiel: let us understand that it is to the end we should have the mirth whereof S. Paul speaks in the fourteenth of the Romans. Let us now rejoice then seeing our Lord has showed himself so bountiful towards us, that he has not withheld any of the cheese good things which he had, but has powered upon us all the benefits that concern the endless life and heavenly glory. Seeing then that we have received the holy Ghost, let us also be joyful in our hearts. As how? By withdrawing ourselves from that vanities of the world, and by holding ourselves contented with the favor of our God, praising him even in the midst of our afflictions. Albeit that we have not all things at will in this world: yet let us not cease to hold on still, assuring ourselves that it ought to suffice us that our God is favorable to us, and that he shows us his love. When we be at that point once, then shall we have such peace and contentment in us, as passes all the joys of this world, yes and puts away all the sorrows that may trouble us. And when we have such gladness ourselves, we must to the uttermost of our power make them partakers away all the sorrows that may trouble us. And when we have such gladness ourselves, we must to the uttermost of our power make them partakers of it, which have need. For if the Jews were commanded to call the widows, the fatherless, and the strangers to make merry with them, in spending of the goods which God had given them: much more reason is it, that seeing the spiritual gifts which God has bestowed upon us, belong to the common building up of the Church as says Saint Paul in the twelfth of the first to that Corinthians, we should take heed that we defraud not our neighbors of the thing which God has appointed for them.

Let us mark also that as now there is no more any stranger as in respect of us. For whereas God has separated the Jews from the gentiles: now it is his will to be known through the whole world: there is no more division of bodies; the wall is broken down as says Saint Paul in another place. Seeing then that God has knit us together after this fashion, and that Jerusalem extends through the whole world as the Prophet Zachary speaks thereof: we ought to be the more moved and provoked to make all our brothers partakers of the joy which we have received by the spirit of God. Thus you see in effect what we have to mark upon that text.

But here withal we must mark that Moses in this place leaves out two feasts which are spoken of in the three and twentieth of Levites, the cause whereof is for that the people were not straightly bound to repair at that time to Jerusalem to worship there. There was the feasts of Trumpets and the feast of Affliction; and although Moses speak here of no more than of three solemn feasts: yet does it behoove us to interlace these other two with them. And as touching the feast of Affliction, let us mark that our Lord ordained it not without cause; but it will serve us very well to the expounding of the text which is dealt with already. For we be taught that the Jews had certain days in the year, to the end that the truth should abide to us, and that it should bear his full force among us all the days of our life. It behoved the Jews to humble themselves both by fasting and otherwise in acknowledging their sins: and thereupon to make a solemn confession of their misdeeds, in humbling themselves to God, and in craving forgiveness for the same. I said before that this was not ordained without cause. For we see how men do cover their faults as much as they can, and that they bethink not themselves of them but by constraint. They always draw back if they be not thrust forward: for to their seeming it is a matter of melancholy. True it is that we cannot think upon our sins without grief of mind: but yet is that for our welfare. And therefore in the second to the Corinthians Saint Paul says, that this kind of sorrowing is not to be shunned, neither ought men to be sorry for their sorrowing when they be put in mind of their sins. For why? It is a sorrowing as pleases God greatly, and glad the Angels of Paradise, and brings us infinite joy in the end. And forasmuch as men make merry and rejoice when they have offended God: their condemnation must needs be double, and needs must this sentence be accomplished upon them which says; Woe be to you which laugh, for you shall weep and be sorry. And so let us mark that because men will not willingly know and perceive their faults, it was God's will that there should be a year mind of them, that the Jews might bethink them ourselves the great number of the sins which they had committed and humble themselves. Not that their so doing acquitted them: but to the intent it should be a warning to them all the year after.

Now then, their fasting and their protesting of themselves to be guilty before God: was to the end that when they were gone home into their own houses, they should consider thus with themselves: Alas it is not for one day only that it behooves us to crave forgiveness: for we cease not to offend our God, every minute of an hour we be entering into a new bond with death. For although God have pardoned us, yet return we to our sin again, and there is no end of sinning: insomuch that as long as we be in this world, there are ever some vices lurking in us, and our corruption is so great, that it is impossible for us altogether to abstain from doing of evil. Then behooved it the Jews to think upon their sins, and meet was it that the said feast should be an instruction to them for all the year after. Thus howsoever it was, they had the figure. But we in these days must have the truth without any ceremony. And thereby we see what superstition was among the Papists: for they turned this feast of Affliction or humbling into their Lenten fast, saying that in that time they punished themselves with fasting, that they might acknowledge their sins: and they alleged the example of the Jews. Yes, but we must always come back to the diversity which S. Paul in the Galatians puts between us and the fathers of old time, for else what are we the better for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ? If we at this day must still have the shadows that were under the law: where is the freedom that were under the law: where is the freedom that he speaks of? I mean not such a freedom as shall lay the reins loose in our neck, to live as we list: No, but that we should not be trained up anymore like little children: for that was continued until the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and until he had showed himself to the world. But as now we must let us figures go, and all that belonged to that rawness; and we must go to the very pith and substance of them. And therefore whereas the papists have ordained their Lenten fast instead of the feast of Affliction, which God had ordained among the Jews: It is but an Ape's toy. I forbear to speak as now of the other abuses and illusions contained therein: for they uphold that their fasting of forty days is after the example of our Lord Jesus Christ. Yes, but let them then abstain from all meat and drink, and be as Angels, of Paradise. Nor, they cram themselves so full at their dinners, that at night they be still cumbered with that which they had received before: and yet notwithstanding they will needs bear Jesus Christ in hand, that they fashion themselves like to him. He was exalted far beyond all state and nature of man when he fasted forty days and forty nights: and he did it to sow his divine power, and to magnify the Majesty of his Gospel: and these scorners take upon them to counterfeit his doings. And after what sort? In cramming themselves, as I said before. Surely it was even a device of Satan, to deface the heavenly power which we uttered in our Lord Jesus Christ. Again if they will needs resemble the son of God in fasting forty days, they should do it but once in all their life. For Jesus Christ fasted but once in all his life. And why then will they go beyond him? Behold the son of God discharged himself with once fasting; and these scorners will needs bear the world in hand that they follow the example of Jesus Christ. Besides this, they will needs frame themselves to the fashion of the Jews also: and because there was a feast among the Jews, wherein it behooved them to afflict themselves: these men will also needs do the like. Yes, but that was not God's intent. For it was a commandment peculiar to the Jews, that they should observe the said feast, as whereof the ceremony was given to them. Nevertheless the truth thereof remains to us, to show us that as the Jews punished themselves once a year, to take instruction thereby according to their small skill: so nowadays we must be sorry for our faults as long as we live.

And herein we see further, that the Papists have not only played the hypocrisies, but also most shamefully and devilishly exalted themselves against God. For first of all their fasting of the Lent, and their going to shrift, is but to have the freer scope to despise God, and to let him alone, and to turn their backs upon him all the year after. They make a sorry countenance and wring their mouths, and play the Pope holy hypocrites when they come to the passion week as they term it, and yet afterward they end the matter with balking out this devilish by word, that they send it away into Galilee, and so like villains they scoff at God and all religion. The tongues ought to be plucked out of their heads which dare blasphemy after that fashion. And it is not the baser sort ourselves the common people, but the wiser sort and as will needs be counted I know not what, which use that kind of speech. And so you may see what confusion is among them, since they despise God after that fashion, and fall to kicking against him, like wild oxen, and yet in the meanwhile will needs shroud themselves under the example of our Lord Jesus Christ. But a man may see not only that the things wherewith they would please God are baggage trifles, but also that they be so shameful abominations as do well betray that they rebel against the holy Ghost, and against the Majesty of God. And yet are they not contented with that, but they proceed also to the murdering and martyring of God's children, shedding their guiltless blood even without any remorse or scruple of conscience. For when they come to thrift, they never bethink them of that, but they confess how they have not observed such an Ape's toy, and how they were not at mass such a day, and how they have omitted that doing of such a flimflam. To be short, they mock God openly. And if a man show them their wicked life by God's word: they be so utterly past hope of amendment, that they spite all warnings and harden their hearts more and more, because they be for possessed with such intolerable pride, that they fall to set up their horns even against God. Thus you see what we have in effect to remember concerning the feast of Affliction.

Also there was the feast of Trumpets, which served to put the Jews in mind, that they ought to stir up themselves to be united in God. For as for them that have glossed that it was in respect of the offering up of Isaac in Sacrifices (as the Jewish Robbins have fantastically surmised) they say nothing to the purpose. But it is not to be doubted that God ordained the feast of Trumpets or Cornets, of purpose to stir up his people to return to him. And why? For they ought to consider thus: Although we have not the Trumpets sounded daily to call us to the Temple: yet ought we to remember that God calls us daily, to the intent we should yield over ourselves wholly to him, to worship him, and serve him, as he requires: and moreover be knit and united together, that we may draw still nearer and nearer to him. Thus you see what manner of instruction the Jews had by the feast of Trumpets. But what a thing is it that Christians will needs have the like guise, and resemblance of it once a year by ringing of Bells? Indeed the Papists do their endeavor to follow this commandment. For at every of their solemn feasts, they think that God is well paid, when they have rung their bells justly, and wakened the Ghosts of such of their friends as are dead. Lo, what witcheries they have among them, yet still at this day. But is it not apparent that the making of such a feast is against the intent of God, because it served but for the people of old time that were under the law? When the said feast was observed yearly, such as heard the Trumpets were warned by it all the year after to think thus: well, although we be far from Jerusalem, and cannot repair thither daily to do sacrifice offered there in our behalf, and God is worshipped there in the name of us all. Nevertheless later, we must not forget the good that God has done to us: but every of us must serve for a Trumpet to stir up himself that our lives may be answerable and conformable to the things that are done daily in the Temple. Lo, what the Jews had. And what have we now?

The figure (as I have said before) is passed away and abolished by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Then remains it that we ourselves should be Trumpets, that is to say, that we should waken up ourselves, because we be besotted, yes and even so wedded to the world and to the vanities that are here beneath, that it never comes in our minds to think upon God. Therefore must we not only feel the sound of a Trumpet or of a bell, but rather an inward remorse of good conscience, so as we repent and bethink us thus: How now wretched Wight? Behold, the living God stoops so low, as to speak to the daily, calling and alluring you by means of his Gospel, and crying upon you without ceasing, to come to him: and yet for all this wilt you continue deaf still? Then must you return to him, when he draws you so carefully: and they must not tart till there be a solemn holyday to call you to the Church, there to keep the feast of Trumpets:

but it must serve you all your lifelong for a spur to make them to return into God. That is the thing (say I) which we have to bear in mind. And as much also is to be noted concerning furrowing: For it is not for one day only that we must before in our earts and bethink us of our sins. But for as much as we fall to them incessantly , & they passed not any day wherein we offend not GOD: let us match it with sorriness, and let us mourn for it, and not play the unthrift which make a scorn of all that ever a man can allege to them out of the word of God: but let us be afraid of his judgments and threats and yet there with all let us not doubt but he will give us whereof to rejoyce, and that although we be fine to pass through many sorrows and hart biting in this world, yet in the end he will deliver us from them, to make us partakers of the heavenly rift. After this manner (say I) must we put this doctrine in use concerning the seas which the Jews had of old time in figure and whereof we have now the truth & have now the truth and substance, as it is brought into us by the son of God.

Now let us kneel down before the majesty of our good God with acknowledgement off our fines, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, so as we may return into him, with true and infringed repentance, and be stirred more and more to amend our faults, knowing that our good God is ready to receive them all to mercy which come to him with low line effect. And that for as much as he hath granted us the grace to have now so full light of his Gospel, as may well enlighten us thoroughly: it may please him not to suffer our eyes to be blindfolded, that we should walk any more in dark but to grant that we keep right way, and endure to bring others into the fame, so as God may be glorified with one common accord of all men. And that for the performance hereof it may please him to raise up true and faithful ministers of his word.

The 100th Sermon, which is the fourth upon the Sixteenth Chapter

13. They shall keep the feast of Tabernacles seven days, after they have gathered in the corn fields and vineyards.

14. And they shall rejoice in the feast, they, the son, the daughter, the man servant and the woman servant and Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, & the widow which are within the gates.

15. Seven day shall they keep the feast to the Lord the God, in the place which the Lord shall have works of the hands: for the Lord your God, will bless the in all your fruits, and in all the works of they hands: and therefore shall they rejoice.

16. Three times a year shall all the males appear before the Lord your God in the place which the Lord will choose: that is to wit, in the feast of unleavened bread, in the feast of Weeks, and in the feast of Tabernacles: and none shall appear empty before the face of the Lord.

17. Bur every man shall give according to his ability, even according to the blessing of the Lord your God, which he shall have given me.

We have here to treat of the feast of Tabernacles, which was a memorial of Gods preferring of Jews in the wilderness, where was no house. For he had kept them by the space of forty years under Tents, and small booths; and the cause whereof was that he had so removed them from place to place, that they had no leisure to build, nor suffer wherewith to build. Therefore it was meet hat they should be put in remembrance of it, that being come into the land of Canaan, they should not give themselves to jollity, and forget it when God had set them are rest. For we see how men are give to fall asleep and nestle themselves when our Lord remove them not. To avoid this danger, it was Gods will that Jews should year by care depart out of their houses and dwell in Tents, that is to say under the open sky in arbors made of boughs, and for seven days together mind that benefit. For it was an incredible thing that God should have preferred so great multitude of people with their young children, in booths & tents without houses. We know why houses serve to keep off both cold and heat and all other discommodities. Needs therefore must it be why god brought after a wonderful fashion, and it was meet that his goodness should be acknowledged in that behalf. We see then now therefore this feast was ordered under the law. For the serving of God consisted not in why people shifting of their places for it had been but a stage play, to have come for Jerusalem, and there to pinch themselves, & to dwell while in Cabanas, unless it had been to some end, and that they had been taught something whereby to magnify Gods name, & to put their trust in him : accordingly as I have declared here to for that all ceremonies must imply some learning and instruction, or else they be but pelting baggage : yes it is but a mocking of God, if the faithful be not edified, that they may always live in the fear of God to rest upon him and to call upon him with the better courage. If it bee not so, it is but superstition: and the things are not only unprofitable but also abominable before God. Now then the feast of Tabernacles was a treatment to the people of Israel, to show them that if they were at rest and at their ease in the land of Canaan, they had not always been so, but that God had led them after a strange fashion through the wilderness: and that if they were consented with Cabanas and arbors, it behaved them also to apply themselves to the praising of God for his delivering of them out of the Land of Egypt by so many miracles. The Jews as folks that would fine discharge themselves to Godward by hypocrisy, did indeed keep the feast itself, but they left the meaning of him that had commanded it. For even at this day still they keep the feast according to the letter, and they have a number of pretty apt toys which they observe diligently. As, that their Cabanas be not too close, but made full of holes, nor that the boughs be not too thick platted, but so as a man may see the stars through them, and that there be Loopholes to look upon the sky, so as the sky may glimpse upon their eyes. All of them (I say) do use such tripling toys, but in the mean while they consider not whereunto God meant to direct them. By which example of theirs will be the better warned not to regard the letter of the laws: but to seek the end which god points us too. And seeing that the Jews had such instruction: let us consider what fruit we ought to reap nowadays of the feast of Tabernacles. It is not now any more in use that we should be bound to the keeping thereof: but yet the dourine thereof continues still, and concerns us as much or more than the Jews. And our keeping of the feast of Tabernacles must not be for a week or Dwayne, but for all or lifelong. And why? For if we be not strangers in this world, we shall have no part in the kingdom of heaven. Will we have God to avow us for his children? Let us keep on our way here beneath, affecting our selves that this life of ours is but as a journey, or rather but as a race. And it is not enough for us to go, but we must also run a pace, holding on our way still to that end, and always straining ourselves to attend unto it. For except we strain and enforce ourselves we shall never get one step forward, but we shall retire fewer back for it. Again we see how flow we be; and how many means Satan hath to hinder us: and therefore we must even fight again it such impediments. And so let us mark, that the things which we read here in Moses, declare into us that for as much as it was Gods will that the Jews in the time of the law should have a week to put them in mind how they had been as pilgrims in the wilderness, and that he had maintained them there after a strange fashion : we in these days (because the figure is abolished) must repair to the truth, that is to say, we must remember that God harbor us in such sort in this world, as that he will not have us to nestle here, nor to be so entangled in it as to make it our everlasting resting place, but to fly upward still, and to be here as birds sitting upon a bough. True it is that God is so favorable to a great number, that they never remove from home of all the time of their life, and yet they be never the less Christian for all that: he meant it especially of himself and of certain others of the faithful, whom God tossed from post to pillar. But as for the meaning of the mind, that must needs be common to all the faithful, namely that they have no resting place in this world. Although then that GOD do bear with some men's weakness, so as they never remove out of the place where they were borne, yet must they consider that they ought to be always ready and to have one foot set forward, against the time that it shall please God to remove them into some strange country so as they make not their reckoning to be so settled in any place, that they should not depart from it, but rather be ready to go, when so ever GOD to fleet any whither else. Again, let those whom God removed understand, that he gave them the prerogative a forehand, to put the thing in where which the holy scripture have us : namely, that we be made pilgrims here beneath, to the intent we should have our resting place in heaven : and let it confirm them so much the more in hope of life to come, so as they may pluck up a good heart when they be so driven from place to place, and not to be too much greed at it, because it is a warrant to them that God has reserved a better resting place for them. After that manner ought all of us together to observe the feast of Tabernacles. Let such as remove not, think nevertheless, that they have not any perpetual state of abiding in any place certain, but must offer themselves to GOD to go with her forever it pleased him. And as for them are saying to remove out of their country, and are drawn a far off; let them understand that Gods walking to them after that fashion in this world, is to the end to draw them out of it, and that they should not set their minds upon it. We see then how with one common accord, we shall make a good observation of this feast, I mean as spiritually. For nowadays we have not any more the figures of the law. But yet must the truth of the Gospel needs be confirmable to the figures that were among the fathers of old time. And here with all we must also be ready to remove a good pace, so as we must not be tied nor held back to this corruptible life, but go to GOD with a free heart when so ever it pleased him to take us hence. And indeed, what house forever we dwell in this world, our body is always going away. If a man be asked which is his chief house, he will not go seek his chamber, nor his kitchen, not any other of this houses of eases but he will say it his body. Now let us consider what our bodies are. We may well build us houses of square stone. Rich men make them places, and lay all their lands about them there to. Their building is substantial, it is able to endure much, it is not to be feared that it will rot over hastily, nor that it will be made with wind or weather; neither is there anything in it to be altered. And they some hangings of it be to be removed, that is all one; the walls are so good, that at a hundred years end they be as found as they were at the first day. Well may a man make such a building; but can we build our bodies so, as they may be of any continuance? No. Our Lord therefore do laugh those fool so scorn, which are so blind that they imagine they shall live ever the longer for their building of their goodly houses, bearing themselves in hand that it is a mean to make them carry longer time in this world. But (as I said before) all houses are nothing in comparison of our chief house, which is our body. If a man pass not of his chamber, nor for his kitchen, nor for his parlor, but would go seek some corner in this stable, and betake himself to that, saying, this is the surest and substantial left place, I had lever tarry here that in any other part of all my house: folks would laugh him to scorn as a fool. Likewise if a man be proud of his house, and have no regard of his own perform whereof he ought to make much greater account: it is evident, that he is out of his wins, and utterly void of reason. What is to be done then? We must come back to this lesson of Saint Paul's, that if our outward may decay, we have a building prepared for us in heaven. For this lodging of our must decay, and fall quite down, but yet shall we be fully restored again, and hen final we dwell in an incorruptible house. There Saint Paul shrewish us the thing that I spoke of before, namely that our bodies (when we have never so great account of them) are but as arbors one blast of wind will blow them quite and clean down. Seeing it is so, let us walk in lowliness, and lift our minds a lot: for we have promise that there we shall be immortal & incorruptible. And we must not think it strange that our bodies should be compared to Arbors of leaves which are of no continuance: for take me the strongest body in the world, and yet cannot the force thereof continue long time in one state, but that if the saying of the Prophet Esau be found true as in respect of our soles. It must needs be verified much more of our bodies: namely that a man is but a flower, and that albeit he flourish for a time, yet is one blast of wind enough to make him to wither, and to bring him to naught. Such is our strength even when it is at the best. But besides this, there is none of us which feel not a great fort of incontinences in himself, to the intent we should for sake this present life. And not be too much addicted to it. Take me the strongest man that is, and hath he not some disease or other that will not suffer him to endure long: again if a man be once past a certain age, he fallen by & by to declining; insomuch that a man may see and perceive with his eyes, that even without sickness he fly death away like water. Indeed most men do never think of it: but what bought it to blind themselves? Nay it is a monstrous thing that everybody should see how a man goes to naught, and yet be so blind as not to perceive it himself. On the contrary part, if our Lord be so gracious to the faithful as to remove them to and fro, and to put them under many diseases: it is to quicken them up to go forward with earn after wills to their heavenly inheritance, because they do but hang their wings in this world, continually drooping now after one sort and now after another, and lying as it were half decade. Such it is so, let them understand that God worked for their benefit and salutation. And it is a very profitable lesson, when we have learned to keep the seat of Tabernacles Spiritually: that is to say, when we have learned to pass in such wise through this world, as we go on further.

And if we be demanded how such perform can be Christians, as are settled in wealth and at their ease: the answer there into is that every man must beware first of all that he seek not his own ease too much. For we hear how S. Paul faith, that we must not cocker our flesh in lusts thereof. And why Because there is no ho when we once begin to follow our own likings: they be so far out of order, that there is always somewhat amiss in them. They therefore which will be lodged after their hearts desire, so as there may be nothing amiss in their state: do put themselves in great hazard of falling into a sound sleep, and of entangling themselves in such wise in the world, as they may never think more upon the heavenly rest. And therefore a man cannot keep too good a measure nor too stayed a hand that behalf. Not that we can be tied to any certain rule, for we must have God's creatures freely. If we should be surplus at everything, what would come of it? Either we should never be thankful to God for the benefits that he bestowed upon us, because we be not sure that he had given us leave of use them freely: or else we shall become hardhearted and stubborn to use them as it were in despite of GOD, be means whereof all things should be corrupted. So then, we must use our houses as we do all other commodities of this present life, without making any scruple of conscience in him. But yet there will all, we must beware (as I said before) that we give not the bridle to our self by satisfying the desires thereof: for it is a bottomless pit, and we can never come to the bottom of it.

Again besides this, let such as are planted commodiously, beware that they fall not asleep. But rather whereas the children of this world do welter in their delights, and so feed themselves with them, that they utterly forgot the kingdom of heaven: Let the other sort learn to consider thus: Go to, albeit I be planted here to my commodities, yet must I not be tied too much to this world. Whereas lusts would hold me back, I must so fight against them, as all the impediments in the world may not restrain me for looking continually towards heaven. After that manner must the faithful deal. And such as are not planted at their hearts desire, must consider how our Lord put them in mind, to go continually forward to the rest of heaven, warning him of it both early & late, as a thing which is for their benefit, & behooves to be put in mind of. In so much that if the Jews had such instruction as was meet for them: exercise that God gave to this faithful ones nowadays in planting them no over much to their liking is as far better learning than was the ancient ceremony of the law. Whosoever then do find any discommodity, and are not at their ease; let them understand that God by that means pricked & spurred him to seek the rest of heaven; & strengthened them there with all in hope which they have of their salvation.

And this concerned not only man's housing but also all other things belonging there into, is the chief house which we have. Therefore if we be now & then diseased, so as we cannot take so quiet rest as fain would, nor have things ready always at hand: let us consider you lord handled us like wayfarers. When a man shall be in his own house which is well rules, they fail not to serve him at his own house, & to have such meat prepared for him as he best liked: but if he be abroad in the country, he shall not have all he would: for folk are not acquainted with his complexion: & whereas he is won't to dine at such an house, he must be fain to tray an house or twain longer. And again, when he had supped peradventure he shall not be so well lodged as in this own house. Now must we apply all this to ourselves: namely in this world we be as wayfarers. Therefore if our Lord do now & then disappoint us of things we desire, it is to the end we should run a pace through this world & always keep on forth still till we come to kingdom of heaven, & not be tried & fastened to the earth. Thus you see how this lesson extended generally to all things that concern this transitory life.

And yet nevertheless it is said expressly, That the Jews in keeping this feast should be merry & also make other men merry with them. Whereby we see we ought not to be sad, they our Lord make us to wait away by little & little. Or rather he said us he will not have us to make any over sumptuous building here below, but we should be contented with our lodgings of boughs which will soon

rot. Still it is so, we must not be sorry, but rather rejoice in our God. And it is a very profitable point and well worthy to be noted. For it may be some man will be sufficiently warned to depart out of this world in he see himself sick or in some strand mishaps befall him: by reason whereof he thinks upon death over often, and do nothing but mourn desiring to be dispatched at the first push. Such are to be seen: but yet for all that, their departing is not without sorrowing. For what joy can they have, except they know that God dragged them through world of purpose to lift them up to heaven to the company of the Angels? If they know not that, surely they have their hearts always distressed with anguish and grief, accordingly as we see how the unbelievers repine, and never commit themselves to GOD, but murmur and grudge against God. And although their mouth speak not, yet have they no gladness nor rest in their hearts. Then let us learn to keep feast to Tabernacles after such a fort, as we may be merry in the Lord: that is to wit, as it may not grieve us that our bodies should consume away by little and little until they be turned again into rottenness; or that our Lord should cut us quite off from our bodies, & utterly dispossess & bereave us of all ever we have in this world. For why he do it to draw us up to heaven. Therefore let us go joyfully, and let our heart be enlarged to give ourselves wholly to our God. That (say I) is the thing which we have to do.

And it is the same thing S. Paul spoke of how be it he showed us mean also how to put this lesson in use. True it is by nature we seek not to be dissolved or cast down. If you say to a man, my friend, are you willing to die? It were against nature for him to say yes, unless it were to some better end: for his desire is to have being still. Indeed the unbelievers do besot themselves in their desiring to be: for this being of theirs is but to cram themselves, to eat & drink, to fill their bellies like swine, to sleep like beasts, and to look upon pleasant things, as folks that are carried altogether with sensuality. Those are the things where in the unbelievers repose themselves. And in the mean while they be so dull, that they consider not that that being of theirs is no being at all, and that the state of this preset life is but a shadow which is ever fleeting & never at any stay. But contrary wise when the godly say, it is good to live, there upon they conclude, that it is good to live, there upon they conclude, that it is not for them to cover death unless, it be to exchange for the better. Nevertheless, when they take hold by faith upon the heritage which God had promised them: then are they debris (and not with just cause) to depart out of this mortal body, it may be renewed again. We see then as now, how we may dwell with joy in theses: that is to say, by being assured that after we be passed out of this world, we shall be taken up into the resting place which God has prepared for us, & which was purchased for us of dearly. Therefore let us go on with a free courage, & let us not cease to keep on our pace, until we become to our end. And let us always conclude with our slues, it is enough for us to hope continually that the heavenly rest shall not fail us, after that God had exercised us in this world, and tossed us to and fro. Thus we see in effect how we ought to keep this feast with gladness.

Now for a conclusion Moses add, that they must report thrice a year to Jerusalem, and there flew themselves before God, as many as were males, & none to come empty, but every man to make some offering to God, according to the blessing that God had given him. This manner of speaking that the Jews should come before the face of God, served for the better expressing that the sanctuary was not a vain and unprofitable figure, but that God uttered his power there, to flew in very deed he dwelled among his people. If Moses had said singly, he shall resort to the Sanctuary: every of you shall make his offering before the art of the covenant: the Jews had not been so well certified, that their coming to call upon God in the sanctuary, was not in vain. For they might have said, very well, indeed we have the figures & ceremonies, but yet are we not sure God will hear us. But when it was said, he shall come show your selves to god, it was a greater edifying of them, because they were well assured that the ceremonies of law were not deceivable. Yet notwithstanding, it was not to make them to set their minds upon the visible signs, * so to hold themselves still down but they were to consider, although God stoop to apply himself to our infirmity, yet is it not his meaning therefore to hold us down to the earthly things: but contrary wise his coming down to us, is to make us to tie up & to seek him above, so when we have visible signs, we should consider his glory surmounted heavens, & is infinite, & therefore that we must worship him with our minds lifted up above the world, and above all things that are corruptible. And so we see that this manner of speech where it is said, we shall be in the presence of your God when we become into his sanctuary: was profitable, and imported a very good lesson to the Jews. For why? God showed in very deed, that he had not instituted those signs without cause, but that thereby he made his grace and power to be felt of the faithful, when they came there to call upon him. But yet for all that, it behooved the faithful there with all to worship God spiritually. For see how the Jews are reprov'd for this: in they corrupted his service, by reason why they supposed to shut him up within their Temple. Shall I dwell in a house made with man's hand says the Lord? If the Jews had replied & said, Why not? For it is said, when we come to the sanctuary, we shall be there before the face of your God. Yeah, but that is no excuse. For Gods ordering of his sanctuary to dwell there, was not in such wise that he would for sake his heavenly glory: but to come seek men here beneath, and to lift them up above. We nowadays must remember the like.

For when God send his word, and add the sacraments for a confirmation of the same it is as much as if he showed us his face, at least wise so fairly as we are able to abide it. For we be rude and earthly, and cannot behold God as he is, and therefore he is fine to apply himself into us. Yet not withstanding we must so seek him after the manner that he uttered and declared himself into us; as we be not tied to the visible signs, nor entangled with them as we see the wretched idolaters are, which always take occasion to turn away from GOD, by means of the helps which he gives them to bring them to him. Therefore let men beware of such abuse. Indeed when we speak of the Lords supper, we can well enough say that Jesus Christ is there present, and that we possess him. When we come to the receiving of the bread and wine, we can say they be no empty signs, but that we have there the very substance, in so much that Jesus Christ imparted himself to us, so as we be fed and nourished with his body and blood. So then Jesus Christ offered himself to us in his supper. But is it to be said therefore, that he come down from heaven, and that he is to be sought after a superstitious manner, as the Papists and such other like do in these days? No: but is served to lift us up to heaven, and to make us understand that although Christ dwell there, yet we ought not to doubt but that his power reaches into us, and that we be made partakers thereof, and that when we receive the bread & the wine, they be true warrantees of that which I have said. You see then that we be in the presence of our God, by being partakers of Christ's last supper. As much is to be said of Baptism; namely that in the water of baptism we behold the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the redemption which he has purchased for us. So as it is to us a lively picture; & not only that, but also we have the truth so we need with the image and portraiture, as the effect must needs be felt and perceived. Nevertheless it stand us always in had, to beware that we abuse not the Sacraments: namely that we be not so fleshy, as to stick to the world: but that seeing God is come down into us, we also on our side do mount up into him: and there with all assure ourselves, that our Lord is giving us his sacraments, gives us not little rattles and childish trifles to busy our heads with all: but that he gives us the very truth, to the end we should be knit to him, and that we might feel that his power is ever at hand with us. Thus much concerning the saying where Moses speaks again of God's presence, & command that Jews to resort to Jerusalem, when God should have chosen that place: & in the mean while to resort to that place where to ask of that covenant & that sanctuary were see up. And finally he said, that they should not come empty before the lord, but that every man should bring somewhat according as God had blessed him. Some have taken this text to be a kind of promise, as they God had said that such as resorted to him, should not go their way again empty. True it is that if we seek God, we shall find plenty of all good things in him, according as it is said. Come to him and he shall be enlightened, and your faces shall not be ashamed. Therefore let us not think that we shall want anything if we seek God, for he will fill us; as he is rich, so is he liberal, we shall be satisfied, and have our fill of all things that we have need of for our salvation. Then is it very true in itself, that all such as offer themselves before God, shall not return empty according as it is written; Open their mouth and I will fill it. But as in respect of this present place, it is certain that Moses speaks of Offerings: and we must not bring in any other glosses. For he declare that every man ought to offer according to the gift of his hand, that is to say, according to his ability. For that kind of speech were strange to us, if we were not made to understand to us, if we were not made to understand it; namely, that every man ought to consider what GOD has given him, that he may do him homage for it. Therefore look what we have in our hand, that let us take to offer to God, and to make sacrifice to him withal. In the time of the Law, that offerings were applied to such use as we have seen heretofore, and we need not to rehearse the Ceremony any more. As now it remains that we do homage to GOD at all times, with the goods that he has bestowed upon us. And how may that be done? By Alms deed. For we cannot increase him by bestowing anything upon him: but yet he accept whatsoever we give to the poor. Those are the sacrifices which he requires and allows nowadays. Therefore must we bestow them there. And seeing that our Lord offers himself to us, not thrice a year only, but manifestly in the person of his son Jesus Christ, so as he dwell with us continually: let it be a mean to draw us to him even with an earnest mind, that we may have our hand always open to offer to him. If we had the Sanctuary, and that it behooved us to present our selves thrice a year at Jerusalem: we should do the thing that is commanded s here, and yet should not that serve to exempt us from doing of Alms deed all the year after. For if there were no more than the Ceremony, it were a final matter as I have said afore. But where is Gods Temple now? Behold Jesus Christ, who fill that whole world; he is with us, & dwell even in our souls. Sit it is so then, let us see that we imply ourselves to make our offerings:& seeing that our God does us that honor to appoint us to be his Sanctuaries & Temples; insomuch that every Christian has that honorable title of Priest: only that otherwise we should never be counted that temple & house of God: it is good reason that every man should occupy himself incessantly without end, in offering him that sacrifice of praise, so as he may be acknowledged in all his benefits & blessings which he bestow

And it is not only the doing of Alms deeds, that he accepts for sacrifices: but we must also serve him & worship him, with all our thoughts, with all our desires, with all our affection, and with all our members. So the, that we may not appear empty in the presence of our God, let us look that we bring him good fruits & such as he require: & let us beware that we be not upbraided, as Jeremy upbraided that Jews when he said, what have I done for them my vine? I have planted them, I have dressed them:& they bring me forth bitter fruit. Therefore let us bring good fruit to our God, seeing it has pleased him to till us, to the end we should do good, and not be unprofitable. And how may that be? True it is that we cannot bring anything to him, neither can he be enriched: but when we endeavor to glorify him in our whole life; that is the fruit which eh require and make account of. Seeing then that he grant us the grace: let us profit continually under him, & let not us on our side be empty. Notwithstanding, it is certain that we have not one drop of goodness, unless he give it us: for we be barren. In deed we be to o fruitful in bringing forth evil: there are too many barriers & brambles to be found in us: but as for of good come, there is not one grain to be found in us, until God have put it in us. What is to be done then? We must pray our God to bless us, that is to say, to power out his holy spirit so upon us, as we may have good fruit to bring to him: that whereas we be nothing, he may give us a being; and whereas we be naught worth, he may make us somewhat worth by his maneuvering of us, so as he may be glorified in us. For it is not enough for us to have Gods gracious gifts in us, but he must also make us to put them to the use whereto he has ordered them. And here let us call to mind what has been declared heretofore: namely that God will not have us all to review our selves, but also to make our neighbors partakers of our gladness: and also to call to us, not only the husband and wife, and the father and his children; but also even those that are furthest of them us, and to endeavor to bring them after such a sort before the face of our GOD, as the very strangers and those that are furthest off from us, may be partakers of our mirth and feel the benefit of it, because it is made common, according to the same saying of Moses in this present Text, that he strangers, the widows, and the fatherless must be merry with those that present themselves after that manner to God, to offer sacrifice to him.

Now let us fall down before the Majesty of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, that being utterly in disliking with them, we may seek to be reformed by his word, and profit there in more and more: And that for as much as he do chiefly command us to pass through the world, and to aspire to that kingdom of heaven; we by this making of us to feel our own wretchedness, may be stirred up by the same mean to seek the salvation which he hath promised us, and where into our Lord Jesus Christ is entered to guide us thither by his examples. And that in the mean while we may be confirmed by the power of his holy spirit in the doctrine he give us, so as we may never be turned from it for any impediments that can befall us, but that we may always keep on our course, till he have rid us of this mortal body, and clothed us again with his own immortal glory. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and Nations of the earth, et cetera.

On Saturday, the 9th of November 1555
The 101st Sermon, which is the fifth upon the Sixteenth Chapter

18. Judges and Officers shall they make you in all the Cities which the Lord your God gives the throughout all the Tribes, to judge the people with just Judgment.

19. They shall not rest the Law, nor have regard of persons. They Shall not take any reward. For gifts blind the eyes of the wife, and pervert the words of the righteous.

Ad we continued in the fame soundness of nature wherein God created us: in order of Law (as men term it) should not be so needful, because every man should carry the law in his heart, So as no man needed to be compelled to obedience, but every man should know his rule, & we should all with one accord follow that which is good & rightful. And therefore law is as a remedy against the corruption is in men. As of as there is any talk concerning earthly government, we must understand that there in we have a mirror of our forwardness, in we are sane to be compelled to following of uprightness & reason. For they that are in authority, have the sword in their hand: and to what end? To repress such as burst out into excess and outrage. And whereof commit that, but that whereas me ought of themselves to seek the thing that is good and just, they turn it upside down, and go about to bring all to conclusion, if they be not jettied? Surely it is a great shame, (considering that God have created us after his own image, & given us dominion & sovereign overall his creatures,) we should be sane to be enforced to it by reason of our naughtiness. Pick me out the most despised of all men, & yet does he carry in himself the image of God, and the said token of sovereignty. Yet for all that, we be sane to become underlings, and that is because of our sin, as I said before. Let us know therefore that God has not established the order of earthly government without cause: but that he had an eye to corruption is in us. Hereby we be well warned (as I said before,) to humble ourselves, seeing our sins require such remedy. But yet ought we to magnify Gods goodness, for he has provided a forehead. All should not go to unrecoverable confusion among us, which thing would come to pass if we might do what we lifted. For if the strongest might go away with the goal, what would come of it? It were much better for us to be in forests among wolves and wild beasts, that to be among me, if all things were at liberty. For no beasts are so wood, as are our own lusts. Therefore let us acknowledge wonderful goodness of our God in he has had such care to prefer us, for as much as he saw we could not maintain ourselves unless there were laws to hold us in, & judges to execute things are set down in writing: he has provided for all. Also hereby we are put in mind to love the state to justice, for as much as we know it is a singular gift of God, & a mean to prefer mankind. If we love the light of the Sun because we cannot live without it, and if we love bread and what so ever else belong to our sustenance: let us also love order of Justice. For it is to no purpose to have meat & drink & all other commodities, feeling without laws & Magistrates we should be deprived of all God's blessings and it were better for us to be dispatched out of hand, than to eat up one another we must esteem order of Justice, to be a president of God's grace, and we must make account of it as it is worthy, every of us in devouring all he can to maintain it: For we show ourselves to be deadly enemies to peace & to the common weal, if we love not the state of Justice. And all such as trouble it, & go about to pervert it, are as thieves, and are to be esteemed as enemies of mans welfare. In so much that all men ought to fight against them, when we see them go about to bring in such horrible confusion among us.

Now it is not for not said again, that when the people were come into the land which had been promised to them, they should make them Judges and Magistrates everywhere. This matter has been expounded already in the first Chapter: but yet is it not without cause that GOD repeat is here again. For he intend to show that it is to no purpose to have good and just Laws, unless there be men to set them in force and to put them in execution. This has been told you before; nevertheless it is required that you be put in mind thereof again. For we see how God speak of one thing oftentimes, to the intent we should let more store by it, and think upon it, and not forget it. Even so do now confirm the former speech which he had concerning Magistrates. And indeed, it is not without cause the common proverb term them soul or life of the Law. For what are all the laws and statutes of the world? They be but dead things. They be lap up in paper and are nothing worth, unless there be men chosen to give them their force and to make them to be obeyed. And so you see what God meant here in saying that the people should choose. Surely such freedom was a singular gift: and we see it is not granted to all men. Where Princes have forgiveness, they appoint judges at their own pleasure and liking, and ambition bears all the sway there. In so much that a Courtier which is in credit, shall not only obtain offices for himself, but also cause them to be given to others at his appointment. Nay there is yet greater and more shameful corruption. For offices are set to sale nowadays as well as all other kind of merchandize. Seeing then that we behold such examples, we must need think it an inestimable gift, when God grants a people or Nation liberty to choose their own judges and Magistrates. And verily when God gave that privilege to the Jews, it was a satisfying of his adoption, and of his choosing to them to be his heritage, and that he meant to have them to be in better and more excellent state, than any of their neighbors, who had kings and Princes, and no such freedom at all.

Now as this thing deserve to be had in great estimation: sought they that have obtained such benefit, to if it: with a good and pure confidence. For what is the cause that our Lord bereave us of his benefits, but that we marry them by our abusing of them? We know well that whatsoever God bestow upon us is desirable, for we see commodity thereof: but yet instead of using of holy with thanksgiving, we will need make it to serve our lust. Now when God see his benefits turned so to our bane and that we draw them clean contrary to his meaning: he bereave us of them. Are we distribute of them? We see whereof it come: And we think it strange : but we consider not how God has born with us a long time, and that in the end he will not have his gifts to be scorned and reproached. Therefore whoever God has done us any good, let us learn to maintain same by our good and pure using thereof. For next way to make the possession thereof to abide with us, is to beware that we defile not the things which God has satisfied to our profit. And therefore if we have liberty to choose judges and Magistrates: for so much as it is an excellent prerogative (as I said before) let it be maintained and used with good confidence. When a people has this prerogative, let them look well to the setting up of their judges, that they may be as the Lieutenancy of God. Wherefore let no such men be put in place, as will either be bribed, or have been loudly given a foretimes, or as are unable to bear such a charge: But let such be sought and found out as are meet for it, as they were marked out by God. And because we have not sufficient different to choose a right: let God be called upon. For it is not enough to seek out such as are meet and sufficient to execute an Office; but for as much as we maybe beguiled in that case, by reason of our own weakness, and by reason of the deep dissimulation that is in men, in so much that when never so narrow search has been made, yet the evil will ever let itself foreword: let me desire God to overlook them, and to give them wisdom and discretion. Thus you see what we have to make upon this saying, where commandment is give to choose and ordain judges and Magistrates.

And it is said expressly, in every City. For what a thing were it, if men should be driven to go far to seek justice, when disorders are committed everywhere? Seeing that misdemeanors are rise and tough us near: if the redress should be delayed too long, it would not boot at all: a hundred faults would be committed, before one could be provided for. Therefore do our Lord say, they should be appointed in every city: as if he should say, that men have always need of some bride. And that is the thing which I touched before, when I said that we which are created after the image of God, and ought to reign over all creatures, have need to be held in subjection. For as we have perverted the order of nature, so it mean that God should cut us short, and show us that we be so far unable to rule, that we be not mean to have freedom, but had need to be held in awe. So then let us learn, that wheresoever vice and corruption is, there ought the remedy to be applied out of handle. True it is that there was indeed a sovereign Court of justice in Jewry; yeah and we have seen in the fifth chapter, that the hard matters and the cases of greatest importance, were referred to Moses. Yet notwithstanding, it was Gods will that there should be some order everywhere, that if any disorder were committed, it might be provided for out of hand, and men should not need to run far to require justice for in very deed it behoove judges and Magistrates to watch and not to tarry till they be called upon and importunately required, but punish evil as for as they see it. I say as soon as they see it: for they ought to spy and keep good watch. It is not enough for a Magistrate to punish he know to be wicked: but he must also make diligent inquisition, as we have seen in other places. And if men went way to work, matters should be in better order. That is thing which we have to make in our Lord will have judges and Magistrates in every City. For otherwise many evils might be committed, before any redress could be hand, so as the remedy would come too late as I have touched before.

Furthermore, whereas Moses added that they must give just judgment, and govern the people after that manner: it serve to confirm that which we heard even now, namely (first of all) that men cannot govern themselves, except they have superiors to guide them, which thing is plainly expressed concerning the Jews, whom God had preferred before all other nations. Let us understand then that of good right we be dispossessed of the freedom which God had set in mankind. For why? We turn the good into evil: and therefore is it means that we should be rest of it. A man in health shall have liberty to care what he listed and he shall not be dealt with so precisely: he needed no physician to forbid him such a mean, or to restrain him from drinking, otherwise than in such measure or at such an hour. But if a man be sick, he must be at obedience, he must keep a dyer, he must be held short like a child and he is restrained of all things that he like, in so much that if he command his own servant to bring him this or that, his servant must not be so bold as to do it. Yeah and when masters be diseased, they are subject to their servants, so as they cannot enjoy their own goods. And why? Because they be not meet to have them; by reason of their disease which overmastered them: and therefore are they saying to be as underlings. Even after the same manner stand the case with us: insomuch that if we were indeed whole and sound, God would guide us after another fashion. But forasmuch as he knows us to be so corrupted, he is saying to compel us, yeah and to restrain us in such sort, as we have heard of. They much concerning the fifth point.

Again for the second, Moses declare and set forth that which I said concerning choice making: namely that in the seat which GOD have dedicated to himself, no such persons must be put, as turn all things upside down. For if such be chosen for public Magistrates, as lead a wicked trade, as in whom there is no fear of God, no honesty, no uprightness, but wildness, wantonness and disorder; or in whom there is no more wisdom than in Ales, but to be short are mad brained or frantic: it such (I say) be set in place of public office; it is not a dishonoring of men, but a working of high reason against God, because it is a defiling of his seat. So then it behove us to way well how Moses says here, that when it come to the choosing of Officers, men must not set up idols, nor judge of them without try all. And why? Because it is a dishonoring of God, to set such persons in his room, as are not worthy to have the ruling of a have. You shall see a man that is not able to govern his own hove should, such a one as is not to be trusted to for anything, folk shall say of him, wonder fellow is a fool, he is a wizard, he has no reason, he has no stay of himself, he has neither with nor discretion to guide himself or his household: and yet for all this, shall men go and set him in the seat of justice? He is a man that cannot live quietly with his wife: and shall he be able to keep a whole city in quiet? Men preferred him to be a consoler. And to what end? To see the peace maintained. And how can that be? He has no more but his wife and household to govern, and yet he is not able to weld them. When he is at home, he is not able to guide his wife and his children. Now when a thing to go arrivers after that sort, God is openly despised. So much the more therefore do it stand us in hand to make well what Moses says here: namely that the choosing of judges and officers in not a matter of formality, or a ceremony : but a holy thing wherein men ought to proceed with all reverence: and that God lath not bridle upon any people neck, as if he should say, take whom you list at adventure without consideration: but he portray out the persons, and point them out with his finger. Look to it (says he) that if discretion in choosing the persons that shall have ruling of the people. For the word: To judge, import to govern. And secondly, let them judge uprightly says he. Whereas he speak to governing to choose such as have need of tutors. To prefer those to the guiding of others, which ought to be put under the direction to others, is too great a scorning of God. Again, the case here concern justice and uprightness. Therefore choosing of officers before they be well-known and thoroughly trained, is surely a marrying of all good order. And thereof come so many changes and turmoil. We wonder to see our Lord overthrow Common weal, and to behold how the nations that were free, are greatly distressed and overwhelmed with tyranny: but we look not fro when all those things proceed. The ground thereof was the abuses which were committed, because there was no regard had of the maintaining of the state which God had stably shed, nor care to follow faithfully the order that God had enjoyed. So much the more therefore do it stands us in hand to bear well away the things that are told us here.

Moses having said so, added now, That men must not wrest the law, nor have respect of persons, nor take rewards or gifts. And he added the reason. For gifts (says he) do blind the eyes of the wise, and perverts the words of the righteous. First he settle down here a general rule, that men should not wrest the Law. For indeed we may like equity to a right line: and if it writes to the one side or to the other, by and by it is iniquity. And therefore Moses say, they shall have thin eye upon the line of justice, and follow it without swerving one way or other. And herewith all he showed how the same may be performed, namely by respecting no mans person, and by eschewing to take rewards. For when we consider a deed simply in itself; even nature teaches us what to do. True it is that we had need to call upon GOD continually: for we see how weak of understanding and courage we be even in the things that are most evident: oftentimes we be stark blind in them. Then must not men presume upon their own with, and think themselves wise enough to judge of all things that are set before us: but we must understand that it is heavenly gift, as Salomon declares. And if we be cambered in the smallest matters; how shall we do when we come to give sentence of matters of great weight? Judges therefore must first humble themselves, and consider that if they be not governed by Gods holy spirit, they shall not be able to hold them to true Justice; and therefore they must refer themselves to GOD and ask counsel at his mouth, that they may be taught by his word; and they must give themselves over to his spirit, and submit themselves thereto.

But besides this, Moses meant to show here the cheese causes of all the impeachments of Justice. For (as I said afore) if we have an eye a lonely to the deed, without respecting the person, so as we be not possessed a forehand either with favor or with hatred: it is certain that we can skill to give sentence aright. And if it could be brought to pass that the parties should not come in fight, that it might not be known who were the plaintiff and who the defendant; so as the Judges might not be allured and carried away either with bribery, or with flattery, or with lies and gloves, or with such other things; but that the case might be laid before them simply and nakedly as it is: we should not see the thing which all the world now rewet, that is to with, that men commonly can obtain no right and Justice. For by nature (as I said) we can well enough skill to say, this is good, this is just, this is upright. But as soon as the parties come in our sight, that we see they be our neighbors or friends; or the one a great man or a rich man, and the other a poor man; and there is bringing of allegations on both sides, so as one seeks to win the goal by threatening and brags, another by sweet words and presents, and bribery trot a pace to make way: all then will be turned upside-down, and the which saw clearly before, become now stark blind. And therefore let us mark, that it had been enough to have said in one word, that men must not peruse the law; but that men are unable to keep themselves from evil, if they be not told how and after what manner they may maintain themselves in soundness and uprightness: namely by having no regard of the persons, and by shunning all covetousness, for taking of rewards.

As for the word Person, I have expounded it elsewhere: namely that we must not respect whether a man be rich or poor, great or small, a stranger or a neighbor, and such other like things. For the word person signifies another thing here, than is meant by it in our common speech, when we say. There is a person, that is to say, there is a man or one of mankind. For in this place the word which Moses uses in Hebrew, significant a face, visage, or countenance. We must not then regard the countenance. And what is meant by that? The things that are seen, the states of men, and their outward show. And the word Show express the meaning of Moses well enough. Then must they not rest upon the outward show. For if I see a man poor, I despise him; if I see him rich I honor him; if I see a man of authority, I stand in fear of him; if I see a wretched abject, I make no account of him, but rather hold scorn of him. See how the outward show here merriest all. I see a man that is able to pleasure me; O, I will incline to him, that he may pleasure me again. I see another that can do me neither good nor harm; O, it skills not how he speed. Again, I see one by whole hurt I may advantage myself: I will do it. And why? Because my mind looks no further but to the outward show. Now we see the meaning of Moses, and I have spoken of it already in the first Chapter of this book: howbeit it is not for naught that the holy Ghost makes rehearsal of it again here.

Wherefore let us learn in few words, that such as have an eye to mans persons, that is to say, regard the outward show, cannot hold their own to deal uprightly and indifferently; but that they must need be moved either with fear or with favor, to give the upper hand always to the wicked person that stand in the wrong. And why? For fear least he should be revenged: and else for hope to be benefited again at his hand for the favor that he shall have received. And therefore let us remember, first that God require a stoutness in them that are Judges. If they see a rich man or a man of honor: well, let them take him as he is, and yet nevertheless judge the case as it require. But this soundness of mind is seldom to be found anywhere. For although the Judges do purpose with themselves to follow that law, yet are they commonly ceased with a kind of fearfulness, by mean whereof they be daunted where it common to us point that they should stand to their tackling. And therefore is there good cause why such as fit in the feat of Justice, should resort to God, & carefully pray him to strengthen them in such wise, as they may not be like to read that are shaken with every wind, but freely follow that course that God has appointed the, without warning or bowing any manner of way. Let us mark then first of all, that we must have this stoutness of not being afraid at the sight of any mans greatness or countenance, that his authority or riches do not anything avail him, but that the case may stand in firm state, without having our eyes dazzled to say. This is a great man, and therefore I must favor him.

Again on the other side, I said also that we must not despite such as had in contempt to the world ward. Because I see a man is poor, I beat myself in hand that it makes no matter they I do him wrong. For we be oftentimes at that point. If there be a man of on reputation, we think ourselves discharged if we can say; well, I have done wrong to a poor creature, which is not taken to be of the common forte: but that is nothing, for no man complains of it. But God will have right and equity to be ministered to all persons. Therefore let such as are advanced to degree of honor think, that if they despite the meaner force and such as seem to be the outcasts of all the world: they shall give account for it. For if God vouch-safe to regard those kind of folk, and to have a care of them; yeah and (which more is) do name himself their defender: will he suffer them to be so trodden under foot, and to be born down with oppression and tyranny, without revenging them? So then, Judges must match their stoutness with gentleness, and incline themselves even to the meanest, receiving them into their protection, and looking to the maintenance of their cases when they be good and rightful. Thus the fee what we have to remember in this text. Were this rule well held, we should not hear so many complaints; neither should things be so fare out of order. But what? We shall see a good judgment given, and a fault or offence punished as it ought to be: and by and by in that turning of an hand, we shall see the like case go unpunished. And why is that? Because the persons of men do bear all the sway. There is a case wherein a man is convinced by the things which he himself was to speak: it fall our apparent, and thereupon he is to have some punishment, and he has it in deed. And why then is not the line done in all other like cases? Oh because the party is favored. In deed men seek many colors and disguising: and it is so much the worse but not yet cannot God be deceived, whatsoever shifts be made to shroud our matters with all. Nevertheless the world sees how this respecting of persons prevented all right, and that is almost an ordinary thing. Insomuch that for some one nice point, a man is oftentimes graveled in a case, which of itself were plain and manifest enough, if the parties themselves came not into the play. That's why judge might give sentence uprightly, without respecting the outward shows which I spoke of before. But the judges being prevented with the regard of the persons, do cast great doubts where none at all is, to say this and that. And what is the cause thereof? Always the respecting of persons. And indeed, in some cases a judge will go through with them, and dispatch them quickly: and in some other in all points like, he will have so many devises, that he can never determine it. We see then how great the lewdness of men is in this behalves. Yet for all that, our Lord will not have the instruction which he delivered here to his people, to be lost or unprofitable. Therefore let us look that we make our profit of it.

And let us mark that as judges and Magistrates are forbidden to have any respect of persons: so is the same warning made to us all. For what is the cause that we fail so often in doing our duties, but that we be so prevented with this respecting of parties? Therefore let us have such stoutness of courage, as no greatness, no pomp, no authority, no honor of this world may get the upper hand of us to pervert us. And on the other side, let us have such mildness as we despite not the meaner sort, but rather be gentle to receive them. Thus much in effect concerning the word person.

Now there is a second point concerning bribery and rewards. Thou shall not take them, says the Lord. His says not, he shall not tell Justice: but his faith, show shall not take. And why so? He added the reason: For gift (says he) do blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous. Here is a reason well worthy to be weed. For it seem at the first sight, that to take some presences is not evil nor to be condemned, I mean in a Judge. For he speak here of the presents and gifts that are give in respect of some case that is to be heard. As for example, a malefactor labor to scope unpunished, and he goes about to win the Judge by sending him some present. Likewise another man puts himself forward, and to have favor against his adversary pray, he goes and gives the Judge somewhat likewise. Now our Lord says not, Beware of it: If thou receive a present to favor the party that gives it you, it is ill done, and it is a setting of justice to sale. God speaks not those precise words: but he says, Beware of taking: for it is impossible that he which has taken, should behave himself uprightly and not aware aside. Nevertheless there are a great sort to be found which will say, As for me, although I take, you do it not therefore, follow, that I will aware from mine office: For when I have taken on both hands, I will give him the alike which thought he had won me by his giving. And is that so evil a thing? Why then was he so foolish to bring it me? If he bring, I take: but yet for all that, I step not aside from my duty. Such kind of folks would make GOD a Jeer. For we hear how it is said here, that gives do blind the eyes of the wise. If they think themselves so sharp sighted, that the receiving of rewards cannot dim their eyes: God says the contrary. And if they think themselves so constant, that they cannot be bowed: God tell them that as soon as they have taken any gift, they be utterly mad, and there is no more soundness in them. Now then it is too gross a soundness to say, I will take rewards, & yet for all that, I will keep myself well enough from turning away, or from swarming from the right. But that is impossible; for then should God have lied in this text. Thus he see what we have to remember in the first place, concerning the second point.

Now therefore, they that sit in your seat of Justice ought to think thus: does he that brings me presents, bring them of good will as one neighbor to another, or as one friend to another? Or brings he them rather for some matter sake which he has before me? Then if a man have a cause before a Judge, & the Judge take a presence of him; he offend god. Who so: Because God has forbidden him, and he know wherefore. It is not for man to say, it makes no matter, I will take need well enough for being bridled by it. But it is a tempting of God when we deal so, and God will hold scorn of our overweening, and will show us that we be not of such ability as we took our clues to be, and that he did not without cause tell us, that when we be lime fingered to draw presence into us, and to hold them fast when we have them: then are our eyes blinded, and then are our hearts wrested, so as we have no more wisdom nor uprightness in us. Seeing that God says so, it is not for us to reply against it. And indeed, whosoever they be that boast themselves to be variable to be corrupted, or to be made to step aside by taking of presences: they need not be brought before God to be convinced, but even young children may judge of them. It is too common a thing, and I could allege examples thereof that are known well enough. For there are some which are grow to so great un-shamelessness; that they stick not to say, as for me, I will take no all hands. This path been heard, and there are witnesses now that can bear me record of the matter. And in the mean season what protested they? Thus, I will not be corrupted for all that. No: but when little children have seen that justice have big set to sale, and that a lead man has gotten the upper hand in all cases, what is to be said of it? As for him, so he might play his pranks, and obtain his suits: he had cast his cards a forehand. And on the other side, those to whom the presences were brought, went like swine casting up their groins. So as there was less honesty and shame amount them, than is even among the heathen man and insides. This has been seen: and yet notwithstanding they pretended in their talk to be holy men. Oh, there were as godly and sweet words as could be: yeah, but when the matter comment to be spoke of, little boys and idiots will give their verdict of it: for the thing is too much known. Seeing then that our Lord tell us here, that if we receive bribes, their eyes must need be dazzled, and their hearts corrupted: let us beware well in mind, that except we will poison ourselves willfully, we must first of all keep this rule, namely that judges must not take anything, at least wise of anybody that has ought to do in Law before there, but utterly abstain from so doing, unless they intend to turn away from all good order, right, and equity.

And herein we see how our Lord who know our diseases or denied immediately meet and convenient remedies for the same. What remains then but that we on our side enter into examination of ourselves, and curie of us search himself narrowly? For the thing that make us so bold to tempt God, is that none of us entered into himself, to look nearly to his own vices and infirmities. But if we had the discretion to be think ourselves, we would consider thus, Alas, I need not anything to pervert me, I am as frail already as may be: though there were no occasion to surprise me, I would seek occasion of myself. And what will I do then when I meet with any evil occasion, or any cause of misdealing? I shall stumble and fall flat down. So then, if we advise ourselves well of our vices: it is certain that we would seek all the helps that could be to preserve ourselves. But seeing that God prevented us, and on the one side showed us how feeble and weak we be, and that on the other side, whereas we might fall into such mischief and inconvenience, he provide for it and says, my friends, true it is that you be subject to evil, but the way you to be preserved from it, is to abstain from such a thing, and to take such a remedy: seeing (I say) that God speak to familiarly into us, if we refuse him, I pray you do not our unthankfulness deserve, that we should be carried away into all evil, and that Satan should drive us and bear us quite away, and that God should forsake us and suffer us to fall into gross offences as all the world might abhor us?

Now then, it stand us so much the more in hand to mark well this sentence, where it is said that if men withstand not the temptations that may beguile them; of wise and discrete, they shall become blind; and just they shall become unjust. God speak not here of such as have always big naughty packs, in whom neither reason nor uprightness has born, sway at any time: but of the wise and righteous. And that is such a monstrous thing as ought to make our hair to stand up upon our heads. As how? That gifts and presents should have such force to corrupt, as that they should blind the eyes of those which were of good discretion. Now it is certain that discretion is a singular gift of God. When we speak of wisdom, we must not think that it grow out of men brains, but that is the gift of God. You shall see that God has indeed some man with a good know, by means whereof he behave himself in such wise, that he do good and common dabble things. And yet if God let him alone, so as he give himself to his corruption of taking rewards: by and by the light which God had given him, not only become dim, but also go quite out. Therefore let us learn to look to ourselves, and (as says S. Paul) let such as suppose they stand beware lest they fall. For our Lord use here a horrible threat, who he says that they which saw clearly enough, shall be blinded if they give themselves to taking of gifts: and that they which were well and holy disposed, shall be pervert and turned away into evil. When we hear this, ought we not to stand upon our guard and to keep good watch; lest we be surprised by Satan's wiliness? So then, let us prevent such temptations a good way forehand. And first we see that our Lord forewarn us: let us stand in fear, and not run rushing against him willfully, nor fall to stubbornness: but rather consider with ourselves how that even they which have big as hailes Angels, may be overthrown and thrust out of the way, when they have given themselves to it, and it would need us too large dispensation. Wherefore let us all learn to rein our selves shore, and to submit ourselves to the government of our Lord; and then we need not doubt but that if he have given us wisdom and direction, he will strengthen us more and more therein, and make us to continue in them to the end; so we go to work with praying to him continually to preserve us, as I have laid afore.

Now let us kneel down before the majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe of our vouchsafe to touch us in such sore, that we return to him with true repentance: & that such as have public charge, may behave themselves so dutifully, as they may be able to yield a faithful reckoning of their charge that is committed to them: and that all private persons may in such wise suffer themselves to be governed by them, as God may reign among us, and have all sovereignty, so as both great & small may be obedient to him. And for the bringing hereof to pass, it may please him to stir up true & faithful Ministers of his word, et cetera.

On Wednesday, the 13th of November 1555
The 102nd Sermon, which is the first upon the sixteenth Chapter, and the first upon the seventeenth.

20. In all cases thou shall follow the thing that is right, that thou may live and enjoy the land which the Lord your God give you.

21. Thou shall plant no grove of any man of trees mere into the Altar of the Lord your God, which thou shall make you.

22. Also thou shall not set up any Image: for that does the Lord your God hate.

The Seventeenth Chapter

Thou shall not offer to the Lord your God, either Ox or Sheep that has any blemish therein: I say thou shall not offer any evil-favored thing: for that is abomination to the Lord your God.

Hitherto Moses has commended equity & uprightness to us, saying that those which are appointed to be Judges, ought to maintain every mans thereupon he said, that as many as intend to continue in such soundness, must beware in any wise of taking reward: for if they take any, by and by they be corrupted, by & by they be blinded. And it is not to be replied here, that a man may well receive a present, & yet have no meaning to favor any wicked case. For the holy ghost has given sentence, that the man which is so given to taking of presents, shall be blinded though he were the sharpest sighted man in the world. Nay, he has a towel before his eyes already, and besides that, whereas he was well & holy disposed before, now he is quite perverted. We see then how it is a deadly poison, for a Judge to receive any presents in any wise.

And now to hold men the better in awe, Moses added God, promise, as if he should say, that we must not be wedded to our own profit, where God on the other side offered us his blessing, & tells us that he will prosper us, so we stick to him. And whether were it better for us, to enrich our selves by unlawful means which God condemn, and which shall come to an evil end: or to have Gods favor present with us, and that the same should never fail us? Thus we see now to what purpose Moses add this sentence, Thus men should follow uprightness. Verily even to the intent they may enjoy Gods favor, & has thou may possess the land (say he) which the Lords your GOD give you, and that thou may live long therein. This is a continuing of the same matter still, which I have declared before: namely that whereas God might command us in one word; yet notwithstanding to win us to him, he is so gentle that he bind himself to us, and make a covenant with us as it were between two parties. He has authority enough to command us, and it is not for us to ask wherefore. Again, he is not bound to promise us anything: for we owe him all that we have, and he is indented to none of us. Nevertheless he vouchsafe to yield to our infirmity, accordingly as we have seen heretofore, that after his requesting of they which is our duty, he added that we shall not be disappointed in serving of him. Yet must we not conclude thereupon, that we can deserve ought at his hand: but rather we see his infinite goodness, in that he promises us his favor freely after that faith. And therefore we ought to be the forwarder in doing whatsoever he commanded, notwithstanding any impediment that might hinder us to pluck us back. Inexcusable are we in these days, if we feel not some force of his promises, in quickening & stirring of us up to obey him. Has God commanded it? That ought to suffice us. Notwithstanding, because we be slow and negligent, he added this help, that he comes to win us by gentleness, as if a father should flatter his child. See we this? Must it not needed be your our hearts are too, too much hardened, if they relent not at such goodness? Therefore when we feel that Gods commandments touch us not sufficiently to the quick: let us take these promises here, to stir up our selves the more, and to spur us the more forward.

Again, let us mark well the speech how he says, Thou shall follow uprightness in all cases. The words are: Uprightness, uprightness shall thou follow. So does Moses speak, how be it that some men translate it, Thou shall follow justice uprightly. But when all is thoroughly looked to, he means nothing else but that men should bear an even hand in executing of justice, following the right by straight line, and persevering steadfastly in it without swarming. I say it behoove us to mark well this saying, because men will needs always discharge themselves to God ward by peace: but as for to g through steadfastly with all things that he commanded; that is a very rare matter, (as the world see) specially in those which have the handling of the law. True it is they though they be wicked, yet will they be ashamed not to have some goodly show: & so now and then a man shall find some uprightness and reason in them. But have they done right to one man? Tomorrow they will deal contrary wise with another. Have they punished one misdeed? Three shall go unpunished for it, after as the persons are favored and born out. This partiality is to be seen in manner continually: and it is a token that there is no uprightness. And this is not to serve God: insomuch that when indifference is not used in the ministration of Justice, those that are punished cry out to God for vengeance, as though they were wrong. And therefore Moses thinks it not enough that men should simply do Justice; but he will also have them to proceed with it, and to continue it, so as there may be Justice upon Justice: that is to say, a continual holding on, so as no indifferences may be perceived, nor any diversity of weight and balances, nor any respect of persons: accordingly as has been said heretofore, that men must not lean to the one side for any favor, nor forsake a good cause for any hatred, but be of such stout courage that they bow not one way or other for anything. That is the way to maintain Justice.

This lesson is apparent enough of itself: there remain no more for us but to fall to the practicing thereof. But as I said, it is a very hard thing for men to frame themselves to keep an even hand. So far off is it, that this was written in vain: that it is said they if we will prosper through Gods favor, we must keep order continually among us, so as every man may have his right: and that on the contrary part, without we do so, God threaten to because us of his blessing though he had given us it before. And thereof it is that we see of so many changes and alterations to happen in the world: namely for that when God has blessed a people, & set them in as good state as were to be wished, by & by the fall to rioting, so as the governors abuse their authority, & the people take liberty to do evil, when they see thou their Judges are corrupted, by reason whereof God is fain to lift up his hand, & to take away quite and clean all that ever he had bestowed upon that nation. We see examples thereof too commonly. Wherefore let us stand in awe, and let us learn to live the aware liar in the obedience of God, when he has see us in any prosperity. Let every man according to his ability, further the maintenance of Justice: and let such as have the sword in hand, use it in such fort as God may be honored, & not be driven to bring us to our arraignment for breaking of the order which he had set among us: That is the effect of the things which we have to remember in this text.

Now Moses add, That men should not plans any tree mere to the Altar of the Lord, nor see up any manner of image. Whereby he provided that there should be no resemblance between the & the Idolaters & Gentiles: and also that there should not be any memorial of long continuance, for fear least they should learn or accustom themselves to do sacrifice in diverse places. So are there two reasons which Moses has an eye to in this text. The one, that he would have that service of God separated from all that superstitions of the heath. The other is, that he would have folk to accustom themselves to the worshipping of God, and to offer their solemn sacrifices in the place where that Ark of that covenant was, and that there might not be any peculiar religion throughout all thou country. As touching that first, it is a point well worth the witting, that God is so chary of that service to be such as he himself require & appoint, & that he will not in any wise have us to meddle with those that Inuit & devise superstitions on their own head. In that first place; Let us mark them how it is not worth cause, that God is so chary of that service that we be to do to him. For indeed, is it reason that men should stand in defense & maintenance of their own right, and that God should be disappointed of his? And is there anything more precious & holy, than that honor which we yield to him, in protecting him to be our God & father, of whom we hold all that ever we have, & at whole hand we look for salvation? Is there anything more holy than y? Then let us learn to be attentive when that holy scripture speaks to us of the service of God. For it is a thing that passes all other in dignity. Mark that for one point.

And it stands us so much the more in hand to give our endeavor thereto, because we see that world holds scorn to yield God his due obedience. If a man speaks to a blasphemmer, or to a despiser of that orders of that church, or (to be short) to one that is no better than a dog: if a man tell such a one of his lewdness: To whom do I any wrong, said he? If he had given a man a fillip, or had chance to have spoken a cross word, as small as that wrong is, he would have confessed his fault and say de, I have done amiss: and yet is this but against a mortal man. But when he shall have spit God in the face, Cush, it is nothing, it is no wrong to any man. Daily shall a man hear such speeches. Insomuch that if God be blasphemed, and his majesty so shamefully dishonored as would make a man's hart are to see it: it is all one, there is no account made of it. But let us mark (as I said afore) that our Lord will have his service to be placed foremost & in highest degree: and when the case concerns the ruling of our life, we must begin at that end; To wit; To honor him as he deserve.

Moreover, let us mark well that it is not without cause, that he will have his service so far unlike all that superstitions of that heath. For even of our own nature we be too much given to the corrupting & disguising of things, by means whereof the pureness of the true religion is perverted. Every man has in himself a storehouse of idolatry, though he be not provoked thereto by other: & in what case then are we, when we light upon stumbling blocks and occasions, yes & even go to seek them? I see idolaters that have disguised & falsified that whole service of God, & I shall go borrow of them I wore not what; because this thing or that thing likes me, I shall go put it to that which our Lord has commanded me. Am not I by and by snarled in the same folly that they were, which played that naughty packers before me? Yes surely. For although I regard neither that one nor the other; yet have I many vain fancies in my heart. And if I fail to seeking of such things of set purpose: it is all one as if I did cast myself into Satan's snares. And therefore let us mark, that our Lord meant to preserve his servants from a deadly plague when he said that they should hold them to that pure simplicity of his word, and not resemble that panics and infidels in any case. In those days the heath for devotion sake, made shadows about their Altars, like as at this day in that Popedom, if a place be darksome, it seems to them to carry some majesty in it, and the simple force are as it were amazed when they come into a Cave, and where the windows be dimmed with red or blue glass, mans eyes dazzle at it, and filly simple fouls feel a kind of motion in themselves which make them afraid & astonished: and to their seeming, it is good to stir them up to devotion, bearing folk in hand that it is a reverencing of God, whereas in deed it is stark foolishness. After the same manner did the heathen in plashing of trees to make places dark, that when men entered into them, they seemed to be aghast, as though a wolf had been at their tail as they say, by reason whereof they were moved to some fearfulness. Now forasmuch as this custom was among the heathen, our Lord will not have the faithful to resemble them. Thus in few words, we see here how all manner of resembling the unbelievers is forbidden us, if we intend to serve God in such wise as he may like of it and take it in good worth.

And this warning is as needful for us nowadays, as it was for that Jews in the time of Moses. For what a number of devices are there in that Popedom, which have been taken from the superstitions of the heathen? All that ever is terms Gods service in the Popedom, is but a confused heap, gathered out of the things that are commanded in the Law of Moses, & the things that are seen to have been observed of the Heathen. And to color the matter was, they allege that their so doing, is least the Jews should upbraid the Christians that they have not so goodly ceremonies in their Churches as they have. And therefore they must need have this and that, after their example. True it is that they have not been so bold as to kill brute beasts in sacrifice; for that had been too detectable. But yet they took up their Lamps, their perfumes, their attainments, their altars, and a certain manner of sacrificing, though it be not of Calves, Oxen, & Sheep. Besides this, the Jews had their washings; & therefore the Papists would need have holy water. To be short, the Jews were so thoroughly counterfeited; that to all seeming, they could not boast that they had no goodly ceremonies in their temples, than that Christians had in theirs. But that was high treason against

God. And if there had been no more but mere folly in it, it might have been that better born now. But it tended to the darkening of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, by drawing a new veil over him. The veil that God had commanded to be in that temple, is rent asunder: and they fall to hanging up of another that is wrought by that hand of man: by means whereof Jesus Christ is as good as hidden, so as men cannot behold that majesty that should shine forth in him. For he is that lively image of God his father; & in him and in his person or face we see whatsoever belongs to our salvation. Now they fail to making of impediments by such ceremonies, that the world might not look full to Jesus Christ. And they be not contented with the intermingling of the things that God had ordered for a time among that Jews: but they have also borrowed of that observances of the heathen. True it is that even in this case also they pretended some color, as who should say that the world could not be drawn from those foolish ceremonies, & therefore it was better to use them still under the title of God & his saints, than under that title of idols as they have done before: but by that means the service of God was falsified.

Let us mark then that all that ever is termed by the name of Gods service at this day in that Popedom, is but a confused hotchpotch of all manner of superstitions; for they cannot show that the holy scripture has appointed men to do so. And when have they fetched their ground, but from a desire to counterfeit the things that were used among the Jews & Infidels Sit it is so, what a thing is it if we shall now fashion ourselves like into them, and suffer a sort of pelting babbles or ceremonies to be laid upon us, and bind ourselves to that keeping of them to that intent we would not be too far unlike those that name themselves Christians? It is that same corruption which God condemn in this sentence. For it is not Gods will that we should have any resemblance to those which have withdrawn themselves from the pure obeying of his word. Therefore let us be conceived to have Gods service reformed & established according to his commandment. That is the thing which we have to observe in the first place.

As touching the second point, it is said that God would have but only one Altar whereon to offer their sacrifices. At this day, this is no more in use; we have no more any material altar. For whereas the Papists use altars, in so doing they deface the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ as much as they can. Nevertheless, Gods intent at that time, was to keep his people in the union of faith, by allowing them but one Altar

And now it is said, that they should not see up any memorial of long continuance, in any certain place. For by that means they might have accustomed themselves to worship God there, or they might have made some chapel for devotion, and so had all been made. And therefore not without cause were they forbidden to plant any trees in the places where they sacrificed: for Gods Sanctuary was to be planted at length upon mount Zion. And as many as intended to serve God purely, it behooved them to resort thither, to show one common accord, and one true unity of belief. Likewise nowadays our Lord Jesus Christ has left us his holy supper, for a warrant that he dwell among us, and is always present with us by his power: insomuch that although he be exalted above the glory of heaven; yet do not we fail to be knit into him to be members of his body, to have one common life with him, and (at one word) to be fed and nourished by his substance. And because it is a secret that passed all understanding of man; he has warranted into us, by that visible sign of his supper. Come we then to the table of our Lord Jesus Christ? The bit of bread and the draught of wine which we receive there, do represent to us, that Jesus Christ is truly our food, & that we be so incorporated into him, that we be partakers of his own proper life. By means whereof Jesus Christ is so present with us that we must all need be gathered together to him.

But we see at this day what has been done in the Popedom. Was there a table for the receiving of the Communion? No, it was turned into an Altar. And that was one corruption a forehand. For as I have said already, it is not for any man to sacrifice Jesus Christ any more. That office belonged peculiarly to himself, and he discharged it thoroughly, & now must we receive that sacrifice that was offered up to God, & let that word altar alone. Nevertheless it is not enough with them that there be but one table; they will need have three or four: every man builds me his chapel, & there sets me up an altar. Although it were a good thing of itself to have one altar among that Christians: yet do they break that unity of faith, when they build several chapels after that fashion. For why? It is that will of Jesus Christ that there should be one common supper, & that all his Church should meet together, & that the receiving thereof should be as a true band to hold the faithful in one with him. But they go to say their devotions in such a place & to sing Masse in another place: And that is an open defying of God, & a setting up on idols in his stead. It is a turning of Gods temple, not only into a Swine style, but also into a thinking dungeon of all abomination & idolatry. And therefore let us mark, how it is not without cause that God teaches us in this text that although we have not that ancient ceremony of Sacrificing Oxen & Sheep: yet notwithstanding we ought to be united in faith, and not had anything at all to that which is commanded us, but simply keep this rule invaluable, that we understand how & after what fashion God will be worshipped, & agree thereto,

Now also Moses says; Thus they must not offer to God any beast that has any main or blemish in it. He has told us hitherto to that men must not meddle with idolaters, not have any resemblance to their superstitions. For the true religion must be held in his pure singleness. But that is not all. For they that offer to God, & turn not away after the fond devotions of men, must moreover serve God soundly, that is to say, their discharging of themselves towards him, must not be lightly, as men do commonly nowadays. For we see how men defraud God of his right. In deed when we be indented to men, we discharge our selves one way or other: but whereas we be indented to God, all our seeking is how to escape from him. True it is that we will endeavor to defraud men also: but yet will be ashamed to use liberty towards them as we do towards God even in dallying with him. If we owe a man either custom or rent, we will not stick to conceal it if we can, if we be of evil conscience: But yet for all that, we will not be plucked too much by the care: for we think we shall gain nothing by so doing. So then, as touching that detest that men do owe one to another they discharge them: but it skills not for God. Although he call upon us & threaten us; yet even after he has showed us our duty, we cease not to defraud him still, yes & we be quite past shame in it. Verily we will not stick to say, it is good reason that he should be honored & served: but yet we will have this serving to be after our own fashion. But he requires a right obedience. And what do we to him? Very well say we, we must discharge ourselves to Godward. And after what manner? In mocking of him. Insomuch that although that doing of some ceremonies be nothing worth; yet notwithstanding men bear themselves in hand that God ought to hold himself contented therewith, and that he dealt too rigorously with us if he require any more of us. For this cause it is said that men shall not offer any thing in sacrifice which has either blemish or spot. For under one kind Moses comprehend that whole; as if he had said, let us not think our selves escaped when we have served God by halves and pieces, but we must go to it soundly & roundly, so as we do our duty towards him thoroughly in all points. True it is that there was a special reason for the Jews: for that Jews were admonished that their sins could not be wiped out before God, but by means of that sacrifice that was to be offered. For it behaved them to life up their minds above the world, to that true, to say, there will be a payment to discharge all our debts: when Jesus Christ come, he will reconcile us to God his father, and discharge us of that bond of death, wherein we be bound. Therefore it behaved that Jews to have their sacrifices pure & clean, that they might be led by them to our Lord Jesus Christ, and their faith be listed up above the world, to know that there is not any satisfaction nor offering that we can bring on our side to please God withal, but that he must be fain to give us the thing that we want to offer into him.

Notwithstanding, we must generally bear in mind which I have declared already; namely how Moses show us we must so roundly yield into god that which he requires, as he be not disappointed, as we hear him complain thereof by his prophet, that although the laws did not utterly refuse to pay tenth and first suits: yet they did it but by halves. But God cannot away with such parings, not to be played with like a little child. And hereby we may learn our serving of God must not be by pangs and fits only, and afterward fall to laziness: but it must be done soundly and substantially throughout, with obedience to his word. And again, in our doings there must be no hypocrisy not constraint: but we must go to work a free will and not set a fair countenance on it to world ward, and in the meanwhile have a back shop that displease God: may we must go to work freely, as I said before. That is the thing in effect, which we have to remember upon this text. We nowadays do not offer any more Oxen or Sheep: but offerings which we make into God, are of our own selves and of all ever be has give into us, so as all be dedicated into him, and applied to such if as he allow; or else it is but uncleanness. For if God have give me a thing, and I abuse it: I am a traitor to God, because I unhallowed thing which he had dedicated to the clean contrary if. And therefore let us mark to please God in offering ourselves into him, we must do it soundly, our blemish or spot. True it is there can be no such perfection in us, but very great fault may be found in our service of him: but yet must we always hold us to this principle, we come to God unfriendly and whereas there are infirmities in us, we must report to our Lord Jesus Christ. For all our spots and blemishes are done quite and clean away by his blood. And is because why it is said, we offer our praises into God by him. If there were any sacrifice clean on misbehave, it were sacrifice of praise: for when we fall to magnifying of God's name, and confess we be beholden to him for all good things; our so doing seemed to be clean. How be it for all much as we have our lips so unclean, we cannot yet discharge ourselves in behalf: therefore it stand is in hand to resort continually to our Lord Jesus Christ. Our sacrifice then are stained with some spot and vice or other; is true: but yet must we have this roundness and soundness of tending into God out enforcement, necessity or hypocrisy. When we be at point, our Lord will accept our sacrifices, as though they were offered up into him thoroughly pure and perfect, and utterly faults. Indeed it is by means of our Lord Jesus Christ; for there must we be grounded as I said before. But if we have virtue, then do God accept sacrifices which we offer into him, so we be not snarled hypocrisy and come not to him as enforced or constrained, but with a free will. Therefore if men will serve God, they must beware they seek not to please men by it, as it often fall out they think it though to make some fair show and there do content and sooth themselves. We bear ourselves in had we have done all can be done; yeah but we never enter into ourselves, to give over ourselves wholly into God. We never sounded ourselves to find whether there were any evil intermingled, that we might be purged of it. And yet is that the end which we should have begun, that our coming into God might not be as by constraint. For if it were possible, we would exempt ourselves from all obedience, and never come to reckoning with him for it. But contrariwise we ought to serve him with a free him with a free disposed mind. Then let us consider, that if we intend to make our life allowable before God, then in all our thoughts and all our affections we must have this substantial soundness of dedicating our whole life into him, so as our senses and desires be made captures into him, and he so reign over us, as our chief desire may be to be ruled by him and by his holy spirit, and to frame ourselves in such wise to his will, that we take nothing in hand but that which liked him. When we go that way to work: then shall our sacrifices be pure and clean.

Besides this, let us mark also we must likewise offer into God all ever he has bestowed upon us. As for example, when we do almost deed, let every man apply gifts which he has received to common benefit of Church. Those are sacrifices of good sent, as leastwise if they be without blemish or spot. For a man shall well edify Church when he himself is led with ambition and vainglory. And as for such a one, let him know think he has offered anything into God. For it is but utter abominate, when things have not their right end, by giving that over again into Gods hand which had committed them to us, and by putting that to such if as he has commanded. Again when a man do almost deeds is led thereto by vain ambition, to boast himself before men and to be esteemed and honored for it; his dealing after fashion but unclean before God. Now then, let us learn to have an eye into God, that our sacrifices may be without blemish or spot.

Moreover, as concerning order of Church, and of all other government, we must understand likewise all our sacrifices must be so purified as God may accept them. As for example, ordering of Ministers to preach Gods word, and the doctrine of fault, the creating of Magistrates and the choosing of Officers, are sacrifices which we offer into God. Now we must offer them our spot. For if a man bring in any corruption in those cases, it is high treason to God, as I have said before. Therefore let us be think ourselves thoroughly and consider although these things according to letter, were enjoined to the Jews in time of ceremony: yet must we apply them to sacrifices are in if and force at this day. And for performance thereof, let us come back to that which S. James Says, name he which commanded the one, has also commanded the other: & that he which forbad the one, has also forbidden the other. Will we then please God in all the services which we do to him? Let there be no passing of stakes, as if we would say. I will do this for the honor of God, & for the rest he shall bear with me & give me leave to do as I list. For in so doing we would be hail-fellow with God. And therefore let us understand that the righteousness of the law is a thing that cannot be divided, neither is it for us to read it in peace. Therefore let us submit ourselves to the rule that is given us, after such sort as is contained in that Law of God. and therewithal let us mark further, that we must not have double or dissembling hearts, but that we must submit our selves wholly to God. And if we cannot attain thereto at that first as were to be wished: yet notwithstanding that must be the mark that we shoot at. Now we see what our Lord meant to require in this text.

But to the end we may be the more provoked, to deal soundly and substantially: let us also mark this speech that Moses added here for a conclusion, namely shall it is abomination before God. For men do always make themselves believe, that they cease not to serve God though there be nothing but dissimulation and hypocrites in all their doings. And we know how hypocrites are puffed up continually with this fond presumption, that although there be nothing but counterfeiting in all that they do, yet (to their seeming) God is nevertheless beholden to them; and all is well enough so there be some gay painting and some faire show. Indeed they dare not utterly deny that there is any fault at all in them: but yet would they still beat men in hand, that there is much good in them which God accept. As for example, when that Papist Priests say their prime & hours, besides that they do but blythe able, their minds are elsewhere; one thinks upon his kitchen, and another upon his harlot. Well, they will grant that this is ill done, and that they ought to be more heedful in their praying. But yet will they uphold, that so they have a final intent to pray to God, it is a good and commendable deed; and their coming to Church deserve verie much, so they have this final intent to serve god there, though their minds be distracted about other things. When they have once worshipped a puppet, and taken a little holy water, though they look upon a woman after an unchaste sort, although they be carried away with covetousness, or although their minds be occupied about some other wicked, shameful, and hellish lust: yet it skills not, so they have the said final intent of serving God; all is well enough, so they make a show of serving God, notwithstanding that they spite him all the means they can. Likewise in their fasting, though a man cast himself into all manner of lewdness and refinery, yet if he fast upon a devotion, O that's a holy man, there is no more fault to be found in him. Thus is it not possible to rid the hypocrites of the false and devilish opinion wherewith they be be-forced, of paying God with this pelting rash, which is nothing else than abomination before him; and in the meanwhile, to spite him in all the residue of their life: so as a man can never win them to believe, that God utterly mislay all that ever proceed not from a sound hear. So much that more therefore does it stand us in hand, to mark well this saying which Moses set down for a final conclusion: namely that such dealings are abominable before god. Indeed the blind & ignorant wretches deem it not so to be; may, their doings are commended of men; behold (say they), here is a goodly virtue, here is a good desert. But we must come before the great Judge, who has given sentence already that such things are but crash, filthiness, and vanity. And he is not contented with saying so; but he said also that they be utter abomination or loathsomeness. For indeed, besides their denying with him to make him as an that doll, they fall to open denying of him. If men thought not god to be stark blind, durst they come before him with a double heart, & fraught full of hypocrites? No surely: it would make them even aghast at it. For when they play that hypocrites after that fashion, it is all one as if they came to stop god's eyes, that he might not discern their dissimulation and cursed hypocrites. So then let us mark well, that we must not stay our selves upon men's bearing of themselves in hand, that to their seeming they fail not to do well, and to deserve well at Gods hand, though they go not to work with a free courage, nor with hearty and substantial soundness: Lee not such follies run in our heads. For God not only retested such things as pelting baggage of no value: but also and we them to be all abominable before him, and that he will not suffer his service to be so shamefully disguised, without taking horrible vengeance for it. And therefore let us know that he will have every of us to examine our selves; & sit we see all our thoughts and affection to be corrupted, so as there is nothing in them but dung and uncleanness: let us pray him to reform us in such sort by his holy spirit, as he may be served and honored by us, and we apply to good and holy use the tunings that he give us: and that therewithal he make us to profit more and more in his obedience, until we be come with a free will, to serve him with so good a courage, as we may be wholly dedicated to his honor. And that we may so do, let us repair to our Lord Jesus Christ, that our spot and steins may be scored away by his pureness and perfection, as he has promised us. If we shall do so, then will our God approve of our life.

Now let us kneel down before the majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make so to feel them that we may from henceforth fall to amendment and resort to his mercy, and that in the mean season he reform us in such sort to the obedience of his Law, as it may shine forth in all our whole life, and he also bear with us in our frailties, until he have rid us quite and clean of them. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father, et cetera.

On Friday, the 22nd of November 1555

The 107th Sermon, which is the first upon the eighteenth Chapter

The Priests Levites, and all the tribe of Levy shall have no part nor inheritance with Israel: but shall eat the sacrifices of the Lord made by fire, and his inheritance.

2. Therefore they have no inheritance among their brethren, for the Lord is their inheritance as he has said to them.

3. And this shall be the Priests duty at the people's hands, even at the hands of as many as offer any sacrifices, whether it be Ox or Sheep. They shall give the Priest the shoulder, the Cheeks, and the inwards.

4. The first fruits of you Come, of your Wine, and of yours Oil, & also the first fleeces of you sheep shall be give him.

5. For the Lord your God has chosen him from among all your Tribes, to stand and minister to the Lord your God, even him and his sons forever.

6. If a Levite come out of any of the Cities of all Israel where he is a sojourner, and come with all the desire of his soul to the place which the Lord your GOD shall have chose:

7. Let him minister in the name of the Lord his God, as all the rest of your brethren the Levites do, which stand there before the face of the Lord.

8. They shall have like portions to eat, besides that which they have of the sale of their father's goods.

Mention has been made heretofore of the right that God reserved to the Priests, and to all that tribe of Levy: and it is not for naught that mention is made thereof again here. For on the one side, it was more than needful that the Priests should be put in mind of their duties, that knowing the honor which God had done them, they should give themselves the more faithfully and cheerfully to the serving of him: and also that the rest of the tribes might know, that sit it had pleased God to choose the sons of Levy, it behaved that dignity to remain to them, & no man was to bear them any spite for it. For in very deed we see how there were that did rise up against them, and God was fain by miracle to warrant that priesthood which e had established, and namely; in making Aarons rod to bud and blossom, then which he willed to be kept for an everlasting memorial. It seemed to others that Moses would have advanced them in respect that they were of his own kindred, for he himself was of the tribe of Levy. And because he ordered that priesthood in the same tribe, they murmured at it, thinking that Moses had dealt altogether upon fleshly affection: but God showed himself to be the Author thereof. And surely there was no cause of suspicion, if they that made the insurrection had not been carried away with great malice. For although Moses had children of his own, yet did he not set any of them in the honorable degree of the priests: but he bestowed it away from them, and set them in the last place, as though they had been of no estimation in that tribe. If Moses had regarded himself & his own advantage, surely he would have preferred his own house. But he did not so, but contrariwise did let his children alone as they were, and held them back. Wherein he showed that he obeyed God, and did nothing upon his own head. On the other side we see how in giving that priesthood to the tribe of Levy, he deprive them of the inheritance that was assigned to them among the rest of their brethren: For the land was not promised a lonely to those twelve tribes among whom it was afterward divided: For at the time that God made Abraham Lord and Moister of the Land of Canaan, Levy was comprised among them that should be the inherits thereof. Why then is he put beside it? So we see that Moses followed Gods ordinance, & invented not anything of his own head. We must go yet further: for he tell the Levites that this scattering of them among the rest of the tribes was a punishment of God, though it was afterward turned into grace, and that God of his goodness did wipe away the curse that he had laid upon Levy. But if we have an eye to the original ground, it is said thereof that Jacob denounce Levy and Simon to have been wicked, insomuch as he say that he will in no wise be matched with them, neither in thought nor in word, because it was not long of them that Israel had not been put to havocked. Whereupon he added, You shall be scattered abroad. Whereas all the rest have their inheritances assigned to them: they must be as a vagabond among your brethren. Seeing that Moses utters so hard and reproachful a sentence against all his own tribe, who can say that he meant to be partial towards it? Nay the clean contrary appears. As a man led by God spirit, he respects not himself or his, but puts them to shame for ever, and will that if they have any honor or dignity that same should be acknowledge to come of Gods mere favor, and that the said not of reproach should make it the more evident that Levy had deserved to be utterly barest of his inheritance, if God had not remedied it of his own goodness. Therefore there was no cause of bearing any envy to Moses or any of his. But such is the maliciousness of the world, that men take occasion to grudge & repine at everything: and it is the thing that Satan does chiefly practice. When God is to be served no man is willing to go to God in true, but all inferior degrees are way ward, and would fain have superiority without the charge. How many shall he find that are willing to give themselves to the service of God by the preaching of his word, or which seek it with a right meaning affection, as who would say, I offer up myself in sacrifice to God? Yet notwithstanding all are led with a kind of self-liking, unless God hold them in awe by his holy spirit: in which respect this lesson is given to them, to the intent that every man should be contented to be only in the forecourt of the Lord his Temple. We see then that men endeavor not to come near God, and yet could every man find in his heart to be advanced, so it were without charge. Even so was it among the Jews. For the rest of the tribes having their portions, & being in quite at home in their house, ceased not to grudge against the Priests and Levy. And therefore God was fain to authority their priesthood after such a sort, as it might be expected from all slander, & no man might take upon him to alter anything therein. And so we see the cause why God repeated this doctrine again.

Now it might seem to be a disordered kind of dealing, to make an inheritance of the priesthood: for the fittest ought to have been chosen out: and why then should God go chose one kindred after that fashion, & make the children whatsoever they were to succeed their fathers? This seems to be no good order for the edifying of the Church. God therefore was fain to set his own authority as a shield against all these objections. If a man be inquisitive what reason or what respect moved God, to choose the tribe of Levy for his service: it ought to content us that God has done it, and we ought to think well thereof though the reason thereof appear not to us. He knows wherefore, and that ought to suffice us. And yet let us not doubt but that when God ordained that tribe [to serve him in his Sanctuary] he was able to indene them with such gifts of grace, as were requisite for the executing of their office. Seeing that God has enough wherewith to enable men: should we fall to seining why or wherefore he chosen one man rather than another? It pleases him. For by the same reason a man might demand why God given his spirit to one man more than to another. He shall see one man dull-witted, without learning or any other excellent gift in him; and he shall see another indene with great Excellency: and what is the cause hereof? The goodwill of God, & there upon must we rest; & whosoever grudge thereat, he shall find in the end that he has to deal with too great a master. So the, it ought to be enough for us that GOD chose out that tribe. Howsoever the case stand, he meant here to stop the mouth of all the Jews, and to show that it behaved them to keep the order which he had set down, as holy and invaluable. Mark that for one point.

Here withal (as I have touched afore) he meant to put the priest in mind of their duty, that they might be the diligence in doing their service in the Temple. For had they lived as idle bellies, it had been contrary to Gods meaning, and it had been a defiling of the order which God had set down and established among them. So the, God had an eye to both these reasons, and it behave us also to mark them on our part. And therefore let us learn, that such as are called to any charge or office, ought to bear continually in mind and to bethink them early and late, who it is that has set them in that place, and for what purpose; that it may be as a whetting or sharpening of them, to endeavor that they become not unprofitable in their charge, but rather apply themselves faithfully to it, that they may be able to make their reckoning thereof to GOD. Let that serve for one point.

Again, let us learn to be contented with the degree wherein God has set us, and let none of us be greave when we see another go before us. For all the members of a body cannot be eyes and ears; all cannot be above; there must be legs and farce as well as eyes and hands. Therefore let us understand that, and let every of us submit himself, and let it suffice us that it please God to accept us into the company of his people, to give us some little corner in his temple, so as we may be incorporated into his Church. That is too great an honor for us, and seeing it pleased God to place us there, we ought to cover no further. Those are the things which we have to remember upon this text, in applying the doctrine to ourselves.

It is said further, The Priests and Levites and all they of the tribe of Levy shall have no portion in the inheritance of Israel, but shall ease she Sacrifices for their inheritance. And the Lord will be their inheritance as he has promised them. Here Moses on the one side deprives his brethren and kinsfolk of all inheritance. Wherein we see the execution of Gods sentence, which was that Levy should be dispersed, & that he should not have any habitant or abode in any certain place. The children of Levite are as a body torn in pieces, And yet does God turn punishment into an honor. And therein appears his goodness, forasmuch as he makes the things to redound to our benefit and salvation, which should have been to our condemnation. Lou how God works towards those that are his. Insomuch that although he punish them for their sins, yet do he make them feel his goodness therewith, by turning the things to a contrary end, which should have been to their shame. After the same manner befell it to all the posterity of Levy. For it is no small thing, that God should be their inheritance: it was a title of honor above all others. Whereas all the rest of the children of Israel, had their portions in the Land of Canaan: God reserved himself for Levy, saying Hold yourselves to me, I am your inheritance. Ye see then how their portion was better than all the rest, saving the tribe of Jude, which was privileged, as where to God had already assigned the kingdom. And whereof came that? If he have an eye to the original, he shall see that the fin of Levy made him worthy of banishment, that he might have been as a vagabond without any certain dwelling place: but yet for all that, God provided so for the matter, that he turned the evil into good, and the reproach into honor. Therefore let us learn not to be discouraged when GOD punishes us for our sins, & yet to be so ashamed of our misdeeds and offences, as we may not doubt but that our Lord pitying us will make his chastisements beneficial to us, so as we shall be the more honorable before him and his Angles. If we be fain to abide some shame and reproach for a time before the world: the thing that ought to be a good comfort to the faithful, when they be smitten by the hand of God, is not to grieve themselves with the only beholding of their present affliction: but to think upon the end and issues of their present affliction: but to think upon the end and issue of it, which is, that God turns bitterness into sweetness.

Furthermore, whereas it is said to be Levites that God is their heritage; it is to the end they should be the willingness to give themselves wholly to his service. For had they been bushed in husbandry, traffic of merchandise, & such other like things: they had been turned away from their office, & not had leisure to do the thing that God had commanded them: he is to with, that those which were in Jerusalem should serve in the Temple; & those which were dispersed abroad in that country, should maintain the religion pure, & not suffer the people to grow out of order, but teach them every man in his place, that they might be preserved in all pureness. For upon the condition were they chosen. Not without cause therefore does God say that he was the heritage & portion of the Levites, to the end that such as are called to his service, should not be pulled away, nor have excuse to withdraw them from the full executing of their duty. Now in deed S. Paul applies this to his ministers of god's word, saying that if by the law of Moses they which served at that Altar were found of the Altar; they which at this day have that charge of preaching Gods word, and of the offering up of spiritual sacrifices, ought of reason to be found and maintained, & to have that which is necessary for them. Yet notwithstanding we must learn generally, that God has done us the honor to make us all Levites, according to this saying, that when God shall have restored his people, thus which were Levites before shall then become Priests & all the common people shall become Levites. And this belongs to the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. Seeing then that Jesus Christ has showed himself to the world: we which before were strangers & had no acquaintance at all with God, are now come into the Church to be of the body of Abrahams children, and are in as good case as they that were heirs of the promise. But we are become Levites for we preach to our God, & have familiar access to him in the name of his only son, so as we may boldly call upon him as our father. And even in the same respect do S. Peter call us a kingly priesthood, because that whereas we were gone back before, and wise not how to come at God, he had any means to bring us to him: now he calls us to him, he even as though we were priests, not to enter into a material Sanctuary with that blood of Goats, Sheep, or Calves: but with the blood that was shed to dedicate us to God & to wash us from all unclean. And so now we go into the sanctuary of heaven to present ourselves before the face of God.

Now then let us apply this doctrine to ourselves where it is said that God is our heritage. True it is that such as have goods & possessions in this world may use them, howbeit with the condition which S. Paul sets down in the seventh Chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians: namely that he which has possessions be as he that has none, that he have the one foot ever lifted upon and that he stick not fast in the mire as tied to the things that are here beneath; but that we remember ourselves to be but strangers in this world, and therefore look ever upward to the resting place of heaven. After that manner we may well possess whatsoever go further, and not be stayed or tied here. For why? Seeing our Lord has advanced us to such dignity, as to have us to be priests: let us go to his Altar. For we be linked to our Lord Jesus Christ, that he might dedicate us to GOD his father. Sit it is so, let us do as is said in the sixteenth Psalm. For although it was said a lonely of the Levites, that GOD was their portion: yet do David boast that he had a fair portion, because God was his. Behold (said he) I have a fair lot, and henceforth I have no cause to complain, as though I wanted any thing: for my God has given himself to me, he is my portion, & I possess him. David came not of the tribe of Levy; and how fall it out then, that he boast himself to have as much as the priests? He knew well that Gods reserving of that tribe for a time was after such a fort, that yet nevertheless he would have that whole people partakers of that same blessing, accordingly also as it is said in Exodus, you be a priestly kingdom. And S. Peter has turned this into another manner of speech, saying, Ye be a kingly priesthood, that is to say, ye be all as it were a sort of little kings, because God govern you, and that is for your benefit: for he has promised to give you a redeemer, which shall lead you into all perception, Nevertheless ye must understand, that this kingdom is not like other kingdom of the world, but is matched with a priesthood, that is to say, it is consecrated and dedicated to God. David therefore acknowledging this, said that God is his portion. Now if this was said in the time of the figures: much more ought we to do the same now, forasmuch as the fore alleged prophetic is now come to pass in our Lord Jesus Christ and in all his members, so as we be not kept back any longer as we were before, but may preach to God with assured hope that he will receive us, and that we shall be near to him. Thus ye see how we ought to benefit our selves by his speech where it is said that the Lord was their portion, ye even according as he had promised them.

And it was not for Levy to boast of his own worthiness or deserts. All that ever he could allege was no more but this: I ought to have been disserved, and yet notwithstanding God has turned it to mine honor. And therefore if we will be sure that God is our heritage, we must not look: what we can attain by our own travel, for there is nothing but utter confusion in us: but we must report to that promise which God has made to us, in that he has vouchsafed to make so great account of us, as to take us for his children, even us which deserved to be damned. And that is the thing whereupon it behoove us to be grounded, to enjoy the privilege and inevitable benefit whereof Moses speaks here. Let us mark well then that he send us back to the promise without any respect had to us, to the intent to do us to with that we have not anything on our won part, but that we be beholden to the only free goodness of our God for that benefit.

Now it is said consequently, that the people also must discharge their duty towards the Priests. Ye must have a special care (said he) that the Priests may have their right which God allow to them: that is to with, The right shoulder of every sacrifice, the two cheeks, and the Pouch: these things must be reserved for them, together with the first fruits of Corn, Wine, and Ole, and also of the fleeces of your Sheep. Here God commands the children of Israel expressly to maintain the Priests, for they were bound thereto, and therein they showed themselves to make great account of the service of God. It behooved them to have men to minister in the Temple: and if these were not maintained, Religion should be, as it were about shed; and therefore it was not without cause that God commanded the people to employ themselves about that matter. True it is that they ought to have done well even without exhortation: but we see the unthankfulness of the world, when any duty is to be done forwards God, they must be spurred forwards, and they never go willingly to it; unless they be urged. And if it were so among that Jews, much more is it so among us. For we be so slothful that we never seek to discharge ourselves to God ward, and therefore we are fain to be called upon and to be prepared. Still we know this vice to be in us, let every of us quicken up & spur forward ourselves; & still we see that our Lord call upon us, let us follow him, & make the things effectual which he tells us in his word. That is the thing which we be to mark in this text.

But yet moreover we have to mark that which is said here: namely that if any of the Levites be disposed to come to the place which the Lord shall have chosen to be worshipped there, he shall have his part and portion of all the offerings of the Temple as one of their brethren, besides that which he has of his own house. For if they had houses from their fathers in the Country, (as in deed there were City assigned them everywhere:) there were to keep them to themselves, and yet they were to have their part of the offerings that were made in the Temple, so long as they served there. But yet God said expertly, with the whole desire of his heart, to show that God meant not here to give occasion of idleness, to such as sought but their own ease and commodity: but to speak of such as came with a right meaning mind to serve him. I told you afore, that the children portion to inherit, but had certain Cities here and there, one in one place and another in another, dispersedly throughout the Land of Canaan. And therefore it is said, that if any of them being far of Jerusalem, had a devotion to give himself wholly to the service of God: he might do so, he might leave the place where he dwelt, to go to Jerusalem, there to give himself wholly to the service of God. And this was no breach of the order that God had set, that is to with, that the Levites should be scattered abroad as a seed, to hold the people continually in the pureness of religion: but it was spoken in respect of some of them. For all of them had not a desire to resort of Jerusalem: that is true. For the most part of the Levites dwelt in place more fruitful than Jerusalem: for that part of the country was not one of the best of all the Land of Canaan. But they that dwelt in the countries of pasturage, were the wealthiest. And we see also how the prophets upbraid them, saying: Ye Bulls of Buffon, because the kingdom of Israel was become very proud by reason of their abundance. The Levites then would have had no liking to have abide in a place that was not very fruitful, & to have left all their own commodities & houses. Again if any had been led by desire of vainglory, God meant not to favor them. Therefore it is said that if any of them would come of good will to Jerusalem to serve in that Temple; he should not be refused, so it might appear that his intent was to give himself to that service of God, and that he did it with a good courage. Now we see in effect preeminence to such as besides their common duty of teaching the people, were also desirous to be continually at the Sacrifices. That is one point. But yet for the better understanding of the whole; we must consider that the service of the Temple consisted not only in the offering of sacrifices : but also in singing of praises unto a God both evening and morning, in saying of public prayers, yes and also in watching nights : and so there was some hardness in performing that charge. In respect whereof it is said in the Psalm, Bless the Lord he that served him, yes and which do keep the watch against in his house or Temple. It was not enough for the Levites in their order and according to their turns, to be occupied from morning to night in calling upon the name of God, and in making of prayers and supplication in the name of the people : but it behooved them to hold out all the night also and it was a set order among them, that when one sort of them had been occupied all the day in singing the praise of God, it behooved them to be present there the next morning when the people came together, to show way to others. Likewise, then solemn sacrifices were to be offered according to the commandment of the Law, the Levites were ever present. To be short, the Temple was never empty, but it behooved them to watch as well for the keeping of the fire upon the Altar, as for maintaining of the lights and such other like things. Thus see we now cause why God vouchsafed to give a certain privilege to those that came after that sort to Jerusalem.

And hereby we be done to understand, first that the office of the Levites was double : to with that on the one side they were to teach the people, & to be as keepers and maintainers of law, to the intent that men should not turn away to any superstition, nor become heartiness for want of good looking to, and so bring the service of God in contempt; but that they might always bear in mind to what end he kept them in the world, and refer their whole life to glorifying of him. That was one part of the charge of Levites. Also they were to teach men the meaning of Ceremonies, as namely that the sacrifices serves to show even to eyesight, all men are accursed, & condemned to death, and that they ought not in any wise to come in God's presence without sacrifice. And there was not any sacrifice sufficient to make atonement between God and the world, but only our Lord Jesus Christ offering up of himself. You see then how the duty of the Levites was to teach the people, that the Ceremonies guided them to the promise which had been made into them concerning the Redeemer. And there with all it behooved the Levites moreover to pray into God: and the High priest was to go into the tabernacle in the name of all the people, to show that they were not worthy to have access into God, but by mean of mediator to go before them and to enter as it were into Gods presence in their behalf. All these things were to be done. And therefore the Levites that served in the Temple, had a harder charge than they that were dispersed abroad in the Country. In respect whereof it was Gods will that they should have the said advantage of taking the portions of all the sacrifices and offering that were made in the Temple.

Whereupon we have to note, that Gods esteeming of the Ceremonies was not without cause. In granting this privilege to the Levites, he do us to understand that he like well of Ceremonies, and will have the kept, & with all that he will have the means maintained for the strengthening of them: but that is not in respect of God himself: for we must always think thus : What? Did God require men to offer him the blood of brute beasts? Why? That is nothing but stench. Again, required he to have the fat burnt, which can engender nothing but silt and stench likewise? Yes: howbeit, that was not for any pleasure that he took in those outward things: but for the salvation and benefit of the people, to keep them in continue all hope of the redeemer that was promised. Again, their praying, the singing, and all the rest of their doings served to inure the faithful, that they might pray to God with the better courage. True it is that we be commanded to pray every man by himself at home in his house, in his Chamber, in his bed, and at his table: but yet our Lord perceiving the weakness and coldness that is in us, have willed us to assemble together and to call upon him with one common accord. And so was done in the Temple. There was singing of Psalms, there was giving of thanks in the name of all the people, there was praying and such other like things, and finally there was sensing with perfumes, to show that our callings upon God after manner, are sacrifices of good sent, & sty up to heaven like the smoke of the perfumes. All these things were done for the better inuring of the people to the service of God, and that they should fashion themselves after the Levites that served in the Temple.

To be short, we see how God did not this in favor of one tribe only: but rather that he took order for benefit of the whole Church. For had the Priesthood ceased, and the order of the temple been abolished: at what point had the people been? All had gone to havoc. And we see also when they were carried away captive, and the temple beaten down: they became as folk forlorn, & could not open their mouths to sing unto God as they had been won't to do. Since it is so then, let us mark our Lords intent was not to favor that one tribe alone, but generally to procure the benefit and salvation of his whole Church. And likewise when mention is make of the order of the Christian Church, it is not in respect of some small number of men: but Gods intent is to draw both great and small into him. And let us make that his ordering of common prayer and of the administration of the sacraments, is because he see that without them our salvation could not stand, but all would go to wreck, & his grace would after a sort vanish away. And this ought to give us the better courage to give our minds to the doing of the things which our Lord commanded us concerning the Ceremonies, concerning the resorting to his word, concerning our meeting together in some place certain to call upon him in the company of faithful. Let us consider, seeing God had ordained these things for our welfare, we must not withdraw ourselves from them, but every of us must resort to them as much as we possibly can.

And it is said expressly, that they shall be there to minister in the name of the Lord, with their brethren which are there before the face of the Lord. This Name of the Lord, betoken nothing else but Majesty of God, even as be manifested same into us. For it was not for the people to conceive so gross and brutish an imagination, as God should be enclosed in the Temple: but it behooved them to bear always in mind, God had verily place his name there, is to say, that he meant to have his Majesty known there as he had given assured tokens thereof: For the Sanctuary, the Altars, (as well whereon the whole burnt offering were sacrificed, as the other whereon the showbread was set, and whereon the perfume were burned,) & all rest of the things there, served for a warrant to show that God accepted the petitions of his people. That then was the cause why it is expressly said, that those which abode in the Temple served that name and Majesty of God. And here with al mention is made also of God presence (as we have seen before,) which is a satisfying of the things that he had taught afore, that the people should not be disappointed in resorting to the temple to call upon him there, because the Levites should always be there ready to succor such as fled to him for succor.

Now this was in the time of the figures. But we must mark that if we resort to our God in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, in whom dwell the whole fullness of Godhead; God will show his face into us: that is to say, we shall find by the effect that he regarded us, and that the door is not shut against us, but that we may perish into his presence. And besides that, to the end we may be guided by our Lord Jesus Christ, we must put the thing in us which he had told us: that is to with, we must come together in his name, to the intent the he maybe among us. Then if we will be heard of God, and that our service should be well accepted of him: we must meet together without hypocrisy, with a true & pure heart: and then will our Lord Jesus so bear sway amongst us, that God also will there will reach out his hand to help & succor us. And when we have so offered up our prayers unto him, and every of us had put himself into his hand: let us not doubt but he regarded our doings. As for example, for as much as we know these our present doings in meeting together to hear his word and to seek him, are commanded by him: Let us not doubt but we be before his eyes, and he looked upon us with pity, and will consider all our necessities to provide for them, and to succor us in them. And let us on our part also so mount doubt that he showed us his face, that is to say that he made us to feel his presence, especially when we come to him by the way us to come in such sort, that he will keep us still under his protection, until he take us up into his kingdom.

Now let us kneel down before the Majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better, yes & that we may be so stricken down in ourselves, as we may seek him with true repentances & rest upon his promises, not doubting but he accepted us how wretched so ever we bee, because we come not him not to him upon trust of our own defers, but upon his mere goodness where through he had elected and chosen us: and that moreover he suffer us not to be defiled with any of the corruptions of our fled, but that seeing he had called us to his Priesthood, he will also grand us the grace to dedicate ourselves to him by offering up all our thoughts, affections, & desires, yes & even our whole bodies & souls unto him, that he may be honored more & more by them, & than such as are yet far off from him may be brought unto him, to the end we may all together worship him in his only son. And for the brining thereof to pass, it may please him to raise up true and faithful Ministers of his word, et cetera.

The 108th Sermon, which is the second upon the eighteenth Chapter

9. When they art come into the Land which the Lord your God give you: they shall not learn to do after the abominations of those Nations.

10. There shall not any be found among you, which make his son or his daughter to go through fire, nor any with that use Witchcraft, nor any man that is a regarded of times, or that regard the flying of souls.

11. Or that is a Sorcerer, or a charmer, or that ask Counsel at spirits that are called familiars, or that is a sooth fair, or which ask Counsel at the dead.

12. For all they that do such things are an abomination to the Lord: and for such abomination sakes, the Lord your God drive them out before they face.

13. Be perfect therefore before the Lord your God.

14. For the Nations which they shall possess, give ere to regards of times: and to witches: but the Lord your God has not taught you to do so.

15. The Lord, your God will raise up a prophet like to me, from among your brethren: him shall you obey.

It is in vain for God to give us many laws & lessons, if we determine not with ourselves to obey him in all points. For the first point whereat we must begin is to know Gods authority, & to learn to submit ourselves to his word without any gain saying. If the Law in general have not this force; to what purpose is it for God to speak of this thing or of that thing? Therefore let us bear well in mind, that we must be disposed to receive whatsoever God enjoins us before we can benefit our selves by any one sentence of the holy Scripture. As for example, when a man comes to a sermon, though he hear the matter, yet shall it not touch him to the quick, unless he know a forehand that Gods truth must be received, and that it is not to be encountered with disputing. And surely we see many which are sufficiently convicted, that the things which are told them are true, and that they be not able to reply against them: and yet pass not to make a mock of them. And why is that? Because they be not touched with that majesty of God; and therefore they cannot think that we ought to submit ourselves to him that made us & fashioned us to be obedient to him & to his commandment. But on that contrary part, when we be urged to receive the things which we know to come of God, his truth will bear away with us. As soon as we hear that it is God which speaks, we tremble at his speech, as is said by the prophet Esau. And so he see now why God give this general rule to his people, that they must hold themselves to his pure and simple will. But for as much as men are naturally given to superstition, & seem to seek even willfully to be beguiled: God here do first withdraw us from all errors and abuses, & afterward give us a foundation whereon to stay & to be build that is to with by harking to him & by sticking to that which he says. Thus are there here two principal reasons. The one is that God corrects the vanity that is in men in that they rather give over themselves to cousin ages & lying, than to the rightful truth. And thereupon he shows after what manner they may be directed giving them a remedy against all the wiles of Satan. For if a husbandman will have his feed to thrive, he must first till his ground: & if there come up any shrewd weeds, he must pull them up or cut them off. After the same manner do God deal with us: to the intent his word may have entrance into us, and be received without any let; he rid us from all that evil & vice that is in us. For all our own seeking is to give ourselves to folly: & the devil is so while & subtle, that he finds means to attain to his purpose, because he knows that our minds are so sickle, that our whole seeking is to be beguiled. Therefore us mark well that Gods meaning in this place, was to hold his people in obedience to his word, that was the mark he shot at. And moreover because we before possessed with the said forwardness, so as none of us can forbear to hearken to leasing but our wits are so shuttle that we be still hearkening after this & that, delighting in fond curiosity & speculations that are nothing worth; & serve to no purpose but to trouble our minds about vain and unprofitable things: therefore here our Lord turns those that are his from all things that may corrupt them and withdraw them from his truth. In respect whereof he said here in effect, Thus if we will be his people, we must not be entangled neither in Sorcery, nor in Soothsaying, nor in Witchcraft, nor in confining of the dead, nor in calling up of familiar Spirits: but all these things must be rid away from us, or else he will disclaim us and utterly forsake us. Mark that for one point.

As touching these several sorts, we will treat of them another time: for the time will not suffer to speak of them all as now. And therefore in that mean season, let it suffice us to see where to God had an eye, & whereat he aimed. Let this then be one point: that if we will be the true disciples of our God, and receive benefit by his word, to be taught as becomes us: we must put away all wicked superstitions, & all abuses where to that world is given, & wherewith we also should be bewitched, if that remedy thereof withdrew us not therefore. And because we be too much given to custom, in so much that if a thing be once in use, we think it to be lawful: God tells us expressly that we must not set our minds upon such clocking, for they will stand us in no stead. Therefore whereas we see the whole world embraced with errors, so as Satan has his full scope to deceive both great & small: let us not run after them. For it will not serve us for excuse, to shield our selves under that greatness of the multitude, or to say, Every man believe so: I see the wisest folk do so. Well may we allege such things; but our Lord tell us that we must not yield our selves after such moaner to men, that he should not always be preferred before them, and bear chief sway, and be regarded of us though we were incised away by all the examples of the world.

This thing is touched expressly by Moses in that he said, True it is that when you be come into the Land which you shall possess, you shall find it to be as a common Law, and that men have so done: but he must the not think that God allows it ever the more, or shall be is consented with it. For the world shall be condemned: and though all men were stained with some one kind of crime; yet will not God forgo his office of Judge, nor be overcome by any multitude be it never so great. And therefore let us remember first of all, that if we were to offer ourselves of God to be his scholars; we must not entangle ourselves in the vanity that reign in this world, but we must yield our selves wholly to him with a simple and right meaning mind, so as nothing may stop that entering of his word into us & our receiving thereof, but that it may have full authority to the uttermost. That is that first point.

The second point is, that we must not pass what the world does, or how other men behave themselves. For God will have us for all that, to frame our selves according to his word. And although we see nothing but rebellion here beneath: yet must we do him the honor to submit ourselves to him. For it is not enough for us to worship him Ceremonially: the chief point is that his word does so reign, as it be a bridle to have us back, and that our life be framed altogether thereafter. And although this was so straightly command: yet we see how the clean contrary came to pass. Wherein we see a fair mirror of mans wickedness and un-thankfulness. For albeit that God does show him the right way; yet does he go after still. Yet see how the Jews had warning enough that they should not corrupt themselves with the abominations of the heathen; God showed them wherewith they ought to have contented themselves and whereon to have stayed; namely that they ought to have learned at his own mouth: he gave them his law, and he raised them up prophets: and yet for all that they ceased not to go foully affray, & to have itching ears; and to be inquisitive of this & that. And that was the cause why sorceries and enchantments, Conjurations of the dead, and such other like things reigned among them: insomuch that in the time of that prophet Esau, we see there were very few folk that followed the law of God. To here am I, (said the prophet,) and those whom God has given to me. What? Had he any great company with him? No. but contrariwise he said, that they were hated, and that they were pointed at with men's fingers, as if they had been monsters against nature. And those that did so, would need be counted wiser than all other men, like as that Papists upbraid us nowadays, that we will need make a new world, & require a reformation alone by our selves, by reason whereof we be scuffmarks: & even so was it in that time of that prophet Esau, as he declares in his eight chapter. Yet notwithstanding he forbearer not to utter this sentence, & to confirm that same, saying: If any man go about to turn you away to familiars; and to conjuring of that dead, hold you your selves to the things that your God has delivered you. Ought not he to reign both over the quick and dead, and to be obeyed of all? Yes: and therefore hold you to his law and to his testimonies. And if the people speak against them; it is because they have no light. But let that blind go on into decay & destruction, seeing they cannot be held back: & in the mean while hold you your selves to that simplicity of the doctrine. And for this cause it is said to that Prophet Esau; Seal up that Testimony of God, & let it be to you as a letter that is closed up, seeing there is nothing but unbelief everywhere. And yet for all y, cease not to hold you still to it quietly and obediently.

Now if this feel out in old time among that Jews: needs must we find that like nowadays, as is showed by that Apostle in that Epistle to the Hebrews, who applies this text: to that reign of our Lord Jesus Christ, & to that state of that Christian Church. Then if they which were desirous to have served God purely were abhorred; & that not of that heathen but of such as named themselves the Church of God: it becomes us nowadays to bear it patiently, if that world not only look away upon us, but also hold us for accursed. Yet notwithstanding, we may feel define that Papists with all their pride and devilish overweening, still we see them to be backsliders & to have forsaken God; & (as much as in them lies) to have renounced their baptism. Let us learn to hold ourselves to that law. And although Gods truth be not received; yet let us keep it still as a letter closed up, & as a treasure laid up in store. And when we see all other men wander away, some after superstitions, & some after errors: let us assure ourselves that the way is infallible, so we hearken to our God, and endeavor to behave ourselves according to his will, & we cannot miss the way, it is so certain, as Moses says hereafter: This is that way, walk therein. But for the better understandings hereof, let us mark the words that are set down here. The people (said he) whose land you must possess, are imbrued with many lies & abuses: but you shall not do so; especially if we will be taken for Gods flock, & accounted for his household folk; we must be separated from all the rest of the world. Let us learn then that our faith must not waver, not wander after our eyes: but we must settle our fight & all our senses upon that which God tells us. Though we saw a thousand stumbling blocks to dazzle our eyes withal, yet & to put us to trouble: yet must we yield such authority to God's word, that it may hold us still in awe. They then that run gadding at that sight of this example or that example, do well show that they were never thoroughly grounded upon that word of God. And therefore this saying is of great importance, when God sets the things which he utters with his mouth, as counterparty against all things that are to be seen in the world. As if he should say, Must I be laid in the balance against men, then when I have commanded them to demean themselves thus or thus, my authority should be diminished and doubted of, & it might come in question whether my word ought to take place or no? were it not a turning of all upside down? Can there be any greater or uglier confusion, than to compare the creature with me? What are men? There is nothing in them but blindness & beastliness. Yes & when they think themselves wisest; then are they that most fools: & their advancing of themselves against me is stark madness: & yet must my word be defaced for their pleasure? Then let us mark well, that it is not for us to follow men's customs; nor to esteem that more of things for that they have had their free scope, when God turns us from them & faith, Ye shall not do so. For why? It is good reason that we should separate ourselves from those whom God has not enlightened. It is no marvel though men tripe & stumble & go affray over all the fields like silly beasts. For it is said that in this world we be as in the dark; & therewithal it is said also, that there is nothing but stark ignorance in us, and that we comprehend not the things that concern God. Therefore when we want Gods word, we be as in an irksome dungeon. And so forasmuch as God grant not that grace and privilege to al men to have that lamp of his word & truth lighted up to them to guide them withal: we ought not to wonder though we see them go affray, but rather to make our benefit of that good that God offers to us, and to hold us altogether to his word when it is given to us.

And now he tells them the cause why they should not do so. For your God (said Moses) will raise you up Prophet, and him you shall obey. If we were but simply forbidden to give ourselves to superstition, sorcerer, and all other abuses: that were not enough. For we should be still in uniqueness, and every man might justly demand, yes, but what will God have us then to do? For the forbidden us to have any superstition among us, and yet in the mean while he leaves us in uncertainty, so as the state of the heathen & unbelievers is better than ours. After that manner might a man have replied: But our Lord has provided well for it. For the faith, whereas I call you back from all abuses & errors, it is not to leave you in perplexity & trouble, so as he should not know on which side to turn you: but I give you my word, & that is the thing which you must take heed to. And if Gods truth content us not: what an unthankfulness is it? We see then now that the thing whereby God will put a difference between us and the Infidels, is that we must have his word for our guide, to rule our selves thereby: & therewithal we must let the world run at rovers, forasmuch as they have no other doctrine to ground upon, but their own opinion, or that folly of other men. And so when one blind man leads another, he himself stumbles first, & all the rest follow him. As for us, seeing we have God for our Master and teacher, let us hold our selves contented therewith.

And let us mark hereby, that it is impossible for men to be withdrawn from errors, unless they have Gods word. Indeed a great sort can well enough mock at the great number of follies which they see: as for example, ye shall see many world lings nowadays which will condemn the abuses & fond toys that are in the Popedom, & lustily received them: but yet for all y, they stand upon never that better ground themselves, neither have they any settle or root. And if they be not stained with the errors which they condemn: they have others as bad or worse. For many of them be stark Atheists, that is to say without Religion and without fear of God, whose shame must need be discovered at length, and God must need give them up to a leaved mind, that even young children may laugh at their beastliness. And when commends y? Even of this (as I said a fore) that we shall never have any certain rule, until God have taught us. And that is a point well worthy to be noted. For first, we need not to be troubled at that impediments which hinder many men to come to the Gospel in these days, when they see the whole world in a manner willfully bent to superstition: for seeing that Gods word bears no sway among them, what shall a man say, but that blind folk may well enough wander in darkness? Again, we see the singular yes & inestimable benefit which God vouchsafed upon us, when he gives us his word, and applies it to us for our soul health. For it is the only mean to draw us out of that bottomless pit. So long as we be in this world, we be hemmed in with so many temptations of the devil, as cannot be numbered: & the world itself may well be likened to a maze, so as we cannot step one pace without danger of falling down headlong to break our necks: from the which there is none other mean to preserve us but Gods word. Seeing them that he vouchsafe to look mercifully upon us, & to open his holy mouth to show us that way of salvation: how may we excuse our selves, if we vouchsafe not to come to him? So then, let us learn to embrace this treasure which is offered us, & to yield due reverence to Gods doctrine, after we have once known what it brings us, and how much it is for our behoove. And finally let us bear in mind that by this text where our Lord tells us that he will raise us up a Prophets, he does us to withal we shall be delivered from all errors, if we receive his word to frame ourselves thereafter.

And hereby we be done to understand, that all such as in these days do make none account of the Gospel, are well worthy of error: of which sort a man shall see many nowadays, which shut their eyes and stop their ears when God is so gracious as to draw them to him. They have the means whereby to yield themselves into that way of salvation, & they play the deaf & blind folks willfully & wittingly: & therefore is it meet that such folk should perish. For inasmuch as they receive Gods grace whereby they might have been saved, & which could not be sufficiently esteemed of: must he not need be revenged of their spitefulness, in that they be so forward as to trample the word so under their feet, which served to have delivered them from the gulf of hell? Mark that for one point.

And therewithal let us mark on our side, that seeing God reaches us, it ought to be a sufficient arming of us against all errors and all vain fancies; in so much that although the devil lay his snares for us, yet shall he not be able to catch us as long as we hearken to our God, and yield him the dutiful obedience which he deserved at our hands & which we owe to him. And for that same cause does S. Paul say expressly, that if we have that doctrine of that Gospel thoroughly printed in our hearts, we shall no more be led to dance after other mans pipes, not play the young children which are easily deceived. He see then that Gods truth is invincible. And when we receive it by true faith, then are we armed with the spiritual sword. For it is not for naught that that title is given to God's word. We cannot be exempted from being assailed by the devil, for even our Lord Jesus Christ himself passed through that battle. But yet howsoever the world go, we shall have wherewith to resist Satan, & all his wills, so we receive Gods word and stick to it.

And by the way let us mark, that whereas Moses says that God will raise up a Prophet: he speaks of that continual order which God intended to establish in his Church, which shall endure to the worlds end. For had there been no more but the once publishing of the Law, truly it had been enough to make folk inexcusable when so ever they had turned from it: but yet had it not been a sufficient mean to hold them to it, especially considering the frailty of men, how they slip away like water and vanish away out of hand, chiefly when the case concerns the accepting of any goodness. Therefore if God had done no more but published his Law, truly men ought to have submitted themselves to it, and to hold themselves as in captivity thereto: but yet we see such was men's feebleness and inconstancy, that they would have turned away from it by and by. God therefore vouchsafed to add a second help, as if he should put to a double bond, saying that he will raise up Prophets from time to time, among the people. As if he should say. True it is that I have declared my will to you fully in my law: but yet will I send you expounders of the doctrine and maintainers thereof, which shall be as keepers thereof, that it perish not, may be buried, nor be corrupted with half interpretations. So shall there always be Prophets. This do us to understand, that God has not only once uttered his will to us, but also that he has sent us teachers from time to time to keep his Church in obedience, and by their means to make his word to be understood. And so we have to gather that the Church cannot stand without teaching, and that it is not enough for men to read the holy Scripture: for if God had known it to have been sufficient for us, he would have gone no further. But it is his will that there should be teachers to speak daily in his name, as instruments of his spirit, and (to be short) as his own mouth. If this be not superstitious; we may conclude thereupon, that where no doctrine is preached in God's name, there is no Church. And thereby we see the desolation that is in the Popedom. True it is that their hypocrites preach now and then: but for as much as they disguise themselves, yes and even falsify & corrupt all good doctrine: all that they do is but abomination. Again, we know that those which bear the name of Bishops & Prelates in the Popedom, are but Idols and dumb pictures. For to what end has God set this order and policy among his people, but that his word should be heard, and that it should be founded out with a loud and clear voice, so as both great and small may be taught by it, and by that means submit themselves thereto, according to this saying, that his word is his Kingly Scepter or Mace wherewith he intended to govern us? So then let us know that if we will be know and reckoned to be of Gods church, and have him to dwell among us: his word must be preached to us, and we must not think it enough to have the holy Scripture, unless we have teachers also to bring us back to the things that are written, & to give us the understanding of them, & to apply them to our use. That is that thing which is showed us in this text. Now I told you that this served not for the people of old time only; but that it belongs to us also; and we see it in as much as the same text is applied by the Apostles to our Lord Jesus Christ. The Apostles intending to show that Jesus Christ was sent of God his father with full commission to govern us, and that it is he to whom we must give air: say it is written that God will raise up a Prophet. Howbeit I have told you already, that this place speaks not of one Prophet alone, but of many, and of their continual succession. How will that agree? Very well. For in as much as God had promised his people, not to leave them destitute, nor unprovoked: it is to be considered now, whether the same has been performed or no. true it is that there were Prophets sometime more and sometime fewer. It is said of the time of Samuel that is to with of his childhood; that Gods word was very precious that is to say: very rare. And why? It was a punishment of God, according as he threatens by his Prophet Amos, that he would send a dearth, not of bread and other vittles, but of hearing the truth, and of the doctrine of salvation. The Israelites then were sometimes as good as berets of the thing that had been promised them: but yet not so utterly that God had no Prophets at all. And after that manner did he encounter the malice and stubbornness of that people; in so much that although the Prophets were received, yet & cruelly murdered: Yet notwithstanding he ceased not to maintain his promise still, even to that coming of Jesus Christ. In deed there was a certain intermission, to that end that the people should be moved with the greater desire to receive this great and cheese Prophet that was promised them. For we see there were no more Prophets in Israel after the time of Zacharias and Aggeus. And had God for all that disappointed them? What was become of the Prophets of Moses? It is said expressly by Malachi, Call to mind the Law that was given you on Hebrew. As if he should say, Sirs, look to your selves, for ye have the perfect wisdom, which is contained in God's Law; and therewithal ye have had prophets also, which have expounded the same to you faithfully. Hitherto God has ever performed his promise towards you: & now henceforth he send you back again to his law. To what end? He added the reason. Behold (says he) I will send mine Angel before my face, (that is to with, John Baptist :) and when he has made ready the way, then will I come, & therefore look that he obey me. For else I must be fain to smite men, & all that withstand me must need be beaten down. This text shows how God promised Prophets, & yet notwithstanding had an eye to our Lord Jesus Christ, at whom the final conclusion & perfect working of all the prophesies amid. Yet & this was so common a thing among that Jews, that even the wretched harlot of Samaria could say, that when Messiahs came, he should teach us all things. Not only that Jews, but also that Samaritan who had but a kind of shadow of the law, and were but as Apes, knew it was office of Redeemer to give full knowledge of the things were requisite for salvation of world. Not what cause therefore is this next applied to person of Gods son, forasmuch as Prophets took their end in him and he have made a perfect conclusion of all. And our Lord Jesus Christ spoke not three years and a half, to intent to hold his peace after: but he will have his Gospel to be preached with a loud and clear voice and those whom he have ordained Ministers in his Church, should be as trumpets. According where to we hear how it is said his Gospel must be preached over all the world. And he limits no short time to it, but will have it done to worlds end. Seth it is so, we see (as I have touched before) Gods setting of this continual order in his Church, was not for laws only but also for us, so although we hear his word, and have it preached into us daily, and yet we be not disposed to learn as at his mouth: he shake us off, and banish us out of his kingdom and we be not worthy to be reckoned in the number of his servants. Thus you see what we have to mark.

But now forasmuch as this text is referred to our Lord Jesus Christ and the Prophets that were raised up before were inferiors to him and but his members: we must know also those that bear office of shepherds in his Church nowadays, are in the same degree the Prophets were, to with; compared to Jesus Christ, inferior into him. True it is they be preferred far before Prophets, as in respect that the Gospel is a higher and excellent matter than any was under the shadows of the law. But yet forasmuch Jesus Christ is head of all; he alone is to be acknowledged for moister of the household, as the apostle speak of him when he compared him with Moses. Seeing it is so then, let us mark that every doctrine is as it were excommunicated, if it respect not Jesus Christ. In deed there are many Prophets and teachers: but yet must Jesus Christ overrule also is expounded must come from him; he must have all preeminence; that the thing which the heavenly father have spoke maybe performed, namely. This is my well bellowed son, hear him. This is not spoken of any man, but only of the only son of God himself. And therefore let us learn that wheresoever's there are pastors or shepherds the bridle is not laid loose in their necks to set forth what they think good: but they be tried to his condition, that our Lord Jesus must always be their master, and alone be heard, so as nothing be set forth but in his name, and that truly. Rightly says Moses, shall obey the Prophet. As how? Not they have the authority to bind Church and to bring it into bondage: for (as S. Peter showed in his first Canonical Epistle) it behooved Prophets to speak by the spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ. And in the same respect also do S. Paul say, that it was he which led and governed the people [in the wilderness.] Although Moses bare the countenance, yet was it Jesus Christ that bare sway. Now I pray you, if a man take more authority upon him than Moses had and advance himself above him: what should a man say to it? Moses and all the Prophets are but underlings, to the end that Jesus Christ might speak: and seeing that the son of God is come, is it real that men should put forth their own dreams and dotages and that Jesus Christ should hold his peace? But the Popish Religion tended to none other end, than to put Jesus Christ to silence. The Pope boast himself to be his vicar. But howsoever the case stand, he will need make new articles of faith: to be short, the Gospel is but an Apse, if we believe the Pope: and the dotages he have devilled are the full perfection of all. For behold, they have not been ashamed to say, that the things which the Popes and their counsels have decreed, and all their gewgaws, first and pelting trash, (which yet notwithstanding are but devilish abominations to pervert the service of God:) are the things which the Apostles could not bear away, when Jesus Christ said into them, I have many things to say unto you, but you cannot carry them away as now. And what things be they? Oh they be the high Mysteries which the Pope devised about the Gospel. Like as Mahomet says his Alcoran is sovereign wisdoms so says the Pope of his own decrees: for they be the two horns of antichrist. Seth it is so, do we not see that we cannot in any wise cleave to the Pope but by renouncing Jesus Christ? Then let us bear well in mind, that seeing in God, will exalt his only son after that fashion: surely he will have us to look unto him, and that all doctrine be referred unto him, and do concern him, so as we must conclude that all such as will not speak in the Church, must utter nothing but which they have learned in school of this great schoolmaster. According whereunto he have given this commission to his Apostles, Preach the things which you have learned of me. Again, when he promises them the Holy Ghost, he says, he shall teach us all the things which you have heard of me. He send them not there to new doctrine; but says that they shall have understanding of the things which they knew not by reason of their rudeness. That is thing which we have to remember in that God attribute your sovereign authorities to his son by name, and will have all Prophets to be under that head, as well whom he had raised up before, as those whom he have set up in these days in his Church, so as this order must be kept, that he only do speak, and that all others which open their mouths, serve but to deal forth the things purely which they shall have received at his hand.

But by way, let us also this speech where it is said, it shall hearken unto him. For as God show himself freehearted; not minding to forsake his Church, but to provide the things which he know to belong to the welfare thereof: so is it good reason that we on the other side should not despite the benefit that he offer us, and impart unto us. Here of his own free goodness he bind himself to us in saying: I will raise you up a Prophet. And on the other part he exacted a covenant, in commanding us to receive benefit as it deserve and to make our profit of it. Therefore see that you obey. Wherefore let us mark, that when god have allured us to him so gently and after so fatherly manner, that he is ready to speak to us as it were mouth to mouth: he will not have us to give him deaf care, or to run gadding away, and to despise or mark him. It is not for us to think that God will bear such unthankfulness and contempt of his word: for me revenge thereof will be horrible as shall be declared in due place. But in the mean while let us go willingly to our Lord Jesus Christ, who is sent into us in the name of God his father and protested that he will reach us his hand to lead us to endless salvation. Therefore let us hear him, not only to say, it is true that he speak; but also to give our hearts into him. For the hearing that he required, is that all wisdom be beaten down, so as men be not puffed up with vain self-winding, as if they would say, I will do what I list: but that we hearken to our master which is given us from heaven, and that all our affections be subdued to him, and that all our affections be subdued to him, and that our lust be over cropped when they would carry us here and there, so as Jesus Christ may reign howsoever the world goes, and that both great and small may know how to them it is that God speak. For as touching the great ones, it is said unto them in the second psalm, Kiss the sonny kinds and Princes of the earth: do homage to the son of God who he have sent into you. Now if our Lord will have all highness to stoop after that fashion under the sovereign domination of our Lord Jesus Christ: (accordingly also as S. Paul says, that the preaching of the Gospel serve to pull down all loftiness that will need be exalted:) What shall become of these wretched worms. When they disdain to receive the Gospel obediently?

Let us mark then that here is no exception, and that Gods intent is to bring all the world to his lure. For if it be so that the Angels must worship Jesus Christ, and reverence his Gospel: seeing then that we be but creatures, not only moral, but also slight full, and such as have nothing in them but corruption: what should we do when our Lord is so gracious to us, as not only to raise up men to speak to us in his name; but also to send us his only son, by whom the doctrine is so authorized, as it cannot be doubted of any more. Seeing we be at point, what should we do but resort to our God, forsaking all things that may hinder our obedience towards him, yeah and even our own wits, lusts, and affections everyone? Having laid all those things down and having subdued them, let us come to the thing that is sold us here: which is, that we must obey the Prophets. Also let us not provoke our god to anger by using such shameless hypocrisy as to say, Oh I will obey God, as we see a number of the Papists do which say, rust, I am a good Catholic. And even among us (without going any further) how many are there to be found which boast themselves like shameless harlots, as for me I would have the gospel and yet for all that, they can find in their hearts to spit at it? But we must not think that God accepted such protestations, unless we desire unfriendly to be governed by his hand. For the doing where so let us understand that there is but only one mean, which is to obey Gods word. For he separate not his majesty from declaration of his right sourness and justice which he have set forth into us. The things that are contained in the law, the Prophets and the Gospel, are his lively image. Will we then obey our God and be subject to him? Let us go to that which he declared and there show the obedience which we owe him. And first he showed himself so gracious and freehearted towards us as to call us to our salvation: let us also on our side anywhere him again.

Now let us fall down before the majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us to feel them, as we may with true repentance seek to be reformed by his holy spirit, that we may follow his holy commandments, and also that it may please him to bear with us and to bury all our offence until he have clothed us with his own righteousness and ride us of all the imperfections wherewith we be now environed. And so let us all say, Almighty God heavenly father and etcetera.

On Monday, the 2nd of December 1555
The 109th Sermon, which is the third upon the
eighteenth chapter

We have seen how our Lord to make his word prevail among the laws, have willed them to put away all superstitions from among them. For in very deed the truth of God cannot be coupled with Satan's lies and corruptions: we must be either altogether the ones or altogether the others. Also I have declared into you, that this order of Preaching Gods word, must be observed to the worlds end. In doing whereof I have reserved hitherto the declaring of the several forts of the superstitions that are set down here: first of all it is said that the laws must not wake their children to pass through fire. And you may be taken two ways. For we know they were carried away such rage, they burnt their children in sacrifice and was a terrible thing. But you may see how foolish devotion of men is, when they estrange themselves from God. Needs must they be barest of all human sense, and needs must the devil process them and drive them into such fury as is horrible to all men. Yet notwithstanding, this mischief befell among the Jews, that they sacrificed their children to Moloch. But there was yet another fashion of making their children to go through the fire, whereof Moses does rather speak in this place, according to the observing thereof among the heathen. They learned it a manner of purging or cleansing when they used such Ceremonies. As for example, there have remained some remnant thereof in the Pope dome, in their Bonfires on Midsummer night. They had such a kind of witchy as they did be are themselves in hand, that it was a kind of purging to go take the air of that holy fire (as they esteemed it) in going about it. But our Lord put such superstitions among the number of enhancements. Likewise the papists have their holy water: and what else is that than a kind of cleansing invented by themselves to set against baptism, which is the true sign thereof? Then let us mark well that here our Lord condemned all manner of purging or cleansing which me devise f their own brain, when they will be cleansed by any other mean than he have ordained , which is, by the only sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by receiving the records and affiances of the same by the Sacraments. True it is that the Sacraments of themselves have not this power in them to make men clean: it is not the water of baptism was away our sins before God: but it is a figure that puts us in mind of the truth and substance, which seal in us the thing that was brought to pass by the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ. Thus much concerning this one point, that here our Lords meaning is that men should not invent means or fashions of purging themselves, but be concerned with that which he have ordained in his law.

Also he speak of such as have regard of the flying of birds, and observe times. Although it be lawful for us to make the courses of the times according to the stars: yet is it a cursed superstition well worthy to be condemned, when we go beyond the order of nature. The measuring of the year by the course of the sun is according to God rule. So likewise is the measuring of the nonetheless by the course of the moon, and the observing of the other things which God have set in all the planets and stars. For it is not said for naught that God have ordained the sun and moon to do us service: but yet therewithal they have a kind of government over the day and night: and thereof spring the difference of times, as is said thereof. Then if men hold themselves within those bounds, no evil will come of it: but if they range without them, and fall to inventing of other things beyond the ordinary course of nature: then it is devilish superstition, like as that is which men call indicial astrology. For there are a great sort of fantastical persons nowadays, which will take upon them to tell men's fortunes by the disposition of the stars. Such a one (say they) shall come to such an end: or else if he take his journey on such a day, such a thing shall beside him, because such a planet reign and have his aspect to the tail of such a one. Again if a man be born under such an aspect, then must he die after such a sort. When men invent things after this fashion beyond God limitation, they be but devilish devils to corrupt the order of nature. Therefore let us make well that here Moses forbid all such divinations as are made upon the time: not meaning but that we should have respect of winter and summer, that we should sow and reap, that we should dress our since according to the season of the moons, and as we see that opportunity will serve: for otherwise it were an utter undoing of all things, and an abolishing of the order that God have set. But his meaning is that men should not through their fond and wicked desires, pass the bounds which God have appointed. So then let us keep ourselves to this plainness that God have set down.

Moreover, whereas he speak of divination by the flight of birds: it was too common a vice among the heath, as I said before. When they were to take anything in hand, they went gassing abroad in the air, and they might not conclude upon anything, till they had seen some bird flying. And there were three or four of them, or if they came from the east or north, they took them by and by for signs: and that was cursed kind of divination. For why? We must hold it for a general rule, that we marry all when we draw God's creatures to any other use than he have ordained them into. Let us make (say I) after what manner God will have his creatures to be used. For as soon as we turn from that point, such disguising of his works is a cursed corruption of them. God have not created the birds to speak into us by their flying from one place to another, nor to the end that we should make account whether thereby four or five of them, or take their flying out of this coast or that coast to be a token of evil luck. These are stark witchery, forged by men out of their own fond curiosity, and blown into their ears by Satan. And therefore let us not marvel though our Lord have forbidden us such things: for as soon as we happen to be imbrued such superstitions and polices, we must need be turned away from Gods truth. Yeah and there follow just punishment upon such curious persons, so as they be ever doubtful and in perplexity.

For in as much as they resort to dead creatures, or to such creatures as have no reason nor understanding; they must need be always uncertain. But if we fear our God; we shall be sure of all things. The fear of God is the best hold that we can have. I mean such a reverend fear of GOD, as therewithal we take him for our father. For if we be against at him, we shall still be in never the less anguish and uniqueness. But if we submit ourselves to God for love; surely his protection shall avail us to rest upon, so as we may defy Satan and all that he practices against us. On the contrary part, when we fear not god, we shall be afraid both of the birds and of the beasts of the wind and of the rain, of the sun and of the moon, of the earth and of the heaven; and to be sort even our own shadows (as men say) shall make us afraid. And as for them which submit themselves to the sun and moon and make idols of them as though they had dominion over us: all such do show in deed that they have no fear of god in them, and therefore needs must they be carried away anew. And that is the cause why the Prophet Jeremy expressly forbid us to be afraid of the signs of the heaven, at least wise according to the enhancements which the insides have invented, as is said already. For if we be afraid of them after manner, we bereave god of his dominion, and impart it to the stars and other dead creatures. But god will have the sun and the moon to give us light, and to do us service with their natural use, (as the sun to heat the earth and the moon and the stars to give their influences:) I say he will have all these so to keep their natures and proprieties; as that he himself alone be the governor notwithstanding. For when we imagine that the sun or the moon have such power over us, that we cannot go one step without they bring us some misadventure or prosperity by their aspects towards us: is not god himself so much debased? Yes verily. If it be said that god work by his creatures: that is true: but yet will be not do it after that fashion. We must have an eye to the mean which he had held, and we must not go beyond that. And therefore as many as rend Gods dominion in peace and impart it so to the lifeless creatures, are strake mad, and it is good reason that they should always be as men in a trance or affrighted, & not know where to become. Wherefore let us learn to put ourselves in such wise under the hand& guiding of our God: as we fall not to passing beyond the course of nature. That is the thing which we have to remember here.

As touching the other kinds, indeed a man might distinguish the, as many have labored to do: but it is enough for us to understand that here is mention made of Enchanters, Sorcerers, Caulkers, workers and Familiars, and of such as ask counsel as the dead. As concerning Enchanters, they be not these Jugglers that blur men's eyes with sleight of hand, and make men believe they do the things which they do not: but the dual has such dominion over the unbelievers, that although a thing be not done in very deed; yet the illusion is such, as makes men believe they see that which they see not. And so it is a kind of Enchantment, that is to say of devilish illusion, when a man shall be made to think that one is transformed into a wolf, or that he sees the shape of a thing that has no substance or truth indeed. Now it is demanded whether such things can be done or no. and why not? We have an example in Pharos sorcerers, who made frogs to come up as well as Moses did: not that the/devil has anything in his own power: for we must not imagine that he can fight against God to do aught whether he will or no: we know he is under Gods hand, & can do nothing without leave or license. He may well attempt much, but yet can he not stir one finger, as we would say. And hereof we have example evident enough in Iob: for we see why the devil is there among the Angels, that is to say, that he is sane to come yield an account before Gods seat, and to have leave of him, and to be admitted. As much is said when God will have Achab to be beguiled for his Idolatry, we see then how the scripture sheweth that the devil has not a several dominion by himself, as though he could attempt anything against God. But yet by permission he may indeed trouble the air, and also do other things, after which manner God is said to send tempests & hails. And by whom des he it? By the wicked Angels. For he speak not there of the heavenly Angels, but of the devils by name, which execute Gods vengeance upon men. And therefore let us mark, that (as experience also shew) devils may work many such illusions by enchantments. And truly such things are not done but in the dark. For so long as we be enlightened by GOD, we need not fear that a man shall seem a wolf to us, or that such crush crash shall get the upper hand of us. But if we be faithless, it is a just reward for our quenching of light should have shown into us, & of our turning of our backs into God. And when we will not be ruled by him, then discern we no more between white and black, but men seem into us to be wolves, and all things are out of order, & that justly. Therefore whereas here is mention made of such as mishap things by their enchantments: Let us note the law is not superstitious. For such case stand so, it is to be concluded such things may befall, as whereof we have examples.

But yet for all that, it is abominable before God: and so likewise are Soothsayers. It is quest whether it be possible for men to foretell of things, for it is Gods office to fore know things to come: and how then may it belong to the devil? Sure it is (as says prophet Esau) that idols can foresee nothing. And as for Satan, he must always need to be the father of lies, & deceive all such as ask counsel of him. Yet not withstanding God does now & then suffer Satan to tell of things to come, and is for the more hardening of such as will not obey the truth, (as we have seen by example in the thirteenth chapter) & it has been treated of partly already. Yet not withstanding it is true also, that soothsayers do lie most commonly. And by that means our Lord deluded them to seek counsel of Satan after fashion. And beside let us not think it strange, though enchanters, soothsayers, such other like do now & then tell of things to come: for it is god's just sufferance, to intent they should be deeper plunged in error. For as much as they would needs be willingly deceived, he let them be so, why they may perish. Thus we see why the law was made concerning such as divine of things to come. Also he speaks of Sorcerers: And this sort continues many things: For what a sin is it, that men should forsake God, and give themselves over to Satan? Must they not needs fall into horrible confusion? Yes: For after Satan has once possessed us and stopped us and stopped our eyes, and that God has withdrawn his light from us, so as we be destitute of his holy spirit, and void of all reason: then follow infinite abuses without end or measure. And thereof come sorceries. Many incredible things are reported of Sorcerers. And truly when we hear them spoken of, we ought not only to dislike of them, but also be sorrowful in our hearts, yes & the very hairs of our head ought to stand up thereat. Buy yet therewithal we must confident that they be revengements of God east upon such as have forsaken him. And that the same may be a cause to hold us in awe and fear, let us learn not to tempt our God nor to play with him, sit we see men become so brutish after they be once turned away from the right path. Truly if there were no more but two or three examples hereof; yet might it well seem strange to us. But we know that in all ages and in all Nations Sorcery or witchcraft has born sway, yes and that more sway for that rejecting of Gods truth. Insomuch that where men have once fallen to withstanding that truth & have disdained to be taught by the pure word of God; there have followed the more illusions of Satan, yes and the more excessive, which have also been the more manifest and grievous. And whereof comes this, but of the cause which Saint Paul show us in his epistle to the Thessalonians? namely that such as will not obey the truth, are utterly perverted by leasing: and that then forth the devil must need work with the greater force, because God give him the bridle to carry men so saw as they become ugly monsters. To be short, we must bear in mind, that whereas God speaks to us of enchantments and sorceries, it is to hold us short under the obedience of his word, least we should fall into such a maze as the wretched Insides are in, yes and proceed so far as to wander quite away, when we have once forsaken his word. Therefore let us abide in this simplicity of obeying him and of submitting ourselves to his mouth.

Also here is mention made of workers with Familiars. As touching the which, need must Satan's illusions be horrible. But what? There have been of them in all ages, and we see a notable example thereof in king Saul when he went to the Witch. He asking had rest forbidden all enchantments and all kind of damnable crafts, and he had behaved himself virtuously in executing Gods law. And yet in the end he became so wretched, that he fell to running after a Witch. And what was that cause thereof, but that he despised God? Whereupon in the end he sell into despair, and gave himself over altogether to Satan: which thing he showed full well. For if ye look advisedly into the matter, he shall find that Satan's illusions do then get the upper hand of men, when there with be amazed by reason of sorrowfulness that gnaw them inwardly, & for that instead of receiving some comfort of God's word, they be overwhelmed with such anguish, that they fall into utter despair. When does Satan meet a man in some bodily shape, and tangle him in his snares? When a man is in some grease of mind, or in some hatred against his neighbor, or when a woman spite her husband. Well then, although such affections bear sway, yet does not God by and by give Satan the bridle, to reign over men, until they become to such extremity that they fall to chewing upon the bit, and become so willful in their sorrow, that they fall into despair and will no more admit any comfort, but refuse all remembrance of GOD, and would that his name were buried: for there is the gate open to Satan, and he enters to work his illusions, which a man is not able to withstand. Hereof we have a fair warning in Saul. For he had offended God, and therefore was to be benefit of his kingdom, because it was Gods pleasure it should be so, and there was none other shift for him but to humble himself. But he would not do that. And when he saw there was no mean to appeal Gods displeasure, but that for all his flattering of Samuel, yet he awaked so little thereby, that when he had rent the Prophets Cote, the Prophet said to him, even so will God rend the kingdom from you: he cried out and stand himself out of his bounds saying thus: What should I do more? Seeing that God has forsaken me, I also on my side must forsake him. And what was the end hereof? He went after Witches. Whereas he had punished enchanter before; now he goes to seek them. And what came of it? Samuel was showed him in a shape, that is to say in a shadow and imagination, so as he thought the Prophet to have been raised up again by means of the Witch. Sit we see it befell thus to such a king as God had chosen, and to whom he had given the sacred authority, till the kingdom of David were set up: what shall we say to it? Let us apply it to such instruction as I have touched already, to make us live in fear. For when men do feel themselves after that sort in evil, and willfully shrink away from God: Satan must need take possession of them, and then is there not anything impossible to him. We shall hear incredible things reported of Witches, and w must not marvel though God execute so exceeding great vengeance. For when men have once turned their backs upon him, and forsaken him even of willful malice: they must need become stark beasts.

Finally here is mention made of such as ask counsel of the dead. For it is not our Lords will that we should have anything to do with the dead. Therefore they that use such conjurations, goes about to pervert the whole order of nature. For do men what they can, yet can they not bring the living and the dead together: but the devil steps in between them and pretended the persons of the dead, so as to outward seeming, the dead man himself appeared (as was not long since rehearsed) whereas in very deed it is the dwell that worked such illusions. And therefore let us mark well, that seeing our Lord had forbidden us to have to do with the dead, we cannot be deceived so long as we keep within our bounds, and attempt not anything which we see not be comprised within the order which he had set. And thereby we see also, that all the things ever have been said of coming up again of dead men's ghosts, have been but sleights of Satan: & when man have been beguiled by that it was all one as if they had willfully yielded themselves slaves to Satan. And yet was it held for great devotion of Popery. The cause why they made pilgrimages, and Masses to be sung, and their feast of all souls to be kept one a year, was by reason of a Revolution or dream of some devotee Monk that had an idle head. He heard crying of dead men's souls: and thereupon the Papists concluded, that a solemn feast was to be kept for the dead, & such and such things were to be done for them. To be short, in that man have invented service for the dead in the Pope dome, that was nothing else but mere witchery, even such as God disliked in this text and utterly abhorred. And all they have their devotion after fashion to pray for dead, are witches and sorcerers: for they believe in Satan's enchantments in despite of God.

And now let us mark that these things here are not noted as small & tolerable faults: but it is said expressly, that they be abominable before God, & that the people of Canaan were to be rooted out for such crimes & misdeeds. Whereby we see although other vices were to be pardoned, yet ought this to be punished and utterly rooted out. Therefore if we will be taken for Gods people, let us see that we understand what this word Abomination be token: namely we must be very ware of sorceries, enchantments, & such other like things. And indeed we see how such things have ever been mis-looked, even among beaten. How much forever witchcraft had reigned, yet was it a great thing for a man to have asked, is this well done? For every man would have said, how so? It is a monster; it is a shameful and cursed thing. After manner did the heathen speak thereof. For it was Gods will it should be engrave in men's hearts, as it might be reprov'd even without do shrine of the law. True it is in Popery all are witches in their idolatries: for my fifteenth of the first book of Samuel, God couple those two sins together: yeah and I have told you already the service of dead is a kind of witchcraft. Yet not withstanding they always adhere term, and utterly dislike thereof. And why? Because God have suffered it to make the more inexcusable. So then let us make it is not for us to suffer their enchanters or witches among us. And if these be forbidden; we must understand there with all, all other kinds of Wizardry are deadly crimes before God. And if judges and Magistrates do their duties, it is certain they will no more bear with them than with murders. It seems a small fault to turn about five (as we term it in this country): but it is more worthy to be punished, than seeking of a man quick. For why? It is an overthrowing of Gods service, and a perverting of order of nature. Were it not worthy of punishment and punishment again, if the order of nature should be confounded between men and bruit beasts? Were there any reason in so doing? And surely when men begin with such enchantments, it is certain they fall into a deeper and dreadful dungeon, than if they give over their bodies to company with the bruit beasts. And yet we see the self same illusions to be wrought by Satan upon all witches and forcers. And what is the original cause thereof, but that they be turned away from Gods truth? Although there were no further evil in it than the attributing of Gods office into Satan: yet were it a matter in no wise to be born with. There is a thing concealed from me, and I would know it: yeah, but God is not minded to discover it into this. That's no matter, I will find it out by some means or other though he say nay to it, yeah I will have understanding of it by devilish illusion. Is it not a making of war against God, if this be suffered? So then let us make, that if we will be taken for Christians: Witchcrafts, enchantments and such other like things must be less born with among us, than Robberies and murders.

Also it ought to make indeed the hairs to stand up upon our heads, when it is said the head then which were never trained up in the law, were rained out because of such things. For if God pardoned not insides which never had any knowledge of his truth: what shall become of us are so well warned, to whom God create aloud, that he will not suffer it, and that such abominations stink before him, and that we must be cleansed from them, or else he utterly disclaimed us? I pray you shall we hope to be spared, when we lie still asleep, having such warning from heaven? God must first give over his office. Again, whereas it is set down here, first that God cannot away with such abominations, and secondly have showed in effect what punishment shall include upon it, by rooting out those that rebelled not wistfully against him, but had ever been hardened in their superstitions, and never knew he tasted of good doctrine: seeing that such are rooted out for having to do with Satan: it stander us in hand to take the better heed, and to learn to withhold ourselves in such wise from all illusions and wiles, that if there be either forever, witch or wizard among us, they be lively repressed. If there be a poison or a thief; every man runs upon him. For it is known that they be the common enemies of mankind which do so pervert all law, and in devour to abolish all policy and order of nature. But these are much worse. For God have commanded that his word should reign among us: and ought not every one of us to be diligent preventing the mischief when the devil goes about to overthrow all and to bring all things to horrible confusion? Verily it is not to be doubted but that because man superstitions are suffered, God also do give Satan head, to overwhelm us altogether. We worth them that have plaid the blind buzzards, and would see nothing, but have suffered the mischief to settle among us. For it must needs increase more and more, until it come to the top, and that we be so far and so deeply plunged in it, as it is impossible for us to get out again. That is thing which we have to remember upon this Text.

And further let us make well, that whereas Moses says here, that the laws must not do so; but that they must give care to God Prophecy: it is according to that which I have expounded already: namely that forasmuch as God have given us so good remedy by being taught at his mouth, it is good reason that we should hearken into him. If we had no witness of Gods will it were half an excuse for us, to sledge, yeah but should we know nothing? The insides have means to find out things by their illusions. True it is that they server idols: but yet are they in better case than we be. After this manner might we speak. But our Lord tell us, that we shall have teaching enough, if we list to hearken to his word. He added that he will raise up Prophets from among us. As if he should say into us, Wretched men, seeing that I am so gracious to you as to condescend to your rudeness and infirmity, and to speak to you by the mouths of men: are not too unthankful and malicious in turning away from my doctrine, to Satan trash, so as you cannot find in your hearts to acquaint your selves with the manner of teaching which I have chosen as fit and convenient for you? Then is it not superfluous that God says here, that he will raise up a Prophet from among us which shall be one of our breath. Indeed we could well find in our hearts that the Angels should come down from heave to speak into us: but our deciding thereof, spring of a foolish lust. For as shall be showed more fully hereafter people of Israel having found by experience what it was to hear Gods voice in his heavenly mainstay: were so afraid, that they besought God to speak to them by the mouth of Moses. Now then, if the choice were put into us, it is certain that we should ever find it best for us that God should speak into us by the mouths of me. And it was known to be so: as we have seen heretofore, and as God himself avoweth there against, saying: I like well of the people's request, that there should be a man between them and me, and that there should be a man to bring them word from me in my name. and so here our Lord upbraids men with their unthankfulness, in that they will not receive his word when it is brought them by the Prophets and teachers whom he has appointed and placed in his Church. If he had said, I will send mine Angels; it had been much. But we see how men abuse even the heavenly revelations also. God therefore applied himself so much and more into us and came down one step lower into us, in he says, I will raise you up a Prophet from among your breath. Now we see that God comes so familiarly into us and speaks with us as it were mouth to mouth: were we not worse than mad, if we should say I would that God would send me his Angels, I would he would work some miracles, I would he would send me some revelations, or raise me up the dead and tell me some news of the things that are done in the other world? Needs must it be we be driven by the devil, when we have so inordinate desires. For behold our God intends to teach us familiarly. After what manner? I will raise up men. Now seeing we be won't to be fellow like one another: what a privilege does he give us in applying himself so into us? We be liars by nature, we be full of vanity and yet does God appoint us to be preachers of his word, and messengers of his infallible truth: he appointed men as his instruments to speak in his name.

And so let us bear in mind, that when God granted us the grace to have his word faithfully expounded into us, and to have shepherds to teach us: it is such a privilege as ought well to hold us in such singleness of faith, that all curiosity be laid away among us. And none of us be led with fond desires, as they be which are ever seeking and never attain to the knowledge of the truth. Let us before (I say) we be not such questioners, and disputers of this and that: and let it suffice us to hear our God speak, alluring ourselves that he have so rarified that order as we need not to doubt but that is the very way to be taught by him. For (as shall be declared more fully hereafter) let us make that whereas our God have rarified his law: yet to end it should be held also left us the Prophets, and that the Gospel have yet had a more full approbation when it was published. For at that time (as is said by the Prophet Haggis) God shook; not only the early, but also the heaven. And therefore when we come to hear the doctrine that is drawn out of the law as out of the very fountain, and out of the Prophets, and out of the Gospel which is perfection of all our wisdom when we take that touchstone to try the things that are set before us; and are desirous to be taught of God: Let us not doubt but we stand upon a sure ground, and shall have whatsoever, is needful for our salvation, and therefore let us leave all unprofitable speculations; to such as cannot find in their hearts to be taught in Gods school; and let it suffice us that our Lord speak not to us by halves, nor as it were to leave us hanging in the air that we might know never the more what to do: but that he give us such a knowledge as we may be thoroughly assured, and lately rest upon the salvation of our souls. This see how we should put this text in, tarrying till the rest may be laid forth more fully.

Now let us fall down before the majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make us feel the better than we have done and we may more and more be drawn to him such repentance forsaking all our own lusts our whole desires may be to be governed by him, and to be held in such a way to him, as we may not either to the right hand or the left, by withdrawing ourselves from his obedience, but that seeing he has once showed us the way of salvation, we may never turn away from it for any practice of Satan, how so ever he seek to blind our eyes with his illusions & enchantments, nor be suffered by our good God to fall into his snares, to be trapped by him, & in the end to be swallowed up and drowned; but we be so enlightened by holy Ghost, as we may Shun and eschew all Satan's allurements, which tend but to our ruin. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people and Nations of the earth et cetera.

On Tuesday, the 3rd of December 1555
The 110th Sermon, which is the fourth upon the
eighteenth Chapter

16 According to all that thou desired of the Lord your God at Horeb, in the day of the assembly, when thou said, Let me henceforth hear the voice of the Lord my God no more, nor see this great fire any more, least I die.

17 And the Lord said into me, they have done well, to say so:

18 I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like into you: and I will put my words in his mouth, and he shall speak into them, all that I command him to say.

19 And it shall come to pass, that whoever obeys not my words that he and I will put my words that he shall speak in my name, I will call him to a account for it.

20 But the Prophet that shall presume to speak words in my name, which I have not commanded him to speak, or which speak in the name of the other gods: that Prophet shall die for it.

After that God has declared that he will govern his church by means of his words preached by men: he added that the same is done at request of the people themselves. As who should say, that they which will not obey that doctrine of the law, are double guilty. For they despite the majesty of God: and that is too outrageous a rebellion. And besides that, they be also thankless, in that God used them after their own desire. For how was the Law published? Did not God give signs of his presence as though he had come down from heaven, and spoken visible to the Jews? But they perceiving that Gods glory amazed them and made them at their right end, desired to have some Prophet to speak to them, and to bring his messages to them: which thing was granted into them. Now if they cannot like of the condition that they themselves required: what excuse is there for them? We see then what the meaning of Moses was, in saying that GOD would raise up Prophets from time to time among Jews, yeah even according to their own request, as who should say that nothing could be better for them. Such it is so, it was for them to hold them to that order. For if they could not abide the thing that was granted them at their own request; what a thing were that? Should they not show themselves utterly intractable and unruly?

Moreover it behoove us to way yet better the circumstances that are set down here, namely according to all shall thou desired as Horeb. God thinks it not enough to say that it came of the Jews themselves to desire a Prophet: but he does also show that he condescended in all points to their desire. For the Gentler that God showed himself towards us, and the more he fashioned himself to our nature: the more are we bound into him: and if we draw not high into him, surely we be double to blame. We hear how S; Paul said, Brother, be as I am, for I desire not but to be as you are. If a speak after manner, shall he not be heard? If God then shall appear in his glory, and shall say: that having pity of us, he will for our sake stoop down & debase himself; and we here upon remain hard hearted, & cannot no hand bow ourselves to obey him: must it not needs follow, that we are utterly void of all sense, and why the devil has so blinded us, that there is no more natural understanding in us? Yes: For it must need be a horror to us, not to follow our God when he showed us such example. Who are we that our GOD should as it were transform himself (as we see he make himself both a father and a mother, and a nurse towards us,) and that we on our side should hold scorn to bow any which into him? Thus we see what we have to mark upon this saying, where Moses tell us that God gave his people all that they desired of him.

But there with all we must also remember the fearfulness of the people. It is said, Let us not hear the voice of our God any more nor see this great fire any more, for fear lead we die. I have told you already know it was Gods will to authorize his Law by doing the miracles that were seen at mount Horeb. And it was meant that the Law should be ratified after that fashion, to the intent men might know that Moses devised it not of his own head, nor added anything to it of his own: but that God was the author thereof. When the trumpets founded in the air, when the sky was on a fire, when the great thunders were heard, and when the order of nature was changed: the Jews ought well to have understood, that God showed himself to be their governor, and that the Law came of him, and that he avowed it to be his. He sees then that that was as a seal to make the Law of God to be of authority. But there was yet another reason; which was that God meant to make the Jews perceive that the Law could do them no good, but only make them at their wits ends, I mean the Law so far forth as it shows us the rule to live well. For whereas God commands us to do the things that he allows; indeed it is the way of life and welfare. But what are we? We have a forward nature: and instead of obeying and of behaving ourselves as becomes us; we cease not to offend God. Now he pronounces his curse upon all such as transgress his commandments. All of us therefore are condemned by the Law, and there is no remedy but God gave at that setting forth of his Law, should be terrible, and that the people should be made afraid with them. And in the same respect does S. Paul say that we receive not the spirit of fearfulness in the Gospel; & after the same manner also is it spoken of in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Also here is a third reason alleged by Moses, which is, that God men's so show how it was good for the maintenance of the Church, that men should be seen bringers of the doctrine of salvation. For surely, God knowing that the best way to govern us, was by sending us Prophets and reaches to speak to us in his name: would that the people also should know the profit there of. True it is, that whenever God speaks we ought to bow down our necks and yield him such reverence, as none of us refuse to obey him, though he speaks to us by the mouths of mortal men. Yet notwithstanding, his meaning is not that his word should but only have such majesty among us as to make us afraid: but that it should receive it with a free heart, and take pleasure in it, and know that to rest upon it is our sovereign welfare. So then, Gods intent was to make men desirous to be taught by the Prophets and preachers whom he would send to them. And that is the thing which Moses touches in this present place.

Now then, we must understand first of all, that our Lord will not come down from heaven visible to speak to us: for that were not for our benefit. Indeed many men are of that mind that they would fain have God to send them his Angels: and they think it a matter of no great authority that a man which is but a frail creature and but an earthen pot, should go up into the pulpit: but yet does God know it to be for our behoove. And therefore we must understand that forasmuch as the Jews found by experience that it was a dreadful thing to them to hear God speaks: it behooved God to alter that manner of declaring himself, and to send Moses to them. Therewithal let us mark also that Gods authorizing of the Law was not for the Jews only; but to the end that we also at this day should receive the same with all humbleness, and understand that whosoever despite of the living God, and makes war against him. That is the thing which we have to remember where mention is made of the terribleness of Gods voice, and of the fire that filled the air. And thereupon let us mark (as has been treated of already), that God promised a Prophet, not only to the Jews, but also to us; and that it is a continual order in his Church. So then, will we be reckoned for the children of God? Let us suffer ourselves to be governed by his word. Yeah, and let us not hold scorn to hear men that speaks to us in his name. but although they be from among us and of our own company, so as we might allege that we owe them no such duty as in respect of their persons: yet notwithstanding seeing they be set in Gods stead, and by his will; let that suffice us. And if we intend to honor God, and to have him to reign over us: it behooves us to show it in this case, by yielding such obedience to his word, as those whom he sends to us be heard of us. And hereof we see what is said by the Prophet Esau. For like as Moses had foretold that God would raise up a Prophet: so that Prophet Esau says that at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in the time of his reign, God would put his word into his mouth, & into the mouth of his seed, and on his children's children. This thing then ceased not when that Gospel was published throw that would: but rather it was newly confirmed, as I have also showed before. For who was this Prophet, but our Lord Jesus Christ? True it is that in that saying are comprehended all the Prophets from Moses to Zachariah and his fellows. But yet did GOD restore all the propheties in our Lord Jesus Christ, which had been as it were broken off for a time. For the Jews had been bereft of that benefit a long time together, and GOD had not appeared to them any more as he had been won't to do before. And the reason was, to the end they should with the earnest desire look for the Messiahs that had been promised them, and understand that he should bring them the full perfection of all wisdom. Our Lord Jesus therefore is now come to perform all Propheties, and to make such a restitution as men might perceive that God had then laid forth the treasure most bountifully: which he had spoken of afore by Moses. And this was not done a lonely for our Lord Jesus Christ himself as S. Paul shows in the fourth to the Ephesians, where he said that Jesus Christ being gone up into heaven, has provided from the state of his Church to the end that it might be maintained by the foresaid mean, ordering some to be Apostles, some Prophets, some shepherds, and some teachers. To be short, it is the will of Jesus Christ, to execute his office by the mouths of those whom he orders to be ministers among his faithful. And herein is accomplished the for alleged text of Esau, that the seed of Jesus Christ and his children's children shall have the word in their mouth at this day. God said not, I will cause it to be preached to you by mine Angels: What faith he then? I will put my word into your mouth. Indeed our Lord Jesus is set there in highest degree: but yet there follows; and into the mouth of your seed, and of your children's children. Then let us conclude, that even to the worlds end, if we will be members of our Lord Jesus Christ, and (to be short) if we will be taken for Christians: we must hearken to the word which God putts into men's mouths, when so ever it is preached to us.

And in that respect it is said, that the man which will not hear the Prophet, shall die without release. Here God thinks it not enough to have exhorted the Jews to receive his word with meek and lowly minds: but also threaten them, because things are never so well ordered among men, but that there is some encountering and rebelling. Our Lord therefore is fain to use here some rigor. Which thing he does, saying: Look to your selves, for my sending of Prophets to you is to your benefit, and it were as much ease for me to make my voice ring from heaven: but I know what is meekest for you, and you yourselves have fond by experience that it is most for your behoove. Therefore see that he hear my word, and receive it meekly, and submit your selves to me with all mildness. And hereto also does S. James lead us, saying that if we will be edified by Gods word, we must be meek. And as the earth that shall receive seed to yield fruit, must first be well tilled: even so the true preparation that God requires of us, is to humble ourselves: for our Lord Jesus began at the same end. Howbeit forasmuch as there are some so blockish, that they cannot be moved by gentleness: therefore is this threatening added, wherein our Lord declares that if we despise his word when it is brought us so by men, such a fault shall not scope unpunished: for I will require a reckoning thereof, says he. As if he should say, indeed it may well be that such contempt shall be let alone, and not once thought upon in the world: but yet shall I continue still to warrant my word, and he must come to account before me though he be scalped the hands of men. And this is to be well marked. For when our Lord will have men to obey him, he said not singly, he that will not obey my word; but he that will not hear the Prophets whom I send. For we see many nowadays which protest that they be ready to submit themselves to God; but yet in the mean while they cannot find in their hearts to yield him obedience in respect of his Law, or in respect of the holy scripture, or also in respect of the holy scripture, or also in respect of the order of the Church. He shall see a sort of scoffers which will needs be taken for good Catholics, but as for sermons, they let them alone, and they think them to be superfluous. And if they chance to come to any, it is but in a ceremony, and for fashions sake, as men term it: so as if it were not for shame of me, they would never come at the Church. He shall never hear that they be desirous to be taught: and what Christianity is that? Contrariwise we hear how it is said here, that God will have us to hearken to him. As how? They can say well enough that they be willing to obey. But he adds who so ever hears not the Prophets whom I send. I have showed already that seeing God has set this order in his Church: it ought to be held as inviolable. Therefore whomsoever he be that makes none account of Sermons, here forth to them; does show himself to be a rebel against God. Who says so? Even he himself. We need not got to reasoning thereupon. For our Lord tells us that all such as will not quietly submit themselves to the order which he has appointed, are rebels against him. He see then that the thing which we have to mark here in the first place, is that we must not seek starting holes to deceive

God withal; for if we desire that he should reign over us, the men that have the charge and office to speak to us both great and small must frame themselves thereafter.

Moreover let us proceed to his comparison which the Apostle makes in the Epistle to the Hebrews. For he shows (as true is) that Moses and his fellow Prophets were but servants. The master himself is come: and that is the only son of GOD, who has superiority over the whole Church, and he speaks by his Gospel: which is a man despite he is not to be born withal. He that transgressed the Law of Moses was stoned to death as we have seen before. But now our Lord Jesus speaks more lively in the Gospel: and shall men make no account of hearing him? Let us mark then that all such as strive nowadays against the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, offend much more grievously, and shall be punished more rigorously, because they spite God openly, as though they protested in effect, that they passed not to provoke him to battle, and to deface his majesty utterly. Therefore let us bear in mind, that as of as the Gospel is preached to us, it is all one as if the son of God speaks to us himself: and therefore that he ought much rather to be heard than Moses. True it is that the Law is of God likewise, and it was given by the very spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ. But as now we stand upon the means that God has used in the Law and the Gospel. For the more that our Lord has uttered his glory, the more ought we to be provoked to submit ourselves into him: and that is done in the Gospel. Wherefore let us conclude that as now we must have a greater regard to hearken to the things that are brought us and set forth into us in the name of our God, than our forefathers had in the time of the law. And that is the thing which our Lord Jesus meant by this saying, that John Baptist excelled all the prophets, so as there was never any man that had so excellent an office as he had and, and yet that the least of them which preach the Gospel nowadays, excellent John Baptist. Jesus Christ speak not there of the holiness of men's persons: but magnifies the doctrine of salvation on which is preached to us at this day, in so much that John Baptist was preferred before all the Prophets, as in respect that he brought the tidings that the Redeemer was come.

But we proceed yet further; for we show that our Lord Jesus has performed his mediator ship in reconciling us to God his father; that his death and passion are the everlasting sacrifice whereby perfect righteousness is purchased to us; that all our sins are washed away by his blood; that he continues still our advocate and spokesman at this day, to procure us favor in Gods sight: that his obedience is imputed to us for righteousness: and that God adopts us in him make us heiress of his kingdom. All these things then are at this day declared into us largely in the Gospel. And seeing that God is so gracious to us in preferring us before all the kings and Patriarchs that lived under the Old Testament: We worth us if we cannot fare the better by such a prerogative. Seeing that the kings (I say) which were desirous to have heard the things which we hear, and to have seen the things which we see, obtained not their desire; and now GOD having given us more than them, can win nothing at our hands by so doing but scorn and despite: what will our reward be? He may well upbraid us as he did the laws in the old time, saying: My people what have I done to you? My vineyard, I have planted there, I have husbanded there, and I have taken great pains about there: and that brings forth bitter grapes that are able to choke their master. If GOD blamed the thankfulness of his people after the fashion in old time: how much more may be blame us in these days? Are not wee worthy to receive a hundred fold more damnation than they? Yes certainly. So then let us mark well, that if God could not bear the despising of his Law: he will much less now suffer that scorning of his Gospel, or that men should make none account of the order which he has set for them to resort to sermons, there to be taught by the mouths of those that are in that degree and office. For as I have declared, it is not enough for us to say, Gods word is worthy to be heard: but we must also show the same by proof. Whatsoever our Lord speaks, although it be by means of creatures: yet let us receive him quietly and obey him.

Let us not further, that where as it is said he will require an account of it: the meaning there of is: that we shall have gained nothing by seeping the hands of men. For why? God will maintain his own honor. And this is not able in many respects. For oftentimes you shall see, that they which should hold the stern to make Gods word to be received with reverence, have no regard of it at all. The Princes, Magistrates, and Judges of this world, do punish things which they know to be to their own damage: such offences are straightly looked to. And why? For if they should go unpunished, great disorder would insure thereof. This respect were not a miss, so they did not set the cart before the horse. For if God be offended, they let that slip. And why? Because they think there grows no inconvenience of it. And in very deed it is grown to a common by word to say. Who is he that accuses me? Whom have I wronged? The party that shall have spited God openly, and therefore deserves to be rooted out of the world, shall but wring his mouth or rather his groin, and step forth with a shameless forehead to ask who accuses him. The very Angels of heaven, yeah and all other creatures cry out against him; and yet he has not offended. And why so? Because nobody is against him hear among men: for it may chance that no man will stand in Gods defense. Every man will well enough please for themselves: but they be not so zealous as to set themselves against such as offended God. And yet in the mean while the Judges are asleep and let all such manner of ungodly dealings ship. Yeah, there are some which are worse than laws and Sarasin's, showing no token of Christianity, but openly despising both Sermons and use of Sacraments. Other some are not contended with such contempt, but they do also make war against God, and play the venomous beasts in spewing out their vileness to make all religion to be set light by. These things are to be seen: and yet men wink at them. Therefore does God tell us that he will call them to account for it. Very well (says he): let men be as negligent as they will: yet will not I forget these things, whatsoever come of it.

Hereby we be warned to receive Gods word when it is set forth into us, and to insure ourselves to the hearing thereof, not for fear of men only, but to eschew the wrath of the heavenly Judge, seeing he is minded to defend the authority of his word. Were this well marked, men would be better disposed to suffer themselves to be taught by Gods word than they be. Men would make more speed when they hear the betel, than they do. But what? We can fear find in our hearts to go three steps to a sermon. And why? For fear least we should afterwards be censured. If I go continually to sermons, and I shall be called afterwards in to the Consistory for it: and in the end I shall be censured. After the manner do these Sarasin speak that dwell among us here, who have neither faith nor Christianity in them more than dogs. Their coming hither commonly is but to scrap the ground with their panoplies in mock age of God. But it were better for them to break their necks, than to come to unhallowed Gods temple after that sort. Others come with the ceremonies and outward shrews: and in the meanwhile have no affection at all. But let us bethink us how it is said here, that our Lord will not let men alone so: for although no man maintain his glory, but presume malapert to despise him: yet shall not their so doing boot them. For why? He tells us that he will do his office and not bury things in forgetfulness. Then if men wink at the despising of God's word: God himself must in the end show, that he sets such store by it, that he will be avenged of them for it. Thus you see what we have to mark, in Gods uttering of such threatening against all the despisers of his Law.

Besides this, it is his mind also to provide we be not deceived not abused under pretense of this honorable title of Prophet. For as it becomes us to obey God by being taught by such men as he has set in the office of teachers: so on the other side it is not for any man to take that charge upon him, thereby to deceive the plain and ignorant people. God then has provided here for both twain. First he showed how there is no cause why the people should grudge seeing there was no want of teaching: and therefore that they which turn away after Witches, Soothsayers and Enchanters, are lewd and unthankful. For why? God comes to us, and required no more but to reach us familiarly. Therefore when men step aside after that manner to superstitions, and cannot be contended with Gods truth which is the perfection of all wisdom: must it not need be that they are possessed of Satan, and worse than stark made or out of their wits? Yes truly. And therefore seeing our Lord protests that he has so provided for his Church, as men may well hold themselves to that which he has done: Let every man be ready to hear and receive the doctrine which he sets forth.

Now he comes to those that are appointed to be teachers. Let no man (says he) presume to speak in my name. For I must put my word in the mouth of the Prophets. He says expressly, I will put my word in their mouths: and thereunto answered the text of Esau which I cited before. Whereby it is showed us that God raised not Prophets up to lay the bridle in their necks, and to give them full liberty to preach what they list: but he raise them up to be as his instruments to deliver the things faithfully which they have heard of him. You see then with what condition God has raised up prophets in all ages, namely he put his word in their mouths. And whereas we preach nowadays: it is not for that Christ has given up his office. For he is always a teacher, he is the head of the Church, yeah and the only head, not to be as any doll, but to rule us with his doctrine. Therefore we must not presume to allege anything which we receive not of the only son of God. Wherefore let us mark well, that as it was Gods will hear to subdue folk to humble themselves, so as they should not refuse to be taught by his word when it is preached: so on the other side he has provided that such as have commission to speak, must not bring their own dotages and dreams, nor devise any new doctrine, but only first learn of their master, and afterwards deliver the same faithfully to others, without adding anything at all of their own heads, is utter corruption: there needs no more heaven to sewer the whole lump of past. And if a man take head never so little, he shall utterly pervert Gods truth, and turn it into untruth. And his serves also to put all men in mind upon what condition they should hear the Prophets. For here are two extremities, as in deed we never keep any mean, unless our Lord draw us to be it by force. If we keep it not, we become heathenish, and his word is scorned of those to whom he send us: which contempt we see in the most part of the world. How deal we when we come to framing of ourselves? We use a kind of fond and beastly devotion, without putting any difference between good and evil, and God will none of that.

Indeed he will have our faith matched with humility, but not that we should be strake blocks without discretion. For clean contraries he will us to try mans spirits. Then must we have skill to examine things whether they be true or not, when men speak to us in the name of God. The way therefore which we must hold, is that when Gods name is alleged, we must be touched with reverence to hearken earnestly to the things that are spoken, and howsoever the world, go we must be prepared to receive them. And when we have this modesty of yielding our selves teachable by the things that are set forth in the name of God: we must also pray him to give us his holy spirit, that we be able to discrete a right and not be beguiled, no imbrued with lies under false pretense of his name, but that although Satan transform himself into an Angel of light, yet, he may not so blind our eyes, but that we may perceive what is good. That is the way which we must hold. And it is the thing where to God intends to lead us, saying that although he will have us to hearken to the Prophets, and added this threat that he despising of them shall not abide unpunished: yet notwithstanding means not therefore to bereave us of discretion, and to stop our eyes that we should not know what to follow. No: but he will have us to examine men doctrine and to list the Prophets whether they teach aright or no. we must not be so doltish as admit all that ever is told us without exception: but (as I said) when men speak to us in the name of God, we must search whether it be truth of falsehood. And now must we lay forth the things particularly which are contained here.

First of all let us mark, that God meant not to example the preachers of his word from all examination, but will have the faithful to consider what is set forth into them, according to the general rule that is given us thereof. It is said that they which have the gift of Propheying must speak in order, and that the residue must judge. It is not said, whatsoever they say, let it be received: but, let men judge and discern of it. How the holy Ghost sheath us how to measure our faith, and after what manner we may keep a means between the contempt and rebellion which we see in the headiest sort, and the beastly blockishness of such as say, as for me: I am so well minded that I receive whatsoever is told me. Yeah, and though art a good goose for the labor. But God will have such children as be of discretion and knowledge, and although our faith be not a wordily science: Yet does it require skill to be taught us at Gods hand as the Prophet says. One point then is this, that when we preach Gods word, it is not for us to say that men should not judge of our doctrine, or that we should not yield any account thereof. For that were in vain to be spoken, and not only needless, but also unreasonable, that a false Prophet should be punished and no examination had of him, nor any means to try him and to take knowledge of his case. We see hear in few words then, that God has given his Church leave to inquire of men doctrines, and that he would have his prophets accountable, so as they should be bound to yield a reason of their doctrine, and to show that it is God. And this condition was never refused, neither of the Prophets nor of the Apostles, who at all times when they were accused of false doctrine, were ready to show openly that they were sent of God, and that they had behaved themselves faithfully. And even so must we do at this day. And thereby will all tyranny be shut out. If a man would nowadays examine the doctrine of the Pope: he says it is not lawful. And why so? Because I sit in the Apostles like sea, says he. And meant not God to provide for his Church? He says expressly that he Prophet which is sent of him, shall have his word in his mouth. To whom does God speak? He speak generally of all that ever were sent by him. For I have proved already that this text is not meant of Moses alone, and of them that lived under the old testament: but that is tended even into us also, and comprehends in it the whole reign of our Lord Jesus Christ. Seeing then that God has not expected either Pope or any man else: it is to be concluded, that their doctrine may. Yeah and ought to be examined. And so we see that the Papists in these days have but a buckler of snow in that they bear men in hand that they be exempted from yielding any account. For our Lord has declared the clean contrary as we see.

And we must mark further, that it is not enough to have the title of a Prophet, but the effect must be had also. And wherein do that consist? In this, that they which speak in God's name, have his word in their mouth. He says not, they must but only have his spirit, how be it that he added that also. And even in this text Esau he says. My spirit shall rest upon him. But does that serve to exclude the word? No: they be things linked together with inseparable bond. It is said, my spirit shall be upon the, and my word shall be in the mouth. But what said the Pope to advance himself? I have Gods spirit. And where is his word? Let that come behind for I have greater and far excellent revelation of mine own. As for God's word, it is but an Apply: the great mysteries have been revealed to me by the holy Ghost. See how this devil will need set up himself above all order of the Church, and above all direction that God has set down to rule his Church by, in that he will have the Gospel to be preached nowadays in his mane, and his word to be in the mouths of those whom he has set in that office. Is it not a hellish kind of divorcement, to break the things so asunder, which God has joined together? It is all one as if a man would cleave the skies, and pluck down one half of the stars and more too. For neither sun, nor moon, nor any other creatures are comparable to Gods Majesty, which utterly itself both by his spirit and by his word.

Now he has cupped them two together, and it is not lawful to take the one of them and to leave the other. And therefore let us learn that as many as will nowadays be taken for teachers in the Church, must have the charge to bring Gods word with them, and also must have his spirit; that is to say, they must have the gift to expounding the holy scripture, they must have such understanding as belongs thereto, and they must be faithful so as they put forth nothing of their own, but only follow the trade that is appointed them, so as they may ever protest in the end, that God has spoken into us. And that if any man do step up against them, they may say with Moses, who am I? As for me, I have brought you the message that was committed to me of God: now goes your ways and strive with him for it. All they then that will be known to be teachers of the Christian Church, must have the said modesty: and then may we boldly (as shall be showed more at large tomorrow) despite all such as presume to speak in God's name, and in the mean while go beyond their bounds and will not submit themselves to the condition which God will have to be common to all his Prophets.

Now let us kneel down before the Majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, and to lead us to such amendment as we may be willing to be overmaster of him, and perceive that all our affections are forward, and that all the sense and with which we have in us, is utter confusion. Wherefore let us be willing to submit ourselves wholly to his will, desiring him to cause the same to be so utterly to us, as we may not walk wonderingly and at all adventure, but be thoroughly certified and assured by his speaking to us, that we shall be guided to him, because the doctrine of his Gospel is the right way to salvation, wherein we cannot go astray: and that we may be confirmed more and more in the same, until we have no more need to be taught by that means of men, but are come to the singing of eternal prays to him in the company of the Angels. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth, et cetera.

The 111th Sermon, which is the fifth upon the
eighteenth Chapter

21 And if you say in your heart, how shall we know the word which the Lord has not spoken to him:

22 When a Prophet speaks in the name of the Lord, and the thing that he has spoken comes not to pass: that is a word which the Lord has not spoken to him, but the Prophet has spoken it presumptuously; and therefore be not afraid of him.

Yesterday was showed why Moses sets down here a Law for false Prophets, to the end they should be punished for seeking to corrupt God's truth, and for abusing their office. For he had declared before, that as many as will be known to be of God's house and sheepfold, must submit themselves to the common order, which is to hear the Prophets whom he has sent. But yet must there be a mean in so doing. For were the bridle laid in their necks which speak, and were there in absolute authority given them: what a thing were that? Great confusion would ensue thereof. Therefore like as our lord binds the whole body of his Church to the hearing of his word and doctrine when it is preached: so will he have those to be ruled, which have the charge to teach others, to the intent they presume not to put forth any doctrine of their devising, but faithfully deliver the things that are commanded them of God, and which they have received as it were from his own mouth. That was the meaning of Moses, to the end that such as have preeminence should not abuse it, and that the people also should all of them yield themselves teachable, and so there might be no tyranny in God's Church, but good order in all points. For if it might be Lawful for every man to refuse the doctrine, as who would say, I am wise enough, I know how to behave myself, I am able to teach others: and again, I can read it at home in mine own house: if such liberty were given; all would go to havoc. And on the contrary part, if the party that has commission to bear abroad the word of God, should say, I am not to yield account to anybody, it is not for any man to examine my doctrine whether it be good and true or otherwise: it were a tyrannous Lordliness, whereby God should be excluded from having any preeminence or audience among us. So then, we must keep the mean that is showed here by Moses, which is, that all such as disobey the common order must be punished and cut off from God's people: and therewithal, that they which are in office to Speak, do take good heed that it is not for them to set forth their own dreams and dotages, but to behave themselves as God's messengers, faithfully and without adding anything of their own.

Now let us come to that which Moses adds here: If you say in your heart, how shall I know when a Prophecy is not of God? It is said, If the Prophet tell you a thing which comes not to pass, assure yourself he is not sent, but he does it all together of pride: and therefore he shall be punishable. Here we have to mark, that in this place God has not set down all the tokens whereby the false Prophets maybe discerned from the true. And for proof hereof, the office of Prophets was not only to tell of things to come, but also to give folk good instruction, to exhort them to amendment of life, and to edify them in faith. As for example, we see that the Prophets did not only say such a thing shall befall: but also confirmed the covenant whereby God had adopted the people of Israel, and told them of the coming of the redeemer on whom the hope of all God's children was grounded. Moreover the comforted the sorrowful, by preaching the promises of God's favor to them; therewithal they threatened the people when they became disordered; they discovered their faults and transgressions; they cited sinners to God's judgment to make them humble themselves. All these things belonged to the office of the Prophet. So then there were other tokens besides that which Moses sets down here, whereby to discern false Prophets aright. And in very deed if we will know whether a Prophet serves God faithfully or not; we must compare the things that are clean contrary. We know that the true touchstone whereby to try the goodness of any doctrine, is the referring of all things to faith, (as Saint Paul says thereof) and to the glorifying of God, that men be taught to put their whole trust in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, to dislike of themselves and to be ashamed of their own doings, and to frame themselves to a true amendment. Thus it is a true trial of good doctrine, when we see that preacher endeavor that God maybe purely honored and served, and that the praise of all power, wisdom, and righteousness be yielded to him. That doctrine is always good, and that is an infallible rule. When men are condemned in themselves; when they be showed that there is nothing but corruption in their nature, and that they be accused of God; when they be so beaten down as they know not, what to do, but only to crave forgiveness like wretched sinners: that is a sure doctrine. For faith leads us thereto and compass it as a certain rule. Again, when sins are condemned by God's law, and men are showed what true repentance is, to know, a disliking of their sins and a desiring to be governed by God's spirit, and to be altogether changed: that is a sure doctrine. Moreover, when men are told that they must flee to God for refuge, and call upon him only, and not be unthankful to him for his helping and succoring of them: the doctrine also is of the holy Scripture, and men cannot fail in embracing of it. If it be said that the very use of the Sacraments is to lead us to our Lord Jesus Christ, and to assure us the better of the benefits which he brings us that we may be partakers of them, and that God also puts us in possession of them: that also is a truth which ought not to be revoked nor doubted of. And here of there is no disputing to be made: for men know that in those points is nothing but good doctrine. On the contrary part, a man may judge that a doctrine is false, when it darkens or diminishes the glory of God. If the thing that belongs to God be plucked away from him to be bestowed upon creatures: it is a practice of Satan's to turn us out of the right way. Again, if one do puff up men with pride and overweening; and make them believe that they be able folk, and so rock them asleep in their sins: or if he teach them to serve God with pelting toys, and to forget his Law, and in the meanwhile to give men's inventions their full scope: or if the Sacraments be used but as light or fond pastimes: a man may easily see that such doctrine is lewd and cursed, and that it was forged in Satan's shop.

Furthermore, whereas nowadays men are inquiring whereon to stay in the midst of these troubles and diversities of opinions that are in the world: it is no very hard thing to do, so they be attentive and discreet in discerning after the manner that our Lord has showed us. For all the whole doctrine of peppery tends to none other end, but to advance men, and to puff them up in such wise with their own deserts, as they maybe half defiance with God, as though they could accuse him. Again, it sends me too and from. Instead of putting their trust in the only free goodness of God, and instead of embracing our Lord Jesus Christ: men are taught other infinite means to save themselves. Moreover, instead of having the only Law of God for their only rule in all things, and for their only holiness and perfection: men have set out their own trifling traditions. Thus may you easily judge of these things. And what is so be said of their Sacraments? It is evident that they be mere witcheries in the Popedom, so as Jesus Christ is driven a great way off by them. And men make idols of the visible signs and live less creatures, and Satan has so imbrued the wretched world with his illusions, that men are become stark beasts. Now then, if a man intend to make trial of a good doctrine; he shall find the things which I spoke of before, to be sure and infallible marks thereof. But in this text our Lord meant only to tell us that he will discover the false Prophet, at leastwise one way or other, whereof he sets down on kind here.

I have told you already that there are divers other means to discern the true doctrine from the false: but none of those come in question here. Our Lord has told us, No, no, you shall not be beguiled so long as you endeavor to follow the truth that proceeds from me. If a deceiver have any countenance among you; I will make his lewdness to be laid open: I will give you some such token thereof, as you may always keep yourselves undefiled, so you have the mind and zeal to stick to my pure word. Thus much concerning this text, which imports a kind of promise, as if our Lord should tell his people that he would discover the hypocrisy of deceivers, and not suffer them to reign ever, but that in the end they shall in some respect or other come to confusion. Now we see the principal drift of Moses' words.

But here a question might be moved. For heretofore in the thirteenth Chapter, it was said that if a Prophet told a thing to come, and the same came to pass indeed: yet was he not to be believed, because God would suffer such things to try his people withal. And here it is said that a false Prophet shall be known and judged by the not falling out of the things which he prophases. Now here seems to be some contrary. But the solution is easy, in marking that though a false prophet be known by his liking: yet it follows not that he should be taken and deemed a true Prophet because it falls out that he speaks some truth. Truly if he spoke the truth at all times and in all cases, then were he a true Prophet. But he may well say the truth in some respect, (which may be done for some just punishment from God, as is declared in this same text:) and yet he shall be but a deceiver nevertheless. As how? Put the case that folk seek to be smoothened in their vices, and are lo to be waked and quickened up as they should be, and had rather to be born with: (for such has the fashion of the world ever been:) Well, God seeing such lewdness, suffers deceivers to plaster them, and to bear the folk in hand (which are so desirous to sleep in their willfulness) that their faults are nothing. Here you see how those men are beguiled, because of the desire which they had before. And God adds the same thing moreover, namely that those false Prophets and deceivers shall have wherewith to confirm their doctrine, that they which were imbrued with lies before, may become more willful. For they will think then, that there is no more danger in believing them. And what is the cause hereof? Even God's just vengeance. Forasmuch as men shut their eyes at the light, and will needs dwell in darkness: God gives Satan the bridle. By means whereof it comes to pass, the false prophets do sometimes speak the truth; as is to be seen even at this day. For what a number are there to be found, which seek after witchcraft to abolish that authority of God's word? You shall see on the one side a sort of curious heads, and on the other side another sort that have no fear of God: and yet that mark which they all shoot at, is to put away God's word, that they might not be ruled by it. And in the meanwhile they will needs have some Wizard to tell them of their good fortunes: and our Lord suffers them to be drawn by such means into all deceits of Satan, notwithstanding that some truth be mingled therewithal. Now then, though a false Prophet speak the truth, yet is not that a warrant that his doctrine is true: our Lord will not have men to credit him a whit that more for that: for we see for what cause he puts the truth oftentimes into the mouths of deceivers. And so, notwithstanding the things that are set down here, yet does it abide true still, that when our Lord is minded to have pity upon his people, and not to suffer them to be abused by false doctrine: he gives them some token whereby to find the deceiver: and whereas earth he was in estimation, and might have amazed the wretched world: God betrays his lewdness and so he is found to be a liar. Thus we see now the whole meaning of Moses, concerning the things that are contained in this text.

These things were performed among the people of old time, and the examples thereof which we see, ought to show us the use of them and what fruit we should gather of this warning which Moses gives. When the Prophets meant to prove that they were sent of God: I am no prophet it this come not to pass. See how Jeremy submits himself to the Law, saying: I tell you, you shall be led captive to Babylon, and think not yourselves to be discharged by that which has happened to you already: (for the city had been taken once before, and therefore they thought themselves discharged by being become tributaries after that fashion to the king of Babylon: and so they thought themselves escaped:) No, no, you must endure yet more. This chastisement, which has not amended you at all, seems over hard and too sharp a rod to you. But forasmuch as god has called you, and you continue still unamended: he is fine to deal now more roughly with you: the temple must be beaten down, the city must be razed, you yourselves must be no more a people, there must be no more sacrifice, all things must so clean taken away, as you may seem to be utterly perished. To this extremity must you come, because you have abused God's patience even to this house. And if it come not so to pass, take me no more for a Prophet, but let me be stoned to death, for I am well worthy of it. But I am well assured of that which I have foretold you, for God himself has told it to me. We see how the Prophets submitted themselves to the Law, and also did set themselves against the false prophets, as we see by the example of Jeremy, when Ananias came and said, No, the vessels of the Temple shall be brought again from Babylon and the kingdom of David shall be set up again in our time, and we shall flourish more than ever we did: and thereupon did break the chain of Jeremy, who walked about the street as it were with a with about his neck. For it behooved him to represent the captivity, because men were so blind in their sins, that they took all God's threatening to be but a jest, and thereupon did make even a mock of them. And therefore it behooved the Prophet to go about the city after that fashion with a with about his neck, as who should say, Even thus shall you be miserably haled into captivity, now you triumph, you think it a goodly thing to besot yourselves in your pleasures and delights; but this yoke that I wear, serves to show that you yourselves shall be put under the yoke of subjection. Behold, Ananias breaks me this yoke asunder, saying: no, we shall live still at liberty, and be delivered from that bondage. It is a wonder. Yes, but how did these wretched and wicked folks afterward behave themselves? How did God ratify the thing that Ananias had spoken? I wish it might be so (said Jeremy) but yet must I go further and tell him his condemnation, seeing the Lord has commanded me so to do. So then, we see that Jeremy ratified the thing which he had uttered in the name of God, and that manner of dealing was common among all the Prophets. Wherefore let us mark that our Lord's intent here was to declare that he will not suffer us to be beguiled, so we be willing to receive his word, and to be taught thereby, and be diligent in discerning between truth and falsehood. Although there be never so many false Prophets, and that Satan strive continually to turn us away from goodness: yet shall we ever have some discretion, that is to say, God will give us some token whereby to keep ourselves from being deceived. It is a promise that can never fail us. And therefore let us hold us thereto, and seek to obey our God. His reaching out of his hand is enough for us: and though there be never so many means to deceive us, yet will he not suffer them to prevail, according to that that is promised here. Wherefore let us look to ourselves. Whereas we have no Prophets nowadays to foretell us things to come, or that have revelations beforehand of war, pestilence, and famine: it is because we have greater perfection of doctrine, than the people had in old time. We therefore must hold ourselves contented with the Gospel, for it is that fullness of light. But yet therewithal let us also have an eye to the things which are written, and let us examine the doctrines that are preached to us: and if we find them to be drawn out of the Law, the Prophets, and the Gospel: let us be assured of them that they are certain. And if we use that touchstone continually to try things by: surely God will preserve us from all Satan's falsehoods. Thus you see what we have to remember upon that text.

Now it is said expressly that such a Prophet shall die the death. And that is a cause also why our Lord says, that he will give the said mark. For it were foul treachery to judge and condemn a Prophet without knowing why or wherefore. If a guiltless person should be condemned under color of some evil deed not uttered: it were too great wrong and injustice to be done to a mortal man. But if a bringer of God's word be condemned, even as though he had done amiss in his office, without being found faulty: that touches not the creature only, neither is the wrong done to a mortal man alone: but it is an outrage done to God also, and that is high reason to his person. You see then that the cause why Moses says here, that God will discover the false Prophets, is to the end they should be judged, and also to warn folk that they should not covet to be founded with warn folk that they should not covet to be founded with vain hope, as I have told you that the manner of the world is continually to do. The prophets had hard hold from time to time with the most part of the Jews, because they brought nothing but threatening. These Prophets (quotes the Jews) do trouble us, and are too importunate upon us, they speak of nothing but of God's wrath and cursing: and should they not as well tell us of gladsome and pleasant things? Those are the things which the world requires. Yes but in so doing we provoke God's wrath. We would have him to be our friend: and we on our side are enemies to him. If we came to God with true repentance and sought him as our father: we should have no tidings but of peace and prosperity to delight in. But what? We suffer not God to be favorable to us, nor to show his love towards us. For we make war against him as I said before. Therefore let us learn that god will turn that saying of the false Prophets to the contrary, so as when they promise folk welfare and peace, mischief shall ensue, whereby your shall be found to have used vain flattery. Wherefore let us not desire to be rocked asleep with men's deceitful speeches. For what shall it boot us to be acquit by them that have no power at all: when we shall be condemned before God? And let us not tarry till God to our cost do betray that lewdness of the false Prophets, and so we be caught in some calamity. But let us prevent God's wrath as soon as we see our sins, and let us be touched with them. And if there be any that flatter us, let us not give ear to them to be seduced to our confusion.

Now our Lord sets down her two sorts of false Prophets. The one is of them that speak falsely in his name: and the other, is of them that speak in the name of strange Gods. Then it is not enough for a Prophet to shroud himself under the name of the living God: but he must also execute his office faithfully. Neither is it enough for him to be put in commission by God, except he execute it with a pure and upright conscience. For we see that the deceivers have sometimes objected thus against God's servants: what? Am not I a Prophet as well as you? Yes, verily, you are in office: but see how you discharges yourself of it. Let us mark then, that all the matter lies not in speaking in God's name: and that does experience well show us. For the Pope at this day will speak in God's name; and yet we shall find nothing but stark abominations in his doctrine: there is nothing there but a gulf of hell to swallow up men's souls into destruction. And therefore let us mark well, that when a Prophet speaks in God's name, we must examine whether it be truly or not. For if God's name be abused, that expressing thereof is double wickedness. And that is the cause why Moses declares here, first that if a Prophet bring us word in that name of the living god, we must consider whether the word be committed to him or not. That is one point which we have to mark here. And because the wretched world has been beguiled under false pretence of God's name: let us learn to make narrower search, and not suffer ourselves to be seduced at all adventure, and so to be led by the noses like brute beasts. True it is that God's name ought to have such reverence among us, that we should all humble ourselves to hearken to the things that are set forth or spoken of him. But yet must we hold that mean, as was declared yesterday; which is that we must not receive all things indifferently that are spoken; but that our faith must be the try of them. For our Lord has not let us his Holy Scripture for naught. It is that true touchstone whereby we must try all doctrines, that we may judge of them aright.

The second sort of false Prophets which Moses has set down here, is of those which speak in the name of idols; which abuse crept in at length even among the Jews. For after that things were once grown out of kind; All took upon them to be Soothsayers and Prophets: but that was altogether in the name of idols, according to the cities wherein they dwelt. Wheresoever there was a Temple: there was a Jew that said, we have the foreknowledge of things to come, even by birth: and yet in the meanwhile they sold their Prophets, as these deceivers do which trot up and down the world, and say they can tell folks their fortunes. And it was a common practice of all the Jews, as appears even by the prophase histories, when they were once become idolaters. Surely it is a great unashamed fastness of them, to make such boast of the gift of Prophecy. And why so? They have that gift because they be the lineage of Abraham, because they be circumcised, because they be God's own people and heritage, and because they have the Law, and look for their promised redeemer: and yet for all this, they give over themselves to such abominations, that they will needs borrow the means of idolaters. And we see in manner the like altogether nowadays in the Popedom: For the Priests and Monks boast themselves to the office of praying for the whole Church and yet in the meanwhile they will sing a Mass of our Lady, and a Mass of such a Saint and such a Saint: and so idols are intermingled with the majesty of the living God. For although that Saints as in respect of themselves, be no idols: yet do they make them so, which do so abuse their names. And therefore let us learn to keep ourselves from both these sorts of falsehoods, by hearing no man speak but in the name of God. For we know there is nothing but vanity in man's mind, and that we shall be deceived if we give ourselves to any mortal creature: and therefore only God is to be heard. Again, when God's name is pretended, let us try whether it be in truth or not: we have his word, we cannot lie: and he will give us the understanding thereof, if we be lowly and meek. And if we submit ourselves wholly to him; it is certain that he will never suffer us to be deceived. Well may we be tempted, as we have seen in the thirteenth Chapter, that God will try us whether we love him or not. But if there be such an upright mind to be found in us that we will seek to serve him purely, and to obey him: surely he will deliver us from all deceit. Thus you see in effect what we have to remember upon this text.

Now in the end it is said, that when a false prophet is found out by trial, then it shall appear that he spoke upon presumption, and therefore be not afraid of him. Here are two sayings which import two good and profitable warnings. The one is, that he which advances himself beyond measure, speaks proudly. For is there a more devilish pride, than for a mortal man to thrust forth himself as if he were an instrument of God's spirit, as though he were an Angel from heaven, when in very deed he is but a liar, and has nothing but wind in him? If I take upon me another man's name, and say, such a one has given me commission: is it not too lewd a falsehood? The party to whom I have done the wrong may come and say, Ah, you liar, how durst you abuse my name? Such dealing (I say) would be counted great injury. Then if a mortal man advance himself in the name of God, (as for example, if I step up into the pulpit and require audience in the name of God, and yet notwithstanding do fall to seducing of the people:) that is a pride which passes all others, as I said before. For it is not simple lying, it is not single deceit, it is not a simple falsifying of this or that: but a turning of God's truth to untruth, and a wrapping of God in our falsehoods, and an unhallowing of his holy and sacred name. Therefore let us mark well, how it is not for naught that Moses says that the false Prophets shall be condemned, yes even because of their proud and presumptuous dealing, and for their intolerable rashness. And hereby as many as have that charge to bear abroad God's word are warned to walk warily and circumspectly, and to take heed that in their preaching of the word, they intermingle nothing of their own: but that they have a special care, that all their saying be referred to the true and pure expounding of that which is written, and that they do nothing else but apply God's word to the use of the people: As for example, I stand not here to make new Laws, nor to forge new articles of faith. What then? Our Lord has uttered his whole will to us in the Holy Scripture; and it is not lawful to add anything there to. What am I to do then? Wherefore do we preach yes, and that continually day by day? To the end that the scripture should be well understood, that it should be applied to our use, and that men might know how to benefit themselves thereby; as how to embrace God's promises, how to order their life aright, and how to live quietly every man after his own calling. The showing of these things is to minister force to the holy Scripture that we may understand it and far the better by it, and be edified therewith. Such (say I) as have the charge of preaching God's word, ought to have a special regard of these things.

Albeit forasmuch as no creature no not even the Angels of heaven, are able to execute so high and noble a commission: we must pray god to guide an govern us, bearing in mind therewithal (as S. Paul says) that no man could say that Jesus is the Lord, (that is to say, no man can give glory to the son of God) but by the holy Ghost: and to be short, that he which is advanced highest to teach others, ought to abuse himself lowest, for fear least anything may escape him which he has not received of God, so as he may safely protest that he has not aimed at any other end, than the worshipping and serving of God, even according to the doctrine which he has delivered heretofore in his Holy Scripture. Again the people are to be exhorted to take heed that God's glory be not defaced. For that Papists think it an humility allowable before God, and a very good and commendable devotion, to be so brutish as to receive all that ever is put to them. Oh, say they, we must submit ourselves to our mother holy Church, yes but in so doing they be guilty of the defacing of God himself and of the bereaving and robbing of him of his authority. For why? The Pope and his clergy are so full of stinking pride and stateliness, that they make Laws and subdue men's consciences to them at their pleasure. You see then that is an usurping of tyranny over God's people. They excommunicate all good doctrine, to set forth their own corruptions, and so they defile the pure simplicity of God's word. Well, they be suffered in these things, yes, and maintained and defended in their maliciousness. And in the meanwhile God is half shaken off, and no account is made of him: for men do overmaster him. For as for all them that hearken to false prophets after that fashion, do they not set up their devilish pride to the intent to thrust down God thereby?

Let us mark well then, that whereas Moses speaks here of the pride or over headiness of the deceivers: it is not only to make them to be disliked, punished, and cut off from among that people: but also to warn us that if a man presume to mingle any of his inventions with God's word or go about to alter any part of the order that he has set: we must be no favorers of such rashness. For in so doing we diminish God's honor, and become guilty of the utter defacing of him as much as in us lies. And therefore all of us in general, as well the preacher as the hearer, are warned to consider what the plain reverence is which God requires at our hand. It consists not in ceremonies, nor in vain babblings as men say: but in this, that he only do speak and all men's mouths be kept shut. Not that there should be no Shepherds, to preach the doctrine to us: but that all should be fetched from him, and he be held as Chief master. The way then to beat down all pride and rashness, is that the holy Scripture have his full force, so as men understand that that is the standard under which we must gather ourselves, and that God will be obeyed by men's submitting of themselves thereto. For without that, there will be nothing but pride and over stateliness among us. And so you see that the devotion of the Papists is devilish, because they have left God to submit themselves to creatures, and suffer themselves to be led like beasts without any discretion.

And in the same respect is it said in the end, You shall not be afraid of such a Prophet. He says not, you shall not fear such a prophet, but word for word it is, you shall not be afraid of such a Prophet. For here God meant to arm his faithful ones with constancy, that they might not be put out of countenance by any fair disguise: but that when they are once instructed in the faith, they should defy all such as vaunt themselves and come to make gay shows under the name of God, as I have told you before, that sometimes men are too fearful. Indeed there are that mock at God and have no feeling of conscience at all, but set as light by the truth as they do by leasing: and even at this day, there are that make as much account of the Gospel, as of the abuses of the Popedom: Jesus Christ and the Pope are all one to them. What a sort of mockers are to be seen, which will needs be counted good Christians because they hold scorn of the popish superstitions; and yet in the meanwhile are despisers of God and his word? Surely they be but dogs and hogs, without any fear of God or civil honesty. And yet is the world too full of such corruption and infection. Again there are other some very tender hearted. Not that it is not a virtue to stand in some fear: but because they be over fearful: when they be vexed with any scruple of conscience, they know now which way to turn them. For if an error be put to them, they dare not receive it for fear: again on the other side, if the truth be put to them, their agreeing to it (if they do agree) is not with any certainty. You shall see a number that are ever wavering, like reeds shakes with the wind. The mass is holy with them, and the Gospel is holy with them also, and yet they be certain of none of both. Now our Lord will not have us to stand in any such fear. He will have us to be sure of his word; and when his truth is thoroughly proved to us, he will have us to defy the world; and all the devils of hell; insomuch that if the very Angels of heaven should let themselves against the Gospel, we see how S. Paul says that we must hold them for accursed and excommunicate. God then will have his word honored so highly, that when we once know it and are sure of it, we must not be any more afraid.

It stands us in hand to put this lesson in use nowadays, because Pope's thundering were able to make all the world to quake, if men were not armed beforehand against him, with the things that are told us here by Moses. The Pope names himself Christ's vicar, that head of the Church, S. Peters successor, and the maintainer of the Apostle like sea, so as there is no Church of God but that Church of Rome: nor any Shepherd, or Prelate, if the Pope be not head of all: nor any kingdom of Jesus Christ, otherwise than in the Pope's person, who has the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Would not the alleging of all these things make the stoutest of all to shrink, if we were not armed against them? Yes: but when all these things are pretended, we must consider whether the reporter of them do discharge his duty faithfully. For if he speak in God's name, and yet be found to be a false harlot; he is that more to blame for abusing so honorable a title. And the more he was esteemed before, the less is he to be regarded afterward. Let him thunder his belly full: yet shall all his excommunications pass into smoke, and all this threatening shall be but mere vanity. The effect thereof of the things which our Lord meant to say in this text, is the being well assured of God's word, and having examined all doctrine, (albeit with humility) and having used that foresaid touchstone of the Holy Scripture: we may well defy all them the clock themselves under that gay mantle of God's name, abusing their commission and executing tyranny instead of serving the Church of God. I say we may defy all the rabble of them, and cry out against the Pope and his abominable wickedness, and not be afraid of anything that he can do to us. For so long as we have God on our side, we may boldly hold scorn of the whole Popedom, how proud and stately so ever they be there. That is the thing in effect which we have to mark, that we be not fearful where God will have us to be stout. But that when we have his doctrine and truth, we must so profit ourselves by then, that whatsoever that devil do practice, he may not turn us aside from the way of salvation: but we must hold on our course, according to this saying which we shall see hereafter. This is the way, walk you therein: and also according to the Prophet Esau account who says, This is the rest. Therefore let us continue therein and hold on to the mark where to God calls us: and then can we not do amiss.

Now let us kneel down before the Majesty of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better that we have done, and to strengthen us more and more by his word, that his kingdom may be advanced among us, and we endeavor so to serve and honor him, as we may be under his protection, and he maintains us in such wise, that we knowing him to be our good father and savior, may take the more courage to give ourselves wholly to him, all our lifelong. And so let us all say. Almighty God heavenly father, et cetera.

On Thursday, the 5th of December 1555

The 112th Sermon, which is the first upon the nineteenth Chapter

When the Lord your God shall have rooted out the nations, whose land the Lord your God gives you, so as you are owner of them and dwells in their cities and houses:

2 Then shall you set you out three cities in the midst of the land which the Lord your God will give you to possess.

3 You shall prepare a way to them, and divide the bounds of the land (which the Lord your God will give you to inherit) into three parts, that whomsoever has committed manslaughter may flee thither.

4 They shall server for the manlier to flee thither, that he may live: namely if he have stricken his neighbor ignorantly, and have not hated him before times.

5 [As for example] if a man go with his neighbor to wood to set timber, and he casts back his hand with the axe in hewing the wood, and the head flies off of the helve, and hits his neighbor that he dies: he shall flee to one of those cities and live:

6 To the intent that the next of his kin follow not the manlier, while his heart is chased, and overtake him if the way be overlong, and put him to death though he be guiltless of the other man's death, forasmuch as he hated him not before.

Although that law that is set down here, served for the common weal of Israel: yet may we also fare the better for it at this day. For thereby God meant to declare what punishment ought to be executed upon such as commit willful murder throw malice and of set purpose. Also it shows that we must not take that for a crime, which a man does not willingly, but by chance as they term it. True it is that such things are not so casual but that God governs them from above, as is showed in another place, where it is said, that if a man be lopping of a tree, and a bough thereof do hit one upon the head that he die, it is God that had determined it so. And the holy Scripture will not have us to attribute the falling out of things to fortune, but that we should know that God directs all things, to the intent that although we see not his hand, yet we should understand by faith, that he sets such store by our life, that he has numbered all the heirs of our heads, as is said in another text. Moreover, to come again to the matter, it is showed here that all faults are willing, that is to say, that men do them wittingly and of set purpose. But let us go forward with the text that is set down here. God commands the people of Israel to choose out three cities, until he have enlarged their bounds further. For it behooved them to have six in all as we shall see in the next lecture, and as is declared in the twentieth chapter of Joshua. Nevertheless, until such time as the people were in full and peaceable possession of the land, God's will was that they should appoint out but three cities of refuge, for all such to flee to as had committed any manslaughter by chance medley (as they call it) Notwithstanding, lest any man should abuse that privilege, he adds what manner of manlier should have protection thereby. Such (says he) as have killed their neighbors unwittingly: and thereof he alleges an example. If a man go to sell timber, and the Axe slips out of his hand, and hits one so as he die, forasmuch as the man purposed not to do any such deed, he may flee and have himself in one of those cities. Now we must mark that it was not enough for a man to protest that he had done it but by mischance: but it behooved him to have it well proved, so as the party that was to enjoy the privilege should be worthy of it, and the matter well known and the truth of all things tried out how the case stood by just examination: and specially that there had been no hatred between the parties before times, so as it might appear that there was none other cause of the committing of the slaughter, than God's only determination, without any act done on man's behalf otherwise than of mind to do well. And the manlier that was able to prove this, should flee to one of those Cities, and there tarry till the death of the high Priest: and then he was to return home again, because in that while the heart burning of the dead man's kinsmen might be appeased.

And hereby God shows, first how greatly he would have us to abhor the shedding of man's blood: and it is a point which we ought to mark well. For thereby we perceive what love he bears us, in that our life is so dear to him, and that he is so chary of it. If God made no more account of us that he dos of the brute beasts, he would not set so much store by our lives. Therefore must we needs conclude that he loves us with a fatherly love, seeing our life is so precious to him. Besides this, every of us ought to take knowledge hereby of his own duty: for we cannot do any outrage or violence to our neighbor, but we must offend God deadly. And now without cause. For in so doing we deface his image, as is said in the ninth of Genesis. Forasmuch as God has printed his image in men; whomsoever hurts his neighbor maliciously, spites God to the uttermost of his power. And so are we warned to abstain from all evil doing, and to live in such sort among men as no man be hurt by us. And indeed we see that the manslaughters which are committed even of necessity, carry with them nevertheless a kind of defiling. As for example, when enemies are slain in battle, although the thing be lawful, yet does God say that it is a defiling of men's hands. Not that he imputes it for a crime, but to the intent that the man which is constrained to fight against his enemies, should be sorry to see the order of nature so troubled by reason of men's sins, that whereas we ought to be as brethren, and to acknowledge our own flesh in every man that is made after our own likeness: yet notwithstanding we be driven to destroy them after that fashion. You see then how that even in the time of war, he that puts on armor against his enemies ought to do it, being sorry in his heart and to bethink himself that such outrage happens not but through the great lewdness of men. The meaning of all this, is that we should live quietly, and every man endeavor to maintain peace and concord, and have our hands tied for committing of any evil deeds.

And whereas God declares how greatly manslaughter displeases him: let us mark that (as says Saint John) before him all manner of hatred is accounted for murder. Then ought we to eschew all wrong dealing that may be done against men, for if we have any rancor or enmity towards them in our heirs, we be guilty of murder already before God. Mark that for one point. But here our Lord acquits the party that shall have slain a man unwittingly. Behold (says he) there shall no judgment of death pass upon such a man: for there is none offence in him. Seeing that the heavenly Judge has pronounced such sentence: what creature dares reply against it? You see then that such a one is guiltless, and so declares to be before God. Yet notwithstanding he must be fine to forsake his own house and inheritance, and go dwell in a strange place, and suffer man yourselves incommodities. And why does God vex him so, since he finds him guiltless? He shows us that although the party be faultless, yet is it done for examples sake, to the end we should not admit any murderers among us, but punish them as grievously as may be, and utterly abhor them. That is the cause why the party that offends unwittingly, shall nevertheless abide some punishment, and become as a man that is put to his penance, to the intent that he may humble himself and acknowledge in this wise: Truly, I meant not to do any harm; and this mischance is befallen me unwittingly: whereby God warns me that I have great need to pray him to rule both my hands and my feet. And moreover forasmuch as man's blood has been shed by me; although there were none evil meant on my part: yet must I be sorry for it, and bear in mind that our Lord makes such account of man's life: as he will have it always to be had in estimation of us. Let that serve for one point, concerning this law.

And now for the second point, Our Lord shows us that we ought to prevent all dangers and occasions, in respect whereof he adds that the manlier shall flee to one of those cities. And why? For fear least any of the dead man's kinsmen being moved to wrath, should revenge his neighbor's death, and so should the mischief be doubled. Now then, to avoid this inconvenience, There must be Towns appointed for refuge. And hereby we see that (as I said before) the Lord will not have us to tarry till the mischief light upon us, but he will have us to take the remedy of it. It might so fall out that some kinsmen of the dead man's being angry with the matter would say, he has slain my cousin, or my brother, and thereupon come running upon the innocent party in his rage, and kill him; whereby the land should have been defiled with blood. Therefore God's will is that the party which has committed manslaughter, should get him out of the sight of those that might be stirred up to anger against him. But it is certain that he could not excuse himself, which should so bear malice to the guiltiness party. For what could he require of him? Lies it in man to overrule the things that come to pass by God's providence, which is hidden to us? Are we able to withstand it? Needs then must it be too spiteful heart burning and malice, that should so move a man to wrath against the party that neither intended nor thought any evil. But although this comes of infirmity and of sin, yet has our Lord vouchsafed to remedy that inconvenience. And so we see that the laws serve not to bring men to perfection, I mean the politic laws that are made for civil government. They serve not to establish perfect holiness among us, but to remedy the vices whereto we be inclined. Because we be not thoroughly cleansed, our Lord is faine to set bars about us, to the intent that if our hearts incline to naughtiness, our hands may be withheld from performing the naughty desires that we have conceived in our minds. God's law is given us to rule our hearts and minds by. For our Lord not only commands us to abstain from all evil but also will have our souls ruled altogether by his will, I mean the moral law or ten commandments which I have expounded heretofore. But as touching the earthly policy or outward government, we must understand that God's intent was to bring his people to honesty, that there might be good order among them; and yet for all that, he restrained their affections that they might not come to effect. As for example, in this place, if we were required to show what were every man's duty and what he ought to do: it might be said that when a man has given a blow with his hand unwittingly, so as the same be sufficiently verified: then the next frier or kinsman must not step to revenge it: for in so doing he offends God in two sorts: first in setting upon the party that has not done him any harm by his will, and secondly in fathering that thing upon a mortal man which God had ordained by his own secret providence. After that manner would God speak, if he meant to bring us to a perfect doctrine. But when he makes a positive law, he thinks it enough to say that men should have an eye to the inconveniences that may ensue, and prevent them, and not tarry till the harm be done, but eschew it beforehand, and shut the door against all occasion. In like cases is it when a manslaughter is committed: the offender must get him out of the way, and save himself in one of the cities of refuge that the next kinsman which is desirous of revenge, have none occasion to do it; but that all further striking may be laid aside, and the pursuer preach not into the city, to follow the rage of his choler; but that the offender maybe pardoned, so as if there be any fault in him, the same may be born withal, and furthermore that the party which is so dealt with may live in safety, according as it is said in another place that those cities of refuge should belong to the Levites, thereby to show that God had appointed them there, to be as protectors of such as came thither for succor: so as if anybody came to pursue the quarrel against the offender, the Priests and the Levites should set themselves against him, and take upon them the protection of the party. Thus much concerning that text.

Now to be short we have to gather hereof, that God meant not to make such Franchises as are devised in the Popedom. For (to their seeming) God is well honored, when a murderer, a thief, or a robber takes sanctuary in a Church, so as the officer of Justice may not be bold to lay hands upon him. Indeed it is an ancient superstition; but yet it ceases not for all that, to be evil. For God never meant to hallow his temple after that fashion. True it is that such as were in danger, were wont to flee for succor to his Temple: but yet it booteth not the parties that were guilty. It served for such as being wrongfully pursued by their enemies, thought that the reverence of God might appease the wrath of their pursuers: and therefore they fled into the Temple. But yet for all that the offenders escaped not unpunished, neither was it any let that they received not a punishment according to their deserts. As for example, Salomon swear that although Adonis had caught hold of the horns of the altar of the Temple; yet should he be taken thence and put to death. Salomon was not so blind, that the reverence of the Temple could make him to let the party escape unpunished that had deserved it. For why? It is a mocking and scorning of God, when his Justice is displaced or disappointed under pretence of his name and Majesty. Behold, God commands us to punish murders and robberies: and yet we will make him a bolsterer of them, insomuch that if a cut throat get him into a church, he must be preserved there from the hand of Justice for the honor of God: and so God should be contrary to himself. Now then the bringing up of such Franchises in the Popedom was a fondness, I mean before such time as the tyranny thereof confounded things in such sort as we see they be now: and it was done of wicked superstition. True it is that in old time there were certain kinds of privileges: but they were but for the poorer sort that were vexed out of measure. As for example, if a bondman were cruelly handled by his master; he might flee for refuge to some image. To say the truth, the Emperors made themselves idols in so doing: but yet the end whereto it was done was not evil. For thereby their case came to examination. If a master would needs cut his bond servants throat, or misuse him without cause: he was compelled to sell him away, and to take money for him: and so the innocent was delivered from death. But the sanctuaries that were devised among Christians, was a perverting of all civil order and equity among men. And in very deed our Lord held scorn of that fond kind of devotion, and showed by the effect that he disliked it. For in old time, they that took Sanctuary in Churches were those that never came at Sermons. We see how complaints have been made thereof by the ancient doctors that have written thirteen hundred years ago. For thus do they say, as for them take sanctuary here among us; they be none of those whom we know, they be none of those whom we see daily, they be none of those whom we take for our disciples, and which come hither to receive God's Doctrine: none of that sort do ever take sanctuary among us. Who be they then that are desirous to enjoy the privileges of the Church? Unthrift, despisers of God, and daily haunters of Taverns and brothel houses. When they have committed any fault or offence, by and by they take sanctuary and flee to us for refuge. And how happens that? No doubt but our Lord has declared that he cannot abide any such disorder, that men should make his Church a den of thieves, as is spoken of it by the Prophet Jeremy. Indeed it is otherwise meant: but yet is this a general ground that God will not have his temple to serve for a covert for any evil doers. And therefore let us note that although the Churches of the Popedom had been dedicated to God: yet were they unhallowed again by that means, forasmuch as they served to privilege offenders, and beside to grieve the creditors, and for such other wicked things. Albeit forasmuch as at this day they be Satan's brothel houses and nothing else but dens of idols: they may well have such privileges, and we should not hate them for it. But in the meanwhile we see how all manner of disorder reigns there.

And now for our part let us mark, that God's will was not to give protection of misdemeanors. For on the contrary side it is said, That the party which commits such a manslaughter shall offer himself: (That saying is set down expressly:) and again, that the Justices shall make diligent inquiry of the matter, to know whether the party that has committed the manslaughter did hate his neighbor before times, or whether he had any quarrel against him or not. Herein our Lord shows that no excuse may be admitted. And this discretion ought to be in all Judges to beware that they admit not the answer of a man that would cover his own misbehavior. For the deed must be looked into, and the truth bolted out. Oftentimes Judges are contented to be beguiled and to see and not see when some color is set upon the matter, and to admit the excuse though it be never so trifling, Tush (say they) he excuses himself of such a matter. Yes and if the offender maybe believed, he will excuse himself ever. Therefore must we make inquiry as God commands us, and we must do it thoroughly. So then let us mark that when God gave protection to such as commit manslaughter unwittingly, he meant not that the same should serve for willful offender; and therefore he has showed the mean how the thing being good of itself, might be kept from turning into abuse. And hereby we be done to understand that if privileges be good and understand that if privileges be good and upright, they serve not for the wicked: and the granters of them ought to consider that thing well: and they must have an eye beforehand to all other respects, whereby men may from time to time draw their domes to evil liberty to the over grieving of such as are worthy to be maintained. But now whereas he has made a law of uprightness, for pity of such as deserve to be regarded at his hand: by and by the wicked sort being subtle, do take the advantage thereof to themselves. Men therefore had need of discretion in that behalf, to disappoint such as would abuse privileges, which are granted for none but for such as are worthy of them and deserve them. That is the thing which we have to bear in mind concerning the inquiry which God commands to be made when manslaughter is committed.

And here we have a double lesson to gather of this text. The one is for such as sit in the seat of Justice. They (as I have said before) must take good heed that they admit no trifling excuses: but that when any open offence is committed, they try out who is faulty thereof, that he may be punished for it. For we see how God has commanded that if a man's body were found dead, the Justice should make diligent inquisition of it out of hand without any for slowing or partiality: and that if the murder could not be found, yet if it were near the bounds of any Town or City, inquisition should be made for it roundabout, and solemn protestation should be made by those cities that they were guiltless of the bloodshed before God, and that if they knew the doer thereof, they would betray him: and after all this, it behooved them also to offer a sacrifice. And there is not anything that can better show us how greatly God abhors the shedding of man's blood, than this that we see that he wills the magistrates to come together after that fashion, to do Justice for duties sake of their hand: and also to offer themselves before God in the open face of the world, with protestation that their intent is not to conceal the misdeed, but that they would to the uttermost of their power avenge it, if it came to their knowledge, without cloaking of it. And yet is not that enough: but they must moreover add a sacrifice, to crave pardon at God's hand, forasmuch as it was his will to humble them, by suffering a manslaughter to be committed within their jurisdiction, and in that they were not able to clear the land thereof. So then let us learn, that such as sit in the seat of Justice must be watchful, to see that no misdemeanor be fostered. And if it be concealed, they must look diligently to it that it may be brought to light. And when they have proof of the matter, they must not be slack in punishing of it, unless they will be taken for accessories before God to that deed doers. Mark that for one point.

And further, in all examinations of matters let Judges and Justices have their eyes open, to see whether folk deal craftily and covertly or no. And if they did so, there should be better regard had to proofs than there is. But they let many things slip, and are contented that they should not come to knowledge. And yet does God show here how men ought to behave themselves in the examination of offences. Wherein we have a general lesson that concerns us all. For although all of us be not ordained to be justices to bear the sword for the punishing of offenders: yet does God grant us the honor to be our own judges. Therefore let us examine ourselves diligently, when any matter befalls us, that we flatter not ourselves in our offences and misdealing. And if we ought to be so diligent in examining ourselves, that although we feel no remorse or heart biting of conscience, yet notwithstanding we should lift ourselves whether we be worthy of blame or no: what ought we to do when we be convicted by the witness of our own consciences, so as we perceive there was some evil disposition in us? Let us beware that we can well justify ourselves then. And so you see how we may proceed from one thing to another: namely that inasmuch as we perceive that Magistrates are here warned to do their duty diligently; wee may gather upon that particular point that God has enjoined every of us to prefer inditelements against ourselves, and to take good heed that wee flatter not ourselves in any wise.

But now by the way, to come again to the examinations which our Lord has let down here: it is said that consideration must be had whether there have been any haired between the party that is so stricken that he dies of it, and the other has gave the stroke: Let it be considered (said he) whether there was any hatred betwixt them or no. Here we see yet better the thing that touched afore, that is to wit, that all crimes are willing, and that we must repair to that fountain to know whether it be a crime or no. As for example, if a man have committed a manslaughter, how may it be known that he is guilty of crime or no? By knowing whether he bare any hatred or malice to the party or no, said the Lord. And here we have to mark first of all, that forasmuch as hatred or malice is the wellspring of murder, it is not to be wondered at, or to be thought strange, that God should denounce all them to be murderers, which hate men in their hearts, and that he should condemn the rancor though it lie hidden within. For why? when a murderer comes to examination, is the hand to blame? is the sword to blame? or is the stroke to blame that was given? No. But the blame is in the malice that was conceived before, which led the hand and provoked the man to commit the murder. Therefore mark it for a point, that it is not without cause that our Lord deems all those to be murderers, which do so hate their neighbors. And the same must warn us to prevent all dangers, that the sun go not down upon our malice; for in so doing we give Satan possession of us. Beware my brethren (says S. Paul) that you give not place to Satan. And how do we give him place? It is (said he) by suffering the Sun to go down upon our wrath; for when we seed any heartburning within us, and multiply rancor in our minds; although we perceive it not at the first, yet are we caught with so cursed affection, as we cannot overcome it afterward. Seeing then that hatred procures such wickedness; let every man look to himself, and when we be moved to any ill will, although some displeasure be done unto us, and it may seem that we have just cause of revenge as in respect of men: yet notwithstanding let all such things be laid aside, and let us strive earnestly to overmaster ourselves, that our hearts be not hardened for fear least the devil do so work in us that the hatred which we have conceived today, do make us ready to flea & kill tomorrow, so as the heart being envenomed do carry the hand away with it. You see then how it is a thing worthy to be marked.

And generally let us learn, that to examine our faults well, we must not only have an eye to the things that are done by our hands, feet, eyes, & ears: but we must also go to the inward parts & search our thoughts, our wicked desires, and all the things that do tempt and provoke us: for there lies the right examination of our sins. When a man goes about to justify himself because he has committed no murder, theft, or whoredom in actual deed, & yet is infected with wicked lusts in his heart: his laboring to acquit himself after that sort, is in vain before God.

And therefore let us bear in mind, that to search ourselves duly of all our offences and misdoings, we must enter into our own consciences, & not only condemn our wicked lusts but also even our thoughts whereby we were provoked & induced to evil, and we must understand that even that is a damnable sin already before God. Thus you see what we be taught in this text where it is said that inquiry must be made whether the man hated his neighbor before or no.

And here is express mention made of the time that went before. Indeed in the Hebrew it is, yesterday or before yesterday: but it is but their common phrase of speech, whereby they do betoken all time that is past. And hereby our Lord meant to declare, that men must not look only at the relent deed, but that they must proceed further, and see whether any mischief lay lurking afore. For if a man allege circumstances to clear himself, and be not sound faulty out of hand; that is not yet enough: an eye must be had what went before: the thing may be sound out in a month which cannot be found in a day: and the thing will be found in a year, which is not to be found in a month. Now is this ought to be done in earthly justice let every of us practice it likewise in our own behalf. When we enter into the consideration of our own faults, let us not look only upon the things that are presently Calm out; but let us go yet further and say; How is this befallne me? It is because I have nourished this vice long time in me, whereas if I had cut it of at the first, God would not have left me so much to my idle. But what? I have soothed myself in mine evil doings, and suffered this cursed seed to take room in my heart, without regarding to repress it, so as it may seem that I have been minded to tempt God willfully. And therefore it is good reason that I should fall so grossly, since I myself am the cause thereof. Such examination should we make of all our faults, and not only condemn ourselves for the present deed done, but also proceed further and say; Alas, if I had armed myself against Satan or if I had not of long time set open the way for him, or if I had not wrought the means for him to beguile me: God had preserved me. But mine own negligence is to blame for it, thereof it comes that I have yielded myself to this wicked lust, against the which I should have strived at the first. And so you see yet again what we have to mark when we be to examine ourselves well and what doctrine we have to gather of this saying, that inquiry must be made whether there have been any former hatred betwixt the parties that are spoken of in this place.

Now finally, whereas it is said, That there is no judgment of death upon such a man, it serves to prove the thing better that which I have spoken already namely that if a man be not guilty by his own purpose, intent, or will; he ought not to be taken for an offender. God acquits him, and therefore he ought not to be condemned by men or by any creature. This ought to serve us for a further confirmation of the doctrine which I take in hand to expound. Men can always well grant that faults are willing. When the Heaven wrote of the matter, they spake after this manner: the Law punishes not the events of things, but the intents of them. And when the Philosophers wrote thereof, they could wet skill to say, there is neither vice nor virtue which proceeds not of the will. Yet for all this, we cease not to blear our own eyes, neither do we think ourselves to have offended, unless our hands be bloody, or that there appear some evident token to the worldward or (to be) that we be convicted of the doing of some wicked deed. But that is against my former saying, that is to wit, that all sins proceed of the will. Therefore when we intend to examine ourselves thoroughly, let us learn to begin at our wills. And if we find no evil deed in ourselves, that is to say neither malice, nor evil will; then is it no crime. And whereas I say that evil affection is willing, yet for all that I exclude not men's inquiries: for it is not for naught that God has distinguished sins and misdeeds into two sorts; whereof the one sort are called crimes, and the other sort are called ignorance. Although then that men have no intent or meaning to do amiss, yet is it not to be said that therefore they be righteous. But my meaning now is that there be no wicked affection or desire in us, so as we be not disposed to it of any will, but that the whole matter stands upon mischance that ensues. And I call it mischance after the custom of common speech. For it behooves us to refer all things to Gods providence, and not to think that any thing can fall out through fortune. Nevertheless it is a common manner of speech among us, to say that a thing happens by chance or fortune, when it comes to pass on our side. That then is the thing in effect, which we have to note, in that our Lord says that there shall no judgment of death pass upon a man that have given his neighbor a deadly blow, without any malice born to him before: but that he shall be quite, if his striking of him were without fore purpose or intent of will.

And furthermore we see here in few words how our Lord meant to forbid us to be moved to anger one against another, and has vouchsafed to bear with our imperfections so far, that to eschew greater inconveniences he will have the guiltless person to get him our of the way for a time. True it is (as I have declared heretofore) that his intent is also to show how greatly we ought to abhor murder. But howsoever the case stand, yet it does behoove us to mark well Gods gracious goodness, in maintaining peace and concord by all means possible. Were we such as we ought to be, there should be as it were but one common league of fellowship among us: but now are we fain to be separated asunder; so as every man gets himself alone, every man has his goods by himself, every man has his possessions several, and every man has as it were a propriety alone: and that is because of our infirmity. And true it is that this Law might be general: but there are many other means whereby God shows us how he bears with our infirmities. Is it not a piteous case that two brethren cannot live quietly together, without contention and strife; and that even the father and the son also should be at the same point? These are shameful things and utterly against nature, so as it may well be said that we be worse than wild beasts, seeing that even they which are linked together in so near and holy bond, cannot bear one with another that they might line together in friendship. But what? The vices of men are so great, that to eschew greater mischief's, sometime the parties that ought to be nearest together, are same to be set furthest asunder. And the same manner of dealing does God use in this place. He will have a man to forsake his own house and possessions, and to go into a strange place. And wherefore? To the end that the party which was moved to wrath for love of his neighbor, should have no occasion to do worse, nor be provoked by seeing him before his eyes. Now then since we see this, let us briefly mark the goodness which God uses towards us, which is more than the love of a father, in that he bears with us in our vices, and finds it means to keep us from flinging out at random, and more over gives us warning by his own example to prevent or cut off all occasions of evil. Therefore let us beware: for the devil is always watching & will soon take us in a trip, if we admit never so final an occasion of doing evil. So then let us bridle ourselves short, and be well advised, saying thus to ourselves: O, if I commit such a thing I may be tempted with such an evil, and therefore I had need to labor to keep myself from it. For why? The devil is over wylie for me, and if I cast myself once into his nets, what will become of me? For God shows us how we ought to live, and how to cut off all occasions of evil, and that if there be anything that may lead us to any evil, we must shun it beforehand. Seeing then that God has sung us such a lesson, let us take heed not only that we abstain from all evil deeds, whereby we may corrupt and defile our whole life and utterly cast ourselves into all disorder; but also that we eschew all things that may lead us to evil by any indirect ways.

Now let us kneel down before the Majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel then more and more, that every of us may so bethink us of our sins, as we become our own judges and learn to condemn ourselves, that we may obtain forgiveness of the heavenly judge, so as he may pick us and bury all our transgressions by which we be guilty before him: and that wee may examine our sins narrowly daily more and more, to the end that being mortified unto them we may daily draw near to his righteousness whereunto he calls us by his word. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and Nations of the earth & c.

On Friday, the 6th of December 1555
The 113th Sermon, which is the second upon the nineteenth Chapter

8 And when the Lord your God shall have enlarged your borders, as he has sworn to your fathers, and has given you all the land which he promised to give to your fathers:

9 (Conditionally that you have an eye to all his commandments, to do them, which I command you this day, and that you love the Lord your God; and walk continually in his ways:) then you shall add three other towns to those three,

10 To the intent that innocent blood be not shed in the midst of the Land which the Lord your God gives you to inherit, and that blood be not upon you:

11 But if a man have hated his neighbor, and have lyen in wait for him, and risen up against him, and smitten him that he die; and thereupon be fled into one of those Cities:

12 Then the Elders of that City shall send and take him thence, and deliver him into the hand of the next kinsman, and he shall die.

13 Your eye shall not spare him: but you shall take away the guiltless blond from Israel, that it may go well with you.

We saw yesterday how it was Gods will to have the inconveniences prevented, which are wont to be seen when men suffer occasions of evil uncut off. And that is so in what better expressed in this saying which Moses adds: Beware (said he) that guiltless blood be not shed in your land. Then it is not enough to punish murders after they be committed; but we must also have the wisdom to prevent them beforehand and to take such order as they may not be committed. And forasmuch as Satan needs but a small gap to thrust us out at, let us be watchful in this case of preventing occasions of evil as has been said afore. Moreover let us also mark this saying, that the blood shall be upon those that suffer things to slip so. For though a man can protest that he consented not to the doing, of an evil deed, yet not withstanding if he suffered it so as it came to pass through his negligence: he shall be taken as accessory. The old proverb is true, that he which suffers a thing to be done and may let it, is the doer of it. And therefore if a Judge that has the sword in his hand do suffer evil deeds to be done and punish them not: it is all one as if he committed them himself. It is not enough for him to say I would it were otherwise: but he must show it by his doings. To be short, when men bear with such as trouble the order of the common weal; it is all one as if they bolstered them in it. Again by such examples things are let at a general liberty, so as custom is taken for law. And therefore look what mischief or inconvenience ensues afterward, the blame of it is to be imputed to those that remedied it not when time was. That is the cause why it is said that the blood shall be upon a whole Nation, when men have not been held short that they might not commit murders.

For that manner of speech is very rise in the Hebrew tongue. And in the same respect also did the Jews say, his blood be upon us and upon our children: that is to say, let the blame light upon us. We must not bring here fantastical imaginations as the Rabbines (that is to say the Jewish doctors) do, who alleging always their own dreams, do say that the souls of the murdered do asks vengeance continually at Gods hand, until they have had justice done unto them. All such sayings are but dosages. For although their blood cry not at all, yet does God hear them, as he himself declares; and there needs neither solicitor nor attorney to require justice at his hand; he can tell well enough how to do his office, without any importunate calling upon him. The very cause why it is said that blood cries, for that God has an eye to the evil that is committed, and it is all one with him as if the case: I were followed with never so great suite. Worldly judges make no great force of a crime when it is committed, unless they be called upon very earnestly, and that the matter be stout lie pursued. But God declares himself to be no such, and that his own seeing of the misdeed is enough, for nothing can scape him, and therefore it is all one with him as if the whole world took the quarrel in hand, and every man followed the suit of it with tooth and nail. God then tarries not for our speaking, but as one that knows his office well enough, he can skill to put to his hand when need is: and therefore let us tarry his leisure. And surely it is a doctrine of great comfort. For although we hold our peace when men misuse us; yet does not God fail to have his hand lifted up to succor us. Therefore let us be patient in our afflictions and wrongs, and whatsoever come of it God will not fore flow: it is enough that he sees me persecute us wrongfully: let us content ourselves with that: the less that we speak of it, the readier will he be to relieve us: yea though we speak not one word of it: Not that it is not meet for us to call upon him, that he may vouchsafe to pity us: but that we should not be desirous of revenge, nor bear any malice to our enemies. If we hold our peace in that respect, and tarry Gods leisure for the succor which it shall please him to send us: let us not doubt but he will do his office, and therefore let us comfort ourselves with that hope.

Moreover forasmuch as it is said that the blood shall be upon us; let us be afraid of it: and although we be not pursued nor complained of by men, yet let us assure ourselves our market is never a whit amended by it, for God sleeps not, but marks all the misdeeds that are done, and they must all needs come to account. Therefore let us be pure before him: and let us not only abstain from evil deeds, but also beware that we consent not to any evil, for then shall we be held as accessories, and wrap ourselves in the same condemnation with the deed doers, as it is witnessed unto us here. For God speaks not only to the murderers themselves, but also to all the people. When this Law is broken and murders are freely committed for want of good execution of justice; God said not that he will require it at the hands of two or three, but at the hands of all in general. Now then seeing the case stands so, what shall become of those that are in authority and reign are accessories? Shall not they be the first that shall answer for it? To be short, we have to gather upon this text, that when an out rage or wrong is done to any man, not only the principal shall be punished, but also the whole Nation in common shall have the curse lie upon them, and must come to reckoning for it before God. To our seeming it is enough when we can say, that we would fain that men should live in peace, and yet in the meanwhile we see men grieved and vexed before our eyes, and we vouchsafe not to open our mouths to succor the innocent, but though we have both opportunity and ability, yet we let all slip, & we bear ourselves in hand that God ought not to require it at our hands: but here we see the contrary. Let us mark well then, that to the uttermost of our power, wee must set ourselves in defense of the innocents so as they may not be vexed, fleeced or troubled, nor might be suffered to overcome right, as they say. Let every of us in his degree look to the remedying hereof. Let such as have the sword of justice show themselves stout in this case and not suffer disorder to have full scope. And as for those that are not of ability, let them yet at leastwise do the best they can to comfort such as have no body to uphold them. And when we see these lusty gallants step up and take more upon them than is lawful; let us become their enemies, let us hinder their misdealing, and let us withstand them. That is the thing which we be bound unto by Gods word; otherwise we shall be held as accessories to their misdoings. If we have not prevented them, it is a consenting to them, and God must demand an account of it at our hands.

Here it is to be noted further, that whereas God says: that the people of Israel shall add three other Cities of refuge, after that their bounds are enlarged: thereby we be done to understand, that the more power and ability that GOD gives us, the more are we bound to employ it, to comfort innocents, and to succor them at their need. And this ought to be put in use generally by all men of authority and governors. The more power then that a Magistrate has, the more ought he to so think himself bound to maintain the good and guiltless under his protection, and to be a help, to them that they be not troubled. Often times he that would relieve good men, is not able: yea and peradventure he himself also shall be oppressed. In such cases we must have recourse unto God, & bow down our shoulders, tarrying till he have pity upon us, and in the meanwhile we must arm ourselves with patience. But when a man is armed with Gods power; then it shall not be enough for him to make of things, and to be somewhat sorry for them; but he must also employ the authority that God gives him, and the same rule ought to be observed of every of us particularly. To be short, forasmuch as God gives power to Kings, Princess, and all other Magistrates; they ought to employ all that ever they have, to the defense of those whom God has committed to their charge, and to deal in such sort as their subjects be not wrongfully molested. Look here a rule that concerns such as have the sword of justice in their hand. Nevertheless, it behoves every of us to follow the same order. And although we be not armed with the sword of justice yet notwithstanding if God give us any ability or opportunity, let us look to it that we help the good and succor them in their need. Therefore if a rich man see a poor man suffer wrong; let him help him and relieve him. If a man of discretion see a poor man destitute of counsel, so as he knows not what to do: let him give him his advise as the case serves. If a man have credit whereby he may deliver them that are in distress: let him likewise employ it for his part. Thus you see how we ought to put this saying in use, When God shall have enlarged your bounds, then shall you add three Cities more. You see here how our Lord measures his ordinance for the relief of good men, and of such as were in danger without deserving it or without any guilt. Therefore his will is to have the thing doubled which he had ordained for their relief. And why so? It is to do us to understand, that the more benefits we have received at Gods hand, the more are we bound and indented both to God and to our neighbors.

But now let us come to that which Moses interlaces here, insomuch as you shall observe all these things which I command you, to love the Lord your God, to keep all his commandments, and to walk in his fear. Here he makes (as you would say) a kind of conjuration, as if he should adjure the people after this manner; Look well to this commandment that you despise it not, if you love the Lord your God and seek to obey him. As if he should say, Indeed a map would think at the first sight that this were nothing: but be you sure that your God will have you to observe such humanity diligently. And therein he tries whether you be loving and obedient unto him or no. To be short; Moses meant to show here, that this commandment is of great importance before god, to the intent that men should not despise it. And here withal we have to mark, that we cannot omit any of the things that God commands, without doing wrong to the Lawmaker: for it is an embracing of his authority. And for that cause is it said that he which despises any of the least things that are contained in the kingdom of heaven; that is to say, shall be, utterly shaken off. Our Lord then will have us to reverence his Law, and to observe it without respect of this or that, so as we must not allege, This is a small matter, this a venial sin, there is no great conscience to be made of it. When GOD has opened his holy mouth, and vouchsafed to ordain one thing or other; becomes it us to make small account of it? If a Lord Great matter speak a thing, men say not; is the matter great or small? but thus they say, the king spake it. And is that that may suffice in mortal creatures; shall we reply to the contrary, and make it an occasion of evil doing and of rebelling against the living God, when he declares his will unto us? Shall we say it is a thing of no great importance, and that it is not so grievous and heinous an offence? Indeed there are some commandments which our Lord urges more than other some, but yet must we in all cases and all respects observe that which our Lord Jesus Christ said: Those things ought to be done, and the other not to be left undone: so that forasmuch as God has given us his Law, it behooves us to keep it, and not to divide it; as who should say, I will keep this point, and let that point alone. Nay, if we believe God, we must look that we submit ourselves to him, yea even to the uttermost title. But now let us consider how it is said here, inasmuch as you observe these things. Here Moses drives men to the observing of the Law, when any particular thing is to be done which God hash ordained. And it is as much as if he should say, Have an eye to the Lawmaker, which rules you. Therefore when you have anything to do; we must always have this consideration with us, to think that God declares his will therein: and that must suffice us. Why so? For there is but one rule of well doing; and to call the things in question which are contained in his Law, is all one as if we refuted to be ruled by the mouth and word of God. Therefore the Law must have his full course, and we must not go about to separate the things which God has so knit and united together.

But herewithal Moses brings us back again to the thing that he had treated of before; that is to wit, which is the true keeping of the Law and to what end it tends. The true keeping of the Law is to give ear unto God in all that he said.

Keep all the commandments (said he), as if he should say, we must not serve God after our own liking, when things come to pass according to our hearts desire: neither must we take leave to dispense with ourselves, when we meet with anything that is hard. It is not for us to part stakes with GOD after that manner: but wee must call to mind how Saint James said, that he which breaks any one point is guilty of the whole law. The reason is the same which I have alleged afore, namely that when we encounter Gods ordinance, we deface his majesty as much as in lies.

True it is that we can never fulfill Gods law, I say there was never yet so perfect a man in the world, but he came far you of the perfection that God shows us. But yet must we tend towards it: though we be far off from the mark, and but halfway onward of our journey; yet must we go forward still, and not think to content God by doing some little piece of it for the love of him, and in the rest take leave to behave ourselves as we list. Let us not think that God admits such compositions: but that we must in all points confirm our whole life to his will. And although we attain not to the full performance; yet our desire must be to do so as I have declared before.

And now let us come to that which he adds, namely to what end the keeping of Gods Law tends, that is to wit that we should love him. Whereby we be done to understand, that our Lord's intent is not to draw us to a sluttish fearfulness, but to have us to take pleasure and delight in honoring him, and in doing his commandments: for it is certain that without this love, all our service shall be refused as unprofitable. Indeed this matter has been expounded already heretofore: nevertheless it is good reason that we should be put in remembrance of it, as often as the holy Ghost speaks thereof: for here is no superfluity. And it is a doctrine that we cannot be persuaded of at the first, that it behooves us to serve God freely and with a willing love. Truly we must not love God as our fellow or mate: but we must stand in awe of him, not as enforced by necessity, so as we should grind our teeth in grudging against him; but as yielding our hearts to him, by letting all our delight in his Law, as David protests himself to have done, by which example of his he shows us also our duty. You see then how GOD requires that we should serve him of free will, yea and that we should also love him. And indeed whence proceeds true obedience, but of the knowledge of the will of our GOD, and that we take him for our father, to the end that we on our side might behave ourselves like children towards him? Until we become to that point, it is impossible for us to go about to serve our GOD with a good will: we shall have nothing but stubbornness in us, so as (if it were possible) we could find in our hearts never to come at him. But when we have once tasted of his goodness; then are we allured to love him out of hand.

Seeing then that men have felt God a father towards them; it becomes them to answer him in like sort again, and to be as children towards him. And so we see here again, how the Law may be duly kept by us: that is to wit, by loving our GOD. For thereupon it will come to pass that we shall walk in all his ways, for God cannot be divided from his word. If we love him, it is certain that we will endeavor to please and obey him. And this is seen even among mortal men: but yet there is a peculiar cause thereof in God. For (as I said before) God is never separated from his righteousness, which he declares unto us in his Law. Then if wee love him, we must needs like well of his Law, and take pleasure in observing the same. And therefore if a man say, I love GOD, I fear him, I honor him and in the meanwhile despise his word, and make no reckoning of it: it is but hypocrisy matched with shamelessness. For as I have said already, it is impossible that God should transform himself, to become as an idol by surcasting from his righteousness which in very deed is his own proper being. So then it is to be concluded, that we cannot otherwise love our God, than by giving ourselves over unto him, by endeavoring to serve and please him.

But now let us come to that which is said concerning such as would needs abuse the privilege by withdrawing themselves to the Sanctuary when they had committed a murder. If it happen that a man which hated his neighbour and killed him, do flee to the place of privilege: let the Elders of that place, that is to say the Rulers or Governors, (for it is a name of office): let the Governors and judges and Magistrates, take him and fetch him thence, that is to say, let them fetch him from the privileged place by strong hand, and put him into the hands of him that ought to revenge the bloodshed or of him that demands Justice, that he may be put to death, and let not your eye spare him, that is to say, have no pity nor compassion on him. Because we be moved when we see a man lament, and our eyes relent at it: that is to say, if we see a man in extreme heaviness of mind, by and by we be moved to pity his case: our Lord says that he will not have him to be pitiful, nor in any wise to relent, which ought to execute Justice. Go to work stoutly (said he), and let the offender be punished, notwithstanding his disclaiming of the privilege which GOD had granted for such as are guiltless and not for such as are faulty. This was declared partly yesterday: but it is well worthy to be laid forth more at large. To be short, let us have an eye to the expounding of Moseses words, and it will suffice us: for thereupon we easily gather a lesson greatly to our behoove. The words are, if a man that has slain his neighbor of prepensed malice and lying in wait for him, do get him into one of those franchised Cities. Wherein we see that the wicked do always seek to abuse the things that are ordained for the succor of good men, and are boldest in taking the benefit of them. The Magistrates therefore must have an eye thereunto, and beware that the wicked abuse not the things that are granted for the relief of Gods children for that is too great a scorning of Laws. And it is not without cause that our Lord speaks of it here for it shows that the like kind of corrupt dealing has been in all ages: and we must not marvel at it, seeing that the world is not amended since, but rather appaired. Let us look well about us therefore, that if a man which has committed any misdeed do go about to hide himself or to scape away by some direct means, it may not avail him. That is the thing which we have to mark in the first place.

And whereas it is said that the judges shall pull him away: it serves to them that it is not enough for men to make good Laws & statutes, but there must also be courage to execute them; there must be a stout and constant mind in those that bear authority: For although that Laws be proclaimed by the sound of the trumpet, and written of record with newer so great solemnity: yet are they but dead and all is nothing worth, except that they which sit in the seat of justice, have the constancy that our Lord enjoins here, and be stout in maintaining the things that are enacted, that men may not laugh them to scorn as we see that the wicked sort do, which make but a mock at them. If a Law have once been proclaimed, they bear themselves in hand that it will be buried within three or four days after. You see then how it is a good and profitable warning for all such as have the sword of justice in hand, to have this stoutness of mind and constancy. And for as much as it is not to be found in men, (for it is a special venue attributed to the spirit of God): let such as are in office beseech God to strengthen them, so as they may use force of hand when need requires, and not be afraid when they see such troubles as might abash them, but stoutly withstand them, yea and also outstand them. That is one thing further which we have to mark upon this place.

Now this thing is to be applied likewise to that instructing of every of us. I say let private patrons also look well to the repressing of evil doings, and that with such stoutness that although they be threatened to put them in fear, yet it may not turn them away from doing their duty. For what a thing were it if we should be afraid at every turn? The lifting up of a mans little finger would scar us; and though we were newer so willing to do our duty, yet if any man stepped afore us to turn us from our purpose, every word of his mouth (as I said) would be enough to put us out of heart. But the case concerns the serving of our God, wherein we must overcome all the assaults of Satan, and all the impediments that the world can devise. Now if it behove us to fight so valiantly against Satan & all his endeavors should we be afraid of men, or stand in dread of them? Should they so scar us that we should leave our God behind? So then, to the intent we may do our duty, let us learn to strengthen ourselves. And at one word, it stands us in hand to mark well, that no man shall ever discharge his duty towards God, except he enforce himself and have such a courageous constancy, as may surmount all temptations: and that is a thing greatly for our behalf to mark. For a hundred times a day shall we have occasions to thrust us our of the way; & we resist them full coldly. Again, if we be to do any good, we make excuses and say, I would fain do my duty, but I see such an impediment, and by that means I am held back. Because that they which are under the tyranny of the Pope in there days, cannot have leave to do well and to serve God purely, without putting of their lives in hazard: they bear themselves in hand that they be discharged, when they can make this excuse to say, I would fain do otherwise; but I am not suffered to do it, it shall never come to account before God. And we need not to go far for proof of the matter. Even here where there is no persecution to hinder the serving of God, but rather encouragement to men to do well, yet nevertheless we have many distresses. For Satan is subtle enough to find every day new inventions to turn us from the right way. What remains then, but to go to it with force and to do our endeavor to serve our God in such wise; that if we meet with any lets to turn us aside, they may be overcome by the constancy and courage that I spake of, which it behoves us to require of the holy Ghost.

Furthermore let us mark, that the offender must be delivred into the hand of him that into revenge the bloodshed, or else of him that demands justice: Whereby we may perceive that God allows no [private] revenges. For we know what rule is given us in the holy scripture: My brethren, (said S. Paul) forbear revenge, yea; desire it not but put it altogether into the hands of the heavenly Judge, to whom it belongs. Nay (which more is) we be commanded to render good for evil, to pray for them that curse us, to do good to our enemies and to such as persecute us. Since it is so then, we must assure ourselves, and be fully resolved of it, that our Lord will have our affections bridled, so as we desire not any revenge though cause thereof be ministered; but rather strive to overcome the evil by doing good. Look whereunto God calls us. And why then is it said here, that the Offender shall be put into the hand of him that requires Justice? Let us note that the Laws which are made for civil or outward government, serve not to overrule men's affections: they be things that go asunder. Truth it is that they be not repugnant, neither is there any contrariety in them: but we must have the discretion to consider, that when God spake as king of Israel and made statutes but for common policy; he respected not the spiritual perfection that is contained in the law which is our rule to all holiness and righteousness. A Judge therefore may well agree to one that requires Justice at his hand; and although he be led with wicked affection, yet ought the judge to grant him his right. And that is for our profit. For many men bear themselves in hand, that so they use the ordinary way of justice, it is lawfull for them to do what they can, & they shall not be condemned for it before God, if their quarrel be just. But it may fall out many a time, that a quarrel shall be just, and a man shall pursue it by good means; and yet in the meanwhile he shall not fail to be worthy of blame before God. For there are three things required. The guard must first be just and good: secondly the mean must be lawful: and thirdly the affection must be pure and well ruled. Now this third point wants in most men. As how? Some man perchance is misused, and he has just cause to require redress at the judges hand: he intends neither to strike nor to practice anything against his adversary by treachery, but resorts to the justice: this is a lawful remedy, it is ordained of God, we may safely use it with good conscience. So are there two of the points to be found here. But yet this man that has the just cause, and seeks no remedy but by order of Justice, fails not sometimes to do amiss. As how? If he have a desire of revenge in his heart, is he conceive such rancor that he seeks to be so revenged as the party may perceive he has done evil and cannot be contented and satisfied till he see himself to have requited like for like to him that has offended him: such a man is blamable before God. For he takes covert under the name of Justice, to be revenged of his enemy. It is in vain for him to allege the goodness of his quarrel; for he does but abide the remedy that God had ordained. What is to be done then? When we be desirous to demand justice, let every of us enter into ourselves and examine what our affections are, and see that we be clear from all ill will. When there is such soundness in us; then is it Lawful for us to pursue offences done against us, and to require that they may be punished, namely so there be no rancor nor malice in our hearts. Now then if a man have none other respect than the punishing of the misdeed, and that he hate not the party ne be led by any wicked desire: then shall he be allowed of God, and not otherwise. But such examples are very rare. For as soon as men begin to go to Law, by and by enmity bewrays itself, and such a fire is kindled as cannot be quenched, so as this proverb is very true, that suit in Law and friendship are two things that can hardly join to together. Now then let us bethink our Celtics, and not imagine that the having of good right, and our seeking of it by order of Law, can utterly excuse us before God: for our hearts must be dented from all evil will, and from all wicked affection as I said before. Moreover let us mark well the conclusion which is added in this place: When Moses said your eye shall not spare the man that has treacherously murdered his neighbor of set purpose; if a murder be committed in heat of choler as they say, it shall not be held excused, but the land shall abide still defiled, until it be punished. This was declared sufficiently yesterday. Now he treats here of a more heinous murder: which is, that a man having conceived hatred and rancor against his neighbor, lies in wait for him, and kills him willfully: for that is the term that is proper to the murders that are committed of set purpose and prepensed malice. And that kind of murder is unpardonable: to grant savor in such a case, is to overthrow the whole order of nature, and all laws written. So then, it is not without cause that God said here, your eye shall not spare him. For sometime we make our market of other men's welfare, of their profit, or of their harms, according to the common proverb, which said that we cut large thongs of other men's leather. When a man has offended, the judge, who was not hurt by it, ne suffered any harm, will easily pardon it. What, said he? It was a small matter. But if a man had done the like to him: he could find in his heart that God should thunder down from heaven for the punishing thereof: and yet in another mans case he does make a move at it. Tush (says he) this may well be let slip, this will vanish away of itself. See how a man shall oftentimes be moved to pity and compassion towards someone, and deal cruelly with some other: yea he will become cruel to a whole realm to spare one man. This is daily seen: O say they, this poor man is to bee pitied. Yea, but in the meantime, is a wicked deed do pass unpunished, all that whole realm is defiled and corrupted by it, and it is a provoking of Gods wrath against the whole Nation. Again, others take example by it to give themselves to all lewdness, when they be in hope that crimes shall scape unpunished. Men consider not that such kind of mercy is the cause of innumerable cruelties, and that it turns to the common confusion of all men. And therefore whereas our Lord said that we must not spare him that has done such evil deeds; it is to show that we must not be merciful after our own manner, to overthrow a great number for the sparing of one man; but that we must have an eye to right and indifference.

And herewith all he shows us again, how dear our lives are to him, in that he will not suffer a murder to be committed, without vengeance for it. Herein we see say his fatherly care over us. Now if he set such store by this transitory life, and show himself to be the defender thereof; what will he do touching the life of our souls. Well has he showed by one gage how greatly he loves it, and what store he sets by it, in that he had not spared his only son for it. Then let us bethink us here, that seeing our Lord tells us how he has a care of this transitory life, and vouchsafes to take it into his custody, whereby he shows his favor and goodness towards us in that behalf; in so much that, although our bodies be but worms and rottenness, yet notwithstanding he vouchsafes to stoop so low as to have regard of it. We ought to consider well such goodness, and to bear in mind that seeing God loves us so much, we ought not to bite one another, nor to be as cats and dogs, since our God will have us to be knit so together in the bond of brotherly love. Therefore inasmuch as we know Gods goodness and fatherly love towards us; let us learn to restrain ourselves from doing any harm or wrong to our neighbors. And afterward let the same lead us yet further: that is to wit, that forasmuch as God holds us under his protection, and holds out his hand to succor us: we in the mean season must look up higher; namely to the heavenly life which he has prepared for us; not doubting but that he will preserve our souls much more than our bodies. Let us be fully resolved of that, to the intent that we may call upon him with full boldness.

And although we be beset with infinite dangers; yet let us go forward, assuring ourselves that our God will strengthen us seeing he has a care of us. And moreover, that although no man require revenge for us; yet he himself will require it. Therefore let us be contented to be in such wise under his protection, that if any man do us any outrage, he will have his hand lifted up to succor us at our need. Let us content ourselves therewith, say I; and let us walk on in simplicity and uprightness being patient in all our adversities, waiting Gods leisure till he provide convenient remedy for us. And as for those that fit in the seat of Justice, and have authority in their hand; let them also do their office duly, so as they may yield a good & faithful account of their doings at the last day.

Now let us kneel down before the majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make us feel them better than we have done, that we may be drawn more and more to true repentance, and be so cast down in ourselves, as we may rise up again in him & seek him, and so rest upon his promises, that through his invincible power we may fight valiantly both against Satan and all his champions, and also against the world: and that although we be sometimes hindered to serve him, yet we may go through with our race, until we become to the mark whereunto he calls us. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us, but also to all people & nations of the earth, &c.

On Saturday, the 7th of December 1555
The 114th Sermon which is the third upon the
nineteenth Chapter

14 You shall not remove your neighbors bounds which bounded your predecessors in your heritage that you shall possess in the land which the Lord your God gives you to possess.

15 Let not one witness alone rise up against a man for any manner of trespass or sin, or for any fault that he offends in: but at the word of two or three witnesses shall the matter be established.

For the better understanding of that which is commanded and forbidden here concerning bounds or limits; we have to mark first of all, that God in giving the land of Chanaan to his people, had ordained that partitions should be made, and his intent was the same should continue forever. For although sales were made; yet behooved it that in the year of Jubilee, all things should return to their former state again. And Eleazer the high priest & Josua were to make those partitions, which should endure to the end. Now there was moreover assigned to every house an inheritance. For the tribes having parted the land after that manner, agreed afterward as touching the heads of their houses: but yet for all that, it behooved the former partition to continue still, and that the others nevertheless should enjoy their goods, and that if any sale were made, it should be under such condition, as every man might afterward return to his own inheritance, at the time that God had appointed. Now let us come to that which said here. Gods will is that the bounds (which we in this country call limits) should remain fast, so as no man might alter any of them: and this served as well for the universal inheritance of the whole body of the nation, as for the peculiar possessions of every several person. And although there was a special reason for the people of Israel (as I have touched heretofore) yet did the heathen know well enough, that if the same thing were observed other where also, there would be no uprightness among men, but all would go to confusion. And therefore they held it for a crime. When any man altered the landmarks, & it was counted a kind of falsehood even among the Heathen. And to the intent it should be taken for holy matter, they made a God of it, according to their common manner, which was to mingle some superstition with their matters to hold folk in awe, when they intended to bridle them. Now it was a devilish invention to set up an idol for the maintenance of equity between men. Yet notwithstanding, we see how nature has always taught us this principle, that if bounds & limits were not kept and maintained, there would be a horrible confusion among men, and no laws would be any longer kept.

Therefore to benefit ourselves by this text, we must mark two things. The one is not only that the children of Israel had the possession of the land of Chanaan of Gods gifts; but also that the partitions thereof were made by his appointment & authority. The other is, that if the like order be not kept among other men; there will be neither equity nor upright dealing, but all will be full of the every & quarrelling.

Now as touching Gods bounding of the land in that wise; we may understand thereby what care he had of his people, how that in so doing he showed himself a father. Again it was to the end that the tribes should always be severed, so as there might be no confusion, because the tribe of Lewie was to have the priesthood, & the redeemer was to come of that tribe of Juda. In these respects it was Gods will that this order should be kept among his people: the maintaining of the bounds was not for their possessions sake, but for the respects afore mentioned. And we in these days must about all things mark the afore-touched thing, that is to wit the said equity, which cannot be continued between man and man, unless their grounds be bounded out, so as every man may know his own possessions. And this serves as well for kingdoms & lordships, as for private possessions. It is said in the Psalm that our Lord pitched the bounds of kingdoms, at such time as it pleased him that the nations should be divided asunder. But we see how the covetousness, ambition, and insatiable greediness of princes has put all out of order, & there is not so holy a thing that can stay them from encroaching upon the bounds of their neighbors & next borders. For when they seek so to enlarge their own dominions, it is a breaking of order of nature. Behold, God has separated one nation from another: and it is to the ends that all should live, and communicate one with another, and that there might be no confused disorder: You see then how all men ought to hold themselves contented with their own bounds. But men play the loose colts their covetousness carries them away; all their seeking is to make themselves still greater. We see then that the wars which are taken in hand upon ambition, or covetousness, are as a spiting of God, by perverting the order which he has set in nature, & which he would have kept as most holy. Now then since we see such confusion, we have good cause to be sorry; & to think it no wonder though so great a mischief draw along talk after it. For when God is so despised, by the

And here withal let us mark, that when men go about to enrich themselves by wicked and unlawful means, it is a plucking up of the bounds and limits as men term them: and that is a plain falsehood. What is to be done then? Like as weights and measures ought to be maintained justly, & likewise coins, because that if faithfulness be not observed in them, there can be no more dealing between man & man: so are bounds and landmarks to be kept & maintained also. If weights and measures be false, there will be no more merchandise: there can be neither buying nor selling: men shall become as wild beasts among themselves. If coin be not lawful, all must needs turn to thievery & stealth. The like reason is in bounds & limits. And therefore let us mark that Gods commanding of us to maintain them is not without cause: but that under that one particular kind, he comprehends all other things: showing thereby, that we must be careful to keep the things which we know to be necessary for the maintenance of the common weal, & of loving kindness between man & man. That is the thing which we have to remember upon this part of the text.

Also it is expounded allegorically by such as would have men to hold, themselves in all things & in all respects to antiquity. They be of opinion that God would have men to direct themselves by the laws & ordinances of their ancestors, & that nothing should be changed which had seemed to be good afore times. Yea, but we know, though a thing be ancient, is it be not also good, antiquity does but increase the evilness of it. And therefore what a thing were it, if we should be bound to observe all things without exception which our ancestors have done or said? Indeed changes are always to be feared, & we must eschew them as much as we can: but yet are the Papists so much the more fond & foolish to say, O, we may not alter the bounds which our ancestors have set: & therefore we must not now receive any new thing. Truly they misunderstand the case, in taking us to bring any novelty into the world. For what require we, but that gods word which has been at all times, should be set up again? Whereas it has been trodden under foot heretofore, & utterly forgotten; we seek to set it in, former state & authority. That is all that we desire. But under pretence of the ancient bounds & the meaning of Papists is to maintain themselves in possession of all their errors, idolatries, & abominations, which are so gross as it would pity a mans heart to think on them, & every blind folks may feel them. Seeing them that they be so willful; it is a flat mockery to allege those things in defense of their so long continued errors, which our Lord has ordained here for worldly

Let us mark then, that as touching Gods word, & as touching the doctrine of salvation, we had need of another manner of antiquity than the antiquity of men. In this case it is not for us to stand upon the decrees of our forefathers: but God must be he by whom our faith must be directed. You see then how we must resort to Gods everlastingness, if we will make a sure foundation. Nevertheless, as concerning men's laws, antiquity is to be honored, so as things be not changed upon foolish curiosity and rashness: for that were to be ever new to begin. Therefore let men hold them to the ancient laws as much as is possible. But when necessity requires alteration; there our Lords will have us to use the means that he shows & puts into our hands: & then to be willfully addicted to antiquity, is utter beastliness. As touching equity, (as Moses said here) let men beware of removing their bounds, & let every man content himself with his own & not ineroch upon his neighbor or next dweller by. Thus you see in effect what we have to mark upon this place.

Now here is another law, That one witness alone shall not be believed in any criminal case, whether it be trespass, offence, or forfeit, but that the case shall stand in the mouth of two or three witness. This law had been admitted by men, without knowing that ever Moses spoke it. For in very deed our Lord had printed the things in men's hearts, which he did set forth in writing to his people. Surely it was a special grace that he vouchsafed to take upon him the office of a lawgiver to the people of Israel. Yet notwithstanding he would not have men so brutish, as to be without these grounds of equity, even as they are contained in the law of Moses. Seeing then that there is such agreeableness, let us note that God never let mankind without some seed of uprightness remaining in them. True it is that men are sore blinded by reason of Adams sin: but yet had our Lord left still a certain discretion engraved in their hearts, and that is but only to make them inexcusable, as said St. Paul in the first chapter to the Romans. Howbeit, there was this further regard also, that mankind might be maintained, & that there might be some difference between men & beasts. That is the thing which we have to learn by the agreeableness that is found to be between the law of Moses & all the states of government that have been among all the Heathen in the world.

Moreover we must understand how it was Gods intent to ratify the thing among his own people, which was already know & observed of all men, to those intent that it might be of those more authority. For not only the consciences of the people of Israel did prove it unto them that there could be no order among men, without those things that are contained here: but also they were taught it by Gods own mouth, & therefore it behooved them to condescend to his saying with all fear & reverence. You see then that the people of Israel had a great advantage, & so have we at this day, inasmuch as we be succeeded in their room. But now let us come to that which is said here.

Our Lord will not have any one witness to be believed in any case: that is to say, he will not have his evidence credited, to give sentence upon it. Indeed witness must needs be admitted: for until they have been heard, a man can not tell what they will say. Sometimes it falls out, that four or five witnesses are brought forth in one case. & none of them all deposed according to those parties intent. And men bear themselves in hand, that they have witness in their sleeve: & yet when they have brought men forth, all is found to be but smoke. A man then may well take one witness alone: but yet must not judgment be given upon those hearing of him only. What a thing were it, if one person should be so credited that upon his bare word a man should be put to death, & be punished by law? You see it were too rigorous a thing. So then, it is not without cause that God had ordained that there should be two witnesses before a case were judged, that is to say, that a man should be convicted by two or three witnesses before sentence were given upon him as guilty, or before he were condemned to any punishment. For his speaking of three, is meant of any number above two. But by this express number, God meant to show how it were no reason that any one witness alone should be believed, & his saying so stood upon, that a body should be condemned for it: but that it is meet there should be a larger & more sufficient proof of the matter. The third witness then is not of necessity but as it were of over plus. It is all one as if he should say, If there be three witnesses, they be more than need; but at the least there must needs be two. Indeed here is no mention that the witnesses should be unblameable: but our Lord had showed already in other places, that inquisition must be made of the hatred & rancor that is among men; which ought to extend to witnesses as well as to other men: for although it be not spoken of them, yet both Moses presuppose that the witnesses must be worthy of credit, & such as have no sufficient cause in them why they should be rejected. That in effect is the thing that is contained here.

Now we be taught first & foremost by this text, that if any of us know of any evil, we must bear what it patiently until our Lord do bring it to light. For we see a number of men led with so unadvised zeal, that they think themselves to have wrong, if judgment be not given upon their bare word. O say they, I know a man that had committed such a wicked deed, I would therefore that he should be condemned for it. Yea, but he is not yet convicted of it. I know it, said he, yea, but we must not pervert those order of nature. Let us keep ourselves therefore from running headlong to be both witnesses & judges in any case: & let us tarry till our Lord brings things to light. And very needful it is that we should so do. For we see daily examples of great numbers that are straight in a chafe if a man believe them not. Yea, but yet for all that, was not our Lord wiser than we? Then let us learnt to restrain ourselves, & remember how St. Paul says, that there are some sins which make has to come to their condemnation, as though God did thrust the men forth by the shoulders, that they might come of themselves to discover their own shame: & that there be some other sins which God reserved to himself, & those lie lurking a long time. And indeed if we considered how God governs the world; this thing were apparent enough. But what? We judge at all adventure, without consideration of our Lords doing. We be not worthy to reap those benefit of his works, seeing we have not those modesty to refrain ourselves, & to wait patiently & quietly till God have performed his work, at which time we should perceive that he was not a sleep when we were grieved that things came not forward. You see then that sins may be committed, & some signs & tokens thereof shall come to sight, yea & it may hap that many men shall know of it. Behold there is a wicked man, & his faults arc known but yet it is not possible that he should be convicted of them by order of law. This is a sin that lied still in covert. Now of all this while (as it is said in Genesis) the party may go forth where he will, & wander in his own affection; but his sin is still at his door, & watched him surely for going out. God then lets men take their pleasure after that fashion for a time: & afterward bewrays them when it pleased him. And we see examples here of as I said afore. There arc some other sins which come to knowledge at the first push, as though God had sifted them out. Therefore we must mark this rule, that we may bridle ourselves, and not be too hasty to judge, but tarry patiently for the convenient time. Also we have to follow those rule which our Lord Jesus Christ gives us; namely that if any man have done amiss towards us, we warn him secretly ; & that if he receive not our warning we take two or three witnesses to us, that in their mouth the thing may be the better established. Now it is certain that in that place our Lord speaks of those faults that are unknown: for if there be an open offence given, so as the party may be openly convicted: it is not meant that I should say to him secretly in his ear, Sir you have done amiss. We see that our Lord Jesus Christ meaning was nothing so. As for those that allege that text nowadays when they have offended in the open face of those world, and say, Why do you not warn me of it secretly between you & me? [We answer them,] & why did not you hide yourself to do your naughtiness out of sight? You comes hither to poison a whole street; & you would have me to draw you aside into some corner to tell you of your fault. We see a number of these nice persons which know not one word of those gospel more than this text; & yet they do falsify that too. Our Lord speaks there of those sins that are unknown, & whereof they have no witnesses. Therefore it behooved us to follow the order which we hear in that behalf. When a man had done amiss & there is none to bear witness of it, he must be admonished secretly, & have his fault laid afore him: & if he be willful, then must I take two or three witnesses with me, & prove it to his face: for otherwise it cannot be done. If we were so dealt with, we should not be so lusty as we be, at leastwise as a number of us are: but we would understand that it is our Lords will to keep us in use, & that whereas our faults come not to light at the first committing of them, but God seems willing to conceal them: the same is not without cause. And although it be a temptation that is hard for us to bear, yet both God do it to our benefit, to the intent that we should inure ourselves to patience, & strive against the evil, though we cannot discover it when we would.

Moreover let us mark also, that whereas our Lord punished not a number of faults in the sight of men, he suffers then to come to knowledge: thereby it is his will to show us, that we must walk before him, & that we must content ourselves with his record, although men know not what we be. It is said in the common proverb that a man's own conscience is as good as a thousand witnesses: and they that have said so, knew neither why nor wherefore. Yet notwithstanding God wrested that saying out of their mouths, as if a man should draw an offender to execution. On our part we must understand, that the reason is, that inasmuch as God enlightens our consciences & is the Judge of them; we have more than a thousand witnesses. For our sins must be laid open, not only before those Angels of heaven, but also before all creatures. Seeing then that our consciences are enlightened by God, & must answer before him: let us not think it strange that it should countervail a thousand witnesses. But now let us come to that which I spoke of. It may be that I live honestly & uprightly, so as my desire is to serve God, and to discharge myself towards my neighbors also, & all this shall be ill taken, & no man will cun me thank for my labor. If it grieve me that men perceive not the soundness that is in me, & thereupon do seek the more to be known; I receive my reward in this world, as says our Lord Jesus Christ. Nevertheless let us mark, that God to draw us to him, will oftentimes not suffer us to be known of men, but will have us to be taken for other than we be. And that is (as I said afore) to the end we should hold ourselves contented with his only record, & that those same should wey so much with us, as we might defy the whole world, so God allow of us. Mark that for one point. Again, when men grudge against us, we must have the courage and constancy to appeal continually unto God, and to take him for our sufficient warrant. Thus you see on the one side what we have to bear in mind.

But in the meanwhile we see how the wicked do mock both God and the world, & harden themselves in their lewdness, because they be not called forth to Justice for it, nor are punished for it. For sometimes they be born with, and sometimes also our Lord holds them at that stay to increase their condemnation. Yet notwithstanding let not us be tempted to resemble them, neither let us be grieved at their escaping so from the hands of men, and that they be not condemned out of hand by order of justice. For what shall they gain by it? So little is their market mended by it, that it shall serve to increase their confusion before God, as had been said already. If our Lord bring a man's sin to knowledge, it will surely grieve him at the first, and when he shall be driven to his shifts, it will make him to look about him and to think thus with himself: What though I am fallen and have committed this fault? Is it reason that men should come and rebuke me thus roughly at the first dash? I see such a one haunt there things more than I, and I see such a one offend more grossly than I, and yet they escape unpunished. I in the meanwhile have chanced to make a escape, rather of oversight than of any evil purpose; and must men be so rough and fierce upon me? Such complaints and murmurings shall a man hear; or if the party that is grieved make not complaint after that manner before men, yet fails he not to repine in his heart. But we regard not the foresaid things as we ought to do. And therefore our Lord perceiving us to be in danger of falling asleep, if our misdoings should be suffered and let slip at the first: puts us into the hands of men to be corrected by Justice. And his so doing is for our benefit. For we must always come back to this saying, that God chastised those whom he loved, showing thereby that he had his eye upon them as upon his children, & that therefore he holds them the nearer to him. That is the thing whereunto it would behoove us to have an eye. Nevertheless is our Lord give the wicked the bridle, so as they heap sin upon sin before it come to those knowledge of men, & no countenance is made towards them of punishing them, it is an increasing of their condemnation, by rankling in their own poison, & the devil wholly drives hem into a reprobate sense, until they be come to their full measure. Let us see what the inhabitors of the land of Canaan fared those better by Gods bearing with them by the space of four hundred years. They were already malicious and forward, there was no faithfulness nor loyalty among them, they were extremely cruel: moreover, whoredom, extortion, & such other like things reigned among them:

& for all that, God makes as though he saw it not. But what came of it? It was told Abraham that their iniquities were not yet come to the full. That saying is set down to us for a general rule. And therefore when our Lord forbears to condemn the wicked at the first push, let us assure ourselves that their iniquity is not yet full ripe. And how so? Is the sin of Gods children come to full ripeness at the first day as soon as they have done amiss? No: but our Lords intent is to chastise his children in such wise as amendment may ensue of it, that his correcting of them may serve for a salve to heal them: whereas his suffering of the wicked folks sins to come to full ripeness, is for that he punished them not but deadly. Thus you see what we have to bear in mind, where mention is made of two or three witnesses.

Furthermore, hereby we be warned not to make delay till we be convicted by witnesses before men. Let the remorse of our own conscience be a sufficient rebuke unto us: for it is as much as if God cited us before him, & made us to be indicted, & impaneled a quest upon us, & condemned us. Both our own conscience speak to us? It is as much as if God had made great Registers of our sins, & we saw witnesses brought in against us, not one or two, but a hundred. For (as I have said already) our own conscience is of more force than a hundred witnesses. You see how every man ought to look nearly to himself, so as we wrye not our mouths when we have done amiss, under color that no man had perceived us, & that there be no witnesses that can shame us for it before men. Also let us mark, that inasmuch as our Lord had sent us his Prophets and Apostles, they be such sufficient witnesses as shall be heard before all those private persons that can be brought forth at this day against us. St. Paul speaking to the Corinthians says, that seeing he had written to them already, & told them of their faults, and both likewise again the second time: if they amend not, it was all one as if they were convicted by two or three witnesses. Yea & he used this selfsame text, you know (said he) that God had ordained that two or three witnesses should be credited. Now, I come to you again; & look how many times I speak, so many records will it be against you before the heavenly Judge. I summon you not here before men: neither will God forget the things that I do towards you: for his stirring of me up to give you warning, is to hold you the more convicted.

Now let us apply these things to ourselves, & let us understand (as I said afore) that seeing we have Moses & the Prophets, we have witnesses now. True it is, that they speak not as now before men, they let us alone and trouble us not: but yet for all that let not us fall asleep, for our flattering of ourselves will stand us in no steed, but to plunge us the deeper in Gods curse. But forasmuch as our Lord sets us these witnesses before our faces: let every of us bethink himself; & seeing we have here our Lord Jesus Christ and his Apostles, let us be the more moved to make our own inditements and to prevent Gods judgments. For if we condemn ourselves, it will be a mean to obtain favor at his hand: and our faults shall be forgiven us, if we crave pardon what unfained misliking of them, desiring to depart quite & clean from them. And not only those Prophets & Apostles shall be our witnesses before God; but also all those faithful that ever have been in the world shall reprove our unbelief & disobedience; if we become not the better by the doctrine that had been preached unto us. And for that cause both the Apostle in the twelfth to the Hebrews say, that we must have a good eye to the great and thick cloud of witnesses. He used this similitude there, which at the first may seem fond; nevertheless it is not without cause that he said there is a great & thick cloud of witnesses, after he had made mention of the Martyrs that had suffered. For we see that the faithful were constant to death, & held out to the uttermost when men went about to turn them away from the law of God, so as they could not be made to swerve or step aside for any torments that were put unto them. All they (said he) are witnesses: As if he should say, there needs none other process against us before god, for our negligence in these days : in so much that if we faint for fear, & forsake God & his word; our process is sufficiently concluded; & information is already given against us said he. And why so? For it is not a two or three witnesses only, but a great cloud of witnesses that stand up against us, which are able even to stop our eyes. Seeing then that the case stands so with us: let us note that it behooves us to set our eyes more advisedly upon God, & to better ourselves in such wise by the things wherewith he enlightens us in his word, & by the doctrine which he will have to be confirmed unto us by such witnesses as he raised up, & daily brings forth, as we tarry not till he shame us & confound us before men: but let every of us condemn himself. Thus you see what we have to mark in making comparisons betwixt the judgments of men and the judgments of God. Namely that although men do let us alone, we must not think we have sped the better, for our inditement is thoroughly framed afore the heavenly Judge, though our faults were hidden & buried before men, so as never any mention or inkling were made of them.

Now to make a conclusion of this text, whereas he said that all cases shall be established in the mouths of two or three witnesses: it was our Lords will to speak here generally, doing us to understand that if that were not, there would be no more order among men. For if men will not be contented with two witnesses, offences must needs be fostered, & there will be every day greater disorder than other, whereby Gods wrath shall be provoked against the whole country, as had been said before. Therefore is it requisite that all matters should be stayed & concluded at the mouth of two or three witnesses. That is those drift of Moses in speaking so. Howbeit, men will allege thus: It is a dangerous matter; for false witnesses may be suborned, & if they be believed, a man may soon be oppressed, & he might be wronged in a rightful case. It is true that such allegation may be made, & examples thereof are to be seen. But yet both it not follow that there should not be some certain rule for men to direct themselves by, & to hold themselves unto, whatsoever inconveniences may be alleged. For we see that when men be minded to do evil, they seek the dark by all the means they can, they found no trumpet, they call no witnesses to their doings. If it be a thing that is for their advantage & profit, they can skill well enough to call witnesses: but when they do evil, they hide themselves: & though they be spied, yet they go about to blear men's eyes. And what would come of it then, seeing there are so many shifts used to conceal evil doings, if two witnesses might not be admitted in a matter? Never could any thing be condemned, but all justice must needs go to wreck, & we should live together like brute beasts. Not without cause therefore both our Lord tells us here, that two or three witnesses must be credited, yea even in all cases: though it concerned a man's life an hundred times, yet ought it to stand for good. But we see how the devil had practiced continually to overthrow this order. And why? For he knows that he could not devise a better way to win us, than by covering our faults, because that by that means Gods wrath is kindled daily more & more, & every man takes those greater & more excessive liberty to do what he lists insomuch that the no punishing of his lewdness, makes him to think it lawful, & so he goes on from one wickedness to another. Yea, it becomes a common infection like those plague: if it be not remedied in time, it will poison all. In like case is it with evil deeds. That is those cause why the devil had always practiced that there might be no proof of things, or else that there might be so many starting holes, as men's offences might not come to knowledge, to be condemned. And therefore our Lord said expressly, that the matter must be tried at the mouth of two or three witnesses. It is not Gods will that there should be any exemption in that behalf. For they that be in high degree, ought to give those greater light: & if they offend, the fault is double, & deserved to be the grievously punished. Therefore they must hold themselves to that, & there ought to be as great rigor at the least used towards them, as towards those that may better be born with all. And so let us mark, that seeing our lord had told us that two witnesses ought to be believed in all cases; it is an overthrowing of that good law, to allege that inconveniences may in few of it, as some always do, casting this doubt & that doubt to bring all things to confusion. O say they, such a thing may come of it. A man may allege that those clouds will fall out of the air. And we have seen examples thereof. For without going any further, when one [was to be punished which] went about here to overthrow Gods order, & those things that our Lord Jesus had ordained by his word: O we will none of that, said some: And why? For such an inconvenience might ensue of it. And was that inconvenience seen? No. But a man can not tell what might come. And their meaning was, that Jesus Christ should not reign by his word. After that manner did they grieve God. And under what pretence? For sooth that some inconvenience might ensue of it. Look here a devilish wisdom. Now then is we see necessity pinch us & hold us short; whatsoever impediment or quarrel do set itself against us, let us learn nevertheless to follow Gods commandment without disobedience in word or deed. And that is a thing which we have to gather upon this text, over & beside the things that have been declared.

Now let us cast ourselves down before the majesty of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to vouchsafe to hold us so within our bounds by his word, as that the great number of our vices & imperfections hinder us not from obeying his holy will, & from abiding within he lifts which he had set us, but that we may be quickened up by those witnesses which he gives us; And seeing he draws us to him by so many means, we may not be so unthankful as to drag back when he calls us, & to seek starting holes to hide our sins, & to bury them before men, but rather give him glory by confessing them, & conceive not any other hope of salvation than through his mere mercy: & that every of us may so look to himself, as we may be witnesses and Judge s to ourselves, that he may receive us to mercy, when he shall see that the evil dislikes us, and that we have not gone about to shrink away from yielding obedience unto him. That it may please him to grant this grace not only to us, but also to all people and nations of the earth, & sea.

On Monday, the 16th of December. 1555
The 115th Sermon, which is the fourth upon the nineteenth Chapter

16 If a false witness rise up against any man, to bear witness against him for any transgression:

17 Then the two men that are at variance shall stand before the Lord in the presence of the high Priests and Judges that shall be in those days.

18 And the Judges shall make good inquiry, and if it be found that the false witness had given false witness against his brother:

19 Then shall you do unto him, as he meant to have done to his brother. And so you shall rid away evil from among you.

We have seen heretofore after what manner God would have all things brought to end: namely by proving the truth by good record: and yet that no infinite number of witnesses should be required, but that men should hold themselves contented with twain that could bear record of the deed. For as I said, offences should abide unpunished, if men should not stand upon the record of two witnesses. Yea and we see how a number of men conceal the truth and foreswear themselves, insomuch that when the proof of a crime committed comes to trial, a man shall have much ado to find one faithful witness among three or four. Therefore if the number were not determinate, what a thing were it? Notwithstanding forasmuch as those witnesses do more in a case than the Judge himself as the common proverb said it behooves them for their part to be held in awe, and that they have no liberty given them nor gap opened to them to oppress guilt less persons. For is that might be suffered, it were better for men to be in the woods among thieves, than to be in a city where law is to be executed: for false witnesses would murder such men with their tongues, as could defend themselves from the robbers. And therefore our Lord adds, that if an un-faithful witness be falsely deposed; and that the defendant feeling himself grieved allege that the record is false and wicked: he shall be heard. Now a man may mislike of the witnesses before they give their evidence, if there be just cause, or at leastwise if there be some color: but here it is for the defendant to show that the witnessing was false.

And it is said, that both of them shall come before the High priest and the Judges that shall be in that time, and the Judges shall inquire diligently of the matter. And if they find that the guiltless person is grieved; the false dealer must be punished, yea even without any sparing: insomuch that if he appeased his neighbor of a matter of life, his own life shall answer for it: or if he intended any hurt to him, he shall forgo eye for eye, foot for foot, hand for hand: that is to say, he shall be served of the same sauce himself. That is the very effect of our Lord his meaning in this text. And let us mark that here our Lord shows us that witness bearing is a holy thing: and indeed, when witnesses are brought forth, they ought to think that it is God whom they come to serve in that deed. True it is that men may well bring then forth; but yet in the mean while, who is the founder of that order? Is not God the author thereof? Then must men have an eye to him above all. Again, he that brings forth a witness, can not say that he is to be examined in his name: But God is there to receive the oath: & when a man is made to lift up his hand when he should give evidence, he is called as it were before God. Therefore to be short, let us mark, that whensoever we bear witness in any matter of Law, we do as it were a holy deed; in respect whereof we ought to go to it with the more reverence and care. For perjury carries with it high treason against God: insomuch as we blaspheme against the name and majesty of God; And it is he, against whom the treachery is committed, and not against a creature. And that is the cause why so grievous punishment is here expressly appointed unto it, insomuch that God will not have that witness to be spared. True it is that he had an eye to the wrong and wicked dealing which he offered to the guiltless person. Nevertheless his intent is also that there should be a reverence had to the order which he had set down for the common benefit of all men. And moreover forasmuch as he himself bears chief stroke there, he will have men to honor his majesty, and not to dally with him after that fashion. And indeed, we see how men take more liberty in forswearing themselves, than in any other misdoings. And why is that? Because they bear themselves in hand, that God will easily forgive it. Yea forsooth, as who should say he made not more account of his own glory than of all that ever concerns us. Again in all other faults men have some shame to holds them back, they be afraid least it should be proved by them, or that it should be perceived. But the wicked sort make but a mouth at it when they forswear themselves; Tush (say they) who shall ask vengeance of it? Who shall follow the suite of it? Yea, as who should say there were no GOD in heaven. Now then let us mark, that forasmuch as men take leave & dispense with themselves so easily in committing of perjury; and that it is not looked unto of men, but it is let slip without punishing: that therefore God must be fain to reserve it wholly to his own examination, and the crime must be so much the more accountable before his judgment seat, where it shall be punished double. Mark well therefore what we have to bear in mind, that every man may look to himself, and that we may be fully resolved, that we be bound to yield record to the truth, as oft and whensoever we be called thereto: and that we defraud both God and our neighbors of that which is due unto them, when we can help them in any good case and do not; which is all one as if we robbed them of that which belongs unto them. That is an Item to them that conceal and dissemble the truth when they be required to speak it.

Furthermore let us bear in mind that our coming to do that, must be as though GOD called us before his own face, and did set down his name there before us saying, as you have any estimation of my name, see that you bear faithful record, without favor or hatred: be not led by any affection, but only do what you can to report what you know, without respect of any person. Were this well observed, we should see another manner of fear of God in all giving of evidence than we do. How great liberty so ever the world take, & although most men pass their bounds without any awe of God: yet must not this lesson be lost: but we must learnt to practice it, even with horror to behold the great blockishness which reigns every where, in that men do so mock God, and rush against him with such boldness and presumption.

And now it is said expressly, that the parties must come both into the presence of the Lord, before the priests and Judges. Whereby Moses does us to understand, that God is present at the executing of Justice, because all is done by his authority and in his name. And this text is yet very well worthy to be noted. For when men come before a Judge, they think they have hid them well, if they may deceive him: but there are very few that consider the Judge to be Gods lieutenant. Indeed men can find in their hearts to confess that Justice is a divine thing, and that God bears chief sway therein, it costs them nothing to say so: but as for to be touched with it to the quick, and to bear well in mind that when we appear before a Judge, God both presently behold us, so as we can not conceal any thing from him, but he writes up all things in his registers, insomuch that although we be spared by men, yet we must come to account for it before God:

we never think of that. But yet both this text warn us, that we must never go to law, but what intent to demean ourselves as in Gods presence: assuring ourselves that although nothing in the world be hidden from him; yet he will have men to acknowledge a certain special presence of his majesty in the order of Justice. True it is that even when men be in their chambers or in their beds, they ought to think still that they be continually in the sight of God: and al-though it be his property to search all things & to examine even the bottom of men thoughts: yet notwithstanding, it is his will to have a notable mark of his majesty and glory to appear, in the order of government which he had set in the world, by appointing Judges to be as his lieutenants and officers, and he will have men to know that he himself is there, and that he guides and governs the whole action. In the Popedom, because men know not that God is present at the executing of Justice, they have Puppets and Paintings, and Crucifixes, and I wote not what else For those beasts bear themselves in hand, that images are laymen's books as they term them. But it ought to suffice us that God tells us here with his own mouth, that he himself sits in the seat of Justice where earthly men be ordained in his name; and that whereas there be Priests and Judges, he will have men to know that that is not done without him, but that he maintains that order because he had once established it among us. When we hear such doctrine proceeding out of Gods own mouth, must it not needs be that we be too too dull, and that the devil had made us stark beasts, if we be not touched with it? Now then let us not look to have stocks and puppets set before our eyes to gaze upon: but let us have Gods lively image printed in our hearts and let us consider that seeing it is his will to have mankind governed by that mean: he both also assist it, and is at hand unto it, so as the things that are done there, are guided by him, & ought also to be referred unto him: And that when we come thither, it is to appear as it were before his majesty, as I have declared already.

And this serves, not only for earthly Justice, but also much more for the meetings that are made to the end that God should teach us by his word. For when we come hither to hear the doctrine of the Gospel; God is much more apparently present with us therein than in the order of Justice. True it is (as I have said already) that when we come before a Judge, we come before God: but here is the spiritual doctrine whereby we should be lifted up to heaven, & men's laws are of no account here; because there is none that speaks but God. Therefore let us mark, that when we come to the Church to be taught, or when any of us opens the bible at home in his own house, Jesus Christ must needs be there as though we saw him before our eyes. Not that we must have any fleshly conceit of him: but that we must approach unto him by said, and consider how it is not in vain that he had told us, that where so ever two or three meet together in his name, there is he in the midst of them. Then let us consider that not only we be here before the Angels of heaven, but also that the son of God beholds us. And as he likes well of the confession of the faith which we make unto him; and of our obedient resorting hither to know the will of GOD his father, and to suffer ourselves to be governed by him and by his doctrine: so likewise when we come hither sainedly, so as we make none account of his word, or bear ourselves in hand that we be discharged for tarrying here an hour or twain: we must come to a reckoning for it; for we unhallowed the thing which our Lord Jesus Christ had made holy for our salvation. Wherefore is the doctrine preached unto us? Is it that God had any profit by it? No, but for our benefit. Now if the same be disappointed through our unthankful ness; is it not a trampling of the precious stones under our feet which were offered unto us? It is the food of our souls, and we will not eat of it, but will need fast still: or rather we be filled with wind, there is no true sustenance in us. Of whom is it long but of our own leadenness, that we thrust away the grace which God did put into our hand? And therefore, that we may be the better disposed to receive the Gospel, let us understand that we must never repair to the Church , but we must think that our coming thither is to offer ourselves into Gods presence, so as our Lord Jesus Christ may bear such sway there, yea and be so present, as it may appear that the grace and power of his holy spirit accompany him, that his word may have such force as to enter into our hearts, to touch us to the quick, and to edify us. But if we have our ears beaten with the things that are preached unto us, and in the mean while our lives be nothing answerable to the same; but we continue as cold as we were before: that comes to pass because we consider not that our Lord Jesus Christ is present to make his word available, which is uttered to us by the means of men. That is the thing which we have to gather upon this text, where it is said that the parties which are at variance must appear in the presence of the Lord.

And it is added, that they must also appear before the Priests and Judges for the time being. It is an exposition of these words of God. And to what end serves that? That folk should not have an eye to mennes persons; but rather consider what state they represented there? Were the priests made at their own pleasure? No. No more were the Judges. GOD was the author of them both. Now then forasmuch as he had set them in that office, and governed them by his power: he will have men to know that he himself is there. And Moses will in any wise have the priests to be there: not that the evil jurisdiction is allotted unto them, (as I have declared heretofore): but to strike the greater reverence into such as had to deal or to do in matters of so great importance. For if a man be annoyed by false witnesses, he is as good as half dead already. And therefore he was to be succored by an extraordinary means. That is the cause why God joins the Priests and the Judges together.

Yet notwithstanding it is said that the Judges shall make good inquiry of the matter. Wherein he shows that which we have seen heretofore: namely that to comfort one man, we must not grieve another. For it is no small thing to overthrow an evidence: I have told you heretofore how it is a holy thing. Now if any man abuse it, he must be punished for his labor. But yet on the other side, it must also be well known and verified that such an abuse is committed. Therefore is it said expressly, that diligent inquiry is to be made. For it is a sore matter to alter or reverse a thing that had passed by order of Law. And for the same cause it is said, If he be found to have given false evidence, and to have practiced to do his neighbor wrong: let him be punished with the selfsame punishment, and let not their eye spare him, but ride away the evil from among you: to the end that they winch hear thereof may be afraid, and no more suck deeds be committed afterward. Here Moses notes the circumstances, which even the heathen themselves knew. For we must always come back to that which is spoken in the eight Chapter of Salomons proverbs, where it is said, that it is through Gods wisdom that kings reign and that Laws and statutes are made thereby. Therefore when as the heathen made Laws, it came not first of all of their own brain: for whereas they made fond and blockish Laws, therein God gave them the bridle, and it was to the end that men should know that when men follow their own wit, they overshoot themselves pitifully, yea even in the things that concern this present life. And what must they needs do then, when they be to pass beyond the world? In that case men are utterly blind. God then ment to show by some things, that men's wits are too weak to judge well of equine and uprightness; and yet notwithstanding, that forasmuch as he was minded to show his providence over all mankind; he inspired those with equity and uprightness, whose duty it was to make Laws & statutes. And it is the very same thing which I was about to tell unto you out of Salomons proverbs, that the wisdom of God challenges this to be her office. The heathen knew that thing well enough, affirming that Laws were Gods gift, and not the invention of man. And God wrested out that confession from them, to the intent that their unthankfulness should be the less excusable, as we see here.

For whereas Moses said, that the party shall be punished which had but even practiced against his neighbor: he said not simply, against the truth. And thereby he excludes oversight, so that if there were any error he would not have the punishment to be so grievous. Again whereas he sets down that the offender should not be spared: his meaning is that if a man spare one that had procured the death of the guiltless, he is double cruel to him that was in danger of his life.

Whereas he said that others hearing thereof shall commit no more any such act: he shows the principal end, which is also set down by evil Laws, namely that punishment should be executed for examples sake. The punishing of a thief is not only for his misdeeds sake or for the crimes sake: but also to teach others by it, and to hold them in awe, so as they may be ashamed of such dealing and abhor it. In like case is it with murders when bloodshed is revenged. And why is that? Is it only for the faults sake that is done and past? No, but to provide for afterward that murdering and all manner of shedding of mans blood may be eschewed. You see then how punishments do serve for example. And that is a thing well worthy to be marked: for we may gather a double lesson thereof. First that such as occupy the room of Justice, ought to think themselves worthy of blame before God and the world, for all those faults which they let slip unpunished. And why? For it is an opening of the gate and a giving of liberty to all others to do the like. Behold, one that is found to be a thief, a murderer or a whoremonger, is winked at and let slip. And why? because he is pitied. And by that means the offender escapes scot-free. By reason whereof other become the bolder to do the like. For why? It is an increasing of the mischief, when men see offences escape unpunished; and the bridle is let loose which otherwise had been restrained, if evil doing had been punished without respect of persons. Behold, one adultery is committed after another, two or three murders are committed together, and three or four robberies are done one in an others neck. And who is the cause of all this? Even the Judge himself; he is the principal thief, he is the principal adulterer, he is those principal murderer. It is he that had robbed God of his glory and men of the right which he would have to be observed, it is he that had as it were made open proclamation that offenders should make their hand and escape scot-free for it. Now then let us mark well, that whereas Moses had declared that wicked witnesses must be punished, that other men may beware by them; afird be afraid when they hear of it, and do so such deed any more: he shows thereby, that if Judges have not the sternness to punish misdeeds without relenting, when they come to their knowledge; they be the cause of all the mischief that are committed afterward. For they did as it were give leave to them, in that they punished not the party as they ought to have done, whom they saw to have offended. And therefore let them look well to their charge unless they will be blamed as procurers of horrible confusion above all other men, for want of executing of Justice as they should have done. Let that serve for one point.

And herewith all we be taught further, that we must learn to make our gain of other men's harms. The punishments of other men for their offences must be a bridle to us, or else we be very blind, for they be as looking glasses unto us. When we see a thief punished, it is as a warning given unto us by our Lord, to put us in mind that robbery is condemned before him. The same is to be said of murders, of adulteries, and of other like things. True it is that even without those examples we ought to be wise enough to restrain ourselves: but yet if we be so hard hearted and negligent, as not to have sufficient regard of the bridling of ourselves without warning by such visible examples: at leastwise let us learn to fare the better by those things, when they be added for our help. But when a thief is whipped or hanged, or when a murderer is beheaded, if the sight thereof wey no further with us than to make us retrain for fear of men or for fear of punishment by order of Law: it is a small matter, and we be never the better by it. Nay, we must steppe one steppe further: which is, to confider that GOD who reigns over us in heaven, will have the punishments of offenders to be as lively pictures to show us that murderers, & thieves, and all such like, shall not escape his hand, but that although they be not punished here beneath, yet they must come at length before the heavenly Judge. Let us then consider that: and let us take such warning by it, as every of us may bridle ourselves. For that is the second point whereto we must come, if we intend to receive good instruction by any of the punishments that are executed upon men's crimes and misdeeds. Yea and let us not tarry till men set to their hands: but whensoever GOD executes his judgments, let us awake to think upon them more advisedly, as Saint Paul exhorts us. Beware (said he) that no man deceives you: for by reason of such things does Gods wrath come upon the disobedient. He said not that the disobedient shall be punished by earthly Justice, for many times Justice sleeps upon earth, and is not executed with such force and liveliness as were requisite. But Saint Paul said, that Gods wrath is wont to come upon the disobedient; and therefore take heed (says he) that vain worries deceive you not. And in that place he speaks of Theft, Murder, Whoredom. O, will some say, It is lawful for a man to revenge himself: and if a man have done me a displeasure, I may requite him with the like. Likewise concerning Lechery, the despisers of GOD and these lewd persons which are not worthy to go upon the ground, say it is but a natural sin. But Saint Paul said, Look well about you, and although evil deeds escape unpunished in this world, think not that GOD will therefore omit his duty: all things must come to account before him. Nevertheless, when you see that he lays his hand upon an offender; let it be as a summoning to every of you, and let it do you to wit, that his grunting of you the favor to see other folks punished before your faces, is to the end you benefit yourselves by his correction. And so you see what we have to mark in that Moses said that the punishing of crimes must serve for common example and instruction, yea even when they be but heard of.

Now besides our Lords chastising of such as have offended; he does also make us to hear of his Justice by his word, in that the threats of his Law be daily rehearsed unto us; and in that we be told of the examples which are set down in the holy scripture, concerning such as have been punished at Gods hand: and are not we too too dull-witted if we take no heed by them? Albeit that GOD spoke not at all, but only wrought in the punishing of murderers, thieves, blasphemers, perjurers, adulterers, and whoremongers: yet ought we not to be so blockish as to take no heed by it. But now seeing that God by stretching out his arm after that fashion against the transgressors of his Law and ordinance, does put us in mind that his so doing is not for naught, but rather to call us to amendment: must it not needs be that we be too too hard hearted, if we continue still in our former state? Nay let us follow that which Moses tells us here; and learn to open our ears when God speaks unto us, and to mark well not only the examples of the punishments which we see presently executed upon the wicked: but also all the examples that have been since the beginning of the world, so as we may apply them to our own use, & learn by them to live in awe, that no such act may be committed among us. For he said not here that the punishing of misdeeds shall be to the end that all men should only condemn them in words: but to the end that all men should be afraid and do no more so. And that is a thing very worthy to be well noted. For we bear ourselves in hand that it is enough for us to have condemned a crime, and to have liked well of the Justice that is executed for it. O (say we) he deserved it right well. We condemn another man, and in the mean while we ourselves are oftentimes more faulty than he. But God will have every man to be his own Judge. Therefore when we see offences punished, let us be afraid, and let us restrain ourselves, that no such things be done among us any more. You see then that that was one thing more which we had to remember upon this text.

And let us, mark that whereas here is mention made of fear, although Moses treat but of outward government, yet must we conceive a better kind of fear, that is to wit a reverend awe of God. To say the truth, the only fear which we have of punishment would not suffice. It were too slender a thing, and God should be too ill served at our hands, if there were none other end yet nevertheless, because of our infirmity, the punishments that are executed ought to be as provocations unto us, to live in the more awe. Good reason would that the love of GOD should go before, and that the reverence which we bear unto him, should breed an earnest desire in us to fashion ourselves all wholly to his righteousness; but forasmuch as we be slothful and slow: God vouchsafed us this help for our weakness, that we may take warning to amend, by all the punishments which he executes. Alas that I should be so made as to go make ware willfully against GOD. I know by such an example which he had given me, that he abhors such a crime: and shall I now run headlong into it? Were it not an open fighting against him, if I should deal so against all wit and reason? You see then how we ought to be restrained by the chastisements which GOD executes and that the fear of him ought to bear such sway in us, as to make us in devour to fashion ourselves according to his righteousness, and to submit ourselves to his good will.

But now let us come to the punishment that Moses adds. His laying is that there shall be Life for life, Eye for eye, Tooth for tooth, Foot for foot, and Hand for hand. As if he should say, that he which had gone about to do his neighbor harm, shall be served of the same sauce himself. For when one man practices an others death, if he should be but put to his fine, and so discharged of it for a piece of money without answering any further: what a thing were it? Is all the goods of any man able to countervail the life of an other? Peradventure the party whole life is sought is but a Poor man that had nothing: but yet is he such a creature as is fashioned after the image of God. There comes a rich man to oppress him, and indeed, the poor soul is as good as half dead a forehand, if he be oppressed by false witness.

Now if it be said, yea, but his adversary is a rich man, he may well make him good recompense: what recompense I pray you, can be made for a man's life? Therefore our Lord minding to take away all such shifts said, that if any man has practiced the death of his neighbor, he himself shall die for for it without any pity or companion. If he have gone about to hurt him in his eye, or in his arm, or in his foot, he himself must abide the like punishment in himself: that is to say, if I have gone about to do any reproach, or dishonesty to my neighbor; the shame thereof must light upon myself. We see as now whereat GOD aimed. Like as when he sets down the Law concerning women with child in the xxi. of Exodus, he said that if a man have hurt them, and any mischance follow thereof, the party that had done the hurt shall be punished for it: so also does he add here, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, foot for foot, and hand for hand. As if he should say, no recompense is to be admitted in that behalf: the purse must not be pinched, but the life itself must answer for it, at leastwise if the deed concern life. And so we see now in effect, how it had ever been Gods will, to show that he sets great store by mans life, as he will declare it, yet better hereafter: but yet we have here a good record thereof in the meanwhile.

Moreover he shows that we must have no respect of persons: but that although a man be never so well able to forbear money to save himself withal; yet must not that be admitted in matters of Justice. Let ransoming be let alone for ware matters: But in cases of Law, faults must be regarded as they be indeed. If the fault be such as may be punished by fine or amercement, and that the Law will bear it; very well, it is good reason it should be so. But if it be a crime that deserves death, and that the Law itself do judge a man to death for it: if the punishment of death be turned into a fine, under color that the party offended shall be come wealthy, or for that it seems better that it should be so; those law is by that mean perverted, and the common order is altered by having respect of persons: and so all goes to confusion. And therefore let us mark well, that whereas our Lord had said, life for life, eye for eye, and so forth: he had showed us that in judging, there must no regard be hade of the persons that are to be condemned. But if it be not a matter of life and death, but a single misdeed or trespass (as they term it) that is to say, a light fault and such a one as deserves not the punishment of death: it is to be punished according to those quality of the offence, and according to the Law provided in that behalf. But if it be a deadly crime, the Judge must shut his eyes as in respect of the person, and deem simply of the crime and deed itself: accordingly also as it is said here, that no pity must be showed in that behalf. For the alleging of mercy and pity toward offenders, is a thing that always deceives many men. What, say they? Should we not be pitiful? Would not God that we should resemble him? Seeing it is said, that if we be his children we must be kind hearted and inclined to pity and compassion; is it not a bare to all rigor? Yes, but though it be said that we must pity the party, yet is it not meant that the fault should be unpunished. If a malefactor be brought afore a Judge sitting upon the bench, the Judge may well he sorry to see a poor creature that is shaped after the image of God, to go, to destruction. Yea, he must be moved therewith, and have pity and compassion of him. But yet for all that, he must also look to his commission, what charge he had received, and he must do Justice. He sits upon the bench to punish offenders, it is not now for him to show pity, or to allege any such thing. Now then it is Gods will here to cut off all by shifts of pity and compassion that can be alleged; and to show that Justice ought to have his course, so as in examining of crimes and misdeeds, the Judge must be blind as in respect of persons, and have both his eyes set fast upon the deed, and upon the desert of the case. Yea and to the end there should be no

gainsaying; let us mark that here God had used a word wherein there is some show of virtue, saying: Your eye shall not spare him, neither shall you have any pity on him. How so? It is said that our eye ought not to spare him, not our heart to pity him. And what is to follow then, but such extreme rigor as is next cousin to cruelty? Indeed so will men think. But yet is this rigor acceptable to GOD. For we must call to mind how Salomon said, that he which justifies the wicked is as faulty before GOD, as he that condemns the innocent. Is it not a great and ugly abomination, that a silly innocent should be condemned to death? Yes: and yet if an offender be let go, God mislikes it as much as the shedding of guiltless blood. So then, let us not deceive ourselves any more, under the shadow and color of any of these fair pretences that are made at all adventure. There are that abuse the holy scriptures by wresting them every way; and this pity is alleged continually though they wote not why nor wherefore. Now then let us understand, that as GOD commands us to be merciful, so he showed us after what manner and how far forth he allows our mercy: that is to wit, so far forth as the course of Justice be not let. Yea and let us look upon ourselves. Is it gentleness to be cruel to one man for the sparing of another? Behold, there are two men, both of them be my neighbors, we be all three created after the image of God, we be all of one nature, they be my flesh and my bone as well the one as the other: one of these plays the false witness of purpose to have his neighbor put to death, and it is not long of him that his neighbor is not dead already: Hereupon one comes unto me and says, O sir, you must have pity upon him. Very well: I shall be pitiful to the one and cruel to the other. You see how the poor man which was at deaths door is preserved by miracle, and shall I now go sell away his life so good cheap? Is it not an horrible matter that mercy should be pretended after that sort? Yes. But if we were well advised and had good stay of our affections surely we would never pity any such crime, for any mans upbraiding of us with cruelty. But it is yet far worse when a false witness steps up against his neighbor: for that is much more than the oppressing of some one man privilege, that is fallen in his danger. For if the silly soul being so falsely accused, had been executed: by whose hand had he been punished? The Judges had been half accessory, Gods wrath had been provoked against the whole country, and moreover a gape had been opened for the like inconveniences ever after. A false witness therefore sins not against one or two, nor against two or three: but first against his adversary, secondly against the Law, and thirdly against his whole Country, in that he provokes Gods wrath against it. For his intent is to deface Justice, and (as much as in him lies) to put all things to havoc. Now then if the Judge have pity upon him; he shows himself to bear neither love nor fear unto GOD, nor reverence unto Justice. For he ought to think thus with himself: Of whom had it been long that I had not been guilty of manslaughter, if I had judged an innocent to death? Indeed I had not done it wittingly: but yet had I not been excusable for all that. Then was I in danger to have been guilty of murder, and in what case were I then, if I should suffer such a fault to scape unpunished? Now then if a Judge bethink him not of these things: it is a token that he has no fear of God in him. Therefore it behooves us so much the more to mark well this saying of Moses, that judges eye must not spare the panic that has done a fault worthy of punishment. For it is but cruelty to use such wrongful mercy, as makes us to run headlong to the breaking of all order set by God, and fall uprightness among men.

Now let us kneel down before the majesty of our good God with acknowledgment of sins, praying him to make us so to feel them, as we may be drawn to true repentance, and learn more and more to repair unto him, not tarrying till he hale us thither by force, but seeing he vouchsafes to allure us so gently by his word, let us come willingly unto him, and provoking ourselves forward, become our own judges, that in condemning ourselves we may seek to be acquit by his mercy: And that it may please him to guide us in the meantime, as that being rid of our wicked affections, & cares that hold us back from coming to him; we may show by our deeds that we be his true children, and that we bear the mark of his holy spirit. That it may please him to grant this grace, not only to us but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

On Tuesday, the 17th of December 1555
The 116th Sermon, which is the fifth upon the nineteenth Chapter, and the first upon the twentieth Chapter

19 You shall do unto him as he meant to have done to his brother: and so you shall rid away evil from among you.

20 And others hearing thereof shall be afraid, and not do any such wicked deed among you from thenceforth.

The twentieth Chapter

When thou goes forth to war against your enemies, and you sees horses and Chariots, and a greater multitude of people than yourself, be not afraid of them. For the Lord your God which has brought you up out of the land of Egypt, is with you.

2 And when you come near to give battle: then shall the Priest come forth and speak to the people,

3 And say unto them: Hearken O Israel, now that you be come hither this day to give battle to your enemies, let not your hearts faint, be not afraid, neither be you discouraged or abashed at the sight of them.

4 For the Lord your God goes with you, to fight for you against your enemies, and to preserve you.

We saw yesterday what punishment God ordained for such, as practice mischief against their neighbors And that concerns judges and such as have the sword of Justice in their hand. But as for us, we for our part ought to suffer the wrongs patiently that are done unto us. Or else if we pursue them that they may be punished, it must not be done of malicious spite, nor with desire of revenge: but to the intent that the party which is to be punished, may be kept from offending any more afterward; and also that no outrageous or violent dealings may be suffered, least others should grow bold to do so too; but that all men may be made to stand in fear, by beholding the example of him that is punished. And by this mans we see how the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, agrees very well with the doctrine of the Law. For he tells us that we must not resist evil.

The Law commands that he which procures the death of his Neighbour, shall be put to death, and not be spared. Now at the first sight here seems to be some contrariety. But we must consider to whom our Lords speaks, when he says that the offender must be punished: namely that he speaks to those whom he has put in authority. When he said, resist not evil with evil: his meaning is that every of us should live quietly, and put up wrongs patiently, rather than requite like for like. And that is the cause why he says in the fifth of Matthew, you have heard how it has been said to the men of old time, An eye for an eye, and a hands for a hand: but I say unto you, if a man strike you on the one cheek, turn him the other also: and if a man take away your Cloak be willing to give him your Coat too: or if he take away your Coat give him your Cloak too. We see how the Jews abused the said Law. For under pretence that GOD would have no injuries to scape unpunished, they bare themselves in hand that every man might seek to be revenged of his enemies. But we must in anywise put a difference between the laws of policy, and the Laws of GOD, which require a perfection, and serve to rule our hearts and affections by, so as it is not Lawful to procure harms to any man, though he have deserved it. The civil Law and earthly policy give men leave to seek amends of the wrongs done unto them; and the judge is bound to satisfy their demand: but yet for all that, is the party that is wronged have a malicious heart, and his accusing of his enemies is to be revenged of him; he is not excused before God. Although he have right ministered unto him before men, and they say that his cause is good and lawful; yet for all that does GOD condemn him. And why so? Because (as I told you before) we must be patient. For what virtue is it, to be friendly to such as love us, and to wish no evil to such as do us pleasure and service? Do not the heathen as much? But if men vex us and put us to shame and trouble, and we bear with it; endeavoring to overcome their evil by doing good then do we show ourselves to be Gods children, and followers of his example who causes his day sun to shine both upon good and bad. Therefore let us first mark this fore touched difference between the Laws of policy and the Law of GOD, which is spiritual, and serves to rule all the affections of a man's heart. Now in policy, there is no more to be looked for, but that no man attempt anything against his neighbour, that men do one an other no harm, that men work no displeasure one to an other, neither in goods, nor in person, nor in name, and that whosoever offends, be punished.

But when GOD shows us how we should live, he said not only refrain yourselves from evil, and let him that offends be punished: but he tells us also, that it is not lawful for us to look upon a woman with fleshly lust of desiring to commit uncleanness with her: nor to hate our Neighbour any more than to murder him. You see then how the Law of GOD mounts higher than the earthly policy. God will have us to walk before him in all pureness. In so much that, besides that it is not lawful for us to assault our Neighbour, or to hate him without cause: Nay not then, when we have just cause and covertures for the same to the worldward. For we must even then not only forgive the wrongs that are done us, and not requite like for like; but also pray for our enemies: and although they speak evil of us, and could find in their hearts that we perished a hundred times; Yet must we work their welfare to the uttermost of our powers. Mark that for one point.

Indeed it is a very hard thing to bridle our affections after such a sort, as to desire the welfare of our enemy when he has gone about to do us harm: but yet must we strain ourselves to do it. For though we feel a gain striving in us, yet will not that settle us for an excuse: neither must we do as the Papists do, who perceiving this to be clean contrary to mans nature, have gone about to salve it with this gloss, that it was a counsel, and not a plain and express commandment: and that is a manifest blaspheming of God. For he said, that if we will be taken for his children, we must fashion ourselves after his goodness in pardoning those that have offended him. Therefore let us not have eye to our own strengths, nor to the inclination of our own nature: but if we feels any heartburning in ourselves; or be desirous of revenge through heat of impatience when a man has vexed us: Let us resort to our GOD, praying him to overmaster the excessive passions that are in us; and to give us the spirit of meekness when we be in such heats, that we may become patient, as the harm or injury be not too hard and cumbersome for us to bear, but that we may pass it over mildly. After that manner ought we to deal. And therefore let us learn to beware that we beguile not ourselves with vain colors.

Seeing that our Lord has given us a good Law; Let us not turn it upside down by pretending our own wicked and corrupt affections for an excuse: Yea and let us mark, that man's nature is so frowardly despised, that if they look not very narrowly to themselves, they shall always abuse the name of GOD. The Law which I expounded Yesterday, namely that the party which shall have practiced the death of any innocent person, is not to be born withal, is very rightful. But yet for all that, is it meet that we should have leave to avenge ourselves? Should the bridle be laid loose in our necks to requite evil for evil; No finely. And yet do men make it their excuse. We see then that naturally we should be ever inclined to abuse Gods name: and therefore we have so much the more need to be watchful, and to consider at what end God aimed in say this or that, that is, that we should not be blind therein. For it will not avail us at all, if we make as though we saw it not. And therefore let us first and foremost correct our vices, and lay aside all our wicked affections: and then may we use the laws that are good and holy. As for example: If a man deal by order of law; and in the meanwhile have his heart full of rancor, so as he seek to overthrow his many by crooked means: It is a wicked manner of proceeding, and condemned of God. Yet notwithstanding, it is almost an ordinary custom. For there are few that go to law, which are not enemies one to an other, according to this common said saw, that suite in law and friendship do seldom match together. And yet for all that, if a man have any such heartburning, he offends God. Yea, but he uses the mean of justice and is not that lawful; Is not that manner of dealing permitted? Yes: but it would behove us first, of all to have our wicked affections subdued according to this saying, that all Gods creatures are good to such as are of a pure and clean heart. Saint Paul speaks there of meats; but we may apply the same saying to all other things, namely that when so ever God appoints any thing to our use, the same is good and behove full; yea verily, so we on our side defile it not by our wicked affections. If we have any filth in us, by and by all that ever we touch becomes filthy out of hand. You see that the order of Justice is a holy thing, appointed of GOD to our use and benefit: and yet if I have a spiteful heart, and bear any malice to mine adversary; then do i defile the thing which God had dedicated to a holy use, and which was pure and clean of itself. And therefore let us learn to reform our wicked affections. When wee have done so, then may we say that the thing which GOD has ordained, is good and profitable to us: For we turn it not contrary to his meaning and will. That is the thing which we have to remember in effect concerning the Text that was treated of yesterday.

Now let us come to that which GOD adds concerning matters of war. When you goes out against your enemies (said he) be not afraid nor dismayed at them, though your set them more strong than yourself, though the number of their people be far greater than yours, and though they have both chariots and horses: that is to say, Although they be better furnished and bred of all things than you are; yet let nor your heart shrink for all that. And he adds the reason: For your God (says he) goes with you, and it is he which brought you out of the Land of Egypt. Therefore put you your trust in his goodness and might. Now, we must presuppose, that in so saying GOD gives not leave & liberty to his people to make war when they list at their own pleasure: but only upon just cause. As for example, when the Jews entered into the Land of Chanaan, they made no war but by the express commandment of God: in so much that they were forbidden to save any of the people of that country alive, and it behooved them to put all to the sword saving the young infants and women which were reserved to make slaves of: but as for the men, they were all appointed to the sword; for God had given that judgment upon them, and not without cause. For it was a great matter that he had born with them so long a time; and yet that they continued stubborn and unreformable still. Besides this, when the people of Israel had once made a full conquest of the land of Chanaan which was given them to inherit: then might they sit at rest; and they might not make any invasion upon their neighbors unless they were troubled by them, as indeed it fell out afterward: yet is it true that the people of Israel never possessed the whole Land that was given them. And that was through their own fault and unthankfulness, so as they were ever in trouble and vexation unto the time of David. Did David subdue all his enemies? Did he set the people in full possession of the heritage that had been promised them? If he had done so, then was he to make war by and by upon his neighbors: howbeit not by picking any quarrels to them, nor to seek to enlarge his kingdom by conquest. But he was provoked unto it; and therefore he was to maintain the stare of his own people. And so let us mark that this text treats of such wars as GOD allows, as when a Prince is unjustly assailed, then may he withstand his enemy by force. For why? The man that enterprises to trouble are other bodies possession, or the territory of a City, or the provinces of a country; is no better than a robber. True it is, that men indeed call them Kings and Princess, but yet are they but honorable thieves indeed, which do so abuse the power that GOD has given them; and are not contented with their own bounds, but will needs enlarge them without just cause or titles. Such then are but Robbers. And as a judge ought to punish a thief or a robber: so likewise they that have the power ordained of God, may enter into arms against all such as fall to troubling and vexing of their subjects; and such manner of wars are not only lawful but also of necessity to be undertaken by them. It is not without cause then that God does encourage his people, saying that they must not be faint hearted and cowardly when they go to war against their enemies.

That is the thing which we have to mark first of all, least we might surmise that Gods will is to help such as maintain an evil cause: for then should he renounce himself. And therefore when so ever he promises to be with his people; his meaning is that their quarrel must be just and reasonable. And hereupon we may gather by the way, that it is lawful to make war upon necessity, conditionally that the war be to none other end than to procure peace & to obtain it. There are some fantastical persons which imagine that this serves but for the old testament, and that the case stands not alike to in these days. But we must make this a general rule, that whereas God grants to succor his people against their enemies; his promising to do so, is not for once only, but forever. Indeed it is promised that under the reign of our lord Jesus Christ, swords and spears shall be turned into Plowshares and Coulters, and that there shall be no more annoyance nor violence. That is very true as in respect of such as shall be truly converted and reformed by the spirit of God. For if we will be Christians, we must become as Lambs. Inasmuch as it is said expressly, that the Bear and the Lion shall dwell together, & that a little babe shall rule them both. This must be understood of such as God shall have changed and renewed by his holy spirit. But we see that so far off is it that the world is converted to God, when the Gospel is preached, or that all of them change their manners: that many of them become worse and worse, and other some more and more envenomed, having heard Gods word: and therefore worthy are they to be delivered up to Satan through a reprobate sense, because they have hardened their hearts against God, & have manifestly despised him, by refusing the grace that is offered them. Is it not reason (that premises considered) that God also should turn away from them, and that Satan should draw them and carry them away into all evil? Mark I pray you how a number of people become worse and worse after they have heard the preaching of Gospel. All then are not so converted as to become Lambs: but rather their rage is inflamed more & more. And therefore forasmuch as there are wicked men continually in this world, yea & the Princess themselves are so called away by their own ambition, covetousness, and other wicked lusts, that they keep no measure in their doings, but will needs turn all things upside down, and make havoc of all, for that satisfying of their own wicked wills: God has left the use of the sword to men of authority & ordained that they should be strong handed, as S. Paul declares. Whereupon it is to be concluded, that if a war be lawful, this promise of Gods stands in force still. For otherwise what a thing were it? True it is that we ought to possess our souls in patience, as our Lord Jesus Christ faith: but yet does it not follow, that therefore the office of the magistrates should cease, & that his arming of them is to no purpose, & that they should be but as idols. Nay rather they ought to hazard their lives so far as God enables them, when so ever their subjects are assaulted & tormented. And for this cause I have stood the longer upon this text, to the end we might know that faithful Princess have Gods promise still at this day, that he will be their guide in the time of war, and take their part when they be to fight with their enemies, & give the victory to the intent they should allure themselves of his help, and always flee to him for refuge. And so you see how that is one point which we have to mark upon this text.

Never the later we must understand also, that there is no war just, unless God be the author of it. For if we intend to be armed with the strength of his hand, we must also ask counsel at his mouth: & his spirit must be the over ruler of the advise which we have taken: for we see that all enterprises are accursed, which men do take in hand upon their own head, without inquiring of his will. As for example, when the Jews made leagues with the Realm of Egypt, or entered any other familiarity with them, Cursed be those (said he) which weave a web, but not by mine advise. And by and by he adds the exposition, yea (said he,) for you determine upon matters without taking counsel at my mouth; that is to say, without considering by my word whether the thing be lawful or no. You will not hold yourselves to my will, nor fuller my spirit to be your governor, or to have the overruling of you: Wo to you therefore, said he. And the Realm of Egypt shall be as a Reed that will break under you if you lean unto it, it shall serve but to break your necks; yea and it shall prick you like a sharp reed that runs into the hand of him that leans upon it. Then let us mark, that if we intend to be succored by our God, we must fashion ourselves wholly to his will, and not attempt any thing which is not permitted by his word, or which we be not sure that he allows. And then may we thoroughly assure ourselves, that he will be on our side, and that we shall be so sensed with his power, that we shall get the upper hand of all our enemies.

But it behooves us to weigh well the words are set down here. Although you see that your enemies are stronger than you (said he) and far better furnished with horses and Chariots, and that they have a greater number of people; yet be not afraid. Hereby he shows (as king Josaphat declared) that we must not measure Gods power by the things that are seen with our eyes, for it is no harder matter with him to discomfit an so host of an hundred thousand men, than to discomfit an handful, or to give victory to a dozen persons as well as if they were a great army. The thing move thus is this: If we be well furnished of worldly strength, then we think that God helps us and favors us: but if we be bare & naked, and our enemies too strong for us; then are we dismayed. And why? Because we bind God to these inferior means, and we bear ourselves in hand that he can do nothing, unless he tell afore hand how and wherewith he will do it, and that he give us a good pawn of it as they say. But that is too great an embacing of his mightiness, and a turning of all order upside down. For how that God be honored at our hands? Even by continuing undismayed, though our enemies be too strong and mighty; for God needs no more but to blow upon them, and by and by all their power is dashed. The thing wherein God shows himself almighty, is that the creatures which seem to be of most power are able to do nothing at all, but God makes every whit of it to vanish away. If God could do no more but say, I will be a let to men that they shall not advance themselves, I will take away their courage and scatter them: it were a small thing: but he has diverse ways to succor those that are his. Sometime he sets our enemies on such a fire, that they be as mad folks against us or else they have all things in a readiness against us: and sometime when they have practiced to overthrow us, he lets them have been like Lions, by meaner whereof they be imaged with such fury, that by all likelihood they must needs bear down all things before them like thunder. Has he permitted all this? Yet when it comes to the very push: then shall they have no strength at all, insomuch that the things which they had purposed, shall vanish away. Although they come onward so terribly at the first, as that they make all things to quake again: yet will he strike the sword out of their hand, so as they shall not be able to put any thing in execution: to be short, they shall slide away like water. Therefore let us mark here, that in such cases we must weigh well the power of God, not doubting but that when he shall have suffered men to advance themselves, and all things to be fully furnished according to their desire; he will dash it all under foot. Mark that for one point. True it is that when we fall to the considering of our own state and condition, we must not imagine that God is not merciful towards us, so we have our recourse to him. Yet notwithstanding, now and then to give the greater gloss to his own goodness and power, he will suffer us to be in some distress: insomuch that when we look about us, we shall cry out alas, how shall I do, what will become of me? We shall not know to whom we may betake ourselves: and when we have made all the shifts we can we shall be as folks half vanquished afore hand. But our God has wherewith to supply all our wants: only let us tarry his leisure and say with Josaphat, It is as easy for our God to give victory to a final number against an infinite number, as to give victory to a great army against a few folk all is one with him. So then, let us trust in him, let us stay ourselves upon his strength, and let us not doubt but he will give us wherewith to withstand all temptations that shall be laid afore us. And specially when Satan goes about to weaken our courages, and to cast us into despair: let us refill that. Thus you see what we have to remember upon this saying here, that although our enemies be never so strong, and never so able to overcome us: yet we must not be dismayed at it.

And indeed, we must take this for a general rule, that the welfare of the Church consists neither in horses, nor in Chariots, nor in Spears nor in any manner of armor or artillery but in the power of God, as is oftentimes vouched by the Prophets. And it is a lesson which is more than necessary for us: For if we should triumph to the worldward, and were of such power as were glorious to see too: what a thing were it? Gods glory should be diminished among us, and we would surmise ourselves to be preserved by our own means, so as we would not call earnestly upon God as were requisite we should, but our calling upon him would be but in way of Ceremony, or rather our hearts would be puffed up with pride and overweening. Now because we be so given to this over loftiness, God brings us low. And for the bringing thereof to pass, his will is to have us to be as sheep among wolves, destitute of all force and furniture, and hemmed in on all sides with such enemies, as are armed, furnished, and fenced in all points: so as by all likelihood we be as sheep that are dragged everyday to the slaughterhouse and have the knife setted continually to our throat to kill us. Since we be in such state, let us understand that our Lord will be glorified by us, and that he calls us to him, to the end that we resting wholly upon him, and putting all our trust in his goodness and protection, should call upon him, when we see the necessity pinch us, as they that should not know where to become, if he should not reach out his arm to helps us. Thus you see after what manner we ought to put this lesson in use, where it is said that in considering the power of our enemies, we must not be discouraged at it, be it never so great.

And let us mark how Moses uses many words here; the cause whereof is, that we cannot by and by overcome the fear wherewith we be caught when any peril seems to be towards us. You shall not fear it said he; your heart shall not quail, nor shrink, you shall not be dismayed at it; you shall not be afraid of it. See how he uses four sundry terms, to betoken one only thing. And yet is it no superfluity of speech. Whereat then did he look? Let every of us examine our own hearts and we shall find that God does not without cause stand so much upon this point, namely; we must not be afraid, nor astonished, nor dismayed, nor out of heart, nor discouraged, when we see the force & puiflance of our enemies. Truth it is that as long as we are far from blows, we can sleep soundly enough, and a man would wonder to see how blockish we be: and we bear ourselves in hand that newer any danger can come near us. But if it come to good earnest, and that we be once pinched: then it would pity ones heart to see how far we be out of countenance. Let GOD comfort us, and let him encourage us never so much, and all will not cheer up our hearts. For why? we be fore possessed with fearfulness which bears such sway in us, as we cannot be relieved of our discouragement. We see in what taking Achaz was; when he saw the City Jerusalem at the point to be besieged. Albeit that the Prophet Esay being sent unto him: promised him deliverance in that name of God: yet was he still like the leaf of a tree, as the similitude likens him in the same place, insomuch that he was in unquietness and vexation of mind, yea and quite besides himself for fear. True it is that he went about to repair the bulwarks of the city: but yet nevertheless he quaked still for fear. Be of good courage (said the Prophet to him) and fear not. Indeed you has two mighty Kings against you: for the king of Syria had ailed himself with the king of Israel. Well, well, indeed it is their meaning to burn up all: but yet for all that they be no better than a couple of smoking fire brands that do nothing else but smoke. There is some likelihood that they should make havoc of all things: but all this is nothing, God will set a stop in their way, be you quiet and still. Yet notwithstanding, this wretched man was so fore afraid, that he could not take any comfort. True it is that he did set a good face upon the matter, and he played the hypocrite so stoutly, that he would not ask a miracle when GOD offered it him. Demand some token of your God, said the Prophet. What, said he, shall I tempt my GOD? And yet nevertheless, he tempted him through his unbelief. And the Prophet Esay said unto him, Is it not enough for you to tempt the Lord, but you must also grieve those whom, he sends unto you, O you house of David? You royal and holy house, ought there to be such hypocrisy among you? Now since we see such an example in the successor of David who was a figure of our Lord Jesus Christ, let us bethink ourselves well, and understand that when we be so astonished, there is no way nor remedy to cheer up our hearts again, but by Gods own working after a marvelous fashion. And the case stands so with us, that we have such a root of unbelief in us, that until such time as we be grounded in GOD and in his promises, every fisking of a fly before our eyes will make us by and by afraid, accordingly as it is said that the wicked shall tremble for fear when no man pursues him. And we see that among other curses of the law, God threatens such as lean not unto him, that they shall be ever in a maze, not knowing where to become. Seeing then that this infirmity is so rooted in us by nature, let us learn to arm ourselves against it.

And moreover, let no fear so overmaster us when we come in danger, but that we may wade out of it again. And that we may so do, let us mark how it is said here, Be not dismayed, let not your hearts faint, be not discouraged. When as our Lord uses such manner of speech, it is all one as if he said, Go to, If I said no more to you but be not afraid: it ought to suffice you. But I see well that you will not cease to be afraid, even when you be allured on my behalf. Now therefore pluck up a good heart, and gather new strength to you, and stand to your tackling so stoutly, as you may in the end get the upper hand of all temptations that come before you. And hereby we be done to understand in few words, what we have to do when we see such trouble of mind in ourselves, that we cannot be comforted again out of hand. If one promise of God be not enough for us; let us go to another: and so forth to a third: yea and let us enforce ourselves to get the upper hand of all distress, so as the seed of unbelief may be utterly rooted out of our hearts. After that manner must we deal. When a man has heard one of Gods promises, if his mind be still out of quiet, let him strive with himself, and bethink himself thus: Although I be weak, yet must I not feed mine own folly, but I must strengthen myself in God. And how may I do that? Indeed I am too unthankful if I quiet not myself with any one promise of his. Is not the very opening of Gods mouth enough for me? Am I not too froward, if I believe not his saying? Yes: but for as much as this cursed unbelief reigns in me, I must fight against it: and the harder that the battle is, the more must we enforce ourselves. Then must God be honored at my hand, even in despite of the misbelief that is in me; so as his promise may prevail and I perceive the fruit thereof in me. And how so? [If one promise will not serve,) we must take a second. It is not once only that my God has said, I will help you but all the whole scripture is full of such promises. Again, when we see that does not yet sufficiently avail us: we must proceed further and take hold of another of Gods promises, and resolve ourselves by that. To be short, we must heap them up one upon another, so as Satan may be beaten back. And if we be not able to wrestle with him hand to hand, let us make us a fortress, or bulwark of Gods promises, yea let us make a Rampire and a double Ditch of them, so as the enemy may by no means come at us, but that we may boldly defy him. Thus you see that the thing which we have to gather upon this text, where Moses does so often repeat, that we must not be afraid of our enemies; is, that we must first consider the disease that is in our nature, namely that we be afraid as soon as any danger appears: and secondly that we must seek the remedy thereof, not by taking some small taft of Gods promises as it were at a glance only; but by letting our minds upon them, and by exercising ourselves daily in them.

After this here follows the reason. Because your GOD goes with you: yea even your GOD which brought you out of the Land of Egypt. Here Moses shows us that there is none other mean whereby we may overcome the fear of our enemies: but only by having recourse unto God. For as long as we stand weighing of our own strength, and stand gazing about us alas in what taking be we? Needs must we be continually turmoiled with a number of terrors and careful thoughts. Therefore if we will have good assurance & stoutness of courage, let us learn to resort simply unto God and to keep ourselves close under the shadow of his wings. And hereby we be warned, that all the hardness which men do build upon themselves, is accursed. If we put our trust in this or that, because we have maintenance and aid to overcome our enemies: if we tie our trust to that; woe to us. True it is that for a time we may be puffed up with wind, and we may bear ourselves in hand that nothing can daunt us: but in the end God will laugh such malapertness to scorn, & show how it was no better than smoke. And that is the cause why I said that the foundation of true stoutness, courage, and constancy, is to have our eye upon God, and to allure ourselves that he is on our side. Notwithstanding, it is not in us to send it; but we must embrace the promise which he makes to us. Your God (said he) will go with you. Yea verily, so we attempt not any thing without the warrant of his word, as I have said afore; and that we run not ahead: For God will not be our tennis ball to trot where so ever we will send him. But when we do him the honor to take him for our Captain and king, so as we fight under him, and enterprise not any thing which is not permitted us by his word; but yield him the whole sovereignty over us: we shall never be destitute of his help. Now then, when so ever we be scarred, and there is any occasion to make us afraid: let us learn to cast our eye upon God, and embrace the warrant that is given us here, which is that he will be ever at hand to succor us at our need. Yea verify: for he has not only taken upon him fluid, on of us; but also tells us that he will be an enemy to our enemies. Is it not a singular privilege that besides that our God vows himself to be the maintainer of our welfare, he tells us also that if men vex us and go about to do us any harm, they let themselves against him, and he puts himself as a shield betwixt them and us? The holy scripture is full of such similitudes. Sometime God is called our Rampire, sometime our high tower, sometime our bulwark and sometimes our shield. Again, when he will show how greatly he loves us: he that touches you (said he) touches the apple of mine eye, which feels or perceives all the harm that can be purposed against us. Seeing it is so then, that we have this warrant that God watches for us; let us not doubt but he is strong enough to confound all our enemies. And therefore let us yield him his deserved honor, in making no account of all the force of the world, forasmuch as we know that all that ever men can bring of their own, is but utter vanity and leasing in comparison of Gods arm. So then, it is a speech of great importance when as Moses sends folk unto God, saying, My friends, Never stand musing what you be of yourselves, but know for a certainty that you be able to do nothing. Though you had never so great furniture for the wars, yet have your recourse to your God, and be strong in him, and take courage there.

And he adds that it is God which brought them out of the land of Egypt. Whereby he means that they had found already by experience, that God was enough for them, and that they ought not to be astonished at the power of men. So long as God is on your side and maintain your part; never be afraid. For when the people came out of Egypt, what likelihood was there of their safety? When they were come to the red sea, was it not like that they should have been utterly undone? The sea was on the one side of them, and on the other side was Pharaoh with such a power, as it was impossible for them to have escaped his hand. True it is that the Israelites themselves were a great multitude of people. But what? Were they inured to feats of arms? No verily, they were as a flock of sheep, which had a rout of wolves hard at hand. There it appeared how God wrought for them. And therefore Moses puts them in mind of the things which they had felt and known before. As if he should say; your God has showed you sufficiently already by his doings, that you shall not be disappointed if you hang upon him. And his power is no whit abated. For as much then as you know that it is enough for you to be under his protection, hold yourselves still thereunto. Now the removing of the Israelites out of Egypt, was a putting of them in minds that God had given them a president after what manner he would maintain the state of his Church: that is to wit, after such manner as passes the reach of mans capacity. And let us mark that even at this day we must have the same rule still. For (as I have alleged already out of the Prophets) the welfare of the faithful consists not in the multitude of horses or of Chariots, or in the strength of armor or men of war; but in the goodness and help of God. And this is to be referred most peculiarly to our state under the reign of our Lord Jesus Christ. For it is the Christian Church which the Prophets speak of, when they use such kind of speeches. Since it is so, let us allure ourselves that the wonders which God wrought in bringing his people out of Egypt, are a sure warrant unto us that he will maintain us. So that, although it seem impossible to men, and although we be dismayed when we behold the power of our enemies and the weakness that is in ourselves: yet will God work about our capacity and understanding. That is one thing which we have to bear in minds.

Again, let us also mark therewithal, that all the experiences which God has given us afore, must allure us the better of our salvation, and make us to trust the more unto him, for his former succoring of us. And let us gather thereupon, that he can well find other means which we never thought of: and moreover, that his goodness diminishes not, and that he is always alike strong. Let us conclude that he is able to save us, so we resort unto him. And therefore let us bethink us of the gracious goodness that God has extended towards us aforesaid, and of the our that he has given us. And in considering those things, let us not only give him thanks for his showing of himself to be our preserver heretofore: but also let us take further matter and occasion to trust to him afterward, and to resort boldly unto him, and not to doubt but that he will continue as he began, until he have brought our salvation to full perfection. Now if this be spoken concerning our bodily enemies: much more reason have we to apply the same to Satan, to sin, and to all other things that fight against the endless fashion of our souls. But I cannot as now make any larger discourse of this matter. Let it suffice us for this time to make our benefit of this doctrine: which is, that if we resort unto our God, he has promised to preserve us, so as even when we be hemmed in on all sides, and we seem to be out of all hope, and men seem to have the upper hand of us, yea even the unbelievers whose only desire is to overthrow us: yet even then we may boldly and safely keep on our way. For why? We pass not what we ourselves be, nor what we can do: but forasmuch as God tells us that he will be at hand with us, and have pity upon us, and that he loves us in such wise that he will utter his wrath against our enemies, and be so inflamed at them as if their dealing were immediately with himself, and take the quarrel upon him as though the dishonor were offered to himself, and that defiance were made to his own person: forasmuch (say I) as we have such promise at his hand, let us trust boldly unto it, and walk on still in fear and reverence, praying him to vouchsafe to give us peace, and to maintain good agreement among us. And although it be his will to give bridle to the wicked, so as they do what they can against us: yet let not us cease to resort to him, forasmuch as we be sure that if we put our life into his hands, he will then himself a good and faithful keeper of it.
